The coming of Marcion to Rome makes up one of those concurrences which belong to the explanation of the historical position of Rome in the Catholic Church. The first of these concurrences was the residence there together of St. Paul, St. Peter and Simon Magus. The three great elements of Christian liberty, of liberal yet positive Judaism, and of Gnosticism, met for the first time in Rome in the persons of their original and greatest representatives. So, on his arrival, Marcion found there the full-blown Gnosticism of Valentinus and Cerdo, the Alexandrian descendants of Simon Magus through Menander; and he found these teachers spreading themselves in opposition to a Church fixed upon the Judaizing compromise of Peter, while he himself became known as the representative of extreme Paulinism. So far as we know, Marcion, whatever phraseology he may have taken in from Valentinus or Cerdo, was not to be regarded as a Gnostic, so far as Gnosticism involved a scholastic system, and still less so far as it revived the esoteric and aristocratically exclusive spirit of the pagan religions. His purpose was to reopen the question which seemed in danger of being closed for ever; whether Christianity were reformed Judaism or something distinct from it [Comp. Bunsen's Christianity and Mankind, v. i.]. He is rightly regarded by Neander as the opposite pole to the Judaizing Clementine Recognitions and Homilies put forth about the middle of the second century, and therefore during his residence in Rome.

In re-opening this great question, Marcion unhappily went far beyond the wisdom of St. Paul. So far was he from acknowledging the harmony between the Old and New Testaments, or allowing an allegorical interpretation, as St. Paul did, that he was led to reject the Old Testament altogether, because in the literal interpretation he found many things contrary to Christianity. For instance he accused the God of the Jews of cruelty in commanding them to tread on the necks of their enemies, and to hang the kings whom they invaded; nor would he allow, as Origen complains, that there could be an allegorical reference to the conquest of spiritual enemies in such a command [Origen, in Jesu Nave, Hom. xii.]. Many of the other difficulties that he made bear the stamp of a rugged simplicity of intellect, rather than of the deep and subtle malice with which his orthodox enemies continually charge him.

He went on to deny that the two books could have come from the same author. The Old Testament was from the God who made the world, the author of evil and fosterer of wars, whom he called the Cosmocrator (Irenæus), or Demiurge; the New Testament was from the Supreme, the Bonus Deus, the Invisible, who having long borne with the works of the Demiurge, at length, in the fulness of time, sent forth His Son to destroy them. Tertullian says that Marcion's supreme God, "better because of His tranquillity, came from the Stoics" [Deus melior de tranquillitate a Stoicis venerat, de Præsc. Her. 39], and that his whole system was patched together out of different philosophies. According to Epiphanius, while Cerdon had two, Marcion had three principles, the third being the Devil, intermediate however between the Bonus Deus and the Demiurge [p. 304, ed. Petavii, 1622]. The principles and details of his system, so far as he had one, are however chiefly interesting as they prompted his evil treatment of the records of Christianity, which seems to have caused him to be more feared and hated than any of the early heretics. He regarded Christ as the Son of the invisible and incomprehensible God, and therefore as incorporeal. Thus landed in Doceticism, he was led to mutilate the New Testament as unhesitatingly as he had rejected the Old. Of the Gospels, he is said by all the Fathers to have accepted only that according to St. Luke, and that much garbled; of the Epistles only those of St. Paul, and only ten of them, and those placed in an order of his own, thus: Galatians, 1 Corinthians, 2 Corinthians, Romans, 1 Thessalonians, 2 Thessalonians, Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, Philemon. To these he added some portions of a supposed epistle to the Laodiceans. He disposed them in two volumes, one of which he called the Evangelium, taking away from the title the name of St. Luke, the other the Apostolicum. Modern criticism has perhaps disproved that Marcion's Gospel was simply a designed mutilation and garbling of St. Luke; but, on the other hand, cannot succeed in proving that it was the original version of the same. [See Neander's Antignostik.]

Of these alleged mutilations and interpolations a long list is given by Epiphanius [i. 3]. Most of them are referable to Docetic or to Antinomian principles, yet many are slight and trivial, and might be nothing but various readings. It is impossible to tell which were due to Marcion himself, and which to his followers. In fact, it is impossible to tell to what extent Marcion tampered with the text of Scripture, although it is, at the same time, quite certain that he gave his opponents good reason for charging him with falsification. Tertullian goes upon the method of confuting him from what he himself admitted into his canon; and in so doing continually appeals to passages which, on the shewing of Epiphanius, he rejected or garbled. Again, it is by no means clear what Epiphanius means by his list. It is introduced apparently as a list of passages, corrupted or cut out by Marcion. Yet presently in his Scholium of Refutations these passages come over again as if they were common ground to him and his opponent [p. 322, Petavii ed. Par. 1622]. Again, after saying with Tertullian that Marcion only received ten of St. Paul's Epistles, he enumerates them all as received by him [p. 321]. It may be noticed that Irenæus says nothing of the rejection of any of St. Paul's Epistles, though he speaks of their mutilation.

The choice of St. Luke marks Marcion as the follower of St. Paul. Irenæus observes that while Marcion kept to St. Luke, the Valentinians as generally made use of the Gospel after John. It has been argued, that if the latter Gospel had been openly published in the days of Marcion, he would have preferred it to St. Luke [C. de Bunsen, Hidden Wisdom of Christ, ch. viii. vol. i. p. 477], even though St. John wrote against the Docetics.

The passages just mentioned in Irenæus can scarcely be held to make against the supposition that St. John's Gospel was unknown to Marcion. He speaks of Marcion, and then not of Valentinus, but of the Valentinians, a change which is very observable in reading the passage. Irenæus may refer to the Commentary on St. John by the Valentinian Heracleon in the latter part of the second century. Equally remarkable is the fact, that Marcion gave the first place in his Apostolicum to the Epistle to the Galatians, the most anti-Judaic and independent of St. Paul's writings. His rejection of the Epistles to Timothy (if true) may be explained perhaps from their directions about marriage and denunciation of forbidding to marry. Virginity, fasting, and the Sabbath, says Epiphanius, were enjoined by Marcion; but the Sabbath was a fast with him, because it was the rest of the Creator.

Epiphanius bears witness to the wide extent of Marcion's heresy in Italy, Egypt, Palestine, Arabia, Syria, Cyprus, and Persia.

Justin Martyr says that the Marcionites were not persecuted as the Christians were, which may have been because they could not be mistaken for Jews, and also because of the greater openness of their religious worship. Baptism, says Epiphanus, was thrice repeated among them, because Jesus twice spoke of having a baptism to be baptized with after His baptism by John. St. Augustine [de Bapt. iii. 15] seems to imply that they baptized in the Name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Women were allowed to baptize, to teach, to exorcise, to profess the gift of healing [Tert. de Præsc. Hær. 41]. The mysteries, says Epiphanius, were celebrated in the presence of the catechumens, and not only before the baptized entitled to communion [cf. Jerome, ad Gal. vi. 6]. Marcion thus appears as the combatant of hierarchical mystery and the advocate of congregational unity. The dismissal of the catechumens at a certain point in the divine service he regarded as an innovation foreign to the original simplicity of the Church. It was impossible, as Tertullian complains, to distinguish between catechumens and baptized in these celebrations; and if pagans entered, then that which was holy, even though not truly so, was cast to dogs. They made peace with everybody, of whatever opinions, it made no difference to them; they ordained everybody. They gave offices to neophytes, persons tied to the world, Christian apostates. Among them one man was bishop to-day, another to-morrow; the reader to-day, to-morrow would be deacon, to-day a presbyter, to-morrow a layman, for they committed the priestly offices even to laymen [de Præsc. Hær. c. 41]. Such was Marcion's restoration of the primitive or Pauline simplicity, as related by his great adversary.

Marcion denied the resurrection of the body; and, according to Epiphanius, believed in transmigration. Of his own works the most important was the Antitheses, or Oppositions between the Old and New Testaments, which is confuted by Tertullian in his fourth book against Marcion. Tertullian also mentions an epistle written by him [de Carne Christi, c. 2]. The only fragment of his writings is unfortunately a very brief one, preserved by Hippolytus [Bunsen, Christ. and Monk, vol. v. p. 99]. The date of his death is unknown. [The numerous passages in other ancient writers, besides those who expressly wrote about him, are collected by Ittigius, de Heresiarchis, sect. ii. c. 7; Tillemont, Mém. ii. p. 266; Beausobre, Hist. de Manichéisme, liv. iv. ch. v.-viii.; Lardner, Hist. of Heretics, bk. ii. ch. x. See also Cave's Hist. Lit. ad ann. 128, and Volkmar's Evangelium Marcions, 1852.]

MARCOSIANS. A sect of early Gnostics who were named after Marcus, a contemporary of Colobhasus and Heracleon, and perhaps a disciple of Valentinus. Irenæus seems to speak of him, when writing his book on heresies about the year 185, as still living; but also as if he had begun to propagate his heresy many years before.

This heretic is called "Marcus the Magician" by Irenæus in the beginning of the preface to his second book, and also "a perfect adept in magical impostures . . . joining the buffooneries of Anaxilaus" [Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxv. 15] "to the craftiness of the Magi" [Iren. adv. Hær. I. xiii. 1]. He narrates also that Marcus had, among other women, seduced the wife of "a certain Asiatic, one of our deacons" [ibid. 5], meaning apparently a deacon of the Church of Ephesus, which was the cradle of that of Lyons, where Irenæus was then writing. The strange cabalistic theory of letters attributed to Marcus appears likely also to have been derived from the system of "Ephesian letters," which formed a conspicuous part of the old Artemisian religion; and this confirms the other indications of an Ephesian origin for the Marcosian heresy. Such an origin will also account for the fact, that when Irenæus wrote a considerable number of the Marcosians existed in what he calls "our own district of the Rhone," where many women had been deluded by them [ibid. 7].

All that we know respecting the heresy of Marcus comes down to us from Irenæus, who wrote at some length about them, evidently influenced by their local association with the district of which he became bishop, and his consequent personal acquaintance with their tenets. Hippolytus and Epiphanius reproduced most of what he has said about them; while in Philaster, Augustine, and Theodoret, there are only short summary notices of the sect, gathered out of his account.

The first statement of Irenæus respecting Marcus is that he associated magical arts with the rites of Christianity. Consecrating cups of mingled wine and water in imitation of the Christian Liturgy (which he is said to have extended to great length), he contrived to give a purple red colour to the fluid; as if Charis, whom he spoke of as one of the highest Æons, had dropped her own blood into the chalice. Again, handing a mixed cup to one of his women disciples, he bade her consecrate it in his presence; and then, producing a larger chalice, he caused the wine and water to be poured from the smaller into the larger vessel, at the same time making the latter overflow with that which was naturally not nearly sufficient to fill it. The object of this apparent miracle, Irenæus says, was so to work upon the women as to draw them after him; and he suggests that it was done by the help of a familiar spirit. Upon this follow charges of great and systematic licentiousness, on the part both of Marcus and his disciples: their conduct being founded on the Antinomian plea, so common in later times, "that they have attained to a height above all power, and that therefore they are free in every respect to act as they please, having no one to fear in anything." For they affirm that because of the "redemption"—by which Harvey supposes they meant a second baptism, which removed them out of the power of the Demiurge—"it has come to pass that they can neither be apprehended nor seen by the judge" [ibid. 6].

The Marcosian mystery of the alphabet was partly similar in character to the numerical system of the Basilidians and Valentinians, but it was chiefly based on the apocalyptic saying of our Lord, "I am A and Ω." The key to the system seems to be that the letters of particular sacred names were used in such a manner that the name of each letter composing those names was again subdivided into its letters, and those letters set out at length as the foundation of a mystical meaning. Thus the name of our Lord being set out in this manner,—

Ἰῶτα	=	10
Ἡτα	=	8
Σίγμα	=	200
Ὀμικρόν	=	70
Τψιδόν	=	400
Σίγμα
Χζ	=	600
Ρῶ	=	100

Σίγμα
Ταυ	=	300
Ὀμικρόν
Σίγμα

the letters used in the names of the letters composing it, and in the names of the letters of those names, are α γ ε η ι κ λ μ ν ο π ρ σ τ υ φ χ ψ ω, which, with a little manipulation, might be turned into one or more pronounceable though unmeaning words.¹ Add to this that the numbers represented by the letters of the sacred name amount to 1688, and it is clear that the field of speculation laid open by this system is infinite, "letters," as Irenæus says, "continually generating other letters, and following one another in constant succession," and numbers arising in a still more prolific manner. The Greek Title placed upon the Cross would thus be made to contain all the letters of the alphabet except ζ θ ξ. So also the Greek name of the Dove resolved into numerals sums up the same amount as is represented by the two letters in question,—

ε	=	5	ω	=	800
ρ	=	100			801
ι	=	10
σ	=	200
τ	=	300
ε	=	5
α	=	1

and the word being exhaustively treated as before takes in all the letters of the alphabet, except ζ η θ χ. It is thus very likely that some recognized title of our Lord might be found, which might by this exhaustive process be made literally to represent the Α and Ω in the Marcosian sense.

From this alphabetical mystery was developed a system of Tetrads, Ogdoads, Decads, and Duodecads, in which the letters were in a manner personified, representing Æons, and even the Divine Persons themselves, with their attributes. And in connection with this theory of letters and numbers Marcosians provided themselves with a cosmogony, and a theory of creation, in which visible things were made to match the images of those that are invisible,—earthly Ogdoads, etc.,

of heavenly Ogdoads, and all of them proceeding from one supreme Monad.

That the Marcosians were ever a large sect does not seem to be likely from the little notice taken of them by writers later than Irenæus. Those in the East were probably absorbed into the great body of the Valentinian Gnostics, while in the West their mysticism was of a kind which was not likely to take hold upon the European mind, and would die out with the generation that imported it.

Prædestinatus says that Marcus was confuted before all the people, and afterwards excommunicated, by St. Clement of Rome [Prædest. Hær. xiv.]. St. Jerome makes him out to have been a Montanist [Hieron. Ep. xxix. Comm. in Isai. lxiv.]. Both of these are evidently mistakes either of date or person. Philaster and Augustine throw no further light upon his heresy than by saying that he denied the Resurrection.

MARDAITES. [MARONITES.]

MARONITES. The ecclesiastical, and now national name, of a Syrian tribe anciently known as the Mardaites, and inhabiting the slopes of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. Their present name is derived from a monk who probably taught them Christianity early in the eighth century, and who from his monastery of St. Maro on the river Orontes was known as John Maro or Marun. The Monothelite heresy was at that time prevalent in the Patriarchate of Antioch, and Maro was consecrated bishop by some of the Monothelite bishops, with the title of Patriarch of Antioch, that he might exercise his office as a missionary among the mountain tribes. The Maronites were thus Monothelites for five centuries, not becoming Mahometan (as so many Christian nations of the East became under similar circumstances) when they lost their independence by Mahometan conquest under Amurath in A.D. 992.

The Maronites gave up the Monothelite heresy under the influence of Aymeric, their titular Patriarch of Antioch, in the year 1182; and the Latin kingdom of Jerusalem being then established, they entered into communion with the Roman Church, their number being then about 40,000. On the final destruction of that kingdom, two centuries afterwards, the Maronites ceased for some time to have any intercourse with Western Christendom, but were formally reunited to Rome at the Council of Florence [A.D. 1445]. In the following century a Maronite college was founded at Rome [A.D. 1584], for the education of their clergy, and from it have proceeded several theologians of great eminence, especially the illustrious family of the Assemani, of whom Joseph Simon [A.D. 1687-1768] and his brother Joseph Aloysius [d. A.D. 1782] are among the greatest of Oriental scholars and liturgical writers.

Although the Maronites are in union with Rome, it has been found expedient to leave them in a condition of unusual independence. The election of their Patriarch is left entirely to themselves, and notwithstanding that a synod, held on Sept. 30th, 1736, subscribed to the decrees of the Council of Trent, they retain their own liturgical customs. They have bishops at Aleppo, Tripoli, Byblus, Baalbek, Damascus, Cyprus, Berytus and Tyre, and their patriarch resides in the monastery of Karnobin. In modern times they have suffered much persecution from the Druses. [Le Quien, Oriens Christ. iii. 10. Asseman. Biblioth. Orient. Vatican. i. 487. Neale's Eastern Ch. Introd. i. 153.]

MARROW MEN. In the year 1646, Edward Fisher, a lay member of Brasenose College, Oxford, published a compilation, chiefly from foreign Reformers and Puritan writers, on the subjects of Justification and Sanctification, in the form of a dialogue, which he entitled, The Marrow of Modern Divinity. About the year 1700, Thomas Boston having met with a copy in a farmhouse, in his then parish of Simprin, Berwickshire, was much attracted by it, and having recommended it to the notice of others, it was reprinted in 1718 at Edinburgh, with a preface by Thomas Hog, minister of Carnock in Fifeshire. The book excited considerable notice, and it is said to have been esteemed by many Presbyterians as next in value to the Bible and their Shorter Catechism; but a controversy arising upon some of the points in its teaching, an unfavourable report was made to the General Assembly by a committee appointed to examine it, and on May 20th, 1720, the Assembly formally condemned various propositions which it contained, and prohibited all ministers from using or recommending it. The propositions censured were to the following effect: [1.] That personal assurance is of the essence of faith; faith being a belief that Christ has done all for each individual. [2.] That Christ made a universal atonement (in sufficiency of merit) for the sins of all men, and that eternal life is offered to all in Him by the Father as by a deed of gift, although He died for the elect only, who were chosen before by an irreversible decree. [3.] That holiness is not necessary as a condition of salvation (although absolutely necessary as its accompaniment). [4.] That fear of punishment and hope of reward ought not to be motives of a believer's obedience. [5.] That the believer is not under the law as a rule of life. With these were condemned various extravagant Antinomian paradoxes, e.g. that the believer does not commit sin, that the Lord sees no sin in him, and is not angry with him for his sins, and that he has no cause to confess his sins or seek for pardon. Hereupon, twelve ministers (including Boston and the two Erskines) drew up a Representation, complaining of the Act of Assembly, and vindicating the teaching of the Marrow from the interpretation put on it; hence they became known in Scottish polemics by the names of Representers and Marrow Men. A somewhat modified or explanatory act was in consequence passed in 1722; but at the same time the prohibition against teaching the condemned propositions was strictly renewed, and the Representers, "because of the injurious reflections contained in their Representation," were ordered to be rebuked and admonished by the Moderator, "though their offence deserves a much higher censure." However, as is usual in such cases of ecclesiastical admonition, the Representers only protested against the new act, and forthwith proceeded to disobey it. The controversy, however, gradually died out, but the discontent engendered by it at length found vent in the Secession originated by Ralph and Ebenezer Erskine in 1734.

MARTINISTS. A school of religionists, formed originally by the Chevalier St. Martin a few years before the French Revolution broke out, as a kind of Pietistic freemasonry, but afterwards swept into the general tide of Republican infidelity by which France was overwhelmed.

St. Martin [A.D. 1743-1804] had originally been brought up to the bar, but exchanged the profession of the law for that of the army. Forming some opinions, however, against the lawfulness of war, he left the army and settled down as a private gentleman at Paris. There he became acquainted with a Portuguese named Martinez Pasqualis, who had elaborated a peculiar mystical system of Christian philosophy, which seems to have contained a good deal of Cabbalistic Gnosticism, and who afterwards emigrated to St. Domingo, where he died in the year 1799. From the instructions of Martinez, and from his own studies, St. Martin became a mystic of the class called Theosophists, and he appears to have been an ardent student of the works of Jacob Boëhm and Emanuel Swedenborg. His indignation was excited by a work of Boulanger, in which was revived the ancient tenet of Atheists, that all religions have had their origin in the terror of mankind at some great convulsions of nature. To this work St. Martin replied in 1775, in a volume, an English edition of which was published at Edinburgh, under the title Error and Truth, a book written in obscure and mystical language, apparently with the intention of shewing that all true religions contain common elements of Christianity. In the preface to this he says, "Though the light be made for all eyes, it is still more certain that all eyes are not made to behold it in its brightness; and the small number of those who are the depositaries of the truths which I announce are bound to prudence and discretion by the strictest engagements. Therefore I have allowed myself to use a great reserve in this country, and oftentimes to cover myself with a veil, through which even eyes that are not ordinary ones cannot always pierce, especially as I speak sometimes of something altogether different from that of which I seem to be treating." This reference to a secret understanding between him and his followers led to the supposition that St. Martin was engaged in a revolutionary plot, and it has been asserted that he was connected with the notorious secret society of Jacobins, formed at Avignon by Count Grabianca, a Polish refugee, and the Benedictine monk Pernetty. But the secrecy really referred to a new order of freemasonry, with masonic signs, hieroglyphs, &c., of which lodges were formed in several parts of France, especially at Lyons and Montpellier, and by means of which St. Martin was endeavouring to spread his theosophy. Barruel says that St. Martin's book circulated more widely even than the writings of Voltaire. It was especially read by ladies, whose "dressing-rooms were metamorphosed into secret schools, where the interpreting adept developed the mysteries of each page, and the novice in ecstasy applauded the mystery which was hidden from the vulgar. Little by little the novice herself became an interpreter, and founded a species of school. This is not a mere assertion," continues Barruel; "such schools for the explanation of the code existed at Paris and in the provinces, particularly at Avignon, the headquarters of the Martinists. I was and am acquainted with several persons who were introduced to these schools." Such a circulation must have tended greatly to the promotion of infidelity; for, among all its mystical nonsense, the book contains such statements as that man is antecedent to any being in nature, existing in spirit before he existed in body, and being of the same essence as God Himself.

After publishing several other works, and extending his societies into Russia, where they were more successful than in France, St. Martin printed his last book in the year 1802, entitling it Ministère de l'homme esprit, par le Philosophe inconnu. This was an attempt to shew that Christianity exists as something separate from the doctrines of the Church, and that the latter are only a means by which to attain the former; that there is in fact, as is so often asserted by Pietists, but so often disproved by the history of religion, an "undogmatic Christianity" which is the true theosophy or knowledge of God.

There is probably no truth in the bitter accusations of Jacobinism which Barruel brings against St. Martin; but there can be little doubt that the charges are true as regards those who called themselves after his name. [Didot's Nouv. Biogr. Univ. Gregoire's Hist. des Sectes Relig. ii. 217. Barruel's Mémoires du Jacobinisme, Eng. ed. ii. 339-355.]

The Martinists were transplanted to Russia during the reign of Catharine II. by Grabianca, already mentioned as one of the Avignon Jacobins, and the Russian Admiral Pleschkeyoff. There also they attempted to promote their principles by the formation of masonic lodges and confraternities, and professed to devote themselves to the study of the writings of Swedenborg, Boëhm, Eckartshausen, and other mystics. A large library was established at Moscow for the purchase, and a printing-press for the publication, of moral and religious literature, to which free access was permitted to young men of talent, who were even searched out and offered pecuniary assistance for the development of their powers. But the suspicion of revolutionary societies hung about them, justly or unjustly, and the Empress Catharine persecuted their leading members in various ways. Norikoff was imprisoned in a fortress; the wealthy Lapookhin, Prince Nicholas Trubetzkii, and Tourgheneff were banished from Moscow to their own estates; and although under her successors, the Emperors Paul I. [A.D. 1796-1801] and Alexander I. [A.D. 1801-1825], rather more liberty was allowed, the whole genius of the Russian nation was against them, and its ecclesiastical conservatism and social traditions have prevailed.

MARTIN MARPRELATE. [PURITANS.]

MARTYRIANI. [EUCHITES.]

MASBOTHEANS. An obscure sect of Jewish freethinkers who denied the Providence of God, said that the world was formed by a spontaneous motion, and denied the immortality of the soul.

This statement rests on the authority of the Apostolic Constitutions, and on the assumption that the Basmotheans there named [vi. 6] are no other than the Masbotheans. This assumption is most probably correct; and if so, the Masbotheans were Jews who had learnt the philosophy of Epicurus. Hegesippus [in Euseb. H. E. iv. 22] undoubtedly speaks of a Jewish sect of Masbotheans, but (supposing the text to be correct) his words certainly imply a Christian sect of the same name. Valesius concludes that the text is corrupted. Later notices however shew, that in one particular the Masbotheans alleged the authority of our Lord's teaching, and from this may have sprung the notion of a Christian sect of this name. Pseudo-Hieronymus mentions the Masbotheans thus, "Masbothei dicunt ipsum esse Christum qui docuit illos in omni re sabbatizare" [Indic. iii.]. Isidore of Hispalis repeats the words. In this statement there are two difficulties; first, a rigid Sabbatism is quite inconsistent with the denial of the creation of the world and of God's Providence; and secondly, it is not easy to see how our Lord's teaching, by any amount of plausible misrepresentation, could be quoted in favour of it. Instead then of giving up the identification of the Basmotheans and Masbotheans, and asserting the existence of a Judæo-Christian sect of Sabbatarians, distinguished only by the rigour of their Sabbatism from the ordinary practice of the Jewish Christians, it may be allowed us to conjecture that the Masbotheans were the very reverse of rigid Sabbatarians; that they availed themselves of Christ's teaching to proclaim that men are lords of the Sabbath [compare Clem. Alexand. Strom. III. iv., who says that the Gnostics claimed to be lords of the Sabbath]; that their opponents retorted by asserting their Sabbath to be a sabbath of desolation, of Gentile domination, giving it a name from Lament. i. 7;¹ for in that passage the sabbath which the adversaries derided was the desolation of the land [see 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21; Lev. xxvi. 34]. From the word signifying "cessations" the name Masbotheans was given to the sect, and later writers, knowing the derivation of the word from "Sabbath," erroneously imagined Masbotheans to mean Sabbatarians.

MATERIALISTS. Materialism reverses the creed of all philosophical systems, which assert that spirit is at least co-eternal with matter, whereas the Materialist affirms matter to be the first and only principle, of which mind is a derived result. Its congener Naturalism endues matter with a soul of life, while Sensualism derives all intellectual and moral phenomena from matter and from the material impressions of sense. The three may be treated as modifications of one principle. Materialism dates from the school of Epicurus. Naturalism, which is only another term for Pantheism, was Spinoza's logical result from the Cartesian theory. He in fact begins where Descartes ends. While Sensualism, as developed by Locke, became the creed of the Encyclopédistes of France in the last century, Materialism may be referred back to its origin through Epicurus [B.C. 300], Leucippus, and Democritus [B.C. 500], to the far more ancient Moschus [Cudworth, Intell. Syst. I. i. 10]. Epicurus, however, gave roundness and consistency to the atomic theory, and may be considered virtually to have been its founder; and later Materialists have added little to the principles derived from him. The universe, he said, is atomic; it is uncreate and imperishable.

"Docui nil posse creari
De nihilo, neque item genita ad nihilum revocari."
[Lucr. i. 265.]

There is an infinity of worlds such as ours, and space is boundless. The component elements of all things are indivisible and indestructible atoms. They alone are the first cause of all things. They have from all eternity a gravitating movement through empty space, of infinite swiftness. This movement is the work of blind chance, of which the whole cosmic system is the result. The soul of man is material, and is wholly dissolved by death through a redistribution of its atoms. Modern Materialism accounts for mental phenomena as the products of cerebral organism, chemically acted upon by the phosphates of the blood. Passion and reason are only the result of a congeries of atoms variously combined, and acted upon through chemical affinities. The addition or subtraction of certain elements and properties determine the action of the human machine in the direction of what moralists term respectively virtue and vice.¹ Modern Epicureanism makes bodily sense to be the only source of human knowledge. That alone is infallible and sure, the fountain-head of every mental perception. Generalization is only a memory of many antecedent relative perceptions. These, variously combined, cause the phenomena of judgment, will, determination. The reflective habit of the mind, apart from sensible impression, generates error; sensible impression alone is truth. Bodily sense, physical fact, material impulse, bear the stamp of reality; such notions as soul and spirit begin and end in fallacy. The illogical assumptions of such a system are transparent. From whence did the movement of these atomic corpuscles derive its first impulse, and how can it possibly account for the various phenomena of creation? Whence come memory and mental reflection? How are unalterable mathematical truths to be referred to the impact of bodily sense? How is the religious idea, the birthright alike of savage and of sage, a result of material combination? If this be maintained, then each religious being must have been subject to the same external accidents to be productive of the same internal perception. Whatever occupies space is capable of more or less, and is divisible, how then are these indivisible atoms the tenants of space? They are not to be appreciated by the senses, how then are they the elements of all truth, which it is assumed is only cognizable through the senses? How is life the result of myriads of atoms fortuitously thrown into juxtaposition? If some dead mechanism could possibly result from such chance arrangement, life would still be wanting to it; where, then, in such a system, is there room for the attribute of life? Whence also these teeming proofs of design with which the universe abounds, so far as it can be tested by the human intellect, if blind chance be the universal mother? Could accident be productive of so much regularity? Bodily enjoyment is the mainspring of morality in the Materialist school. Virtue and vice are only the bodily advantage or pain caused by the rewards and punishments awarded by society, with a view to its own ease and comfort.

¹The banter of Pope scarcely involves greater improbability than the misty reasoning of the Materialist. "We are so much persuaded of the truth of this our hypothesis, that we have employed one of our members, a great virtuoso of Nuremberg, to make a sort of hydraulic engine, in which a chemical liquor resembling blood is driven through elastic channels resembling arteries and veins, by the force of an embolus like the heart, and wrought by a pneumatic machine of the nature of the lungs, with ropes and pulleys, like the nerves, tendons, and muscles; and we are persuaded that this, our artificial man, will not only walk and speak and perform most of the outward actions of the animal life, but, being wound up once a week, will perhaps reason as well as most of your country parsons." [Pope's Works, v. 57.]

The Epicurean system was widely prevalent when Christ appeared. Platonic and Peripatetic notions were easily capable of being reconciled with the faith of Christ. Stoic severity was asceticism in the embryo; but Materialism could never harmonize with a true theology. "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," was the universal maxim; "true," said the Apostle, "and after that the judgment." And it was that sure doctrine of a future life after this world of matter is dissolved that arrested the step of sages and easy-going men of the world, and shewed to them a more excellent way than the sensual principles of Epicurus. We owe to Platonic and Pythagorean notions a debt of gratitude in the early ages of the Church, for keeping Materialism in abeyance. In the seventeenth century, Locke's purely objective and sensualistic theory revived more than one principle of the Epicurean philosophy. As in the older system, all thought and knowledge were based upon sensible perception, so also Locke traced both back to the experience of the senses. There is nothing in the intellect, he said, that was not first in the sense ; to which Leibnitz added the rider, "nothing, if you except intellect." But when Locke referred all our ideas to experience, he made a twofold distinction ; there is experience of sensation, referring to the external world, and experience of reflection, which is of internal action. Hence the mental phenomena of retention, involving attention, memory, reproduction ; and discernment, including comparative and complex ideas, abstraction and generalization ; hence also the importance of observation, and of variously combining the results of experience in habits of thought. We owe to Locke those clearer psychological views that now exist, and for this reason his influence as a teacher is permanent. In his essay he determines the nature and limitation of the understanding ; a subject that had never yet engaged the attention of the philosopher. Yet while he indicates the only safe road of knowledge, he moves along it with an uncertain step, and confines himself to a narrow and exclusive path that is wholly inconsistent with the vastness and grandeur of his general direction. [Cousin, École Sensualiste]. All idea of God, and of a moral law written on the heart, co-extensive with humanity, and therefore innate in human consciousness, as Descartes taught, is discarded. A guiding and overruling Providence is ignored : but there was the phenomenon of intellect to be accounted for, and brute matter could never evolve intellect ; therefore the notion of Deism was supplemented, cold, unsympathizing and comfortless—a "caput mortuum" of religious belief, a "Deus ex machinâ," because no modern system could stand without it. The philosophical notion of a Deity became the involucre of other moral and religious ideas, such as the freedom of human action ; the probability first, and then the necessity, of a Divine revelation to help out man's need of a higher knowledge than is attainable through the senses. But there was no more substantive relation between the Deism and the intellectual system of Locke than between thought and action in the pre-established harmony of Leibnitz.

As Spinoza gave a development to the Cartesian idea that was never intended, so the theory of Locke led to a more open and undisguised advocacy of Materialism by French writers in the second half of the eighteenth century, such as the naturalist Bossuet ; Diderot, projector of the Encyclopédie ; D'Alembert ; Condorcet, who poisoned himself to avoid the guillotine [A.D. 1794] ; La Mettrie, the title of whose works sufficiently declare his principles, The Natural History of the Soul, The Man-Machine, The Man-Plant. Voltaire also was an intense admirer of Locke ; and Helvetius exhibited the moral code of sensualism. Condillac [born A.D. 1715, died 1780] presents the exceptional case of a thorough acceptance of the metaphysical principles of Locke, combined with a hearty spiritualism and a higher view of the nature of God and the duties and destiny of man. He applied his method to the whole curriculum of human knowledge, and inherited, for a time at least, in the French schools the old Cartesian influence. He represents a school that, adopting his sensualistic basis, by a similar inconsistency remained faithful to every spiritual instinct, the immortality of the soul, and the moral duties of man as a religious being. But after his day an undisguised return to Epicurean Materialism became perceptible. Thus the Baron Holbach, who died in the first year of the French Revolution, advocated a Materialistic Atheism. The work Le Système de la Nature, ou des lois du monde physique et moral, published under a dead name, but written either by or under the guidance of Holbach, was a revival of Democritic Atheism. Nothing exists, it says, but matter, which is eternal, and subsists as a vortical motion of infinite atoms. Man is wholly material ; his soul is the result of bodily organism ; thought and will are mere modifications of cerebral matter. Belief in God and in the immateriality of the soul are fond notions that originate in a mistaken resolution of the one incomposite function of nature. Man is no more a free agent than an heir of eternity. Blind chance is his moving power, and a final resolution into constituent atoms is his ultimate destiny. Self-interest is the guiding principle of all, and human society is based on the antagonism of conflicting principles. Holbach is the unhappy type of many other kindred spirits of the same school.

In England, Priestly, as attached to the Encyclopédist school of thought, undertook to demonstrate the materiality of the soul. But Locke's system met with a by no means universal acceptance at home. Dr. S. Clarke attacked it on Newtonian principles ; Cumberland and Shaftesbury recoiled from the moral conclusions that it indicated ; while Berkeley's exaggerated idealism was in direct antagonism to it. Hume converted it into a thoroughgoing scepticism that furnished out the more subtle reasonings of Kant. The Scotch school followed the theory of Locke, but gave it a higher tone. It is represented by the honoured names, among others, of Reid, Adam Smith, and Dugald Stewart.

There can be little doubt but that the tendency of physical investigation is to encourage Materialism. While the inductive mind is only led by such researches to a purer and more spiritual perception of God's ways in the world around it ; the mind to which the thought of God is no thought of love sees in the operation of mutually harmonious laws no more than ultimate results ; principles that are in themselves all that is divine ; necessary antecedents of the inevitable consequence. An all-wise benevolent Deity being denied, the spirit of man is also ignored. It is only a result of material organism. The many know nothing of speculative infidelity ; but unfortunately its results are easily massed and assimilated. Thus the Materialism of Paris in the last century is producing its fruit in our great centres of industry now. To earn, to enjoy, and to die, is accepted as its whole destiny by many a deathless soul. It is the mission of the Church to grapple with this gigantic evil ; to apply its remedy in giving a better form to the plastic intellect of youth; and to reclaim older hearts, when experience of the unsatisfying nature of the world has prepared the way for God's ordained ministry of discipline.

No nearer approach to theoretical Materialism has been made in any English system than in the sensualism of Locke, and it has sunk English thinkers to no lower deep than Deism. But Materialistic teaching has pushed itself to the front in Germany. An account of the works that advocate it, with their respective answers, may be seen in Fabri's article in Herzog's Encyclopædia.

MATHEMATICI. Astrologers, "Qui dicunt hominem nasci sub fato, id est, substella" [Ebrard, in Bibl. Max. Lugd. xxiv. 1575]. St. Augustine writes, "Those impostors whom they call 'Mathematicians' I consulted without scruple: because they seemed to use no sacrifice, nor to pray to any spirit for their divinations: which art, however, Christian piety consistently rejects and condemns" [Aug. Conf. iv. 3; cf. Civ. Dei, v. 5]. Philaster mentions, as a distinct heresy, the belief that every man is born under the influence of one or other of the signs of the Zodiac, a notion, he says, derived from the Mathematicians, "illi vanissimi totiusque erroris et sceleris adsertores" [Philast. Hæc. cxxiii.]. Priests were forbidden to be Mathematicians by the 36th Canon of Laodicea [circ. A.D. 350].

MATTHIAS OF JANOW. One of those earnest preachers of a spiritual reformation who preceded Huss at Prague. He was the son of a Bohemian knight, and received a high education in the University of Paris, from which fact he came to be named "Magister Parisiensis." After spending some years in travel, he returned to Prague, and came under the influence of the ascetic preacher MILITZ, upon whose death at Avignon in 1334, Matthias took up his work, though in a more sober spirit. He also followed Militz in enjoining frequent communion upon his converts; and although neither of them were Utraquists, their teaching eventually led to the revival of communion in both species. Matthias was obliged to retract some of his opinions on the subject before the Synod of Prague which met in the year 1388, and a canon was then enacted forbidding laymen to communicate more frequently than once a month. He died in 1394, ten years after Wickliffe (on whose writings his opinions were partly formed), leaving behind him two works on The Abomination of Desolation in the Church and on The Rules of the Old and New Testament. These books both contain many severe censures of the monks and clergy for the corruptions which had grown up in the Church, and are known chiefly through the voluminous summary given in Neander's Church History.

MAXIMIANI. The followers of a Donatist deacon named Maximian, who quarrelled with Primitian, the schismatic bishop of Carthage, in the latter part of the fourth century, and who, on being excommunicated at the Donatist Council of Bagai [A.D. 398], set up a rival sect of his own. The main point in which he differed from Donatus was in holding that valid baptism could be administered outside the Donatist communion. [Augustine, de Hæres. 69. Contra Cresconium Donatist. iv. 70].

MECHARISTIANS. See APPENDIX.

MELCHIORISTS. A sect of Strasburg Anabaptists, taking its name from a leader named Melchior Hoffmann. They denied the chief point of the doctrine of the Incarnation, namely, that our Lord was made Man "of the substance of His mother." They also held to the ordinary extravagances of the Anabaptists; and after Hoffmann's death, his followers alleged that he would come again before the judgment in company with the prophet Elijah. [Paget's Heresiography, p. 37, ed. 1662.]

MELCHISEDECHIANS. Theodotus the Banker added to the tenets of the Theodotians the following opinion concerning Melchisedech. He affirmed that Melchisedech was not a man but a heavenly power, unbegotten (ἀπαύρω, ἀμήτωρ), located in a supreme but unnamed place; superior to Christ in that He is the mediator and intercessor for angels, whereas Christ is such only for men, the true priest, of whose priesthood the priesthood of Christ was only an inferior copy. This tenet formed a branch of the Theodotians into a separate sect. The founder of the sect being the younger Theodotus, and the sect being mentioned by Hippolytus, it must be dated about A.D. 210.

What was really meant by an unbegotten heavenly power does not appear. Hierax afterwards gave the words the only definite meaning they can bear, and plainly declared Melchisedech to be the Holy Ghost. [HIERACITES.] So an anonymous author is mentioned by Jerome, who began by asserting Melchisedech to be a divine power, and at last dared to identify him with the Holy Spirit [Hieron. Ep. 126, ad Evagrium].

Theodotus' notion is clearly connected with his heresy regarding our Lord [THEODOTIANS], and it is plainly heretical to assert a mediation and priesthood superior to that of Christ's. Lardner's remark, therefore, that Epiphanius might as well have made a separate heresy of each of the opinions he has named regarding Melchisedech is unworthy even of a Unitarian. Peter Cunæus and Peter du Moulin held Melchisedech to be the Son of God; Hierax, and the author of Questions on the Old and New Testaments,¹ the Holy Ghost; Origen and Didymus, it is said, a created angel; the Samaritans, Shem; Jurieu, Ham; Suidas, of the race of Canaan.

The first of these opinions is admissible for trial, inasmuch as a Theophany may be catholically predicated of the Second Person of the Holy Trinity, but on trial it will be found that a Theophany such as others were before the Incarnation will not fulfil the necessary conditions. To hold Melchisedech to have been the Son of God must imply a true incarnation, which it would be heretical to assert. The second opinion is not even admissible for trial. A Theophany of the Holy

Spirit cannot be supposed. The third opinion is admissible for trial, inasmuch as the appearance of an angel is very conceivable. It will be rejected on the ground that, since the Son of God became Mediator and Priest by taking man's nature, the priesthood which was to prefigure His priesthood could not have been that of an angel. Opinions of the fourth class are historical speculations. [Jerome, Trad. Heb. in Genes.]

Timotheus Presbyter alleges that the Melchisedechians were in his time called Athingani, and attributes to them very strict practices respecting the pollution of food by the touch of those who were not of their sect.¹ [Hippol. Refut. vii. 24. Epiph. Hær. 55. August. et Prædest. 34. Theod. Hær. fab. ii. 6. Pseudo-Tert. xxiv.]

MELCHITES. A term signifying "royalists," or "followers of the King" (Melcha), and used as a designation for the orthodox Egyptians to distinguish them from the Jacobites. It was used by some orthodox writers in the early part of the fifth century; and after the Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451] was adopted by the Jacobites as the ordinary name for the orthodox, on the pretence that the latter had accepted the decrees of the council solely on the authority of the Emperor Marcian, by whom the council had been summoned. When the Mahometan caliphs became rulers of Egypt, the title thus fastened on and accepted by the orthodox was looked upon as a sign of their adherence to the Eastern emperors; and the Melchites, who had been reduced to a comparatively small number, suffered further troubles on this account. In more recent times, the few orthodox Christians of Egypt have given up their independence to so great an extent that the name Melchite has acquired a further meaning, their close connection with the Patriarch of Constantinople making them appear as foreigners, with Greek customs and ceremonial, rather than as native Christians of Egypt. [Renaudot's Hist. Patriarch. Alex. Jacob. Neale's Hist. Patr. Alex.]

MELETIANS. A schismatical party in the Church of Alexandria, formed [A.D. 306] by Meletius, Bishop of Lycopolis in the Thebaid. Athanasius, in his Epistle to the bishops of Egypt and Libya, written A.D. 361, says that the schism had then lasted fifty-five years. No heresy is charged to the sect until after the Council of Nicea, when the Meletians embraced Arianism, influenced by a common hostility against Athanasius.

The schism arose from a refusal of Meletius to submit to a sentence passed on him by his metropolitan, Peter of Alexandria. In a full synod of bishops Meletius was convicted of certain crimes, and particularly of sacrificing. He was therefore deposed. The sentence, it must be observed, did not imply suspension from communion [see Apost. Can. 18]. Meletius neither appealed to another synod, nor took any pains to vindicate himself, but presently made a schism [Athan.]. Theodoret gives the same account of the origin of the schism. He writes, that Meletius being convicted of certain crimes, and deposed, would not submit to the sentence, but rebelled against the primacy of Alexandria, and filled the Thebaid and the neighbouring part of Egypt with strife and tumult [Hist. i. 9]. That at an early period he took the final step of schism, by intruding into other dioceses, and erecting altar against altar, is shewn by the letter addressed to him by certain Egyptian bishops who were then in prison. The letter was probably written by Phileas. It states, "Qualem etiam commotionem et tristitiam communiter omnibus, et singillatim unicuique, præbuit a te facta ordinatio in parocciis ad te minime pertinentibus, nec dicere etiam prævalemus."² Meletius paid no attention to the remonstrance, but continued his irregular ordinations. Consequently, Peter, by letter to the Church of Alexandria, suspended him from communion until the case should be duly heard. The result of this hearing we may conclude to be that which is told by Sozomenus [i. 15], that Peter excommunicated the adherents of Meletius, and rejected their baptism. The defence set up by Meletius appears to have been, that it was necessary for him to act in Peter's absence, in order that a sufficient supply of clergy might be maintained. Peter had fled to avoid persecution, and the Bishop of Lycopolis, ranked next to him, was the first of the suffragans of Alexandria. This plea is answered by the Egyptian bishops in the letter already quoted [Sozom. i. 24; Routh's Reliq. Sac. iv. p. 92]. The numbers that adhered to Meletius were considerable. Athanasius mentions twenty-eight bishops of his party, but of these the larger number at least were Meletius' own consecration. Socrates speaks of his many followers [Socr. H. E. I. iv.]. He did not yield therefore to this second sentence, but ordained bishops as well as priests and deacons, and even extended his sect into Palestine, where he visited Jerusalem, Eleutheropoli and Gaza.

It will be observed that in these later proceedings against Meletius he is dealt with simply as a schismatic: the crimes of which he had been convicted, and the subsequent deposition, are not noticed. Particularly Peter, in his letter to the Alexandrians, charges him, so far as appears, only with coveting the primacy. Whether any doubt had arisen as to the validity of the sentence of deposition, or whether some motive of prudence dictated its suppression, it is impossible to say. But Meletius had passed from the simple sin of disobedience to the sentence into the wider sin of creating a schism, and that wider sin appears to have been dealt with exclusively. In this light the matter was presented to the Council of

Nicæa, but we can only understand the language of the Council by supposing that it contains at least an allusion to the earlier proceedings. The Council declared by canon [Can. vi.] that the bishop of Alexandria by ancient custom, the maintenance of which it enjoined, had power over the Bishops of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis. It decreed that Meletius should remain in his own city Lycopolis, retaining the title and dignity of a bishop, but without the power of ordaining, or of promoting any one to an ecclesiastical office; that those whom he had ordained were capable of reordination, and might be so admitted to communion, and to the same grade of the ministry, provided that they always ranked after the clergy of Alexander's ordination. They were not to elect to any office in the Church, nor to do any thing without the consent of the Catholic bishop. They might, however, be made bishops, if the Bishop of Alexandria should confirm their election by the people [Synodical Ep. to the Church of Alex.; Theod. H. E. I. ix.; Socr. H. E. I. ix.]. The Nicene Fathers take credit to themselves for dealing leniently with Meletius. This is intelligible only on the supposition that they waived inquiry into the earlier charges. Against Meletius and his party, as schismatics, the sentence was not lenient, it was just. It may be contrasted with the terms on which the Church received back the Donatists, whose ordinations were admitted. "The Church did not always allow of the ordinations of schismatical or heretical bishops, but sometimes for discipline's sake, and to put a mark of infamy on their errors, made them take a new ordination" [Bingham's example in illustration of this remark in the case of the Meletians]. He adds, "In pursuance of this decree, Theodore, Bishop of Oxyrinchus, reordained the Meletian presbyters upon their return to the Church; as Valesius shews out of Marcellinus' and Faustinus' petition to the Emperor Theodosius" [Orig. IV. vii. 7; Valesius, Not. in Theod. H. E. i. 9].¹ Meletius lived but a few months after the Council of Nicæa. During this time, in obedience to the council, he remained at Lycopolis, and when Alexander returned to Egypt, restored the churches which had been unjustly taken from him. But his obedience was not sincere; for shortly before his death he appointed John Archaph his successor. This was contrary to the conciliar decree, and can only have been done from a desire to keep up the schism [Sozom. H. E. II. xx.]. Alexander died shortly after Meletius, and in the absence of Athanasius, who was recommended to be his successor, the Meletians consecrated Theonas. But Theonas died in three months, and Athanasius was elected [Epiph. Hæc. lxxviii.]. The Meletians now joined the Arians at the solicitation of Eusebius of Nicomedia, and the larger number of them adopted the Arian heresy [ARIANS]; but the schism continued into the fifth century, and adopted childish practices, lustrations, with clapping of hands, dancing with the tinkling of little bells [Theod. Hæc. fab. iv. 7].

Epiphanius gives an account of the origin of the Meletian schism altogether different from the foregoing. He states as follows:—In the Diocletian persecution, Peter, Meletius, and other confessors were together in prison. Upon the application of certain who had fallen in the persecution to be admitted to penance, disputes arose regarding their reception. Meletius, Peleas, and very many others, held, that when the persecution had ceased, they might be received after a fitting period of penance, but the clergy to lay-communion only. Peter, on the other hand, thought they might be admitted immediately upon repentance. The separation was caused by Peter rather than by Meletius, for Peter called for a division: "Let those who think with me stand by me"—from which time they refused to communicate with one another. When Peter was put to death, and Alexander succeeded him, Meletius was sent to the Phœnician mines in Arabia Petræa.² In his journey he ordained bishops, priests, and deacons wherever he could. When liberated from the mines, he lived in friendship with Alexander, to whom he reported the heretical teaching of Arius. After the death of Meletius, Alexander began to persecute the Meletians, upon which, through the intervention of Eusebius of Nicomedia, they joined the Arians.

Epiphanius' authority for this statement is not given. Athanasius, from his friendship with Alexander, and his possession of the records of the see, had the best possible means of information. It is a singular estimate of evidence which sets aside his testimony on the authority of Epiphanius' anonymous report. Lardner remarks that Athanasius was prejudiced, and wrote in a passion, while he gravely adduces, on the other side, Meletius' testimony in his own favour; "Meletius always complained of injustice" [Credib. ch. lxi.]. But there are several things in Epiphanius' statement inconsistent with documentary evidence. He reports that the schism was formed while Meletius was a prisoner. The letter of the Egyptian bishops is addressed to Meletius at liberty. The report of Peter's dealing with the lapsed is inconsistent with Peter's own canons. [See Nat. Alexander, vol. vii. diss. viii. Routh, Rel. Sacr. iv. pp. 105-111.]

MELETIANS OF ANTIOCH. One of the two communions into which the orthodox of the Church of Antioch were divided from about A.D. 360 to A.D. 393. The other communion was that of the Eustathians. Theologically, they differed only in the use of the terms employed in stating the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, the Meletians following the Eastern usage, the Eustathians the Western usage. This difference of usage was not the cause of the separation of the two bodies, but was superadded to the schism. The schism resulted from Meletius, a prelate of the Arian party, being deposed for avowing the Nicene faith, and gathering round him some of the old orthodox party. The circumstances were as follows :—

In the year 329, Eustathius, a Catholic, was in rightful possession of the see of Antioch. In A.D. 330 or 331 he was deposed, uncanonically, on calumnious charges by the prevailing Arian party, and a series of Arian prelates succeeded. Besides their heresy these prelates were intruders. Many of the orthodox seceded from their communion, but some submitted, and kept alive an orthodox party in the midst of the Arian communion. About A.D. 360, Meletius, Bishop of Sebaste, was appointed to the see of Antioch. He had been brought up in the Arian party, and was thought to belong to it; but at his installation, or some other solemn occasion soon after his appointment, he professed publicly the Nicene faith, accurately fixing the meaning of his expressions, although avoiding the use of the word Homousion. Upon this he was banished, and a new prelate, Euzoius, was appointed.¹ Eustathius had died before the appointment of Meletius. Thus, at the accession of Julian, the Arian Euzoius was in possession of the see and of the churches of Antioch, the line of bishops from whom he derived his mission being originally intruders, and he himself again an intruder, Meletius having been wrongfully deposed. Of the orthodox there were two parties. First, the old adherents of Eustathius, now without a bishop, but keeping together under Paulinus, a presbyter ordained by Eustathius. These did not wish to join the communion of Meletius, although he had disclaimed Arianism, not only because he had been brought up an Arian, but because his appointment to Antioch was by intruding bishops. And, secondly, the adherents of Meletius, who could aver that they had an orthodox bishop, whose title was undoubtedly preferable to that of Euzoius, while the Eustathians had not kept up the episcopal succession. An edict of Julian allowed the banished bishops to return home. Several bishops, Lucifer of Cagliari, Eusebius of Vercellæ, Hilary of Poitiers, and others [Theod. iii. 4], on their return met in consultation on the state of the Church [Socr. iii. 5, 6]. They agreed that Eusebius should proceed to Alexandria to join Athanasius and assist him in summoning a synod to confirm the decrees of Nicæa, and that Lucifer should go to Antioch. The way of reconciliation at Antioch was open. It was in the power of the representatives of the Catholic Church to heal the breach, by recognizing Meletius, whose consecration was valid, and joining his communion.² It was in the power of the Church, as Eustathius had no successor, to condone the original intrusion of the line of bishops from whom Meletius derived his succession. But as if the original entanglement were not sufficient, Lucifer added to it. Together with Cymatius and Anatolius, Bishops of Paltus and Beroea, he consecrated Paulinus for the Eustathians; thus setting up an orthodox competitor to Meletius, and consolidating by opposition the Meletian schism. Meletius, on his return, found Paulinus consecrated, and as his adherents would not recognise Paulinus, he put himself again at their head. The schism was thus fully formed, altar against altar. Paulinus sent his legates, Maximus and Calemerus, to the Alexandrian synod. It appears that the synod received them, thus recognising Paulinus' title.

The synod, breaking up after consultation, left it in charge to Athanasius and a few bishops who remained at Alexandria to write to the bishops collected at Antioch, that is, to the three consecrators of Paulinus, and Eusebius and Asterius who had left Alexandria for Antioch. Athanasius did so, and urged these bishops to strive to unite the dissentient parties, especially to bring over, if possible, τοὺς ἐν τῇ παλαιᾷ συναγομένους, those who assembled in the old city, i.e. the Meletians. But there were now three competing bishops in the city; and the dissension, which had run its course and was dying of itself, was reanimated. Eusebius retired in disgust, and the schism was left to its new career.

The Arians continued in possession of all the churches of the city except one, which Paulinus had been allowed to retain. The Meletians met outside the city walls [Socr. iii. 9]. Valens, baptized by the Arian Eudoxius, pledged himself to uphold their cause, and among other orthodox bishops he banished Meletius. On the accession of Gratian [A.D. 378] Meletius was recalled [Theod. iv. 13, v. 2, 3; Sozom. vii. 3; Socr. v. 5], and the churches which had been held by the Arians were restored to him [Theod. v. 3]. By this the Meletian party was put in the position of the established Church. Meletius now made overtures to Paulinus, and an agreement was concluded that the schism should cease by the common recognition of the survivor of the two. On Meletius' death, however, his party did not keep to the agreement, but consecrated Flavian. On the death of Paulinus, Evagrius was consecrated. He lived but a few years. Jerome mentions him as alive in A.D. 392. St. Chrysostom took the opportunity of his death to end the schism, by bringing the parties into communion under Flavian.

In which of these two lines of bishops the right to the throne of Antioch was really vested it is difficult to determine. Assuming that Eustathius was the rightful bishop, and that Meletius' claim was preferable to that of Euzoius, the question narrows itself to this, whether, after Eustathius' death, without a successor in his line, the party which had adhered to him so fully represented the Catholic Church of Antioch as to be entitled to proceed to a fresh election, and call in a metropolitan of another patriarchate (Cagliari was a metropolis in the patriarchate of Rome), to supply from a new source a new line of conse-crations. According to the order of the Church, the bishops of the province should have been applied to; and Lucifer's act must needs be judged intrusive. However, Athanasius and the Egyptian Churches, the Western Church generally, and the Churches of Cyprus, upheld Paulinus' title: the Orientals took part with the Meletians.

There is no doubt that both Eustathians and Meletians held substantially the Catholic faith regarding the Holy Trinity, and differed only in the terms which they thought most suitable to express its doctrine. The Meletians believed that they must abide by the formula of Three Hypostases, while the Eustathians would only acknowledge Three Prosopa. [DICT. OF THEOL., HYPOSTASIS.] Thus the usages of the East and West confronted each other, the Church of Antioch being as it were the stage upon which the two parties in dispute were represented, the Meletians siding with the orthodox of the East, and the Eustathians with those of the West. The Council of Alexandria agreed that the language of the Nicene Creed was the more desirable and accurate. But the verbal controversy had been taken up and was carried on, not in an unimpassioned endeavour to ascertain correct forms of doctrine, but as furnishing watchwords for the contending parties in a schism; and it ceased only when the Eustathians were finally absorbed by the larger and more powerful body.

MEN, THE. This title is one popularly given, in certain districts of the Scottish Highlands, to a class of lay preachers and catechists. Owing to lack of pastoral superintendence, through the latter part of the last century and the beginning of this, in the more remote parts, specially in Ross, Sutherland, Caithness, Argyle, and the Isle of Skye, and to the deficiency of Gaelic Bibles, which were too costly in price for general possession, lay-helpers were appointed to hold meetings for exposition and prayer. These persons themselves used the English Bible, and from it made extempore Gaelic translations, a practice which admitted of considerable and fervid "embellishment," as well as of departures from received interpretation, inasmuch that it was no uncommon thing for the better educated among their hearers to maintain that the Bible then in use was quite different from that to which they had formerly been accustomed. The new light thus shed upon Holy Scripture proved very attractive; the meetings were thronged; the powers of the catechists gradually developed; their office became more recognised, their ministrations more varied and more valued. Doubtless in many cases these ministrations were greatly blessed in the awakening of the careless and in reaching neglected districts; but the general result was that a class of illiterate, self-appointed teachers sprang up, whose only claim to office rested upon their self-stated "experience" and the display of their "superior gifts." These gifts they had special opportunities for displaying at the funeral services, or "lykewakes," held in private houses, and at the "sacramental occasions," or preparatory services on the Friday before the periodical Communion. This day is still popularly called "the Men's Day." On it perhaps twenty or thirty Men from different parishes may be present, who engross all the public services, permitting the parish minister only to sum up their exhortations at the close. But sometimes The Men have (like the Wesleyan preachers in England, to whom in origin and history they bear a strong resemblance) carried on their own ministrations in direct opposition to the Kirk. It is stated in a tract (published at Glasgow about 1840), containing an account of a revival of religion in the Isle of Skye in 1812-1814, which owed its origin to the labours of one of these preachers, that there followed from this awakening an "entire abandonment of ordinances." The "professors," as The Men are there called, "lifted their protest against the clergy by refusing to accept ordinances as by them administered. Hence it soon ceased to be matter of reproach to live in the non-enjoyment of ordinances. More than this, it came to be counted an evidence of seriousness not to apply to the clergy, or a mark of carelessness and irreligion when application was made." A curious instance of the narrow ignorance and intense presumption which were compatible with a reputation for the greatest sanctity and insight into spiritual things, is afforded by the "Dying Testimony" of a leading Man, one Alex. Campbell, published in 1824, which, after generally denouncing the Kirk, the King, the Cameronians, and everybody and everything not agreeable to his judgment, ends with a sweeping and indiscriminating testimony against "Quakers, Tabernacle folk, Haldians, Independents, Anabaptists, Antiburghers, Burghers, Chapels of Ease, Relief, Roman Catholics, Socinians, Prelacy, Arminians, Deists, Atheists, Universalists, New Jerusalemites, Unitarians, Methodists, Berceans, Glassites, and all sectarians."

The dress of The Men is distinctive. They generally wear, when engaged in religious exercises, a large blue cloak, a revival of that which St. Paul left at Troas, but which is claimed by another school as the prototype of the chasuble. But a peculiar head-gear is a still more usual characteristic. In Skye they wear red, striped, or blue woollen night-caps; elsewhere, coloured or spotted handkerchiefs, which gradually, as higher degrees of sanctity are reached and the stains of earth are removed, give place to napkins of white.

It is said that since the establishment of the Free Kirk, the influence of The Men has been greatly on the wane. [Quart. Rev., Sept. 1851, Puritanism in the Highlands. Eadie's Eccles. Cyclop. Brit. and For. Evang. Rev., July 1872, The Religion of the Highlands, referring to books in favour of The Men.]

MEN OF UNDERSTANDING. This name was assumed by a set of fanatics who appear to have been a branch of the Brethren of the Free Spirit. They appeared in the Netherlands, chiefly at Brussels, about the year 1411, under the leadership of an illiterate man named Giles the Singer, and of a Carmelite monk named William of Hildesheim or Hildeinssen. Giles appears to have taken up the position of a false Christ, making the blasphemous declaration, "I am the Saviour of men, by me men shall see Christ, as by Christ they see the Father." This perhaps was the broad and ignorant form of the fanaticism. Its more intelligent side seems to have been a modification of the theory of the JOACHIMITES, that the time of the Jews was that in which the Father ruled the Church, the times from Christ to their own that in which the Son ruled, and that thenceforward the Church was under the rule of the Holy Spirit, with whom they associated or identified the prophet Elijah. These latter days they maintained to be a time of higher illumination than any which had preceded, an illumination which practically superseded Holy Scripture, and established a new dispensation of spiritual liberty. Among other opinions which they added on to this fundamental one, they maintained that the only resurrection of the body which would ever take place, had taken place already in that of Christ; that the spirit is not defiled by bodily sin; that the punishments of hell are not eternal; and that even the evil angels would be eventually saved. [Baluze, Miscell. ii. 277.]

MENANDRIANS. The followers of Menander, one of the primitive heretics or false Christs of sub-apostolic times. The sect was the latest of the three Samaritan sects which contributed so much to the formation of Gnosticism, coming between the schools of Simon Magus and of Saturninus: and its origin dating about A.D. 75. Pearson held that Menander flourished under Vespasian [Pearson's Vindic. Ignat. ii. 7].

The common consent of antiquity connects Menander closely with Simon Magus. Justin Martyr [First Apol. xxvi.] and the appendix to Tertullian's de Præscr. call him Simon's disciple, Irenæus [i. 23] and Eusebius [Hist. Eccl. iii. 26] Simon's successor. He was a Samaritan of the town Capparetæ or Chabrai [Theod. Hær. fab. i. 2], an adept in magic, which he practised with success at Antioch. He taught that the Primary Power continued unknown to all, that the world was made by Angels, whom (like Simon) he maintained to have been produced by Ennoia. He professed himself to have been sent forth from the presence of the invisible beings as a saviour for the deliverance of men from the power of the demiurgic angels. He promised by means of magic to give men knowledge to overcome those angels, to obtain the resurrection, and to remain in possession of undying youth. For this purpose he baptized men in his own name. What Simon had professed to be, Menander also in turn professed to be, or rather gave himself out to be greater than Simon. [Epiph. Hær. xxii.]

The Fathers, from whom these particulars have been gathered, certainly understood the immortality promised by Menander to have been in this world [see particularly, Tertull. de Anima, p. 349, edit. 1641]. Walch thinks that they must have been mistaken, but even such an excess of folly or imposture is not incredible. Epiphanius, in his abstract, remarks that in some points Menander differed from his master, but he does not state the differences. The doctrine of evil demiurgic angels is certainly not the doctrine of Simon's "Announcement," but some reasons have been given in the article on "Simonians," for thinking that Simon may in latter years have adopted this doctrine, and deserted the Cabbala. In this doctrine is involved the principle of the inherent evil of matter, and the author of Prædestinatus states that Pope Linus condemned the Menandrians for this tenet. He states also that Linus excommunicated them (a consortio conversationis nostræ ejectos æterna damnatione multavit). He therefore took them to be Christian heretics, but this is probably an error. Mosheim believes the opinion that Menander was a disciple of Simon to have no other foundation than the general notion that all the various sects of Gnostics derived their origin from that magician; which notion he asserts to be entirely groundless. But the notion is not likely to be groundless with regard to the Samaritan Gnostics; and Justin Martyr's assertion is probably well founded. Gieseler concludes that the three Samaritan sects continued for several centuries [Gieseler's Eccl. Hist. i. 50]; Mosheim, that the Menandrians existed but for a short period, and appear to have been always confined within very narrow limits [Mosheim, de Rebus Christ. Vidal's tr. i. 335]. Certainly the sect is little noticed by historians. It was probably merged in the later Gnostic sects. [SIMONIANS.]

MENDÆANS. An ancient Eastern sect found in the borders of Persia and Arabia, but chiefly at Bassora and the district around, who profess to be "Mendai Ijahi," or "Disciples of St. John" the Baptist. They are called "Christians of St. John" by many European writers, and "Sabians" or "Tsabians" by the Mahometans.

The origin of the Mendæans is involved in obscurity. Some writers associate them with the idolatrous Sabæans out of whom the Mahometans sprung. [MAHOMETANS.] They themselves allege that they are Hebrews. A Carmelite named Ignatius à Jesu, who lived near them as a missionary to the Chaldæan Nestorians for forty years [A.D. 1622-1662], believed them to be truly descended from some of the original disciples of St. John, and compares their name with that of the Christians of St. Thomas on the coast of Malabar, whose claim to be descended from some of the original converts of the Apostle St. Thomas is generally allowed. It seems not unlikely that some of John the Baptist's converts may never have heard of Apostolic Christianity. A quarter of a century after the Day of Pentecost there were "certain disciples" at Ephesus, who, as had recently been the case with Apollos, knew "only the baptism of John" into which they had been baptized, and had not so much as heard of the great event of Pentecost [Acts xviii. 25, xix. 1, 5]: and if this could be the case at Alexandria or Ephesus it was far more likely to be so in the deserts of Arabia, where indeed Christianity never made any great progress. It is not unreasonable therefore to conclude that the modern Sabians or Mendæans are descendants of some of the ancient Arabian descendants of Abraham who had been converted from Sabæan idolatry and had been baptized by St. John the Baptist, but who were never brought under the influence of Apostolic Christianity. To the descendants of such men the Baptist himself would seem to be "that Christ" which he was supposed to be by some even in his lifetime; and the influence of later Christianity upon them would be analogous in its results to those which were produced upon the early Mahometans, though of a far higher character, because building on a better foundation.

These half Christians are said by Ignatius à Jesu to have imitations or perversions of the Christian Sacraments. They administer baptism on Sunday only, with a liturgy, and by semi-immersion in a flowing stream, water being poured thrice on the head of the child "In the name of the Lord Himself, the First and the Last, the Lord of the world, and of Paradise, of Him Who is above all and Creator of all."¹ For their Eucharist they use wafers composed of flour, wine, and oil; the other element being a kind of wine made by steeping dry grapes in water, the same which is used also for making the wafers. They maintain a line of bishops and priests, in which the Levitical system of lineal descent is kept up, the nearest relative being elected to succeed a deceased bishop if he left no son to take his place. None can be ordained priest who does not belong to the sacerdotal family, nor any who is the son of a mother who was otherwise than a virgin when she married.

The Christians of St. John hold the Cross in the highest veneration, and have a curious superstition that the original Cross was placed in the sun, and that the sun and the moon derive their light from it. St. John Baptist is kept in memory by an annual five days' festival, when all, young and old, flock to their patriarch and are baptized in a flowing river by him; a rite which has led some writers to identify them with the HEMERO-BAPTISTS. Among many singular superstitions respecting St. John Baptist, one is that he commanded his disciples to crucify his dead body, which they did; and that afterwards it was preserved in a crystal sepulchre at Sciuster, a city of Persia.

The Christology of the Mendæans is of a very heretical character. They hold that Christ is the Soul of God, as the Mahometans say that He is the Spirit of God. Some of them have Docetic notions respecting the Crucifixion, believing that Christ passed through the hands of those who held Him, and that only an appearance of His body was nailed to the Cross: while others maintain that His Soul only ascended to heaven, and that His Body remains on earth, not locally, but everywhere.

They have four sacred books, written in the peculiar dialect of Arabic which goes by the name of Mendæan, and which seem never to have been examined with the critical learning necessary to determine what is the real value of their contents. The first is called "The Divan," or Audience-Hall, and is alleged to have been given by God Himself to Angels. It contains statements respecting the Fall of the Angels, the Creation of Man, and the future changes which are to occur in the world. The second is the "Book of Adam," which is said to have been communicated to our first forefather by the Angel Gabriel. It also contains much respecting the origin of the world and of mankind, and abounds in devotional expressions of adoration towards God as Light. The third is a volume of smaller size, called the "Book of John the Baptist," and contains a summary of the Sacred History. The fourth is called "Cholasteh" or the completion, and is the book of rites used by the Mendæans. Of these the book of Adam was printed in Mendæan and Latin by Norberg in the year 1815. The rest remain in manuscript in the National Library at Paris, and in the Bodleian. [Ignatius à Jesu, Narratio origin. rituum et errorum Christian. Secti. Joan. 1652. Asseman, *Bibl. MENNONITES. A general name given to the four sects of Dutch Baptists, the Flemings, Frieslanders, Germans, and Waterlanders. They were originally called "Anabaptists," but after their reformation by Menno in the middle of the sixteenth century that name, which had become very odious through the iniquities with which it was associated [ANABAPTISTS], was exchanged for the name of "Mennonites" in memory of their reformer. They are also called "Doopsgezinden" or "Dippers;" and, in America, by a name of similar meaning, TUNKERS.

Menno Simonis, or Symons [A.D. 1505-1561] was a priest, and rector of his native village, Witmarsum, near Bolswert, in Friesland. He gives the somewhat improbable account of himself that, having as a priest lived a profligate life, he yet discovered by reading the New Testament that Infant Baptism is not a scriptural practice; and that on this account, at the age of thirty-one, he gave up his position and became a reformed character. As he is found married after his connection with the Anabaptists, it is probable that marriage had something to do with his secession.

In the following year [A.D. 1537] he became a teacher among the Anabaptists, the fiercest and worst part of the sect having been exterminated in the siege and capture of Munster, and in the suppression of the insurrections which followed at Amsterdam, Deventer, and elsewhere. The remnant of the sect was in so depressed a condition, and so entirely without a leader, that the accession of a man of position and ability was extremely welcome, and he soon acquired so much influence and power among them as to become their new leader and head, an office which he held until his death, a quarter of a century afterwards.

Under Menno's guidance the Anabaptists entirely lost their revolutionary character, so that some have found it difficult to recognise the one continuous sectarian body under two such different aspects. But the notion of an immediate Millennium had been exploded by the failure and death of John of Leyden, the "King" of their "New Jerusalem," and with that notion their motives for insurrection and aggression had passed away. It is also probable that those who were spared from slaughter were a milder and less political kind of Anabaptists than those who became so conspicuous under M nzer and Bockhold, and that thus the religious element of the sect alone survived, and that among a comparatively quiet and religious class of people. The character of Menno would influence his followers in the same direction, for he was a gentle and peaceful man, whose ambition, if he possessed any, was the ambition of a religious leader in the sense of later times, and not in that of the fierce fanatics of the Middle Ages.

Another conspicuous change which arose among the Anabaptists from the violent explosion of their millennial expectations was, that they no longer entertained the notion of a superior dispensation of the Spirit having arrived, a notion grounded entirely on that of the Millennium itself. Hence they no longer claimed a direct inspiration superseding the teaching of the Scriptures such as had been claimed before. [ZWICKAU PROPHETS.] The Scriptures, therefore, regained their influence both as a rule of belief and a rule of life; and whatever errors the Anabaptists may be chargeable with, even under Menno's leadership, they cannot be justly accused of that frightful Antinomianism which had characterized them before their suppression as an insurrectionary sect. They became, in fact, notorious for their deference to the Scriptures, and instead of claiming an inspiration superior to it, bowed down to the most literal interpretation of its precepts.

Before the accession of Menno the Anabaptists cannot be said to have had any theological system. Under his guidance, however, a form of Protestantism was established among them which is, in some particulars, quite independent of the systems of Luther, Calvin, or Zwingli. But Menno was averse to "Confessions," such as were common among the Continental Protestants, and did not draw up any for his followers. He wrote, however, in 1556 a treatise under the title of "The True Christian Belief," in which he compared his own teaching with that of the Romanists and the Protestants in such parts as they differed; and from this basis, two Mennonite preachers named Lubbert Gerardi and Hans de Rys, constructed, in the year 1580, a "Confession of Waterland," which professes to set forth the tenets of the sect. This was at first drawn up for the information of the English congregation of Brownists which had emigrated to Holland [INDEPENDENTS], and was regarded only as a private document; but it has been recognised in subsequent times as containing, substantially, a statement of Mennonite doctrine. [Schyn, Hist. Mennonitarum, vii.] [1] It begins with an expression of belief in the doctrines of the Blessed Trinity and Incarnation, which is necessarily vague and incomplete; for Menno denied that our Lord became incarnate through taking the natural substance of His Mother, maintaining that His Human Body was a direct creation out of nothing in the womb of the immaculate Virgin, by the power of the Holy Ghost. This opinion is still held by the Flemings or old Mennonites, but the sect in general has been strongly tainted with Arianism, perhaps by a not unnatural recoil from this tenet of Menno. [2] Original sin is a doctrine almost entirely repudiated, the guilt of Adam not being considered as transmitted to his descendants, but only some germ of sinfulness such as orthodox Christians believe still to lurk in the will of the baptized. This repudiation of the doctrine of original sin may be considered as the theological ground for the repudiation of Infant Baptism, though the latter is usually stated as founded on the absence of any direct notice of such a rite in the New Testament. The practice of the Mennonites is to baptize children at twelve years of age, not by immersion, but by affusion, or pouring water on the head. [3] The sacrifice of Christ's death is set forth as applicable to all mankind, the Mennonite doctrine thus symbolizing with Arminianism and not Calvinism. [4] The Lutheran doctrine of "Justification by faith alone" is as distinctly ignored as the Calvinist doctrine of the "decrees," faith being defined as that which leads men to do works of love, co-operating with the righteous work of Christ. [5] The Mennonite view of the Eucharist is, however, neither more nor less than the "memorial" theory of Zwingli. [6] In the recoil from the early Anabaptist fury of the sect, the Mennonites went to the opposite extreme, considering war, and even resistance to injury, to be altogether unlawful for Christian men. They also considered oaths to be unlawful, and that it was unfit for a Christian man to undertake the duties of any office of civil government.

Such were the original principles of the Mennonites, as set forth in the Confession of 1580. They were in some degree modified by a subsequent Confession, drawn up in 1632, with the view of uniting the several sects into which the original one had broken up; but no substantial alteration has taken place in their belief, except that above mentioned, the development in the direction of Arianism of Menno's original belief respecting the Incarnation.

While Menno was still living, his followers broke up into two divisions on the subject of discipline. Leonard Bowenson and Theodore Philippi headed a party which maintained the strictest views possible respecting the treatment of those who fell into sin; requiring that they should not only be excommunicated, but that they should never be received back into the sect again, and that they should be debarred all intercourse with their relatives, even their husbands, wives, or children. The same party also defined sin in so strict a manner as to make even innocent amusements a cause for excommunication. Menno endeavoured to unite the two parties, and in his own person set an example of compromise and conciliation, but his attempts met with no success, and his followers became henceforward divided into the "Fine" or strict Mennonites (Die Feinen), the party of Bowenson and Philippi, and the "Coarse" or lax Mennonites (Die Groben), the one being the ascetic representatives of the original sect, the other the representatives of the more ordinary Protestant phase of the sect into which it had begun to develope under Menno's own guidance. These two parties were also marked off from each other geographically, as well as theologically, and as most of the lax Mennonites were inhabitants of a region in the north of Holland named Waterland, they were called WATERLANDERS; while the strict Mennonites being chiefly in Flanders, they acquired the name of FLEMINGS. The latter were soon subdivided into "Flandrians," "Frieslanders," and "Germans," the subject of their disputes being still that of discipline and the exact standard of strictness or laxness which should be permitted. In subsequent times, however, the Flemings grew fewer and fewer, and now most of the Mennonites are Waterlanders.

The number of the Mennonites now existing in Holland is said to be small, there being only about 150 congregations of them. There are also about the same number in Germany, on the Lower Rhine. Large numbers of them emigrated to America by invitation of William Penn in the latter part of the seventeenth century; and it is calculated that the sect in the United States and in Canada now numbers about 240 ministers, 400 congregations, and about 50,000 members. [Schyn's Hist. Christ. qui in Belgio fœderato Mennonitæ appellantur, Amst. 1723. Schyn's Hist. Mennonit. plenior Deductio, 1729. Menno's Works, Amst. 1651. Brandt's Hist. Reform.]

MERINTHIANS. [CERINTHIANS.]

MERISTÆ. A Jewish sect named, along with the Genistæ, by Justin Martyr [Dial. c. Tryph. lxxx.]. The name (=Dividers) is probably the correlative name in opposition to Genistæ, which implied that its bearers represented the true γένος of the nation. The sect is probably the sect of Nazareans described by Epiphanius in his eighteenth heresy. St. Isidore says respecting them, "Meristæ appellati eo quod separant Scripturas, non credentes omnibus prophetis, dicentes aliis et aliis spiritibus illos prophetasse. Μέρος enim Græce portio dicitur." [Isidor. Hisp. cap. v. 8.]

MESSALIANS. [EUCHITES.]

METAGENETÆ. Some heretics are mentioned by Prædestinatus, who maintained that the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity was not co-eternal with the First, and that being begotten by the Father's will, had that will been wanting He would not have existed. In the "Elenchus Hæresum" prefixed to the work of Prædestinatus these heretics are named Metagenetæ [Prædest. Hær. lxxx.].

METANGISMONITÆ. A sect of heretics belonging to the third century, who maintained that the union between the Father and the Son in the Holy Trinity was effected by the Son entering into the Father as a lesser vessel (ἀγγεῖον) may be placed in one that is greater. It is remarkable that, when describing this heresy, Philaster [A.D. 380] confutes their opinion in words which contain a peculiar expression nearly identical with a clause of the Athanasian Hymn, "Et separant se a catholica ecclesia, propter illos suos pseudopphetas: insaniant adsentientes, et non intelligentes quod qualis immensus est Pater, talis est et Filius, talis est et Spiritus Sanctus, æqualis in omnibus, ita ut sit immobilis Trinitas, immensa et omnipotens atque sempiterna ubique, quæ nobis nuntiatur ex sanctis scripturis apertissime, ut et sint tres Personæ viventes in perpetuum, et æquales in omni majestate et potentia, Filius tamen et Spiritus Sanctus de Patre sint proprie" [Philast. Hær. li.]. These words are not quoted by St. Augustine, although he names the heresy [Aug. Hær. lviii.], but Prædestinatus writes in analogous terms, "Quos ideo repudiat ecclesia, quia de incorporeo carnaliter sentiunt, et de incomprehensibili liniatis agunt, et de æqualitate divinitatis gradus statuunt" [Prædest. Hær. lviii.]. The last author says that the heresy was opposed by Diodorus, Bishop of Nicomedia.

METHODISTS. The general name given to a number of sects which are derived more or less directly from the confraternity formed in the year 1739 by John Wesley, Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford. The parent sect is now usually distinguished as that of the "Wesleyan Methodists," or simply as "Wesleyans." The other principal sects are the "Welsh Calvinistic," "New Connexion," "Primitive," and "United Free Church" Methodists. There are also several smaller divisions of the sect both in England and in America. The following article will deal with the history, organization, principles and practices of the original body, and the offshoots of it will be noticed in succeeding articles in chronological order.

I. ORIGIN OF THE NAME. When John Wesley first founded his confraternity he called it the "United Society," after the Moravians or Unitas Fratrum; but the vulgar tongue was too strong for him, and the name of "Methodists"—given in banter to a small brotherhood of fellows of colleges and undergraduates formed by him at Oxford some years earlier—became the world-wide designation of his followers. The lineage of that name is curious and interesting. Early in the seventeenth century it came into use in France to designate a class of theologians, "Méthodistes," who endeavoured by precise and fair statements of the case on both sides to bring about the reunion of the Huguenots with the Church. Of these theological Methodists, the most distinguished representative was Bossuet.¹ [Mosheim's

Eccl. Hist. iii. 242, Stubbs' ed. F. Spanheim, Diss. de Præscript. in reb. fid. adv. Novos Methodistas pontificios, Opp. III. ii. 1079.] It was probably of similar exact writers on the Puritan side that a preacher spoke when he satirized the "plain pikestaff Methodists" who "esteemed all flowers of rhetoric in their sermons no better than stinking weeds" [Spence's Sermons, 1657]: and it is obvious that the name "Precisians," so commonly used for the Puritans, was analogous to that of Methodists in its later sense. The term, however, came closest to its modern signification in the "New Methodists," who held "the great point of justification" in peculiar prominence about ten years before John Wesley's birth [War among the Angels of the Churches, 1693]; and in those who were so called because they "stood up for God," as mentioned about the same time by Calamy. It was first appropriated to Wesley and his half-dozen friends as a piece of Oxford undergraduate banter in the year 1728; and, becoming the popular name of his followers, was fully accepted by himself and them as early as the year 1744. [Min. of Conf. i. 9, 10.]

II. HISTORY OF METHODISM. The original form of Methodism was that of a Society or Brotherhood for the promotion of personal piety, according to the principles and practices of the Church of England: and it was part of that wave of Pietism which passed over Germany and England in the dissolute times of the seventeenth century. Early in that century such societies had been formed in Holland by the COLLEGIANTS, a section of the Arminians: in the latter part of the century they were organized by Spener under the name of Colleges of Piety [PIETISTS]; and both these had their type in the FRIENDS OF GOD, of whom Tauler, a great authority with Wesley, was one of the most famous. Societies of a similar kind were very generally established in England during the reigns of William III. and Queen Anne by the name of "Religious Societies." The Wesleys belonged to one of these latter Societies when they were at Oxford, and the early stage of their movement was simply a development of the obligations undertaken by them in association with it; they and several other young men, banding together in 1727 to study the Bible, to visit the poor, to observe Wednesday and Friday fasts, and to communicate more frequently than was then the custom in the Universities. In the year 1735 this Brotherhood consisted of fourteen or fifteen in number, including John and Charles Wesley, George Whitfield, Hervey, Ingham, Clayton, and Broughton. Some years later, on Wesley's return from his unsuccessful work in Georgia [A.D. 1735-1738] as a missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the movement was revived in a similar form in London. "In November 1738," writes Wesley, "two or three persons who desired to flee from was to the physician who treated his patients according to a scientific system [Μεθοδικός] as opposed to the empiric, who depended chiefly on practical experience. This use of the word still existed at the end of the seventeenth century, being found in the works of Boyle [ii. 245] and Hammond [iv. 577].

the wrath to come, and then seven or eight more, came to me in London, and desired me to advise and pray with them. I said, 'If you will meet on Thursday night I will help you as well as I can.' More and more then desired to meet with them, till they increased to many hundreds. The case was afterwards the same at Bristol, Kingswood, Newcastle, and many other parts of England, Scotland, and Ireland. It may be observed the desire was on their part, not mine. My desire was to live and die in retirement. But I did not see that I could refuse them my help and be guiltless before God." [Minutes of Conference, i. p. 58, ed. 1812.]

By this time, however, John Wesley had become intimately acquainted with the Moravians and their system, having visited their settlement at Herrnhut in 1738, and having taken part in the services of their chapel in Fetter Lane for more than a year after his return. This association had tended greatly to weaken Wesley's hold upon the system of the Church, and although to the latest day of his life he earnestly repudiated the idea of separating from it, yet his movement from that date distinctly and progressively tended towards the formation of a religious community independent of the Church. The impetus of this sectarian movement grew with every year of his life, and after his death Methodism at once passed beyond the borders of the Church of England, and was developed into a separate body by the lay-preachers, whose authority then took the place of that so long exercised by the clerical head of their Society.

The first step which Wesley himself took in this direction was that of building "preaching-houses," the object of which was very similar to that of modern "mission chapels," but which differed from the latter in the important point of being set up without any sanction, obtained or sought, from the clergyman of the parish or the bishop of the diocese. This first step offers one illustration among many of the way in which Wesley, though exacting the strictest obedience from those who were set under him, disregarded the authority of those who were set over him whenever obedience clashed with his plans. "How far," he asks, in 1744, "is it our duty to obey the bishops?" His reply is, "In all things indifferent. And on this ground of obeying them, we should observe the canons, so far as we can with a safe conscience" [Min. of Conf. i. 8]. Thus, while professing to be earnestly devoted to the system of the Church of England, and laying great stress upon his position as a priest of that Church, he began the organization of his Society by acting as if such a thing as Church laws had no existence, and recognising no authority except his own. When he was asked, a quarter of a century later, by what authority he acted, his reply was, "By the authority of Jesus Christ, conveyed to me by the now Archbishop of Canterbury, when he laid hands upon me and said, Take thou authority to preach the Gospel" [Wesley's Works, xxvii. 88]. But he garbled these words by omitting the important ones which complete their sense, namely, "in the congregation where thou shalt be lawfully appointed thereunto;" and this omission gives the key to Wesley's life.

The first preaching-house was begun at Bristol on May 12th, 1739, but before it was completed Wesley had fitted up for the purpose an old cannon-foundry in Moorfields, and this was opened under the name of "The Foundry," and as the headquarters of the Methodist movement, on November 11th, 1739, which may be regarded as the birthday of the sect, though many years elapsed before its position as a separate family from the Church of England was fully established.

The second step towards the organization of Methodism as a sect was the appointment of lay preachers. The preaching-houses were originally intended as places where Wesley and other clergymen who co-operated with him might officiate at any time without asking for the use of a church, or being necessarily driven to preach in the open air. They also, doubtless, offered greater freedom for extempore prayer, and many customs could be permitted in them which Wesley and his clerical friends would have shrunk from countenancing in a consecrated building. But an uneducated young layman named Thomas Maxfield,¹ whom Wesley had appointed to pray extempore in the preaching-house at Moorfields during his own absence at Bristol, thought himself as well able to preach as to pray, and was encouraged to do so by Lady Huntingdon [Life of Lady Hunt. i. 3]. "He is," she wrote to Wesley, "one of the greatest instances of God's peculiar favour that I know. He has raised from the stones one to sit among the princes of His people"—"princes" being apparently interpreted "preachers" by this rather silly Countess. He hastened to London to put a stop to the innovation, of which he very strongly disapproved; but his mother's persuasions were added to those of Lady Huntingdon, and feminine influence so far overcame Wesley's better judgment, that he was persuaded to sanction Maxfield's performances with the questionable explanation, "It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth Him good." From that time [A.D. 1741] lay-preaching became part of the Methodist system, and by means of it the Methodists were rapidly withdrawn from the influence of the Church system; for the ministrations of an ordained clergy became less and less necessary in their eyes the more they became familiar with the sight of laymen in the pulpits of their preaching-houses.

Wesley apologized for this innovation on the ground of necessity, for "what could they do in a case of so extreme necessity, where so many souls were at stake? No clergyman would assist at all." But his writings in the Minutes of Conference and elsewhere give abundant evidence that the system thus forced upon him was one which he never heartily accepted, and that the preachers were often too strong for the power of even his will to keep close to the pattern of his own orthodox teaching. Ever afterwards, also, he was in dread that they would end by severing that connection with the Church which he still claimed for his Society. "Do we separate from the Church?" he asked in the conference which was held three years after lay-preaching had been established. His answer was: "We conceive not. We hold communion therewith for conscience' sake, by constantly attending both the Word preached and the Sacraments administered therein" [Min. of Conf. i. 9]. But the "we" included a very small number, if any, of his preachers, and the growing secession from the Church became so evident, that in 1749 he issued the following remonstrance and admonition to them, the language of which, even under its catechetical veil, clearly indicates the circumstances of the case. "In every place," he writes, "exhort those who were brought up in the Church constantly to attend its service. And in visiting the classes, ask every one, 'Do you go to Church as often as ever you did?' Set the example yourself. And immediately alter every plan that interferes therewith. Is there not a cause for this? Are we not unawares, by little and little, tending to a separation from the Church? Oh! remove every tendency thereto with all diligence. [1] Let all our preachers go to Church. [2] Let all our people go constantly. [3] Receive the sacrament at every opportunity. [4] Warn all against niceness in hearing, a great prevailing evil. [5] Warn them likewise against despising the prayers of the Church. [6] Against calling our Society a church or the Church. [7] Against calling our preachers ministers; our houses meeting-houses; (call them plain preaching-houses.) [8] Do not license them as such. The proper form of a petition to the judge is, 'A. B. desires to have his house in C. licensed for public worship.' [9] Do not license yourself, till you are constrained; and then not as a Dissenter, but a Methodist preacher. It is time enough, when you are prosecuted, to take the oaths. Thereby you are licensed." [Min. of Conf. i. 57.]

The third step towards the separation of Wesley's Society from the Church was a personal act of schism, of the gravest possible character, on the part of Wesley himself; for on September 2nd, 1784, a new plea of necessity induced him to assume the office of a bishop by going through the form of consecrating Dr. Coke and Mr. Asbury as bishops, and others as priests, for his missions in North America: Dr. Coke being already a priest of the Church of England. The shocking character of this assumption he attempted to veil by calling the pretended bishops "superintendents," and the others "elders," and by alleging "Lord King's account of the Primitive Church convinced me many years ago that bishops and presbyters are the same order, and consequently have the same right to ordain;" and this when Lord King himself had recanted his unhistorical notion. He also excused himself on the following grounds: "It has, indeed, been proposed to desire the English bishops to ordain part of our preachers for America. But to this I object. [1] I desired the Bishop of London to ordain only one, but could not prevail. [2] If they consented, we know the slowness of their proceedings; but the matter admits of no delay. [3] If they would ordain them now, they would likewise expect to govern them. And how grievously would this entangle us! [4] As our American brethren are now totally disentangled, both from the State and from the English hierarchy, we dare not entangle them again either with the one or the other. They are now at full liberty simply to follow the Scriptures and the Primitive Church. And we judge it best that they should stand fast in that liberty wherewith God has so strangely made them free." [Min. of Conf. i. 179.] But this professed confidence for "many years" in his power as a priest to act as a bishop, had never yet been sufficiently strong to induce him to go through the same forms of ordination with his preachers, though he was "for many years importuned" to do so. It is not too much to say, 1. that he had far too great facility in convincing himself that what he wished to do was right to do, and 2. that his respect for his preachers was not strong enough to stimulate his wishes to the point of raising them to the same ministerial level with himself in England.¹ The wise Alexander Knox, his intimate friend, wrote that Wesley was "the dupe of his own weakness, and of other men's arts" [Remains of Knox, iii. 470, ed. 1837], which seems to be the plain and straightforward explanation of the matter. It was the occasion of a sarcastic epigram from the pen of Charles Wesley:—

"How easy now are Bishops made,
By man or woman's whim;
Wesley his hands on Coke hath laid,
But who laid hands on him?"

And although the loving spirits of the two could not be alienated from each other, Charles Wesley ceased for the remaining four years of his life to take any further part in the affairs of the Methodists beyond that of paying his brother's debts.

The fourth and last step taken by Wesley towards organizing his followers into one independent sect was that of authorizing the preachers to use the Book of Common Prayer in the preaching-houses. This he did first about the beginning of 1786, his rules respecting the permission being given in a paper dated from Bristol on July 22nd of that year. "Perhaps there is one part of what I wrote some time since which requires a little further explanation. In what cases do we allow of service in Church hours? I answer, [1] When the minister is a notoriously wicked man; [2]

When he preaches Arian, or any equally pernicious doctrine; [3] When there are not churches in the town sufficient to contain half the people; and [4] When there is no church at all within two or three miles. And we advise every one who preaches in the Church hours to read the Psalms and Lessons, with part of the Church prayers: because we apprehend this will endear the Church service to our brethren, who probably would be prejudiced against it if they heard none but extemporary prayer" [Min. of Conf. i. 191].

But these vague limitations were superseded shortly afterwards, in 1788, by the following general order: "The assistants shall have a discretionary power to read the Prayer Book in the preaching-houses on Sunday mornings, when they think it expedient, if the generality of the society acquiesce with it; on condition that Divine Service never be performed in the Church hours on the Sundays when the Sacrament is administered in the parish church where the preaching-house is situated, and the people be strenuously exhorted to attend the Sacrament in the parish church on those Sundays" [ibid. 208].

These four steps towards making the Methodists a sect (in spite of his frequent and vigorous protests against their separation from the Church) bore their fruit, even in their founder's lifetime. The preachers had importuned Wesley in vain to ordain them, but by permitting them to preach and to use the Book of Common Prayer he had given them a position which, to their ignorant minds, seemed almost the same as that of clergymen. One thing only seemed to them to be wanting to complete their sacerdotal character, and that was permission to administer the Holy Communion. Wesley stopped these demands at first by expelling those who made them from his society [Centenary of Meth. 38], but they increased so greatly in number that this course became no longer possible without breaking up the work of his life. Some of his last words shew better than any others can do how vigorously he resisted this final attempt to make the Methodist Society independent of the Church.

"In 1744, all the Methodist preachers had their first Conference; but none of them dreamed that the being called to preach gave them any right to administer Sacraments; one of our first rules was given to each preacher: 'You are to do that part of the work which we appoint.' But what work was this? Did we ever appoint you to administer Sacraments? to exercise the priestly office? Such a design never entered into our mind; it was farthest from our thoughts; and if any member had taken such a step, we should have looked upon it as a palpable breach of this rule, and consequently as a recantation of our connection. I wish all you who are vulgarly termed Methodists would seriously consider what has been said, and particularly you whom God has commissioned to call sinners to repentance. It does by no means follow hence, that you are commissioned to BAPTIZE AND TO ADMINISTER THE LORD'S SUPPER. Ye never dreamed of this for ten or twenty years after ye began to preach; ye did not then, like Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, seek the priesthood also; ye knew no man taketh this honour unto himself but he that is called of God, as was Aaron. Oh, contain yourselves within your own bounds." [Armin. Meth. Mag. 1790.]

¹ When they had complained in 1766 that he was "shackling free-born Englishmen by not permitting them to vote in the Conferences," his reply was, "I answer, it is possible, after my death, something of this kind may take place: but not while I live;" and when he was charged with making himself a Pope, he replied, "I see no hurt in it." [Min. of Conf. i. 60.]

John Wesley died on March 2nd, 1791, at the great age of eighty-eight. His personal holiness had gained for him the veneration of all who knew him; his vast industry in preaching had led multitudes to a better life; his great powers of organization had formed a Society whose ramifications extended through every part of England and Wales, and across the Atlantic; his strong will had kept that Society under control far beyond anything that could have been expected when it is considered of what social elements it was composed. But when the influence of his holiness, industry, and strong will were removed, the revolution which had been impending among the Methodists for so many years immediately broke out, and exhibited at once the weak point in his organization, that of making it dependent on a personal influence that must soon pass away, instead of resting it on the corporate system of the Church, which has a continuous existence. If Wesley had possessed more faith in the Episcopate as a system, and less confidence in his own power of organization, he might have reformed the Church of England instead of founding a sect.¹

"London, Oct. 10, 1778.

"My dear Miss Bishop,—I am not unwilling to write to you, even upon a tender subject, because you will weigh the matter fairly. And if you have a little prepossession (which, who has not?) yet you are willing to give it up to reason.

"The original Methodists were all of the Church of England, and the more awakened they were the more zealously they adhered to it in every point, both of Doctrine and Discipline. Hence we inserted in the very first Rules of our Society, 'They that leave the Church leave us.' And this we did, not as a point of prudence, but a point of conscience. We believed it utterly unlawful to separate from the Church, unless sinful terms of communion were imposed; just as did Mr. Philip Henry, and most of those holy men that were contemporary with them.

"'But the ministers of it do not preach the Gospel.' Neither do the Independent or Anabaptist ministers. Calvinism is not the Gospel; nay, it is further from it than most of the sermons I hear at Church. These are very frequently unevangelical; but those are anti-evangelical. They are (to say no more) equally wrong; and they are far more dangerously wrong. Few of the Methodists are now in danger of imbibing error from the Church ministers; but they are in great danger of imbibing the grand error—Calvinism—from the Dissenting ministers. Perhaps thousands have done it already; most of whom have drawn back to perdition. I see more instances of this than any one else can do; and on this ground also exhort all who would keep to the Methodists, and from Calvinism—'Go to the Church and not the meeting.'

"But, to speak freely, I myself find more life in the Church prayers than in the formal extemporary prayers of Dissenters. Nay, I find more profit in sermons on either good tempers or good works than in what are vulgarly called Gospel sermons. That term is now become a mere cant word. I wish none of our Society would use it. It has no determinate meaning. Let but a pert, self-sufficient animal, that has neither sense nor grace, hawl

But that Wesley had founded a sect became only too evident immediately after his death. The younger generation of Methodists had long accepted such a position for themselves; and as soon as their head was taken away from them they began their endeavours to force the whole body to take up definitively and officially a similar position. Within two months of Wesley's death, his Society was racked with dissension on two questions, the one relating to its government and the other to the administration of the Sacraments independently of the Church. The younger party wished to restrict the power of the preachers by admitting "laymen" to a larger share in the general and the detailed management of the Society, and to remove every restraint as to the times of service and the administration of the Sacraments in the preaching-houses. Opposite to these was a party that desired to return to the original idea of Methodism as an organization supplementary to the Church system, and not supplanting it. A third and intermediate party, led by those into whose hands the power of Wesley was passing, desired to stereotype Wesley's latter plans, only permitting the Methodist chapel to be a complete rival to the parish church in particular cases, and reserving to the Conference the power of licensing it to become so. This latter party was entirely opposed also to any extension of lay influence in the Conference, or in the minor organizations of the Methodist body.

After much preliminary pamphleteering and wrangling, the Conference met at Manchester on July 26th, 1791, when a letter was produced which Wesley had written on April 7th, 1785, and committed to the charge of his travelling companion or secretary, in which he besought the Conference to let all things go on, as far as circumstances would permit, exactly in the same manner as during his lifetime [Min. of Conf. i. 234]. A president was therefore elected from the intermediate party. The Conference took upon itself the government of the body without any further change than that of arranging the "circuits" into "districts," and then out something about Christ and His Blood, or justification by faith, and his hearers cry out, 'What a fine Gospel sermon!' Surely the Methodists have not so learnt Christ? We know no Gospel without salvation from sin.

"There is a Romish error which many Protestants sanction unawares. It is an avowed doctrine of the Romish Church that the 'pure intention of the minister is essential to the validity of the Sacraments.' If so, we ought not to attend the ministrations of an unholly man; but in flat opposition to this, our Church teaches, in the 28th Article, that 'the unworthiness of the minister does not hinder the validity of the Sacraments.' Although, therefore, there are many disagreeable circumstances, yet I advise all our friends to keep to the Church. God has surely raised us up for the Church chiefly, that a little leaven may leaven the whole lump.

"I wish you would seriously consider that little tract, 'Reasons against a Separation from the Church of England.' Those reasons were never answered yet, and I believe they never will be.

"I am glad you have undertaken that labour of love, and I trust it will increase both your spiritual and bodily health.

"I am, my dear Miss Bishop,

"Yours very affectionately,

"J. WESLEY."

pledged itself to a conservative policy in the words, "We engage to follow strictly the plan which Mr. Wesley left us at his death." [Min. of Conf. i. 246.]

It is needless to go into any detail respecting the bitter wranglings which ensued during the next few years, in consequence of the position thus taken up by the Conference. Ignoring this, we may see the plain history of the case indicated by the following extracts from the minutes of the following year. "Q. 23. What rules shall be made concerning ordinations? A. 1. No ordination shall take place in the Methodist Connexion without the consent of the Conference first obtained. 2. If any brother shall break the above-mentioned rule, by ordaining or being ordained, without the consent of the Conference previously obtained, the brother so breaking the rule does thereby exclude himself. Q. 24. What rule shall be made concerning the administration of the Lord's Supper? A. The Lord's Supper shall not be administered by any person among our Societies in England and Ireland, for the ensuing year, on any consideration whatsoever, except in London. Q. 26. What rule shall be made concerning the service in the Church-hours? A. The service shall not be performed in any new place in the Church hours in future, without the consent of the Conference first obtained. Q. 27. Expressions have been used by some, through a false zeal for their own peculiar sentiments, which were very unjustifiable. How shall we prevent this in future? A. No person is to call another heretic, bigot, or by any other disrespectful name, on any account, for a difference in sentiment." [Min. of Conf. i. 259.]

In 1793 a resolution was passed by the Conference, "That the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper shall not be administered by the preachers in any part of our Connexion, except where the whole Society is unanimous for it, and will not be contented without it; and, in even those few exempt Societies, it shall be administered, as far as practicable, in the evening only, and according to the form of the Church of England." [Min. of Conf. i. 279.]

At the same time an Address was printed in which the Conference said, "We are determined, as a body, to remain in connexion with the Church of England. We have never sanctioned ordination in England, either in this Conference or in any other, in any degree, or ever attempted to do it." [Min. of Conf. i. 281.]

In 1794 other resolutions were passed on the same subject, as follows: "1st, All ecclesiastical titles, such as Reverend, &c., shall be laid aside, as also gowns, bands, &c., agreeably to the resolutions of the Conference held at Leeds in 1793.¹ 2ndly, Preaching in Church hours shall not be permitted, except for special reasons, and where it will not cause a division. 3rdly, As the Lord's Supper has not been administered, except where the Society has been unanimous for it, and would not have been contented without it, it is now agreed, that the Lord's Supper shall not be administered in future where the union and concord of the Society can be preserved without it. 4thly, The preachers will not perform the office of Baptism, except for the desirable ends of love and concord; though Baptism, as well as the burial of the dead, was performed by many of the preachers long before the death of Mr. Wesley, and with his consent." [Min. of Conf. i. 299.]

The final settlement of the question was effected in the year 1795, when eighteen "Articles" respecting the Sacraments and Discipline were set forth, the ten first, relating to the former subject, being these:—"Articles of agreement for general pacification: [I.] Concerning the Lord's Supper, Baptism, &c. 1. The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper shall not be administered in any chapel, except the majority of the trustees of that chapel on the one hand, and the majority of the stewards and leaders belonging to that chapel (as the best qualified to give the sense of the people) on the other hand, allow of it. Nevertheless, in all cases, the consent of the Conference shall be obtained before the Lord's Supper be administered. 2. Wherever there is a society, but no chapel, if the majority of the stewards and leaders of that society testify that it is the wish of the people that the Lord's Supper should be administered to them, their desire shall be gratified: provided, that the consent of the Conference be previously obtained. 3. Provided, nevertheless, that in Mount Pleasant Chapel in Liverpool, and in all other chapels where the Lord's Supper has been already peaceably administered, the administration of it shall be continued in future. 4. The administration of baptism, the burial of the dead, and service in Church hours, shall be determined according to the regulations above mentioned. 5. Wherever the Lord's Supper shall be administered according to the before-mentioned regulations, it shall always be continued, except the Conference order the contrary. 6. The Lord's Supper shall be administered by those only who are authorized by the Conference, and at such times, and in such manner only, as the Conference shall appoint. 7. The administration of Baptism, and the Lord's Supper according to the above regulations, is intended only for the members of our own Society. 8. We agree, that the Lord's Supper be administered among us on Sunday evenings only, except where the majority of the stewards and leaders desire it in church hours, or where it has already been administered in those hours. Nevertheless, it shall never be administered on those Sundays on which it is administered in the parochial church. 9. The Lord's Supper shall be always administered in England according to the form of the Established Church; but the person who administers shall have full liberty to give out hymns and to use exhortation and extemporary prayer. 10. Wherever Divine Service is performed in England, on the Lord's day in Church hours, the officiating preacher shall read either the service of the Established Church, our venerable father's abridgment, or at least the Lessons appointed by the Calendar. But we recommend either the full service, or the abridgment." [Min. of Conf. i. 322.]

During the few following years the petitions for permission to administer the Sacraments were very numerous, and it was not long before the practice became almost universal in Methodist chapels. The usual mode of "ordination" adopted until the year 1836 was that of "setting apart" with prayer. In that year imposition of hands was introduced, and this has been the only important change in the practice of the Methodists since their final settlement as a body distinct from the Church by the above "Articles of Pacification."

The later history of the sect has not been distinguished by any other events of importance except the formation of other sects from the original one. These have been the "New Connexion," which separated under the leadership of Alexander Kilham, on the questions of the Sacraments and lay influence, in the year 1797 [METHODISTS, NEW CONNEXION]: the Primitive Methodists, who separated in the year 1810, who claimed, but were forbidden, the right to use the original exciting methods of promoting conversion [METHODISTS, PRIMITIVE]: the Bryanites, or Bible Christians, who formed a sect in Cornwall in 1815 [METHODISTS, BRYANITE]: the "Wesleyan Association," which was formed in 1835, and the "Wesleyan Reformers" in 1839, both of which have since been united in one sect [METHODISTS, UNITED FREE CHURCH].

III. THE ORGANIZATION OF THE METHODISTS. The most distinctive feature of the system established by Wesley was its organization for the purposes of religious discipline, finance, and ecclesiastical government; an organization which was admirably adapted to the habits of the classes out of whom his community was formed.

1] Bands. The unit of this system is a small body of from five to ten persons called a "band."¹ It is not compulsory on every Methodist to belong to one of these bands, but it was Wesley's original intention that all should so associate themselves voluntarily. His object was to keep up a sense of sin in the members of his confraternity, and to assist them in overcoming temptation, by means of mutual confession.

"The design" of the bands, he writes, "is to obey that command of God, 'Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another that you may be healed.' The chief rules are: [1] To meet once a week. [2] To come punctually. [3] To begin with singing or prayer. [4] To speak each of us in order, freely and plainly, the true state of our soul, with the faults we have committed in thought, word, or deed, and the temptations we have felt since our last meeting. [5] To desire some person among us (thence called a leader) to speak his own state first, and then to ask the rest in order as many and as searching questions as may be concerning their state, sins, and temptations." Two questions are to be asked occasionally, thus:—"Do you desire we should come as close as possible, that we should cut to the quick, and search your heart to the bottom? Is it your desire and design to be on this and all other occasions entirely open, so as to speak everything that is in your heart, without exception, without disguise, and without reserve?" Four questions are, however, to be asked at every meeting of the band:—[1] "What known sins have you committed since our last meeting? [2] What temptations have you met with? [3] How were you delivered? [4] What have you thought, said, or done, of which you doubt whether it be a sin or not?" [Wesley's Works, xv. 212, 1st ed.]

These "bands" were considered of great importance for the spiritual discipline of his followers by Wesley. "As soon," he wrote to his preachers in 1768, "as there are four men or women believers in any place, put them into a band. These need to be inquired of continually, and the place of any that do not meet supplied. In every place where there are bands, meet them constantly, and encourage them to speak without reserve" [Min. of Conf. i. 79]. "Exhort the leaders of bands to speak to those with them in the closest manner possible" [ibid. 73].

"An objection boldly and frequently urged is, 'all these bands are mere popery.' A very stale objection, which many people make against anything they do not like, and which betrays the gross ignorance of those who make it in two respects: the confession we practise (in bands) Papists do not; the confession they hold (i.e. private to a priest) our Church holds also" [Wesley's Works, xv. 214]. The band meetings were considered as private and confidential: and the nature of the confessions required at them was, of course, such as obliged the bands for each sex to be held separately. It was also contrived that each band should consist of persons occupying similar positions in life, and of about a uniform age, so that they might speak their minds with the less embarrassment. After Wesley's death the band part of his system greatly fell off. [Min. of Conf. iii. 294.]

2] Classes. The next step in the system is that of "classes," consisting of from twelve to thirty persons, to one of which every Methodist must necessarily belong, several of these classes making a "society" or congregation. The members of these classes are required to meet, under a leader of their own election, once a week, when, after a hymn and a prayer, each member of the class is expected to follow the leader in telling his spiritual "experience" during the week preceding. This practice has been found to degenerate into unreal exaggeration, in which persons often magnify the depths of wickedness out of which they have escaped, and mostly the heights of goodness to which they have attained. And it seems impossible that ordinary persons could be trusted to tell their "experience" without such unreality arising, partly from a supposed necessity of saying something, partly from the difficulty of making a true "diagnosis" of one's own case, and partly from emulation in the ostentation of humility.

The class-meeting is, however, a very essential part of the modern Methodist system. "Whatever may be alleged," says the Conference of 1870, "against that mode of Christian fellowship which is in use among ourselves, it was the origin of Methodism. The peculiar features of our system have grown out of the class meeting. . . . We exhort you on every ground to value the pearl of Methodist privileges. To surrender the class meeting is to take the heart out of Methodism; to esteem it lightly is to enfeeble the pulsations of that heart" [Min. of Conf. 1870, p. 216]. In the next year, however, the Conference "cannot but mourn over the report this year of a diminished number in our classes," and they associate this diminution with the "spiritual depression" of Methodists. [Min. of Conf. 1871, p. 227.] It is also to be observed that the class meeting has an important bearing on the financial prosperity of the Methodist community, since every member of a class is required to contribute at least one penny weekly, and one shilling quarterly to the general fund, out of which ministers are paid. This Wesley calls his "original rule" [Min. of Conf. p. i. 159, ed. 1812].

3] Circuits. Several of the "societies" (or congregations formed by the union of several classes) are organized into a "circuit," which generally comprehends the chapels in some market town and the villages for ten or twelve miles round. To each of these circuits are appointed from one to five ministers, and a number of lay or "local" preachers, the ministers being technically called "travelling preachers," because they are not allowed to continue in the same circuit for more than one or two years; the local preachers always remaining in the circuit to which they belong. The senior minister of each circuit is called the "superintendent" of it, and to him is committed the general supervision of all the societies and the preachers within its boundaries. These superintendents were originally called "assistants" to Wesley.

4] Districts. The circuits are again organized into "districts," of which there are thirty-three in England and Scotland, each containing on an average eighteen circuits. These districts (which were arranged by the Conference after Wesley's death) are organized chiefly for the purpose of gathering the preachers together in meetings at appointed times for financial and disciplinary objects. Of the district meetings thus gathered each one acts as a kind of local committee of the Conference, when that body is not sitting, having authority to suspend preachers for misconduct or insufficiency, to authorize the building of chapels, and to superintend the finances of the district. Every district has its chairman and financial secretary.

5] The Conference. This is the central governing body of the Methodist community. It consisted originally of those travelling preachers whom Wesley invited to meet him once a year for consultation respecting the affairs of the community, and to assist him in making and enforcing arrangements for its government. In the year 1784, this annual Conference was formed into a body, recognisable in Courts of Law by a "Deed of Declaration," drawn up under the advice of counsel, and properly enrolled in the Court of Chancery. Under this deed, "The Yearly Conference of the people called Methodists" consists of one hundred of the travelling preachers originally nominated by Wesley; its succession being, however, provided for by directing that after his death vacancies should be filled up by the Conference itself. It meets once a year in London or some large provincial town, for a session not to exceed three weeks, or to last less than five days, and appoints committees for carrying on the details of business connected with the various institutions of Methodism during the interval between its meetings. Although the Deed of Declaration limits this body to the number of one hundred, every preacher who has been admitted into "full connexion," after five years' itinerancy, is permitted to attend, and to vote in its proceedings. The presidency of the Conference is the post of highest honour in the Methodist community, having been filled by Wesley himself for forty-seven years.

The principal business of the Conference is the reception of probationers on trial for the ministry, the ordination of those preachers whose term of probation has expired, the appointment of preachers to every circuit for the ensuing year, and the general supervision of the affairs of Methodists throughout England. The results of its proceedings are ultimately published in the form of "Minutes of Conference."

IV. THE THEOLOGY OF THE METHODISTS has been from the beginning of their existence as a community, and still is, formally that of the Church of England. John and Charles Wesley were, like their father and their elder brother, High Churchmen of the Laudian school; they, like Laud and other opponents of Calvinism, being called "Arminians." John Wesley accepted the title of Arminian, but the jejune creed of the true Arminians was far from being his creed, and he accepted it only in the modified sense of anti-Calvinist, being very imprudent in accepting at all a name which merely represented one controversial facet of his theology.¹

It is not unfrequently alleged, indeed, that the theology of Wesley in his later life was very different from that of his earlier days. But those who knew him well thought differently, and his own words agree with their testimony. Alexander Knox wrote, "In his prevalent tastes and likings, as an individual, he was a Church of England man of the highest tone; not only did he value and love that pure spirit of faith and piety which the Church of England inherits from Catholic antiquity; but even in the more circumstantial part there was not a service or a ceremony, a gesture or a habit, for which he has not an unfeigned predilection." "I am now," he himself writes in his last years, "and have been from my youth, a member and minister of the Church of England, and I have no desire nor design to separate from it till my soul separates from my body." "I have uniformly gone on for fifty years, never varying from the doctrine of the Church at all." "I have been uniform both in doctrine and discipline for above these fifty years, and it is a little too late for me to turn into a new path now I am grey-headed." Abundant illustrations have also been given from his works to the same effect [John Wesley and High Churchmen, by an old Methodist, 1866], shewing that his teaching on the subject of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Holy Communion, and on other chief doctrines of Christianity, was distinctly that of the Church of England as interpreted by theologians of the present day.¹ His very first principle was indeed that of maintaining such a position. "I hold all the doctrines of the Church of England," he wrote in 1790,

The following is taken from the Minutes of 1776. "Q. 26. Calvinism has been the grand hindrance of the work of God. What makes men swallow it so greedily? A. Because it is so pleasing to flesh and blood: the doctrine of final perseverance in particular. Q. 27. What can be done to stop its progress? A. 1. Let all our preachers carefully read our tracts, and Mr. Fletcher's and Mr. Sellon's. 2. Let them preach Universal Redemption frequently and explicitly; but in love and gentleness, taking care never to return railing for railing. Let the Calvinists have all this to themselves. 3. Do not imitate them in screaming, allegorizing, calling themselves ordained, boasting of their learning, college, or 'my lady.'" The Countess of Huntingdon was the great patroness of Whitfield and the Calvinistic Methodists. The rivalry of John Wesley and "my lady" was so well known that they came to be called "Pope John" and "Pope Joan."

¹ The tone of Wesley's churchmanship may be illustrated by the following memorandum in his own handwriting, written when he was about forty years of age:—"I believe [myself] it a duty to observe, so far as I can [without breaking communion with my own Church]

- "1. To baptize by immersion.
- "2. To use Water, Oblation of Elements, Invocation, Alms, a Prothesis, in the Eucharist.
- "3. To pray for the faithful departed.
- "4. To pray standing on Sunday in Pentecost.
- "5. To observe Saturday and Sunday Pentecost as festival.
- "6. To abstain from blood, things strangled.
- "I think it prudent (our own Church not considered):
- "1. To observe the Stations.
- "2. Lent, especially the Holy Week.
- "3. To turn to the East at the Creed."

[Urlin's Wesley's Place in Church Hist. 69.]

"and I love her Liturgy, I approve her plan of discipline, and only wish it could be put in execution" [Armin. Mag. 1790, p. 287]. It was in this sense also that he accepted the names "Precisian" and "Methodist," writing that a "a true Methodist" was "none other than a true Churchman," precise and methodical in his observance of Church rules respecting the practice of personal piety. [Wesley's Works, xvi. 10.]

The standard of Methodist theology is still formally the same, being based on Wesley's Sermons and his Notes to the New Testament, to both of which the preachers of the "Old Connexion" are obliged to subscribe. The Thirty-nine Articles of Religion are accepted by Methodists, as is also the Book of Common Prayer, the sacramental offices of which are used entire, although those of Morning and Evening Prayer are usually abridged. No standard of doctrine other than that of the Church of England has ever been imposed upon the Methodists either by Wesley or by the Conference; and what variations from it there may be in the teaching of some of their ministers are the variations of individual opinion only, which have no sanction from any authoritative Methodist formulary of faith.

V. THE PRACTICAL SYSTEM OF THE METHODISTS. Apart from the usurpation of the sacerdotal office by their ministers, the Methodists have not anything in their practical system which is inconsistent with the principles of the Church of England. It met with the disapprobation of many in former days on account of its "enthusiasm," but much of what is called enthusiastic in the practices of the Methodists results from a sincere zeal in the pursuit of personal religion; and its faults are rather those of stilted language and general bad taste than those of unorthodoxy. The discipline adopted by them in their "classes" is simply a form of pastoral superintendence; and though the "class-meetings" at which they "tell their experience," have often been made occasions for the display of spiritual vanity and pride, their real object is exactly that of confession—the unburdening of conscience. Such practices were strange enough to the "donnish" bishops and other prominent persons who were taken as exemplars of the Church of England down to quite a recent period, but the revival of personal religion and devotional earnestness which was effected by the Evangelical and Tractarian movements has naturalized the zeal and the confessional system of the Methodists; and has also shewn that stilted language and bad taste in religion are merely class peculiarities, which must be borne with until they pass away under the influence of sound religious education.

The practical system of the Methodists is founded on a set of rules which were drawn up by the two Wesleys in the year 1743, and as these offer a full illustration of it in the present day, as well as in the early days of Methodism, they are given at length.

"RULES OF THE SOCIETY OF THE PEOPLE CALLED METHODISTS.

"1. In the latter end of the year 1739, eight or ten persons came to me in London, who appeared to be deeply convinced of sin, and earnestly groaning for redemption. They desired (as did two or three more the next day) that I would spend some time with them in prayer, and advise them how to flee from the wrath to come, which they saw continually hanging over their heads. That we might have more time for this great work, I appointed a day when they might all come together; which, from thenceforward, they did every week, viz., on Thursday in the evening. To these, and as many more as desired to join with them (for their number increased daily), I gave those advices from time to time which I judged most needful for them; and we always concluded our meetings with prayer suitable to their several necessities.

"2. This was the rise of the UNITED SOCIETY, first in London, and then in other places. Such a society is no other than 'a company of men having the form, and seeking the power, of godliness; united in order to pray together, to receive the word of exhortation, and to watch over one another in love, that they may help each other to work out their salvation.'

"3. That it may the more easily be discerned whether they are indeed working out their own salvation, each society is divided into smaller companies, called classes, according to their respective places of abode. There are about twelve persons in every class; one of whom is styled the leader. It is his business,

"[1] To see each person in his class once a week, at least, in order "To inquire how their souls prosper;

"To advise, reprove, comfort, or exhort, as occasion may require;

"To receive what they are willing to give towards the support of the Gospel;

"[2] To meet the ministers and the stewards of the society once a week, in order "To inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any that walk disorderly, and will not be reprov'd;

"To pay to the stewards what they have received of their several classes in the week preceding; and

"To shew their account of what each person has contributed.

"4. There is one only condition previously required of those who desire admission into those societies; viz., 'a desire to flee from the wrath to come, and be saved from their sins.' But wherever this is really fixed in the soul, it will be shewn by its fruits. It is therefore expected of all who continue therein that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation,

"First, By doing no harm, by avoiding evil in every kind; especially that which is most generally practised. Such as "The taking the name of God in vain;

"The profaning the day of the Lord, either by doing ordinary work thereon, or by buying or selling:

"Drunkenness; buying or selling spirituous liquors; or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity:

"Fighting, quarrelling, brawling; brother going to law with brother; returning evil for evil, or railing for railing; the using many words in buying or selling:

"The buying or selling uncustomed goods:

"The giving or taking things on usury, viz. unlawful interest:

"Uncharitable or unprofitable conversation; particularly speaking evil of magistrates or of ministers:

"Doing to others as we would not they should do unto us:

"Doing what we know is not for the glory of God, as,

"The putting on of gold and costly apparel;

"The taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus;

"The singing those songs, or reading those books, which do not tend to the knowledge or love of God:

"Softness, and needless self-indulgence:

"Laying up treasure upon earth:

"Borrowing without a probability of paying; or taking up goods without a probability of paying for them.

"5. It is expected of all who continue in these societies, that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation.

"Secondly, By doing good, by being in every kind merciful after their power, as they have opportunity; doing good of every possible sort, and as far as is possible to all men:

"To their bodies, of the ability that God giveth, by giving food to the hungry, by clothing the naked, by helping or visiting them that are sick, or in prison:

"To their souls, by instructing, reproof, or exhorting all we have any intercourse with: trampling under foot that enthusiastic doctrine of devils, that 'we are not to do good, unless our hearts be free to it.'

"By doing good, especially to them that are of the household of faith, or groaning so to be; employing them preferably to others, buying one of another, helping each other in business; and so much the more, because the world will love its own, and them only.

"By all possible diligence and frugality, that the Gospel be not blamed.

"By running with patience the race that is set before them, denying themselves, and taking up their cross daily; submitting to bear the reproach of Christ; to be as the filth and offscouring of the world; and looking that men should say all manner of evil of them falsely, for the Lord's sake.

"6. It is expected of all who desire to continue in these societies that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation.

"Thirdly, By attending upon all the ordinances of God: such are

- "The public worship of God ;
- "The ministry of the Word, either read or expounded ;
- "The Supper of the Lord ;
- "Family and private prayer ;
- "Searching the Scriptures ; and
- "Fasting or abstinence.

"7. These are the general rules of our societies : all which we are taught of God to observe, even in His written Word,—the only rule, and the sufficient rule, both of our faith and practice. And all these we know His Spirit writes on every truly awakened heart. If there be any among us who observe them not, who habitually break any of them, let it be made known unto them who watch over that soul, as they that must give an account. We will admonish him of the error of his ways : we will bear with him for a season. But then, if he repent not, he hath no more place among us. We have delivered our own souls.

"JOHN WESLEY,
"CHARLES WESLEY.

"May 1, 1743."

These rules might just as well be called those of "the people called Churchmen" as those of "the people called Methodists ;" and when the Wesleys framed them, the two zealous brothers were but working out in their own way a good system of pastoral work such as is mapped out in Bishop Burnet's Pastoral Care, or George Herbert's Country Parson, and a good system of personal holiness such as was illustrated by the lives of the Ferrars, and has been illustrated by many others before and since, both in the Church of England and in Catholic Churches elsewhere.

In conclusion, it may be said that there is nothing which really differences the Methodist community from the Church of England, except the assumption of the sacerdotal office and sacerdotal functions by its ministers. This is an error of a very grave character, but it is one which has partly resulted from the incomplete manner in which the nature of the priest's office was set forth by theologians of a past day ; and it is, therefore, one for which much excuse may be made. The day may come when the better instructed Methodist preachers may seek and obtain episcopal ordination, and when the less educated class may also have work assigned to them analogous to their present work, but not sacerdotal, under similar authority. A general movement of this kind would go far towards ending the sectarian position of the Methodist body and restoring it to the position which it was intended by its founder to occupy. The two streams of practical godliness which now flow in the two separate channels of the Church of England and of the Methodist community, might then combine to form one great river whose broad expanse would represent an unity consistent with the varieties of English character and habit, and whose almost irresistible force would mould the religion of English-speaking people throughout the world.

VI. STATISTICS OF THE WESLEYAN METHODISTS.
At the time of Wesley's death, in the year 1791, his Societies in various countries numbered 136,622 members. Of these there were 60,000 in Great Britain, and 11,000 in Ireland, far the greater proportion of the former, 35,000 in the north and 12,000 in the west, being among the people of the northern and western counties. The number of ministers in Great Britain was then about 300, not including the local preachers.

In the year 1871, there were in England and Scotland 347,090 members of classes, and 18,126 on trial ; the number of ministers being 1,649. These numbers shew a decrease during the previous twelve months of 1,381 members of classes and 2,307 on trial. A growing decrease in numbers is conspicuous in the iron and cotton districts, in the metropolis and in Scotland, as is shewn by the following table ; and in populous districts it amounts to nearly 2 per cent. per annum diminution of actual members.

Metropolis, . .	20,252	19,593	659
Lancashire, . .	29,659	29,431	228
Birmingham
Iron district, .	11,915	11,416	499
Durham, Cumberland, and Northumberland, .	29,862	29,664	198
Scotland, . . .	5,722	5,456	266
Total,	97,410	95,560	1,850

Other districts also are decreasing in numbers, but there is a partial counterbalance on the whole of some increase in Yorkshire, Wales, and the Eastern Counties. The whole number of members throughout the British Empire amounted in 1871 to 576,000, those on trial numbering 39,000, there being an increase of 5,000 in Canada and Australia during the preceding year.

The Methodists formerly did but little in the work of educating their poor, considering their great resources ; but since the formation of the "Wesleyan Education Committee" in 1837, they have been much more active in this direction, especially in recent years. In 1863, their week-day schools were 556 in number, with an attendance of 79,582 scholars. In 1871, the schools were 889, and the scholars 150,765. The number of Sunday scholars is about four times as large, and there is a teacher for every six children.

The Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society employs upwards of 1,000 missionaries, for whose education a College has recently been established at Richmond near London. The expenditure of the Society on its missionary work amounts to £150,000 a year.

There are also two other Colleges for the education of Wesleyan ministers, one at Didsbury near Manchester, accommodating seventy students, and another for forty at Headingley near Leeds.

METHODISTS, CALVINISTIC. Another branch of the great stream of religious revival, which flowed off from that of Wesley under the guidance of George Whitfield in the year 1741.

While he was a young servitor at Pembroke [A.D. 1732-1736], Whitfield had become known to Charles Wesley, who was then a student of Christ Church, and through him to his brother John, who was a Fellow of Lincoln. He had thus been brought into association with the Methodists in the University stage of their existence, and when he was ordained deacon, in 1736, he very soon gave up his dull Hampshire curacy at Dummer, and assumed to himself a roving commission as a preacher wherever he could get people for hearers. After two years of such work, he left the shores of England for missionary work in Georgia just as Wesley was returning to them after his failure there. Reaching Georgia in May 1738, he was back in London on Dec. 8th of the same year, and on January 11th, 1739, was ordained priest. He sailed again for his living at Savannah in August, after much itinerant preaching in England; but towards the end of 1740, being suspended by the Episcopal Commissary in Georgia for ecclesiastical irregularities, he appealed home, and returned thither himself by March 11th, 1741, marrying a widow ten or twelve years older than himself shortly afterwards. The thirty-four years of his ministry were all spent in a similar restless manner, for during that time (of which he lived half in England and half in America) he made thirteen voyages across the Atlantic, and seldom remained many days together in one place, either in the old country or the new.

It was while Whitfield was in America in 1740, that he received information respecting Wesley's "Arminian" preaching of Universal Redemption from John Cennick, one of the Methodist lay-preachers, who accompanied his information with an earnest entreaty that he would return home to oppose the "heresy" of their master. A controversy at once arose between Wesley and Whitfield, and they preached and printed sermons against each other across the ocean. On his return to England Whitfield immediately began preaching on Kennington Common, and in Moorfields, not far from Wesley's "Foundry" chapel. Once he was invited to preach in the chapel itself, and using the opportunity for the proclamation of his Calvinistic views respecting the eternal decree of some to damnation as well as of some to salvation, he was not permitted to preach there any more. For this he consoled himself with some words in Beza's Life of Calvin, "Calvin turned out of Geneva, but behold a new Church arises," and the omen was fulfilled by some of his admirers erecting a temporary wooden "Tabernacle" for him in Moorfields, shortly to be superseded by a permanent building.¹

From this date, 1741, the Methodists who dissented from Wesley on the ground of his opposition to Calvinism, looked to Whitfield as their theological leader for thirty years; but the practical leadership of the party drifted into the hands of the enthusiastic Countess of Huntingdon, and most of them in England became members of the Low Church sect which she established, half within and half without the Church of England. [HUNTINGDON CONNEXION.] Whitfield died at Newbury-Port near Boston, in New England, on September 30th, 1770. He had no power whatever of organization, his one talent being that of impassioned preaching, and consequently his followers were never formed into a compact society by him as the Wesleyan Methodists were. Adam Clarke records a saying of Whitfield's illustrating this fact: "My brother Wesley acted wisely. The souls that were awakened under his ministry he joined in class, and thus preserved the fruits of his labour. This I neglected; and my people are a rope of sand."² Some part of the sand agglomerated in the formation of Lady Huntingdon's sect: but a large portion of Whitfield's followers were absorbed into the Church, to form the nucleus of the "Evangelical" school. [LOW CHURCHMEN.] Some of their chapels were, however, kept up in a few places independently of the Church, yet following its usages so closely as to be mistaken for Episcopal chapels. Before the revival of Church building, not a few of them were found in which the Prayer Book, the surplice, and all Church customs were adopted in the same manner as in Lady Huntingdon's Connexion, although the ministers were not ordained in the Church. Such were Surrey Chapel, where the well-known Rowland Hill, brother of the great Lord Hill, was minister (who was, however, in deacon's orders), and Ranelagh Chapel, Chelsea, so well known at a later date as the Court Theatre. Most of these, however, have given way before Church extension, and the few scattered congregations of Calvinistic Methodists which still remain adopt the name of "Independent Methodists," and the usages of the Independents.

METHODISTS, WELSH CALVINISTIC.

A large community of Methodists which owes its origin indirectly to Wesley, and has adopted his system of organization, but which follows the Calvinistic theology of Whitfield.

is also used by Tillotson in 1688 in a letter to Lady Russel; and as synonymous with "chapel of ease" in the report of Convocation to Parliament respecting the scheme for new churches in 1710.

² Wesley records his conviction, on August 25th, 1763, that the work of the Calvinistic Methodists was a "rope of sand" in spiritual matters also. "I was more convinced than ever that the preaching like an apostle, without joining together those that are awakened and training them up in the ways of God, is only begetting children for the murderer. How much preaching has there been for these twenty years in Pembroke-shire? But no regular societies, no discipline, no order or connection. And the consequence is, that nine in ten of the once awakened are now faster asleep than ever." [Wesley's Journ. xii. 33].

The direct originator of Welsh Methodism was an Oxford disciple of the Wesleys and friend of Whitfield named Howell Harris [A.D. 1714-1773], a young man of some property at Trevecca. Harris left Oxford without taking his degree, and when (being under twenty-three years of age) Bishop Clagett declined to ordain him [A.D. 1736] he began to emulate the career of Whitfield as an itinerant preacher among his countrymen, and formed societies similar to those of Wesley. This work he continued in spite of much opposition, and before 1742 he had won over ten clergymen to co-operate with him, among whom the most effective fellow-worker was Daniel Rowlands, Rector of Llangeitho, near Cardigan, and Chaplain to the Duke of Leinster, whose grand presence and voice gained him the name of "the Thunderer" among his excitable countrymen. Rowlands was suspended by his bishop after some years of irregular ministration, and for the rest of his life he followed the course of Wesley and Whitfield, travelling from one end to another of Wales, and continually preaching to multitudes with vehement energy until a little before his death, which took place in 1790, when he was seventy-seven years old. The work of Harris and Rowlands in South Wales was taken up in North Wales by Thomas Charles, Curate of Bala, one of the founders of the Bible Society. He was offered several benefices in the Church, but he preferred the position of authority which he acquired over a large number of his countrymen by following in the footsteps of Rowlands. Before his time the Welsh Methodists had not actually coagulated into a sect, although long practically dissociated from the Church, but in 1811, Mr. Charles completed their sectarian organization by "ordaining" a number of their lay-preachers, and establishing a settled system of rules for the government of the Society. In 1823, a "Confession of Faith" was agreed to, which was founded on the Calvinistic Confession of the Westminster Assembly of Divines.

At the present time the actual members of the Welsh Methodist sect number about 60,000, but many who are not Methodists attend their chapels. They have 200 ministers, 250 lay-preachers, and between eight and nine hundred chapels. In estimating the number of chapels, however, it must be remembered that some of them represent a body of a dozen or two only of attendants. "I am not sure," says a recent correspondent in a Welsh Methodist Magazine, "that some chapels are not erected and small branches separated from the mother Church to be independent churches, from desire of office and a spirit of ambition. Some persons feel—Oh! there is no possibility of my being a leader in this Church as it is; no one here sees any need of me; but we will have a little Church of our own, and we will be heads over it. The great poet Milton puts in the mouth of Satan, 'Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven.' The language of some men's conduct is, 'Better to reign over a society where there are no more than five members, than serve in a Church where there are 300.' The Welsh Methodists have training colleges for their ministers at Trevecca and at Bala.

METHODISTS, NEW CONNEXION. This body of Methodists seceded from the original connexion under the leadership of Alexander Kilham, in the year 1797, and are hence known also as "Kilhamites." On their first separation they were also called "The New Itinerancy."

The New Connexion was formed by about 5000 Methodists, who were discontented because the following claims were not granted by the Conference. [1.] The right of the people to hold their public religious worship at such hours as were most convenient, without their being restricted to the mere intervals of the hours appointed for service in the Church. [2.] The right of the people to receive the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper from the hands of their own ministers, and in their own places of worship. [3.] The right of the people to a representation in the district meetings and the annual Conferences, and thereby to participate in the government of the community and in the appropriation of funds. [4.] The right of the people to have a voice, through the local business meetings, in the reception and expulsion of members, the choice of local officers, and in the calling out of candidates for the ministry.

The growing discontent had been much fostered by the anonymous publications and avowed opposition of Kilham, a Methodist from Wesley's own village of Epworth, who had done good service in the Channel Islands. The position of Kilham at last became so dangerous to the preachers who ruled the Society, that it was resolved to accept the risk of expelling him, notwithstanding the number of those who would follow, rather than that of allowing him to break up their oligarchy. At the Conference held on July 26th, 1796, Kilham was therefore required to subscribe afresh to the canon law of Methodism, the "rules of the large minutes" of Conference. His reply to the demand was "I agree to them as far as they are agreeable with Scripture." The answer of the Conference was, "We all agree with the Koran of Mahomet with the same limitation, namely, as far as it is agreeable to Scripture; but we agree to these rules because we believe them to be agreeable with Scripture." As the accused, or already condemned, preacher had nothing further to say, he was expelled by the following sentence of excommunication: "Whereas Mr. Kilham has brought several charges against Mr. Wesley and the body of the preachers of a slanderous and criminal nature, which charges he declared he could prove, and which, upon examination, he could not prove even one of them; and also considering the disunion and strife which he has occasioned in many of the societies, we adjudge him unworthy of being a member of the Methodist Connexion." Kilham protested against this sentence, and a Committee was sent to him to see whether he would subscribe the "Articles of Pacification:" but as he refused to do so, the sentence was confirmed, with the declaration of the Conference, that "he could have no place in the Connexion while he continued in his present opinions." [Min. of Conf. i. 347.]

Kilham being a man of some power and great energy, soon gathered around him a large body of seceders, 167 class-leaders in Leeds alone coming to his side; some of the circuits in Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Nottinghamshire retained hardly any members of the Old Connexion, and the first census of the New one shewed as many as 5000 members. The disgusted Conference issued an Address, which contains the following passage: "We shall lose all the turbulent disturbers of our Zion,—all who have embraced the sentiments of Payne, and place a great part of their religion in contending for (what they call) liberty. The vine which the Lord has planted among us with His own right hand needed to pass through this pruning and purgation. At the same time, all our watchfulness and diligence should be employed, that the wheat may not be destroyed with the tares. For the loss of the latter we have reason to be thankful to God. And we trust and believe that He will preserve our dear faithful brethren from all the attacks of Satan and His emissaries. The Captain of our salvation is stronger than the demon of discord, and He will in His good time drive him back to the hell whence he came" [Min. of Conf. i. 388.]. But there is no reason to think that there was any such Atheism among the seceders as they are here charged with: nor was the religious liberty for which they seceded at all inconsistent with the principles of Methodism as they had by this time become developed. The fact is, that the ruling preachers inherited Wesley's intolerance of opposition, and his custom of assuming that all who opposed him were necessarily influenced by the powers of darkness.

The New Connexion Methodists at once adopted the practice respecting the Sacraments which were only gradually adopted by the parent sect; and they also introduced the "lay element" freely into the organizations of their Society from the class upwards to the Conference. This latter point is now the only one in which they differ from the Wesleyan Methodists of the older stock.

Their numbers are not very large. In the year 1870 there were 22,633 members in England and Wales, with 419 chapels and rooms, and 149 preachers. This was a decrease of 605 members during the preceding twelve months; the diminution in London being 132, in the Northern counties 412, and in Cornwall 177, counterbalanced by a small increase in some other parts of England. The sect is distributed chiefly over the northern counties, where they number 13,568, in Lancashire, Yorkshire, Durham, and Northumberland. It expends more than £5000 a year on foreign missions, and numbers 9000 members out of England.

METHODISTS, PRIMITIVE. Shortly after the secession of the New Connexion from the main body of the Methodists, extensive attempts were made to recruit the ranks of the latter by means of "revival services," especially in Cornwall, Lancashire, and Staffordshire. In 1807 these efforts were assisted; in the last-named county, by Lawrence Dow, an American Methodist who had previously been engaged in the same kind of work in Ireland as well as in the United States. To him is traced the origin in England of the well-known "camp-meetings," the first of which was held at Mole Cop, near Newcastle in Staffordshire. These were extensively promoted by two local preachers named William Clowes and Hugh James Bourne, who had long advocated a revival of the original methods by which Wesley, Whitfield, and other field-preachers had won so many converts sixty years before. The Methodists were now, however, established in a position of more dignity than in those long-gone days, and they looked upon a revival of old Methodist habits much as a parvenu looks upon the trade of his grandfather. The Conference of 1807 asked itself, therefore, "What is the judgment of the Conference concerning what are called camp-meetings?" and answered, "It is our judgment that, even supposing such meetings to be allowable in America, they are highly improper in England, and likely to be productive of considerable mischief. And we disclaim all connection with them." [Min. of Conf. ii. 403.]

In 1808, Bourne was expelled from the Methodist body by the Burslem Quarterly Meeting, and in 1810 this expulsion was followed by that of Clowes. These two local preachers, being thus made the victims of a generation of travelling preachers who had learned to despise the origin of Methodism, at once began to form a new sect, and were joined by sixteen congregations and twenty-eight preachers in Lancashire and Cheshire. Thus a nucleus was formed for an organization which has numbered more than all other offshoots of the parent body put together, and which has been its most dangerous rival. Within twenty years, in 1830, the Primitive Methodists numbered 36,000, which was 6,000 more than the original Methodists had numbered in England in 1774, after thirty years of Wesley's vigorous preaching and organizing; and at the present time they reckon 30,000 more members than the original community did in 1804, when it had been in existence for the same number of years. By the statistics published in their Minutes of Conference, the Primitive Methodists numbered in 1870 as many as 150,169 in England, and 12,000 elsewhere, being an increase of 1152 during the previous twelve months. Their chapels were reckoned as 6,397, their travelling preachers as 961, and their local preachers as 14,332. Of day schools they counted only 41, with 2,717 scholars; but their Sunday scholars were 271,802 in number, with 47,379 teachers. The distribution of the sect in England is 32,916 in the southern and western counties, 12,609 in the eastern counties, 20,981 in the Birmingham iron district, and 83,663 in the northern counties.¹

METHODISTS, PRIMITIVE IRISH. This name is used in Ireland as descriptive of those Methodists who still adhere to Wesley's system of making their Societies part of the Church system.

METHODISTS, BRYANITE. This sect of Methodists, which is also known by the vague name of "Bible Christians," owes its origin to a local preacher of Cornwall named O'Bryan, who separated from the main body of the Methodists in the year 1815 and returned to it again in 1829. There are no substantial differences whatever between their doctrines and customs and those of the sect from which they seceded, except that they permit women to preach, and that the preachers form a smaller portion of their governing bodies. The Bryanites are especially a West-country sect, the distribution throughout England in their circuits and home missions in 1870 being as follows:—

	Chapels.	Members.
Cornwall and Devonshire,	370	13,000
West Somersetshire and Wales,	60	2,000
Sussex, Hampshire, and other Counties,	114	3,466
Total,	544	18,466

It thus appears that there is a chapel to every 33 members of the sect. There are also about 7000 Bryanites in Canada and Australia. [Min. of Conf. of Bible Christ. 1870.]

METHODISTS, ASSOCIATED. [METHODISTS, UNITED FREE CHURCH.]

METHODIST REFORMERS. [METHODISTS, UNITED FREE CHURCH.]

METHODISTS, UNITED FREE CHURCH. This sect of Methodists has been organized in its present form since the year 1857, but previously to that time the two bodies by whose union it was formed had existed, the one from 1835, the other from 1849.

The first secession, that of the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION, arose out of a dispute respecting the establishment of the Wesleyan Theological Institution. Dr. Samuel Warren (best known as the father of the author of Ten Thousand a Year) taking a part in this quarrel which was objectionable to the other members of the Conference, that body secured his expulsion by the district meeting from the Manchester by the following particulars, very moderately stated by the Primitive Methodist Magazine, of occurrences in Durham, so recent as 1871:—"On the 5th of March last, Mrs. Thompson, formerly Miss Hyde, commenced a series of special services, which extended over six weeks. The chapel will seat 600 persons, and on the week evenings it was often crowded. On the Sabbath evenings scores could not find admission. Individuals often lay prostrate for hours during the services, and some were restive, and in a trance-like state with closed eyes would walk about the chapel, and even stand upon the pew backs, and if not held, appeared as though they would come over the front of the gallery. Scores were converted. The city membership rose from 58 in March to 110 in June. The numbers were taken again in August for September, and there were 106. Several have joined since the numbers were made up. There is converting power in the services. Prostrations are still experienced, and moving about in the service at times, but it does not excite so much attention as at first." These "individuals" appear, from other reports, to have been all, or nearly all, young women.

chapel of which he was the minister, the act being sustained by the Vice-Chancellor, and eventually by the Lord Chancellor. [Min. of Conf. 1835.] Dr. Warren was then expelled from the Methodist body by the Conference, and within two years about 20,000 had joined him in forming the sect of "Associated Methodists." The founder of the secession eventually took holy orders, and became Incumbent of All Souls' Church in Manchester, and from that time its numbers began to diminish.

The WESLEYAN METHODIST REFORMERS, the second of these two sects, originated in a quarrel of a still more trivial and personal character. Some anonymous pamphlets entitled "Fly Sheets" were published at intervals from 1844 to 1848, in which the proceedings of the Conference were severely criticised, and some rough personalities used towards Jabez Bunting, the President. With its usual intolerance this body of preachers expelled the supposed authors, three in number, from the Methodist body, and, as usual, stigmatized the agitation against themselves in terms that would have been more appropriate to the condemnation of blasphemy. The excommunication of the three preachers, however, raised a storm of indignation, and 400 delegates from those who sympathized with them assembled in London just before the meeting of the Conference. At the latter a petition was presented for the redress of certain specified grievances, to which more than 50,000 Methodists had signed their names. The Conference was at once seized with the desperate instinct of self-preservation, and excommunicated all who had been in any way concerned in the meeting of the delegates, as well as whole "classes" and "societies" of those who had been most conspicuous in criticising their authority. This great multitude of excommunicated Methodists soon became a flourishing body, reporting itself as possessing 339 chapels, with an attendance of about 35,000 persons at their services.

In the year 1857 the Association and the Reformers joined together in the formation of a new body, which calls itself "The United Methodist Free Churches," which numbered in 1870 as many as 62,898 members of classes, with 5786 on trial, and 5000 elsewhere than in England. The chapels and preaching-rooms of the community are 1460 in number, which are provided with 282 travelling and 3309 local preachers.

It has 61 day schools, with 6117 scholars. The Sunday schools are 1142, with 150,560 scholars, and 23,726 teachers. The members of the sect are distributed over England in the following proportion:—In London and the south-eastern counties, 8171; in Dorset, Devon, and Cornwall, 10,027; in the Birmingham iron district, 6058; and in the northern counties, 38,642. There was a net decrease in 1869-70 of 120 members; but the decrease in Cornwall was 195, in Northumberland and Durham, 195, in Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire, 212. These districts contain one-third of the whole number of members, and thus the decrease amounts to 3 per cent. in those counties.

METHODISTS, AMERICAN. The rise of Methodism in America was simultaneous with its early spread in England, Whitfield carrying thither his fervid zeal in the year 1738, just as Wesley was returning to his native shores from his unsuccessful missionary work in Georgia. Whitfield spent at least one-third of his life for thirty-two years [A.D. 1738-1770] in America, but he himself organized no separate sect there any more than he did in England, leaving his converts to the ministrations of the Church, or of the sects already existing. The first Methodist congregation was, in fact, formed not by Whitfield's followers, but by some Irish emigrants who landed in New York in the year 1766. But although they had a local preacher, Philip Embury among them, they did not set themselves up as a separate community until stimulated to do so by a female emigrant of a more energetically sectarian disposition, who arrived in the following year, and through whose exertion the first Methodist chapel in America was erected in John Street, New York, in 1768. The small community thus formed entreated Wesley to send them preachers from England, and ten being sent out at various times, the Methodist Societies in New York and Philadelphia numbered in 1773 about 1200 members. When the War of Independence broke out, all the English preachers returned home, but the increase of the sect proceeded so rapidly, that at the close of the war in 1783 they numbered 43 preachers, and 14,000 members.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. In the year 1784 the sect so formed received a new constitution from Wesley. Assuming to himself the authority of an apostle, Wesley laid hands on Dr. Coke (a priest of the Church of England), and Mr. Asbury (one of the missionaries who had fled from America ten years before), sending them out with the name of "superintendents," but for the purpose of acting as bishops. [See page 315.] He also enjoined upon the American Methodists the use of his abridged Book of Common Prayer, and gave them twenty-five articles of religion as the standard of their doctrine. Thus reorganized, the sect assumed the name of "The Methodist Episcopal Church," and it has ever since retained the constitution thus given to it by Wesley, its general organization being that of the English Methodists, its ministerial being that of so-called bishops, elders, and deacons.

In the Northern States this body of Methodists numbers three-quarters of a million of members, with more than 11,000 preachers. In the Southern States, before the war, the number of members was more than half a million, with about 6000 preachers. [Stevens' History of the Meth. Episc. Church, New York, 1864.]

METHODIST REFORMED CHURCH. This sect of American Methodists separated from the main body in the year 1814, giving up the form of Episcopacy and reverting to the original characteristics of Methodism. They made much of the early Methodist doctrine of Christian perfection, and also of that respecting the power of faith; which latter they considered capable of restoring the sick to health as in Apostolic days. They were also strongly opposed to slavery, not permitting any person who countenanced it to remain in their community. To these distinctive principles of the sect has lately been added that of "temperance." In the year 1843, it developed into a much larger body by union with a number of Methodists who again seceded from the parent sect on the questions of episcopacy, slavery, and intemperance. They now consider themselves the true Wesleyan Methodists of America, but their numbers are not large as compared with the original sect, amounting only to about 25,000 members, and 600 preachers.

AFRICAN EPISCOPAL METHODISTS. This is an offshoot of the original sect formed by the secession of its black members in Philadelphia and Baltimore in the year 1816. They profess to hold precisely the same doctrines, and to practise the same discipline as the body from which they seceded, their only reason for separation being the contemptuous treatment which they received from their white brethren.

ZION WESLEY METHODISTS. This is another community of black seceders from the original Methodists of the Northern States. They established separate chapels in the end of the last century, but continued under the control of the Conference of the Episcopal Methodists until 1820. In the latter year disputes arose with the Conference respecting the authority of the latter over the chapel property and the ministers' salaries of the Zion Methodists, and this led to an entire separation.

METHODIST SOCIETY. A secession from the Episcopal Methodists which took place in 1820, on a question respecting the administration of local collections of money. It was a small body, and was ultimately incorporated with the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH, a similar secession which was formed in the year 1830, on the question of lay-representation in the Conferences. The united bodies now number about 100,000 members, with 2000 preachers.

MICHELHAHNITES [MICHELHAHNER]. A Pietistic sect of the Evangelical Lutherans of Würtemberg, said to number about 30,000, and professing to maintain the true principles of the body from which they have separated. They take their name from Michael Hahn, a farmer of Würtemberg [A.D. 1758-1819], who pretended to receive special inward illuminations, and who gave up his original calling for that of a travelling preacher. The Michelhahnites are zealous Millenarians, and expect a "restoration of all things:" that is, the salvation of fallen angels and men. From among them arose the KORNTHALITES, under the elder Hoffmann, immediately after the death of Hahn.

MILITES. This name is given by Philaster as one of the names by which the FLORINIANS were known [Philast. Hær. lxvi.]. Epiphanius also says that the Gnostics were called Στρατιωτικοί in Egypt [Epiph. Hær. xxvi. 3]: a statement in which he is followed by Theodoret [Hær. fab. i. 23] and St. John Damascene [Hær. xxvi.].

MILITZ or MILICZ. One of the precursors of Huss and the Calixtines, who was the leader of a great spiritual reformation in Prague between the years 1363 and 1374, but provoked a charge of heresy against himself by wild declarations respecting the immediate approach of Antichrist and the end of the world.

Militz was a native of Cremisia in Moravia, but became Archdeacon of Prague, and Secretary to the Emperor Charles IV., King of Bohemia. His ascetic habits led him to give up his offices in the year 1363, and retire to the little town of Bischofteinitz, where he spent six months as assistant to the parish priest. He then returned to Prague, and began to take up a position similar to that of Wesley four centuries later, zealously preaching to the people in their native tongue, with stirring exhortations to amendment of life. Bohemia, and especially the new city of Prague, was then full of vice, one quarter of the city being called "Benatky" or "Little Venice," because it was wholly occupied by houses appropriated to purposes of profligacy. Among the inhabitants of this quarter the preaching of Militz had so good an effect that the name of Little Venice was exchanged for that of "Little Jerusalem;" his movement being combined with the use of confession, and of frequent and even daily communion by his penitents.

Like so many reforming ascetics of that age, Militz at last wandered into fanaticism on the subject of Antichrist and the Second Advent, which he declared to be immediately at hand. In the year 1367, he went to Rome that he might proclaim this belief at the very centre of Christendom, and the Pope, Urban V., being still at Avignon, he affixed a notice to the pillars of St. Peter's Church declaring his intention of doing so. This led to his being confined for a time within the walls of a Franciscan monastery, but on the Pope's arrival he ordered him to be liberated, to be entertained by one of the cardinals, and eventually to be sent home to Prague. His fanaticism, however, growing more dangerous, Gregory XI. issued bulls condemning the teaching of Militz, and he was summoned to Avignon to answer the accusations made against him. There he died, while his cause was still pending, in the year 1374.

There is extant a Life of Militz, written by his disciple Matthias of Janow, from which Neander has made many quotations in his Church History. Another is also extant in Balbinus the Jesuit's History of the Kingdom of Bohemia, printed in 1682.

MILLENNARIANS. The Millenarian heresy is the retention in Christianity of the low Judaic notion of a Millennium of mere earthly blessedness. This unworthy conception of the last stage in the world's history is not, it must be remarked, true Judaism. Judaism had indeed a system of temporal promises, but it possessed also elements of spirituality by which its teachers, had they been true successors of the prophets, would have placed due limitations to those promises and have risen above the old and temporary covenant. Such instructors were wanting; and the later Jews, as they looked only for a temporal deliverer in the Messiah, looked only for a temporal Messianic reign. Christianity, giving the true conception of the kingdom of heaven, corrected this unworthy belief, and introduced a conception of a final stage in this world's progress, in which not only shall things temporal be subordinated to things spiritual, but nature itself shall be rendered a willing instrument of the perfect man, that is, of the righteous who are raised from the dead.

It is needless to repeat here the statements of the Dictionary of Theology [MILLENNIUM] regarding the evidence of a belief in the Millennium in the early Church. Those statements shew, to say the least, that such belief, if it be not formally sanctioned by the Church, has on its side a preponderance of early testimony. At present it is proposed to shew [1] the essential difference between the Christian doctrine and the perverted Judaic doctrine; and [2] that the condemnation of Millennial doctrine attaches only to the latter.

The former of these points is worked out by Dorner [On the Person of Christ, div. i. vol. i. app. note AAA.]. The Jews represented the Millennium as the triumph of Israel according to the flesh, of Jerusalem that now is. Christianity represents it as introduced by Jesus of Nazareth Who was crucified and is now exalted; as including believing Jews and Gentiles; as superseding Israel according to the flesh by Israel according to the spirit, the Jerusalem of the Jews by the city of God which comes down from heaven. The Jews taught that Messiah would found His kingdom of earthly blessedness immediately on His first appearance, and evaded that which is essential in Christian doctrine, that the exalted one should be identical with the sufferer. In their view the kingdom of earthly blessedness was not merely a prelude to heavenly blessedness, but was itself substantially the goal and final consummation. [Compare Mede's remark on Jewish ignorance of the second resurrection, Dict. of Theol., MILLENNIUM, 471, ccl. 2.] In the Christian view, the Millennium is but a prelude to the blessedness of heaven, the final stage of the world in which all the senses and all nature shall be subdued to the spirit, the spirit exerting not an annihilating but an ennobling power on the first nature or creation. Without this, it was thought that God cannot be said to reconcile all things to Himself by Christ. "It is fitting," said Irenæus, "that the creation itself, being restored to its primeval condition, should without restraint be under the dominion of the righteous; and the Apostle has made this plain in the Epistle to the Romans when he thus speaks, 'For the expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. . . . The creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the sons of God'" [Iren. cont. Hær. v. 32].

To the Jewish perversion of the Millennium the Christian Millennium was distinctly antagonistic; and those who retained or fell back into the Jewish perversion were unsparingly condemned. Origen led the way. He states that certain men think that the promises of the future are to be looked for in bodily pleasure and luxury, describing the sensual gratifications, the earthly pomp, the temporal dignities which they expect. "Such," he says, "are the views of those who, while believing in Christ, understand the Divine Scriptures in a sort of Jewish sense, drawing from them nothing worthy of the Divine promises" [Orig. de Princip. ii. 11]. We do not assert that, in the sections which follow these words, Origen enounces on the other hand a Christian Chiliasm: but we assert that his doctrine of the intermediate state with its several abodes is not inconsistent with Chiliastic doctrine.

So Jerome: "Judæi et nostri Semijudæi, qui auream atque gemmatam de cœlo expectant Jerusalem. . . . Hæc illi dicunt, qui terrenas desiderant voluptates, et uxorum quærunt pulchritudinem, ac numerum liberorum" [Comm. in 1s. cap. ix. 1, 2, 3]. In the commentary on the fifty-ninth chapter, Jerome had mentioned the belief that circumcision was to be restored. Gregory Nyssen "entirely disclaims the expectation of a voluptuous Millennium, the renewal of Jewish sacrifices, and a terrestrial Jerusalem adorned with precious stones" [Lardner, Credib. chap. c. 8]. It is not denied, however, that through opposition to these carnal notions, true Chiliastic doctrine was very generally abandoned. Andrew, Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, is a witness to this. In his Commentary on the Revelation [cap. xx. 7], he states that some interpret the thousand years of the period of our Lord's ministry: "others think," he adds, "that after the completion of six thousand years shall be the first resurrection from the dead, which is to be peculiar to the saints alone; who are to be raised up that they may dwell again on this earth, where they had given proofs of patience and fortitude; and that they may live here a thousand years in honour and plenty: after which will be the general resurrection of good and bad. But the Church receives neither of these interpretations." Consequently he interprets the thousand years of the time of the Gospel dispensation.

The writers on heresies confine themselves to the denial of a sensual Millennium [Philaster, lix.; August. viii.; Isid. cap. vi. Hær. viii.]. Augustine at one time held Chiliastic doctrine: and when he had relinquished it, still allowed it to be tolerable. [DICT. OF THEOL., MILLENNIUM.] Epiphanius, arguing against Apollinaris, urges, as Jerome did, the absurdity of supposing a return to the rite of circumcision [Hær. lxxvii. cap. 38].

It is in the writings of the doctors of the Church, not in conciliar decrees, that the condemnation of a perverted Chiliasm is to be sought. So, on the other hand, there are no authoritative decrees against true Chiliasm, while it is at the same time confessed that after the first ages there has been a noticeable abandonment of the doctrine. The English Articles of the year 1553 contained a condemnation of Millenarianism, couched in language agreeing with that which has been quoted from Origen and Jerome. "They that go about to renew the fable of heretics called Millenarii, be repugnant to Holy Scripture, and cast themselves headlong into a Jewish dotage" [art. xli.]. This article was directed, as is well known, against the Anabaptist teaching [compare Augsburg Confession, 1531 and 1540, art. xvii.]. It was dropped in 1562, owing, it may be, to the suppression of fanatic teachers who had formerly converted Millenarian expectations into pretexts for licentiousness, both moral and political [Hardwicke, Hist. of Art. p. 131]. With the omission of the article must be connected, however, the appearance of Chiliastic doctrine in Edward VI.'s Catechism, printed in the same year as the Articles. It may have been thought that the article would be considered to condemn all Chiliastic doctrine whatever.

In conclusion, it may be said that Millenarianism is to a certain degree not unorthodox, but that Millenarians who uphold the doctrine of a sensual or Judaic Millennium are unequivocally condemned by theologians.

MILLENNIAL CHURCH. [SHAKERS.]

MILLIARII. [MILLENNARIANS.]

MILLIASTÆ. [MILLENNARIANS.]

MODERATES. This name was given to the party dominant in the Established Kirk of Scotland during the eighteenth century, which (by a reaction, consequent upon the Revolution settlement, from the fervid fanaticism evoked by the ecclesiastical struggles of preceding years) regarded with indifference many of the points held cardinal with the old Covenanters, acquiesced in, and approved of, the system of absolute lay patronage, preached more on morals than on faith, and was generally Latitudinarian in doctrine, Erastian in policy, and worldly in tone of life. It quieted controversies by treating them alike with indifference, and went so far in its aversion to any exertion of spiritual life, as to reject in the General Assembly of 1796 an overture in favour of Missions, partly on the ground alleged by a minister that the preaching of the Gospel was likely rather to hinder than advance the simple virtues of the untutored savage, and partly on that alleged by a lay elder, panic-struck at the progress of French revolutionary ideas, that the funds collected for such an object would "certainly" in time "be turned against the Constitution." The party, however, was not without many members who possessed a more evangelical spirit, and to whom the term "moderate" attached in a far better and higher sense; while with regard to intellectual ability the names of Blair and Robertson (by the latter of whom the proceedings of the Assembly were directed for many years with great tact and prudence) give to it no mean distinction. But as the prevalence of a similar party in England gave rise to Methodism, so the opposition to the Moderates in Scotland found vent in the Secession and Relief Synods, and finally rent the Kirk in twain by the Free Church movement of the present century.

MOLINISTS. An anti-Augustinian school of Jesuit theologians, originated by the Spanish Jesuit Molina, in the latter part of the sixteenth century.

Lewis Molina [A.D. 1535-1601] was a professor of divinity in the Portuguese university of Evora, where he promulgated opinions on the subject of grace and free-will which were opposed to the received theology of St. Thomas Aquinas, and to that of St. Augustine, on which the arguments of Aquinas are grounded. These opinions were published by Molina in the year 1588, in a book first printed at Lisbon, and in an enlarged form at Antwerp in A.D. 1595, under the title of a "Harmony of Free Will with the gifts of Grace," &c. [De Liberi Arbitrii Concordia cum Gratiæ Donis, Divina Præscientia, Providentia, Prædestinatione, et Reprobatione.] The book was immediately attacked by the Dominicans as being of a Pelagianizing tendency, and before the second edition of it had been brought out, the controversy between them and the Jesuits, who sided with Molina, had become so dangerous, that, in 1594, Pope Clement VIII. enjoined silence on both parties, and promised to commit the decision of the dispute to a congregation of theologians. Upon this the Dominicans used their influence with Philip II. to induce the Pope to re-open the question at once, and the King's persuasions prevailed on Clement to convoke the promised assembly early in the year 1598. It consisted of a president, Cardinal Madrucci, the Bishop of Trent, of three other bishops, and seven theologians of different fraternities, and its meetings continued for three years under the title of "Congregationes de Auxiliis," or "Congregations concerning Divine Grace." At the third of these, held on January 16th, 1598, the opinions of Molina were thus summarized:—

[1.] A reason or ground of God's predestination is to be found in man's right use of his free will. [2.] That the grace which God bestows to enable men to persevere in religion may become the gift of perseverance, it is necessary that they be foreseen as consenting and co-operating with the Divine assistance offered them, which is a thing within their power. [3.] There is a mediate prescience, which is neither the free nor the natural knowledge of God, and by which he knows future contingent events before he forms his decree.¹ [4.] Predestination may be considered as either general (relating to whole classes of persons) or particular (relating to individual persons). In general predestination there is no reason or ground of it beyond the mere good pleasure of God, or none on the part of the persons predestinated; but in particular predestination

(or that of individuals) there is a cause or ground of it in the foreseen good use of free will.

The Jesuits did not adopt these opinions, but they maintained that they were not Pelagian, and that they were permissible; the Dominicans, on the other hand, identified them with Semi-Pelagianism, and opposed to them the theology of Aquinas, the great theologian of their order and of the whole Church: and the decision of the divines to whom the controversy was committed was given in favour of the latter view in the year 1601.

Notwithstanding this decision, however, the Jesuits succeeded in prevailing on Clement VIII. to re-open the case; and a new congregation was appointed, consisting of fifteen cardinals, five bishops, and nine doctors, over whom the Pope himself presided on seventy-eight separate occasions between March 20th, 1602, and January 22nd, 1605: but just as he was ready to pronounce his sentence in the cause he died, within six weeks of the last session. The congregation met again under the presidency of his successor Paul V. between September 1605 and March 1606, but ultimately it was determined that no sentence should be pronounced on either side; public policy requiring, probably, that the Pope should not make an enemy of France by deciding against the Jesuits, or of Spain by deciding against the Dominicans. The views of the latter were shortly afterwards developed in their extreme form in the "Augustinus" of Cornelius Jansen: while the "scientia media" of the Molinists has been substantially adopted by Jesuit theologians. MOLINOS. [QUIETISTS.]

MOLOKANES. [MALAKANES.]

MOMMIERS. A nickname given to those who represented a revival of "Evangelical" Christianity in Geneva about the year 1818, under the ministrations of Cæsar Malan and Robert Haldane, the former a Calvinistic pastor at Geneva, the latter an English clergyman. Mr. Haldane established a class of theological students at Geneva in 1817 (of whom Merle d'Aubigné was one), which gradually developed a better description of pastors than had been hitherto known in Geneva. The prayer-meetings held by these (after the custom of the Methodists and Evangelicals in England) gained for them the absurd name of "Mommiers," but in the year 1831 the party was strong enough to form an organized body, with a theological college, and it then became known as "The Evangelical Society of Geneva." A similar Society was afterwards formed on the opposite shore of the Lake for the Canton de Vaud.

MONARCHIANS. By this euphemistic name are called those heretics who deny the distinction of Persons in the Divine Nature. They pretended that they alone held a true μοναρχία, in the same manner as modern Unitarians pretend that they alone hold the Unity of God.

The term μοναρχία this party used not in the Catholic sense, as maintaining that there is one only ἀρχή, source or fountain of Deity, the Father; which sense implies the existence of the Begotten Son and Proceeding Spirit as distinct Persons: nor in the sense of unity, for unity can only be asserted when there is plurality (in which lies the misuse of the term by Unitarians): nor again in the sense of God's sole government, which affirms nothing concerning the existence or non-existence of a distinction of Persons in the Godhead; but in the sense of simple oneness, from which oneness they argued that the Godhead is so simple a Being as to be μονοπρόσωπος, a solitary, single Hypostasis. They charged the Trinitarians accordingly with Tritheism. "Monarchiam tenemus," they boasted [Tert. adv. Prax. 3], i.e. (Rigault remarked) μοναρχικὴν θεότητα, nam alias incidimus eis τὴν ἄθεον πολυθεότητα. That this was the meaning in which they used the term is apparent on the very face of the controversy. Tertullian goes on to assert that Monarchia means nothing else than "singulare et unicum imperium." So far then as his arguments rest on this assertion, it seems that they are not to the purpose, being directed really against a misuse of the word, not against the thing the Monarchians intended by it.

Dionysius of Rome uses the word of the Unity of God, speaking of those who in their opposition to Sabellius, by division of the Persons, destroy τὴν μοναρχίαν, τὴν ἀγίαν Μονάδα [Routh, Reliq. Sac. iii. p. 373-4].

The heresy of the Monarchians, who thus misused the term Monarchy, may be traced in the very earliest times of Christianity. Justin Martyr expressly denounces it, and his notice guides us to its source: for he finds the heresy to exist both among Jews and Christians. He condemns the Jews for thinking that when God was said to have appeared to the patriarchs, it was God the Father who appeared. Such, he says, are justly convicted of knowing neither the Father nor the Son; for they who say that the Son is the Father are convicted of neither understanding the Father, nor of knowing that the Father of the universe has a Son, who being the first-born Logos of God is likewise God [First Apol. ch. lxiii.]. In the Dialogue with Trypho he handles the same topic, and extends the charge to Christians. "I am aware that there are some who wish to meet this by saying that the power which appeared from the Father of the universe to Moses, or Abraham, or Jacob, is called an Angel in His coming among men, since by this the will of the Father is made known to men; He is also called Glory, since He is sometimes seen in an unsubstantial appearance; sometimes He is called a man, since He appears under such forms as the Father pleases; and they call Him the Word, since He is also the bearer of messages from the Father to men. But they say, that this power is unseparated and undivided from the Father, in the same manner that the light of the sun when on earth is unseparated and undivided from the sun in heaven, and when the sun sets the light is removed with it; so the Father, they say, when He wishes makes His power go forth, and when He wishes He brings it back again to Himself" [Dial. c. Tryph. cc. 127, 128]. It appears, then, that there were persons in Justin's time who called themselves Christians, but who believed that the Son was merely an unsubstantial energy or operation of the Father. [See Bull, Def. Fid. Nic. II. iv. 4; Burton, Bampt. Lect. note 103.]

Now, in this the Jews had deserted the better teaching of their earlier Rabbis. For these ascribed a Divine Personality to the Angel of the Presence; and the doctrine of the Holy and Undivided Trinity subsisted, though in a less developed form, in the synagogue of old [see Mill, Panth. Prin. part ii. pp. 92-99]. The cause of this declension in doctrine was, that opposition to the Incarnate Word when He really appeared predisposed them to accept a heathen philosophy, and to represent the Logos, as Philo did, as the manifest God not personally distinct from the concealed Deity. This error found its way into Christianity through the Gnostics, who were largely indebted to the Platonic school of Alexandria. It appears as the foundation of the system of Simon Magus, who taught that the originating principle of all (which he asserted to be Fire, for "God is a consuming fire") is of a twofold nature, having a secret part and a manifest part, corresponding, as Hippolytus remarks, to the potentiality and energy of Aristotle. If this be nothing else than Philo's representation of the Logos, there is some sure ground for the notion that Simon held the heresy afterwards called Sabellian. Burton rejects the notion, inasmuch as the doctrine of emanations is not to be confounded with the theory of Sabellius; but Hippolytus (whom Burton did not possess) shews that the Logos, in Simon's theory, employed certain portions of the Divine fulness, which portions he called Æons; and that the Logos, although Simon uses the word Begotten, is really the manifest God not personally distinct from the concealed Deity [Burton, Bampt. Lect. note 46]. Although therefore the doctrine of emanations is not to be confounded with the doctrine of Sabellius, it had in its original form as constructed by Simon a foundation of Sabellianism. Traces of Sabellianism are found even in the later schools of Gnostics, and the later Sabellianism approached to an emanation theory. A resemblance has been noticed between the tenets of Valentinus and those of Sabellius [Petavius, Dogm. Theol. II. i. 6; Wormius, Hist. Sabell. ii. 3]; and Neander is inclined to think that Marcion may have adopted some of the Patripassian doctrines in Asia Minor. [Allgem. Geschichte, i. p. 796. Burton, Bampt. Lect. note 103.]

The leading tenet of the Monarchians thus appears to have been introduced into Christianity principally through the Alexandrian Jews and the Gnostics. It may also have been derived immediately from heathen philosophers, as in the case of Noëtus it is ascribed by Hippolytus immediately to Heraclitus. [NOËTIAN.]

The tenet rests on the sophism, Either the Son is the same as the Father and not distinct in Person, or we must say that the Divine Substance is divided into two parts, of which the one constitutes the Person of the Father, the other the Person of the Son. This follows evidently, Bull remarks, from the passage of Justin Martyr which has been quoted [Def. Fid. Nic. II. iv. 4]. The Monarchians asserted, that is, that we cannot distinguish the Persons without dividing the Substance.

From this error it follows logically that the Divine Nature in our Blessed Lord is either denied, or asserted to be the very nature of the Father. The Monarchian, to be consistent, must be an Arian or a Patripassian. And all who denied the distinction of Persons in the Godhead did adopt one of the varying forms of the heresies of Sabellius, Paul of Samosata or Arius. In the forms of some of these different sects the Monarchian controversy agitated the Church of Rome, especially during the episcopates of Zephyrinus and Callistus, during the third century; and passed into the great controversies which agitated the whole Church in the fourth century, and called for the two great Councils of Nicæa and Constantinople.

The history of the Monarchian sects shews an endeavour to escape from the revolting tenet of Patripassianism, and to retain or supply that which the nature of man almost instinctively requires, a superhuman mediation and atonement. The working of these two motives, as the Monarchian adopts either the Arian or the Patripassian alternative, is very remarkable; inasmuch as the return to Catholicity appears to be much easier in the school which adopts the former alternative. When Patripassianism is at once and decisively rejected it is open to the Monarchian to satisfy the need for a Mediator by magnifying the Divine element in our Lord, which at first he considered to be only the highest degree of prophetic grace, and passing through stages of Arianism and Semi-Arianism to approach nearer and nearer to the truth. Whereas, when Patripassianism has been adopted, and the need is felt for freeing the mind from a tenet at which one shudders, it is only done by diminishing the Divine Nature in our Lord, through the stages of supposing it a portion of the Divine fulness, then an emanation from the Godhead. The result is a deliberate Psilanthropism.

Regarding the heresy itself of Pseudo-Monarchianism, the main points for consideration are the following: First, An eternal Mind must needs have in it from eternity an ἐννοια or λόγος, a notion or conception of itself, which the schools term verbum mentis; nor can it be conceived without it. "This Word in God cannot be, as it is in us, a transient vanishing accident, for then the Divine nature would indeed be compounded of substance and accident, which would be repugnant to its simplicity; but it must be a substantial, subsisting Word" [Bull, Cath. Doct. concerning the Blessed Trinity]. The Monarchians denied this Τελευταίον καὶ ζῶντα καὶ αὐτοῦ τοῦ πρώτου νοῦ λόγον ἐμψυχον. Denying this, they denied also that substantial vinculum Charitatis in which the Father and the Son are One ἐνότητι Πνεύματος. Secondly, Thus is destroyed that αὐτάρκεια which we attribute to God, i.e. His self-sufficiency and most perfect bliss and happiness in Himself alone, before and without all created beings. For this we cannot well conceive without acknowledging a distinction of Persons in the Godhead. The Monarchians denied the Individual Society of the Ever-blessed Trinity.

MONARCHYMEN. [FIFTH MONARCHY MEN.]

MONOÏMUS. An Arabian heretic of the second century, who appears to have been a follower of Basilides. He is mentioned by Theodoret, but the particulars of his system, which was formed of strange geometrical and arithmetical speculations respecting the origin of the world, are given only by Hippolytus. The substance of these is that primal man is the universe: that the universe is the originating cause of all things, he himself being unbegotten, incorruptible and eternal, that a Son of the primal man was generated independently of time; that the Son of Man is a monad represented by the iota and the tittle, that is the Greek figure 10 [ι]; that all things have emanated from the substance of this monad; that cubes, octahedrons, pyramids, and all such figures, out of which crystallize fire, water and earth, have arisen from numbers which are comprehended in the number ten. In a letter from Monoïmus to Theophrastus, which is quoted by Hippolytus, the former avows that he believed in no God separate from man's own self. [Hippol. Refut. Hæc. viii. 5-8, x. 13. Theodor. Hæc. fab. i. 18.]

MONOPHYSITES [Μονοφυσίται]. A sect which separated from the Orthodox Eastern Church upon the condemnation of the Eutychian heresy in the year 451 by the Council of Chalcedon; gradually extending itself to every part of Eastern Christendom, and being represented after the sixth century by the Jacobites. Their distinctive tenet was developed out of the heresy of Eutyches, but was not identical with it: Eutyches maintaining that the Union of Christ's Divine and Human Natures in the Incarnation resulted in the ultimate extinction of the latter, so that the glorified Saviour is wholly and only Divine, while the Monophysites held that the two Natures were so united, that although the "One Christ" was partly Human and partly Divine, His two Natures became by their union only one Nature (μὴν φύσις).

The modification of the opinion of Eutyches [EUTYCHIANS], which thus acquired the name of Monophysitism, originated with Dioscorus, the successor of St. Cyril as Patriarch of Alexandria. He presided at the Council of Ephesus, which was summoned in the year 449 to consider the opinions of Eutyches, and which from the murderous violence shewn by his Egyptian partizans was called the "Latrocinium" or "Robber Synod." Under the influence of Dioscorus, who wished to gain a victory over the patriarchs of Antioch and Constantinople, the chief opponents of Eutyches, the assembled bishops were persuaded or forced to give their decision in favour of Eutyches, the key-note to that decision being struck by the passionate exclamation of Dioscorus, "Will you endure that two Natures should be spoken of after the Incarnation" [Mansi, Concil. vi. 503]. The decision so given was not, however, accepted by the Patriarch of Antioch nor by Flavian the Patriarch of Constantinople (who died in exile shortly afterwards from the wounds which he received at the last riotous meeting), nor by Leo, Bishop of Rome; and another Council was summoned by the new Emperor Marcian in the following year, which assembled first at Nicæa, but eventually at Chalcedon, from which latter city it received its name. At this Council, composed of 630 bishops (a much larger number than had attended any previous general council), the opinions which the martyred Flavian had maintained against Eutyches were declared to be orthodox, and Dioscorus, by whom he had been deposed, and through whose encouragement of violence he had been murdered, was himself deposed. At the moment of his condemnation he reiterated his opinion in the cry, "They are condemning the Fathers as well as me; I have passages from Athanasius and Cyril which forbid us to speak of two Natures after the Incarnation" [Mansi, Concil. vi. 590]. He was, however, banished by the Emperor to Gangra, in Paphlagonia, and Proterius, Arch-priest of the Church of Alexandria, was [A.D. 452] elected patriarch in his stead; great riots ensuing among the people of Alexandria, a large number of whom were the partizans of the banished patriarch. He never returned from exile, but died at Gangra some time in the year 454.

As the initiation of the Monophysite schism was signalized by the murder of its opponent, so was its consummation. The leading adversary of Proterius was Timotheus Ælurus, who organized some of the Monophysites into a separate body, with places of worship of their own, and who acquired his nickname of "the cat" by climbing up to the windows of the monks, and pretending that he was a messenger sent from Heaven to bid them forsake the communion of Proterius, and make himself patriarch in his stead. On the death of the Emperor Marcian, Timothy collected a body of monks and other followers, seized on the Church of Cæsarea, and was there consecrated patriarch [A.D. 457] by two bishops who had been condemned by a council and exiled by the Emperor. A few days after some of his partizans attacked the house of Proterius, and when he fled to the baptistery, where the baptisms of Holy Week were going forward, for safety, he was followed by the mob, who stabbed him to death, dragged his body round the city till it was torn to pieces, and having burned what remained on the shore, scattered his ashes in the sea; treating him in the same savage manner as Hypatia had been treated not long before.

From this time there was an unbroken succession of Monophysite patriarchs in Alexandria. The orthodox succession was revived in Timothy Salofaciolus for twelve years [A.D. 468-482], and afterwards for a short time in John Talaia, who, however, was soon driven away from Egypt, and died Bishop of Nola near Rome. There was then a vacancy in the see for more than half a century, when, in the year 539, a new race of nine orthodox patriarchs began which lasted until about A.D. 640. From that time the patriarchate of Alexandria lapsed into the hands of the Monophysites through the favour which was shewn to them by the Mahometan conquerers of Egypt; and although an orthodox succession was restored in the eighth century, the original Church of St. Mark sunk into insignificance, and has become little more than a dependant on that of Constantinople.

At the same time that the Monophysite sect was thus beginning to take possession of Egypt it acquired a strong hold on Palestine through the usurpation of the see of Jerusalem by a monk of the party named Theodosius, who seized on the patriarchal church and throne during the absence of Juvenal, the reigning patriarch, and consecrated Monophysite bishops in opposition to the orthodox bishops throughout Palestine; a similar schism being not long after established by Peter Fullo, or the Fuller, at Antioch: and thus a large portion of the Eastern Church was confronted by a bitter sectarian rival, before the successful progress of which the orthodox Christians came to be looked upon as a mere Church party under the name of "Chalcedonians," or even a mere State party under the name of "Melchites," or Royalists.

The first great success of the sect was attained through an imperial edict which was issued by Basiliscus, the usurper who for a short time succeeded Marcian, at the persuasion of Timothy Ælurus. In this edict [A.D. 476] the Emperor professed his adherence to the three Ecumenical Councils of Nicæa, Constantinople, and Ephesus, and rejected that of Chalcedon. To this profession of faith Ælurus himself, Anastasius of Jerusalem, and Peter Fullo of Antioch, all added their subscriptions; and they were followed by nearly 500 other bishops, so strong had the sect grown [Evagr. Hist. Eccl. iii. 5]. Under Timothy Ælurus the Monophysites were led back a degree nearer to orthodoxy. Dioscorus had followed Eutyches in denying our Lord's human nature to be of the same kind as that of ordinary men; but when Timothy was on a visit to Constantinople, and some Eutychian monks desired to join his communion, he took the opportunity of disclaiming this part of their belief, and declared the conviction of himself and his followers to be that the Saviour became consubstantial with men according to His Human Nature, as He had ever been consubstantial with the Father according to his Divine Nature. In this particular the Monophysite followers of Timothy, who were hence called "Timotheans," as the opposite party were called "Dioscorians," returned to the Creed of St. Cyril, which his deacon and successor Dioscorus had forsaken.

When the Emperor Zeno had returned to Constantinople and deposed Basiliscus, he for a time discouraged the Monophysites, but was at length persuaded by Acacius, the patriarch of Constantinople, to attempt a reunion between them and the Church by means of an edict similar to that of Basiliscus, and called from its object the "Henoticon," or Formula of Concord [ibid. 14]. This was accepted by Peter Mongus, the successor of Timothy Ælurus; and the orthodox patriarch, John Talaia, having then fled from Alexandria to Italy, many members of the forsaken Church were willing to accept the Monophysite bishop for their head, so that he and his successors became sole Patriarchs of Alexandria for fifty-seven years [A.D. 482-539], only a few holding out, weakened and persecuted, and known as "Proterians." At the same time another schism broke out among the Monophysites; for while Mongus was professing great zeal on the one side, by inserting the names of Dioscorus and Timothy Ælurus in the diptychs, he was also professing to the patriarchs of Constantinople and Rome that he accepted the decrees of Chalcedon. Hence the old Dioscorian party separated from him entirely, and reverting to the original principles of Eutyches, formed the sect known as the ACPHALLI, or those who had separated from their episcopal head, and had no bishop of their own.

The Monophysites were again broken up into two sects about the year 520. Severus having been deposed from the see of Antioch, and Julian from that of Halicarnassus, by the Emperor Justin, both sought refuge in Egypt. There Severus headed that division of the sect which was called by the name of Severianists, PHTHARTOLATRÆ, or Corrupticolæ, and which maintained the corruptibility of Christ's Human Nature, or its identity with that of ordinary pain-suffering, weak, and mortal manhood; while Julian became the leader of the Julianists, or APHTHARTODOCETÆ. The theology of Severus eventually became that of the Monophysites at large, while that of the Julianist party soon ceased to have any supporters. The memory of Severus is so bound up with the traditions of the sect, that a festival is set apart in the Jacobite calendar to commemorate his arrival in Egypt. From the time of Severus the tenets of the Monophysites receded therefore another stage further from Eutychianism; and although they still maintained that our Lord after His Incarnation was of one Nature only, the doctrine was henceforward held in such a way as not to be so extremely divergent from that of the Church. For, in the theology of Severus, the qualities of human nature were all retained in our Lord after the Incarnation, although that nature was in Him so amalgamated with the Divine Being that it could not be said to possess any being or identity of its own. Thus the Monophysite conception of Christ's Person settled into that of a Theandric or composite Nature, analogous to that composite action of His Person which later divines have called a Theandric operation (θεανδρικὴ ἐνέργεια). But belief in such a composite Nature is inconsistent with the Nicene Creed, which asserts that our Lord Jesus Christ is "of one Substance with the Father;" and since the Father is not of such a composite Nature, to declare the Son to be so is to declare Him to be of a different substance from Him. Thus, the intellectual form which Severus gave to Monophysitism cannot escape from the charge of heresy any more than that earlier form of opinion which was condemned at Chalcedon.

The instability of opinion, when dissociated from the safeguard of the Nicene Creed, was also strikingly illustrated in the case of the later Monophysite school, as well as of the earlier. Severus himself held views respecting the Soul of the united Natures of Christ which were not logically consistent with the theology respecting their oneness, and thus it was only one step forward for Themistius, his deacon, to invent the tenet of the AGNOËTÆ, that the human soul of Christ was like ours in everything, even in its want of omniscience, or "ignorance." When, again, Severus maintained that the Divine and the Human Wills in the united Natures were also so united that there could be no volition of the one nature one way and the other nature in another direction, he was preparing the way for that development of his opinion which was made by the MONOTHELITES, who maintained that there was only one will in Christ as well as only one nature.

After the death of Severus, and of Timothy II., who was sole patriarch of Alexandria during the fifteen years in which Severus was so prominent a leader of the Monophysites, a new schism broke out among the latter, the clergy and men of wealth choosing Theodosius, a disciple of Severus, as successor to Timothy, the monks and the lower classes electing Gaianus, the leader of the Aphthartodocetæ, whose party took the name of GAIANITES. This division, and the energy of the Emperor Justinian in supporting the orthodox cause, led to a revival of the orthodox episcopate in the person of Paul, who was consecrated in the year 539, and who began a new Catholic succession of patriarchs, beside which the patriarchate of the Monophysites ran parallel for a century. During the greater part of Justinian's reign [A.D. 527-565], the sect was much depressed, and broken up into a great number of parties. Its principles were condemned in synods held at Constantinople in the years 536 and 553, and the Emperor himself, who eventually adopted the opinions of the Aphthartodocetæ, was always personally opposed to the Severian, or predominant, party of the Monophysites, and wrote against them [Justin. Imp. contr. Monoph. in Galland. Bibl. Patr. xii. 292]. But towards the close of Justinian's reign a disciple of Severus, Jacobus Baradæus, or Zanzalus, Bishop of Edessa, [A.D. 541-578] began an energetic revival of Monophysite opinions in Syria, a revival which spread to Egypt also. From that time until the Mahometan armies began to overrun the East, the "Jacobites," as they now began to be called from the revivalist just named, were again a prosperous and important sect; and they so easily went over from the side of the orthodox Greek Emperors to that of the infidel conquerors, that the latter shewed them much favour, and eventually established them as the recognised Christianity of the new empire in Egypt. [JACOBITES. Evagr. Hist. Eccl. Renaudot, Hist. Patriarch. Alex. Asseman. Diss. de Monoph. in Bihl. Orient. ii. Gieseler's Commentatio qua Monophysitarum variae . . . opiniones . . . illustrantur. Neale's Hist. East. Ch. Patriarch. Alexandr. Dörner's Person of Christ. II. i. Clark's transl.].

MONOTHELITES [Μονοθεληται]. An heretical school developed within the Eastern Church in the earlier half of the seventh century, through an attempt to harmonize the orthodox doctrine of the Incarnation with the opinions held by the Monophysite sects. The distinctive tenet of the Monothelites was that the Divine and Human Natures of Christ did not possess separate Divine and Human Wills, but one Will (μόνον θέλημα) partly Human and partly Divine.

The name of the Monothelites first appears in the writings of St. John of Damascus in the middle of the eighth century, but the origin of their opinion may be traced as far back as to Severus, the deprived patriarch of Antioch, who, during the last fifteen years of his life [A.D. 520-535] resided in Alexandria, and became the founder of the later school of Monophysites. In some fragments of his writings which have come down to modern times, Severus remarks that our Lord's words, "Not My will, but Thine be done" [Luke xxii. 42], do not prove the existence of a will distinct from the Divine Will, nor that there was any struggle or resistance on the part of the Saviour's Soul as if He had a human fear of death or a human unwillingness to die; but that the words are so set down by way of accommodation, and for Christian instruction [Mai, Coll. Nov. vii. 288]. But the distinct formulation of the Monothelite dogma is attributed to Theodore, Bishop of Pharan in Arabia. Although not a Monophysite, Theodore taught that all the acts of Christ proceeded from one principle, originating in the Word, and operating through the human soul and body. Hence, though the Logos and the Manhood were distinct natures, they were both acted upon by one and the same ἐνέργεια; and there being one activity, there was one will by which it was moved, that will being divine. [Αὐτοῦ γὰρ τὸ θέλημα ἓν ἐστὶ, καὶ τοῦτο θεϊκόν. Mansi, Concil. xi. 568.]

Athanasius, the Monophysite patriarch of Antioch, was a zealous convert to the opinion of Theodore, and laid it before the Emperor Heraclius as offering a basis for such a compromise between his sect and the Church as might enable them to reunite in one communion. The idea of reunion was taken up with enthusiasm both by the Emperor and by Sergius, the patriarch of Constantinople; and the see of Alexandria becoming vacant [A.D. 630], Cyrus, Bishop of Pharis, was translated thither for the purpose of effecting it in that city, which was the intellectual stronghold of the Monophysites. Immediately after his appointment, Cyrus held a council, at which terms of reunion were arranged in nine articles, all of which were orthodox except the seventh, in which the opinion of Theodore was affirmed in the words τὸν αὐτὸν ἓνα Χριστὸν καὶ υἱὸν ἐνεργούντα τὰ θεοπρεπή καὶ ἀνθρώπινα μὴ θεανδρικῇ ἐνέργειᾳ [Mansi, Concil. xi. 565], where the theandric operation appears intended to comprehend the idea of one will alone, as expressed by Theodore in the passage previously quoted. This canon was protested against by a learned monk named Sophronius, who declared that it revived the Apollinarian heresy which made the Divine Nature of Christ to be the Soul of His Human Nature, but Cyrus disregarded this protest, and a formal reunion of the Monophysites and the Church was effected in the spring of A.D. 633. This was looked upon as a victory over orthodoxy by the former, and many of the orthodox were alienated.

In the following year Sophronius was appointed Patriarch of Jerusalem, and at once embarked in a controversy respecting the new dogma. His opposition was so formidable, that Sergius, the Patriarch of Constantinople, thought it desirable to obtain the countenance of Honorius, Bishop of Rome, to whom he wrote a detailed account of the origin and progress of the controversy, including the nine canons which had formed the basis of reconciliation. The Roman Pope replied in terms approving of the policy which had been adopted, and assenting to the Monothelite dogma, though regarding it as an unpractical piece of controversy. But Honorius seems even to have gone further than Sergius in assenting to it; for whereas the latter and Cyrus, with the canon passed in the council, had only spoken of one activity or ἐνέργεια, Honorius writes: "Inasmuch as the Humanity was naturally united with the Word, and Christ is therefore One, we acknowledge one will of our Lord Jesus Christ—unam voluntatem fatemur Domini nostri Jesu Christi" [Mansi, Concil. xi. 539]. Sophronius appealed to Honorius, sending to him Stephen, Bishop of Dora, and entreating him to oppose the growing heresy, but he only met with a sharp rebuke from the Pope, who admonished him to submit his opinion to that of Sergius, and no longer to teach that there was a duality of wills in Christ. Shortly afterwards Antioch was in the hands of the Saracens, and no more is heard of Sophronius.

Within a few months after the correspondence with Honorius, the Emperor Heraclius followed the example of Zeno and Justinian by publishing [A.D. 638] an edict composed by Sergius, which contained an exposition of the faith, and hence received the name of the "Ecthesis" (Ἐκθέσις τῆς πίστεως). This forbade discussion on the subject of the unity or duality of the ἐνέργεια, but laid down positively that the Catholic faith required the acknowledgment of one only will in Christ; thus substantially embodying the statements which Sergius had received from Honorius, though in some parts using the words of the epistle which Sergius himself had written to Rome. [Mansi, Concil. x. 992.]

The Ecthesis was quietly received in the East, but John IV., the successor of Honorius, rejected and condemned it in a council which he held at Rome in the year 641. He also wrote against it to the Emperor Constantine (son and successor to Heraclius), and to Pyrrhus, the successor of Sergius [Theophan. Chronograph. i. 508; Mansi, Concil. x. 682, xi. 9]; but his remonstrances produced no effect upon either emperor or patriarch. In a few years, however, the edict was withdrawn by Constans II., and its place supplied [A.D. 648] by another called the "Type" [τύπος τῆς πίστεως], which strictly forbade, under penalties, all controversy respecting the mode in which Christ's will or energy is exercised, and required both clergy and laity to keep within the bounds of conciliar statements [Mansi, Concil. x. 1029]. This penal suppression of truth, as well as falsehood, was so unacceptable at Rome, that Martin, who was then Pope, immediately summoned a council to meet at the Lateran, which, in A.D. 649, condemned the Monothelite heresy, the Ecthesis and the Type, and anathematized Theodore, Sergius, Cyrus, Pyrrhus, and also Paul, the reigning patriarch of Alexandria. The Emperor was so indignant at this disregard of his authority, that he caused the Pope to be treated with great severity. He was carried to Constantinople as a criminal, tortured and banished to the Crimea, where he died in the year 655, to be numbered among the martyrs of the Western and the Confessors of the Eastern Church. His great intellectual supporter at the council had been a Greek abbot named Maximus; and he too underwent a long persecution, being scourged, having his tongue cut out, and at last dying a death little short of martyrdom just as he had reached his place of exile, A.D. 662.

The final and authoritative condemnation of the Monothelite heresy took place at the Sixth General Council held at Constantinople in the year 680. This council was summoned by Constantine Pogonatus [A.D. 668-685], the successor of Constans II., and sat from November 7th, 680, to September 16th, 681, the Emperor himself sometimes presiding. The English bishop Wilfrid was present, and brought home the acts of the council to be accepted by the Church of England at the Council of Hatfield [Haddan & Stubbs' Councils, iii. 140]. An exact and laborious inquiry was made into the arguments which were alleged by Macarius, Patriarch of Antioch, on the Monothelite side, and those of Pope Agatho's deputation on that of the orthodox faith, but it was not until the thirteenth of its eighteen sessions that the council arrived at any decision. At last it was ruled that there are in Christ "two natural wills and two natural operations, without division, without conversion or change, with nothing like antagonism, and nothing like confusion," but that at the same time the Human Will of Christ could not come into collision with His Divine Will, but is in all things subject to it. An anathema was also pronounced on Theodore, Sergius, Honorius, and all who had maintained the heresy: this anathema being confirmed by Leo II., who wrote to the Emperor respecting his own predecessor in the See of Rome "Anathematizamus . . . necnon et Honorium qui hanc apostolicam ecclesiam non apostolicæ traditionis doctrina lustravit, sed profana proditi-tione immaculatam subvertere conatus est" [Mansi, Concil. xi. 631-637, 731]. This anathema of Pope Honorius was repeated by his successors for three centuries.

After this œcumenical condemnation of Monothelitism little more is heard of the heresy. The controversy which had risen respecting it was soon supplanted by that of the Iconoclasts, and the only Monothelites known in recent times are the small community of the MARONITES, who inhabit the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. [Combes. Hist. hæc. Monothelit. Paris, 1648. Assemann, Bibl. Orient. Dörner's Person of Christ. II. i. Clark's transl. Neale's Hist. East. Ch. Patriarch. Alex.]

MONTANISTS. A sect of the second century which claimed, in virtue of new revelations, to introduce a dispensation of the Spirit superior to that of Christ and His Apostles; and to perfect accordingly the discipline of the Church in the matters of the power of the keys, the rule of marriage, the rules of food and fasting, and the permission to save life in time of persecution.

This sect is now usually called Montanist [as it was by Theod. Hæc. fab. iii. 2], from its founder Montanus, a native of Ardaba, a village of Mysia adjoining Phrygia [anon. author in Euseb. H. E. v. 16], but of old more commonly Phrygian or Cataphrygian [so Eusebius, v. 14; Epiphanius, xlviii.; Augustine, xxvi.; Philastrius, xlix.] from the country; sometimes (or more properly a branch of them) Pepuzians, from Pepuza, a town in Western Phrygia, in which they located the heavenly Jerusalem [Epiph. xlviii. 14].

The author¹ whom Eusebius quotes dates the rise of Montanus in the proconsulship of Gratus in Asia, but the year of this proconsulship has not been ascertained; Eusebius [Chronicle] in the twelfth year of Marcus Antoninus, i.e. A.D. 171, which agrees with Eusebius' narrative [v. 3] of the letters of the churches of Vienne and Lyons. Epiphanius gives the date A.D. 156, and Pearson and Beausobre follow him. Eusebius, however, is more correct in his chronology than Epiphanius, and the later date is much more consistent than the earlier with the appearance of Montanism in Rome.

Gieseler and Milman remark that the national character of the Phrygians impressed itself on their Christianity, and led to a sensuous enthusiastic worship of the Deity and to a wild mysticism. But this cannot have been the cause of the Montanist movement; it can only have given a peculiar character to the movement, and influenced its details. For Montanism is but one of a number of similar movements in the Church. At intervals, throughout the annals of Christianity, the Holy Ghost has been summoned by the hopes, felt as present by the kindled imaginations, been proclaimed by the passionate enthusiasm of a few, as accomplishing in them the imperfect revelation; as the third revelation which is to supersede and to fulfil the Law and the Gospel. This notion appears again in the Middle Ages as the doctrine of the Abbot Joachim, of John Peter de Oliva, and the Fratricelli; in a milder form it is that of George Fox and of Barclay [Milman, Latin Christ. i. 1]. In the Irvingites of our day the same notion is but slenderly disguised. For if God restores Apostles to His Church, it is quite open to the Irvingites to argue that as the Church developed itself from St. James of Jerusalem to St. Paul of Antioch, so it may develop itself beyond the Gospel of St. Paul under later Apostles. In all these cases there is a striving, but a misguided striving, after a higher standard. This striving is at first, it may be, an endeavour to raise the Church above that which is its normal condition since Apostolic days to the extraordinary condition of those days, not only in piety and charity, which is the endeavour of every good man, and tends to a true revival of religion, but in apostolic and prophetic mission, in the extraordinary χαρίσματα of the Holy Spirit. As human infirmities and passions enter more and more into such a misguided endeavour, as knowledge puffeth up, as pride and the love of pre-eminence are engendered, as fanaticism begins and grows, new revelations are asserted, and a claim set up that a new dispensation of the Spirit, in a new Gospel, is begun. Such a movement could hardly fail to take place at a time when the miraculous powers and gifts which marked the introduction of the Gospel were ceasing. An enthusiast would be naturally tempted to connect a low standard of holiness, a decline of faith and love, with the cessation of those gifts; and therefore to seek their renewal. To suppose such an origin of Montanus' career is both more just to all parties concerned and more in accordance with history, than to suppose him from the first an impostor. Montanus and Alcibiades and Theodotus raised up in many an opinion that they prophesied: and this belief was so much the more increased concerning their prophesying, for that as yet in several churches were wrought many and stupendous effects of the Holy Spirit [Euseb. H. E. v. 3]. Origen, about seventy years later, notes that the prophetic power had all but ceased, that only some traces of it were in his time to be seen [cont. Cels. viii. p. 337, Spencer, 1677]. The esteem in which Montanus was at first held by the Bishop of Rome, and Tertullian's joining his party, are thus best explained. Montanus, then, as an enthusiast passing into an ecstasy, announced that the Holy Spirit had imparted Itself to him for the purpose of raising the Church to perfection.¹

That these ecstasies were a mere simulation there is no reason whatever for asserting. In Eusebius they are thus described: "Montanus, in the excessive desire of his soul to take the lead, gave the adversary occasion against himself, so that he was carried away in spirit, and wrought up into a certain kind of frenzy and irregular ecstasy, raving, and speaking, and uttering strange things." In Tertullian they are described thus (in the case of one of the prophetesses): "Nam quia spiritalia charismata agnoscimus, post Joannem quoque prophetiam meruimus consequi. Est hodie soror apud nos revelationum charismata sortita, quas in Ecclesia inter Dominica solennia per ecstasin in spiritu patitur; conversatur cum angelis, aliquando etiam cum Domino, et videt et audit sacramenta, et quorundam corda dignoscit, et medicinas desiderantibus submittit. Jam vero prout scripturæ leguntur, aut psalmi canuntur, aut allocutiones proferuntur, aut petitiones delegantur, ita inde materiæ visionibus subministrantur. Forte nescio quid de anima disserueramus, cum ea soror in spiritu esset. Post transacta solennia dimissa plebe, quo usu solet nobis renunciare quæ viderit," etc. [de Anima, c. ix. p. 311, ed. 1641]. These appear to be genuine ecstasies of fanaticism, which, at a time when Charismata had not altogether ceased, and in men who earnestly coveted those Charismata, would naturally ape the Charisma of prophecy. They were pseudo-prophetical raptures. Chrysostom laid down this difference between true and false prophets. It is the property of a diviner to be ecstatical, to undergo some violence, to be tossed and hurried about like a madman. But it is otherwise with a prophet, whose understanding is awake, whose mind is in a sober and orderly temper, who knows everything that he saith [Hom. 28, 1 Cor.]. This sobriety of mind and evenness of temper does not exclude the strong emotions, varying perhaps according to the subject-matter of the prophecy, which appear so frequently in the Old Testament [Jer. xxiii. 9; Ezek. iii. 14; Dan. x. 8], but the prophet does not lose his self-control. The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets.

The Charisma of prophecy, the true prophetic spirit, seated itself as well in the rational as in the sensitive powers; it did not alienate the mind, but informed and enlightened it. The pseudo-prophetical spirit was seated in the imaginative powers and faculties inferior to reason; upon these the foreign force acted (if foreign force there were, such as the lying spirit of 1 Kings xxii. 21), or from the natural excitement of these the pretended spirit of prophecy was engendered. Thus the true prophetic influx and a mistaken enthusiasm had this in common, that both made strong impressions upon the imaginative powers, and required the imaginative faculty to be vigorous and potent. Considering this common element, considering too that the true gift of the spirit was subject to the control of him who possessed it, and might be used "decently and in order" [1 Cor. xiv. 4], and therefore might also be used indecently and disorderly, it is easy to imagine that there was difficulty in distinguishing between the true and the false, and that a true Charisma wrongly used might be withdrawn, and the enthusiasm of him who had possessed it might continue an imitation of it. The true prophet might pass into the false prophet, and be for some time undetected.

The Fathers gave it as the mark of the false prophets that they spoke in an ecstasy. But among the lies (writes Clement of Alexandria) the false prophets also told some true things. In reality they prophesied in an ecstasy as the servants of the Apostate [Strom. I. xvii.]. This test was applied to the pretensions of Montanus by the historian Miltiades. "The false prophet," he wrote, "is carried away by a vehement ecstasy." . . . "They will never be able to shew that any in the Old or New Testaments were thus violently agitated and carried away in spirit" [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 17]. So too by Jerome: "Non loquitur propheta ēv ἐκστάσει, ut Montanus et Prisca Maximillaque delirant" [Proem. in Nahum]. See also the prefaces to Isaiah and Habakkuk.¹

It is impossible now, and probably was impossible during Montanus' career, to say whether he was knowingly a deceiver; but the marks of enthusiasm passing into fanaticism are much stronger than the marks of imposture. In this case, as in many others, the more charitable judgment which refers Montanus' career to mistaken enthusiasm, is probably more just than that which refers it to disappointed ambition.

That these new revelations announced a new dispensation, or at least were so interpreted, is clear from Tertullian's distinguishing the times of the Paraclete from the times of Christ. Tertullian argues that as Christ took away what Moses commanded, the Paraclete may have forbidden the indulgences which Paul allowed. Hardness of heart occasioned certain precepts of Moses, infirmity of the flesh certain indulgences of Paul [de Monogam. p. 686]. The time of the Paraclete is the time of Montanus. In the beginning of the same tract our Lord's words, "When the Spirit is come, He will guide you into all truth," are explained in the same way of the new revelation of discipline [pp. 673-4]; and expressly also in the tract, de Virg. Vel. [p. 192]: "Quæ est ergo Paracleti administratio nisi hæc, quod disciplina dirigitur, quod scripturæ revelantur, quod intellectus reformatur, quod ad meliora proficitur?" "Justitia primo fuit in rudimentis, natura Deum metuens: dehinc per Legem et Prophetas promovit in infantiam: dehinc per Evangelium efferbuit in juventutem: nunc per Paracletum componitur in maturitatem" [p. 193].

Consequently, Christians before Montanus were only Psychici. "Et nos quidem postea agnitio Paracleti atque defensio disjuncta a Psychicis" [adv. Prax. p. 634]. The followers of Montanus were Spirituales, πνευματικοί.

Excepting this infringement of the doctrine of the Holy Catholic Church, Montanus and his followers were orthodox. Jerome [Epist. liv. ad

Marcellam], Socrates [i. 23], Sozomenus [ii. 18], attribute Sabellianism to them. Such statements are true of the sect in a second stage (as will be hereafter noticed), but that they are not true of Montanus himself and his immediate followers we may believe from Tertullian's works, especially his Treatise against Praxeas, and from the testimony of Epiphanius [xlvi. 1], and Theodoret [Her. fab. iii. 2. See Bull, Defen. Fid. Nic. II. i. 15, and vii. 7].

The prophesying of Montanus, Prisca, and Maximilla, accepted by their followers as revelations, related to the discipline of the Church.

I. St. John's words, "a sin not unto death," and a "sin unto death," were held to divide sins, as regards the outward act, into two classes, for the former of which alone the sacrament of penance was appointed, and in which alone the absolution of the Church might be given. The latter (it was not denied) were remissible by Almighty God, but no ministration of forgiveness was appointed for them. "Causas poenitentiae delicta eondicimus. Hæc dividimus in duos exitus. Alia erunt remissibilia, alia irremissibilia. Secundum quod nemini dubium est alia castigationem mereri, alia damnationem." And again, after naming St. Paul's obtaining mercy for what he had done ignorantly in unbelief, Tertullian continues: "Quod si clementia Dei ignorantibus adhuc et infidelibus competit, utique et poenitentia ad se clementiam invitat, salva illa poenitentiae specie post fidem, quæ aut levioribus delictis veniam ab Episcopo consequi poterit, aut majoribus et irremissibilibus a Deo solo" [Tert. de Pudicit. pp. 717, 738]. These "capitalia delicta" are called also, in a like sense, "inconcensibilia," "immundabilia" [pp. 726, 742]. In the Montanist system, then, such sinners ceased, ipso facto, to be members of the Church.

II. Second marriages were altogether condemned by Montanus. They were held to be no other than fornication, and to have been permitted by St. Paul in consequence of his knowledge and prophecy having been only in part [Auctor. Prædestinati, Hæc. xxvi.; Tert. de Monogamia, pp. 669, 675, 681; de Exhort. Castit. pp. 664, 670].

Apollonius, quoted by Eusebius [H. E. v. 18], adds that Montanus taught λύσεις γάμων, dissolution of marriage, and that Prisca and Maximilla, as soon as they received the Spirit, abandoned their husbands. Wernsdorf [see Routh's note, Rel. Sac. i. 473] observed that this teaching was not by precept, but by the examples of the two prophetesses. It is contrary to Tertullian's principles, who defended the one marriage as honourable and holy [Tertull. adv. Marc. i. 29, p. 452]. It is doubtful whether Apollonius' evidence regarding the two prophetesses can be implicitly relied upon.

III. Montanus appointed two Lents in the year besides that observed by the Church, and two weeks of Xerophagy [Hieron. Epist. liv. ad Marcellam; Comm. ad Cap. i. Aggæi; Tert. de Jejuniis]. Kaye sums up the differences between the orthodox and Montanists on the subject of fasting thus: "With respect to the Jejunium or total abstinence from food, the orthodox thought that the interval between our Saviour's Death and Resurrection was the only period during which the Apostles observed a total fast; and consequently the only period during which fasting was of positive obligation upon all Christians. At other times it rested with themselves to determine whether they would fast or not. The Montanists, on the contrary, contended that there were other seasons during which fasting was obligatory, and that the appointment of those seasons constituted a part of the revelations of the Paraclete. With respect to the Dies Stationarii, the Montanists not only pronounced the fast obligatory on all Christians, but prolonged it until the evening, instead of terminating it, as was the orthodox custom, at the ninth hour. In the observance of Xerophagiæ, the Montanists abstained not only from flesh and wine like the orthodox, but also from richer fruits, and omitted their customary ablutions" [Kaye, on Tertull. p. 416]. Apollonius [in Euseb. H. E. v. 18], in this particular, simply notices of Montanus, "This is he who laid down laws of fasting," pointing out in these words that Montanus' offence was not the change of one law for another, but the imposition of a law where there had been liberty.

IV. Men are not to flee in persecution. For if persecution proceeds from God, it is no way their duty to flee from what has God for its author: it ought not to be avoided, and it cannot be evaded [Tert. de Fuga, sec. iv. pp. 691, 692]. Our Lord's command [Matt. x. 23] was a special command to the Apostles, that they might fulfil their mission. Our Lord's own conduct was ruled by the same principle. And if we may not flee, neither may we buy off persecution, "Sicut fuga redemptio gratuita est; ita redemptio nummaria fuga est" [pp. 693-697]. The anonymous author in Eusebius asserts, however [H. E. v. 16], that there had been no Montanist martyrs.

In these rules of discipline there is little that had not been already advocated, or at least prepared for, in one or another part of the Church. St. Cyprian mentions that some of his predecessors had denied penance and reconciliation to adulterers [Epist. ad Antonian. p. 110, Fell]; and his letter being written A.D. 252, this may reach back to the time of Montanus. The refusal however was, as Augustine remarked in a like case, "non desperatione indulgentiæ, sed rigore disciplinæ" [Epist. ad Bonifac. See Marshall's Pen. Disc. p. 86]. An undue estimate of celibacy and marriage was far from uncommon. Athenagoras had declared that a second marriage was but a cloaked adultery [Legat. cap. xxxiii.]. Ascetic practices were considered neither unusual nor blameable; and the Church had its laws of fasting, of which the rules of Montanus were an extension.

In what respect then was Montanus a heretic? His heresy lay not in the rules themselves, but in the foundation on which they were made to rest. The rules themselves, although in some respects an unwarrantable narrowing of Christian liberty, and in other respects an unwarrantable denial of divinely-appointed means of reconciliation, were yet such as need not interrupt communion between a church which adopted them and a church which refused them, if adopted only as disciplinary. Nor was there anything heretical in the simple doctrine that Charismata had not ceased in the Church. But that these Charismata introduced a new dispensation superior to that of Christ and His Apostles is a doctrine in a high degree heretical. That Christ who came to fulfil the Law and the Prophets, and promised His Holy Spirit to His Apostles to guide them into all truth, bequeathed to His Church only an insufficient morality, and a dispensation which needed to be supplemented by the Paraclete of Montanus, is utterly inconsistent with a true reception of the doctrines of the Catholic Church, and of the Holy Ghost who spake by the Prophets. The distinction in Montanus' system between the Paraclete and the Holy Ghost is not a distinction (or difference rather), of Person or Nature, but the distinction of a plenary bestowal for a complete revelation following a partial bestowal for an imperfect and temporary revelation. It may be compared, and is virtually compared by Tertullian in the passages cited above from the treatises de Monog. and de Virg. Vel., to the distinction drawn by St. John when he says, "The Holy Ghost was not yet given." It was the same Spirit in the Mosaic and the Christian dispensations, yet might be called another on account of the different and larger grace of the Christian dispensation. So the Paraclete is in Person and Being identified with the Holy Ghost, but the larger measure of the Spirit given for the completion of Christianity introduces a distinction by which the Holy Ghost bestowed on the Apostles is inferior to the Paraclete. The Paraclete is undeniably identified with the promised Spirit of Truth, i.e. the promise of our Lord, which the Church believes to have been fulfilled on the first Pentecost-day, was not fulfilled until the Spirit came on Montanus.¹ Mosheim [cent. ii. p. ii. cap. v. sect. 23, note], we must take the liberty of saying, entirely mistakes the nature of the distinction, if his words imply, as we understand them to imply, a teacher other than the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity. This heresy gave a character to the new disciplinary rules. It introduced also schism in its most aggravated form, asserting that the party of Montanus alone was the true Church, the Pneumatici, all other nominal Christians being Psychici.²

It is consistent with this that Montanus,

² "Nos—quos Spiritales merito dici facit agnitio spiritualium Charismatum" [de Monog. p. 673].

Prisca, and Maximilla had no successors. If they had pretended to ordinary Charismata, they might have had successors—as the plenary prophets of a complete revelation there was no room for successors.

Such was Montanism in its first stage. The Catholic writers who opposed the heresy in its early form did not deny the possible or actual continuance of Charismata in the Church, but the genuineness of the Montanist prophesying. And they rested this question on the difference between an ἐκστασις and a true prophetic rapture. There were also many synods held in which the novel doctrines were examined and rejected, and those who held them excommunicated [Euseb. H. E. v. 16]. One of these was held at Hierapolis [A.D. 173] by Apollinarius, with twenty-six bishops. It is named by the author of the Libellus Synodicus, an authority to which Cave says he should not have trusted had it not been for the statement of Eusebius that such councils were held. If the date of this council be correctly given it is almost necessary to adopt an earlier date than A.D. 171 for the commencement of Montanus' prophesying.

The second stage of Montanism is clearly marked by an alteration in the formula of Baptism. Montanus himself had retained the Catholic form. For this we have the evidence of Athanasius, who writes: Φρύγες . . . τὰ ὀνόματα λέγοντες οὐδὲν ἡττόν εἶον αἰρετικοί [cont. Arian. Or. ii. 43]. He is writing of Baptism, and the "names" are the Names of the Persons of the Holy Trinity. Even without this evidence we should have been slow to think that Tertullian could have fallen so low as to baptize in the Name of the Father, of the Son, and of Montanus. That this was done in the second stage of the heresy is stated by Basil [Epist. clxxxviii. Canon. Prima, iii. 268, Paris 1730] and Theophylact [in Luc. xxiv. 45-53], and their statements are corroborated by the decrees of the Councils of Laodicea and Constantinople, that the Montanists be baptized for reception into the Church [Laod. viii.; Constant. vii.]. Athanasius did not deny the validity of the baptism he names, but asserts the heresy of the sect. It appears, then, to be true that the later sect actually held that Montanus was the Paraclete, in which case Jerome's statements are explained and verified [Epist. liv. ad Marcellam]. He says, that the Montanists, following the opinion of Sabellius, bring the Trinity to the narrow restraints of One Person: that, in their system, God at first intended to have the world by Moses and the Prophets, but because He could not effect His design that way, He assumed a body of the Virgin, and preached in Christ, under the species of a Son, and suffered death for our sakes. And because by these two degrees He could not save the world, at last He descended by the Holy Ghost into Montanus, Prisca, and Maximilla. The assertion that Montanus was the Paraclete can only have been made on the notion that the Paraclete was a manifestation of Deity, embodied in Montanus, or which is tantamount to it, one of the Simonian Roots taken from the Deity. [SIMONIAN.] Æschines is named in the Appendix to the de Præscriptione Hæreticorum as at the head of this later heresy.

It is needless to attempt to follow the sect into its obscure subdivisions. Besides their usual names, Montanists and Cataphryges, other appellations were applied to them, some of which may have referred to particular sections, while others were mere names of derision [Gieseler]. The Montanists had their peculiar ecclesiastical constitution. Jerome writes: "Habent primos de Pepusa Phrygia Patriarchas; secundum quos appellant Cenonas: atque ita in tertium, i. e. pæne ultimum locum Episcopi devolvuntur" [Ep. liv. ad Marcellam]. No explanation is given of the word "Cenonas." It may be that the office is specially referred to in the words εἰ καὶ μέγιστοι λέγοντο of the Laodicean canon. This constitution continued down to the sixth century. The last laws against them proceeded from Justinian [A.D. 530 and 532: see Cod. lib. i. tit. 5, l. 18-21. Gieseler]. At this time, if Procopius' Historia Arcana may be trusted, some Montanists in Phrygia, driven to desperation, shut themselves up in their conventicles, set fire to them, and perished in the flames [Hist. Arc. ii. pp. 34, 35].

It has been noticed incidentally that the early movement of Montanism was not regarded unfavourably at Rome. The letters of the Lyonese martyrs to the Asiatic Churches, and to Eleutherus, Bishop of Rome, appear to have been at least apologetic, if not recommendatory of Montanism [Euseb. H. E. v. 3]. Elaborate statements of the resemblance of Montanism to orthodoxy, and of the probable holiness of Montanus, may be seen in Baronius, and in Rigaltius' Preface to Tertullian. It appears further, from Tertullian, that the Bishop of Rome, probably Victor, was on the point of formally recognising the new prophets, when Praxeas, a confessor, came from Asia to Rome, and by his reports of the character of the pretended revelations, induced the bishop to change his opinion, and to renounce communion with the Montanists [adv. Praxeam, p. 634].

Praxeas proving himself a heretic [PRAXEANS], Tertullian had the controversial advantage, which he was not slow to seize, of representing the heresy and the opposition to Montanism in the same light. "Ita duo negotia diaboli Praxeas Romæ procuravit, prophetiam expulit, et hæresim intulit; Paracletum fugavit et Patrem crucifixit." Victor however took decided measures against Montanism, the most important particular of which is given by Tertullian: "Audio etiam edictum esse propositum et quidem peremptorium: Pontifex scilicet Maximus, Episcopus Episcoporum, edicit: ego et moechiæ et fornicationis delicta poenitentia functis dimitto" [de Pudicit. cap. i.]. Separate Montanist churches were formed in the West. Augustine relates that in his time the remnant of the Tertullianists in Carthage returned to the Catholic Church [Hæc. lxxxvi.]. The author of Prædestinatus infers that the Tertullianists had formed a peculiar sect separated from the other Montanists. Gieseler denies the correctness of this inference [Compend. i. p. 214, note 6]. But, considering what later Montanism was, disciples of Tertullian cannot but have separated themselves from the main body: and that the main body fell into the deeper heresy which has been named, the testimonies given above prove conclusively.

It is evident that Montanism was in no inconsiderable part a carrying out of orthodox principles, that on this account it was at first well received in Rome, that as such it has left its mark on the Church at large. Dr. Newman observes "that while it is chiefly in Tertullian's Montanistic works that strong statements occur of the unalterableness of the Creed, yet, on the other hand, the very foundation of Montanism is developement, not of doctrine, but of discipline and conduct. In its whole system Montanism is a remarkable anticipation or presage of developments which soon began to shew themselves in the Church, though they were not perfected for centuries after. The prophets of the Montanists prefigure the Church's doctors, and their inspiration her infallibility, their revelations her developements" [Newman's Essay on Developement, pp. 349-352]. Since these words were written a new significance has been given to them by the proceedings of the Vatican Council, which has associated with the individual person of the Pope an infallibility that has hitherto been associated only with the collective Episcopate of Christendom. The principle of Montanism has thus been revived in a remarkable manner; and grave apprehensions may be felt whether its revival may not ultimately be developed to a still further extent in the direction of that fundamental error respecting the Holy Spirit which characterized the heresy of Montanus.

MONTENSES. This name seems to have been a local name of the Donatists: St. Augustine saying distinctly that in his time those heretics were called "Montenses" at Rome. [Aug. Hær. lxi.]. Epiphanius and Theodoret both associate the name, on the other hand, with the Novatians [Epiph. Hær. lix.; Theodor. Hær. fab. iii. 5]. In the early list of heresies which goes by the name of St. Jerome it is said that the Montenses were found chiefly at Rome, and that they were so named because they had concealed themselves in the hill-country during a time of persecution. This author speaks of them as distinct from the Donatists and the Novatians, but as adopting the heresy of the one as to the rejection of penitents and of the other as to re-baptism [Pseudo-Hieron. Indicul. de Hæres. xxxiv.]. In one of the canons of the African code which directs the mode of receiving a person into the Church when coming "de Donatistis vel de Montensibus," the two names seem to be used as synonymous. [DONATISTS.]

MORAVIANS. The sect originally known by the name of "Moravian Brethren" was part of that more moderate section of the TABORITES, which began to shew itself in Prague about the year 1450, under the protection of John Rokyczana, the Calixtine Archbishop of Prague; and which, assuming the general name of "Brethren," or "Brethren of the Law of Christ," was distinguished in Bohemia and Moravia respectively by the prefix "Bohemian" or "Moravian." On the subjugation of the Taborites in 1453, a large number of them came round to this moderate party, and it spread widely through Moravia, many doubtless flying there to escape from the persecution of George Podiebrad, who came to the throne of Bohemia in 1461, and who, with Rokyczana, was then endeavouring to bring about a reconciliation between Rome and the Calixtines. During this persecution the "Brethren" hid themselves in caves and underground dwellings, and were thus contemptuously called "Jamnicii," or "Burrowers" ["Grubenheimer"].

The Bohemian and the Moravian part of the sect appear to have had a common organization, and to have co-operated together, whether in time of peace or of persecution, under the name of "Unitas Fratrum." They continued to increase notwithstanding the latter; and in the year 1467 they constituted themselves into a formal sect by electing "elders" in an assembly held at Lhota. This election was made by lot, the assembly first selecting twenty names from which to choose, reducing these to nine, and then writing on three slips of paper the word "Est," and mixing them with nine other slips which were left blank. The three lots fell to Matthias of Kunewald, Thomas of Prschelanz, and Elias of Krschenow. The persons thus chosen were not ordained by bishops, nor is anything said of any ceremony of ordination whatever, a point of importance to remember in connection with the claims to an episcopal ministry which are asserted by modern Moravians. Shortly afterwards, at another synod, a discussion arose as to whether the persons so chosen by lot were really presbyters, or whether the office of a bishop was not necessary for that purpose. It was decided that a bishop's intervention was not necessary but was expedient, and therefore "to put it out of the adversaries' power to dispute the validity of their office they would seek to obtain an episcopal ordination." Three of the "elders" were therefore sent to Stephen, a "Bishop" of the Waldenses, who had been banished from France, and was now settled in Austria; and by him and his chorepiscopus, they were not only ordained as priests, but consecrated as bishops; Michael of Szamberg being one of the number. Shortly afterwards Stephen was burnt as a heretic at Vienna. [Camerarius, Historica narratio de Fratr. Orthod. eccl. in Bohemia, Moravia, et Polonia. Comenius, de Eccl. Fratr. in Bohem. et Morav. 116.] This consecration by a Waldensian bishop is alleged as conveying to the Moravian Brethren an apostolical succession. But it must be remembered that the Waldenses did not originally, or perhaps ever, make any claim to such a succession in its ordinary sense, having no ground whatever for doing so. They alleged that as the Apostles were all bishops though not ordained by men, so their founder Waldo, having a divine mission as an apostle, had the same authority as the Apostles of our Lord had received twelve centuries before, that of consecrating successors in the newly established ministry [Gieseler's Eccles. Hist. iii. 466, n. 29, Clark's tr.]. The claims of the Waldenses to an episcopal ministry were, in fact, based on a similar foundation to that of the Irvingites in a later age; and when Stephen landed on a ministerial succession to the Moravians he handed on that which had been derived from the layman Waldo, just as the Irvingites hand on that which they have derived from a layman of their own body. [IRVINGITES.] Whether those laymen were entitled to be accounted apostles is a separate question.

In the year 1481 the Brethren were made the subject of fresh persecution, and were banished from Moravia, whence they emigrated through Hungary and Transylvania to Moldavia. After six years a large proportion of them returned to Moravia, but some descendants of the original emigrants are still believed to exist among the mountaineers of the Caucasus. The doctrines of the Brethren at this time are stated in three apologies which were sent by them to King Ladislaus, between the years 1504 and 1508. [Brown's Fascic. i. 162, 172, 184.] They repudiated the Roman doctrine of Purgatory, believing the true Purgatory to be in this world. They also rejected the worship of Saints, and the dogma of Transubstantiation. But they did not hold the doctrine of Protestants respecting the Eucharist, believing the consecrated elements to be really the Body and Blood of Christ. "Corpus Christi, verum, naturale, ex castissima virgine sumptum, similiter vinum sanguis est naturalis corporis ejus."

In the beginning of the sixteenth century the Brethren numbered two hundred congregations in Bohemia and Moravia. They were about that time joined by many of the Calixtines, and some of the Calixtine nobles built them places of worship in the towns and villages over which they had authority. But after many vicissitudes they were driven from both Bohemia and Moravia in the year 1627. Their estates, their churches, and their schools were confiscated, and if any of the Brethren remained in either country they were only those whose poverty and insignificance concealed them from the notice of the authorities. Their last minister who professed to exercise the office of bishop was the learned John Amos Comenius [A.D. 1592-1671]. Towards the close of his life Comenius did indeed give authority in writing to Daniel Vetter, "his co-senior," to consecrate Nicolas Gertichius as Bishop for the Brethren dispersed through Poland (where most of them resided), and Paul Jablonsky for those elsewhere, but he himself took no further part in the act than this, and Jablonsky dying before himself he made no attempt to secure a successor [Crantz' Hist. of the Brethren, La Trobe's transl. p. 76]. After the death of Comenius the Brethren subsided into an ordinary Presbyterian organization, holding Lutheran tenets; and the only relic of episcopacy which they retained was the occasional use of the name bishop for their "senior," which was the official title of their presiding elder.¹

MODERN MORAVIANS, HERRNHUTTERS, or ZINZENDORFIANS. This sect is a revival in name only of the ancient Brethren whose history has been sketched above, and there is no real historical association between the two. The Modern Moravians were originally a Lutheran community on the plan of Spener's "houses of piety," established on his estate of Bertholdsdorf in the year 1722, by the young Count Zinzendorf, who was a godson of Spener, and whose father was one of Spener's intimate friends and admirers. This community was originally called "Bethel" by Zinzendorf; and afterwards received the name of Herrnhut, the "watch of the Lord." The members of it eventually assumed the name of "Moravian Brethren" when they separated from the Lutheran establishment in 1727, that name being suggested by the presence of several Moravian families among them, especially that of their leading man, Christian David.²

Zinzendorf [A.D. 1700-60] became acquainted with David (a shrewd working carpenter of Görlitz, who had left Moravia some time before), while he was an enthusiastic young man of twenty-one, who had just resolved "faithfully to take charge of poor souls for whom Christ had shed His blood, and especially to collect together and protect those that were oppressed and persecuted" [Spangenberg's Life of Zinzendorf, Jackson's transl. 36]. Christian David availed himself of this resolution of the young nobleman by fetching from Zauchtenthal in Moravia two of his friends who were cutlers, and unable to earn a living, that they, with their wives and six children, might be the nucleus of such a settlement as his keen eye saw the possibility of founding on Zinzendorf's recently acquired estate at Bertholdsdorf in Upper Lusatia, where the Count was then building a house. These two men, Augustine and Jacob Neisser, under the guidance of David, built timber-houses for themselves at Hutberg ("the Watch hill") near to the Count's residence, in 1722, and marked out the lines of a considerable village. David then went again to Moravia and persuaded five more of his friends, three brothers named

Nitschmann, and two others, to return with him to his new settlement, which they did in 1724. From that time the village rapidly increased under the management of David, and in ten years from its first foundation his expectations were so far realized that it contained as many as six hundred inhabitants. During most of this time Zinzendorf, who had married and held office at court, resided principally at Dresden, having at the outset presented to the parish of Bertholdsdorf, of which the new settlement of Hutberg formed a part, a zealous young Pietist named John Andrew Rothe, with whom, for some years, his own sentiments and those of his dependants were in agreement.

Up to the year 1727 the settlement at Hutberg was thus, as to its religion, simply a community of Lutheran Pietists, and nothing was heard of any religious association between it and the ancient "Unitas Fratrum." About that time, however, some of the community began to forsake their parish church, and to have separate services in the great hall of the community; and about the same time a distinctive religious name began to be given to the settlement by changing that of Hutberg for Herrnhut ("The Watch of the Lord"). Disputes arose among them as to the doctrines of Election and the Lord's Supper, some being Schwenkfeldians, though the majority were Lutherans, and it seems likely that the revival of the name "Unitas Fratrum" for their new sect was originally suggested to the Moravian members of the community by the reconciliation of the two parties. The revival of the old sect may also have been suggested by the need of some organized ministry, for they adopted precisely the same plan for forming it, that of choosing "elders" by lot, which had been adopted in 1467 by the Brethren themselves. Four were thus chosen out of twelve, Christian David and Melchior Nitschmann being two of the four [Spangenberg's Life of Zinzendorf, 84].

The ecclesiastical relation in which Zinzendorf stood to the community at Herrnhut had hitherto been that of catechist, in which office he acted as deputy to Rothe, the pastor of the parish. But on coming to reside more permanently on his estate, he styled himself "guardian," "warden," or "trustee" of the community. In 1734, however, he was himself ordained as a Lutheran pastor at Tübingen. As the community separated more and more from the Lutheran establishment, the question was agitated whether the episcopal system of the old Brethren should not be established among their professed representatives. Zinzendorf had hitherto discouraged the attempts in this direction, but he now assented to the plan; and David Nitschmann, being chosen by lot for the office, he was despatched to Berlin to be "consecrated" by Daniel Ernest Jablonsky, chaplain to the King of Prussia, who was "senior" to the dispersed Brethren. This act of Jablonsky was at the time assented to by letter by Christian Sitkovius, the senior of the Polish Brethren.

In 1736 Zinzendorf was banished from Herrnhut and from Saxony, his proceedings having been so mixed up with political intrigues that they were considered to be dangerous to the State. From that time until his death, a quarter of a century afterwards, he spent much of his time in travelling about Europe, establishing many settlements similar to the original one, and organizing the missionary work of his sect. Among other countries he visited England in 1737, and became acquainted with Charles Wesley, but the influence which the Moravian system had upon that of the Methodists was exercised through the subsequent intimacy of John Wesley with Peter Böhler on his voyage to Georgia, and of a visit which he paid to Herrnhut. [DICT. OF THEOL., METHODISM.] Having made a short stay in England, Zinzendorf went to Berlin, where, on May 20th, 1737, he was ordained bishop by Jablonsky and Nitschmann in the private house of the former, with the consent of the King. To this act of Jablonsky also Sitkovius gave his consent by letter, but he afterwards considered that he had been imposed upon, and disclaimed all intention of assenting to either ordination in any other sense than as making Nitschmann and Zinzendorf "seniors" or presiding presbyters.¹ [Rimius' Suppl. to Candi's Account, xxxii.] Shortly afterwards the Count-Bishop was permitted to return to Herrnhut, but he was again banished from Saxony in the following year, and took up his residence at Berlin, where he opened his house for religious services, the clergy declining to admit him to their pulpits. In subsequent years he visited the West Indies, and nearly every European country, forming Moravian settlements and missions, or inspecting those already in existence.

Such a settlement was projected and partly carried out by Zinzendorf in England in 1749. He purchased of the Duke of Ancaster a mansion on the banks of the Thames at Chelsea, named Lindsey Place, a former residence of Lord Lindsey; securing with it, on a ninety-nine years' lease, most of the site and the outbuildings of Beaufort House, the old residence of the Dukes of Beaufort, the Duke of Buckingham, and Sir Thomas More, which had been demolished in 1740 by Sir Hans Sloane, the destroyer of the ancient Court suburb. The stables of Beaufort House were turned into a Moravian chapel, with a burial-ground adjoining, and Lindsey Place was repaired and enlarged for the purpose of making it a residence for three hundred families, receiving the new name of "Sharon."² This great scheme was never accomplished, but for twenty years Lindsey House became the headquarters of the Moravian body, and some of its managing heads lived in the splendid mansion. It was then used as an orphanage until it was sold in 1770, ten years after Zinzendorf's death. Besides the chapel adjoining this mansion, there were others in Fetter Lane and White's Alley, and several in country towns.

While Zinzendorf was in England he procured an Act of Parliament to be passed [22 Geo. II. c. 30] exempting the Moravians from military service. He also attracted much attention to them by an unscrupulous misrepresentation of their claims to apostolical succession and a genuine episcopacy, printing a thin folio volume of documents, which were put together with more cleverness than candour, and published in 1749 under the title of "Acta Fratrum Unitatis in Anglia." Archbishop Wake, in his zealous endeavours after unity with foreign churches, was rash enough to write strongly in favour of the claims made by Zinzendorf, and Bishop Wilson accepted the appointment of "Administrator of the Reformed Tropic in the Unity of the Brethren." A tradition thus grew up respecting the Catholic position of the Moravians which, as is shewn above, is altogether groundless.

Since the death of Zinzendorf in 1760 the sect which he founded has maintained a quiet and unassuming position among Christian communities apart from the Church, which has won great respect for its members. Some of the quaintness and simplicity of German country life have clung to them everywhere, and while they are characterized by an earnest mission spirit as regards the heathen, they are entirely unaggressive as regards other sects. Their theological position is identical with that of the Evangelical Lutherans, and their sympathies have always been strong towards the Low Church School in the Church of England. The whole number of them in Europe, including children, is said to be only about 12,000, but they reckon as many as 70,000 in their missions, which are chiefly among the Negroes, the Hottentots, and the extreme northern people of Europe and America. The parent settlement at Herrnhut still exists; with many others in Germany, and the next in importance to these are Fulneck near Leeds, Fairfield near Manchester, Ockbrook near Derby, with Bethlehem, Nazareth, and Lititz in Pennsylvania, and Salem in North Carolina.

MORELTSCHIKI. A name signifying "self-immolators," and given to a fanatical sect of Russian Dissenters, whose wild and savage practices are more like those of the ancient Scandinavians than of professing Christians of the nineteenth century. Their custom is to meet together on a certain day in the year in some retired place, and having dug a deep pit, to fill it with wood, straw, and other combustibles, while they are singing weird hymns relating to the ceremony. Fire is then applied to the piled-up fuel, and numbers leap into the midst of it, stimulated by the triumphant hymns of those around, to purchase a supposed martyrdom by their suicidal act. These fanatics are found chiefly in Siberia, and the Russian government has endeavoured to discover and suppress them by means of very severe measures, but has not yet succeeded in doing so.

MORISONIANS. An offshoot from the United Secession body in Scotland, which originated in 1841 in the defection of a small minority from the high Calvinism maintained by the parent sect. In that year James Morison, a young minister at Kilmarnock, but afterwards of Glasgow, was deposed for maintaining the universality of the Atonement. In opposition to the view that Christ died in purpose and effect only for those who are by an irreversible decree the elect, although the benefits of His death are also freely offered to those who reject them, he taught that Christ died equally for all men, and that by His death He has removed all obstacles to forgiveness; that every one who will simply believe that Christ died for him is at once saved; that holiness, grace, and a spirit of devotion are at once comprehended in this belief; that repentance is not sorrow for sin, but simply the change of mind from disbelief in salvation to belief; that those who ultimately will be condemned, will be condemned only for disbelieving the truth of Christ's dying for them, and consequently failing to secure forgiveness through Him; that all men are able of themselves to believe, and that Adam's fall has not so corrupted mankind as to render them liable to eternal punishment on account of his sin. From the extreme of Calvinism the rebound was thus made to Pelagianism, while the exaltation of the simple act of faith as all-sufficient has a strong tendency to develop Antinomianism in practice. Morison was joined in the course of a few years by several other ministers, chiefly from amongst the Independents, and a body was constituted which styles itself "The Evangelical Union and affiliated Churches," although often called by others after the name of its originator. The sect is of the Congregational kind, each separate congregation maintaining individual freedom; and consequently, although generally agreeing in maintaining Morisonian views, there is not in it any necessary unanimity in opinion. At the census of 1851 the sect was returned as possessing 27 places of worship in Scotland, with a total attendance of 10,192 persons at morning, afternoon, and evening service. There are now eighty congregations, of which four are in England and two in Ireland.

MORMONS. The usual title of the adherents of a religion founded, A.D. 1830, in the United States of America, by Joseph Smith. They derive the above name from one of their sacred books; but they call themselves "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints," or briefly, "Latter-Day Saints." They number about 250,000 persons; 80,000 of whom live in the territory of Utah, in the United States, between the Rocky Mountains and California; the rest are scattered over the world.

I. History. The founder, Joseph Smith, was born, of poor and somewhat disreputable parents, in Sharon, Windsor County, State of Vermont, December 23rd, 1805. In 1819 the family removed to Manchester, State of New York, where soon afterwards a religious "revival" took place. Joseph took advantage of the excitement to declare that he had seen a vision. Two heavenly personages appeared to him, who, declaring themselves to be God the Father and God the Son, bade him join no religious sect then existing, for they were all in error. This story only met with ridicule, and for some years Smith lived an idle, discreditable life. In September 1823, he alleged that another vision had been vouchsafed to him. A glorious personage appeared to him three separate times in one night, and told him that his sins were pardoned, that the time was now come for the Gospel to be fully preached, and that God had a great work for him to do. Directions were then given to him where he should find, buried in the earth, some golden plates, inscribed with the writings of ancient prophets, together with an instrument whereby they could be read and translated. He was also warned, on pain of death, to shew the plates only to those persons who should be pointed out to him, and not to indulge a worldly or covetous spirit in his thoughts of or dealings with the plates. [See also Book of Mormon, Mormon, iv. 2, p. 510.] From this time he professed to receive constant messages from heaven. Smith alleges that he found the plates in the spot indicated; but that he was not yet allowed, owing to his want of holiness, to possess them: they were, however, after three yearly visits to the place, committed to his charge in September 1827. These plates are asserted to have been of fine gold, about 8 inches long by 7 broad, a little thinner than ordinary tin, bound together in a volume, and fastened at one edge by three rings running through the whole. The volume was about six inches thick, but part was sealed up, so that it could not be opened or read. The plates were beautifully engraved with small characters in an unknown tongue, called in the work itself the Reformed Egyptian [Book of Mormon, Mormon, iv. 8, p. 515]. With them were found "two smooth three-cornered diamonds set in glass, and the glasses set in silver bows, which were connected with each other in much the same way as old-fashioned spectacles" [Biogr. Sketches, 101]. This was the Urim and Thummim, the possession and use of which constituted seers in ancient times, and God had prepared it for the purpose of translating the plates. [See Book of Mormon, Ether, i. 7-11, pp. 520-522.] Besides these, there was a curious breastplate of metal, apparently copper, and a sword, formerly used by Laban, one of the personages in the Book of Mormon [Nephi, i. 20, p. 5, sq.]. No one else professes to have seen the plates till, two years after [A.D. 1829], in accordance with a revelation, they were shewn to three persons, and subsequently, when or how is unknown, to eight others. The testimony of these eleven persons is prefixed to the printed copies of the book. Two of the first three witnesses afterwards apostatized; of the eight five were relations of one of the former three; the others were the father and two brothers of Smith himself. The "Urim and Thummim" was shewn to a few people, the breastplate only to Smith's mother, the sword to no one. They were all, according to Smith's statement, afterwards returned to the angel, and never seen more. In the beginning of 1827, Smith told his story to one Martin Harris, a farmer of Palmyra, State of New York, a person of much credulity and some property. This man at once agreed to aid in supporting Smith while he translated the plates; and the great work was begun. Smith sitting behind a blanket, hung up as a curtain lest the plates should be seen by unholy eyes, dictated the translation to Harris. When a small portion was finished, Harris was sent to lay it, together with a copy of the characters on one of the plates, before Prof. Charles Anthon, of New York. The Mormons assert that the Professor declared the characters to be Egyptian, Chaldaic, Assyrian and Arabic, and asked to see the original [P. of G. P. 45]. Prof. Anthon himself states that he saw at once that the engraving was a deceit, and warned Harris against being the victim of roguery [Letter, in Mackay, 32-34]. A facsimile, alleged to be identical with that shewn to Prof. Anthon, is published in the Millennial Star [xv. 540, also in Rémy, i. 244]. This has no resemblance to any existing characters, and is like nothing but the scratches made by children for amusement when they begin to learn writing. Harris however returned to Smith, and continued his labours as secretary. When about 116 pages were finished, Harris was permitted to take the MS. home to read to his wife, but with her connivance it was stolen. On this Joseph produced a revelation ordering him not to translate again the portion lost, lest the wicked, finding the two translations to differ, should scoff at God's work [D. and C. xxxvi. p. 178, sq.]. Harris was soon after replaced in his task by Oliver Cowdery, a village schoolmaster, who professed to believe in Smith. A vision was soon granted to these two. A heavenly messenger, declaring himself to be John the Baptist, appeared to them as they prayed in a wood, and, laying his hands on them, consecrated them, in the name of Jesus Christ, "Priests of the order of Aaron," and commanded them to baptize each other by immersion. As soon as they were baptized "the Holy Ghost fell on them, and the spirit of prophecy was granted them" [accounts by Smith and Cowdery, P. of G. P. 46, 47]. The new gospel was made known to several persons; some believed, and aided Smith with hospitality and money; others, knowing his character, scoffed at it, and annoyed him in various ways. When the translation was finished [A.D. 1829], Harris undertook to bear half the cost of printing it, having, in obedience to a revelation [D. and C. xlv. 3, pp. 194, 195], sold his farm for that purpose. Meanwhile the "Church of Christ," as it was at first called, was being organized through numerous and minute revelations, and on Tuesday, April 6th, 1830, it was formally started at La Fayette, State of New York. Six members were present, who ordained each other, after which they received the Communion, and were "confirmed in the Church of Christ by the Holy Ghost," who granted them the gift of prophecy. Several persons present as spectators were converted and baptized, among them the Prophet's father and mother. About the same time the Book of Mormon was published. This work was really written about 1809, by Solomon Spaulding, who had been a preacher of some obscure sect, and had afterwards failed in business. The discovery of some remains of an extinct race led him to write a romance connecting this race with the Jews on the one hand and the American Indians on the other. The MS. was entrusted for publication in 1812 to a bookseller named Paterson at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania. Before, however, the arrangements were completed, Spaulding died. The MS. remained with Paterson, who, it would seem, allowed a copy of it to be taken by Sydney Rigdon, one of his compositors, a man of some ability and a preacher of the CAMPBELLITES. It is supposed by some that Rigdon was an accomplice of Smith in concocting the story of the plates and the plan of a new religion; but the two appear not to have met till after the Book of Mormon was published. It is therefore probable that Smith obtained Spaulding's MS., or a copy of it, in some other way, and that it was the knowledge of the origin of the pretended Holy Book that drew Rigdon to him. There is no doubt that several persons, including the widow, the brother, and the partner of Spaulding, recognised in the Book of Mormon Spaulding's fiction. The same names, incidents, and peculiarities of style were found in it, with such additions as suited the imposture. The story of the gold plates was probably suggested by the discovery by Smith of some ancient remains, such as are often found in North America. It was at first apparently intended as a hoax, but the credence which it obtained induced Smith to carry it further, and to use Spaulding's MS. to support his story. The publication of the Book of Mormon, and some alleged miracles, attracted several converts; and at the First Conference of the Church [June 1st, 1830] thirty members were present. Missionaries were sent forth through the States, and had no small success, among their converts being Brigham Young, Smith's successor as president, and two brothers named Pratt, both clever men. Rigdon also openly joined Smith, and at once became his confidential counsellor. The affairs of the Church were entirely directed by revelations. Many of these were simply to serve Smith's idleness and greed. For instance, one [dated July 1830] orders the Church to support him [D. and C. ix. 4, p. 112]; another [February 1831] declares: "It is meta that my servant Joseph Smith, jun., should have a house built" [D. and C. lxi. 3, p. 214]; a third bids that he be provided "with food and raiment, and whatsoever things he needeth to accomplish the work wherewith I have commanded him" [D. and C. xiv. 3, p. 131]. The success of the Prophet roused great animosity; his previous conduct and character were cast in his teeth; charges of fraud were brought against him, and when he was acquitted in the district courts, he and his friends were threatened with violence. In the beginning of 1831, therefore, the saints in a body removed to Kirtland, Ohio, where Rigdon had made many converts. Here the Prophet resided for some years, employing himself, with the help of Rigdon and others, in elaborating, by revelation, the doctrines and discipline of the sect. He also pretended to make, with the help of the Urim and Thummim, a new translation of the Bible. In this year the Melchisedek Priesthood was established. Soon after his arrival in Kirtland, Smith, seeing that he could not carry out his plans in the more settled States, set out with several companions westward in search of a fitting settlement. He pitched upon a spot in Jackson County, Missouri, on the banks of the Missouri River, which was declared to be "Zion, the New Jerusalem, where Christ would shortly reign in person." The saints were ordered by revelation to settle there, and buy up the land, and in a short time nearly 1200 persons had removed thither. After a stay of about six weeks the Prophet returned to Kirtland. In addition to his duties as "Prophet, Seer, Revelator, and Translator," he managed a store, a mill, and a bank, and he also occasionally went on missionary tours through the States, where, by preaching and pretending to work miracles, he gained many converts. But persecution, arising partly from jealousy of the Saints' prosperity, partly from disgust at their teaching, soon broke out at Kirtland also. In March 1832, Smith and Rigdon were torn from their beds by a mob, and tarred and feathered. Rigdon was treated so roughly that he was for some days insane; Smith, however, on the next day preached to a great crowd and made three converts [Biogr. Sketches, 192-194]. In the next year [A.D. 1833] the first edition of "The Book of Doctrine and Covenants" was published. Troubles now came on the new colony in Missouri. The Mormons in their enthusiasm declared that all unbelievers would be rooted out from the State, which would soon be theirs. Their newspaper also put forth abolitionist views. The people, enraged by these proceedings, and by charges against the Saints of communism of goods and wives, resolved on their expulsion. After enduring mob violence for some months, and receiving no protection from the authorities, the Mormons were compelled to forsake Zion in the midst of winter. They settled ultimately at Liberty, Clay County. On the news of this outbreak, Smith, with 150 men, set out from Kirtland to aid his followers. Before starting, he established, in order to appease some jealousies, the first presidency of three members, himself being first and Rigdon second, and the High Council of 12, and as the ruling authorities of the Church. The formal title of "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints" was also adopted [May 1834]. The Prophet and his "company for the redemption of Zion" suffered much hardship in their journey; the cholera also broke out among them, which Smith, to the scandal of the Saints, was unable to cure by the laying on of hands. On their arrival, they found themselves too few for their purpose; the Prophet therefore returned, after a fortnight's stay, to Kirtland. The Mormons now remained unmolested for nearly four years [1834—end of 1837], and, through their missionary zeal, their numbers largely increased. The institution of tithes was now [November 1834] set on a regular footing. In 1835, Smith obtained some Egyptian papyrus rolls, of which he published translations, obtained by the Urim and Thummim. The first foreign mission was despatched to England in 1837, the first conference of converts was held at Preston, Lancashire, December 25th of that year. Smith still carried on his trading enterprises, obtaining the capital required from the tithes and contributions of the Saints, while the profits were made over chiefly to his own family, who were not sparing in their demands. Accordingly, in the autumn of 1837, the business failed, and the bank, which had issued notes to a large amount, stopped payment. Smith and Rigdon were at once indicted for swindling, and to avoid the writs fled by night to their friends in Missouri. Here also troubles soon arose, both within and without the Church; and the dissensions reached such a pitch, that Cowdery, Harris, Rigdon, and other Mormons of long standing were [A.D. 1838], expelled from the Church. Rigdon, however, who knew too much to be made an enemy of, was soon pardoned and re-admitted. During their respite from persecution, the Mormons, through their industry, had prospered much. With success, their arrogance also returned. The Prophet is said to have declared that he would yet trample on the necks of his enemies, and that as it was with Mahomet, "The Koran, or the sword," so it should soon be "Joseph Smith and the sword." About this time also a band of men, called Danites, or Destroying Angels, was secretly organized to defend the First Presidency by any means, fair or foul, and there is little doubt that, up to a recent time, many murders and other acts of violence were committed by them on opponents and apostates. Persecution again began; the Mormons retaliated, and regular warfare, with much destruction of property and some bloodshed, ensued. At length the State militia were called out, nominally to preserve the peace, really to crush the Mormons. After much loss and suffering, especially at a place called Hawn's Mill, where several Mormons were massacred, the Saints were driven, in the depth of winter, across the Mississippi into Illinois [A.D. 1838]. The Prophet, his brother Hiram, and other leading Mormons, were seized, and sentenced by court-martial to be shot; but the sentence was not carried out, and after some months' close confinement, they all escaped into Illinois [April

1839]. A third settlement was there formed, and named Nauvoo, explained as Hebrew for "beautiful." Numerous converts assembled, and the Saints soon amounted to 15,000. In 1840 a charter of incorporation was obtained; the militia, consisting of all able-bodied men, with Smith for General, was organized, under the name of "The Nauvoo Legion;" and a mansion was built, where the Prophet and his family were maintained at the public cost. A revelation of great length [D. and C. 103, p. 298, sq.] gave directions for the building of a splendid temple, the first stone of which was laid with great pomp on April 6th, 1841. The Anti-Mormons now tried another mode of attack. During the next three years Smith was several times brought to trial on charges of libel, swindling, treason, and inciting to murder. He was, however, always acquitted; though he had a narrow escape in 1842, when accused of bribing a ruffian to shoot Governor Boggs of Missouri, one of his chief opponents. The Mormons still increased in wealth, numbers, and audacity. The corporation assumed an independent jurisdiction, and passed an ordinance imposing imprisonment on any person who should speak disrespectfully of the Prophet; all legal documents were declared to be void unless backed by his signature. Smith was now absolute ruler, both in spiritual and temporal things, over 20,000 persons; and his converts, both in America and elsewhere, were rapidly increasing in numbers. It is stated that in 1843 there were 10,000 in Great Britain alone; and in the following year a copy of the Book of Mormon was presented to the Queen. Smith used his prosperity for the gratification of his greed and lusts. He exacted large contributions in money and kind; and, with his chief followers, he began, under cover of a theory of "Spiritual Wives," secretly and cautiously to teach polygamy. Some of the women to whom proposals were made informed their friends, rousing thereby great indignation. Meanwhile, in 1844, Smith went so far as to offer himself as a candidate for the Presidency of the United States. But his proceedings raised against him many bitter enemies, including some of his former partisans. At length the Anti-Mormons established a newspaper in Nauvoo itself, in the first number of which were published affidavits from sixteen women, stating that Smith, Rigdon, and other prominent Mormons had attempted to seduce them. A council of the Saints promptly declared the journal a public nuisance. Smith ordered the nuisance to be abated, and a mob of Mormons destroyed the office, papers, and furniture. The owners obtained warrants against Smith and others concerned: the Mormons resisted their execution: the whole neighbouring population rose in arms against them: the governor called out the militia, and finally, to avoid a general massacre, and on the governor pledging his word and the honour of the State that they should be protected, Joseph Smith, his brother Hiram, and some others, surrendered, and were lodged in prison at Carthage, the State capital. All was quiet for a time, but a rumour arose that the governor wished their escape. At 6 A.M., June 27th, 1844, 200 men, disguised and painted as Indians, overpowered the guard, broke into the prison, and shot the Smiths dead, severely wounding their companions. [Accounts from Mormon eye-witnesses, in Burton, app. iii.; Mackay, 189, sq.]. Joseph Smith was thirty-eight years of age, and left a widow, with several children. His character and whole career is that of a low-minded, lustful impostor, with little education but much shrewdness, led on by circumstances to play the part of a religious leader. There is not the slightest evidence that he was, as some have maintained, a misguided enthusiast. He used his power simply for his own personal ends; and his zeal and endurance under persecution were prompted by keen-sighted views of the future, and in some degree also by natural firmness and resolution. [For the life of Smith, see Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith the Prophet and his Progenitors, by Lucy Smith, mother of the Prophet; The Autobiography of Joseph Smith, in Mill. Star, xiv. xv.; The Book of Doctrine and Covenants, passim.]

At first it seemed that the death of the Prophet would cause the ruin of his religion. Four claimants for the vacant presidency arose; but the twelve apostles unanimously elected Brigham Young their president; and the choice was generally accepted. Rigdon, who ventured to resist, was, with some adherents, finally excommunicated. The "Saints" were for a time left in peace; but their rejoicings and boastings at the laying the capstone of the temple again roused the populace against them. After much loss of life, the leaders resolved to remove from the civilized world beyond the Rocky Mountains. They agreed to leave Illinois altogether in the course of 1846, and a promise was made that they should be allowed to sell their property and retire in peace. An exploring expedition, setting out in February 1846, after much hardship reached Iowa. Here circumstances compelled them to wait till they were recruited by fresh parties from Nauvoo. Meanwhile those who remained in the city, while preparing for their removal, pressed forward the building of the temple, which was solemnly consecrated in May 1846. This proceeding was regarded as a sign that the Saints intended to remain or to return hereafter. The populace again rose; and after three days' bombardment, the remnant of the Mormons were driven out of Nauvoo by the sword, in the greatest misery. The city, which had contained 20,000 inhabitants, was left desolate. The temple, having been dismantled by the departing Mormons, was set on fire by an incendiary, November 19th, 1848; and the bare walls were blown down by a hurricane, May 27th, 1850. From the camp in Iowa an advanced body, with the president, after marching for three months, reached the valley of the Great Salt Lake; and, guided, as they said, by an angel, fixed on this for their new home. Here they were soon joined by the main body. They suffered terribly in their long march, and during the autumn and winter after their arrival. A circular letter from the twelve apostles called all the Saints to the new "Zion," which was named Deseret, interpreted to mean, in the "reformed Egyptian" language, "Honey-bee" [Book of Mormon, Ether, i. 3, p. 518]. Public buildings (including a tabernacle, or temporary place for public worship), manufactures and shops were soon established; and a system of emigration was organized, with a fund to help the Saints on their way, who flocked thither, enduring much privation from the journey. In 1850, the district—part of that ceded by Mexico in 1849—was admitted into the United States as a territory, with the name Utah, a claim that it should be erected into a State being rejected. Brigham Young was named the first governor. In 1852, the "Celestial Law of Marriage," authorizing polygamy, was promulgated, and at once acted on; and in 1853 the corner-stone of the temple, the plan of which with all its details was "revealed" to the president, was laid; it is not [A.D. 1873] nearly finished. Difficulties soon arose with the judges and other officers appointed by the United States President; and twice, in 1854 and 1856, they were all compelled to fly to Washington. The first difficulty was smoothed over; but in 1857, 2,500 troops were sent to enforce submission. The Mormons prepared to resist, but, after some skirmishes, gave way. The troops were withdrawn in 1860, but in 1862 it was found necessary to form a permanent camp at Douglas, close to the city, to overawe the Mormons. The governor forbade the annual muster of the militia, and tried to prevent the packing of juries; his death soon after was considered by the Saints as a judgment. His successor, supported by the judges, continued this policy; and in consequence the Mormon periodicals are full of complaints of injustice, corruption, and personal profligacy. In 1871 some of the Mormon leaders were indicted under the United States law against bigamy; in the first case, the defendant was convicted, whereon the president was arrested for bigamy and inciting to murder. On appeal, however, the proceedings were quashed, to the great joy of the Mormons, who look on this result as due to a special interference of Providence. They declare their resolve to resist to the death all attempts to put down polygamy, and their firm belief that God will work miracles for them, as for his ancient Saints, the Jews [Rae, 116, Mill. Star, vol. xxxii. passim, esp. p. 328]. The opening of the Pacific Railway [A.D. 1869], by giving a great impulse to mining, has largely increased the number of "gentiles;" and this fact will probably greatly influence the future fortunes of the Mormons. Recent events [May 1873] shew symptoms of a design to leave Utah for some spot where a more complete isolation can be maintained.

II. Sacred Books. The alleged discovery and real history of the "Book of Mormon" has been already described. In its published form it is a duodecimo volume of 563 pages of small print.¹ It is divided, in imitation of the Old Testament, into fifteen books of unequal length, bearing the names of their supposed authors,—Nephi [cf. 2 Macc. i. 36], Jacob, Enos, Jarom, Mosiah, and the like; each book being divided into chapters and numbered paragraphs. The work contains the history of three peoples who came from the East to America; the earliest after the dispersion of Babel, the others setting out from Jerusalem in the reign of Zedekiah. Lehi [cf. Judg. xv. 19], a righteous Jew of the tribe of Joseph, warned by God to flee from the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, was, with his wife and four sons, divinely guided to America. From this family sprung two nations, the righteous Nephites and the wicked Lamanites, who were continually at war with each other. The latter were finally punished by the loss of their fair skins, and were allowed to sink into barbarism, becoming the Red Indians. The history of the Nephites is given at length. In the fifth century after their arrival, the Nephites, under Divine guidance, found and united with a people of the tribe of Judah, whose ancestors had left Jerusalem after its capture by Nebuchadnezzar. This people possessed plates containing the history of the family of Jared, who had come to America after the dispersion of Babel. From this family sprung great nations, who mutually destroyed each other. A number of prophets arose among the Nephites, who foretold the redemption through Christ, and instituted baptism in His Name. At the time of the Crucifixion the Nephites were visited with terrible convulsions of nature, and a voice from Heaven commanded the people to repent and believe. After the Ascension, Jesus Christ thrice appeared to them, converted all the nation, appointed twelve disciples, instituted the two sacraments, performed many miracles, and ascended again into Heaven. After a long period of piety and prosperity wickedness and troubles again arose; and finally, all the Nephites but one were slain by their enemies the Lamanites. So all true religion perished; miracles and gifts of grace ceased. The chronicles of the Nephites were kept on gold plates, handed down from generation to generation. The final possessors of them, Mormon, and Moroni his son, at God's command, made an abridgment of the history, and hid it in the place where it was found by Joseph Smith. With the history are mixed up long exhortations, visions, parables, religious meditations, in language imitating that of the English Bible, from which many passages are directly copied, sometimes with slight variations which do not improve the sense, including large portions of Isaiah, the Sermon on the Mount, and some verses of St. Paul's Epistles. The narrative is most tedious; there is not a trace of any elevated, poetic, or religious feeling. The style is that of an uneducated person, glaring grammatical errors appearing on nearly every page, besides the grossest absurdities and anachronisms. Beyond the assertions that the Book is the work of inspired writers teaching true religion, and that revelations, miracles, and gifts of tongues are ever with the faithful, few of the doctrinal peculiarities of Mormonism appear. Materialistic notions of the Deity are hinted at [Ether, i. 8, p. 521, 522], and infant baptism is forbidden [Moroni, viii. 2, pp. 557].

The chief authority on doctrine is The Book of Doctrine and Covenants of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, selected from the Revelations of God, by Joseph Smith, President. The first edition, published in 1833, differs much from the later ones, and was subsequently suppressed.² This work consists of two distinct parts. Pp. 1-64 contain seven lectures on faith, originally delivered before a class of elders at Kirtland; and it seems probable that they were written by Rigdon. In them are some very curious statements. For instance, it is inferred from Heb. xi. 3, that faith is "the principle of power existing in the bosom of God by which the worlds were framed, and that if this principle or attribute were taken from the Deity, He would cease to exist [Lect. i. 13-17, p. 3]. Again, "When a man works by faith, he works by mental exertion, instead of physical force. It is by words, instead of exerting his physical powers, with which every being works, when he works by faith" [Lect. vii. 3, p. 55]. Many peculiar doctrines are here set forth. The second part, entitled Covenants and Commandments, consists of the revelations given to Smith at various times, and is evidently by a different hand from the "Lectures." The style and grammar betray the interpolator of the Book of Mormon. The "Covenants and Commandments" resemble in form the Koran; both works contain Divine revelations; much in both is only of temporary interest, and both afford undesigned materials for the life of their authors. But all the merits of the Koran are absent and all its defects present in the work of Joseph Smith. The revelations were given to a great number of persons, but always through the medium of Smith. They refer to various subjects: the organization, worship and hierarchy of the Church; instructions in faith and morals; prophecies, visions, parables, interpretations of Scripture; directions to individuals about their acts, preachings, journeyings, for the promotion of the faith; and concerning the affairs and needs, spiritual and temporal, of the Church. There are also two addresses of the Prophet to the Saints in Nauvoo, delivered in writing only; minutes of the High Council [February 17th, 1834]; declarations of the Church on marriage, and governments; and an account of the martyrdom of Joseph Smith and his brother. Those sections relating to the organization of the Church and the duties of the ministry are placed first, then the portions chiefly treating of faith and practice; lastly, those that relate chiefly to individuals and to temporary circumstances.

² The edition used is the sixth European, 1869. It is referred to as [D. and C.]. When there are two figures, the first denotes the section, the second the paragraph.

Many other revelations, translations, prophecies addresses, etc., of Smith were published in the periodicals of the sect, all of which are regarded as of authority. Some of these have been collected into a pamphlet, entitled The Pearl of Great Price, being a choice selection from the revelations, translations, and narrations of Joseph Smith, Liverpool, 1851 [referred to as P. of G. P.]. In this book is set forth the theory that Mormonism is a revival of the primitive religion revealed to Adam [see also D. and C. Lect. ii. p. 8, sq.; Coots. and Comm. iii. 18-29, p. 78]. A similar theory is found in the Koran. Here also appears a translation, with facsimiles, of some Egyptian papyrus rolls, procured from a travelling showman. Smith declared these rolls to be written by Abraham, narrating his stay in Egypt. An eminent French Egyptologist, M. Déveria, before whom the facsimiles were laid, shewed that they represented the resurrection of Osiris, a funerary disk, and a painting from a funerary MS. [For full details see Rémy, ii. 536, sq.] In this pamphlet two different accounts of the creation are given, both made up out of Gen. i. A translation is given of Matt. xxiii. 39 and xxiv. differing from the Authorized Version in containing additions to the extent of one-third, entirely unsupported by any MS. or version. There are some other fragments, absurd but unimportant, except as shewing the audacity of the author. The "translations" are portions of a translation of the whole Bible, said to exist in MS. in the hands of the Mormon leaders. Some further extracts have appeared in periodicals: the text is altered to suit Mormon doctrines, and large additions made. It is asserted by the Mormons, that the Authorized Version has been fraudulently corrupted, and that this "translation" alone represents the original and true form. Other revelations are also said to exist in MS., to be published when the world is ripe for them.

III. Doctrines. It is difficult to set forth exactly and clearly the principles of Mormon theology, first, from the theory of continuous revelation abiding in the Church [see preface to Hymn Book, 1856, quoted in Qu. Rev. exxii. 477; also Spencer, Lect. ii.; Compendium, 43-47]; secondly, Mormon theology has neither scientific form nor leading idea, being a disorderly mixture of doctrines and superstitions borrowed from many different sources. The only document at all resembling a creed is published in P. of G. P. [p. 55, see also Burton, 467-480], which nearly represents the form in which Mormonism is usually preached. Faith in Joseph and his successors, repentance, baptism for the remission of sins, reverence for the Bible and the sacred books described above, the payment of tithes, absolute obedience to the president and the priesthood, this is nearly all that is required of the orthodox; while farms at Utah and the attractions of polygamy are held out to gain converts. The deeper doctrines are reserved for the intelligent and inquiring.

The Mormon faith is based on very gross Materialism, in some points verging on Pan-theism. All that exists is material; matter therefore is eternal, and is in fact only one substance of which all existing things are modifications. The Supreme Deity then is material, originating in the union of two elementary particles of matter: passing through the human stage, He has by constant development attained omnipotence. This Supreme Godhead is threefold: its nature may be understood by comparing it to a council of three, each of whom is separate and distinct from the others, equal in knowledge, truth, power, and all other respects; but yet the three compose but one body. These three persons are called Elohim, Jehovah, and Michael, who is the same as Adam; and they "organized" the world out of previously existing matter. This God has also a wife, a female Deity, and from these two have sprung, by a celestial mode of generation, countless gods of both sexes, differing in dignity and power, also angels and the spirits of men. No spiritual being therefore is created; all are begotten. "God," said Smith, "never did have power to create the spirit of man at all. The very idea lessens man in my estimation. I know better" [Last sermon in Mill. Star, v. 87, sq.]. The gods possess both body, parts, and passions; and therefore are not omnipresent. A Mormon hymn [No. 349] begins—

"The God that others worship is not the God for me:

He has no parts nor body, and cannot hear nor see."

[See also Spencer, Lett. viii.; Compend. 140-146.] The gods therefore have local residences; the Supreme Deity lives "in the planet Kolob" [P. of G. P. 24; Compend. 199-200]. The revelation which the Trinity, Elohim, Jehovah, Michael, bears to the Christian Trinity is not very clear. It is said that "these three . . . in organizing element are perfectly represented in the Deity as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost" [Compend. 153]. God the Father, like the other gods, has the form and body of a man, and in fact once inhabited this earth, but by development has become the model or standard of perfection to which man is intended to attain. Jesus Christ, the Son of God, was born of the Virgin Mary, the latter having been duly married after betrothal by the Angel Gabriel. Yet He had a previous existence in the bosom of the Father, and "He is called the Son, because of the flesh" [D. and C., Lect. v. 2, p. 45]. The Father is a personage of spirit, glory and power, possessing all perfection and fulness, "but the Son is a personage of tabernacle, made or fashioned like unto man, or being in the form and likeness of man, or rather man was formed after His likeness and in His image" [ib.]. There are two personages in the Godhead, the Father and the Son [ib. p. 47]. The Holy Spirit also is a member of the Godhead, being the mind of the Father and the Son; but while the other two persons have bodies of flesh and bones, the Holy Ghost has not, but is a personage of Spirit [Compend. 154]. Yet His substance is material, subject to the necessary laws which govern matter. He has therefore parts, which are infinite and spread throughout all space, and so is He virtually omnipresent. The Father and the Son, as persons, are not omnipresent, but only through the Spirit [Comp. 140-148]. He may properly be called God's minister, to execute His will in immensity. He is therefore the worker of miracles, the source of grace, and even the cause of increase, being in every person upon the face of the earth; for the "elements that every individual is made of and lives in possess the Godhead" [B. Young in Compend. 148]. As God is in the form of a man, so man was created to become a god. The Divine beings are constantly producing souls by generation; these are destined to become gods, which they can only do by obtaining bodies. Hence, Michael, or Adam, and Eve his wife, who were immortal, assumed humanity to provide tabernacles of flesh for the disembodied spirits. They and their offspring would not have been subject to death but for the Fall, which necessitated redemption by the death of Christ. They have now become gods, and with the other deities continue to bear disembodied souls, which are waiting for bodies, in order that they may attain perfection. This can only be effected through the agency of men. He who has few or no children is injuring these souls, and the more wives and children a man has, the greater will be his glory in the next life as a god. Thus one of the hymns [326] says,—

"Through him who holds the sealing power,
Ye faithful ones who heed
Celestial laws, take many wives,
And rear a righteous seed.

"Though fools revile, I'll honour you,
As Abraham my friend,
You shall be gods, and shall be blessed
With lives that never end."

Jesus Christ had several wives, among others Mary and Martha, the sisters of Lazarus. Joseph Smith will be a chief god. Hence it is said of him [Hymn 252], "Mingling with gods, he can plan for his brethren," and [290], "His home's in the sky; he dwells with the gods." The angels have been men, who have not fulfilled the law of their life, nor spent their strength in perfect obedience to God, like Abraham, and other scriptural friends of God, i.e. have not taken many wives. Hence they will never become gods.

This theology is supported by the most absolutely literal interpretations of Scripture, and also by the doctrine that the Mormon faith, through the continuous revelations granted to the priesthood, is the supplement and perfection of Christianity, standing in nearly the same relation to it as Christianity to Judaism [Spencer, Letters, 55]. At the same time, Mormonism is a revival of primitive Christianity, with all its miraculous powers, the gifts of tongues, healing, etc., which were suspended through the failure of faith till Smith came. Many accounts of miraculous cures are given [Mill. Star, v. 32, 1870, 445, 475, 494, also Hymn 243]. As the Jews were bidden to separate themselves from the Gentiles, and the early Christians (the Ancient Saints) from the heathen, so the Latter-Day Saints are called forth from a wicked world, doomed to almost immediate destruction which is indeed already beginning, to the Zion of the latter-days on the Western Continent. When the Gospel has been preached to all the world, and the elect have assembled at Zion, then all unbelievers will be destroyed; the kingdom of heaven will be set up on the earth, and God will reign in Zion in person.

IV. Ordinances. The "Ordinances of the Gospel" are five: [1] Faith, which is very strangely described, see quotations from D. and C. above; [2] Repentance, i.e. sorrow for sin, and resolution to lead a good life; [3] Baptism, administered by immersion, to none younger than eight years, that being regarded as the age at which moral responsibility begins [D. and C. xxii. 4, p. 160]. Infant baptism is declared to be a "solemn mockery, because little children have no sins to repent of, and are not under the curse of Adam" [Mormon, Moroni, viii. 2, 3, p. 557]. The rite is administered as follows: "The person who is called of God, and has authority from Jesus Christ to baptize, shall go down into the water with the person who has presented him or herself for baptism, and shall say, calling him or her by name: 'Having been commissioned of Jesus Christ, I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.' Then shall he immerse him or her in the water, and come forth again out of the water" [Mormon, Nephi, v. 8, p. 457; D. and C. ii. 21, p. 73]. The effect of baptism, when administered to and by a qualified person, is declared to be the remission of sins, the gift of the Holy Ghost, and a title to eternal life. It is regarded as absolutely necessary to salvation; without it, neither repentance nor faith avail [D. and C. iv. 12, p. 87]. To supply the deficiency of those who through ignorance or other involuntary defect have died unbaptized in the Mormon faith, the practice of baptism for the dead has been ordained. The faith is preached to the dead in Hades by departed Saints; and the benefit of baptism is obtained for them by proxy. Any believer may be baptized for his departed friends, relations, and ancestors to the most remote ages; and, in the perfect state, those for whom a person has been thus baptized will be added to his family and subjects [Spencer, Letters, 162-164; Mill. Star, v. 87, sq.]. A careful record of the persons vicariously baptized is kept by duly appointed registrars. These records are the books spoken of by St. John [Rev. xx. 12], the book of life being a record kept in heaven to verify those kept on earth [D. and C. evi. 6, 7, p. 319]. [4] Laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost, sometimes called baptism by fire as distinguished from baptism by water. It is usually administered immediately after baptism, of which it is regarded as the completion. By it the spirit of prophecy, the gift of tongues, and the power to work miracles are given. [5] The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, originally administered in bread and wine, as Christ Himself ordained when He appeared to the Nephites [Mormon, Nephi, viii. 6, p. 469].

In 1833, it was revealed to Smith that "strong drinks are not for the belly, but for the washing of your bodies," and that wine was only to be used in this ordinance if it was the pure juice of the grape, and made by Mormons [D. and C. lxxxi. 1, p. 240]. Water only, therefore, is now used. The rite is administered every Sunday; the water, having been blessed, is handed round in tin cans, together with the bread [Rae, 106].

Of other rites, the most important is that of marriage. The present service is of some length, containing, in the case of all marriages after the first, certain ceremonies by the first wife [Conybeare, 74, 75]. There are two kinds of marriage—for eternity and for time. A marriage for eternity holds good not only during this life, but for ever, and is not necessarily consummated here; but those thus married will produce souls in the world to come. Marriages "for time" are in order to produce children in this world; hence a woman may be married, or "sealed," to one man for eternity, and to another for time, or may be married to the same man both for time and for eternity. Marriages for time only are dissolved by death; and the children in the perfected state are added to the family of the husband for eternity, increasing his glory. The faithful Mormon who in this life has been prevented by some involuntary cause, such as an early death, from doing his duty as a child-producer, may have wives "sealed" to him. In this case another person, appointed by the president, acts for the dead man; and if any children are born they are reckoned to the latter. Divorce is common, and marriage is allowed within near degrees; a man may marry two sisters, a niece, a mother and daughter, and even a half-sister. The consequence of this doctrine of marriage is the utter degradation of woman; by herself she is useless and meaningless; all her honour, both in this life and the next, comes from the husband; an unmarried woman has only the very lowest place.¹ The public profession of polygamy, or, as it is officially called, "plurality," is a later development of Mormonism. Suspicions were early aroused by the life of Smith and other leading Mormons; and the charge of teaching this practice was frequently thought to excite public odium. The accusation however was vigorously denied. Passages from the Book of Mormon [Jacob, ii. p. 118, sq.] were quoted against it: a public declaration of the Church [A.D. 1841] stated, "We believe that one man should have one wife, and one woman but one husband" [D. and C. cix. 4, p. 331]. The Millennial Star [Aug. 1842] declares, "No such principle ever existed among the Latter-Day Saints, and never will" [Mill. Star, iii. 74]. It is however now alleged, that in 1832 it was, in answer to an inquiry, divinely revealed to Joseph that the principle of "plurality" is true, but that the time had not yet come for it to be practised; and that, on July 12th, 1843, the Prophet, then at the height of his power in Nauvoo, received a long revelation on the subject. [See Burton, 451.] This document, if genuine, was kept secret till August 29th, 1852, when it was published at a great meeting at Utah [Rémy, ii. 112-130]. The Prophet's widow at once denounced it as a forgery, and, with four of her sons, headed a schism. On the other hand, several women publicly declared that they had been married to Joseph, while the president and others stated that they had been taught the doctrine by him [Mill. Star, xxxii. 327, 333, etc.]. The practice is now carried to great lengths, the leading men having from fifteen to forty wives each; and it is preached as the one thing needful to regenerate a world steeped in wickedness. Many plausible and paradoxical arguments are urged in its favour. [See Conybeare, 76-83; Rémy, ii. 97-109; Burton, 525, sq.; Ollivant, App. B. 148-151, and Mill. Star, passim.] For burial there appears to be no prescribed ritual. The ordinary worship consists of prayers, with addresses, often of a very homely character, and hymns. The chief peculiarity of the services is the absence of any true devotional element. The duties of private prayer, meditation, communion with God, self-examination, are seldom or never spoken of; and very gross irreverence is often shewn during public worship [Qu. Rev. cxxii. 486-488; Ollivant, 54, and App. A. 119, 147; Rae, 106, sq.]. When the temple is completed, it is intended, as the founder ordered, to establish sacrifices and every ordinance belonging to the priesthood, as they existed prior to Moses' day [Compend. 177]. There are also some ceremonies, which are most carefully kept secret, and of which very different accounts have been given.

V. Hierarchy. This is very elaborate; and the ministers possess very great power. About one-fifth of the male members hold some church office. "The priesthood," said the Prophet, "is the channel through which the Almighty commenced revealing His glory at the beginning of the creation of this earth, and through which He has continued to reveal Himself to the children of men to the present time, and through which He will make known His purposes to the end of time" [Compend. 176]. There are two grand divisions of the priesthood, the Melchisedek and the Aaronic or Levitical. To the former belong the first presidency, the patriarch, the apostles, the seventies, the high-priests, the elders; to the latter, bishops, priests, deacons, teachers. The Melchisedek priesthood is so called "because Melchisedek was such a great high-priest" [D. and C. iii. 1, p. 74]. Its power and authority is thus described: "To hold the keys of all the spiritual blessings of the Church—to have the privilege of receiving the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, to have the heavens opened to them—to commune with the general assembly of the first-born, and to enjoy the communion and presence of God the Father, and Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant" [D. and C. iii. 9, p. 76]. The Aaronic priesthood ought to consist of literal descendants of Aaron, pointed out by revelation; but, in default of such, others may be appointed [ibid. iii. 8, p. 75]. The power and authority of this priesthood is "to hold the keys of the ministering of angels, and to administer in outward ordinances the letter of the Gospel—the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins" [ibid. iii. 10, p. 76]. The highest office in the Church is The First Presidency, consisting of three members, the successors of Peter, James and John among the Apostles. Of these the first president is supreme, being ex officio seer, revelator, and prophet; he is "the presiding high-priest over the high-priesthood of God, and, under God, holds the keys of heaven and hell." From his decision there is no appeal; for the other two presidents are only his councillors. The first presidency is said to be appointed by revelation, but at the General Conferences, held twice a year, a vote is passed to sustain the existing holders. The Patriarch, also called "Father of the Church," is appointed by the Church for life. His sole duty is to administer blessings. The Twelve Apostles, or Second Presidency, are "the special witnesses of the Name of Christ in all the world" [D. and C. iii. 11, p. 76], being mainly for missionary purposes. Their duty is to build up the Church, and to ordain and set in order all inferior ministers; they take the lead in all meetings, except in presence of a president, and may administer all ordinances. An apostle presides over the most important foreign missions and churches. The Seventies are a number of committees, so called because each consists of seventy persons. The first seventy, like the apostles, are chosen by the Church in conference at Utah; of these seven are appointed presidents, with a chief, "the president of all the seventies." The presidents appoint seventy others, and these again seventy more, "until seven times seventy, if the work in the vineyard so require." Thus the number of "the seventies" amounts to many hundred, though the number of seventy is rarely complete. Their duty is to assist the apostles, under their direction, in building up the Church; and they are in fact travelling ministers. The High-Priests, after the order of the Melchisedek priesthood, form the highest class of ordinary ministers; they exercise spiritual authority under the general direction of the first presidency, and the control of a president of their own order; they may officiate in all offices of the Church. The Bishops, the highest order of the Aaronic priesthood, have chiefly temporal duties, though in spiritual matters they have authority over the lower ministers. Their work consists mainly in the management of the Church funds, obtained by tithes and offerings, in relieving the wants of the ministers, aiding needy Saints, &c. A bishop is the local authority in each of the wards of Utah and the settlements in the neighbourhood. The Elders, the lowest rank of the Melchisedek priesthood and the most numerous class of ministers, conduct the ordinary meetings, except in presence of one of higher rank, and execute the ordinary ministerial duties—the administration of the ordinances, preaching, teaching, visiting from house to house, and privately exhorting the Saints. The Priests have the same duties as the elders, and may also ordain other priests, teachers, and deacons in subordination to the elders. The Teachers usually assist the other ministers; they exercise a general supervision over the members, may expound, exhort and teach at meetings, but may not administer any ordinances. The Deacons assist the bishops in their temporal duties, as collectors, treasurers, etc.; they may officiate in the absence of other ministers, but only as preachers and expounders.

Besides these office-bearers, there is also The Standing High Council, to settle difficulties among believers. This consists of eighteen (at first twelve) high-priests, appointed by ballot, with one or three presidents, being the first president alone, or with his assessors. After the evidence has been heard, and the accusers, accused, and a certain number of councillors, from two to six, according to the gravity of the case, have spoken, the president gives his decision, and calls on the other members to sanction it. Sometimes a case is reheard; in special difficulties recourse is had to revelation. Every "stake" and separate church is governed by its own "High Council," with a similar constitution and procedure; and with an appeal to the Supreme High Council.

General affairs are managed by conferences, held April 6th and December 6th in each year. At these, which sometimes last several days, the first presidency and other office-bearers are sustained in office by the vote, always unanimous, of the meeting, vacancies are filled, reports on various subjects are read, prayers are offered, addresses delivered, hymns and anthems sung, etc. [Mill. Star, passim; Burton, 367, sq.; Qu. Rev. cxxii. 488.]

Missions are a great feature of Mormonism. Any member of the priesthood is liable to be sent, at the will of the president, on a sudden impulse, at short notice, to "preach the Gospel to the Gentiles." The missionaries are sent forth moneyless, or with only sufficient funds to take them to their destination, and have to work for their living till they can be supported by the offerings of converts. The Book of Mormon has been translated into Welsh, French, German, Italian, Danish, Norwegian, and other languages; churches have been founded in Great Britain, Denmark, Norway, several parts of Australia, Gibraltar, Malta, Switzerland, France, and Germany. Missions to Sweden, Austria, Chili, China, Hindostan, have been unsuccessful. The converts are numerous, most being from the North of England, Wales, Norway, Denmark, and the seaboard States of the Union; almost all have belonged to some Protestant sect, and all are from the indigent and hopelessly ignorant classes. Every inducement is held out to them to go to Utah; and an excellent system of emigration has been established [Conybeare, 56; Ed. Rev. No. 233, pp. 188, 189]. For this, and other purposes, every Mormon is bound to pay tithe from his income to the Church; and is exhorted to give liberally besides. The tithes are supposed to be devoted to the building of the temple [Hymn 218]; but are absolutely at the disposal of the president.

The Mormon system is an almost unlimited temporal and spiritual despotism. "The people," it is said, "will be as much condemned if they do not obey Brother Brigham as they would if they should disobey the Lord God were He here in person" [Compend. 42]. "When the Lord comes, He will take vengeance on those who obey not His priesthood. The word of Brother Brigham is the word of the Lord" [ibid. 43]. The whole duty of a Mormon consists in thinking and doing as he is told, even as regards his most private and personal affairs. The president may order, or forbid, a man to marry; a bishop may at any time enter any Mormon's house and issue what orders he pleases. All are compelled to deal only at the authorized shops and stores, which are managed on the co-operative principle for the benefit of the Church, i.e. the enrichment of the leaders. By means of a constant system of espionage, any breach of rules is promptly noticed, and if it be persisted in, the offender is cut off from the Church, and every means are used to crush him. Persons are even excommunicated without any reason assigned, and, on complaining, are told that their crime will in due time come to light; it being held that if any man fails in obedience to the priesthood in any respect he must have committed some great sin, whereby he has lost the Spirit of God [Ollivant, 86, 87]. All the arrangements at Utah are admirably suited to maintain obedience. Every means are adopted to prevent any but the chief men from accumulating money; so that while a man can live from hand to mouth in some comfort, he cannot save anything; hence in no place are there more people, who can just hang on, short of absolute poverty [Ollivant, 47, 101]. The majority, therefore, are virtually prisoners in Utah. If any man secedes, or is cast out, all Mormons are forbidden to have any intercourse with him, even to give him food or shelter; sometimes violence, even to death, has been used, and in such a way that it cannot be easily proved; moreover, accused Mormons are usually acquitted by packed juries. All "Gentiles" are suspected, and every means are used to keep or drive them away. [See Rae, 118-120; Fraser's Mag. for June 1871, p. 692].

The prospects of Mormonism in its present form do not seem favourable. The Republican party in the States have made it part of their platform "to put down the Saints;" and though the first attempt has failed, it will doubtless be repeated with greater caution and success. In that case, the Mormons would have to choose between abandoning polygamy or Utah. If the former were done, they might still linger on among the chaos of sects in America. If the latter, they might for a few years retain their attractions for the sensual and the fanatic. The influence of the two schisms is considerable in causing disaffection; and the younger people are said, partly from education, partly through intercourse with Gentiles, not to be, as a body, very zealous for the faith. An Episcopal Mission, established in 1866, has had some success, chiefly through the excellence of its schools.

The causes of the success of Mormonism may be briefly summed up. [1] Its appeal to that unreasoning reverence for the letter of the English Bible fostered by popular Protestantism in the uneducated. [2] The claim to be "the Lord's own people," appealing to the feeling of spiritual pride, and the idea that God is ever interfering, by miracles and extraordinary gifts, in their behalf. [3] Its earthly character, as a religion—not above, but on a level with low and carnal desires, offering the full present enjoyment of this life, and a life to come, which is only a continuation of that enjoyment. [4] The pictures held out by preachers of the wealth and comfort to be obtained at Utah, and the allurements of polygamy.

Two schisms have taken place from Mormonism. The first, whose headquarters are in Illinois, with the title of "The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints," was led, in 1852, by the widow and sons of the founder, on the publication of the revelation authorizing polygamy, the genuineness of which they denied. Their chief feature is the rejection of that practice and the doctrines connected therewith. The second secession arose in 1869, in Utah itself, with the title of the "Church of Zion;" it advocates freedom of thought and action, as opposed to the despotism of the president and the priesthood. Many old and prominent Mormons have joined this body [Rae, 157, sq.; Ollivant, 82-90]. Both these schisms cause much trouble to the Mormon leaders.

MUGGLETONIANS. A sect originated during the Great Rebellion by Ludovick Muggleton [A.D. 1609-1697], a journeyman tailor of London, and an associate named Reeves.

Muggleton set forth that he and his accomplices were the two witnesses spoken of in Rev. xi. 3-6, and that it was their mission to prophesy during the last days, which had then arrived. They professed to have special revelations from heaven, and that they had received power to destroy any who opposed them. The fanatics also taught strange notions, that look as if they were confused memories of some Gnostic heresies,—as that earth and water were not created, but self-originated; that the Evil One became incarnate in Eve; that the Father was the Sufferer upon the Cross, having left Elijah to govern heaven, while He came to earth to die; that Reeves represented Moses, and Muggleton represented Aaron.

Reeves died many years before Muggleton, and after his death the latter claimed to have a double portion of the Spirit bestowed upon him. He himself died in the year 1697, and was buried in Spinningwheel Alley, Moorfields, where the following inscription was placed upon his tomb:—

“ Whilst mausoleums and large inscriptions give Might, splendour, and past death make potents live,
It is enough briefly to write thy name.
Succeeding times by that will read thy fame;
Thy deeds, thy acts, around the world resound,
No foreign soil where Muggleton's not found.”

The sect of the Muggletonians just survived until within the last few years. [Chamberlain's Pres. State of Eng. 1702, p. 258. The Snake in the Grass. Transact. Liverpool Lit. and Phil. Soc. 1868-70.]

MUNSTER, PRESBYTERY OF. A secession from the main body of the Presbyterians of Ireland, consisting of ten congregations in Dublin and the South of Ireland.

MÜNZER. [ANABAPTISTS.]

MUSTITANI. A small and obscure sect of Donatists, condemned by the three hundred and ten bishops of that schism, who met at Bagai or Vaga in Numidia, A.D. 398. [S. Aug. contra epist. Parmeniani, lib. iii. cap. 29.]

MYSTICS, so called from μύστικον, that which pertains to mysteries from which the uninitiated are excluded. The term applies at the present day to that union with the Deity which the rapt soul is believed to attain by ecstatic contemplation. Mysticism, in this sense, lies at the root of every form of religious enthusiasm, and by easy degrees may pass on into fanaticism. “Mysticismus haud raro obit in fanaticum furor” [Wegscheider]. Where mysticism is the dominant power of the will it is fanaticism; as mixed up with the imagination it is enthusiasm; and where it has attempted to engraft the religious idea on anciently received forms of philosophy, it has been definitely known as theosophy. In every case it claims to set itself above the moral guidance of principle; the feelings of the heart and the purblind impulse of the imagination being its only law.

But a distinction may be drawn between the mystical principle, holding the verity of the soul's union with God, and mysticism in its exaggerated and morbid condition [Nitzsch, Syst. d. Chr. Lehre; Sack, Polemik]; and certainly, so far as the inner life of the soul, in direct communion with God, is to be distinguished from the action of the same soul in its relation with the world, a distinct phase of spiritual power is to be recognised, whether it be termed the mystical principle of the soul, or the divine union of the soul with God, or the Life of God in the soul of man. Mysticism is the intensified application of this principle, carried out to lengths that are inconsistent with the everyday duties of life. Mysticism has so far no necessary connection with practical piety. It aims at the absorption of the life of man in the Divine; while a rational piety seeks its blessing in representing the Divine Life faithfully in every relation with the world; that is, in every phase and minute ramification of daily duty. The tendency of mysticism is towards a pantheistical summing of all in the Deity, whereby the sense of distinct personal existence, whether in the human or divine substance, becomes confused. Yet the mystical principle is to a certain extent inseparable from a deep appreciation of the religious idea. The soul's yearning for the invisible finds the object of its aspiration in a sacramental union with the object of its desire. Jacob's realisation of the Divine presence at Bethel was as the mystic ladder of communication, on which the angels of God passed to and fro between earth and heaven. By a deeper generalization Solomon saw in the wisdom of God the bond of union that connects the Spirit of the universe with the Spirit of God. The religious idea had at that early date its obverse side of mystic impress. In the cognate theology of St. John, the Word is the middle term between earth and heaven, and being God from the beginning, He is still the Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Hence the mystic principle is inseparable from true religion, so far as it sets the Invisible before the eye of faith, and enables the soul to anticipate the future for which it was created. Hence also the less true forms of religion have one and all embodied the mystic principle, as involving the very essence of religion. Therapeutic contemplation was the obverse of Mosaic ordinance; the Cabbala refined upon the Talmud; and Persian Sufism is as the spirit of which the Koran is the letter.

In the Church of the sixth century the pseudo-Dionysian mysticism was a reaction upon the dogmatic teaching forced upon the Church by heresy; much as the mysticism of the ALOMBRADOS or Illuminati of Spain, in the sixteenth century, was called forth by the rigid orthodoxy of the Inquisition, and Jansenist and Quietist tenets by Jesuitism. Mysticism has still been the most usual form in which the expiring flame of religion has flickered up from its embers. Theosophical mysticism may be referred back to the allegorizing exegesis of the Alexandrian school of theology, the remote source of which may be found in the writings of Philo. The historical treatises of this writer were evidently composed for Hellenistic readers, and set forth such facts of Jewish history as were known to every child under synagogal discipline. His allegorizing treatises¹ were addressed to that particular phase of the Jewish mind that is dimly indicated in the Proverbs of Solomon, more clearly in the writings of the Son of Sirach, and which became a rule of life in the Therapeutæ of Alexandria. At Alexandria the literary Jew added the study of Plato to the teaching of the Law, and learned to qualify the anthropomorphism of the latter by the transcendental notions of the Deity conveyed by the purest form of Greek philosophy. By a natural progression the anthropopathic descriptions of the Sacred Books were spiritually interpreted as divine allegory, and in time the whole letter of the Law was regarded only as a veil that screened deep mystical truths from the vulgar gaze; σχεδὸν τὰ πάντα ἀλληγορεῖται are the words of Philo. This is the true origin of the allegorizing school of exegesis that was developed in the catechetical school of Alexandria by Clement and Origen, and continued elsewhere by Theophilus of Antioch, Hilary, Cyril of Alexandria, Ephrem Syrus, and the elder Macarius. The authority principally followed by mystics of succeeding ages was that of Dionysius the Areopagite, said to have been the first Bishop [St. Denys] of Paris,² in the "Mystical Theology," the "Divine Names," the "Heavenly Hierarchy," and the "Ecclesiastical Hierarchy." The object of this writer was to give a Platonic development and colouring to the deep mysteries of the Christian faith; and to lead the soul on by contemplative energy to adunation with the Deity. The highest attainment in Christian philosophy was to behold in spirit, and to become one with, God, Who is neither darkness nor light, neither negative nor positive. Three steps lead to this blissful consummation: purification, illumination, and vision (ἐποπτεία); terms adopted from the various grades of Eleusinian initiation [Plut. Demetr. 26]. A more direct application of the terminology of heathen mysticism was made by this writer when he gave its title to the work "De Mystica Theologia."

The works of Dionysius exercised a considerable influence on the Latin Church of the Middle Ages. John Scotus Erigena translated them into Latin by the command of Charles the Bald, and left them as a model, of which the St. Victoire schoolmen afterwards made much use. These writings are referred by Dr. Westcott [Contemp. Rev. May 1867] to some writer of the Edessene school at the latter end of the fifth or commencement of the sixth century. The immediate

The tone of thought represented in these books was scarcely originated by Philo: he made application of existing material.

² Hunc alii moderni temporis asserunt, . . . a Papa Clemente in partes Galliarum directum fuisse, et Parisiis martyrii gloria coronatum fuisse. [J. Scot. Erig. Præf. in Dion. Areop.] source of Dionysian mysticism was the Symposium of Plato, in which the function of Eros is described as the medium of intimate communication between God and men; filling every void place throughout the universe, and binding together all its parts, celestial and mundane, in one compact body of love [Symposium, 202 E]. Dante, himself an exponent of the Symposium, perhaps drew from thence the inspiring thought of his Beatrice. The further development of the Platonic idea by the Neo-Platonists, Plotinus, Porphyry and Proclus, is closely copied in the abstraction from mundane grosser thought, and in the unity of divine contemplation to which Dionysius aspired. He ploughed, as Fabricius says, with the Neo-Platonic heifer [Fabr. in vit. Procli., Proleg. xii.; Lupton, Introd. to Dean Cole's two Treatises on Dionys. xlii.]. The great end at which he aimed was to shew how, by means of an intermediate and mediatorial hierarchy, man may hold communion with these celestial powers, order above order, until he reposes on the immediate contemplation of God Himself. But he seems to wander beyond the pale of the Church. The celestial hierarchy in this scheme replaces the mediatorial functions of the Redeemer of Mankind. He himself defines this hierarchy [Cæl. Hier. iii. 1] as a divine order, science and energy, standing in closest connection with the attributes of Deity; it is in fact an exact reflex of those attributes. The works of Dionysius were explained as genuine in a commentary by Maximus the monk, of Constantinople. He composed also an allegorizing work on the Liturgy, with the title of Mystagogia, in close connection with Dionysian views. This work still has a value as exhibiting the Liturgy of the Greek Church of the seventh century. Maximus forms a middle term between the so-called Areopagite and Erigena. We find in his Scholia on Gregory of Nazianzum the same transcendental notions of the Deity, and of the Divine Immanence in the world of matter, which only is by virtue of that Immanence.³ As supra-substantial (ὑπερουσίως) God has nothing in common with any⁴ known thing; but so far as the one is manifested in Being it is multimorphic; and conversely, the multimorphic by involution is substantially one.⁵ It anticipates the Spinozist "Alles ist Eins, und Eins ist Alles." Man having had an eternal existence in the Ideality of the Divine Being, partakes of that Being.⁶ From the Divine Substance he comes forth, and

into that Substance he returns; a consummation apparently but little removed from the Nirwāna of the Indian theosophy. Man, both in his origin and in his future destiny, is impersonal. As uniting in one the material and intellectual, he is a microcosmic representation of the universe;¹ as the crowning effort of creation, he embodies in himself the future recapitulation of all things in God. Substantive union with the Deity is only possible in Human Nature; and it was made possible to all by the union of the Manhood and Godhead in Christ. Thereby man's spirit soars up to God through the energy of the will, and the Incarnation of the Word is perpetuated in the individual. By means of his own free will, man may be raised more and more above the trammels of the body, and be formed in God. As God is man by Incarnation, so man through grace is divinely formed, and is one with God. God through love became Man; man through love, and by virtue of the Incarnation, becomes God. It is not once for all, but by an indefectible continuance in all and through all the whole mass of humanity, that the mystery of the Incarnation is perfected.² The writings of Maximus, with Erigena's translation of Dionysius, helped to raise scholastic thought from its dry dialectics, and to create a taste for spiritual contemplation. Thus St. Bernard, in his deep appreciation of things unseen, stands forth in strong contrast with the materialism of Abelard and Gilbert de la Porrée. Two canons of St. Victoire, selected apparently for their kindred tone of mystic thought—Hugo de St. Victoire being of Saxon, Richard of Irish extraction—threw a fervour into the theology of the schools; the cold reasoning of which was seen by them to kill down religious warmth. The conception of Hugo in every other subject was "moulded by his theology, and that theology is throughout sacramental" [Maurice, Mediæv. Phil. iv. 44]. Mysticism, as applied to this school, means a deep appreciation of the things of faith, a realization by the spirit of the unseen world, and is very far from implying the unintelligible musings of the enthusiast, or any other "cold formal generalization of a later period" [Maurice, Mediæv. Phil. iv. 41]. Hugo stands at the head of this school as its founder. Walter's mysticism stood in direct antagonism with the scholastic system; his work, Contra quatuor Labyrinthos Gallie, being a running invective against the principles developed by the four principal Gallican schoolmen, Peter Abelard, Gilbert de la Porrée, Peter Lombard, and Peter of Poitiers. Joachim à Floris opposed an apocalyptic mysticism to the dialectical theology of the schools. In Bonaventura and Gerson the mystic and dialectic elements flowed on once more in harmonious action. In the fourteenth century the mystic tone given by the HESYCHAST monks of Mount Athos to the Greek Church was approved by three councils held on the subject at Constantinople [A.D. 1341, 1347, 1350]. They drew their inspiration from the writings of Maximus, the annotator of the Celestial Hierarchy. In the controversy that arose in the Greek Church, Nicolas Cabasilas [Archbishop of Thessalonica, A.D. 1354] stood forth as the Hesychast champion, and his Seven Discourses of Life in Christ is one of the most effective works that mystical theology has produced. The mysticism of St. Hildegard in the twelfth century, of the Swedish saint Birgitta, and of Catherine of Sienna in the fourteenth, all form part of the same wave of thought. PAULICIANISM, the remote germ of the Waldensian and Albigensian sects, was rooted in a dualistic mysticism; and the Quietists of the seventeenth century were still true to the Alombrado stock from whence they sprang.

Asceticism not unfrequently issued from the mystical religious life, its highest instance being that of St. Francis of Assisi, the founder of the Franciscan Order. The FRATICELLI of the thirteenth century were an offshoot from this stock. The Beguine establishments, originally asylums for the widows and daughters of Crusaders, became convents of mystical devotees, with more or less of heretical taint. [BEGHARDS.] Germany has been peculiarly the seat of mysticism before and since the Reformation period. On the Rhine, in the thirteenth century, the Brotherhood of the "Free Spirit" gave a wide impulse to the pantheism of Amalric of Bena and David of Dinant. In the fourteenth century the pantheistic theory of J. Scotus Erigena was revived by Eckhart, provincial of the Dominican Order in Saxony, the "Doctor Ecstaticus," a man of unblamed purity of life and great earnestness of character. The boldest metaphysical speculations were united in his system with a severe asceticism. It was a period that particularly favoured the development of mystical or spiritual theology. The distraction of party warfare in State matters, the hostile attitude of the Emperor towards the Court of Rome, and the increasing divergence of religious opinion, gave an opportunity that was not thrown away by the mystic theologian. Without adopting any party in particular, the mystic devotee could combine his higher spiritual aspirations with the most opposite political and religious theories, and gain a willing ear from all. The whole heart of the people was open to him. Hence the success of Tauler as a preacher in the fourteenth century. He was termed "Doctor Illuminatus," as being the most enlightened preacher of his age. A living faith in the pure word of God, he said, was better than mass attendance or bodily mortification; the sincerely pious man alone was free, the friend of God, over whom the Pope had no spiritual power, for God had enfranchised and sanctified him to his free service; the spiritual and political powers were essentially distinct; neither, if the former was ever on ill terms with the civil governor, had it authority to lay his subjects under a ban. In Tauler, the mystic principle was exhibited on its most practical side, and in many of his views he was the harbinger of that school of thought that brought about the Reformation of the sixteenth century, and which was represented by Wycliffe in England, Huss in Bohemia, Savonarola in the Ferrarese, and John Wessel of Gröningen more ubiquitously throughout the Continent. [FRIENDS OF GOD.]

With Tauler must be associated the name of Henry Suso, his friend and ardent admirer, a pupil of Eckart [A.D. 1300—1365]. Mysticism with him was a matter of feeling rather than of speculation. Wisdom as personified by Solomon was his theme, identified at one time with Christ, at another with His Virgin Mother. To make himself worthy of the object of his adoration he practised severe austerities, and claimed to be frequently favoured with divine visions. His was no connected system, but a tissue of rhapsodical applications of the mystical theology of the preceding period, which he invested in fantastic and visionary forms. He adopted the view which led the schools so closely to the verge of Pantheism, that all created nature is a mirror in which the Deity is reflected. Creation was eternally in God as the universal exemplar. No name can sufficiently declare the Deity. As Basilides termed the Divine Principle οὐκ ὄν, and as Hegel in modern times has said the same thing, so Suso declared that the Deity might with equal propriety be termed an Eternal Nothing, as a self-existent entity. He is as a circle whose centre is everywhere, whose circumference is nowhere. Imitation of Christ's sufferings is the true mean of man's regeneration. Three principal steps lead on to union with the Deity; purification or expulsion of all mortal desire; illumination, which fills the soul with divine forms; and perfection, to which is accorded the fullest enjoyment of heavenly good. If Eckart was the philosophic mystic, and Tauler the more practical devotee, Suso was more poetical in his enthusiastic adoration of Eternal Wisdom.

In all ages a yearning for more spiritual forms of religion has driven more ardent spirits into mysticism. Thomas à Kempis [Thomas Hamerken of Kempen, near Cologne, A.D. 1380—1471], in his Hortulus Rosarum, Vallis Liliorum, de Tribus Tabernaculis, and above all in his De Imitatione Christi, gives sufficient indication of the mystic spirit. Molinos of Saragossa, a resident at Rome from A.D. 1669, published his Guida Spirituale A.D. 1675, of a similarly mystical cast. The Père La Chaise, confessor of Louis XIV., brought it under the notice of the Pope as a production of a kindred spirit to the Beghards of the Netherlands or the Spanish Alombrados, who laid the whole work of religion in silent prayer, to the neglect of external ritual. Sixty-eight heretical propositions were found in it, and the book was condemned by Innocent XI. [A.D. 1677]. Molinos, notwithstanding his confession of error, was confined in a Dominican cell, under a tedious course of lifelong penance. His followers were termed "Quietists," and as the Pietism of Germany was copied from them, they may be considered to be a link of connection between Catholicism and Protestantism. Pope Innocent, before the denunciation of Père La Chaise, had received much edification from the work of Molinos which he afterwards condemned. Fénelon also, Archbishop of Canibray [A.D. 1694], was more consistent in his appreciation of the mystic principle, as shewn in his Reflections and Meditations on the inner life of the Christian. His rival, Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, complained of his metropolitan to the King, and the matter was referred to the Court of Rome, where twenty-three propositions of doubtful character were declared to be erroneous. Fénelon submitted with humility to the papal decree; himself published the judicial bull, and proscribed his own writing. But there was nothing about him of the Protestant Pietist; one must be either Deist or Catholic was rather his theory.

There was also an unsuspected strain of mysticism about Pascal, the scourge of Jesuitism; for after his death an iron belt rough with nails¹ was found to encircle his body, and a folded parchment sewn within his dress, Pascal's "amulet," on which was a figured cross and the following writing:—"In the year of grace 1654, Monday, Nov. 23rd, Feast of St. Clement, pope and martyr, and others of the martyrology; vigil of St. Chrysogone, martyr, and others; from about half-past ten in the evening till about half-past twelve at night, Fire;

"God of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob [Exod. iii. 6; Matt. xxii. 32], not of wise men and philosophers. Certainty, certainty, feeling, joy, peace.

"The God of Jesus Christ. 'My God and your God' [John xxii. 17]. Thy God shall be my God [Ruth i. 16]. Forgetfulness of the world and of all beside God. He is found only in ways taught of the Gospel. Dignity of the human soul. Righteous Father, the world hath not known Thee, but I have known Thee [John xvii. 25]. Joy, joy, joy, tears of joy.

"I have separated myself from Him. 'Dereliquerunt me fontem aquæ vivæ' [Jer. ii. 13]. O God, wilt thou forsake me? [Matt. xxvii. 46]. May I not be separate eternally! 'This is true life, that they may know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ Whom Thou hast sent.' Jesus Christ! Jesus Christ! I have separated myself from Him; I have fled from Him, renounced, sacrificed. May I never be separated from Him! Safety is alone in the ways taught by the Gospel. Self-renunciation, total and sweet. Total submission to Jesus Christ and my guide. Everlastingly in joy, for one day of trial upon earth. 'Non obliviscar sermones tuos' [Ps. cxix. 16]. Amen."

If this was mysticism,² it may find its parallel in the conversion of St. Augustine [Conf. viii. 11, 12]. Both had sought peace in philosophy; the Father in Plato, the Jansenist in Descartes: if their respective masters could demonstrate the existence of the Deity, they could not lead the soul to the Eternal; the revelation of the way the truth and the life was in either case attended with the same effects; tears, vision, light, joy, peace. They were mystics according to Montesquieu's definition, "Les dévots qui ont le cœur tendre."

The "German Theology" had a great effect on the inner religious life of Germany at the time of the Reformation, and gave to it a mystic tone. It is the title of a work that was first brought under public notice by Luther, and published by him, A.D. 1518, as Eyn edels Buchlein, von rechtem Vorstand was Adam und Christus, sey und wie Adam yn uns sterben und Christus ersteen soll. Since that time it has been frequently translated and republished, and has been a great favourite in Lutheran Germany. All that is known of the author is that he was Custos of the Deutsch Herren Haus at Frankfurt, or rather across the Maine at Sachsenhausen, and a member of the society of "God's Friends," Catholics of mystical principles, who disappeared from the scene at the close of the fourteenth century. The style of the book is quite similar to that of Tauler and Suso. The book inculcates the necessity of completely merging the will of man in the will of God, and of practising the most complete self-denial and mortification of the natural inclinations. It is self-will that stands as a wall of separation between man and God; it converted angels into devils, and is as the fire that never can be quenched: voluntary humiliation is its remedy. Of the high conceit and lax morals of the "Brethren of the Free Spirit" it speaks with much severity, as the very spirit of Antichrist. Enlightenment, in which mysticism has always professed to initiate its votaries, is not to be attained by talk or study, but by steady acts of self-devotion, and the practice of active virtue. Love and no taint of self-seeking must be the spring of all his actions, and a man can only hope to attain perfection when he renounces as unworthy all wish for earthly reward. The same mind must be in him which was in Christ Jesus, a self-devoting, self-sacrificing spirit. The tone of the book shews no symptom of disrespect for the Church, but its free application of Bible principles in a neoterizing spirit scarcely failed to prepare the way for the Reformation. In some respects it exhibits also the germ of the Reine Vernunft of Kant. The book was always a great favourite with Luther, who ranked it in the third place after the Bible and the works of St. Augustine.

At the Reformation period, Paracelsus [Theophrastus Bombast of Hohenheim, born A.D. 1493, d. 1541] was the first who shewed a decided leaning to mysticism, though medicine, not theology, was his peculiar faculty. He was by no means a partisan of Luther, although he was himself a zealous reformer. His theological mysticism was mixed up with medicine, astronomy, astrology, alchemy, and natural history: from a similar medley Jacob Böhme, at a later date, extracted religious comfort. But the first of the Reformed party who gave to mysticism a definite shape was Valentine Weigel, minister of Ischopping, near Meissen in Saxony, who died A.D. 1588. Mysticism has often made a close approach to Pantheism; and so in his system he said that God had pity on Himself in pitying man. For since the believer is by his act of faith raised above himself and abandons the soul to God, so God is conscious of His own being in man. So Spinoza declared that God is only self-conscious in the self-consciousness of man. Man is a microcosmal power, and in him the world is exhibited in miniature reflexion. During his life Weigel had the worldly wisdom to keep his thoughts to himself, and subscribed the "Formula Concordiæ" as a good Lutheran, to avoid inconvenience, as was found stated in a posthumous writing, and not from inner conviction. In his Postils he complains earnestly of the sluggish spirit of the existing schools of theology; their bulky bodies of doctrine, their confessions, their commonplaces and table-talk, as well as their famed Formula of Concord. All such beggarly elements of instruction he would sweep away, and go to the word of God alone for light. Imputed righteousness was a doctrine he said that could only have been devised by Antichrist. Thus he also, though a professed reformer, was in many points at direct antagonism with Luther and Melancthon.

But the most unintelligible of mystics was Jacob Böhme, a cobbler of Gorlitz, on the Saxon boundary of Silesia, who died A.D. 1624. Light, he declared, had been revealed to him that rapt him into a state of ecstatic rest; and thoughts were inspired by the revelation that he seems never to have had the power of communicating to others. After a silence of fifteen years he wrote the Aurora [A.D. 1612], which was followed by other similar coruscations. His reveries shew a strange mixture of the naturalism afterwards developed by Schelling and the wilder theosophy of the ancient Gnostics. Thus he affirmed God and nature to be essentially one; and this dualized principle, without which neither nature as a whole nor any integral portion of it can exist, is the Deity. As to be self-engendered is of the essence of the Deity, so nature and the external world is the substance of that self-generation. In the fall of Lucifer, where a spirit of light should have been engendered, there issued forth a spirit of fire. It is the principle of life of all creatures, the very heart of their existence. All that is gross and hard, dark and cold, terrible and evil, has its origin in the fall of Lucifer, the Prince of this world. But intimately as his spirit interpenetrates the mass of existence, he is not wholly one with it. The spirit of life is there also, held captive as it were under the covenant of death, yet not extinguished. The confines of the rival kingdoms touch each other in man, and keep up a perpetual contest between Love and Rage. In the material world the Creator is born as creature in the quickened life of the spirit; the stars are nothing else than powers of God; and all three Persons of the Trinity are ever-present in the universe. The Father is the occult foundation of all ; the Son in the heart of the Father is the quickening spirit of life and love, of tenderness and beauty. The Spirit is universally present. From nature and its internal development Böhme professed to have gained his knowledge of philosophy and astrotheology. He was indebted to no human lore ; his only book was the book of nature, ever open before his soul. Fr. Schlegel has been able to trace in these ravings the afflatus of a poetical mind of high order, and he does not scruple to rank Böhme with the master minds who have taken their theme from the unseen world, Dante, Milton, and Klopstock. Hallam can see in them nothing better than the incoherence of madness [Lit. M. A. III. iii. 20].

J. Arndt's mysticism was of a very different stamp. It meant in him thoroughly spiritual religion. He was a Lutheran preacher in Anhalt, and when that province adopted Calvinism, he resigned his post rather than give up baptismal exorcism, which since the time of Luther had been a badge of the party. He died A.D. 1621. His principal works are the four books of True Christianity, and his devotional collection, the Paradise of Christian Virtues. They maintain their high character, and are still used in many households throughout Germany. But they encountered a vehement opposition when they first appeared, and more especially from Osiander the younger, who managed to extract from them eight several heresies : the main gravamen being, that Arndt threw a slight on school learning by his advocacy of practical piety and of such "popish" mystics as Thomas à Kempis and Tauler. Moreover, by his doctrine of the illumination and indwelling of the Holy Spirit, he trenchanted upon the Lutheran theory of justification by faith alone, and the orthodox doctrine of grace.

J. Gerhard's Meditationes Sacre [A.D. 1606], his Schola Pietatis and Postils, are works of a similar tone of thought to Arndt's, but they met with the same reception at first ; as Gerhard said, "If any writer upholds pious practical Christianity, and aims at something higher than mere theological learning, he is straightway branded as a Rosicrucian or Weigelian."

J. Val. Andrea, grandson of Jacob Andrea, who took a prominent part in setting up the Lutheran Formula of Concord, was of the same school. In his younger years he accepted the Rosicrucian¹ mystery [A.D. 1602], but more in jest than earnest. His later writings [A.D. 1617-1619], are written in a spirit of mystical piety. His endeavour evidently was to expose and put down the religious and political follies of the age, and to uphold what he deemed to be spiritual Christianity. But he wrote in the spirit of Lucian ; and it is often difficult to see where irony ends and earnest principle begins. His more liberal acceptance of the ancestral Formula of Concord made him many enemies among the high orthodox Lutherans. The Pietist Spener said of him, "If I could raise any from the dead for the good of the Church it should be Valentine Andrea." It was owing to Arndt's influence that the mocking, scoffing spirit that seemed natural to Andrea was replaced with something higher and worthier of a Christian man.

Enough has now been said to shew that the Theology of the true Mystics exhibits two distinct phases ; a side towards earth on which the legend of the medal is obscure and without meaning ; and an obverse side bright with the light of heaven ; union with the Eternal through sacramental grace is its impress of truth ; and, flowing from that grace, a loving exercise of the great duties of Christian life. It is closely allied with QUIETISM. A very different kind, and yet an essential form of Mysticism, is that avowed by Schlegel ; one closely similar to the rhapsodical notions of Plotinus, when he says that whereas human consciousness, in which subject and object are inseparably blended together in idea, cannot form to itself a notion of the Absolute, which is unity, still an adequate idea of the Absolute may be gained by the contemplation or intuitive faculty, independently of thought or consciousness ; it is a rapid illumination, a sudden rapture, too fleeting for analysis, for it eludes reflection and baffles consciousness. Reflection is in fact its death. In this mystical condition of the mind all distinction between subject and object vanishes. There is no longer the Deity on the one hand, the soul on the other. The soul identifies itself with the Deity. It is on this side that Mysticism passes into Pantheism.

NAASSIANS. [OPHITES.]

NATURALISTS. This name, which has now become nearly obsolete in a theological or philosophical sense, has been used to designate two sections of the antichristian school which rejects belief in supernatural causes or operations. [1] The name has been mostly used by German writers for those who identify God with nature, but who are now more generally known as Pantheists. [2] By English writers it is generally taken as signifying those who consider natural religion to be sufficient for man's guidance and happiness without any supernatural revelation. But these latter may be subdivided also into two classes; the first of which has received the name of "philosophical naturalists," rejecting altogether belief in revelation, the second, that of "theological naturalists," who accept revelation as containing truth, but as being at the best only a republication of natural religion, and so unnecessary.

The name is rarely found in works written later than the seventeenth century, when it was used by Kant in Germany and by Boyle in England; and the school formerly known as Naturalists are now called PANTHEISTS and RATIONALISTS.

NAZARÆANS. A Jewish sect mentioned under this name only by Epiphanius [Hær. xviii.]. The name is probably derived from Netsir, a branch (Epiphanius writes it also Nasaræans, and Nassaræans), and, if we are right in identifying this sect with the Genistæ, signifies branches of the true stock. The sect aimed at a patriarchal religion in place of a Mosaic Judaism. They canonized the patriarchs, and did not exclude Moses and Joshua from that society; they allowed that a law was given to Moses, but asserted that law to have been lost, and the Pentateuch to be corrupt or supposititious. They practised circumcision, kept the Sabbath and the Jewish festivals, rejected the sacrifice of animals, and ate no flesh. It follows from this that they rejected the history of Genesis as well as the laws of Moses; but whether they professed to found their doctrine on tradition or on a new revelation is not told. They were found in Galaaditis, Basanitis, and other parts beyond Jordan.

NAZARENES. Jewish Christians who continued to observe the law of Moses after the mother Church of Jerusalem had abandoned it.

The sect was the Pella branch of the Jerusalem Church [JUDAIZERS], which did not join in the change made upon the appointment of Marcus, the first Jerusalem bishop of the uncircumcision. The Nazarenes are not named by the earlier historians and Fathers of the Church; Irenæus, Hippolytus, Tertullian, Origen, Clement, and Eusebius being silent regarding them: and the accounts and notices which we have of them are by Epiphanius, Augustine, Theodoret, Philaster, Jerome, and Isidore.

I. Epiphanius states that the Nazarenes flourished principally in Bercea, in Cœle-Syria, in Decapolis at Pella, and in Basanitis; and that from hence, after the retreat from Jerusalem, the sect had its beginning. Epiphanius adds that he could not ascertain the date of the sect as compared with the Simonians, Cerinthians and others, a statement which points to a sect not formed by one leader whose date could be ascertained, but to a party gradually separating from the Church. Jerome speaks [Catal. Scriptt. Eccl., Matthæus] of the Nazarenes who dwell at Bercea, using St. Matthew's Hebrew Gospel, and this implies an early formation of the party. Epiphanius, in his prefatory index, defines the Nazarenes as confessing Jesus to be Christ and the Son of God, but as living in all things according to the law. And Augustine [Hæres. ix.] describes them as confessing Christ to be the Son of God, but observing the law, which Christians are taught to keep not carnally but spiritually.

From all this it is clear that the Nazarenes were Jewish Christians, forming themselves into a party in Pella and its neighbourhood after the retreat from Jerusalem, and passing by degrees into a distinct sect. But there were two classes of Jewish Christians, the one apostolic and orthodox, who did not impose the observance of the law as necessary to salvation, who acknowledged the mission of St. Paul and recognised the communion of the Gentiles; the other Pharisaic and sectarian, who maintained the universal obligation of the law, and denounced St. Paul as a transgressor. In inquiring to which of these two classes the Nazarenes belonged, it must be noticed, in the first place, that the community at Pella was composed of those converts who joined the Church of Jerusalem in her exile, of those Hellenist fugitives whose national feeling and love of their city was not so strong as in the native Jews, and of those native Jews who had formed connections in their new residence which overpowered their national feeling. It was a community predisposed to accept in the spirit as well as the letter the decree of the Council of Jerusalem. In the next place, the Ebionites and the Nazarenes are contrasted. But it was the Ebionites who held the universal obligation of the law. [EBIONITES.] When therefore we read in Jerome [in Is. i. t. 3, p. 4, ed. 1616], "Audiant Ebionæi, qui post passionem abolitam legem putant esse servandam. Audiant Ebionitarum socii, qui Judæis tantum, et de stirpe Israelitici generis hæc custodienda decernunt," it can hardly be doubted that the "Ebionitarum socii" are the Nazarenes.

This sect is thus identified as, in its origin at least, a branch of the orthodox Church of Jerusalem. The Church of Jerusalem had been under the Apostles of the Circumcision; and at the time of the retreat to Pella had "a literature consisting on the one hand of most of the New Testament, except the Gospel of St. John, and on the other of much studied of old Halachah and Hag-gadah—law and poetic fancy;" [DICT. OF THEOL. s. v.] "with rites wherein Jewish and Christian practices are still found side by side, circumcision and baptism, hallowing of the Sabbath and of the Lord's day, Passover perhaps, and Eucharist, —these are the surroundings amid which we place" the sect of the Nazarenes in its origin. [Sinker, Testamenta XII. Patriarcharum, Camb. 1869, p. 124.]

This quotation, the words of which were used with reference to the author of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, leads us to a remarkable book which proceeded from the school, and probably from the very sect under consideration. This book, and the writings of the Ebionite school, have been much studied of late; and in the hands of German scholars have thrown considerable light on the history of the early Church. In noticing it as an example of the theology of the Nazarenes, it must be remembered that we are entirely ignorant of its author, of the position he held in the Judæo-Christian Church, and of the degree of acceptance the book met with. In short, we are not entitled to assume that it is a representative book. But it is known from other authority that the author was of the Nazarene school, and we are thus entitled to gather from his book the broad and distinctive characters of the school. Finer shades of doctrine, and doctrines that are not distinctive, must be referred to the standard formed by the teaching of the Apostles as supervening upon the tenets of the Jewish Church.

Lardner's summary of the writer's doctrine may be first given: "The writer speaks of the Nativity of Christ, the meekness and unblameableness of His life, His Crucifixion at the instigation of the Jewish priests, the wonderful concomitants of His Death, His Resurrection and Ascension. He represents the character of the Messiah as God and Man, the Most High God with men, eating and drinking with them, the Saviour of the world, of the Gentiles and Israel, as eternal High-Priest and King. He likewise speaks of the effusion of the Holy Spirit upon the Messiah, attended with a voice from heaven; His unrighteous treatment by the Jews; and their desolations and the destruction of the Temple upon that account; the call of the Gentiles; the illuminating them generally with new light; the effusion of the Spirit upon believers, but especially, and in a more abundant measure, upon the Gentiles. Here little notice is taken of our Lord's miracles; however, he speaks of the Messiah as a 'Man who renews the law in the power of the Most High;' in which expressions the working of miracles seems to be implied. Here are also passages which seem to contain allusions to the Gospels of St. Matthew, St. Luke, and St. John, the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistle to the Ephesians, First to the Thessalonians, First to Timothy, the Epistle to the Hebrews, the First Epistle of St. John, and the Book of the Revelation. And, as far as was consistent with his assumed character, the author declares the canonical authority of the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles of St. Paul" [Lardner's Credibility, etc. ii. 363].

Here the recognition of St. John's Gospel and Epistles, and of St. Paul's Epistles, shews that Nazarenes, at the later period of this book, were not without the teaching of full Catholic Christianity. The question will arise again, with regard to a still later period, "What was Nazarene doctrine respecting the Divinity of our Lord?" At the period we have now before us, it is just to the Nazarenes, as Jewish Christians, to assimilate their confession, that Jesus is Christ and the Son of God, to St. Peter's confession,¹ without attributing to them any limited meanings of the term, such as were devised at a later time. The passages may be seen quoted and commented in the third chapter of Sinker's work, in which Dörner's remark is quoted, "that the words," from Levi 18, "imply that the relation of Christ to the Father is as close as is that of a human son to his father."²

Our Lord's birth of a Virgin is referred to in Josh. 19. His pre-existence in Dan. 6, Sim. 6. On these points we may believe the Nazarenes to have been orthodox. The Ethics of the Testaments are sufficiently characterized in the remark, "that the view held as to the law of God is the same which we find in St. James' Epistle, the old Mosaic law completed and developed by Christ, and that thus the author recognises the moral bearing of Christianity, not as a contrast, but as a continuation of the old religion" [Sinker's Testam. XII. Patriarch. 121].

² See Grabe's Testimonia pro Deitate Christi adducta ex Testamentis XII. Patr. in Annot. on Bull's Defensio Fid. Nic., Bull's Works, Burton's ed. v. 176.

The subject of priesthood, the priesthood of our Lord primarily, of the ministers of the Gospel secondarily, requires a more distinct notice. Judah (sect. 21) is made to say, "God gave Levi the priesthood, to me the kingdom; and subjected the kingdom to the priesthood. To me He gave things of earth, to him things of heaven. As heaven surpasses earth, so God's priesthood surpasses an earthly kingdom." The Testaments represent our Lord as combining in Himself the offices of High-Priest and of King, and state consequently that He is to spring from the tribe of Levi as well as from the tribe of Judah [Sim. 7; Dan 5]. This identifies, or at least tends to identify our Lord's Priesthood with the priesthood of Aaron, contrary to the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

This opinion of the descent of the Blessed Virgin Mary from both Judah and Levi might doubtless be held by men of piety and Catholicity, who might further repudiate the inference to which it seems naturally to lead; but, on the other hand, it is certain that the opinion, made to rest, as it must be, upon much legendary matter, would connect itself with heresy more readily than the historical Davidic genealogy.¹ It would suit the purpose of those who denied that the Word was made Flesh to represent the genealogy as a myth setting forth a transmission of office. This would be more complete if it set forth a transmission of the priesthood as well as of the royalty of our Lord. The Gnostics were all of them Docetæ [Iren. iii. 11], and there is nothing unreasonable in the supposition that Docetic teachers in later times laid hold of this opinion, if it were current in the community of the Nazarenes, and endeavoured through it to instil their heresy. In which case we should have a reason for the disquisition regarding the priesthood and the royalty, with which Epiphanius introduces his account of the Nazarenes, the relevancy of which is otherwise not very clear.

The opinions of the author of the Testaments regarding the ministry of the Church are stated clearly in the Testament of Levi. In sect. 3 the universe in the times of the Gospel is described as of seven spheres.² Three represent the outer world, the world of unbelievers, the third containing the encampments of the ministers of retribution on the ungodly. The fourth, fifth, and sixth represent the Church, taking the word church in its widest sense; the fourth being the sphere of the saints, the fifth of the ministry, the sixth of the ministering angels of intercourse. The fifth is occupied by angels of the Face of God.³ They minister and make atonement before the Lord for all the ignorances (ἀγνοίας) of the just. They offer to the Lord the reasonable service of a sweet-smelling savour, and an unbloody offering. Again, in sect. 8, after the robing of Levi, it is said that Levi's offspring shall be divided into three ranks of office. Two appear to belong to the body of Levites, and to the Aaronic priesthood; the third clearly belongs to the Christian ministry. For the third possesses a new name: a King arises from Judah, and creates a new priesthood, which is κατὰ τὸν τύπον τῶν ἑθνῶν, εἰς πάντα τὰ ἔθνη. The Ethnic type is the priesthood of Melchisedek. A passage in Theophilus of Antioch makes this designation easier. "Melchisedek was the first priest of all the priests of the Most High God. From his time priests were found in all the earth" [To Autol. ii. cap. 31]. This new priesthood shall set in order the table of the Lord, and of it shall be priests, judges, and scribes, priests, i.e. in ministering, judges in discipline, scribes in teaching. The only objection which can be made to this description is that the Christian ministry is made to descend from Levi. If the newness of their priesthood were lost sight of, the Christian ministry would be at once identified with the Aaronic priesthood. From this affiliation of the ministers of the Gospel to Levi we are inclined to contend, supposing that the Testaments justly represent the belief of the Jewish Christians, that the lower or spurious sacerdotalism, which has found place in the Church, is of Judaic, not of Gentile, origin. That the Hebrews found a difficulty in appreciating the true import of the history of Melchisedek is clear from the Epistle to the Hebrews. A sense of this difficulty may have led the author of the Testaments to refrain from an explicit mention of Melchisedek. Of another writer of this school, Aristo of Pella, we have very short fragments [Routh, Rel. i. pp. 93-97]. One fragment is important. Aristo speaks of Jesus as the Son of God, the Creator of the world. [See Westcott, On the Canon, pp. 105-107; and Professor Lightfoot, St. Paul and the Three, n. 2, p. 294.]

II. It may next be inquired whether the Nazarenes in later times fell into heresy. Augustine accuses them only of Judaizing [Aug. de Hæres. ix., contr. Faust. xix. 4, contr. Crescon. I. xxxi. 36, Epist. ad Hieron. lxxxii., ii. 16, de Bapt. contr. Donat. vii. 1]. Epiphanius having briefly defined them in the prefatory index as Judaizers, begins in the work itself [Hæres. xxix.] with stating that they hold the same opinions as the Cerinthians, but in his seventh chapter he professes his inability to say whether they did or did not hold Cerinthian doctrine regarding our Lord. This quite sets aside his previous statement, which may be referred to his well-known proneness to make charges of heresy. In his Commentary on Isaiah Jerome calls the Nazarenes the Hebrews that believed in Christ [Hieron. in Isa. cap. ix. t. 3, p. 33, ed. 1616], giving the Nazarene explanation of the prophecy, that Christ's doctrine delivered the land of Zebulon and Naphtali from . . . Jewish traditions, that by St. Paul's preaching the Gospel shone among the Gentiles, and at length the whole world saw the clear light of the Gospel. [See also ad August. Ep. 89, t. ii. p. 266, ed. 1616.] Accordingly Lardner¹ writes: "It might easily be shewn that the Nazarene Christians did not reject St. John's Gospel, nor hold any principles that oblige them to reject or dislike it" [Lardner's Jewish Testimonies, cap. i. vol. vi. p. 387, Kippis' ed. 1861]. On the other hand, Theodoret [de Hær. fab. ii. 2] accuses the Nazarenes of denying our Lord's divinity; but the later authority of Theodoret cannot outweigh the mass of earlier testimony in their favour.²

III. Adopting then the conclusion that the Nazarenes retained their orthodox creed, it remains to be asked whether they retained their position in the Church, or whether, while free from heretical error, they were yet sectarian. There is no historical information to enable us to answer this question; but there does not appear to be any sufficient reason why the Church of Jerusalem, when it renounced Judaism, should exclude the Church of Pella from communion simply for its retention of national customs; and certainly there was no reason why the Church of Pella should renounce communion with Jerusalem. The general observance for some centuries of the decree of the Council of Jerusalem [JUDAIZERS], enforcing on Gentiles abstinence from things strangled and from blood, implied also (it may be fairly argued) a liberty to the Jews to continue in the observance of their national law; while canons intended to prevent Gentile Churches from adopting Jewish customs do not apply to the Nazarenes. On the other hand the strong condemnations of the Nazarenes as heretics, by Epiphanius and Augustine, can be fully explained only on the supposition that the Nazarenes had become the authors of a schism by renouncing communion with the Church. Augustine states in several places that the Nazarenes were called by some Symmachians.

NECESSITARIANS. This term is used [1] in a wide sense as the name of those who believe in Fatalism, or that everything happens according to fixed laws which cannot be changed by the will of God or the will of man; and [2] in a more restricted sense for those who believe that man's will is not free to control his actions, but that all the latter proceed necessarily and inevitably from the direction given to them by the will of his Creator.

These two classes of Necessitarians are, however, closely allied with each other, and if the opinion of the second class is carried to its logical terminus, it will be found not really to differ from the simple Fatalism of the first. Thus the Stoics, who professed to allow free will to man, although all beyond the will of man was Fate, and the Mahometans, who deny all free will to man, and yet speak habitually of the will of God, although they represent two phases of fatalism, do in reality represent the same general principle; the substitution of inevitable law in a higher or a lower portion of that sphere of intelligence, where the effects of will in one region are manifestly interwoven with its effects in the other, and the free will of man exhibited as the image of the free will of God.

The school of modern Necessitarians takes its origin from HOBBS, the founder of the English Deists, and one whose influence extended far beyond his country or his age. "Liberty and necessity," he writes, "are consistent. As in the water, that hath not only liberty but a necessity of descending in the channel, so likewise, in the actions which men voluntarily do, which, because they proceed from their will, proceed from liberty; and yet, because every act of man's will, and every desire and inclination, proceedeth from some cause, and that from another cause, in a continual chain (whose first link is in the hand of God, the first of all causes) proceed from necessity. So that to him that could see the connection of those causes, the necessity of all men's voluntary actions would appear manifest. And therefore God, that seeth and disposeth all things, seeth also that the liberty of man, in doing what he will, is accompanied with the necessity of doing that which God will, and no more nor less. For though men may do many things which God does not command, nor is therefore the author of them, yet they can have no passion, will, or appetite to anything of which appetite God's will is not the cause. And did not His will assume the necessity of man's will, and consequently of all that on man's will dependeth, the liberty of men would be a contradiction and impediment to the Omnipotence and liberty of God." [Hobbes' Leviathan, 108.]

Contemporary with Hobbes was SPINOZA, whose broad Materialism admitted no other view respecting nature and the mind than that of mechanical law. Against this extreme Materialism Leibnitz opposed himself with considerable vigour, but in the theory of Leibnitz the whole universe was as much a machine as in the theory of Spinoza, the only difference being that the one admitted an original moving Divine Power, while the other made this power a part of the machine itself. Hence in the spiritual machine which Leibnitz called mind, the freedom of the will of man was entirely rejected, and the freedom of the will of God was restricted to the imposition of the original law out of which human actions developed themselves from the original spiritual monad. [LEIBNITZ.] According to him, therefore, no event that ever happened in general history or in individual action could ever have taken place otherwise than it did. This theory of Necessity pervades the scattered writings of Leibnitz, but it was specially developed in his Essais de Théodicée sur la bonté de Dieu, la liberté de l'homme, et l'origine du mal, which were published in the year 1710. Leibnitz was met by an able antagonist in Dr. John Clarke, Dean of Salisbury, with whom he was in correspondence at the time of his death.

A little later Dr. Clarke met with another opponent in Anthony Collins, the founder of the FREETHINKERS, who printed a Philosophical Inquiry into Human Liberty, in which he maintained the doctrine of Necessity in its extreme form as regards the will of man, and although he was himself as nearly an Atheist as any one probably can be, asserted with the greatest effrontery that the doctrine of the freedom of the will led to Atheism. Collins argues for Necessity on five grounds. [1] Our experience gives us a consciousness that our actions are not controllable by our will, but by an inevitable force external to ourselves. [2] Liberty is impossible, for all man's actions have a beginning, and "whatever has a beginning must have a cause; and every cause is a necessary cause. If anything can have a beginning which has no cause, then nothing can produce something. And if nothing can produce something, then the world might have had a beginning without a cause; which is an absurdity not only charged on Atheists, but is a real absurdity in itself. . . . Liberty, therefore, or a power to act or not to act, to do this or another thing under the same causes, is an impossibility and atheistical." [3] The Divine Prescience takes in from the beginning the particular actions of all men, and therefore they are foreordained: in stating which argument the writer forgets that God's own actions also are foreseen, and that if His Prescience of men's actions takes away their freedom, so also is His own freedom of will and act destroyed by the same prescience. [4] The nature and use of rewards and punishments. [5] The nature of morality. His arguments were all answered effectively in the Boyle Lectures of Dr. Clarke for 1720 and 1721, on the Origin of Evil.

The writings of Collins, superficial as they are, much affected the generation in which he lived. He was the intimate friend of Locke, and the latter seems to have paid much deference to his opinions. Locke was also trained in the school of Hobbes, and although in words he maintained the free agency of man, yet deference for the opinions of his predecessor and his contemporary led him to make such concessions to their theories that Priestley not unjustly ranks him among those who really adopted the doctrine of Necessity while verbally repudiating it. This is especially evident in Locke's doctrine of Power: and the general influence of Collins on the thought of the day is indicated by two lines in Pope's Essay on Man:—

"The general order since the whole began Is kept in Nature and is kept in Man."

But modern Necessitarians found their most effective champion in Priestley [A.D. 1733-1804], who took up the Materialistic theories of Spinoza, and deduced from them their logical consequence of a mechanical, which he called a "philosophical," necessity. This he worked out in a treatise entitled The Doctrine of Philosophical Necessity Illustrated, which was published in the year 1777, in which he argued out the main doctrines of Christianity on the groundwork of the theory that whenever the human mind is in a particular state, and under the influence of particular circumstances, it will always act uniformly, as the same weight will always act in the same manner upon the balance: and that thus man can have no such liberty as is implied in the doctrine of free will, any more than the weight or the balance have power to change their mode of action and its results. Such a theory destroys at once all moral responsibility, makes prayer useless, and abolishes the idea of future reward and punishment.

About the same time the writings of an American divine, which were of a more popular character than those of Priestley, began to be known in England, and helped to spread the doctrine of Necessity among Socinians without and within the Church. This writer was Jonathan Edwards, President of Princeton College [A.D. 1703-1758], who, towards the close of his life, had printed two works, entitled An Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will, and on The Doctrine of Original Sin.

Since Priestley there has been no writer of distinction among those who have maintained the doctrine of Necessity, but it has been extensively held by the Unitarians and the Rationalists. [Copleton's Inquiry into Necessity, etc.]

NEOLOGIANS. [RATIONALISTS.]

NEONOMIANS. A controversial name given to their opponents by the CRISPITES. A Neonomian is defined by one of their writers as "One that asserts the Old Law is abolished, and therein is a superlative Antinomian, but pleads for a New Law, and justification by the works of it, and therefore is a Neonomian." [Chauncy's Neonomianism Unmasked, 1692.]

NEO-PLATONISTS. It will be the object of this article to set forth—[I.] The history; and [II.] The principles of Neo-Platonism, as affecting Christian thought.

[I.] It has exercised a very decided influence on intellectual Christianity in ancient, mediæval and modern times. It has had its positive and negative side, an attracting as well as a repelling pole. It took its rise at Alexandria. This important city and centre of civilization having been built by Alexander, was colonized by the representatives of every quarter of the globe—Macedonians, Greeks, Romans, Jews, Syrians, and Persians. The religious and philosophical opinions of this motley population were fused together in the various schools which had a common centre in the Museum. An age of philosophic scepticism, in the century preceding and in the first two hundred years of Christianity, had thrown a doubt upon every existing intellectual system; but a neutral condition of doubt is alien to the mind of man, and is sooner or later displaced by positive teaching. Doubt, as the first principle of Descartes, leads to the definite axiom, "Cogito ergo sum;" and Pyrrhonism was gradually displaced by a syncretic fusion of conflicting elements, which were reduced into system at Alexandria. Points of agreement were noted between the great masters of Grecian thought; Truth was no longer held to be confined to any one school; Chaldaean lore, worked into cabalistic form by the learned Jew, Zoroastrian theosophy, Egyptian symbolism, and the reasonings of the Indian Gymnosoph, founded upon theories reaching back to the cradle of the human race, were each and all admitted to a co-ordinate respect with the more familiar Platonic and Pythagorean teaching. The Amshaspands and Ferouers of the Persian system, forming an intermediate world of intelligence between the soul of Man and the Infinite ONE, were seen to have points of analogy with Greek mythology; and the fables of the poets were treated as allegories—pregnant with meaning, and veiling important truths from the gaze of the vulgar. The teaching of Christian truth, also, was too remarkable as a moral restorative to be neglected; and one of the greatest perils to Christianity was the risk of having the pure doctrines of Christ and His Apostles confounded with hybrid counterfeits. Philosophy at Alexandria, thus variously tintured, became more closely identified with Oriental theosophy; and it gained from it a religious element in mysticism, which may have facilitated in the end the reception of Christian truth; but in its earlier stages it stood in complete antagonism to the Cross of Christ. This syncretic fusion at first gave rise to various phases of Gnosticism, in which the Oriental theory of emanations formed a conspicuous feature; but these outrageous absurdities had no charm for the philosophic mind, though it accepted the eclecticism on which they were based. Among Christian teachers, Clement of Alexandria openly professed the eclectic scheme, afterwards known as Neo-Platonism. "By philosophy," he says, "I mean not Stoic, Platonic, Epicurean, or Peripatetic theories, but all sound teaching of the collective schools, all precepts of virtue that have connection with religious knowledge. This eclectic aggregate, πάν τὸ ἐκλεκτικόν, I call philosophy" [Strom. i. 7]. Philo, contemporary at Alexandria with St. Mark, claimed for his race priority of civilization and science, while he gave to his Shemitic notions an Hellenic colouring. Plutarch, advancing the same claim in favour of Greece, had no prejudices as regards barbarian tones of thought, but assimilated them eclectically with analogous theories of Plato and Pythagoras. Apuleius, however, was the most completely representative man of the early Neo-Platonic school. Deeply read in Greek and Roman literature; at once a scholar, naturalist, and philosopher; versed in the resources of dialectics, and in the special pleading of forensic practice; enlightened, and at the same time superstitious; sceptical and credulous; initiated in every mystery; disciple of every school; he did more than any other votary of the philosophy of the period to found the new school of eclectic Neo-Platonism. Thus, in the second century, the disengaged elements of newly-awakened thought were reduced to system, and the first weak attempt of Potamo received a rapid development at the commencement of the next century under Ammonius Saccas, the sack porter. His principal aim was to harmonize the theories of Plato and Aristotle, whose followers had already begun to tamper with the master's text. Numenius, apparently of Hebrew extraction, succeeded him, and cast the Mosaic account into the crucible, as another element for amalgamation, saying that Plato was only an Atticizing Moses. Longinus followed, and then Plotinus consolidated the new school of interpolated Platonism. Ammonius had been his only guide and instructor. From Longinus he gained nothing, philology rather than philosophy having been his study.

The transcendental teaching of Plato with respect to the Deity was greatly exaggerated by Plotinus. That which men term Deity, he said, is the negation of every conceivable idea. It has neither quality nor quantity; is neither intellect nor soul, is neither motive nor quiescent; uniform, yet unformed; pure Being, but without the accidents of being; we can affirm and deny nothing, he said, with respect to the Deity; the soul can only realize its mode of affection towards the Absolute by ecstatic progression from its own centre. No appellative befits the One, the First, the Best: not even Thought, for so there should be the antinomy of discrimination. All that we know is, that a power external to Nature underlies all other existence which it thereby upholds. From this school has proceeded the negative notion of the Deity, which was adopted in due course by Dionysius the so-called Areopagite [MYSTICS], J. Scotus Erigena, and in later days by Hegel and his school. The emanational theory, also, of Plotinus gave rise to the celestial Hierarchy of Dionysius. The overflowing redundancy of the First Principle evolves the Second, yet without change or loss of glory; as the sun remains unchanged, though an infinity of rays for ever speed from its substance. This Second Principle is Intellect, the express image of the Primeval First, and from whence, equally without change, the Soul of all Nature proceeds. Neo-Platonism is only semi-Christianized; and the intermediate divinities and spirits of Proclus are the angelic series of Dionysius. The two systems, however, differ in this, that the emanation theory of Dionysius was purely spiritual [Ep. viii. 2, Demophilo Monacho]. That of the former, as in the Gnostic scheme, issued in the plastic principle of the material world.

A few words will suffice for the other names of authority in the Neo-Platonic school. Porphyry [Malchion, b. at Tyre A.D. 232—d. at Rome A.D. 304], and Jamblichus, a Coele-Syrian [A.D. 363], at Alexandria, exhibited the Plotinian theory in a more popular form, giving an allegorical application to Hellenic myths. Porphyry was the bitter enemy of Christianity, allowing Christ to have been a pattern of the highest virtue, but imputing to His followers thorough delusion [Aug. Civ. Dei, xix. 23]. He attacked Scripture from every point of view, more especially denying the genuineness of the Book of Daniel. He was an enthusiast perhaps rather than an impostor, for if, like the theurgical juggler Jamblichus, he professed to prepare himself for communion with the Deity by familiar converse with subordinate demons, he actually macerated the body with rigid asceticism [de Abstin.]. Extreme contempt and neglect for the body, as the prison-house of the divine spirit, was always a constituent element in the teaching of this school. Julian the Apostate did his utmost to support Neo-Platonism by restoring heathen worship. He rebuilt the temples and heaped up hecatombs. But the great Pan was dead. The system at once collapsed, and in revenge he became persecutor. A more systematic arrangement of Plotinian subtlety was made by Proclus [A.D. 450] giving to Neo-Platonism a dialectical and scientific character that commended it to the schoolmen.

Earlier in the same century Hypatia was head of the school at Alexandria; of rare beauty, and spotless purity of character, but a determined foe of Christianity. Her mission she considered to be the reconciliation of Plato and Aristotle. It has been said that Cyril, Patriarch of Alexandria, caused her death through jealousy of her popularity; but it is referable rather to the reader named Peter, who thus revenged the death of a monk killed by a mob of fanatics. At the head of a body of monks Peter dragged his victim into the church, where she was stoned to death, and her mangled limbs were afterwards burned in public by the people.

Notwithstanding the Neo-Platonic hatred for Christianity, its theory of the divine origin of the soul, and its lofty aspiration, always proved attractive to the more philosophical sons of the Church. Origen was a hearer and an admirer of Ammonius Saccas. Clement was eminently eclectic. Augustine was thoroughly imbued with one phase at least of the Plotinian teaching.¹ Basil, Theodoret, Synesius, all made free use of Plotinus. While in the writings of Pseudo-Dionysius Neo-Platonic opinion gained a weight that has told sensibly upon the more fervid spirits of the Church, Neo-Platonism maintained an uneven contest with Christianity till the schools of philosophy were finally closed by Justinian, A.D. 519. Its votaries then found a temporary asylum at the court of Chosroes, but it had finally died out before the middle of the century. Neo-Platonism had a firm hold upon the minds of learned men about the time of the Reformation, Florence being its stronghold, and Ficinus and Picus Mirandola being its exponents, when courtiers, warriors, statesmen, and poets were Neo-Platonists. There is much in the Pantheistic philosophy of modern days that altogether harmonizes with the teaching of the Neo-Platonic school, as will be shewn in its proper place.

[II.] Neo-Platonism is thus seen to have been a combination of mysticism and eclecticism; and hence it had a transitional character: its eclecticism connected it with the various intellectual phases of the past; its mysticism gave a starting-point to religious theories of the future. Its main deficiency, until the time of Proclus, was a total absence of critical and scientific principles. At Alexandria it chiefly occupied itself with the nature of the Deity. It fused together a conception of the active disponent Deity of the Timæus with the metaphysical Deity absorbed in the contemplation of his own perfections, and the Absolute Unity of the Eleatic School. An inactive Deity was seen only to have an hypothetical existence, yet unmoved Intelligence must itself be superior to all movement. The subtle distinction was acknowledged of a Perfect Essence, apart from every other being, shrouded in impenetrable mystery, wholly inaccessible to reason, and infinitely exalted far above the most simple and ineffable of universal principles. The antinomies of these reasonings on the Divine nature were manifest: Neo-Platonism professed to resolve them. First, it is impossible to conceive this Absolute Unity superior to Essence—Ineffable, and, therefore, relatively to any known mode, Non-Existent. Secondly, the affirmation of an Eleatic Unity is the negation of Divine Essence; but to declare with Plato and Aristotle that God is the Primary Intelligence, is to make God one with Essence, since Intelligence is identical with Essence. And further, since movement is inconsistent with Infinite Perfection, Divine Intelligence must be itself unmoved; although it is affirmed, per contra, that the Deity, without loss of perfection, is the active principle of all movement. Hence, the Neo-Platonic theory made a distinction in the nature of the Deity, without touching the Divine Unity, after the manner of those Oriental trinities that have very possibly descended as a faint echo of the faith of humanity from the very cradle of the race. Thus it recognised a Divine Unity in the Absolute; Intelligence or Self-Existent Essence; and Soul, as the efficient cause of all Will, Mind, and Power. Reason, it was conceded, cannot fathom or declare the Divine Nature. But it is brought home to the soul and spirit of man, and made one with his own self-consciousness, by another principle than that of reason—by an ecstatic union with the Deity; whereby the spirit of man travels, as it were, beyond itself, and, apart from all sublunary matters, becomes one with its sublime object. The Absolute is thus known independently of reason, and by abstract intuition; but this ecstatic mean stands in no antagonism with reason: it is rather reason in its highest and most perfect condition, as involving oneness with Absolute Truth, whereby Thought and its object are one.

Further, this mysterious power of the Soul shews the non-permanence of individual existence, since by ecstasis self goes forth from and returns again to its own being. Man in this is a microcosmic counterpart of the universe. The whole world of creation is an aggregate of phenomena distinct from God, and yet resolvable again into His nature. They emanate from Him, and yet they have their immanence in His Being. Two currents are ever in flux and ebb throughout the universe, productive and absorbent of life, which they at the same time serve to interpret. The one is an emanative series, whose progression is from unity to multiplicity, from the perfect to the imperfect; the other is the law of re-absorption, whereby all being returns to its source, so that it be not defiled in its exodus, and be deemed worthy to re-enter into the bosom of the Parent of all. The Divine Being is that continued systole and diastole, which is life. These notions, in their several elements, were confessedly reproduced in Christian mysticism, and in the pantheism of subsequent intellectual systems. As a corollary, also, extreme contempt and neglect of the body, the prison-house of the soul, became a necessary principle of philosophy.

The conditions whereby the visible world thus proceeds forth from the Divine Unity are determined by matter. This is wholly a negative quantity, to speak algebraically,—without form, without substance or attribute, a nonentity, which can only become an object of thought as an abstract privation of form and individual property, a wholly unintelligible quiddity. As the antagonism of the Eternal Good, it is the matrix of evil, τὸ πρῶτος κακόν. The One, through the mundane soul, having His issue in this abstract negation, fills the material world with life and being, which, howbeit inseparably combined with evil, thence becomes the counterpart of the ideal forms of Intellect. There is a manifest analogy between this theory and Gnostic notions; only whereas these early heretics wholly vilified matter and everything material as inherently and entirely evil, of which the Demiurge was the active principle, the Neo-Platonist, with a higher religious tact, commended it as exhibiting the providential wisdom of the Deity, and as giving scope to the good that still abounds in the world. This providential wisdom is not merely care and order, but it is the very law of the universe, binding everything together in harmonious action, the reflex image of the Soul that quickens all, and creates in all a yearning and tendency to revert to the Unity from whence it sped. If better exists, so then must the worse, and evil in this system has its destined part to play as the relative shadow of good. All existence is as a tree of life: the One Sole Being is as the root; Intellect as the stem that contains within itself the germ of an endless sequence of results; the Soul is as the branches breaking forth into a rich profusion of leaf and flower and fruit. The latent pantheism of such a system cannot escape detection.

NEPOS. An Egyptian bishop of the third century, whose teaching respecting the Millennium made a temporary schism in the Church of Alexandria. He himself is spoken of with great respect and affection by Dionysius, the bishop of that see; who, calling together to Arsinoë the clergy and laity who had been led away by a priest named Coracion [A.D. 255], expounded to them the true apocalyptic teaching of St. John for three days together, and persuaded them, including Coracion, to retract their opinions and return to the communion of his see. The Book of Nepos, on which the Chiliastic opinions of his followers were grounded, was entitled Ἐλεγχος τῶν ἀλληγορησάντων, a refutation of the Allegorists, but it has not been preserved. From Theodoret's notice of the work it appears to have been of a Judaizing character [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 24; Theod. Hæret. fab. iii. 6].

Timotheus Presbyter speaks of a sect as "Nepotiani a Nepote Elcesæo," but gives no particulars [Timoth. Presb. Hæret. vi.].

NESTORIANS. These heretics derived their name from Nestorius, Patriarch of Constantinople [A.D. 428]. Like many other heresies this was in part a reaction against previous heresies. The confusion of the two Natures in Christ by the Apollinarians had caused others to insist so strongly on His Human Nature as to tend to a separation of Persons in Him. This is what constitutes the Nestorian heresy, the denial of what is called in theology the Hypostatic Union. In the history of the controversy this main point is frequently obscured; and Nestorius himself, as well as his followers, did as other heretics have done, so wrapped up their doctrine in verbiage as to make it uncertain what they really meant to teach.

Nestorius was a Syrian by birth, and at the time of his appointment to the see of Constantinople a presbyter of Antioch. In the first year of his patriarchate the heresy was propounded: Anastasius, one of his presbyters at Constantinople, being the first who gave utterance to these unsound opinions. In a sermon preached in the presence of Nestorius, at Advent [A.D. 428], he maintained that the title Θεοτόκος was inapplicable to the Blessed Virgin Mary, inasmuch as God could not be said to be born of a human creature. This term, Θεοτόκος, had been in use for many years. It was brought into prominence at the time of the Arian controversy by Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria, in a letter to Alexander, Bishop of Byzantium. It had been adopted by many others, and appears at the beginning of the fifth century to have been generally established. [Dict. of THEOLOGY, THEOTOKOS]. The term was meant to express the catholic doctrine of the two Natures in the one Person of Christ, and had nothing whatever to do with additional honour or dignity thereby accruing to the Blessed Virgin herself. The ostentatious rejection of this term by Anastasius created a great disturbance. Not very long afterwards the archbishop himself preached on the same subject, entirely upholding the view advanced by Anastasius. The first to take upon himself to defend the Catholic doctrine against Nestorius was Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria. Having discussed the matter in synod, Cyril sent two letters of admonition to Nestorius. In the former of these letters he referred to a letter to the same purport which had already been sent from the See of Rome. John, Bishop of Antioch, also appealed to Nestorius upon the subject. The Patriarch of Constantinople, disregarding these admonitions, and treating them with contempt, fell into general disfavour. With these expostulations the year 429 was taken up. Early in the following year another hortatory letter arrived from Cyril, and a more pronounced one from Celestine, Bishop of Rome. In this latter it was announced that the error of Nestorius had been examined and condemned in a synod at Rome, and unless he recanted within ten days he was to be excommunicated, "ab universalis Ecclesiæ Catholicæ communione" deductus. Nestorius having at length replied to Cyril, and exhibiting no disposition to retract, but on the contrary accusing Cyril of having fallen himself into the opposite error to that which he meant to condemn, Cyril drew up twelve anathemas, which were approved at a synod of all Egypt, held at Alexandria, and transmitted them with a letter to Nestorius. John of Antioch took exception to this letter, and began to sympathize with Nestorius, considering that Cyril himself, as had been alleged by his opponent, immoderately opposing the unsound views of Nestorius, had fallen into the Apollinarian heresy. The Bishop of Antioch had from the first interfered only in the interests of peace, and he still urged Nestorius so to qualify his expressions and statements that he could be pronounced orthodox; but this he could not be persuaded to do. Nestorius now appealed to the Emperor Theodosius, who wrote upbraidingly to him, but consented to convene a general council, which his opponents also demanded. It was appointed to meet at Ephesus, at Pentecost, A.D. 431. Celestine of Rome had deputed Cyril to act on his behalf and carry out the sentence of the Roman council of the preceding year; and Cyril's assembly of his bishops, and further proceedings, brought matters to the crisis.

The Bishop of Hippo, St. Augustine, was to have presided at the council of Ephesus, but he died in the latter part of the year 430. By the appointed time all the bishops summoned had arrived, except those from the East. A fortnight's delay was assented to in the hope of their arrival; but at the end of that time a message from John of Antioch having been received, which begged them to proceed with the business if the Syrian bishops were still detained, it was resolved to wait no longer. Upward of 200¹ bishops met under the presidency of Cyril, but Nestorius was not of the number. Messengers were sent to his house, but brought back his refusal to appear. The reason he assigned was not any objection to the constitution of the council, but the continued absence of the Syrian party. The assembled bishops accordingly, in his absence, read Nestorius' writings, and discussed the term Θεορόκος. The council was unanimous in its condemnation of the patriarch's doctrines, and in its enunciation of the Catholic doctrine of the Hypostatic Union, "that Christ was one Divine Person in Whom two Natures were most closely and intimately united, but without being mixed or confounded together." The council then passed formal sentence of excommunication and deposition. In less than a week John of Antioch, with his bishops, in number about 33, arrived. Messengers were sent to inform him of the proceedings of the council, but were not received. He presided over a schismatical council of his own party, at which Cyril and Memnon of Ephesus were condemned. Fresh arrivals having taken place, there was a final meeting of the council under Cyril, entirely confirming the former decision, and passing sentence of excommunication upon John and the Syrian party. At this meeting letters were drawn up and sent to the Emperor and the clergy.

In the first instance the Emperor confirmed all the condemnations, but upon being better informed, he directed Nestorius to be dismissed, and the other bishops to return to their respective dioceses. The Syrians, on their arrival at home, were again summoned to meet by John, and they again condemned Cyril, by this time at Alexandria. Nestorius himself was banished to Egypt: and the town where he lived being attacked, he wandered about in want and misery till he died [See Hey's Lectures, bk. iv. 21, 16]. He survived his deposition barely four years.

It has been stated above that the original Nestorian party obscured their real sentiments by a hazy use of words. Nestorius himself used to complain that inferences were by his opponents drawn from his words which they were not intended to convey. Dupin [Bibliothèque, i. 442, ed. 1722] thus summarizes his views, as expounded by himself. [1] He expressly rejected the error of those who said Christ was a mere man, as Ebion, Paul of Samosata, Photinus. [2] He maintained that the Word was united to the humanity in Christ Jesus, and that this union was most intimate and strict. [3] He maintained that these two Natures made one Christ, one Son, one Person. [4] And that this Person may have either divine or human properties attributed to Him.

But his words contradicted this formal enunciation of his doctrine. His illustrations proved that he did not allow the Hypostatic Union, but admitted a moral union only. A contemporary writer [Marinus Mercator, Opera, Paris 1673, ed.

Garner], who lived in the first half of the fifth century, says that Nestorius was sound in most of the Catholic truths on this question taken seriatim. He was sound "de persona divina assumpta," also "de natura humana assumpta," and also "de tempore, quo primum extitit unio;" all these positions being demonstrated by extracts from extant sermons and other writings of Nestorius. But he was unsound "de genere unionis." He certainly allowed only a moral union; "Deus et homo unum tantum moraliter." Hence the Incarnation, according to him, was ἐνοίκησις, ἀνάληψις, ἐνέργεια, ἐνανθρώπησις. There were two Natures in Christ, and the properties of each should be very carefully distinguished; "duæ in Christo reipsa hypostases; discernenda singulorum idiomata." Nor would he allow human attributes to be predicated of the Divine Nature, or divine ones of the Human Nature of Christ. "Nec quæ unius tribuenda alteri, nisi καθ' ὁμονομίαν, vel σχετικῶς." Rogers [Parker Soc. 55] quotes an apposite passage in this connexion: Φησὶ γὰρ ἐνωθῆναι τὸν Θεὸν λόγον τῷ ἐκ Μαρίας ἀνθρώπῳ, ὥσπερ εἰ τις φίλος φίλῳ ἔνωσιν διὰ σχέσεως ποιῶτο [Nicephorus, xviii. 48]. He refused therefore to say that God the Son had endured human suffering or gone through human experiences. He necessarily rejected, according to the above view, the term Θεοτόκος, and proposed Χριστοτόκος as an alternative. There is abundant proof from his works of his denial of the Hypostatic Union. He compared the union of the two Natures in Christ to a marriage: he spoke of Christ's Humanity being the Habit, the Temple, of His Divinity. He said that Thomas had touched Him that was risen again and honoured Him that raised Him up. He believed "hominem Deificatum, et non verbum carnem factum:" that Christ became God by merit, and was not God by nature. At some meetings at Ephesus preliminary to the council, Nestorius said he would not admit that a child could be God. Acacius, bishop of Melitana, at the council, said that he had heard a bishop of the party of Nestorius say, "that He that suffered for us was a distinct Person from the Word" [Dupin, i. 640]. Nestorius proposed an alteration of phraseology in order to overcome his difficulty. He suggested that there would be no difficulty if we said the Divine Jesus Christ knew men's thoughts, the Human Jesus Christ was hungry, and the like. [See Dr. Hey's Lectures, iv. He speaks of the cruelty of the persecution of Nestorius, and does "not scruple to say that the Council of Ephesus erred in treating Nestorius with too great severity."] Practically it became clear that his doctrine amounted to teaching that there were two Persons in Christ, and it was so felt at the time.

Including the diocesan synods and the schismatical assemblies, there were not less than nineteen or twenty meetings during the first twenty years of the controversy. Mercator gives them in order: he makes out that there were four at Rome, at Alexandria, and at Constantinople; two at Ephesus; two at least held by the Orientals; and others at Antioch, Bercea, and elsewhere. Most of these have been already spoken of. The second at Constantinople, held 25th October 431, was for the election of Maximian in succession to Nestorius: and the third, which was rather a consultation of bishops with the Emperor, was for considering the best means of re-establishing the peace of the Church. The Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451] assembled to condemn the opposite heresy, that of Eutyches: it not only did so, but incidentally confirmed the decision of the Council of Ephesus, and expressly adopted the term Θεοτόκος. Two years later a council at Constantinople, among other things, condemned a letter of Ibas of Edessa that had renounced the term Θεοτόκος. Gelasius, Bishop of Rome [A.D. 492-496], also synodically condemned the Nestorians. Pope Anastasius II., who succeeded Gelasius, is said to have been inclined to favour the Nestorians. At the beginning of the fourteenth century Pope John XXII. made a vigorous effort at their total suppression. He sent letters to the Patriarch of Jerusalem on the subject [A.D. 1326]. By this time both Nestorians and Jacobites (who held the Eutychian heresy that there was but one Nature in Christ) had extensive establishments. In the Pope's letter it is stated that both these sects, "habentes illic distinctas ecclesias, in quibus errores et hæreses hujusmodi, non sine magnis suarum et multorum aliorum animarum periculis, publice dogmatizant." The patriarch is accordingly urged to exterminate them.

It need hardly be said that the Nestorians repudiate the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon. Timotheus, their patriarch, in a national synod [A.D. 786, confirmed A.D. 804], pronounced "Anathematizatas fuisse Synodos Ephesinam et Chalcedonensem ex eo, quod duas personas in unam coaluisse docuerint" [Asseman, de Catholicis seu Patriarchis Chaldaeorum et Nestorianorum Commentarius, 1775, pref. xlv.].

After the death of Nestorius the sect largely increased, especially in Northern and Eastern countries. They still exist in the East, and have a patriarch in Seleucia and elsewhere. They are not now quite identical with the old Nestorians. The modern Chaldeans or Nestorians are very numerous, and have spread over Mesopotamia, India, Tartary, and China. Those of India in the twelfth century settled under the Tartar Khans. They officiate only in Chaldee or Syriac. Many learned men doubt if they are now tainted with the original heresy, having by several confessions of faith cleared themselves. They are believed in the main to agree with the Roman Church on the Incarnation, though they express the doctrine in different terms. Some on the coast of Malabar are not conformed to the Church of Rome; but others, as at Diarbekir, are professed Roman Catholics.

It has been shewn that the great opponent of the heresy was Cyril. He has written five books against Nestorius, and a dialogue to prove that the Blessed Virgin Mary was Θεοτόκος, and not Χριστοτόκος. But there are, besides, a great number of writers against this heresy whose works are extant. Among them are Philastrius, Epiphanius, Theodoret, Faustus, Leontius of Byzantium, Maxentius, Marius Mercator, and many others. The works on the history of the sect are very numerous. In Malcom's Theological Index is a long list of such works, the most important being Doucin, Histoire du Nestorianisme; Franzius, Northolthi Dissertationes; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus; Schroeder, Liberati Historia controversiæ Nestorianæ. In the foregoing account, besides the usual materials, the Breviarium of Liberatus, who was Archdeacon of Carthage, written c. A.D. 564, and the works of Marius Mercator, have been found very valuable. Malcom gives also a list of modern writers on the subject. On the Nestorian side appear the Sermons of Eutharius; and Asseman [quoted by Dr. Hey, bk. iv. art. ii. sec. 9] gives a catalogue of 198 writers, with more in an appendix, who are called Syrian Nestorian writers: "but the New Testament is one book reckoned, and Clemens Romanus one author." NETOVTSCHINS. A sect of Russian Dissenters, whose leading tenet is that Antichrist has begun his ruin of the Church, and that a gradual extinction of all holiness is now going on. They assume the name of Spasova Soglasia, the Union for Salvation, and appear to be an offshoot of the POMORANE. [Platov's Present View of Russian Church, Pinkerton's transl.]

NEW-BORN, THE. An American sect of Antinomians, which existed for about twenty years during the first half of the eighteenth century. It originated with a German emigrant named Matthias Bowman, who settled in Berks County, Pennsylvania, in 1719, and died there in 1727. He and his few followers professed to have been regenerated by inspiration and by visions, and thus to have received the new name of the Apocalypse. They also held the Familist opinion of the deification of humanity, and its Antinomian consequence, that of the impossibility of any act being sin in persons so deified.

NICOLAITANES. Two of the seven churches of Asia, Pergamos and Thyatira, are charged in the Apocalypse with allowing among them some who taught "the doctrine of Balaam, . . . to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication;" and the doctrine is named "The doctrine of the Nicolaitanes" [Rev. ii. 13, 14]. The name shews that there was a distinct heretical party which held the doctrine; while the terms of both the Epistles to the Churches shew that these heretics had neither formally separated themselves from the Church nor had been excommunicated.

In considering this heresy it will be assumed that the Apocalypse was written before the destruction of Jerusalem. A book so "thoroughly Jewish in its language and imagery," and yet so pregnant with the ideas of catholic Christianity, can only be the last inspired utterance of the Judæo-Christian Church. "The Apocalypse winds up St. John's career in the church of the circumcision; the Gospel and the Epistles are the crowning result of a long residence in the heart of Gentile Christendom" [Lightfoot's Dissertation, "St. Paul and the Three," in Comm. on Galatians, p. 334. Compare, as on a kindred topic, Mill's remarks on the Benedictus in Observations on Pantheistic Principles, part ii. p. 43.]

Before the year 70, then, there was a distinct heretical party, the matter of whose heresy had entered into the decree of the Council of Jerusalem nearly twenty years before. The subject-matter being so plainly the same, it is of little moment whether or not we assume in the Apocalypse a reference to the council; but the words "I will put upon you none other burden" appear to be rather a quotation from the decree than a mere reference to it.

The decree probably shews that the evil denounced was even then in existence. The council determined, on the one hand, that it was not necessary to be circumcised and keep the law of Moses; on the other hand, it prescribed what, in things indifferent, ought to be conceded to the scruples of the Jewish Christians, who still adhered to their national customs. Into this latter part of the decree so grave a moral evil as fornication could hardly have been brought, unless [1] the existence of the evil had been shewn, and [2] it had been connected with the other topics of the decree by an assertion that the abrogation of the Mosaic law had made the practice permissible. How such a pretence could be made, and the nature of the crime, are important points for investigation.

The identification of the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes with the doctrine of Balaam [Rev. ii. 14] proves that the fornication spoken of is not that crime under ordinary circumstances, but fornication connected with religious rites. Until the return from Babylon, the Jews had been familiar with this odious practice. Among the Hebrews, as previously among the Canaanites

[Gen. xxxviii. 21, 22; Deut. xxiii. 18], a prostitute was termed "consecrated;" and notwithstanding the laws of Moses and the denunciations of the Prophets, "consecrated" women and even boys were at times kept in the temple itself [2 Kings xxiii. 7]. This dreadful custom was spread in different forms over Phœnicia, Syria, Phrygia, Assyria, Babylonia [Hos. iv. 14, and Pusey's note; Apocr. Letter of Jeremiah, vv. 42, 43; Herodotus i. 199; Michaelis on Laws of Moses, art. 268]. The licentiousness mixed up, by the Greeks and Romans, with the worship of Dionysus and Aphrodite is well known, and needs no detail.

In two ways this evil might enter into Christian worship: first, through the pretence that by the abrogation of the Mosaic law the statute imposed in Deut. xxiii. 17, 18 was repealed; that men were at liberty to follow a national custom, the sanction of long-established national custom doing away the criminality of the act; or, secondly, by the fanaticism of professors of religion dwelling with erotic fulsomeness on the ties of human love, as setting forth heavenly love and heavenly communion, until lust conceived and brought forth sin. This fanaticism appears, as we shall see, in the second century. In the apostolic times and conditions of the Church, the former mode of the entrance of sin is the more probable; and the comparison of the epistles to Pergamos and Thyatira with the decree of the council, and the occasion of the calling that council, leads to the conclusion that the apostolic decree is to be regarded, in this part, not primarily as a denunciation of fornication in general, but as a denunciation of religious prostitution, whether in the idol-feasts of the nation or imported thence into the Christian love-feasts.

Other scriptures confirm this conclusion. St. Paul indeed treats the three elements of the question—the eating idol-sacrifices, the Christian love-feast, and fornication—each on its own independent ground. But Nicolaitane doctrine does not appear to have reached Corinth. The apostolic decree of Jerusalem was directed only to Judæo-Christian churches; and in any case the mind of St. Paul preferred the more general treatment of the subject. Both St. Jude and St. Peter, however, follow the more limited treatment, which was afterwards adopted in the Apocalypse.

St. Jude describes these filthy dreamers as defiling the flesh with Balaam, despising dominion¹ with Cain, and speaking ill of dignities, or church rulers, with Korah. He specifies the Agape as the scene of their wickedness, and points out the separation from the Church which was taking place. St. Peter's words are a re-casting of St. Jude's words. He too gives the same threefold description, omitting the parallels of Cain and Korah, but dwelling on the typical example of Balaam. He at least points to the love-feast, for the words "while they feast with you" can be interpreted only of the Agape, even if we do not adopt the probable correction of ἀγάπαις for ἀπάταις. In these four Scriptures then is described the growth in apostolic times of the heretical party of the Nicolaitanes. And thus far their doctrine appears to be a doctrine of libertinism in religious ordinances.

But St. Peter mentions also teachers of the false doctrine, who denied the Lord that bought them. These words may be interpreted either of a denial in works, such as is named in Tit. i. 16, or of a formal denial of the divinity of our Lord. Irenæus states that St. John wrote his Gospel to remove the errors of Cerinthus, which had a long time previously been disseminated by the Nicolaitanes.² But again, having named Cerinthus and the Ebionites, he describes the Nicolaitanes simply as they are represented in the Apocalypse, without attributing to them Cerinthian errors [Iren. adv. Hær. III. xi. 1; I. xxvi. 3]. These two statements are not altogether consistent. Comparing them, and collating them with other notices which will be presently given, the most probable conclusion is, that Nicolaitane doctrine is simply, as described above, a doctrine of libertinism,³ and that it attached itself before long to other heresies.

Whether the Nicolaitanes rightly claimed Nicolas the Deacon, and proselyte of Antioch, as their leader, has been much disputed. The balance of early testimony appears to be in favour of their claim, and to shew that one of the seven became a heresiarch. Irenæus and Hippolytus state it unhesitatingly [Iren. adv. Hær. i. 26; Hippol. Refut. Hær. vii. 24], and Hippolytus does not appear to have rested on the authority of Irenæus, but to have given an independent account. On the other hand, Clement of Alexandria defends Nicolas from the charge; Eusebius follows him, merely transcribing his words [Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. 20, iii. 4; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. iii. 29]. In this defence Clement tells a story (and tries to put a good interpretation upon it) which is incredible. It is that Nicolas having a beautiful wife, and being reproached with jealousy by the Apostles, conducted her into the midst of them, and permitted any one that wished to marry her; and that he used the expression, "Every one ought to abuse his own flesh." Epiphanius [Hæres. xxv. 1] tells a different story, that Nicolas refrained from living with his wife that he might devote himself to religion, but could not persevere in his resolution, and gradually sank into sin, and invented a doctrine that luxury was necessary to salvation. Both stories may be dismissed [Ittig. Diss. de Hæres. I. ix. 4]. The doctrine however which Epiphanius attributes to Nicolas appears to be the fanatical doctrine to which Clement passes on after describing the libertinism of the Nicolaitanes: Ἐσὶν δ' οὖν τὴν πᾶνδημον Ἀφροδίτην κοινωνίαν μυστικὴν ἀναγορεύουσιν [Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 4].

² Augustine also attributes to them Cerinthian errors regarding the creation of the world. [Aug. Hæres. v.]

Eusebius [Hist. Eccl. iii. 29] states that the heresy of the Nicolaitanes lasted but a very short time. The explanation of this, as compared with other notices, is that a doctrine of libertinism easily attaches itself to other forms of heresy, and, as far as the name goes, is lost in them. Thus Tertullian says [de Præscr. ch. xxxiii.]: "Johannes vero in Apocalypsi idolothyta edentes, et stupra committentes jubetur castigare. Sunt et nunc alii Nicolaitæ, Caïana hæresis dicitur." The author of the continuation of the de Præscr. connects the Nicolaitanes with the Gnostics. Hippolytus [vii. 24] writes that Nicolas was the cause of the widespread combination of the wicked Gnostics. Clement of Alexandria [Strom. iii. 2] speaks of the Carpocratians abusing love-feasts to licentiousness, and is of opinion that St. Jude wrote prophetically of them. Justin Martyr [Trypho. xxxv.] speaks of certain calling themselves Christians, Marcians, Valentinians, and others, partaking in nefarious and impious rites. Agrippa Castor [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 7] charged the Basilidean Gnostics with holding the indifference of things sacrificed to idols. Hippolytus speaks of the Nicolaitane practices of the Simonians [Hippol. Refut. Hær. vi. 14]. Epiphanius derives the Gnostics from the Nicolaitanes. It is more probable that they had a separate origin, and adopted Nicolaitane teaching and practice.

Thus the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes was extended into several other heresies, while the sect, as a distinct body, lasted but a short time. And upon the whole it may be concluded that Nicolaitane doctrine was a doctrine of libertinism in religious rites, passing quickly into a doctrine of general libertinism, defending itself under a shew of fanaticism, and attaching itself soon to other heresies.

NICOLAS OF BASLE. [FRIENDS OF GOD.]

NICOLAS, HENRY. [FAMILISTS.]

NICONIANS. A name applied by Russian dissenters to the orthodox members of the Established Church who accepted the reforms introduced by the Patriarch Nikon in the year 1654.

NIHILISTS. A school of theologians who taught that God did not become anything through the Incarnation which He was not before. This proposition is founded on the doctrine of the unchangeableness of the Divine Nature, from which it is deduced that since God can never be otherwise than God, therefore it cannot be true to say that He became man. Peter Lombard [A.D. 1160] stated this theory in the third book of the Sentences [Lombard, Sent. iii. dist. 5-7], but it was of earlier date, being traceable to Abelard in the twelfth century [Abelard, Theol. Christi. in Martene, Thes. v. 1307], and even to the early theology of the school of Antioch, which maintained that God clothed Himself with humanity as with a garment. The more advanced Nihilists held the opinion in such a form as to make the Incarnation nothing more than a theophany, in which without becoming man the Son of God made Himself appear as man to the eyes of men. The proposition, in the form "Deus non factus est aliquid," was laid before the Council of Tours [A.D. 1163], and rejected [Mansi, Concil. xxii. 239]. A work was also written against it by an Englishman, John of Cornwall, about the same time [Joann. Cornub. in Martene, Thes. v. 1658], and by Walter St. Victor, who charged Peter Lombard with the extreme form of Nihilism. It was finally condemned in the year 1179 at the Council of Lateran [Mansi, Concil. xxii. 426].

NIOBITES. A party of Alexandrian Monophysites formed under the leadership of a Sophist named Stephen Niobes, who attempted to revive the older Monophysite doctrine in opposition to the modified form of it maintained by Damian, Monophysite Patriarch of Alexandria [A.D. 570-603], who belonged to the school of Severus and the PHTHARTOLATRÆ.

The particular opinion brought forward by Niobes was that the qualities belonging to human nature could not continue in the Human Nature of Christ after its amalgamation with or absorption into the Divine Nature. He thus took up the position that there was no logical ground for the Severian compromise between orthodoxy and Monophysitism, and that the Jacobites ought to revert to the creed which they held before Severus came to Egypt, that which Dioscorus had maintained in opposition to the Council of Chalcedon. The Niobite party was driven out of Alexandria by Damian after the death of Niobes, and settled at Antioch, where, before the death of Damian, they gradually came round to orthodox opinions, and were energetic supporters of the Chalcedonian doctrine. [Asseman. Bibl. Orient. ii. 72.]

NJETOWSCHITSCHINI. [NETOVTSCHINS.]

NOËTIANS. A sect, both heretical and schismatic, of the beginning of the third century, belonging to that branch of the Monarchians which maintained that there is a Divine as well as a Human Nature in the Person of our Lord. They avowed the Patripassianism which results from this recognition of a Divine Nature in our Lord, when conjoined with the erroneous view of the Monarchy. In this respect they went beyond the Praxeans.

Of Noëtus himself nothing more is known than the few particulars which follow. He was a native of Asia Minor, Hippolytus [Ref. ix. 11] and Epiphanius [Synopsis. I. ii. 11] say of Smyrna, but Epiphanius in the body of his work says of Ephesus [Hær. lvii.]: perhaps a native of Ephesus, and a presbyter of Smyrna. At Smyrna he advanced his heresy, and was summoned before the synod of presbyters, when he denied or evaded the charge; but presently, encouraged by gaining about ten associates, he openly maintained the doctrine charged to him, and on a second summons before the synod avowed it. He was excommunicated, and then gathered followers, and formed a school for the propagation of his opinions; shortly after which he died [Hipp. Disc. against Noëtus; Epiph. Hær. lvii.]. The author of Prædestinatus states that he was condemned also by Tranquillus, Bishop of the Chalcedonians in Syria [Prædest. Hær. xxxvi.].

From Hippolytus we learn that Epigonus, a disciple of Noëtus, aided by Cleomenes, a disciple of his own, disseminated the heresy at Rome in the episcopate of Zephyrinus. Zephyrinus, an illiterate and covetous man, was bribed into licensing Cleomenes as a teacher, and then became his convert [Hipp. Ref. ix. 2; Wordsworth, Hipp. and his Age, pp. 84-91]. Irresolute however as well as ignorant, governed generally by Callistus, who tried to hold a balance between the orthodox and the heretics, but acted upon now by Cleomenes, now by Sabellius, Zephyrinus was swayed to and fro. There was endless conflict and confusion throughout the remainder of his long episcopate [see Milman, Lat. Christ. I. i. p. 53, ed. 1867].

The time at which Noëtus formed his heretical school at Smyrna must be gathered from this history, for the date assigned by Epiphanius is clearly inadmissible. The tenor of the narrative of Hippolytus leads to the conclusion that Zephyrinus fell into heresy some time before his death, which was in A.D. 219. Allowance must be made for the action of Epigonus and Cleomenes before Zephyrinus joined them, and for that of Epigonus alone. Consequently the establishment of the Noëtian school may be well placed at A.D. 205-10; and Praxeas, who came to Rome in the time of Victor, A.D. 192-201, was probably one of the earlier disciples of Noëtus.

Noëtus denied the distinction of Persons in the Godhead, and there can be no doubt that he avowedly held what may be called the simpler form of Patripassian doctrine, the form namely which is obtained by substituting in the Person of our Lord for the Divine Nature of the Word the one undistinguished Nature of Deity which the Monarchians called the Father. The sum and substance of this is thus well set down by Victorinus: "Patripassiani Deum solum esse dicunt, quem nos Patrem dicimus; ipsum solum existentem et effectorem omnium, et venisse non solum in mundum, sed et in carnem, et alia omnia quæ nos Filium fecisse dicimus" [Pearsen, On the Creed, p. 158, fol. 1741].

But the statements of Hippolytus appear to make it probable that Noëtus went even beyond this in heresy; that he held the truly appalling doctrine that the Father, the One Primary Principle, suffered on the cross, not in the way in which the Catholic Faith teaches that Christ suffered, but from a passibility attributed to the Divine Nature itself. In stating the catholic doctrine that the Son of God suffered, it is not said that the Word is in His own Nature passible, nor is it said that Christ suffered "ratione divinæ naturæ," but "ratione humanæ naturæ, quæ sola passibilis erat." But do not the statements of Noëtus' doctrine begin with ascribing passibility to the Divine Nature itself? The Noëtians "advance statements after this manner—that one and the same God is the Creator and Father of all things, and that when it pleased Him, He appeared to just men of old." "Wherefore it is that, according to the same account, He is invincible and vincible, unbegotten and begotten, immortal and mortal." The subsequent statements it is true refer these positions to the supposed incarnation of the Father, but it may be asked, whether that supposed incarnation, with its consequences, is not in accordance with a presupposed attribute of passibility in the Deity itself.

On no other supposition can the derivation of Noëtianism from the doctrine of Heraclitus be made good, a derivation which Hippolytus insists upon very strongly. The original principle of the universe Heraclitus believed to be living, ætherial fire, self-kindled and self-extinguished. In the following passage he asserted, as Hippolytus states, that the primal world is itself the Demiurge and Creator of itself: "God is day, night; summer, winter; war, peace; surfeit, famine." He says that the universe is divisible and indivisible; generated and ungenerated; mortal and immortal; reason, eternity; Son, Father; Justice, God. In this passage the manifestations or developments of the Primal Principle in time are contrasted with its nature and existence in eternity. And the derivation of Noëtian doctrine from the doctrine of Heraclitus will scarcely hold good unless Noëtus be understood to attribute to the Godhead itself that which Heraclitus attributed to the Primal Principle. Whence, after quoting the pantheistic passages from Heraclitus, Hippolytus stated the Noëtian doctrine that, according to the same account, the Father is unbegotten and begotten, immortal and mortal. Is it not to be inferred that to be unbegotten and begotten, to be immortal and mortal, was attributed by Noëtus to the Godhead itself independently of the supposed incarnation of the Godhead; in short, that he held the Father to be visible and passible, so that there was required the addition to the Creed which was made by the Church of Aquileia, affirming the Father to be invisible, impassible?

A further proof of this is found in the 12th anathema of the Synod of Sirmium, A.D. 351, which, summoned to deal with Photinus, condemned the various errors of the Sabellian school. It can hardly be doubted that the following words were directed against the Noëtians, who were Sabelliani ante Sabellium: "Si quis unicum Filium Dei crucifixum audiens dealitatem¹ ejus corruptionem vel passibilitatem aut demutationem aut deminutionem vel interfectionem sustinuisse dicat: anathema sit."

The Monarchian controversy arose from the intrusion into Christian doctrine of heathen philosophy; and the affiliation of Noëtus to Heraclitus is a strong proof of the truth of this assertion.

In the Refutation no notice is taken of that which is mentioned in the Discourse, and by Epiphanius, that Noëtus alleged himself to be Moses and his brother to be Aaron—or as Philaster gives the assertion—Elias, and it was probably nothing more than an arrogant comparison. It does not appear that there was any attempt to maintain the sect by a separate episcopal succession: and in Augustine's time the name of Noëtus was almost unknown.

NOMINALISTS. A school of mediæval theologians which arose in the latter half of the eleventh century, maintaining the opinion that objects exist only as individuals, so that genera, species, or "universals" (the term then in use) are but several or many individual objects collectively brought under one common name, or thought of under one common idea. The Nominalists thus opposed the position of the Realists, that universals have an abstract existence distinguishable from the existence of the individuals related to them; and they took as the formula of their school "universalia post rem." The extreme application of the theory is seen in the opinion of some Nominalists that the Three Names of the Holy Trinity are the Names of Three individual Substances, and that the Unity of the Trinity is but a verbal expression and not a Unity of Three consubstantial Persons.

The founder of the Nominalist school was Roscellin, Canon of Compiègne [circa A.D. 1089], whose opinions respecting the Trinity were carried to the tritheistic extent just indicated [ANTITRINITARIANS, p. 36], and who was compelled to retract them at the Council of Soissons in the year 1092. The next distinguished leader of the school was his pupil Abelard [A.D. 1079-1142], who modified the tritheistic opinion of Roscellin into a Sabellian form, defining the Three Persons as God's power, wisdom, and goodness, but yet not altogether denying the personality of those attributes. After his time Nominalism was little regarded by theologians until the fourteenth century, when it was revived by William of Occam [*—1347], the pupil of Duns Scotus. Henceforward the Nominalists may be recognised as the school of progress, inquiry, and criticism, out of which the Reformation arose: a school which so far tended towards scepticism that it overvalued the truth which it arrived at by reasoning, and undervalued that which it received by revelation; thus being disposed to believe only after demonstration. In later times the Nominalist theory was adopted by Hobbes, Hume, and Dugald Stewart. [REALISTS. SCHOOLMEN.]

NONCONFORMISTS. Presbyterian, Independent, and other non-Episcopal ministers, who held benefices by authority of the Revolutionary Parliament during the Great Rebellion, and were deprived of them by the Restoration Parliament. The name has also been occasionally used—as by Bishop Bancroft at the Hampton Court Conference—for those Puritan priests and deacons who refused to conform to the ritual customs of the Church of England during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, but who are more generally known by the familiar name of PURITANS.

To understand the position of the Nonconformist ministers of 1662, it is necessary to trace out the circumstances under which they came to occupy the churches and parsonages, and to receive the incomes which were appropriated, under the old established endowment system, to the clergy, of the Church of England.¹ These have been noticed at some length in the article on the Puritans, in which it is shewn that the overthrow of the Episcopal system in the middle of the seventeenth century was the climax of a movement which had been going on within the boundaries of the Church for about 120 years, and that this movement was for the purpose of establishing the Presbyterian system, instead of that which was inherited by the Reformed Church of England from that of Mediæval, Saxon, and Primitive times. It may now be observed more particularly that the post-Reformation system was as distinctly and uncompromisingly episcopal as that which had preceded it, and that none but clergy ordained by bishops were recognised by it.

I. In November 1549, Parliament passed an Act [3 & 4 Edw. VI. c. 12] declaring that, "forasmuch as concord and unity to be had within the King's Majesty's dominions, it is requisite to have one uniform fashion and manner for making and consecrating of bishops, priests, and deacons, or ministers of the Church: Be it therefore enacted by the King's Highness, with the assent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that such form and manner of making and consecrating of archbishops, bishops, priests, deacons, and other ministers of the Church as by six prelates and six other men of this realm, learned in God's law, by the King's Majesty to be appointed and assigned, or by the most number of them, shall be devised for that purpose, and set forth under the Great Seal of England before the first day of April next coming, shall by virtue of the present Act be lawfully exercised and used, and none other, any statute or law or usage to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding." There was a strong Germanizing party which wished to introduce Presbyterian ordination, Poynt desiring to abandon the very name of bishop, Grindal calling consecration a mummary, and Jewel and Hooper

1. Episcopal and Capitular Estates, a large proportion of which were given by the Crown in times before the Conquest.

2. Tithes and lands, the former given in times beyond record, and the latter mostly in times before the Conquest, for the use of the parochial clergy.

3. Monastic Estates, chiefly given in times subsequent to the Conquest, for the use of the monks and nuns.

4. Chantry Estates, chiefly given in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, for the use of chantry priests (not parochial clergy) to offer masses for the dead.

The two latter descriptions of property were entirely appropriated by the Crown, and given away by the Crown, (chiefly to courtiers and political adherents,) in the reigns of Henry VIII. and of Edward VI. The two former descriptions of property were (with some diminution) retained by the clergy.

being almost as much opposed to the continuation of the old customs. But the Ordinal now in the Book of Common Prayer had already been substantially constructed under a commission issued by the Crown in 1548, and this was published, under the authority of the Act which has been quoted, in March 1549-50. The Preface to this Ordinal (probably written by Archbishop Cranmer) enacts that "no man shall be accounted or taken to be a lawful bishop, priest, or deacon, in the Church of England, or suffered to execute any of the said functions, except he be called, tried, examined, and admitted thereunto according to the form hereafter following, or hath had formerly episcopal consecration or ordination." The whole of the Prayer Book, including the Ordinal, and therefore this unambiguous enactment respecting episcopal ordination, was incorporated into the second Act of Uniformity [5 & 6 Edw. VI. ch. 1, A.D. 1552], and when that had been repealed by Queen Mary's Parliament, it was again incorporated into the third Act of Uniformity [1 Eliz. ch. 2, A.D. 1559]. Efforts were made to override this provision of Church and State in the cases of Whittingham, titular Dean of Durham, and Travers, the opponent of Hooker, who had neither of them received episcopal ordination: but it is clear that the principle was not conceded, although some latitude was permitted to them because they had been set apart as ministers abroad by foreign, and not at home by English, Presbyterians [Strype's Ann. ii. pt. 2, pp. 168, 622; Life of Whitgift, iii. 182]. In fact it was an article of enquiry of the churchwardens at episcopal visitations, "Whether doth your minister or any other take upon them to read lectures, or preach, being mere lay persons, or not ordained according to the laws of this realm?" [Cardwell's Docum. Ann. ii. 22]. In spite of all such enactments and care, some "counterfeit ministers," as Archbishop Whitgift called them [ibid. 29], did probably obtain a footing in a parish here and there, but this was only by breaking the law, and the rule was never authoritatively relaxed except in the case of a very small number of foreign Lutherans or Calvinists, to whom Puritan bishops gave preference. Even those extreme Puritan clergy who submitted to the system of "calls" mentioned in the article on "Puritans," were always careful to be ordained by bishops: and probably there were no persons beneficed in the Church of England at the time when the Great Rebellion began who had not been episcopally ordained.¹

II. It need hardly be said that the strict system of episcopal ordination thus maintained from the Reformation to the Rebellion was never altered by any act of the Church. But on November 8th, 1645, an "Ordinance" was passed by the Lords and Commons, who then claimed to be the Parliament of England, declaring that "the word 'Presbyter,' that is to say 'Elder,' and the word 'Bishop,' do in the Scripture intend and signify one and the same function;" and that it being an usurpation on the part of bishops for them alone to ordain, henceforth ordination was to be given by presbyters, under certain rules respecting examination and trial which were laid down in the Ordinance: and then it was enacted that all persons who shall be ordained presbyters according to this Directory, "shall be for ever reputed, and taken to all intents and purposes, for lawful and sufficiently authorized ministers of the Church of England" [Rushworth's Hist. Coll. vii. 212]. At this time the parochial clergy were being rapidly and very generally driven away from their parishes. Many were notoriously loyal to the Crown and to Episcopacy, and had to fly for their lives, because they would not take the Covenant and the Engagement; many were imprisoned (some with circumstances of great cruelty, as when twenty were kept under hatches in a ship on the Thames), and it is believed that not a few were "sent to the plantations" to slavery as the early Christians were sent to the mines. There were also "Committees for enquiry into the scandalous immoralities of the Clergy," and as the least taint of loyalty to Church or King, the use of the Prayer-Book or the refusal of the Directory, was scandalous and immoral in the estimation of these Committees, they turned out most of those clergy who were not got rid of by other means. The consequence of all these rigid measures was, that nearly the whole of the Episcopal clergy were turned out of their benefices during the early years of the Great Rebellion. A few temporized, a few were protected by influential laymen, and a few escaped notice; but the number of those who thus retained their places was very small, and it is probable that the popular estimate which put down the number of the clergy ejected by the Parliamentary party at from 8,000 to 10,000 was correct.

As the episcopally ordained clergy were thus driven away from their churches, their parsonages, their tithes and their glebes, the Presbyterians and Independents stepped into the vacated benefices, and were settled in them securely by the authority of the Ordinance of Parliament which is quoted above. Thus it came to pass that between the years 1643 and 1660 most of the parishes throughout England and Wales received for their incumbents men who had not received episcopal ordination, the number of such amounting to about 10,000 at the time of the Restoration.

III. The Restoration of the civil constitution of the country was accompanied by the restoration of its ecclesiastical constitution almost as a matter of course. Attempts were made, indeed, by a comparatively small but yet noisy party, to prevent the re-introduction of the Episcopal system in its integrity, but the great body of the laity were heartily weary of Presbyterianism, Independency, and of the fanatical sects which had sprung up like mushrooms during the supremacy of these two principal ones, and lay influence being consequently exercised strongly against this attempt it was at once defeated. One of the first proceedings of the restored Parliament was to pass an Act for the confirming and restoring of ministers [12 Car. II. ch. 17], which enacted that every minister of the Church of England who had been ejected by the authority of the Rebellion Parliament should be restored to his benefice by December 25th, 1660, provided he had not justified the King's murder or declared against Infant Baptism. Under this Act many of the non-episcopal ministers had to retire from the livings into which they had been intruded, that the old, persecuted, poverty-struck clergy, who had been turned out of them fifteen or sixteen years before might be restored to their homes and their flocks. Some even of those who had been episcopally ordained had also to retire, and thus Richard Baxter had to make way for the return of the old and rightful Vicar of Kidderminster, whose place he had not unworthily held for half a generation. But half a generation of exile, war, persecution, poverty and hardship, had not left many of the old clergy to return to their parishes, and most of these were still occupied by non-episcopal incumbents until the Act of Uniformity came into force on August 24th, 1662.

This Act of Parliament [14th Car. II. ch. 4] was no novelty, being the fourth Act of Uniformity which had been passed since the Reformation, and having its parallel in several "Ordinances" of the Parliament which were passed during the Rebellion. It was, moreover, absolutely necessary that if the Church system was to be restored some enactment should be made enforcing the first principle of the system, that of episcopal ordination. But it was under the consideration of Parliament (especially of the House of Lords, which received a formal request to hasten it from the House of Commons) for several months, and it was so constructed as to deal considerably with the non-episcopal incumbents as well as to deal justly with the principles of the Church. The former were not, therefore, "ejected" as it has been so often represented, but opportunity was given to them of retaining the benefices which they held without any difficulty if they were willing to conform to those principles which had always been maintained, and which could not be given up, respecting episcopal ordination, the use of the Prayer Book, and decent loyalty to the Crown. The conditions thus imposed were stated as follows in the Act of Uniformity:—

1. "Every parson, vicar, or other minister whatsoever, who now hath and enjoyeth any ecclesiastical benefice or promotion within this Realm of England, . . . shall openly and publicly, before the congregation there assembled, declare his unfeigned assent and consent to the use of all things in the said Book contained and prescribed, in these words, and no other: 'I, A. B., do here declare my unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained and prescribed in and by the Book intituled The Book of Common Prayer,' " etc.

2. Every such incumbent, or any one to be admitted to an incumbency thereafter, was required to subscribe the following declaration: "I, A. B., do declare that it is not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take arms against the King; and that I do abhor that traitorous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him; and that I will conform to the Liturgy of the Church of England, as it is now by law established. And I do declare that I do hold, there lies no obligation upon me, or on any other person, from the Oath commonly called 'The Solemn League and Covenant,' to endeavour any change or alteration of government either in Church or State: and that the same was in itself an unlawful oath, and imposed upon the subjects of this realm against the known laws and liberties of this Kingdom."

3. It was also provided that "no person who now is incumbent, and in possession of any parsonage, vicarage, or benefice, and who is not already in holy orders by episcopal ordination, or shall not before the feast of St. Bartholomew be ordained priest or deacon according to the form of episcopal ordination, shall have, hold, or enjoy the said parsonage, vicarage, benefice with cure, or other ecclesiastical promotion, within this kingdom of England, or the dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick-upon-Tweed; but shall be utterly disabled, and ipso facto deprived of the same; and all his ecclesiastical promotions shall be void as if he was naturally dead."

The Act of Uniformity, therefore, to secure the integrity of the Church system on the one hand, and to secure the vested interests acquired by long possession on the part of the non-episcopal incumbents on the other, offered to the eight or nine thousand of the latter who still remained, that if they would be ordained, accept the Prayer Book, and renounce their engagement to destroy Episcopal government [COVENANTERS], or to bear arms against the Crown, they might retain their benefices. The great majority accepted the terms that were thus offered, so legalizing their position, and qualifying themselves to carry out the system of the Church of England according to its long-established principles.

The "Nonconformists" who did not accept these liberal terms offered by Parliament have been paraded before the world for two centuries as amounting in number to 2,000. Contemporary writers of authority—as for example Bishop Kennett in his "Register and Chronicle," the great storehouse of information respecting the years 1660-2—often denied that the number was so large; but Calamy published an "Abridgment of Baxter's Life and Times" in 1702, the ninth chapter of which is occupied with biographical notices of some of the Nonconformists, and in which he gives the number of 2,000 as correct. When this chapter was answered in 1714 by Walker's folio volume on the "Suffering of the Clergy," Calamy compiled a "Continuation" of his former work, which was published in 1721 in two volumes, and in which he still maintained that 2,000 Nonconformists were "ejected" by the Act of Uniformity. A critical examination of Calamy's evidence shews, however, that he has much overstated his case, the number being not much more than one third of what he alleges it to be; and as so much has been made of the matter by dissenting writers, it is worth while to shew what is the real conclusion furnished by his evidence.

The list of ejected ministers printed by Calamy may be distributed under the seven following heads: [1] Those who were actually dead before the time of ejection arrived; [2] Those who yielded up their places to the dispossessed Episcopal incumbents; [3] Curates and lecturers whose appointments were not benefices, and who were not therefore "ejected" from any by the Act; [4] Cases in which the list sets down two incumbents for the same benefice; [5] Cases in which Bishops' registers shew that other men than those named in the list were in possession; [6] Those who, on Calamy's own shewing, had no benefices to be lost, but whom he includes among those ejected from benefices; [7] Those who may have been deprived by the operation of the Act of Uniformity.

By the help of Newcourt's "Repertorium" of the diocese of London, those ministers whom Calamy names as ejected from benefices in that diocese may be distributed under these seven heads as follows:

	Number given by Calamy.	1	2	3	4	5	6	Number possibly ejected.
London,	119	2	21	8	3	12	22	51
Middlesex,	31		3	3		14		11
Essex, .	127	2	23	1	6	15	18	62
Herts, .	16		5			8		3
Total.	293	4	52	12	9	49	40	127

The number of those of whom it is possible that they may have been ejected is thus, taking the general average, only 43·3 per cent. of the number given by Calamy for the diocese of London. If this proportion be taken as regards the alleged number ejected throughout England and Wales, that number will thus be reduced from 2,000 to 867. It seems improbable, therefore, that the number of Nonconformist ministers who were "ipso facto" deprived of their parishes on St. Bartholomew's Day was much, or any, over 800; and, as contemporaries allege that some of these were men of property, that some made good marriages, that some returned to the trades which they had given up for the pulpit, and that great kindness was shewn to those who were poor by the bishops and the nobility [Kennett's Register, 888, 919], it may be concluded that much exaggeration has been used by those who have used the event to the discredit of the Church.

Among those who thus refused to accept the terms offered by the Act of Uniformity there was also a large number who continued to attend the ministrations of the Church, and whom Baxter calls "Episcopal Nonconformists." These, he says, "are for true parish churches and ministers reformed, without swearing, promising, declaring, or subscribing to any but sure, clear, necessary things, desiring that Scripture may be their canons, taking the capable in each parish for the communicants and Church, and the rest for hearers and catechized persons: desiring that the magistrate be judge whom he will maintain, approve, and tolerate, and the Ordainer judge whom he will ordain, and the people be free consenters to whose pastoral care they will trust their souls; desiring that every presbyter may be an overseer over his flock, and every church that hath many elders have one incumbent president for unity and order; and that godly diocesans may (without the sword or force) have the oversight of many ministers and churches, and all these be confederate and under one government of a Christian king, but under no foreign jurisdiction, though in as much concord as possible with all the Christian world. And they would have the keys of excommunication taken out of the hands of laymen (chancellors or lay brethren), and the diocesan to judge in the synods of the presbyters in cases above parochial power" [Baxter's Life and Times, App. 71, ed. 1696]. These were probably a large class among the laity for some time after the Restoration.

Three years after the Act of Uniformity had caused the ejection of these 800 Nonconformist ministers, Parliament passed a severe law against them called the "Five-Mile Act" [17 Car. II. ch. 2], which prohibited them from dwelling within five miles of any city or corporate town, or from even coming within that distance of any such town except in the course of travel; thus placing them in a much more unfavourable condition than ordinary Dissenters. This Act soon fell into disuse, and the few Nonconformists who remained alive at the Revolution were relieved from its operation altogether by the Toleration Act.

NONCONFORMISTS. A term which has come into use, in quite recent times, as a general designation of Protestant Dissenters. This new application of an old word causes some inconvenience, as confusing modern Dissenters of all sorts with the ministers who declined to conform to the Act of Uniformity, and so were deprived of the benefices which they had got into their hands during the Great Rebellion, as narrated in the preceding article.

NON-INTRUSIONISTS. [FREE KIRK.]

NONJURORS. This name was originally given to those bishops and other clergymen who were ejected from their benefices in 1689-90 for refusing to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary while they were still bound by that which they had taken to James II. It subsequently designated those of the party who, in the year 1693, organized an Episcopal sect of Non-jurors, which lingered on until the beginning of the nineteenth century.

I. When the Prince of Orange invaded England with a Dutch army (of whom 4000 were Papists) in September 1686, at the instigation of the unpatriotic statesmen who then held the reins of government, it was supposed by many that he would merely act as an armed arbitrator between King James and the discontented portion of his subjects. The King, however, having reason to fear from his son-in-law the same fate which his father had met with at the hands of Cromwell, did, on December 24th, 1688, what his father had taken care never to do, fled from his own dominions and took refuge in a foreign kingdom. Under these circumstances a general desire arose that the Prince of Orange should be appointed Regent during the absence of the King; but as the Princess of Orange had ceased to be heir-apparent to the English throne through the birth of her brother on the preceding June 10th, the Prince was unwilling to lose the new chance of a kingdom which had thus fallen into his hands, and refused to accept the government of it on any other condition than that of becoming its sovereign; threatening that, if any other settlement was attempted, he and his army would return to Holland. The crown was therefore offered to him on February 7th, 1688-9, by a body of Lords and Commons who had formed themselves into a joint committee, to which the name of a "Convention" was given, and on February 13th, seven weeks after King James had left England, the Prince and Princess were proclaimed its King and Queen.

The change of sovereigns having been thus effected, it was thought necessary that all persons holding office in Church or State should take an oath of allegiance to those who de facto occupied the throne, and this Oath was imposed in the form, "I, A. B., do sincerely promise and swear to bear true allegiance to their Majesties King William and Queen Mary." A new Oath of Supremacy was also imposed, which ran in similar terms. The Act of Parliament by which the new oath was imposed required that it should be taken by all ecclesiastical persons¹ before August 1st, 1689, under pain of suspension; and if they still refused to take the oath, their benefices were to be declared vacant on February 1st, 1689-90.

The position which the clergy were thus placed in was a very difficult one, for they had already promised to bear true allegiance to King James, and although many persons thought that his departure from the kingdom had released them from that allegiance, there were others who considered the oath to be still binding, and the more so because it bound them to the King's direct heir as well as to himself, that heir being now the infant Prince of Wales, and not the Princess of Orange. Some, on reflection, adopted the principle indicated (though at a much later date) by Nicolson, Bishop of Carlisle. "Whenever," he writes, "a sovereign de facto is universally submitted to and recognized by all the three Estates, I must believe that person to be lawful and rightful monarch of this kingdom, who alone has a just title to my allegiance, and to whom only I owe an oath of fealty" [Bp. Nicolson's Epist. Correspond. ii. 387]. But although in modern times this principle might be conceded by many persons without hesitation, it was not so easy to act upon it in an age when the displacement of one sovereign by another was a rare occurrence. Hence the clashing of the two oaths was a real difficulty to the consciences of a large number of the clergy, as well as to some of the official laity. This difficulty is well stated in a letter written by Dr. Fitzwilliam, Canon of Windsor and Rector of Cottenham, to Lady Russell, and dated May 13th, 1689. "What now I shall do in this present emergency I am ir-resolved: but if having first debated it with myself and advised with my friends, it shall seem most expedient to make such a retreat, I will depend upon your honour's mediation for that favour. . . . It may be I have as sad thoughts for the divisions of the Church, and as ardent desires for its peace as any; and let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I prefer not Jerusalem before my chief joy. But I cannot esteem it a good way to seek the attainment of this by any act which shall disturb my own peace. . . . In the meantime I entreat you, very good madam, not to call boggling at an oath, clashing against another, as far as I can discern, which I formerly took, an unnecessary scruple. I believe, were you under such an engagement, your tenderness and circumspection would be rather greater than mine.

"The former oath of allegiance runs thus:—'I will bear faith and true allegiance to his Majesty King Charles, or King James, and his heirs and successors, and him and them will defend.' Of supremacy, 'I will bear faith and true allegiance to the King's Highness (Charles or James), his heirs and lawful successors, and to my power shall assist and defend all jurisdictions, privileges, pre-eminences, and authorities granted or belonging to the King's Highness, his heirs and successors, or united and annex to the imperial crown of this realm.'

"Now I am informed by the Statute 1 Jac. c. 1 that lineal succession is a privilege belonging to the imperial crown, and by 12 Car. II. c. 30, § 17, that by the undoubted and fundamental laws of this kingdom, neither the Peers of this realm nor the Commons, nor both together, in Parliament, or out of Parliament, nor the people collectively nor representatively, nor any persons whatsoever, hath, or ought to have, any coercive power over the kings of this realm.

"The present oath runs thus: 'I will bear true allegiance to their Majesties King William and Queen Mary.' Now let any impartial person resolve me whether one of these, King James having abdicated, be his heir or lawful successor, or could be made so, had the people met either collectively or representatively, which they did neither." [Lady Russell's Letters, ed. 1792, p. 458.]

No one can complain that men who had such scruples of conscience on this subject should be willing to give up their bishoprics and their parishes rather than do an act which they considered as wilful perjury. And that they did so consider is shewn not only by the costly acts of self-denial to which they submitted, but by the dying words of two bishops of the number. "If the oath had been tendered," said Bishop Lake, "at the peril of my life, I could only have obeyed by suffering." "If my heart do not deceive me," said Bishop Thomas, "and God's grace do not fail me, I think I could suffer at a stake rather than take this oath." [Life of Kettlewell, 199, 206.]

When the first date named in the Act had arrived, seven bishops and a large number of the clergy declined to take the oath, and were consequently suspended from the performance of their duties, but it does not appear that this was done by any proper ecclesiastical process. Thomas, Bishop of Worcester, and Cartwright, Bishop of Chester, would have been added to the number, making nine bishops, but they died a short time before. During the six months that followed, Lake, Bishop of Chichester, also died, as did some of the inferior clergy; the numbers of the latter being also diminished by the compliance of many under the influence of argument and persuasion. The six bishops who remained alive on February 1st, 1689-90, were Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury; Ken, Bishop of Bath and Wells; Turner, Bishop of Ely; White, Bishop of Peterborough; Lloyd, Bishop of Norwich; and Frampton, Bishop of Gloucester. These were followed by about 400 clergy, the best blood of the Church, the names of most of whom have come down to us [ibid. App. v.]. A large number of the laity took the same view of the oath of allegiance as that taken by the Nonjuring clergy, but as it would only be tendered to those who were in the service of the Crown, none among them but the latter were called upon to make any sacrifice on account of their opinion.

II. Some of the Nonjurors looked upon their position as simply a political one, which did not affect their spiritual relations to the Church. But the more ardent of them took a different view, and mixed up the idea of the oath with that of orthodoxy, in such a manner as to make it appear that only those were true to the Church who refused to take it. The only shadow of reason for this latter view was, that continued communion with the Church seemed to entail some recognition of the prayers which were offered for the new sovereigns. But although it is easy to see that these prayers must have been a burden to the consciences of those Nonjurors who were present at the services of the Church, it is not easy to see how they could constitute so heavy a burden as to make such presence impossible: still less, to see how the insertion even of an usurper's name in the prayers—to put the matter in the strongest light possible—could in itself affect the catholicity of the ancient Church. So strongly, however, did some of the Nonjurors feel on this point, that they not only declined to attend the services of the Church, but they advocated the immediate formation of a separate communion, for the purpose of continuing what they believed to be the true ancient Church of England, as represented by themselves, in contradistinction to the body which occupied the sees and parishes of the land.

Thus far the position assumed by the Nonjurors appears to be justifiable by no reasonable argument: but when the sees of the six bishops and the parishes of the 400 clergy were filled up by other bishops and clergy, during the lifetime of incumbents who had not been displaced by any sufficient ecclesiastical process, there was much to be said for those who refused to consider the new-comers in any other light than as schismatical intruders. When it was stated by the Nonjurors, for example, that Archbishop Sancroft was really and truly the ecclesiastical head of the Church of England, and that nothing could make Tillotson such during Sancroft's lifetime, they could only be answered by the counter allegation that those who consecrated Tillotson had ecclesiastical authority to give him mission to the see of Canterbury, because the latter had been made vacant by the operation of an Act of Parliament. But if an Act of Parliament can thus destroy the spiritual mission of a bishop [DICT. of THEOL., JURISDICTION], Parliament is indeed supreme, and there seems no good reason left for rejecting its dictum, when it alleged that ordination by presbyters was the same thing as ordination by bishops. [NON-CONFORMISTS.] What is thus said of Tillotson applies also to Kidder, who took possession of the see of Ken (which Beveridge altogether refused to do), and of all the other bishops who assumed spiritual jurisdiction over dioceses the true bishops of which were still living. And what is thus said of the bishops is also applicable, in its degree, to those who took the places of the ejected parochial clergy, not one of whom can be considered as lawfully deprived of the cure of souls committed to him. Those who framed the Act of Parliament had, in fact, made a great mistake, such as lawyers often make when dealing with ecclesiastical matters, for they omitted to insert a provision directing that Nonjuring clergy should be deprived of their spiritual jurisdiction by a proper ecclesiastical process. If the Nonjurors had been thus deprived, there could have been no doubt as to the position of their successors, and though the deprivations might have been still open to the charge of injustice, they would not have been open to the charge of nullity, as they actually were.

But notwithstanding this grave error, which left the Nonjuring bishops still responsible for the cure of souls in their dioceses, and the Nonjuring priests for the cure of souls in their parishes, there does not seem to be any instance on record of either bishop or priest endeavouring to carry out their responsibilities in any such complete manner as to justify the claims which they made, or which were made on their behalf. Sancroft issued a commission to three of his suffragans to consecrate Burnet to the bishopric of Salisbury, and under this commission the consecration took place on May 31st, 1689. But after the Act of Parliament had come fully into force, Sancroft made no further attempt to carry out his duties, or to assert his spiritual jurisdiction, only remaining at Lambeth until he was turned out, which was little if anything more than an assertion of his temporal rights to his benefice, rights which possibly an Act of Parliament could really extinguish. Nor does it appear that any of the other bishops, or any number of the clergy, took this ground. They seem to have been surprised into yielding their spiritual charges, and so letting their sees and parishes practically lapse into the hands of those whom they considered unlawful intruders. They vacated their spiritual charges as James had vacated his throne, and yet claimed to be still the rightful occupants of the posts they had vacated. Thus, if there was a grave error on the part of Parliament in omitting to provide for others doing what Parliament itself could not do, in omitting to release the Nonjuring clergy from their spiritual responsibilities, there was also a grave error on the part of the latter in acting as if they had been so released. And while this latter course went far to cut the ground from under their feet, as regards the claim which the Nonjurors asserted to be still the only rightful representatives of the Church in the dioceses and parishes committed to them, so it went far to justify Tillotson and the rest of the intruders in assuming themselves to be rightfully possessed of posts which had thus been suffered to lapse into their hands. Even so far the Nonjurors cannot be altogether exonerated from a share in the confusion—very nearly approaching if not actually amounting to schism—which was caused in the six dioceses and 400 parishes, when they were thus provided each with two pastors. But many of them, doubtless, took the same line that was taken by Bishop Ken, and quietly retiring from their posts refused to take any part in setting up a rival communion.

III. The first step which was taken towards placing the Nonjuring clergy in a schismatical position was an imprudent act which Sancroft himself was persuaded to perform, that of delegating to Lloyd, the ejected Bishop of Norwich, that archiepiscopal jurisdiction which he declined to exercise personally. This was done by an instrument dated February 9th, 1691-2, when he had allowed his authority to lie dormant for eighteen months; during half of which time Tillotson had been consecrating suffragans for the province, and ordaining and confirming within the diocese of Canterbury, while Sancroft himself had been living the life of a hermit on a small property which he possessed at Fresingfield. Under the authority thus delegated to him, Lloyd shortly afterwards took steps for consecrating two bishops, and the consent of the exiled King having been obtained, Hickes, the deprived Dean of Worcester, was consecrated suffragan Bishop of Thetford, and Wagstaffe suffragan Bishop of Ipswich, on February 24th, 1693-4, the consecrating bishops being those who had previously occupied the sees of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough. The consecration took place secretly in a private house, but was witnessed by the Earl of Clarendon; it was known to very few persons, and those in confidence, until the latter part of the year 1710, when all the deprived bishops but Ken being dead, and he having resigned his see, a discussion arose among the Nonjurors as to the continuance of their separation.

Upon the death of Ken, that saintly bishop departing to his rest on March 19th, 1710-11, many of the Nonjurors, among whom were Nelson, the well-known author of "Fasts and Festivals," and the learned Henry Dodwell, began again to frequent their parish churches, and gave up all formal connection with the separated party. But another section, led by Hickes, determined to perpetuate the secession, and for that purpose to continue the succession of bishops. Hickes and Wagstaffe had been consecrated only as suffragan bishops to Bishop Lloyd, and had therefore no authority after his death in 1710. Wagstaffe himself died in 1712, and Hickes, being thus left as the sole episcopal representative of the Nonjurors, and being then 71 years old, called in the assistance of two Scottish bishops, Campbell and Gadderar, and on Ascension Day, in 1713, these three consecrated Jeremiah Collier, Samuel Hawes, and Nathaniel Spinckes, Scotland thus once more contributing an element of schism to England. Hickes died in 1715, and Collier becoming the leader of the now formally constituted sect, Henry Gandy and Thomas Brett were consecrated by him and the other two schismatical bishops on January 25th, 1716.

In the following year began the dispute among the Nonjurors respecting the "usages." Collier wrote a tract entitled "Reasons for Restoring some Prayers and Directions as they stand in the Communion Service of the first English Reformed Liturgy," etc. In this he advocated the reintroduction into the Communion Service of the mixed cup, of the Invocation of the Holy Ghost, of the Prayer of Oblation, and of Prayers for the departed, these always having been used by Hickes, who celebrated with the Communion Office of Edward VI. First Book, and by Collier himself, while Brett and the Scottish bishop Campbell strongly supported the practice. A division thus sprung up in the now small body of Nonjurors, Spinckes and Gandy leading one party, which wished to retain the use of the last Book of Common Prayer, Collier and Brett leading another section, which used the First Book: the former party being called "Non-Usagers" and the latter "Usagers." The two parties remained separate, each consecrating several bishops, from the year 1718 to 1733, when a reconciliation took place, though some still continued to be "Usagers" and others "Non-Usagers."

The sect lingered on during the whole of the eighteenth century, but with continually diminishing numbers and with continually increasing divisions. Few priests seem to have been ordained among its members, but the consecration of bishops was kept up, at last in a very irregular and reckless manner, until nearly the close of the century. [DICT. OF THEOL. p. 515.] Among them were many men of great learning, and whose works have been of high value to the Church, especially Hickes and Dodwell as theologians, Collier and Carte as historical writers, Brett as a high authority in liturgical theology, Kettlewell, Nelson, and Law as devotional writers whose influence deeply affected the religion of the Church for a century and a half. The Nonjurors appear to have always held their services in private houses, and many of their clergy practised medicine or followed some trade. Gordon, the last of their regular bishops, died in 1779; Cartwright, one of the last of the irregular section, practised as a surgeon at Shrewsbury, and was reconciled to the Church at the Abbey there in 1799, by a clergyman who mentioned the circumstance, in his old age, to the present writer. Boothe, the last of all their bishops, died in Ireland in 1805, but some small congregations of Nonjurors are said to have existed some years later. Many of the last of the Nonjurors, however, attended their parish churches, only reserving to their consciences the privilege of using Prayer Books which had been printed before the Revolution.

A strong intimacy was always kept up between the Nonjurors of England and the Episcopalians of Scotland, and they were mostly mixed up with the Jacobite party to a dangerous extent, some of them even suffering for high treason in 1716 and 1745. Not a few of them seceded to the Roman Catholic sect, and when an Act was passed against Recusants, the Nonjurors were included. The strong desire for Catholic reunion, which thus impelled them to seek it somewhere, although their political feelings would not permit them to seek it in the Church of England, also led to an attempt being made in 1716 to bring about "a concordat betwixt the orthodox and catholic remnant of the British Churches and the Catholic and Apostolic Oriental Church." The full particulars of this have been printed in Williams' Orthodox Church of the East in the 17th century, but the correspondence on the subject fell through in 1725. [Life of Kettlewell. Bowles' Life of Ken. D'Oyley's Life of Sancroft. Lathbury's History of the Nonjurors.]

NONJURORS, SCOTTISH. A party in the Scottish Establishment became known by this name in 1712, on their refusing to take the Oath of Abjuration as enjoined in the Toleration Act passed in that year. The oath recognised by implication the conditions of the Succession Act, among which were the provisions that the Sovereign should always be of the communion of the Church of England, and should swear to maintain that Church as by law established. Hence, by many amongst the more rigid Presbyterians, the refusing the oath was regarded as a criterion of ministerial faithfulness, and almost as a test of communion. In 1719 the oath was modified, in accordance with an address from the Nonjurors themselves; but a few (including T. Boston, who wrote Reasons for refusing the Abjuration Oath in its Latest Form) still resolutely declined it. [CAMERONIANS. MARROW MEN.]

NOVATIANS or NOVATIANISTS. A sect which arose at Rome, in the middle of the third century, from a simple spirit of insubordination, and then adopted, as if for its justification, the tenet that the means of grace and reconciliation entrusted to the Church are inapplicable to those who have fallen from the faith in persecution, and to those who have after baptism committed mortal sin.

The sect organized itself into a body, and the schism became complete when Novatian, from whom it is named, fell off from Catholic unity, and assumed the position of bishop of Rome, in the reign of the Emperor Decius. A succession of schismatic bishops was kept up for nearly three hundred years, not in Rome only, but almost throughout Christendom. The sternness of Novatian's refusal to admit the lapsed to penitence was extended by his followers, if not by Novatian himself, to other cases of heinous sin, and to some cases treated as sinful by a mistaken asceticism, such as second marriages. In this matter the sect, which in other respects of doctrine was orthodox, must be judged heretical. From this attempt to enforce a more rigid discipline, they took the name "Cathari," the Pure; and shewed their schismatic spirit by unchurching the body from which they separated, denying even the validity of the Catholic baptism. The spirit of schism manifested itself also, as is usual, in an alliance with the secular power. They gained the favour of the heathen government, treated the banishments of bishops by the government as if they were canonical depositions, and thus virtually surrendered the liberties of the Church to the secular arm.

Thus the schism of the Novatians involved these three cardinal points: the constitution of the Christian Church, its use of the means of grace and reconciliation, and its relation to the secular power. Considering this, and considering the wide extent and long duration of the schism, it is remarkable that there does not remain from original authority any detailed account of its rise and progress. Its history must be gathered from unsystematic notices in Cyprian's epistles; from some few epistles of particular bishops and doctors of the Roman, African, and Eastern Churches extant among Cyprian's works; from the remains of some tracts and epistles of Dionysius of Alexandria preserved by Eusebius; from Pacian's epistles; from Ambrose's treatise, De Pœnitentia; from a few conciliar determinations; from the occasional notes of Socrates and Sozomen; and from statements of particular points of doctrine or history by Jerome, Augustine, and Basil. By far the greater part of this information comes from opponents, and in the consideration of it, this chapter of Church history, more perhaps than other chapters, is liable to be distorted by the prepossessions of the historian.

The history of this schism must begin with the Carthaginian presbyter Novatus,¹ for with him began the rebellion against episcopal authority. That in opposition to Cyprian he advocated lenity, in opposition to Cornelius he advocated rigour, shews that his mercy and his severity arose from his love of rebellion. The election of Cyprian to the bishopric of Carthage was opposed by a small but relentless minority. Five presbyters in particular carried on their opposition after his consecration [Cypr. Ep. xliii.]. Whether Novatus was one of these five, is disputed; but if the expression in Ep. xliii. regarding the five presbyters, "Antiqua illa contra episcopatum meum venena retinentes," be compared with Ep. xiv., in which are given the names of four of the schismatical presbyters, Novatus being among them, there will be little doubt of the "existence of only one anti-Cyprian party from the very beginning—a party which held together, and in which Novatus took a conspicuous part" [Neander's Ch. Hist. Rose's transl. i. p. 241]. Novatus first set himself in open opposition to his bishop by procuring the ordination of Felicissimus, and appointing him his deacon, without Cyprian's permission [Cyp. Ep. lii.].² Novatus was now accused of heinous crimes. It was said that he had robbed widows and orphans, that he had kicked his wife during her pregnancy and caused the death of her child, that he had allowed his father to starve, and then remain unburied. On these charges he was to be tried, but the Decian

² Cyprian's words are: "Ipse est qui Felicissimum satellitem suum Diaconum, nec permittente me, nec sciente, sua factione et ambitione constituit." Many historians understand by this a presbyterian ordination by Novatus himself. Neander writes that Novatus, with his views, and according to his presbyterian system, might think himself qualified, as a presbyter and president of a church, to perform this. It does not seem at all probable that Cyprian would have brooked a presbyterian ordination, though he might be obliged to pass over the irregularity of the ordination by another bishop. He allowed Felicissimus to remain in office. Bingham's interpretation is therefore adopted [Antiq. II. iii. 7]. So Pearson also understands Cyprian's words [Ann. Cypr. p. 25]. Some have argued, but without sufficient ground, that Novatus was a bishop. See the quotation from Sirmondi in foregoing note. So also Baronius, Petavius, Labbæus persecution prevented the trial [Cypr. Ep. lii.]. Of these charges it can only be said that they are not proved. It is as unjust to Cyprian to attribute them to blind passion, to the rancour of controversy, as it is to Novatus to assume them to be true, in their full extent, because Cyprian believed them. From Epistle xiv., written during the persecution, after Cyprian had left Carthage, it appears that Novatus and three other of the presbyters wrote to Cyprian concerning the affairs of the diocese. A good deal of stress has been laid on the fact that Cyprian calls these four "compresbyteri nostri." He was too just to deny Novatus this title before trial and proof of the charges and sentence given. And the inference from these several notices appears to be, that Novatus was waiting trial when the persecution broke out—that the persecution prevented the trial coming on—that Novatus did not immediately flee, which would naturally tell in his favour in the mind of the bishop—that a lull of persecution rendered it likely the trial might come on—that Novatus then retreated—that (as is always the case when men avoid trial) further evidence against him came to light, and convinced Cyprian of the guilt of his presbyter, and caused the stronger language of the later Epistle, the fifty-second. Cyprian's retreat from persecution was justifiable, but was open to doubt, and very liable to misrepresentation.³ His opponents were not slow to take advantage of it, and besides traducing the character of their bishop, they increased their numbers by receiving on easier terms than Cyprian would have allowed those who had denied the faith and offered sacrifice, and those who without actually sacrificing had bought certificates of submission. Felicissimus was now at the head of the party. He resisted Cyprian's commissioners, who were empowered to visit the church and regulate the distribution of the church funds. Upon Cyprian's return, he with his party was condemned in a synod of the North-African Church. Instead of yielding, he procured the consecration, as rival bishop, of Fortunatus, one of the five presbyters. Our subject requires us not to dwell on these events, but to follow Novatus to Rome.

Novatian, whose party Novatus now joined, a presbyter of Rome, had, according to Cornelius' account, been possessed by a devil, had been aided by exorcism, and after a long illness had received baptism as a clinic, but upon his recovery had neglected the rite of confirmation [Cornel. Epist.

in Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 43]. There is probably some truth in the reproach of Cornelius (exaggerated as we must believe his letter to be, and uncharitable in several respects as we must feel it), that Novatian was a man of unsocial and savage habits.¹ The alleged possession by the devil was—or accompanied—an attack of the solitary and gloomy hypochondriasm of a hard nature, to the unsociability of which the wrestlings of a mind labouring after knowledge would naturally contribute. The rejection of the further means of grace in the ordinances of the Church—the neglect of confirmation implies also the neglect of the Holy Eucharist—indicates a want of humility and true self-knowledge, the proud self-reliance of one who had not altogether unlearned the lessons of heathen philosophy. Cyprian's words make it at least very probable, though they do not certainly prove, that Novatian had been trained in the Stoic school² [Cypr. Epist. lv.]. How long this standing aloof from Church communion lasted we do not know. But we know that Novatian distinguished himself by his writings in defence of the Catholic faith, and by an ascetic life. Fabian, Bishop of Rome, ordained him priest notwithstanding the remonstrance of the clergy, who alleged the law of the Church, that no cleric should be ordained³ [Cornel. Ep.]. As a presbyter Novatian gained much esteem and influence. In the year 250, during the vacancy of the see after the death of Fabian, he was commissioned by the Roman clergy to write a letter in their name to Cyprian [Cypr. Ep. xxx.; see Ep. lv. p. 102]. In this letter, it must be carefully observed, Novatian does not deny absolution to the lapsed at the point of death. He argues strongly against hasty absolution, he urges the propriety of doing nothing new before the appointment of a bishop, and says that the Roman clergy “believe that in the meantime, while the grant of a bishop is withheld from them by God, the cause of such as are able to bear the delays of postponement should be kept in suspense; but of such as impending death does not suffer to bear the delay . . . to them such cautious and careful help should be ministered, . . . so that neither ungodly men should praise our smooth facility, nor truly penitent men accuse our severity as cruel.” Cyprian quotes the substance of this in brief, “that peace ought to be granted to the lapsed who were sick and at the point of departure.”

The story told by Cornelius that Novatian shut

² “Novatiani philosophiam, per quam ille in naufragium religionis incurrit” [Pacian, Ep. ii. p. 197]. Ambrose states that the Stoic doctrine of the equality of sins led Novatian to deny penance to lesser sins as well as greater [de Pæn. I. ii.].

himself up in the time of the persecution, and refused to go to the assistance of the sufferers, saying “that he wished to be presbyter no longer, but to follow a different philosophy,” if true, is very discreditable. But it does not appear to be consistent with Novatian's character, and is probably, to say the least, much distorted. [See Evans, Biography of Early Church, ii. p. 259.]

So stood matters when Cornelius was elected bishop in June 251. Novatian had assured the Church with a solemn oath, that he did not desire the office. He was taken at his word. There was also good reason for passing him by. His literary qualifications would not compensate for the gloomy and unsocial disposition, which was unsuitable to the active and practical nature of the bishop's duties. Cornelius was made bishop by the testimony of almost all the clergy, and by the suffrage of the people then present [Cypr. Epist. lv.]. The exact time of Novatus' appearing in Rome is not known, but it was probably in the beginning of the same year. That he joined the party of Novatian in opposition to Cornelius there is no doubt; as to the extent of his influence there is considerable doubt. “The Greek writers, who appear to be well acquainted with the Novatian sect, say nothing of this African Novatus; nor does Cornelius, in the fragments of his letter to Fabius of Antioch preserved by Eusebius, take any notice of him. Indeed, Cornelius, in a letter to Cyprian, mentions this person among other legates in the second deputation sent by his rival from Rome to Africa; but he does not lay anything particularly to his charge: and he there actually calls another person (Evaristus) author of the schism⁴ [Cypr. Ep. l.]. It is also apparent from Cyprian's answer to that letter that Cornelius had never sent him any account of the conduct of the African Novatus” [Lardner, Credib. xlvii. 111]. From this silence regarding Novatus it is inferred by Lardner that Cyprian had an exaggerated notion of the powers and importance of the man who had given him so much trouble, and that his statements, such as, e.g., that Novatus made Novatian bishop as he had made Felicissimus deacon, cannot be relied upon. Others, as Neander, accept Cyprian's statements of Novatus' influence, and suppose that it was Novatus' mode of proceeding to be the moving-spring of all troubles, and yet not to set himself but another at the head of the party.

Of far greater consequence than the determination of this point is a correct judgment of the change which took place in Novatian's principles. His letter, which has been already quoted, allows the reception of penitents in prospect of death; it urges the propriety of waiting for the election of a new bishop before any new rule is made. Then he is joined by Novatus, who at Carthage had been on the side of lenity; a bishop is appointed with whom the majority of the Roman clergy agreed; yet we presently find Novatian at the head of a party which had altered its principles so entirely as to deny the power of the Church to grant absolution even in articulo mortis, and which insisted on its new principle so rigidly as to assert, that the church which did grant this absolution was apostate, and became no church at all. This change of principle on the part of Novatian is not to be classed with the changes of Cyprian and Cornelius. These were only changes of degree, of more or less strictness or lenity. Novatian's change was from a recognition to a denial of the power of the Church. The inference to be drawn from the facts is, that the heresy was on account of the schism, not the schism for the sake of the heresy.¹ Jerome's apophthegm is proved true by Church history: "Nullum schisma non aliquam sibi confingit hæresin, ut recte ab ecclesia recessisse videatur" [Hieron. in Ep. ad Tit.], and Novatian's heresy appears to be no exception. Pacian speaks very expressly to the point. St. Ambrose concurs with him. Dionysius of Alexandria puts the schism first. St. Basil says that "the beginning of their separation was by schism," as distinguished, i.e., from heresy.² These testimonies will outweigh the account given by Socrates, who says that the Novatians deserted Cornelius because he received into communion those who in the time of the Decian persecution had sacrificed to idols [Socrat. Hist. Eccl. iv. 13]. How little the denial of the power of the Church to receive the lapsed was the cause of the schism may be seen from this, that Maximus, who was Novatian's legate from Italy to Africa, and was excommunicated there by the Catholics, was by the Novatians made a bishop in Africa though he had sacrificed [Cypr. Ep. lix. pp. 132, 133], and from this, that in the year 253, the Novatians communicated with the Lapsi [Cypr. Ep. lxxv.]. We are led therefore to describe the consecration of Novatian as an act of pure schism, without the excuse which a principle put forward, as for the maintenance of holy discipline, might seem to lend it.³ The Novatian doctrine of repentance was a new heresy upon a schism. Pacian writes that Novatian was first stimulated and provoked by his envy, and could not endure Cornelius' episcopal government over him, whereupon he gave himself up to Novatus [Ep. ii. ad Sempron.].

² "Tu postquam a reliquo corpore segregatus es, et a matre divisus, ut facti tui rationem redderes totos librorum recessus, assiduus scrutator, inquiris. Occulta quæque sollicitas, quicquid exinde securum est inquietas" [Pacian, Ep. iii. p. 199]. Again, having related Novatian's earlier opinions, as shewn in his letter to Cyprian, Pacian writes: "Si nemo vobis Cornelium prætulisset, maneret illa Novatiani scribentis auctoritas; nunc displicet tota sententia" [ib. p. 202]. "Qui ideo, ut dicitis, in ecclesiam non convenitis, quia per penitentiam tributa spes fuerat his qui lapsi sunt, revertendi. Sed hoc præteritum est specie. Ceterum episcopatus amissi dolore succensus Novatianus schisma composuit" [Ambr. de Penit. l. xv. 85, Bened. edit. Eusebius H. E. vii. 8, Basil, Can. Epist. i., ad Amphil.]. This conclusion agrees with the tenor of Cyprian's letter to Antonianus [Ep. lv.]. Pacian states that he took his narrative from Cyprian's Epistles, and he appears to have had access to letters not now extant. See Historical Collections conc. District Successions, p. 179, and the note in Benedictine edit. of Ambrose, loc. cit.

Under these circumstances we may well believe that Novatian's consecration was procured by secret, underhand and treacherous dealings. The account which Cornelius gives of the transaction is, that Novatian's agents persuaded three distant Italian bishops to come to Rome to act as mediators between the two parties, feasted and intoxicated them on their arrival, and then compelled them to perform the consecration⁴ [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 43]. Cyprian, contrasting the conduct of Cornelius and Novatian, states that the latter used force and violence: "Non, ut quidam, vim facit ut episcopus fieret, sed ipse vim passus est, ut episcopatum conatus acciperet" [Cypr. Ep. lv.]. Of the three consecrators, one not long afterwards, returned to the Church, mourning and confessing his error. He was admitted to lay communion. The other two were deposed. Many of the Roman confessors had sided with Novatian. Cornelius was soon able to inform Cyprian of their return to the unity of the Church [Cypr. Ep. xlix.].

Novatian and Fortunatus⁵ followed the custom of the Church in notifying their election to other sees, and Novatian was anxious to be recognised by the three great Churches of Carthage, Antioch, and Alexandria. His legates arrived at Carthage while a council was sitting, and were at once repelled [Cypr. Ep. xlv.], upon the representation of four African bishops, who at the same time returned from Rome, where, with fourteen others, they had been present at the election of Cornelius, and now bore testimony to the validity of that election.¹ The letter of Cornelius to Fabius of Antioch, which has been quoted so often, was probably a reply to inquiries of Fabius in consequence of a missive from Novatian. Dionysius of Alexandria answers Novatian, "If as you say, you were forced against your will, you will shew it by retiring voluntarily" [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 45].

³ Pacian states that Novatian assumed episcopal authority upon the receipt of a letter from the confessors, without consecration. "Novatianus . . . quem absentem Epistola episcopum finxit, quem, consecrante nullo, linteata sedes accepit" [ii. p. 196]. "Sine consecratione legitima episcopum factum, ideoque nec factum per Epistolam eorum qui se confessores esse simularent" [p. 198]. "Novatus . . . ex Africa . . . Romam venit; et cum apud Carthaginem, urgentibus in ecclesia fratribus, dies cognitionis ipsius immineret, et hic latitavit: nec multo post Novatianum istum episcopatu Corneliæ anxium, (nam sibi speraverat) cum aliquantisper, ut in tali re solet, ex sua parte fautoribus nutantem impellit, dubitantem fovet; . . . invenit aliquos ex eorum numero qui tempestatem persecutionis illius evaserunt, apud quos hanc ipsam de lapsis receptis Cornelio conflaret invidiam: dat eorum Epistolas ad Novatianum: ille ex auctoritate epistolarum, sedente jam Romæ Episcopo, adversum fas, sacerdotii singularis alterius Episcopi sibi nomen assumit: Cornelium lapsis communicasse arguit: se vindicat innocentem" [iii. p. 202]. This account is quite compatible with that given above. Novatian thus assuming the title of bishop, would soon find a consecration necessary, and procure it by any means. The account indicates (if true) not settled presbyterian principles, but a disbelief of the necessity of any ordination whatever. Theodoret states that Novatian went himself into Italy to find and bring the three bishops. This is contradicted by Cornelius' account of the transaction.

The Novatians now endeavoured to support their cause by assuming the appearance of superior sanctity. They restricted the power of the keys, denying at first its extension to those who had apostatized in persecution, then to those who committed certain greater crimes after baptism. The power of binding and loosing was in fact ultimately limited to the remission of sins in baptism.² They took the title of Cathari, and asserted that all besides themselves had forfeited their catholicity. They rebaptized those who joined them. This shew of sanctity and rigour of discipline doubtless prevailed with some: some it alienated; of whom an example is given by Socrates, who reports that Atticus of Constantinople drew the distinction between Novatian and his followers, approving the refusal of communion to those who had sacrificed, condemning the refusal to the laity who had been guilty of less heinous crimes [Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 25].

The great cause of the rapid increase of this sect was that they gained the secular power to their side, enabling them to form themselves into a corporation to purchase lands and build churches; and further protecting them by law in invading not only the sees of the Catholics and their spiritual rights, but their temporalities also, which the schismatics were enabled to use for carrying on their schism. This appears from Constantine's edict of restitution, which will be quoted below. Decius declared his mortal and irreconcilable hatred to Cornelius. He had put Fabian to death, and "would rather hear of a rival prince than of a priest of God setting himself up at Rome" [Cypr. Ep. lv.].

From the tenor of Dionysius' reply to Novatian it appears that Novatian asserted (with what truth we are not able to say) that he was compelled by the Emperor's threats to accept the bishopric; for Dionysius tells him it is a duty to suffer anything, even martyrdom, rather than to afflict the Church of God. Novatian could not have pretended that he was in danger of martyrdom from the Roman clergy if he refused to be made bishop. But it is uncertain how far Novatian's letter of excuse told the whole truth. The exemption of the Novatians, however, from persecution under Gallus and Volusianus can hardly be accounted for on any other supposition than that of favour shewn from the first to Novatian as the rival of Cornelius. Decius' death was late in the year 251. Persecution then ceased for about seven months, and recommenced upon the refusal of the Christians to sacrifice at the heathen altars of propitiation. In August 252, Cyprian wrote to Cornelius, who was then in exile, and his letter contrasts the sufferings of the Catholics with the rest the heretics enjoyed [Ep. lx.]. Now we do not suspect the Novatians of sacrificing; and that their refusal to sacrifice was overlooked can be attributed only to some earlier concordat with the government. If they had been persecuted under Decius' government, although they were Cornelius' rivals, it is difficult to assign the ground on which such a concordat can have been made in the seven months of rest. It is far easier to suppose that they were favoured from the first as enemies of Cornelius. Novatian retired from Rome, it is true, at the time of the Decian persecution; but if he left his followers under persecution, a letter on Jewish meats, without one word of exhortation to constancy and patience, was surely a singular mode of seeking to edify them. His retirement may have been only to save appearances.

In Carthage, early in the year 251, the five presbyters who opposed Cyprian were associated with the magistrates in an edict, says Cyprian, that they might overthrow our faith, and turn away the hearts of the brethren [Ep. xliii.]. This makes it more probable that a like course was pursued at Rome. Cyprian's Epistle to Lucius [xi.] speaks also of the freedom which the Novatians enjoyed; God's secret ordering so contrived it, he says, that the punishment was a test which distinguished the true Church; the devil attacked only the soldiers and fortresses of Christ, he passed by the heretics once prostrated and already made his own. He expressly limits the persecution to the Church of Christ and its bishop Cornelius.

It is to feared then that, as at Carthage the heretical presbyters joined the magistrates against Cyprian, so at Rome the Novatians joined the secular power in this persecution for the sake of removing the Catholic bishops, and setting themselves as successors in their sees. How far the Novatians profited by the persecution and availed themselves of it, is at least clear from the laws we are now to name, which prove that they had churches, cemeteries, and houses, possessed by them a long time as their freehold, even from the beginning of their schism, some of which belonged to the Catholic bishops and clergy.

Constantine's law is rather favourable than otherwise to the sect. "Novatianos non adeo comperimus prædamatos, ut iis, quæ petiverunt, crederemus minime largienda. Itaque ecclesiæ suæ domos et loca sepulchris apta sine inquietudine eos firmiter possidere præcipimus: ea scilicet, quæ ex diuturno tempore vel ex empto habuerunt, vel qualibet quæsiverunt ratione. Sane providendum erit ne quid sibi usurpare conentur ex his, quæ ante dissidium ad ecclesias perpetuæ sanctitatis pertinuisse manifestum est." Dat. vii. Kal. Oct. Spoleti, Constantino A. vii., et Constantio C. Coss. [A.D. 326].¹ The law of Theodosius the younger and Valentinian III. is general: "Hæreticorum ita est reprimenda insania, ut ante omnia quas ab orthodoxis abreptas tenent ubicunque ecclesias, statim catholicæ ecclesiæ tradendas esse non ambigant, quia ferri non potest, ut, qui nec proprias habere debuerant, ab orthodoxis possessas aut conditas suæque temeritate invasas ultra detineant." Section 2 proceeds: "Posthæc, quoniam non omnes eadem austeritate plectendi sunt, Arianis quidem, Macedonianis et Apollinarianis, quorum hoc est facinus, quod nocenti meditatione decepti credunt de veritatis fonte mendacia, intra nullam civitatem ecclesiam habere liceat; Novatianis autem et Sabbatianis (the Sabbatians were the Judaizing Novatians) omnis innovationis adimatur licentia, si quam forte tentaverint; Eunomiani vero . . . et Manichæi nusquam in Romano solo conveniendi orandique habeant facultatem;" Dat. iii. Kal. Jun. Constantinopoli, Felice et Tauro Coss. [A.D. 428]. [Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. v. legg. I. 65.] The first and third clauses of this latter section referring to holding places of worship, the meaning of "innovatio" in the second clause must be trespass upon the Catholic churches, and change of their destination from Catholic worship to heretical.

The sixth title also of the same book, "Ne sanctum baptisma iteretur," appears to refer primarily to the Novatians, as the chief sect which then rebaptized. The first law of Valentinian and Valens [A.D. 373] declares the Antistes who rebaptizes to be unworthy of the priesthood; the second, of Valens, Gratian, and Valentinian [A.D. 377], condemning rebaptism, proceeds, "Eos igitur auctoritas tua erroribus miseris jubebit absistere, ecclesiis, quas contra fidem retinent, restitutis catholicis." The law is directed "ad Flavianum Vicarium Africae."² From all this it may be concluded that the Novatians did what the Donatists and Arians did—the Donatists courted Julian the Apostate, the Arians complied not only with the Meletian schismatics, but with the heathens, to make their party stronger. [DONATISTS. ARIANS.] It is indeed the natural and common course of schismatical action.

To this favour shewn by the emperors and their governments is to be attributed the increase of the sect, after the severe blow which it received when the confessors returned to the Catholic Church.³ The error of the confessors it is not difficult to understand. "It is natural for men who have distinguished themselves in any way from the rest to consider themselves an exclusive party. Where this distinction is of a dangerous nature they consider themselves as the elect, and are fain to shew their election visibly to the world, as well as palpably to represent it to themselves, by drawing a line between themselves and the general body. The martyrs, therefore, sometimes as weak in understanding as they were strong in resolution, were a ready prey to the flattery of such as wished to use them for the instruments of schism" [Evans' Biog. of Early Church, ii. p. 273].⁴ The error lasted but a short time. Cyprian's interposition was successful; the confessors publicly acknowledged their fault, and submitted to the rightful authority of Cornelius [Cypr. Ep. xlii. xlvii. xlix.].

The letter of Dionysius of Alexandria, given by Eusebius [H. E. vii. 5], and Eusebius' words introducing it, have been quoted to prove a rapid decline of the party. We venture to think that this arises from misinterpretation. Eusebius represents the Churches of the East as averse to the innovations of Novatian, and as at peace among themselves, that is, on the point of the re-baptism of heretics. This question had caused an interruption of communion: and the restoration of communion among themselves, not the return of the majority of the Novatians to the Church, appears to be the peace which Dionysius refers to. There are many proofs of the wide extension of the Novatian body. Cyprian writes thus: "Per plurimas civitates novos apostolos suos mittit . . . ille super episcopos in persecutione proscriptos creare alios pseudo-episcopos audet" [Ep. lv.]. We have no complete catalogue of these intruding bishops, but we meet with them frequently in history: Maximus at Carthage [Cyp. Ep. lix.], Acesius of Constantinople [Socr. Hist. Eccl. I. vii.], Agelius of Constantinople [ibid. v. 12], Leontius of Rome [ibid. v. 14], are examples. "Socrates speaks of their sees at Constantinople, Nice, Nicomedia, and Cotiaenus in Phrygia, as the chief sees of the sect in the fourth century, in the East at least; for

⁴ Evans ascribes to the desperation which Novatian felt at his adherents thus deserting him, the impiety, which Cornelius relates, of forcing communicants in the Holy Eucharist to swear that they would not return to Cornelius [Biogr. Early Church, ii. 283]. It is difficult to believe the story; and the tone of Cornelius' letter makes one judge that he would not be very careful in examining the evidence on which it rested.

² Jerome speaks of Novatian's remaining at this time "nudatus et pene solus."

he supposeth them besides very numerous in the West. The pieces written against them by St. Ambrose, Pacian, the anonymous author of the Questions out of the Old and New Testament, the notice taken of them by Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, the accounts given of them by Socrates and Sozomen, are proofs of their being numerous, and in most parts of the world, in the fourth and fifth centuries. Eulogius of Alexandria wrote against them not long before the end of the sixth century" [Lardner, Credib. part II. ch. xlvii.].

In Phrygia, where on account of the national character and manners of the people the Novatian sect greatly flourished, a subordinate schism took place through the introduction of the Quarto-deciman dispute. It began under Valentinian and Valens, i.e. about A.D. 270, when a small synod at Pazus, a village at the source of the Sangaris, decreed that the Jewish Paschal reckoning should be adopted. The leading Novatian bishops were not present at this synod, and the matter appears to have rested until, under Valentinian II. and Theodosius, the question was again brought up by a presbyter, Sabbatius, a convert from Judaism. Marcian, his bishop, called a council to consider the subject. The council declared the point to be indifferent, and no just cause of separation or of breach of communion. Sabbatius would not yield. He gathered followers, and was made bishop (by what consecrators does not appear), although he had before taken an oath that he would not be consecrated. [Socr. Hist. Eccl. iv. 13, v. 20; Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vi. 24, vii. 18]. These Quartodeciman Novatians appear to have coalesced with the Montanists, their notions of discipline being nearly the same, but we are not told whether in this coalition the Novatians adopted the Montanist new prophecy, or the Montanists abandoned it.

The formal action of the Church regarding the Novatian sect was as follows. Immediately upon the consecration of Novatian a council was called at Rome by Cornelius in the year 251. Sixty bishops and as many presbyters assembled. Novatian and his followers were declared to be separated from the Church, and it was decreed that the brethren who had fallen were to be admitted to the remedies of repentance [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 43]. Eusebius states that the epistles of Cornelius shew not only the transactions of the Council of Rome, but the opinions of all those in Italy and Africa. The opinions of the Africans were delivered in a council, A.D. 251, mentioned by Cyprian, Ep. lvii.; and Jerome speaks of three councils, supposing that the opinions of the Italians were formally delivered also in an Italian Council. At Antioch also a council was held, A.D. 253, which came to the same determination. It was summoned by Fabius, but he died before it met; and it was held by his successor Demetrianus [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 46].

The Council of Nicæa assigned to the Cathari their place in the Church upon reconciliation. Canon viii. decreed that those already ordained should continue to rank among the clergy,¹ upon written promise that they would adhere to the decrees of the Catholic Church, that is, that they would communicate with those who had married a second time, and those who had lapsed under persecution, to whom a term of penance had been assigned. In places where there were no other clergy they were to remain in their order; where there was a bishop or priest of the Catholic Church that bishop was to retain his dignity, the Novatian bishop having the honour of a priest, unless the bishop should think fit to allow him the nominal honour of episcopate, otherwise the bishop was to provide for him the place of a chorepiscopus, or of a priest, so that there should not be two bishops in one city.²

The Council of Laodicea, A.D. 367, directs that the Novatians are not to be received until they have anathematized all heresy, especially that in which they have been engaged. Their communicants, having learnt the creeds and having been anointed with the chrism, may then partake of the holy mysteries [can. vii.]. The Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, receives "the Sabbatians and Novatians who call themselves Cathari,"³ if they give in a written renunciation of their errors, and anathematize heresy, by sealing them with the holy chrism on forehead, eyes, nose, mouth, and ears, with the words, The Seal of the Gift of the Holy Spirit" [can. vii.]. The Council of Telepte (Thala in Numidia), A.D. 418, decreed "Ut venientes a Novatianis vel Montensibus per manus imposi-

² It may be noticed that the Præfatio Arabica mentions the washings, purifications, and fastings of the Cathari; and states that, while they preserved the faith and retained the Scriptures, they asserted that there was no place for repentance of sin after baptism, and consequently admitted none to absolution [Hardouin, Concil. i. 1018 B].

tionem suscipiantur, ex eo quod rebaptizant" [Brun's Canones Apost. et Concil. i. p. 154]. The sixth of Carthage [A.D. 419] enforced and explained Nic. I. viii.; see last note. The second of Arles [A.D. 452] directs that a Novatian shall not be received into communion without undergoing penance for his disbelief, and condemning his error [can. ix.]. Of these the Constantinopolitan canon is to be noticed as determining, against St. Basil, the validity of Novatian baptism.¹ In Basil's first canonical epistle, to Amphilochius, canons i. and xlvii. involve this point. There are several difficulties regarding their interpretation, but thus much seems to be clear that Basil proceeded on the general principle of the invalidity of lay baptism; and, arguing that the Cathari had no longer the communication of the Holy Ghost, having broken the succession, that being schismatics, they were become laymen, he ordered them (at least such of them as had received only Novatian baptism) to be received into the Church by baptism. The first Council of Arles [A.D. 314] had laid down the principle that those baptized in the name of the Holy Trinity should be received by imposition of hands [can. viii.].

There must be noticed, lastly, the conduct of several distinguished prelates towards the Novatians as recorded by Socrates. Cyril of Alexandria, we are told, shut up their churches, and took away all their sacred vessels and ornaments, and deprived Theopemptus, their bishop, of all that he had. Innocent I. persecuted them at Rome, and took from them many churches. Celestinus followed the same course [Socrat. Hist. Eccl. vii. 7, 9, 11]. The particulars of these transactions we do not know, but after the proofs we have had of the violent intrusion of the schismatics into Catholic churches, it is as easy to suppose, and is far more likely, that what Socrates represents as persecution and robbery was only discipline and restitution. The Novatians suffered together with the Catholics in the Arian persecution under Constantius about the year 356.

Such are the main points which have come down to us of the history of the Novatians. From this contention the Catholic system of the Church, deeply rooted and thoroughly compact in all its parts, came forth victorious; and the Novatians were reduced to an inconsiderable party about the middle of the fifth century.

It remains only to define the heresy which was superadded to this schism. Several authors have ascribed to Novatian a denial of the possibility of salvation to those who after baptism fall into the greater or deadly sins. That this is an exaggeration is shewn by Petavius, and our limits compel us simply to refer to his Essay. Novatian denied that the Church can reconcile them. It has already been pointed out that Novatian's change of opinion on this point was not a change of degree of rigour of discipline, but a change of principle; and his new principle must be judged heretical. Cyprian did not scruple to call Novatian a heretic, and the great Dionysius, whose proceedings were both cautious and charitable, wrote thus:—"It is with good reason that we detest Novatian for rending asunder (as he has done) the Church, drawing some of the brethren into impieties and blasphemies, introducing a novel and most impious doctrine respecting God, traducing our most kind Lord Jesus Christ as devoid of pity, and in addition to all this, setting at nought the holy laver, subverting the faith and confession which precedes it, and utterly putting to flight from among them the Holy Spirit" [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 8].

The Church being the Body of Christ, where there is a possibility of salvation there must be in the same degree the possibility of reconciliation to the Church. The means of grace being in and through the Church, repentance has by God's promise a valid title to be met by the ordinances of the Church. Holy men will differ as to the due period of penance: to refuse reconciliation and the means of grace altogether, involves a denial of God's mercy either primarily, which in terms Novatian was not guilty of, or secondarily, in the denial of His mercy through the Church. And those who consider the office and nature of the Church, and the extent of the power of the keys, cannot but judge it heretical to assert that the covenant of mercy in the Church has narrower limits than the primary mercy of God in Christ.

NUDIPEDES. [EXCALCEATI.]

NYCTAGES. A name derived from νυκτάζειν or νυκτάζειν, and given to those who repudiated the night hours of prayer, on the ground that as the day is divinely ordained for work, so the night is equally ordained for rest and sleep. [Isidor. de Hæres. lxiv.; Paulus, de Hæres. lii.; Ebrard. in Bibl. Max. xxiv. 1577]. They are also spoken of under the name of Dormitantes by St. Jerome in his treatise against Vigilantius.

OCCAMITES. The school of English Nominalists, or rather the revivers of Nominalism, who followed William of Occham's lead in the first half of the fourteenth century, and whose opposition to Realism brought about the decline of scholastic philosophy. [SCHOOLMEN.]

OLD CATHOLICS. The Old Catholic movement originated in Germany, where it still has its headquarters, though it now extends over other Catholic countries of Europe, and beyond it. And it is necessary, in order to understand its true nature and significance, to go back some years and examine briefly the remoter causes out of which it sprang. When both Catholic and Protestant theology woke from the long religious sleep of the last century, they were at once brought face to face with each other in their revived energy in the mixed religious society and mixed universities of Germany; and thus a spirit of honest scientific inquiry was engendered, which soon came to be viewed with great jealousy at Rome. The Congregation of the Index, whose arbitrary and unintelligent method of procedure was exposed some years ago in the posthumous Letters of one of its Austrian Consultors [Briefe aus Rom, von Dr. Flir, Innsbruck, 1864], was set to work, and few distinguished names among the Catholic divines of Germany, such as Hermes and Gunther, escaped its censure. As a rule they were condemned unheard, without explanation of reasons or opportunity of appeal, and for the most part they made a formal submission, and so the matter ended. Some years ago, however, a book on the Soul was published by Dr. Froschammer, of Munich, based on copious authorities from Fathers and Catholic divines, which for some unexplained reason was placed on the Index. He requested information as to the grounds of the sentence, which was, as usual, peremptorily refused; and on his declining, under these circumstances, to make an unconditional ex animo submission, he found himself (in 1863) ipso facto excommunicated. This occurrence may have helped to precipitate the crisis, though Dr. Froschammer, who has now abandoned the standpoint of Christian belief altogether, never had any connection with the Old Catholic movement, except as its bitter assailant both in the Contemporary Review and in various German periodicals.

In September 1863 a Conference of about a hundred Catholic scholars and divines (which Dr. Froschammer did not attend) was held in the Benedictine abbey at Munich, under the presidency of Dr. Döllinger, and with the full sanction of the archbishop, who sang high mass at the opening. It was designed at once to form a bond of union between the Catholic divines of Germany and to illustrate the real harmony of scientific and religious truth. The president's inaugural address [Die Vergangenheit und Gegenwart der kath. Theologie], which has unfortunately never been translated into English, but of which an excellent summary appeared in the Home and Foreign Review for January 1864, contains a masterly sketch of the growth of Catholic theology from the Alexandrian school of the second century down to our own days. It was however unfavourably received by the party who have the ear of Rome, and early in 1864 a Papal Brief was addressed to the Archbishop of Munich, denouncing the methods and spirit of German theology, and asserting the absolute supremacy of scholasticism and of the Roman Congregations. This was understood on all sides as a censure of the Munich Conference, which accordingly did not meet again in that year, as had been intended; and when, some months later, the now famous Syllabus was issued, it was felt that war to the knife with Catholic Germany had been proclaimed by the authorities at Rome.

It was not to be expected that the German Catholic divines would acquiesce in the finality of a verdict almost avowedly intended to suppress them. It could only become final on the assumption of Papal infallibility, which they had never accepted, and which, though a popular Ultramontane opinion, was no doctrine of the Church. But the Jesuits, who for the last twenty-five years have been supreme at Rome, were resolved to enforce, in its fullest and most obnoxious sense, the teaching of the Syllabus, which, in fact, was their own work [see Stimmen aus Maria Laach, Freiburg im Breisgau, 1868-70], and they had for years been sedulously pioneering the way for a definition which would summarily dispose of all controversies by the infallible arbitrament of Rome. The main outlines of their policy are traced in the earlier pages of Janus [The Pope and the Council, Rivingtons], and its results may be studied at length in the Letters of Quirinus [Rivingtons], which Bishop Strossmayer has declared to be "the truest compendium of the proceedings of the Vatican Council" which he has seen. When in 1868 a General Council was summoned for the ensuing year, there could be little doubt of its real object, though no hint of it was given in the Bull of Indiction; and a series of papers which appeared early in 1869 in the Civiltà Cattolica, the authorized Jesuit organ of the Holy See, raised suspicion into moral certainty. A Catholic writer in the Allgemeine Zeitung replied in what now forms the earlier portion of Janus, and in the summer of the same year an influentially signed address from Catholic laymen at Coblenz, combating the Jesuit programme for the Council, was presented to the Bishop of Trèves. In September the German bishops issued a joint Pastoral from Fulda, declaring against any doctrinal innovations. It is not our business here to write the history of the Vatican Council, which met on December 8th, 1869. Suffice it to say, that the 55 Schemata to be laid before it had been carefully prepared beforehand, in strict secrecy, under Jesuit auspices. Two of them, after undergoing some modifications, were passed—the Schema de Fide, on April 24th, and the Schema de Ecclesiâ, including the chapters on the supreme universal jurisdiction and infallible teaching of the Pope, on July 13th, by 451 *placet*s against 88 *non-placet*s, and 61 conditional votes, while 91 members abstained from voting at all. The minority bishops handed in a protest, and left Rome before the Solemn Session of July 18th, when the voting was of course all but unanimous. Their objections, both to the dogma and the validity of the Council, may be seen at length in the official Synopsis Analytica Observationum, reprinted in Friedrich's Documenta ad Illustrandum Conc. Vat. [Nördlingen 1871], and summarized in Lord Acton's Sendschreiben an einen deutschen Bischoff [Nördlingen 1870]. Nevertheless, within a short time, nearly all of them outwardly succumbed, though the Austrian bishops and some others have never made any pretence of enforcing the decrees. Bishop Hefele held out for nearly a twelvemonth, when he was reduced by a refusal to renew his quinquennial faculties; Archbishop Darboy was murdered by the Commune; Bishop Strossmayer still remains firm. In August 1870 the North German bishops assembled at Fulda, and issued a Pastoral promulgating the Vatican decrees, thereby, as Professor Reinkens has expressed it, "affirming the precise opposite of their Pastoral of the previous year, and of their declarations at Rome." This public announcement that no help could be looked for from the bishops proved the signal for a vigorous resistance to the new articles of faith. Lord Acton's Letter, already referred to, appeared a month afterwards; and in the same month appeared what may be called the first Old Catholic manifesto, publicly rejecting the Vatican decrees, issued by a large body of Catholic professors at Nuremberg. It may be found at length in the article on "The Altkatholik Movement" in the Theological Review for Jan. 1872.

The time was now come for Döllinger, whose studious and Conservative instincts and his habitual deference to authority would have made him shrink from courting such a position, to be forced to the front of the contest. The Archbishop of Munich, on his return from Rome, had summoned the Theological Faculty, and called on them for their adhesion to the Vatican decrees, which was refused [Friedrich's Tagebuch, pp. 389, sq.]; but all except two had subsequently succumbed, including Haneberg, Abbot of St. Boniface, who has since been made Bishop of Spire. By the end of March [1871] the two recalcitrants, Döllinger and Friedrich, were required to make their formal submission, and on March 29th Döllinger handed in his famous Erklärung (a full translation of which may be read in the Union Review for May 1871), which at once struck a chord that vibrated throughout Catholic Germany. It announced his definite rejection of the dogma of papal infallibility, as contrary to Scripture and Tradition, based on spurious authorities, condemned by the Councils of Constance and Basle, and incompatible with the existing civil order of European States. On Palm Sunday [April 2nd] a Pastoral was read in all the churches of Munich condemning his views. He pontificated for the last time on Easter Sunday in the Chapel Royal, and received on the same day an address of sympathy from the Catholic Professors of the University. On Easter Monday a public meeting to express sympathy with him was held in the Museum, and an address to the King denouncing the new dogma received 12,000 signatures. The Archbishop declared all the signatories to be ipso facto excommunicate, and on April 18th pronounced the greater excommunication against Döllinger by name, as a formal heretic. Friedrich had been already excommunicated. The "venerable Nestor of Catholic theology" was thus placed, by no choice of his own, at the head of the movement which was now fairly begun. In Whitsun week he presided over a preliminary conference of Catholic divines from various parts of Germany held at Munich, which set forth the aims and principles of the movement in a programme forming the basis of that afterwards adopted by the first Old Catholic Congress. In this document the validity of censures pronounced on priests or laymen for rejecting the Vatican Council is openly denied. And accordingly, when a Munich professor who died in the following June, Dr. Zenger, was refused the last sacraments by his parish priest, on account of his having signed the address to Dr. Döllinger, Dr. Friedrich administered them to him, and performed the rites of burial in the presence of 20,000 persons, including nearly all his colleagues in the professoriate. He was also called on to marry couples who were refused on similar grounds by the parish priests, and a petition with 18,000 signatures, chiefly of heads of families, was presented to the Government on the subject. But although several members of the Bavarian Chambers and Cabinet had taken part in the Whitsuntide meeting, and the Government had declined the request of the bishops to set aside Dr. Döllinger's election in July as Rector Magnificus of the University, by the unprecedented majority of 54 votes against 6, it was not till the end of August that an official note was issued by Herr von Lutz, the Minister of Worship, intimating that the Government did not recognise the legal validity of the Vatican decrees, and would maintain the rights of its Catholic subjects, whether clergy or laity, who rejected them. The action of the Government has however throughout been undecided and evasive, and Professor Huber observed at the Congress of Cologne last September [1872] that if they had talked less and done more, half Munich would long ago have openly joined the movement.

The first Old Catholic Congress met at Munich on Friday, September 22nd, 1871, and sat for three days. Schulte, Professor of Canon Law at Prague, but a Prussian by birth, presided, and the Committee for drawing up the resolutions consisted, besides himself, of Professors Maassen of Vienna, Langen of Bonn, Reinkens of Breslau, Huber of Munich, and Döllinger. The Vice-presidents were Keller of Aarau, and Professor Windscheid of Heidelberg; Professor Schwicker of Ofen and Stumpf of Coblenz were secretaries. Deputies were present from every part of Germany, and the meeting was in fact the response of Catholic Germany to Döllinger's Declaration of the previous March; but there were also representatives of nearly every European country and of North America and Brazil, together with three priests of the so-called Jansenist Church of Utrecht, and Dr. Ossinin, a theological professor at St Petersburg. The main part of the programme, agreed upon after full and minute discussion, ought to be put on record here, defining as it does the doctrinal basis and scope of the movement, and thereby clearly establishing its distinctively Catholic character.

"I. In the consciousness of our religious duties we hold fast to the ancient Catholic faith as witnessed in Scripture and Tradition, and the ancient Catholic worship. We therefore claim our full rights as members of the Catholic Church, and refuse to be thrust out of Church communion or of the ecclesiastical and civil rights appertaining thereto. We declare the Church censures inflicted on us for our loyalty to our faith to be objectless and arbitrary, and shall not be disturbed or hindered in conscience thereby in our active participation in Church communion. From the standpoint of the confession of faith contained in the Tridentine Creed, we reject the doctrines introduced under the pontificate of Pius IX., in contradiction to the teaching of the Church, and the principles observed from the Apostolic Council downwards, especially the dogma of 'the infallible teaching office' and 'supreme ordinary and immediate jurisdiction,' of the Pope.

"II. We adhere to the ancient constitution of the Church. We reject every attempt to thrust out the bishops from the immediate and independent government of the separate churches. We reject the doctrine embodied in the Vatican decrees, that the Pope is the sole divinely ordained depositary of all ecclesiastical authority and official power, as contradicting the Tridentine canon, according to which the divinely ordained hierarchy consists of bishops, priests, and deacons. We acknowledge the primacy of the Roman Pontiff, as it was acknowledged on the ground of Scripture by the Fathers and Councils of the ancient undivided Church.

"[1] We declare that articles of faith cannot be defined simply by the decision of the existing Pope, and the express or tacit assent of the bishops, who are pledged by oath to unconditional obedience to him, but only in harmony with Holy Scripture and the ancient tradition of the Church, as contained in the acknowledged Fathers and Councils. Even a Council not deficient, like the Vatican, in essential outward conditions of œcumenicity, and where the breach with the fundamental principles and past history of the Church is consummated by the unanimous vote of its members, could not issue decrees binding on the conscience of any members of the Church.

"[2] We maintain that the dogmatic decisions of a Council must be shewn to agree with the original and traditional faith of the Church in the consciousness of the Catholic people and in theological science. We reserve to the Catholic laity and clergy, as also to scientific theology, the right of bearing testimony or of objecting in the establishment of rules of faith.

"[3] We desire by the aid of theology and canon law, and in the spirit of the ancient Church, to effect a reform which shall remove existing abuses and defects, and fulfil the legitimate desires of the Catholic laity for a constitutional participation in Church affairs, whereby national views and needs may be recognised without prejudice to doctrinal unity. We declare that the charge of Jansenism has been unjustly brought against the Church of Utrecht, and that consequently there is no dogmatic difference between us. We hope for a reunion with the Oriental and Russian Churches, whose separation had no urgent cause, and is based on no irreconcilable dogmatic differences. In view of the reforms we are striving for, and in the way of science and advancing Christian culture, we look for a gradual understanding with the Protestant and the Episcopal Churches."

The remaining paragraphs deal with the necessity of searching reforms in clerical education and discipline, the political aspects of the new dogma, and the pernicious moral and social results of Jesuit teaching, which ought therefore to be suppressed; and the last clause affirms the full civil rights of the Altkatholiken "to all real property and possessions of the Church." It was further resolved that unions (Vereine) for organizing the movement should be formed throughout Germany, and religious congregations (Gemeinde) wherever circumstances required it. One such congregation had already been established in the Church of St. Nicholas at Munich, and they are now spread over the country, the first effect generally being that, wherever an Old Catholic church is opened, the regular parish priests at once cease from asking any questions about the new dogma in the confessional. In Austria, where no difficulty is made about giving the sacraments to Old Catholics, separate congregations have not been established. Dr. Schulte, who presided at both the first and second Old Catholic Congress, continued to live on intimate terms with the Cardinal Archbishop of Prague (Schwarzenberg) until he quite recently migrated to Bonn, where a chair had been offered him. The Munich Congress, which first gave to the movement a definite organization, established two points beyond possibility of doubt; viz. that it represents no mere local or temporary phase of opinion, and that it does not aspire, like the so-called "German Catholics" or Lichtfreunde of a quarter of a century ago, to add one more sect to the multitudinous progeny of the Reformation, but is a bona fide attempt to fulfil the design, again and again proclaimed since the Council of Constance by some of the wisest and holiest of her sons, to effect from within a genuine "reform of the Catholic Church in her head and in her members." It claims to represent the Catholic faith as held up to July 18th, 1870. At the same time it does express what has long been a strong and growing conviction in Germany in favour of restricting Roman influences to what is necessarily involved in the idea of the primacy, and that as well from a deep moral indignation against the habitual policy of the Curia, as with a view to facilitate the reunion of religious bodies separated from the Church. Döllinger himself has avowed his conviction that "Philoctetes has received his death wound, and it is now only a question of time when the movement shall triumph over the curialistic system." And Archbishop Darboy has embodied in the brief but pregnant pamphlet he published towards the close of the Vatican Council [La Dernière Heure du Concile] a similar sentiment: "Les Spartiates, qui étaient tombés aux Thermopyles, pour défendre les terres de la liberté, avaient préparé au flot impitoyable du despotisme la défaite de Salamine." The Congress closed with two public meetings held in the Glass Palace, where addresses were delivered to some thousands of persons by Schulte, Huber, Michelis, Reinkens, Hyacinthe, Van Thiel (from Utrecht), and other speakers, the whole assembly joining in a final tribute to the steadfastness and courage of "the great Nestor of German theology," Dr. Döllinger.

We must pass rapidly over the year intervening between the first and second Congress, which was marked by an extensive development of the movement both in Germany and Switzerland, and the appearance of several learned and able publications in connection with it. The Prussian Government meanwhile expelled the Jesuits and adopted other measures, which it does not fall within the scope of this article to criticise, hostile to Ultramontane interests. Bishop Ketteler of Mayence, who was a leading member of the Opposition at Rome, and the inspirer and dis-seminator of a powerful work [Quæstio] against papal infallibility, soon became the most influential champion of Ultramontanism in the German Episcopate, who assembled again at Fulda in September 1872, and addressed a memorial to the Government endorsing, while it ingeniously misrepresented, the Vatican dogmas. A reply was published, drawn up by the Standing Committee of the Cologne Congress. This memorial seems to have given the immediate occasion of Prince Bismarck's ecclesiastical legislation, which was soon afterwards introduced into the Prussian Landtag. In France Dr. Michaud served the cause by the issue of a remarkable series of eight pamphlets [Paris, Sandoz et Fischbacher], and in the spring of the year Dr. Döllinger delivered at Munich his Lectures on the Reunion of the Churches, since translated into English. In Prussia, Archbishop Melchers of Cologne, and Bishop Crementz of Ermeland, both members of the Opposition at Rome, led the crusade against the anti-infallibilist clergy and professors. In March, four Catholic professors at Bonn, three of whom were priests, were excommunicated by the Archbishop of Cologne—Hilgers, Reusch, Langen, and Knoodt—and vindicated their position in a spirited and telling reply. Shortly before, Mother Augustine (Amalie de Lasaulx), Superior of the Sisters of Charity at Bonn, who was so beloved and revered throughout the Rhineland for her holiness and works of mercy as to be popularly credited with miraculous powers, had been excommunicated and turned out of her convent during her last illness for refusing to accept the Vatican decrees, and was refused the last sacraments and the rites of Christian burial. A weeping crowd followed her to the grave on January 30th, when Dr. Reusch, formerly confessor of the convent, said a few prayers. It was well known that numbers both among the clergy and laity, who lacked the courage or the occasion for openly avowing their sentiments, were of the same mind. The Theological Faculty of Tübingen, e.g. have never submitted, and the venerable Dr. Kuhn, who is at the head of it, has written a work against the dogma, which is only withheld from publication for a time to spare further embarrassment to his diocesan, Bishop Hefele. To the immense majority of the clergy, who are absolutely at the mercy of their bishops in the present abnormal state of the law, resistance would mean starvation, whence the term Hungerdogma has come to be applied to the new article of faith; and there are large classes of the people, as was pointed out at the Cologne Congress by Reinkens, who are dependent on Ultramontane patronage, and would be exposed to ruin or serious loss if they ventured to speak out. The professed Old Catholics form therefore the centre and nucleus of a movement which has a wide circumference. The defection of the German bishops of the minority has supplied the ground and example of an outward conformity, which in numberless cases represents no inward belief.

Notwithstanding these serious difficulties the movement, first organized at the Munich Congress of 1871, had enormously extended its range and influence when the second Congress met at Cologne on September 20th, 1872. The mere fact of its migration from a court and university city like Munich to a busy commercial centre of North Germany, the chief Catholic city of the Rhineland, illustrated the advance made during the past twelvemonth, of which another indication was seen in the presence of the Archbishop of Utrecht¹—who had already held a series of confirmations for Old Catholics in Germany—and of the Bishops of Lincoln, Ely and Maryland, and the Russian Archpriest Janyschew. Letters of sympathy were read from two Eastern Archbishops and the Bishop of Lichfield, and from several distinguished English clergymen and laymen who were unable to be there. In all, about 500 deputies and invited guests from Belgium, Switzerland, Hungary, and Italy, as well as various parts of Germany, took part in the business sessions, and from 3,000 to 4,000 persons attended the two public meetings and the services and sermons in St. Pantaleon's Church. Schulte again presided, with Petri of Wiesbaden and Cornelius of Munich for vice-presidents. This time there was no programme to be drawn up, and the Congress was entirely occupied with practical business, the main points being the further organization of worship and cure of souls (Seelsorge) for Old Catholics, and of means for maintaining their civil rights, and for extending the movement; the appointment of a Committee to make arrangements for appointing one or more Bishops, who will receive consecration at Utrecht; and of a Committee of ten members to promote Reunion, with Döllinger for chairman, Friedrich, Reinkens, Michelis, and Michaud among its members. Two Central Committees were nominated for North and South Germany respectively, and it was resolved that the Congress should be held in alternate years at Munich and Cologne. For a full report of the very interesting speeches delivered both at the private and public sessions, we must refer our readers to the official Acts [Verhandlungen des zweiten Altkath. Congresses], or for an English summary of them to the last article of the Union Review for March 1872. It should be noticed that the same Conservative spirit prevailed as at the first Congress. Advocates of extreme measures, like Bauer and Kaminski, found no support, and Hyacinthe, whose unauthorized marriage had discredited him, was not invited to speak, while the question of organic reforms, as in the law of celibacy, was expressly reserved for "the constitutional organs of the Church." The President began by defining their "stand-point" as "the Catholic one," and added, "Those who do not hold to the ground of positive believing Christianity, as contained in the Scriptures and the truly Œcumenical Councils, we cannot regard as Catholics, nor can they have any active participation in our work." And the Archbishop of Utrecht insisted amid general applause on the necessity of maintaining Catholic unity.

At the time of the Congress the movement had made little progress in Switzerland, but it has since advanced rapidly, especially in the diocese of Basle, where several Altkatholik congregations have now been formed. During the first fortnight of December, Reinkens, in compliance with urgent invitations addressed to him, visited Olten, Soleure, Berne, Rheinfelden, and Lucerne, where he addressed enthusiastic audiences; on his departure six parishes had openly joined the movement, and several more have since followed their example. Meanwhile the bishop, Mgr. Lachat, who had made every effort to enforce the Vatican decrees by suspension and excommunication, became involved in disputes with the Diocesan Conference of the seven Cantons under his jurisdiction, and eventually with the Government. In February last Reinkens and Michelis addressed a meeting of 3,000 persons in the Old Council Hall of Constance, and one of the churches there is now assigned to the Old Catholics. On June 4th a select body of clergy and laymen, assembled at St. Pantaleon's Church, Cologne, elected Dr. Reinkens, late Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Breslau, Missionary Bishop for the Old Catholics of Germany, and he was consecrated at Rotterdam by the Bishop of Deventer on August 11th, 1873, according to the Roman rite, but without any recognition of the Pope's supremacy. He is a man of great learning and eloquence and profound earnestness, and has contributed to the pending controversy an able treatise on the Papal Decrees of July 18th, 1870, in six parts. Until a bishop was appointed the movement, successful as it has already proved, could not be considered to have passed beyond its tentative and initial stage.

We have not spoken of Italy, as the movement has not yet taken shape there, but Mr. Chauncey Langdon, American chaplain at Florence, bore testimony at the Cologne Congress to the sympathy felt for it among both ecclesiastics and laity, and they have an organ in the Rinnovamento Cattolico at Florence. Signor Mamiani, a member of the Italian Parliament, also wrote to express his sympathy. In France political events have conspired with episcopal absolutism to repress any outward resistance to the dominant Ultramontanism. But there is practically no interference with the widespread personal disbelief in the Vatican dogmas, and many of the bishops are with good reason suspected of retaining the convictions they so emphatically expressed at the Council.

It will be a convenience to those who desire further information if we append to this necessarily brief sketch some references to works bearing on the antecedents, history, and character of the Old Catholic movement. OLD LIGHT ANTIBURGHERS. [ANTIBURGHERS.]

OLD LIGHT BURGHERS. [BURGHERS.]

OLD LUTHERANS. Those Lutherans of Prussia are so called who have not joined the UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH.

OLD SCHOOL BAPTISTS. A party among the American Baptists who adhere to the original strict notions respecting predestination and election, in opposition to the tendency which the younger generation of the sect shews towards the doctrine of free will and towards universalism. The Old School Baptists deny that the salvation of souls can depend on human effort, and maintain the strictest Calvinism in regard to the doctrine of election.

OLD SCHOOL PRESBYTERIANS. [PRESBYTERIANS.]

OMISH CHURCH. A sect of American strict Mennonites, who are said to take their peculiar name from Jacob Amen, a Swiss Mennonite preacher of Amenthal, of the seventeenth century, and to have been originally called "Amenites." Some still remaining in Switzerland are called "Hook Mennonites" or "Button Mennonites" according as they wear hooks or buttons on their coats. The American sect is analogous to that of the FLEMINGS or "Fine" Mennonites of Holland.

ΟΜΦΑΛΟΨΥΧΟΙ. [HESYCHASTS.]

OPHITES [Οφίτες]. An Egyptian sect of very early date, the principles of which appear to have been a compound of the mysteries of Isis, and of the involved fancies of Oriental mythology, mingled with corrupt notions of Christian history and doctrine. St. Cyprian mentions them by name [Cypr. Ep. lxxiii. 4]; and the last chapter but one of Irenæus' first book is supposed to be written against them and the SETHIANS [Iren. adv. Hær. i. 30]. Origen calls them "a very obscure sect," and denies that they were Christians, saying "that no person was allowed to join their assemblies till he had uttered curses against Jesus" [Orig. contr. Cels. iii. 13, vi. 24]. He also says that they were founded by a man named Euphrates [ibid. vi. 28], a name mentioned by Theodoret as that belonging to the founder of the heresy of the PERATE [Theodor. Hær. fab. i. 17]; but which in the account of the Naasseni or Ophites given by Hippolytus is taken as the name of the mystical water of life spoken of in John iv. 10. Hippolytus looks upon the Ophites as the originators of all heresies, and associates them both with the Jews and the Gnostics; for he writes of them under the Hebrew form of their name as "the Naasseni" [from נָחַשׁ nachash], "who call themselves Gnostics" [Hippol. Refut. v. 6]. Philaster places them first in his list of heresies before Christ [Philast. de. Hær. i.], while Epiphanius and St. Augustine say that they were alleged to have been derived from the Nicolaitanes or the Gnostics. [Epiphan. Panar. xxxvii. Aug. de Hær. xvii.]

The author of the Treatise against all Heresies which goes by the name of Tertullian says of the Ophites that they derived their name from the reverence which they entertained towards the tempter of Eve, who brought into the world the knowledge of good and evil. It was in reference to his power and majesty, they alleged, that Moses set up the brazen serpent, and they brought our Lord's words [John iii. 14] in support of this notion; thus shewing their acquaintance with the New Testament. The same writer also states that they introduced the serpent into their assemblies to bless the Eucharist [Tertull. adv. Hæres. ii.]; a horrible ceremony, in which, as Epiphanius, St. Augustine, and other writers affirm, they caused the serpent to trail over the bread of which the communicants were about to partake; each person also kissing the serpent before receiving.

The heretical philosophy of the sect is given by Hippolytus and by Epiphanius as above quoted. The former says that they professed to derive it from James the brother of our Lord, who handed it down to Mariamne. He also quotes from a "Gospel according to Thomas," which was in use among them, which seems to be the "Gospel according to the Egyptians," mentioned by Epiphanius in his twenty-sixth book, among the Gnostic Apocrypha. In addition to these sources of information there is also an account given by Origen of their "Diagram," a tablet on which they set forth their doctrines in a hieroglyphical form [Orig. contr. Cels. vi. 33]. The chief points of their profane belief, apart from the intricate and fanciful system of dualistic philosophy which they adopted, were: that the serpent was Christ, that He Who was born of the Virgin was Jesus alone, upon whom Christ afterwards descended. They held the Valentinian theory of a Demiurge, whom they named Jaldabaoth, and who was set forth as begetting six beings, the spirits of the seven planets. By these six beings man was created after their common image, a body without a soul, and they brought him to Jaldabaoth, who breathed into him a living spirit. At the sight of man's perfection Jaldabaoth became envious, and gave him a command which the serpent led him to disobey. Hence the conflict of good and evil in the world, the good being represented by the serpent. The mythic Christ of the Valentinians is the opponent of Jaldabaoth, and is ever endeavouring to defend man from his envy.

The sect continued to exist after other forms of Gnosticism had died out, the Emperor Justinian enacting laws against them [Cod. I. v. 1, 18, 19, 21] so late as A.D. 530.

ORDIBARII. This name appears in the treatise of Reimerius against the Waldenses, in close association with the sect of the Ortlibenses [Bibl. Max. xxv. 266]; but Gieseler states that the reading of an authentic manuscript gives the word as "Ortlibarii." The context of the passage gives no reason for supposing that Reimer was writing of two sects, all that he says applying to the Ortlibenses. In Pluquet's Dictionnaire des Heresies, and in the Index to Sianda's Lexicon Polemicum, the name is printed "Orbibarii," which offers a further illustration of the way in which the original name may have been corrupted. [ORTLIBENSES.]

OREBITES. [HOREBITES.]

ORIGENISTS. Those of the immediate disciples of the great Origen, and those subsequent students and admirers of his works who developed heretical opinions out of the bold philosophical speculations which he mingled with his allegorical interpretations of Scripture.

The father of philosophical Christianity from whom these errors were said to have sprung—Origen [A.D. 185-253] the Adamantine [Ἀδαμάντιος] and the "brazen-brained" [χαλκέντερος]¹—was pupil and successor to St. Clement in the school of Alexandria, being appointed by Demetrius the Patriarch on the flight of St. Clement during the persecution of Severus, and before he had reached the age of twenty [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 3]. He had already adopted the life of an ascetic, and of a hard, untiring student, endeavouring to carry out the Counsels of Perfection literally [Matth. xix. 12], going barefoot, having but one coat, sleeping on the bare floor, and restricting his diet to the humblest vegetable fare. Four years of such a life as this, combined with the daily labour of instruction, compelled him to retire for a time from Alexandria to Rome, but in the year 212 he was again at his post. Three years afterwards he visited Palestine, and although not ordained to the priesthood, was invited by the Bishops of Jerusalem and Cæsarea to preach in the churches of those cities. This led to a remonstrance on the part of his own bishop, Demetrius, and he returned to Alexandria. A few years afterwards he again visited his friend and pupil, Alexander, the Bishop of Jerusalem, and was ordained priest by him, when he was about forty-four years of age. This ordination was uncanonical in two ways: Origen having incapacitated himself for the priesthood by his early self-mutilation, and it being contrary to all rule for a bishop to ordain a person belonging to another diocese without letters commendatory from the bishop of the latter. An angry discussion arose, in which the clergy of Palestine took the side of Origen, and those of Alexandria that of Demetrius. The latter summoned a council, before which it was represented that the great catechist had been guilty of teaching heresy as well as of violating the canons, and he was condemned and excommunicated in A.D. 232, being at the same time deposed from his office as the head of the Catechetical School [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 26]. This sentence was afterwards, perhaps, withdrawn [Huet's Origeniana, I. iii. 10], and it was certainly disregarded by the bishops of Palestine, Arabia, and Greece; but Origen never returned to Alexandria. Labouring for the conversion of heretics [BERYLLUS, ARABICI] in the three countries named, he at the same time accomplished literary labours so vast that he is said to have been the author of 6000 separate books and tracts (most of which are lost), to have dictated to seven amanuenses, and, as it is put by St. Jerome, to have written more than any other man could read. Among such a multitude of writings it would not be difficult, probably, to find materials out of which to frame charges of heresy, yet the opinions on which these charges are chiefly founded are contained in a work on First Principles [Περὶ ἀρχῶν], which was written while he was at Alexandria, but of which only a Latin version has been preserved. When he was sixty-six years of age, Origen was imprisoned and put to the torture during the Decian persecution, and before he was seventy his life was brought to a close at Tyre.

The writings of Origen are so corrupted with interpolations of a later date, and so many of them have been lost, that it is impossible to determine with anything like certainty how far he was responsible for the extreme form in which his peculiar opinions now appear. It is true that he was convicted of erroneous opinions as well as of uncanonical conduct by a synod of Egyptian clergy, and that the Bishop of Rome concurred in this conviction, but it is also true that many bishops refused to recognise this decision, and that this refusal diminishes greatly the force which it might otherwise have. It is true, too, that opinions attributed to Origen are refuted by St. Jerome and others, especially by Epiphanius; but it is also certain that (as Origen himself complains) his opinions were greatly perverted by some of his hearers and readers,¹ and all critics agree in considering that his works were corrupted by heretics at a very early date, that they might gain the weight of his name to their side. The great deference which he shewed for Holy Scripture, at the study of which he laboured during twenty-eight years for his "Hexapla" edition of the Old Testament, as also his respect for the tradition of the Church, make it very improbable that Origen wandered into actual heresy; but, at the same time, he began to teach and write very early in life, and wrote so abundantly, that some of his productions must have been hastily sent into the world, and may have contained many ill-considered statements. His profound speculations on the nature of God and created beings, and on their relations to each other, offered, too, a tempting field for wilder and less learned speculators to work in; and it is easy to see that heresies might thus be manufactured out of his words by others for which he himself was not in reality responsible.

The opinions which Origen was charged with holding, and which those called Origenists professed to draw from his works, were chiefly these: [1] That there is an inequality between the Persons of the Holy Trinity; [2] That human souls pre-existed before the creation of Adam; [3] That the soul of Christ pre-existed with other human souls; [4] That the resurrection nature of mankind will not include material bodies; [5] That the punishments of the wicked and of evil spirits will not be eternal; [6] That all intelligent beings tend towards re-absorption into the One Fountain of Being from which they sprung.

These opinions are part of a methodical system, the materials of which are to be found, for the most part, in the de Principiis of Origen, but some of them are only known as his from the statements of St. Jerome and others who wrote against them; these authors, no doubt quoting from works which are not now extant, but which were known to be—whether corrupted or not cannot now be discovered—his authentic productions. Taking them in the order in which they are given above, the system which they form is as follows:—

[1] The Divine Nature consists of three ὑποστάσεις; first, the Father, who is the one original essence, and the one source of all other being; secondly, the Son, who is necessarily generated eternally by the Father as an eternal Brightness proceeding from an eternal Light, or as an ever-flowing stream from an inexhaustible Fountain; and thirdly, the Holy Spirit, a Spirit created by the Son, and yet united in the Unity of Trinity with the other two Divine Persons. [Hieron. ad Avitum, Ep. lix. ad Pammach. et Ocean. Ep. lxxv.; Justinian. Imp. adv. Origen in Mansi, Concil. ix. 487.] Here it is to be observed that the Son is also alleged to be inferior to, and different from the Father, although the primary emanation from Him and His minister in the work of creation; while the Holy Spirit is accounted inferior to quæ nunquam sensisse nos novimus. Sed neque hi qui plus diligunt, neque illi qui aderunt, veritatis regulam tenent; et alii per dilectionem, alii per odium, mentiuntur. [Origen, Hom. xxv. in Lucam.]

both. This doctrine of Subordination was never accepted by the Church, and its promulgation by Origen led some writers to charge him with being the father of Arianism. On the other hand, he was the first to formulate the doctrine of the Eternal Generation, and this has ever since been received, in the words of the Nicene Creed, τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ τὸν μονογενῆ, τὸν ἐκ τοῦ Πατρὸς γεννηθέντα πρὸ πάντων τῶν αἰώνων. . . . Φῶς ἐκ Φωτός.

[2] The pre-existence of human souls is associated with the tenet that creative energy is a necessary quality of Omnipotent and ever-ruling Deity, and must therefore have been exercised by God from all eternity. Hence the existing creation is one of a successive order of creations, each of which has been part of the eternal kingdom of the eternal Ruler, and each peopled with living intelligences. These spiritual beings were all originally of one order, partaking, in a lower degree, of the Divine nature from which they had originated: but being endowed with free will they were capable of falling, and thus while some fell to become evil spirits, others degenerated into the condition of souls, which were afterwards imprisoned in mortal bodies as a punishment for their sins.

[3] The pre-existence of the soul of Christ is taken as an antecedent of the Incarnation. The eternal Logos, determining upon a work of restoration on behalf of the fallen, united His Divine nature to one of the perfect intelligences, and was thus able to acquire a soul capable of being united with a human body, and capable also of redeeming fallen intelligences of every degree.

[4] In respect to the resurrection of the body, the Origenists held that the material bodies of the saints will be renewed in a less material substance, a resurrection body more pure and subtle than the natural body. Thus the risen body of Christ was believed by them to be already a glorified body, (a belief strongly repudiated by some of the Fathers, but accepted by others;) and as such a pattern of the resurrection bodies of Christians.

[5] The future life, whether of blessedness or of misery, was considered by the Origenists to be still a life of probation, in which the exercise of free-will gives to all the power of going forward to a higher condition or of going backward to one that is lower. Hence the punishment of the wicked is not eternal, the work of the Saviour extending to them and even to the fallen angels, to enable them to rise from the depths to which they have fallen, and ultimately to attain the condition of the blessed. This belief is referred to by St. Jerome when he writes, "And though Origen declares that no rational being will be lost, and gives penitence even to the Evil One, what is that to us who believe that the Evil One and his satellites and all the wicked will perish eternally, and that Christians, if they have been cut off in sin shall, after punishment, be saved"¹ [Hieron. contr. Pelag. ii. 712, ed. 1737].

¹ This passage is illustrated by another in the writings of the same Father. "I believe that after the resurrec-

[6] Lastly, the Origenists held the opinion that the advancement of spiritual life after the resurrection removes the nature of the saints more and more from the sphere of material existence, and draws them nearer and nearer to that of the highest spiritual existence. Thus the progress of spiritual life in heaven is in reality a step onward towards a continuous process, by which created beings are being absorbed into the uncreated, until God becomes all in all.

Although a school of Origenists arose in the Church after his death, among the many who were educated by him and by his works, the most distinguished of those belonging to it being Gregory Thaumaturgus, Pamphilus, and Eusebius the historian; it was only on the revival, in the sixth century, of the controversy respecting his principles, which had been long dormant, that those principles were brought before a council. The attention of the Emperor Justinian having been drawn to the writings of Origen, he wrote a long treatise against them, addressed in the form of an edict to Mennas, the Patriarch of Constantinople [Justin. Imp. adv. Orig. in Mansi, Concil. ix. 487]. In this edict the Emperor directs Mennas to convene a synod for the purpose of anathematizing Origen. It was at this synod [A.D. 544], as is supposed, that fifteen canons, which are extant, were passed, condemning the tenets mentioned above, and some other opinions of less importance [ibid. 395]. When the fifth general council met, in the year 553, it did not take any notice of these canons or of the Origenist opinions which had been condemned, and notwithstanding the agitation raised respecting the THREE CHAPTERS, the only conciliar condemnation of those opinions was in the obscure synod referred to.

[A very able defence of Origenist opinions was printed anonymously, in the year 1661, by Rust, Bishop of Dromore, under the title A Letter of Resolution concerning Origen and the chief of his Opinions, written to the learned and most ingenious C. L. Esquire, and by him published. A good account of the controversy will be found in Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccl. iii. 648, 761-780.]

ORIGENISTS. From Epiphanius it appears that there was a sect of Origenists who were followers of some unknown Origen, a person quite different from the Father of the second and third century. In one place indeed Epiphanius (a very bitter opponent of Origenist opinions) says he is ignorant whether or not the sect was derived from him [Epiph. Panar. lxiii. lxiv.], but in another he speaks of them without doubt as followers of some other Origen [Epiph. Anacephal.]. These Origenists are spoken of as given to shameful vices, but nothing farther is mentioned of them. There was an Alexandrian philosopher of the same name contemporary with the great Origen, but there is nothing known which connects him with tion from the dead we shall still need a Sacrament to advance and purify us; for none will be able to arise pure from stain, nor will any soul be found which shall at once be free from all faults." [Hieron. in Lucam. Hom. xiv. vii. 288, ed. 1737.]

the sect. Philaster is silent about them, while Augustine and Prædestinatus are only able to repeat the statement of Epiphanius.

ORIGINAL BURGHERS. [BURGHERS.]

ORIGINAL SECEDERS. [UNITED ORIGINAL SECEDERS.]

ORPHANS. A party of the Hussites, which refused to follow Procopius, or to elect any special leader after the death of Ziska, alleging that there was no one man fit to succeed him, and hence calling themselves Orphans, as those who had lost their father. They kept to their camps, fortified with their waggons, and associated little with the Taborites and the Horebites, the remaining followers of Ziska. [HUSSITES.]

ORTLIBARIL. [ORTLIBENSES.]

ORTLIBENSES. This was the original name of the sect of heretics afterwards known as the BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT. It occurs in the treatise of Reinerius against the Waldenses [Bibl. Max. xxv. 266], where also they are called, but apparently by a false reading, "Ordibarii." They appear to have been a party of the disciples of AMALRIC of Bema, who formed into a sect under the influence of a leader named Ortlieb at Strasburg early in the thirteenth century [Gieseler, Compend. Eccl. Hist. iii. 467, Clark's ed.]. Reiner describes them as repudiating nearly all the articles of the Christian faith; the doctrines of the creation of the world by God, of the Trinity, of our Lord's miraculous conception, and of the Sacraments. He also accuses them of not receiving the Holy Scriptures, on the ground that they had a divine inspiration which made them independent of the Bible, and of holding extreme Antinomian opinions on all subjects connected with morals. These heresies seem to be closely associated with the Pantheism of Amalric, and with his theory as to the Incarnation of the Holy Spirit, and thus to bear out the view taken by Gieseler. The only account of the sect under the name Ortlibenses is that given by Reiner, OSIANDRIANS. A section of the early German Protestants who followed Andrew Hosemann (exalted by Latin transformation into Osiander) rather than Luther. Osiander maintained that the Atonement was wrought by the power of the Divine and not of the Human Nature of Christ, the exact converse of this opinion being that of the STANCARISTS. Osiander became head of the newly-founded University of Königsberg in A.D. 1548, but his followers were never numerous. His opinions were maintained by Funch, his son-in-law, but when the latter was executed for high treason in the year 1566, they ceased to have any influential supporter, and the sect was absorbed by Lutheranism. The sixth volume of Schlusselfburg's Hæreticorum Catalogus consists of 259 pages "De secta Osiandristarum."

OSSENES or OSSENIANS. The name given to the ESSENES by Epiphanius.

PACIFICATORS. A name assumed by the Imperial party which supported the Henoticon of Zeno in the year 482. [HENOTICON. MONOPHYSITES.]

PÆDOBAPTISTS. A name given by the Anabaptists of the sixteenth century, and by Baptists of later date, to those who baptize infants or little children [παῖδες].

PALAMITÆ. [HESYCHASTS.]

PANTHEISTS. Those who hold the opinion that God is everything, and everything is God. This heresy presents itself to us under a double aspect. It is either a quasi religious creed, or it represents a philosophical tenet; in either case it may be clearly traced into the emanational theories of oriental antiquity. The notion is old, but the term Pantheism is of very recent date. The Deist Toland was the first to use it in his Socinianism truly stated . . . by a Pantheist to his orthodox Friend [A.D. 1705], and at a later date he published his Pantheisticon [A.D. 1720]. Toland said expressly that he had borrowed his notion from Linus, which the motto of his Pantheisticon expressed as "ex toto sunt omnia, et ex omnibus est totum;" briefly put by his antagonist Fay as "Pantheistarum Natura et Numen unum idemque sunt." Pantheism is little else than the oriental emanation notion imported into the West for the purpose of superseding the religious idea of a personal Deity first creating out of nothing and ever after overruling the course of the world. Creation designates the summoning into existence of that which before was not. Emanation is a mere modification of that which is; it maintains the selfsame existence, though after other forms and other conditions; it is the developed fruit of the quickened germ. It supposes an Infinite Eternal Substance, which arouses itself into action by a self-energy, and clothes itself in a multiplicity of forms, that in the aggregate make up the universe. Thus the Divine Idea as the Whole is All things, and All things are the Whole, and in the end All things will return once more into the Inscrutable Oneness from whence they came forth.

Such was the groundwork of the Brahminical system, and of the cosmogony of the most ancient Indian writing, the Institutes of Menu. Brahm the primal substance, the Absolute, awakening into consciousness, gave birth to Maja, spectral matter, the illusive source of all that appears to exist. A threefold manifestation of himself is put forth by Brahm; Brahma the Creator, Vishnu the Preserver, and Siva the Destroyer. All creation proceeded forth from the joint energy of Brahma and Maja; being concentrated under a twofold originative power, Mahabhava, the principle of spiritual concretion, and Pradjapati, the condensation of all less ethereal elements. All at first was a void nullity, when Tad ("He" the Cabbalistic א who?) breathed upon Sudda ("Her"), who existed only in him, and nothing which has since been called into being has existed otherwise than in Him. Thence the world of spirits and of men was evolved. The Vedantic philosophy is equally pantheistic. After making all allowance for interpolation and corruption, the fundamental principles of both remain the same. Knowledge alone is that which can raise the spirit of man to the unchangeable. To see in creation material forms separate from Brahma is to dream; only when a man recognises All things in Brahma does he wake up from his dream, and gain the use of thought. Brahma is the vast ocean of which the surface waves are the whole external form, the foam and surge that go to make up his substance. He is at once active and passive; active, in the continued evolution of emanations that degenerate more and more from original perfection; and passive, as being himself the degenerating emanations that are evolved. All too is Maja, illusion; light yearned for increase, and its multiple became water; water similarly produced earth. The more visible creation becomes, the more it degenerates, and the more is illusion intensified. It is only by contemplation that all forms and names and illusive appearances vanish; the one real substance is perceived; and the truth is apprehended that the contemplative mind is one with the Infinite.

So again, in the Egyptian system, One Inscrutable Being gives a first impulse to creation by the evolution of intelligence, Cneph, the conceptive Demiurge; and next of Phtha, the organizer of the world, the vital principle of fire and warmth. The various succeeding emanations in ogdoads and decads and dodecads are by pairs or syzygies, whereof the secondary principle is more or less antagonistic of the primary; representing the various phenomena of nature; such too were the φύλια and νέικος of Pythagoras and Empedocles. Thus Osiris, radiant with white light, was combined with Isis in the many-tinted robe of nature; and Typhon, the principle of evil, by union with Nephthys, the ideal of consummate beauty, produced the chequered state of good and evil which is the world of man. Life, as the spirit that pervades all nature, could never again be extinguished; its deification is read clearly in deciphered hieroglyphics, and death is only the narrow doorway that leads back to the fresh life of perpetual youth. In all this we see the remote elements of Gnosticism. In the Egyptian therefore, as in the Indian system, the world of matter, whether real or phantasmal, emanates from and is in fact one with the Deity. The antagonisms of the Egyptian theogony became a dualistic system in Chaldaea and Palestine, where Bel and Nebo or Nergal, Matter, were made to proceed from the procosmic Ur, Light; and in Persia, as seen in the antagonism of Ormuzd and Ahriman. The sect of Sipari, adorers, claiming to return to præ-Zoroastrian truth, professed a modified Zabianism that was wholly pantheistic. The Dabistan (school of morals), a work on all the Oriental forms of religious belief—Magianism, Brahmanism, Judaism, Islam, Christianity, and that which the author, Moshan-Fani, terms the “religion of philosophers”—names other pantheistical sects [Dabistan, Orient. Tr. Comm. i. 203]; but they have had nothing to do with the origin of similar principles in Europe.

Greece received its first ideas of civilization from Egypt and the East. Thales indeed professed the dualism of Chaldaea and Egypt; but Linus, in a passage that has been preserved by Stobæus, exactly expresses the notion afterwards adopted by Spinoza: “One sole energy governs all things; all things are unity, and each portion is All; for of one integer all things were born; in the end of time all things shall again become unity; the unity of multiplicity.” Orpheus, his disciple, taught no other doctrine [Cudw. Intell. Syst. ii. 94]. Pythagoras, an adept in ancient Orphic theology, impressed the same character on the nascent philosophy of Greece [Creuzer, Symbolik.; Irenæus, Cambr. ed. introd. xlii.-xlv.]. His numerical theory was only an illustration of the emanative system. One is all, and all is a wide development of the unit. The monad produces the dyad; the two constitute the triad, and the product symbolizes the absolute unity that holds, as it were, in free solution spirit and matter. Unity becomes a multiple of itself by factors of increasing power, and this multiple is the universe, the very being of the Divine Unity, quickened in all its parts with the Divine Life. The soul of the world is the Divine energy that interpenetrates every portion of the mass, and the soul of man is an efflux of that energy. The world too is an exact impress of the Eternal Idea which is the mind of God. A poetical theogony was easily engrafted on such notions, and a polytheistic religion for the people.

In more savage tribes Fetichism is only Pantheism in its grossest form, deeming “either fire, or wind, or the swift air, or the circle of the stars, or the violent water, or the lights of heaven, to be the gods that govern the earth” [Wisd. xiii. 2]. The deification of gross matter was the earliest error of humanity, as the deification of man’s moral nature has been the latest phase of Pantheism.

The Eleatic school was founded by Xenophanes, the contemporary of Pythagoras, on purely pantheistic principles. Matter was uncreate, for nothing can come of nothing. Neither was continuous production possible; for in whatever respect the product differed from its antecedent type, it was causeless, and therefore impossible. But all substance has its pre-existence in absolute unity, and that which has pre-existed is in no sense produced. All that really exists is eternal, unchangeable, and must continue for ever to exist. All is one; there can be no variety of substance, and any apparent diversity is only illusion. Existence is unique, and the thinking mind is the only real, persistent, unchangeable substance. Omnipotence and intelligence are the only two positive attributes of the universal whole; otherwise it can only be defined relatively by a process of negative elimination [Aristot. de Xenophane, iii.; Diog. Laert. ii. 19; De Gérando, I. vi.]. Parmenides gave a further development to the pantheistic notion; viewed on the side of the universe rather than of its source, of existence rather than of its cause. The only reality, he said, was absolute intelligence; the finite external world was only a phantasm of the mind; all was false and hollow that was based upon the suggestions of sense. Thought and its object are identical. Zeno, in defending the same system, gave its first impulse to dialectical reasoning; hence also to the school of Sophists. It was now denied that simple substance can fill space; next, it was stripped gradually of every attribute, until it reached the vanishing point of the pantheistic perspective; substance then, being wholly neutral and void of colour, ceased to have any appreciable quality, and the schools of philosophy subsided into the blank atheism of Leucippus and Democritus, whose atomic fatalism finds a close parallel in the Zabianism of the Babylonians, Phœnicians, with other idolatrous offshoots of the Shemitic stock. The deepest questions that can occupy the human intellect were bandied to and fro in sophistical discussion; all was problematical, all was doubt, and the only principle which met with universal acceptance was the sceptical maxim, μέμνασθαι ἀπιστεῖν. Socrates once more asserted the claim of sound reason to be heard, and Pantheism vanished from the scene, to reappear after many generations in the Eclectic and Gnostic schools. [ECLECTICS. Gnostics. ZABIANS.]

Gnosticism was either monarchical, believing in one principle, and purely pantheistical, as were Apelles, Valentinus, Carpocrates, Epiphane; or dualistic, making two eternal principles, Mind and Matter, as did Saturninus, Bardesanes, and Basilides, whose systems were borrowed from Zoroaster and issued in Manichæism, and were forms of Gnosticism that were scarcely pantheistic. These were all of Oriental or Egyptian origin, and made their attacks upon the faith, not by the methodical approaches of dialectical warfare, but as a disorganized rout of fanatics, with imagination for their guide and rhapsody for their best weapon of offence. The Jewish CABBALA, a collateral descendant from the philosophy of Zoroaster learned at Babylon, was decidedly pantheistic.

Neo-Platonism was the form assumed by the last expiring attempt of the heathen schools to make head against Christianity. [ECLECTICISM.] Professing to combine the salient characteristics of every other system, it fixed upon the principle that was common to the most ancient forms of philosophy, and was essentially pantheistic. Plotinus had accompanied the Emperor Gordian on his Persian expedition, and made good use of his opportunities for mastering the emanative theories of the East; these he made the basis of his system, tempered by a mixture of Christian Trinitarianism. His absolute Unity is as the Monad of Pythagoras, or the Bythus of the Gnostic, the inscrutable Ur of the Chaldæan mage, first source of Bel and Nebo. This Unity is the substance of all that is real; nothing external to it has any reality, or in fact any existence. It can neither be described as Being nor Intellect: in an ineffable manner it is far removed above both. From this Unity proceeded Mind as a second principle, perfect although subordinate, pure reflex of the pure, transcendental glory of the transcendental. The universal Soul is the third principle, subordinate to both the preceding; the manifestation as well as energy of Mind; and these three form one Being of co-equal and co-eternal glory. It is impossible that heathen philosophy should have thus expressed itself before the day of Christ. This triad of Plotinus constitutes the ideal or intelligible universe, identically one with the Deity, type of the world of sense, and alone real and true. It was the origin of the Realism of the schools, the link that connected the teaching of some of the most eminent schoolmen with Pantheism; Porphyry and Boethius having been the medium of communication. [SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY.] From the Supreme emanates the soul of all things, of gods and men, of animals and brute elements. Matter was also evolved; but it is as the dregs of deteriorated efflux, beyond which it is impossible that emanation should be carried. The unity that maintains all-else in combination with the Divine is here dissipated, and perfection is converted into corruption. Matter involves only negative attributes, and can only be qualified for good by ideas and souls that are themselves factors of the universal. Thus all things come forth from the One; in themselves multiply and divisible, typical form and grosser matter. These products also are eternal; for as the One has never existed apart from Intellect and Soul, so it has eternally produced the universe and every form of existence that it contains. The absolute identity of all things with the Deity is the basis of the Plotinian scheme. True knowledge is oneness of the perceiver with the perceived. If in high acts of contemplation we perceive the Supreme, it is our own selves that we perceive; if we gain knowledge of other intelligences, it is still ourselves that we know in them.

The system of Proclus was similar to that of Plotinus, though differing somewhat in terms. It was a self-consistent scheme of unity. The Supreme emits from a centre of light every form of life, all of which are one, as partaking of the nature of the One; yet various in power, as scintillations from the source of ever-varying life. The force with which these speed from the central Unit carries them back again to be reabsorbed in Unity. The Cabbala has also borrowed this idea from Orientalism. Thus the Pythagorean doctrine of a transmigration of souls was a distinguishing feature of ancient Pantheism. Neo-Platonism had an especial aversion for Christianity, and was eventually suppressed by Justinian, who closed the school of Athens, when many of its disciples betook themselves to kindred spirits in the East.

Another void occurs in the history of Pantheism till the foundation of schools of learning by Charlemagne. [SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY.] John Scotus Erigena restored Neo-Platonic ideas in the ninth century, and with it Pantheism, by his translation of the mystical writings of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite. He stands midway between the more ancient and modern Pantheists; the corner-stone of the old system was the foundation of the new. His book de Div. Naturæ is remarkable for its outspoken Pantheism [ibid.]. It describes the Universal as a mighty river flowing from its source in an indefinite stream, quickening all things in its course, and carried back to the fountain-head by natural exhalation and condensation, to be again rolled forth as before. [de Divis. Nat. iii. 103]. "All is God and God is All." The divine progression through all things is resolution; the return of all to the source is deification [De Gérando, iv. 363].

Again two centuries, and William of Champeaux, the immediate precursor of the scholastic system, broached a theory that, if it was not Pantheism, led straight to it. His notion of Universals, borrowed from Plotinus, taught that all Individuality is one in its substance, and varies only in its non-essential accidents and transient properties. Amalric of Bena and David of Dinant followed the theory out into a thoroughgoing Pantheism, and were condemned [A.D. 1210]. Gerson gives as the heads of Amaurism: "All is God and God is All. The Creator and the creature are one. Ideas are at once creative and created, subjective and objective Being. God is the end of All, and All return to Him. As every variety of humanity forms one manhood, so the world contains only individual forms of one eternal essence." David of Dinant only varied upon this by imagining a corporeal unity. Although body, soul, and eternal substance are three, these three are one and the same Being. Latin versions of the Arab philosopher Averroës (Ibn Roshd), and orientalised paraphrases of Aristotle, tended to give a still more decided pantheistic tinge to scholastic theology [Encycl. Metr. xi. 809]. Albertus Magnus, Duns Scotus, and Raymund Lully, were the principal delinquents. [SCHOOLMEN.]

The fermentation of philosophic thought had brought the scum of Pantheism once more to the surface.

In the latter half of the sixteenth century Bruno Giordano, who first introduced a knowledge of the Copernican system into England [Whewell, Intr. to Ind. Sc. i. 385], an obscure and inconsistent reasoner, formed a mixed system which was partly Pythagorean, partly hylozoic, and partly was borrowed from the writings of Proclus. He and his books were burned at Rome, and in consequence his writings are scarce, but copious extracts are given by Hallam [Introd. to Lit. of Eur. ii. 146-154]. God, he said, is the Universe, and the Universe is God. The Pythagorean method of illustrating the emanation of all things from God by arithmetical development expressed the truth, according to his view, better than any other. The world of sense is a vast animal having the Deity for its living soul. It was the old Stoic theory revived. Birth is expansion from the one centre of life; life is its continuance; and death is the necessary return of the ray to the centre of light.

Baruch (Benedict) Spinoza, born of Jewish parents at Amsterdam [A.D. 1632], gave its first impulse to the Pantheism that has formed the main staple of German philosophy in modern times, as exhibited by Fichte and Schelling, Hegel and Strauss. His system, suggested by the CABBALA of Judaism, is briefly set forth under SPINOZISM; it is sufficient therefore to say here, that in this orientalizing notion the Deity and the universe are said to be but one substance, at the same time spirit and matter, thought and extension, which are the only known attributes of the Deity. He was a disbeliever of the world rather than of God; an Acosmist, to use Jacobi's expression, rather than an Atheist, as Bayle has erroneously termed him. His "natura naturans" expresses the extended Deity; life is the divine expansion; thought is an attribute of the Deity, rather it is the Deity itself as sentient substance, though perfectly passive and impersonal. To do away with the notion of a personal Deity has ever since been the aim of German philosophy. His scoff upon the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation is best expressed in his own words: "Quod quædam ecclesiæ his addant quod Deus naturam humanam assumerit, monui expresse me quid dicant nescire: imo, ut verum fatear, non minus absurde mihi loqui videntur, quam si quis mihi dixerit quod circulus naturam quadrati induerit" [Ep. 21, ad Oldenb.]. To speak of the Intelligence or the Will of the Deity is to speak of Him as of man; it is as absurd as to ascribe to the Deity bodily motion. There is nothing whatever in common between the Divine Mind and human intelligence. "Cogitatio Deo concedenda, non intellectus." There is no such thing as freedom of thought or will, everything is one extended chain of consequences, and thought begets thought by a necessity that is under no other control than the fatal law of its own being. Evil is inconceivable where all is equally divine and necessary, and where liberty is null.

All is good where all is order; it is our own ignorance of ultimate results, and of the necessary relation of things, that makes us think things ill that are not substantially so. What man terms evil in its worst forms is only a contradiction to the laws of his own nature, not of laws that are universal. Spinoza speaks mistily of a future state, and is unable to imagine the soul separate from the body. Immortality consists in a return to God, to the annihilation of all personal and individual existence; it was the idea of Averroes again revived. The more intellectual theory of Spinoza was only distilled off from the dead dregs of primitive Pantheism; it added little to the Vedantism of India; the same matter was manipulated, but with a more scientific consistency and a more cold-blooded rationalism; it was in close alliance with the Eleatic theory. Spinoza, like Erigena, was never the representative man of a school; yet he has exercised an undoubtedly powerful influence over German modes of thought. He first declared that all ideas have their negative side, and succeeding reasoners gave a full development to this germ of thought. Thus there is an inherent contradiction in the notion of Deity on the side of attribute; for attribute implies definition, and definition the negation of all that it does not comprehend. Extension is in antagonism with non-extension, thought with void. Schelling, following out the hint, made "I" in its positive and negative aspect one reality. Hence, too, the identical contradictories of Hegel, "Being" identical with "Nil," the Finite with the Infinite, Life with Death; of which more will be said in its place. Spinoza was warmly patronized by Lessing, whom Mendelssohn defended loyally as a friend from the charge of Spinozism; Schleiermacher also has all but canonized the renegade Jewish philosopher.

There is nothing pantheistic in the sceptical philosophy of Kant, but he struck out new modes of thought that were easily worked into their systems by Fichte and Schelling and Hegel, the three hierophants of Pantheism in modern Germany. The mutual relations and functions of subject and object according to Kant form a primitive duality. Subject is the absolute ideal, surrounded by every attribute that pertains to it as an impression on the mind in its most abstract form; Object is the idea invested in its appropriate form in man's world of action, it is a "fait accompli," external to the mind, but of universal cognizance; thus, if St. Paul speaks of faith, St. James shews that subjective faith cannot save a man; its reality must be demonstrated objectively as a "fides formata," and give actual tangible proof of its existence to other minds. He exhibits the two different phases of the same quality. The subjective is of the secret essence of our mental perceptions. As the perceptive faculty of thought, it suggests the conditions of perception; as the initiative faculty of knowledge, the conditions of judgment. The objective is the material substratum of our perceptions, the realization of phenomenal experience. All knowledge involves the union of form and matter, the coincidence of subject and object. These two principles have no substantial reality in themselves, but stand merely in reciprocally dependent relation; we know nothing of any absolute nature that they may possess, it is to us as the unknown quantity x . Reason is a function of ideas that are unconditional and absolute; it is a generalizing power; perception that is invested with the highest possible degree of unity. The objective plays so subordinate a part in the transcendental idealism of Kant, that by an easy transition the next step in German philosophy was to blot it out altogether as a separate factor in mental philosophy. This was done by Fichte. According to his theory subject is the sole source of all absolute reality. To form a true conception of identity, that I (Ich, Ego) = I, abstraction from every external idea is requisite; thought reverts upon itself and occupies itself with that which is thus wholly abstracted; the subjectively thinking being and the objectively conceived thought are identically the same; that which is thus subjectively known is the only real existence. He recognised alone as real the subjective I, and eliminated the objective or external world. It was a system of pure Idealism. By abstraction and reflection, then, that purely free and plastic energy is attained whereby the individual I gains a conception of itself, and proceeding onwards in the same direction, it improves upon that conception by grasping the idea of the Absolute. It is the intuition of intelligence. Thus, I is All and All is I. The notion of matter is from the first annihilated; intelligence alone exists and is generative of all else. The production of the external world is the manifestation of self-unity. The Deity is moral order, the consolidation of the ideal in the real, of reason in results. It is the soul of all human progress, of which Fichte declared to his class with blasphemous hardihood, "Gentlemen, I will now proceed to create the Deity."¹ There is a close parallel to Fichteism in the Buddhist system, which represents I as the Eternal, the Creator, who draws from self-resource all the phenomena of nature. Thus, the ethical Theism of Kant was converted into ethical Pantheism by Fichte.

Schelling was the exponent of the "Philosophy of Nature" [Darlegung des wahren Verhältnisses d. Naturphil. z. Fichtischen Lehre]. Subject and object he said, with Kant, are relative terms; they reciprocally involve each other's existence; do away with the one and the other vanishes. Truth is not absolute subjectivity, and absolute subjectivity is not the truth pure and simple; but truth is alone to be found in the Absolute, which is the one Eternal unchangeable Being, and is developed in the ideal. God is identically one with reason. The Absolute is not to be apprehended by abstraction or reflection, but by direct intellectual intuition, as some of the St. Victoire schoolmen also asserted. By intuition that plastic energy is gained at once which associates the spirit of man with the Absolute. All being is one and the same. Knowledge and Being are one perfect unity. There is a like identity between form and matter. Yet there is an apparent antithesis in Being, consisting as it does at the same time of unity and multiplicity. But unity qua unity, and multiplicity qua multiplicity have no proper being; the alone Existence is the copula that unites them, which is Being. God is unity, and He is all things. The universe and God are the selfsame substance. Variety and multiplicity are only apparent, they have no reality in Being. Nature sleeps in the plant, dreams in the brute creature, but wakes up in man. Spirit and matter interpenetrate each other, and there is a species of "communicatio idiomatum" between them; for intellect is only matter lit up and etherealized; matter is only intellect darkened and crassified. Thus Schelling caused every other essence to pass over under his manipulation, and a "caput mortuum" of existence, neutral and colourless, was all that remained in the alembic. His system was a transcendental idealism based upon pure Pantheism, which affected every phase of life, whether private or public. Moral law is a tendency in the direction of the Absolute; science is a knowledge of the Absolute; art is its terrestrial image; the body politic is the realization of public life ordained with reference to the Absolute; history involves the idea of an indefinite progressiveness, of perfectibility in the Absolute, of which it is a continuous revelation. Blessedness is final absorption into Being, like the Nirvāna of the Buddhist. Men may seem to act spontaneously of their own free will, yet they only carry out a predetermined order of things, and are under the constraint of a secret necessity. The Deity is not in this or that man, but is in the sum total of humanity. Religion in every varying aspect is the measure of Divine development in the soul of man. No one religion per se can convey an adequate idea of God, but religious systems are complete as a whole in supplementing each other's deficiencies. An adequate notion of the Deity will at some time be the result. The golden age of religion is not in time past, but future. Thus Schelling carries back our thoughts to the Eleatic and Neo-Platonic schools, in which knowledge was identical with Being. Xenophanes and Parmenides, Plotinus and Proclus, described pure existence as absolute unity. All things with them were one, as in the subjective Idealism of Schelling.

Hegelism is a further development in the same direction; but it is Idealism in a more absolute sense, like Buddhism. Its basis is unity; Being is identical with Thought. More thoroughgoing than his predecessors, possibly also with more consistency, Hegel professes to exhibit the law which bands together the various modifications of this unity. By its own inherent energy, unity comes forth from its absolute repose, and subjects itself to every condition of transformation and limitation. Yet it remains Unity. This "Prozess" of modern German thought is a reflex of Oriental emanation theories. The Idea antecedent to all successional product is a cold abstraction; its first offsets are of like character; Being and non-Being, shortly to be explained, quality, quantity, measure, identity, difference, and so forth, express a gradational "Becoming" (das Werden) of that which was not before, and constitute a chain the first link of which is Being. The Absolute includes the ideas of Extension and Thought; at once pure Being and pure Notion, the Ideal and the Real: Idea and Notion, Being and Absolute, all being convertible terms.

Hegel's determination of his Laws of Idea is laid down in the Logic, deduced from one fundamental principle, the "Law of Contradictories." Giving a further development to Spinoza's idea, he affirmed that every notion involves a contradiction; antithesis is an essential element of ideal constitution; thus mind and matter form the individual man. Will and foreknowledge, though antagonizing qualities, in no way interfere with the Divine Unity. The universe involves the same contradiction, for Nothing as well as All Things emanated from the Divine Idea. Darkness is the shadow of light; the mingling of the two by abstraction of various beams gives the semblance of colour. Being is antagonized by non-Being. Every idea then involves three elements, or, in Hegelian language, "moments." An idea may be considered as it is in itself, or as it is in contrast with its antagonism, or as it is in joint relation with both its positive and negative side. The first represents the Idea or Deity, the second the Deity as Nature, in which "to become" distinguishes Being from non-Being, and gives the basis of natural science; and the third is Spirit, resulting from the recombination of the two in one moral and æsthetic world, of which religion and philosophy, arts and social institutions are the various phases. The "logical" emanations of Hegel having a real being assigned to them, are suggestive of Gnosticism, "Deus est in fieri;" it was a process of daily development; but there is a strong Neo-Platonic cast in other terms of his system, such as his rejection of the experience on which Kant so strongly insisted, and his claim of direct intuition; the identity of thinking mind and its object; the triune character of his theory; the profession of leading the initiated on to Absolute Truth; and other points of analogy with the teaching of Plotinus.

The principles of Strauss are Hegelian utterances in their most exaggerated form; under their guidance he professes to apply to Gospel history the critical method of Niebuhr, whose freethinking however never reached beyond the domain of history. Such history at the best he declares to be nil. The work of the Spirit is present, and is not to be sought out in the far-distant dreamy visions of bygone ages. Like Hegel, Strauss draws no distinction between the Spirit of God and the spirit of man. All is one Spirit. The Vedantists of India also identified the spirit of man with the spirit of the universe. But they rose to a much higher level than modern Pantheists. At the present day, union with the Deity means little more than the transcendental march of intellect; the Vedantist taught that it was oneness with all that is pure and holy in the spiritual world of blessedness [Mill, Panth. Princ. 41]. According to Strauss, religion is the human and revelation the divine side of that unity that constitutes all things one. The universality of human souls, an idea taken from Averroes by Amalric of Bena and David of Dinant, and condemned at Paris A.D. 1210, is reproduced by Strauss as it was by Spinoza. "Without World God is not God" (ohne Welt ist Gott nicht Gott) is the teaching of both Hegel and Strauss. Their God is not a person but vague personality, and cannot interfere with the established order of the world's progress. The Christology of Strauss, like that of Hegel, treats with contempt the thought of the personality of Christ, which is a "purposeless residuum." Humanity is the Anointed of the Lord. The Incarnation means, not the union of two natures in one personal subsistence, but union through the spirit of the Absolute and the Finite; the Deity thinking and acting in universal humanity. Spinoza had already said as much. The Resurrection and Ascension are a mere representation of human progress by a double negation; the negation of all that is worth the name of life, followed by a resolution of that negative condition through quickened union with the Absolute. Thus there is no room for faith or trust, no sense of individual support, no hope of answered prayer in this soulless and hopeless system. The "sting of death" is ignorance of Straussian and Hegelian ideas; its removal is the only "resurrection to life." Other points of the Strauss theory, as of German philosophy, need not to be touched upon here, which have less palpable points of contact with Pantheism, being reserved for a subsequent article. [RATIONALISTS.]

The foregoing account will have shewn that the entire system of German metaphysics, as represented by the writers instanced, is a reproduction of ancient Pantheism. It is the Theosophy of the East imported into the West; an avowed attempt to displace the religious idea that God stamped upon the soul and conscience of humanity from the very cradle of the race in Paradise. The personality of the Deity and of Christ, with the individual responsibility of man, are the weighty questions upon which men's minds are to be unsettled. There is nothing original in the means adopted, unless indeed in their higher sublimation from all earthly taint of common sense; "Insana magis quam hæretica;" the present deification of man is the last word of German philosophy, which begins with the Scepticism of Kant and ends in the Pantheism of Hegel and Strauss. "J'ai assez lu," says Saisset, as the conclusion of his comparison of the successive systems of German philosophy [Essai de Phil. Rel.], "j'ai assez discuté, l'âge mûr arrive, il faut fermer ces livres, me replier au dedans de moi, et ne plus consulter que ma raison."

PAPELLARDS. A term used in the thirteenth century to designate the party which uncompromisingly supported the Papacy. It was applied chiefly to the mendicant friars and their adherents, and with special reference to their pietistic affectation of poverty and their arrogant pretence of humility. William of St. Amour [A.D. 1255] uses it not only with reference to the mendicant friars, but also to "those young men and maidens itinerating about in France, who, under pretence of living only for prayer, had really no other object in view than to get rid of work, and live on the alms of the pious." When Louis IX. was almost persuaded by the Dominicans to enter their order, he was nicknamed "Rex Papellardus" [Guilielm. de Sancto Amore, De periculis novissimorum temp., quoted in Neander's Ch. Hist. vii. 396, Bohn's ed.]. It was also a name given to the Beguins [Robert de Sorbonne in Biblioth. Max. Lugd. xxv. 350].

PARKER, THEODORE. [RATIONALISTS.]

PARMENIANI or PARMENIANISTI. The usual name of the Donatists in the interior of Africa, derived from Parmenian, a Donatist bishop. [Prædestinati, lib. cap. 69.]

PARSEES. The name given to the adherents of the ancient religion of Media and Persia, founded, probably not later than B.C. 1000, by the Bactrian Zarathrustra Spitama, or Zoroaster. They now number not more than 150,000 persons, some living in the north of Persia, in the town of Yezd and the surrounding villages, but the greater number in Hindostan, in the city of Bombay and its neighbourhood, and in some cities of Gujerat. Many have of late years settled, for purposes of trade, etc., in Calcutta, and other cities of Hindostan, in China, and in Great Britain. The name "Parsees" signifies "Inhabitants of Fars," or Persia. Other names by which they are known are, "Zoroastrians," from their founder; "Magians," properly the name of another religion incorporated with that of Zoroaster; "Ghebers" or "Guebers," applied in contempt by the Mahometans to the small remnant in Persia, and said, in violation of all linguistic laws, to be derived from the Arabic Kafir, an unbeliever; perhaps it was the name of some tribe, sect, or city.

This religion arose out of a schism from, and a revolt against, the primitive Aryan worship of nature-powers, known to us from the earliest portions of the Vedas. [BRAHMINS.] The common origin of these two religions is shewn by the similarity of many of their rites—the offering of the juice of the homa or soma plant, and the effects ascribed to drinking it, the sacrifice of the horse, the investiture at initiation with the sacred thread. The legends of the sacred books strikingly resemble each other, even to the names of those of whom they are related. Their antagonism is shewn in the titles of the sacred Beings. In the oldest form of Brahminism, these, regarded as powers rather than persons, are known indifferently as Ahuras, or Asuras, and Devas. But the later development, after the rise of Zoroastrianism, confined the name Deva to the good powers, assigning that of Asura to the evil beings. Zoroastrianism, recognising spiritual personal existences, reverses the names, calls the good spirits Ahuras, the evil Devs, while most of the beings hitherto worshipped are included among the Devs. There are very plain indications of the struggle both in the Zend-Avesta and in the Brahmanas. The causes of the schism have been plausibly conjectured to be of both a social, political, and a religious nature. It is probable that a portion of the ancient Aryans, abandoning their previous pastoral and nomad life, settled as agriculturalists in Bactria and other suitable districts. These, in consequence, became estranged from the other Aryan tribes, who still clung to their ancestral mode of living. The latter, allured by hope of plunder, attacked and devastated the settlements of the former. The hatred which arose naturally extended to religion, devotion to which was regarded as the cause of success. Hence arose a divergence of views; and, in the end, each regarded the religion of the other as the source of all mischief and wickedness. [See Haug, Essays, 248, 249.] He who gave a distinctive form to the new faith of the Bactrian tribes was Zarathrustra (the Greek Ζαραθρούστρης, Ζωροάστρης, the Latin Zoroaster, Modern Persian Zerdoscht, Zerdusht), usually distinguished from those successors in the priesthood who bore the same title by the addition of his family name, Spitama. The date assigned to him varies enormously: B.C. 3000 [Bunsen, God in History, i. 276], B.C. 1500 [Haug, Essays, 254, 255], 6th century B.C.; but this last date is certainly too late, and arose from a mistaken identification of the King Vistaspa, under whom he lived, with Darius Hystaspis. The details of his life, as handed down to us, are entirely legendary and unhistorical. We only know that he was a native of Bactria, living under a King Vistaspa; that he was married, and had children. In the Vendidad he is represented as possessing supernatural and even divine powers, being superior to the Amshashpands, and next to the supreme Deity himself. He is styled "The master of the whole living creation," "The abyss of knowledge and truth." His religion became predominant in ancient Irania, including Bactria, Media, and Persia, being, in course of time, adopted as the official religion of the two latter empires, but undergoing various modifications and developments. It received a great blow from the conquests of Alexander the Great, and under the Greek, semi-Greek, and Parthian kingdoms which were successively built upon the ruins of his empire, it lost almost all its influence and power. But on the restoration of the Persian monarchy by the Sassanidæ [A.D. 226], the religion of Zoroaster was revived, purified, and re-established as the State religion. The remains of the sacred books were collected, and translated into the vernacular Pehlevi from the obsolete Zend. It was finally overthrown by the Mahometan conquest [A.D. 651], and soon almost exterminated. Its votaries were forcibly converted, or expelled from Persia. Some took up their abode to the north of that country, where a few thousands, in the most wretched condition, still remain; others removed, first to the shores of the Persian Gulf, and then [eighth century A.D.] to Hindostan.

The doctrines of the Parsee religion are contained in the remains of the sacred books, called the Zend-Avesta, or, more properly, Avesta-Zend, a contraction of Avesta-u-Zend, "Text and Commentary." They consist of a text, with an authorized commentary, equally sacred with the text, written in the language called Zend—a sister to Sanscrit, closely resembling the oldest form of Sanscrit, and, like it, now a dead language. A translation of the Zend-Avesta into the Pehlevi language, a corruption of Zend by Semitic elements, was made about the third-century A.D., under the Sassanidæ, when Pehlevi became the national speech; and a further translation and explanation was, at a later time, made into Pazend or Parsee, a language closely resembling modern Persian.

Only a very small portion of the original Zend-Avesta now exists, the remainder having been destroyed, partly through the conquests of Alexander, but still more through the Mussulman conquest of Persia, A.D. 651. The Zend-Avesta proper contained twenty-one Nosks or books, each consisting of text and commentary. Of these the names and subjects alone are preserved, except the 20th, called Vendidad, which is entire, and some fragments. There are also other works included in the present Zend-Avesta, which either are not mentioned among the Nosks at all, or only imperfectly indicated. Of these the most important are the Yaçna, or Izeschne, and the Visparad, which are more ancient than the Nosks, bearing the same relation to them as the Vedas to the Shastras and Puranas [Haug, Essays, 128]. The most important of all is the Izeschne or Yaçna, which consists of two parts, divided into seventy-two chapters. The second part, containing five Gâthas, or songs in metre, is by far the most ancient of the Zoroastrian writings, and is plausibly attributed to the founder himself, or his immediate followers.

The Yaçna consists of prayers to be recited at the sacrificial rites. The Visparad, in twenty-three chapters, is a collection of prayers, of later date, to be used on the same occasions. The Vendidad, the code of religious, civil and criminal laws, above mentioned, ranks next. It is apparently fragmentary, and is evidently the work of many hands and times. It is composed of twenty-two Fargards or sections; and may be divided into three parts. The first part (Farg. 1-3) is introductory, containing an enumeration of regions successively created by Ormazd, and spoiled by Ahriman, probably indicating the countries over which Zoroastrianism had spread; legends of a certain king Yima, and recommendations of agriculture. The second part (4-17)—the groundwork—contains laws, ceremonies, and observances, treated without observing any order or arrangement. The third part (18 to end) is a sort of appendix on various subjects, such as spells against diseases. The foregoing works form the Vendidad Sadè, or Liturgy, and are arranged as a manual for the use of the priests. The Yashts, twenty-four in number, are hymns in praise of sacred persons, or ministers of Ormazd, and sacred objects—the sun, the stars, the homa juice, etc. There are also smaller collections of prayers, praises, and blessings, etc., for various occasions, which, with the Yashts, compose the Khordah-Avesta, or little Avesta, for the use of the laity. According to Parsee tradition, the whole of the Zend-Avesta was composed by the Deity, and delivered to Zoroaster to be given to mankind. This claim to a divine origin is unsupported by internal evidence; and probably arises from the fact that Zoroaster is a collective name, indicating the school of successors of the founder as high priests, from whom the Zend-Avesta chiefly proceeded. The text, in its present form and arrangement, cannot be earlier than the time of the Sassanidæ [A.D. 226]; but the different parts are many centuries older. The Gâthas, the earliest part, are probably at least as early as B.C. 1000. To the Zend-Avesta proper is added, as a sort of appendix, the Bundehesh, now existing only in Pehlevi, a compilation of extracts and fragments of very different dates, treating of the constitution of the universe, and in its present form not earlier than the 7th century A.D.

The modern Parsees also use other works of later date, mostly post-Christian, which are not canonical; such as the Sadder, a manual of doctrine and practice, and various catechisms, and other works.

DOCTRINES. The religion of Zoroaster, so far as can be gathered from the earliest Gâthas, was a pure Monotheism. The highest object of adoration is "Ahura Mazdao," i.e. that Ahura which is Mazdao. The name appears in later times under the forms Auramazda (cuneiform inscriptions), Ἀουράωρης in Greek writers, Ahurmazd under the Sassanidæ, Ormazd among the modern Parsees. Its meaning has been variously explained as "The living wise One," "The living Creator," "The great Giver of Life." [Rawlinson, Five Monarchies, iii.

96, note 10. Smith, Ancient Hist. of East, 384, note 11.] The conception of the supreme Deity is sublime. All the highest attributes, except that of Fatherhood, are assigned to him. He is the Creator and Lord of the whole universe, the Creator of earthly and spiritual life. He is the Holy God, the Father of all Truth, the "Best Being of all," the Master of Purity. He is supremely happy, possessing every blessing, health, wealth, virtue, immortality, wisdom, and abundance of every earthly good. All these he bestows on the good man who is pure in thought, word, and deed, while he punishes the wicked. All that is created, good or evil, fortune or misfortune, is his work. He is to be served by purity, truth, and goodness, in thought, word, and deed; by prayers and offerings. The works of agriculture are especially pleasing to him. No images of him were allowed. In spite of some mixture of physical ideas, the ascription to him of health, the conception of him as in some sense light, the notion of Ahura-Mazda is truly spiritual. Under the Supreme Being are the Genii, who stand between God and man—Sraosha, the instructor of the prophet, the friend of God, and the protector of the faith; and Armaiti, the genius of the earth, and the guardian of piety, and perhaps some others. The existence of evil was accounted for by the supposition of two primeval causes, which, though opposed to each other, were united in every existing being, even in Ahura-Mazda himself, and by their union produced the world of material things and of spiritual existences. The cause of good is Vohu-Mano, the good mind, from which springs Gaya, or reality; to it all good, true, and perfect things belong. The evil cause is Akem-Mano, "naughty mind," from which springs non-reality (Ajyaiti); to it all evil and delusive things belong. But, as united in Ahura-Mazda, the two principles are called Spento-Manyus, the white or holy spirit, and Angro-Manyus, the dark spirit. No personal existence is ascribed to these; they both exist in Ahura-Mazda, but they are opposed to one another as creators of light and darkness, of life and death, of sleep and waking. Such were the original Zoroastrian doctrines. But, in course of time, through the operation of the principle whereby abstractions become personified, this primeval doctrine became corrupted into a systematic Dualism, which is seen fully developed in the Vendidad. The two causes appear as distinct and opposed personal beings, Ahura-Mazda or Ormazd, of whom Spento-Manyus is a title, and Angro-Manyus or Ahriman. These two existed separately and independently from all eternity, each ruling over a realm of his own, and constantly at war with and striving to overthrow the other. All the good and pure creations of Ormazd are defiled and spoilt by those of Ahriman, who cannot create independently, but only brings evil into being to counterwork, spoil, and destroy the good works of Ormazd. Under each principle is a hierarchy of ministers, personal beings created by their respective lords, whom they serve and obey in every way. The first created and chief of these to Ormazd are his six councillors, in later times made seven by including Sraosha or Ormazd himself. They are called Amesha-Spentas (among the modern Parsees Amshashpands), or "immortal saints," and each rules over a special province of creation. These are in their origin personifications of abstractions representing the gifts of Ormazd to his worshippers. Ahriman has also a council of six (later, seven) evil beings, the counterparts of Ormazd's councillors, who work evil in the spheres over which the latter preside. Under these, on each side, are hosts of other spirits. Those of Ormazd are the Yazatas (modern Yezds), good spirits, headed by Sraosha and the Fervers, invisible protectors of all created beings. Ahriman has the Devas or Devs, the exact contraries to these. The two principles are regarded as coequal and coeternal in the past; neither is absolutely victorious as yet. Their strife extends throughout all creation; every existing thing is ranged on one side or the other, nothing can be neutral. But at the last three prophets, sprung from Zoroaster, will appear, will convert all mankind to Zoroastrianism; evil will be conquered and annihilated; Ahriman will vanish for ever, and creation will be restored to its pristine purity. A later development still was made by the Zarvanian sect, probably about 350-300 B.C. These, to save the unity of the Supreme, held that the two principles emanated from a being called Zarvan-akarana, time without bounds, into whom they will again be in the end absorbed. This doctrine rests on a misinterpretation of texts in the Zend-Avesta [See Haug, Essay, etc. pp. 20, 21, 264]. It is, however, still held by the Parsees and Guebres. Man is represented as created by Ormazd in purity and holiness; but through the temptation of the Devs he fell, and became exposed to sin and evil. Every man is bound to choose whether he will serve Ormazd by good deeds, industry, and piety, or Ahriman by the contrary vices. According as he chooses, so is he rewarded or punished in another world. On the day following the third night from death, the souls of the dead are collected, and have to pass over an exceedingly narrow bridge, stretched over hell, leading to heaven, called Chinvat Peretu, "the bridge of the judge" or "gatherer." The wicked fall into the gulf below, where they are received with scoffs and scorn by Ahriman and his ministers, and live in misery, feasting on poisoned banquets, till the time of restitution. The good, upheld by good spirits, and aided by the prayers of their friends, pass into heaven, are received by the archangels, and dwell with Ormazd and the Amshashpands. According to some authorities it is taught, that at the final restitution the body will rise again and be reunited to the soul; but this is probably a later addition from Christian or Jewish sources. [See Haug, Essay, etc. 196, 266; Pusey on Daniel, 508, sq.] The morality of Zoroastrianism is simple, pure, and practical. The great duty of the faithful is to aid Ormazd in the struggle with evil, both within the soul and without it. Truth, purity, piety, and industry are the highest virtues; suicide, impurity, and lying the most horrible crimes. Virtue in thought, word, and deed is equally required. The religious rites consist in the acknowledgment of Ahura-Mazda, and the spiritual hierarchy under him, in frequent prayers, praises, and thanksgivings to them in sacrifices, and purificatory ceremonies. Originally images were forbidden, but the faith was corrupted in this respect under the later Persian kings by the adoption of foreign deities and idols, especially of Mithra, originally one of the Yazatas, afterwards looked on as the Sun-God, and Anaitis. The Sassanian reform restored the primitive purity in this respect. Luminous objects, the sun, moon, planets, fire, are revered as symbols of Ormazd; to one of these believers turn in prayer. In the temples are altars fed by sacred fire ever kept burning, the sulling of which is punished by death. The priests wear masks when they approach it, and only touch it with holy instruments. Great reverence is also paid to the other elements, earth, air, and water. These may not be defiled by the dead, which are therefore exposed on a grating at the summit of towers (called towers of silence) to the birds of prey and the weather. When the bones are stripped they fall through a grating to a vault beneath. It is much disputed whether this reverence to the elements belonged to the religion of Zoroaster, or whether it is a later addition arising from the fusion with it of the Turanian elemental worship of the mountain regions, Armenia, Kurdistan, etc., of which the Magi were the priestly caste. Dr. Haug [Essays, 250, 251] advocates the former view, holding that Zoroaster himself was a "fire priest;" Prof. Rawlinson, and others, for whom the evidence seems to preponderate, the latter. [See Rawlinson, Five Monarchies, iii. 122, 136; iv. 340, 347; and Herodotus, App. to Bk. I. Essay V.; and the article "Magier" in Herzog's Encyklopädie, vol. viii. pp. 675, sq.] The sacrifices consist of the slaying of animals, a portion of whose flesh is shewn to the fire, and then the whole victim eaten by the priests and worshippers. There is also the Homa ceremony, consisting in the extraction of the juice of the homa plant during prayers, the presenting it to the fire, and the consumption of it by the priests and worshippers. This was thought to confer immortality and other great gifts. A sacred meal is on certain occasions eaten with special blessings, prayers, and ceremonies, in honour of Ormazd and the good spirits. Confession of sins to the priests is practised, but asceticism is expressly discouraged. Impurity is cleansed by the ceremonial washing with nirang, i.e. cow's urine, accompanied by prayers. There are now two orders of priests, the Destoors and the Mobeds; over all is a chief Destoor. The Modern Parsees are very exclusive in their customs; they will eat no food cooked by one of another religion, and only marry among themselves. Polygamy is forbidden, and divorce only allowed after nine years of barrenness. Of late years a party has arisen to advocate reforms in their customs and habits, such as the abolition of exclusiveness, of marriages of consanguinity, and of the use of the nirang, and this movement has caused much controversy among them. [On the present state of the Parsees, see Manners and Customs of the Parsees, and the Parsee Religion, by Dadabhai Navroji; The Parsees, by Dosabhoi Framjee; Max Müller, Chips, I. art. vii. viii.] It has been strongly urged by recent writers that many of the scriptural doctrines, e.g. the resurrection of the body, the nature of the angels, were borrowed from Parseeism. For a complete refutation of this theory see Pusey's Daniel, Lect. ix.; Hull's Myth. Interp. 124, sqq. But very plain indications of its influence may be found in the later Jewish theology set forth in the Talmud [Quart. Rev. cxxiii. p. 456, sq.]. The religious Jews were naturally more favourably inclined to Zoroastrianism than to the other religions with which they were brought in contact, resembling their own faith as it did in its Monotheism, its hatred of idolatry, and the purity of its moral precepts. From it was derived the dualism of the Manichees and other heretics [Milman, Hist. Christianity, i. 62, ed. 1867]. Mahometanism borrowed largely from its tenets, even to minute details. PARTICULAR BAPTISTS. [BAPTISTS.]

PASAGIANS. A sect of Judaizing Catharists which appeared in Lombardy late in the twelfth or early in the thirteenth century, but which probably originated in the East, and took its name either from the fact of the emigration and wandering life of those who composed it, as if they were "passaggieri," birds of passage, always on the move either from habit or from fear of persecution, or from some association with the Crusades, for which "pasagium" was an ordinary name. They observed the law of Moses except as to sacrifices; circumcision, the Sabbath, and distinctions of clean and unclean food, all forming part of their system, and hence they were also called "Circumcisi." Their Christology only allowed Christ to be the highest of created beings, and they seem to have considered Him a kind of Demiurge by whose work all other creatures were brought into being.

The Pasagians appealed to the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments in support of their doctrine, a fact which is met thus by Bonacursus, the chief authority for their history: "Sed quia hunc suum errorem Novi Testamenti ac prophetarum testimonio nituntur, proprio illorum gladio, Christi suffragante gratia, sicut David Goliam, eundem suffocemus." [Bonacursus, Vita Hæret. seu Manifestatio hæres. Catharorum, in D'Achery's Spicileg. i. 211. Gerhard. Bergam. in Murator. Antiqq. Ital. Med. Ævi. v. 152.]

PASCAL. [JANSENISTS.]

PASCAL CONTROVERSY. The dissension which arose between the early Churches of the East and West respecting the days on which our Lord's Death [πάσχα σταυρώσιμον] and Resurrection [πάσχα ἀναστάσιμον] were to be commemorated.

Whether there was originally one universal custom respecting the observance of these days is uncertain, but the difference is found in the second century; and since at that early date the Asiatic Churches alleged that they followed a rule laid down by St. John and St. Philip, while the Roman Church alleged the authority of St. Peter and St. Paul, it is probable that the want of uniformity out of which the controversy arose had existed even in the first century.

The Eastern custom was to commemorate the Death of our Lord on the day of the year which answered to the 14th day of the Jewish month Nisan (that being the actual day on which it occurred), and the Resurrection on the third day following (or that answering to the 16th of Nisan), without any regard to the time of the week on which these days fell. [QUARTODECIMANS.]

The Western custom was to keep as Easter Day the Sunday following the 14th day of Nisan, and to commemorate the Death of our Lord on the preceding Friday.

The history of this controversy is given at length in the DICTIONARY of THEOLOGY: it is sufficient here to say that the subject of it was one of the two which were placed by Constantine before the Council of Nicæa [A.D. 325], and that the original controversy was substantially settled by the decision of the bishops there assembled that Easter Day should always be a Sunday. The Sunday fixed by the Council was that which follows the vernal equinox, and the Church of Alexandria was directed to give good notice every year what Sunday that would be in the year following. Uniform accuracy was not obtained, however, for many years; and in England the use of one cycle in the North and West and of another in the South and South-east caused Easter Day to be kept on different Sundays so late even as the year 664, when an uniform custom was established by the Council of Whitby.

PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS. The originator of the theory that bread and wine no longer exist in the elements of the Holy Eucharist after the Body and Blood of Christ have become present there by the act of consecration. He may thus be said to have raised a controversy which has disturbed the Western Church for more than a thousand years.

Paschasius Radbertus first comes into notice as a monk of Corbey in Aquitaine [A.D. 831]. He afterwards became abbot for a few years [A.D. 844-851], but resigning the office, died there as a simple monk [A.D. 865]. A former pupil, named Warin (whom he addresses as Placidius), having become Abbot of New Corbey in Saxony, requested his old instructor to draw up a treatise on the Holy Eucharist for the guidance of his young community. In the year 831, therefore, Paschasius Radbertus wrote his work, de Sacramento Corporis et Sanguinis Christi, of which he presented an enlarged copy to the Emperor Charles the Bald in the year 844 at the Emperor's own request or demand, when it had become the subject of controversy.

In this treatise Radbert sets forth the ordinary doctrine of the Church respecting the true and real presence of our Lord's Body and Blood in the consecrated elements, but he goes far beyond all previous writers in defining the mode of that presence, and its consequences. There had been scarcely any controversy hitherto on the subject of the Holy Eucharist, although St. John Damascene [circ. A.D. 740], followed by the second Council of Nicæa [A.D. 787] and the Council of Frankfort [A.D. 794], had seen cause to censure the application of the terms "type" and "figure" to the elements; while a Council of Constantinople [A.D. 754] had asserted their legitimate use: which shews the dawn of such a controversy. The dialectical subtlety which had been employed on doctrines concerning the Person of our Lord and the Holy Trinity was now, however, to be engaged for many a generation on those connected with the Sacrament of our Lord's Body and Blood; and the full tide of strife was set flowing by the clear and uncompromising statements of Radbert.

The substance of these statements is as follows.

[1] That the very Body of Christ which was born of the Virgin Mary, and which was immolated upon the Cross, together with the very Blood that belonged to that Body and was shed upon the Cross, are that which the communicants receive (and he does not hint at receiving in one kind only) in receiving the consecrated elements of the Holy Eucharist. [2] That the bread and the wine which are consecrated are wholly and entirely converted into the Body and Blood of Christ, so that they are no longer to be spoken of as being in any natural sense bread and wine. [3] That this conversion ordinarily takes place in such a manner that it is not made known to the senses, God permitting the appearance and taste of the bread and the wine to remain as a veil to the great miracle which He has wrought. [4] But that under special circumstances—to confirm the faith of doubters, or to satisfy the devotion of saints—the fact of the conversion is made apparent to the senses by the substance of Christ's Body and Blood becoming visible, either in the form of a lamb, or presenting the colour and appearance of flesh and blood. Only one such instance is narrated, but it is said to be one out of many [Pasch. Radbert. de Sacram. Corp. et Sang. Christi. in Bibl. Max. Lugd. xiv. 729; Martene, Vet. Script. Collect. ix. 367; Migne, Patrol. cxx.].

This precise definition of the nature of the Eucharist was a novelty in the Church, as is shewn by the catenæ of authorities respecting that Sacrament which have been collected by Pamelius in his Liturgicon, and by Guéranger in his Institutions Liturgiques. It raised a controversy at once among the theologians of the Benedictine order, and Radbert endeavoured to prove his statements in a letter addressed to one of his monks named Frudegard, in which he collected passages from the Fathers [Pasch. Radbert. Opp. Bibl. Max. Lugd. xiv. 749; Migne's Patrol. cxx. 1351]. The first to write against the novel opinions or definitions was Rabanus Maurus, Abbot of Fulda [A.D. 822-847], and afterwards Archbishop of Mentz [A.D. 847-856], in an epistle to a monk named Eigil, which has been lost [cf. Mabillon, Act. Sanct. Ord. Bened. sæc. iv. II. 591]. When the controversy attracted the attention of the Emperor Charles le Chauve he required Paschasius Radbertus to place a copy of the treatise in his hands, and this was delivered to another monk of Corbey, Ratramnus, or Bertram, for examination. The result was an answer by Ratramnus in the form of a treatise bearing the same title as that of Radbert, the point of which is to prove that there is a difference between the manner of Christ's Presence when on earth and that of His sacramental Presence in the Eucharistic elements; that in the latter "est quidem Corpus Christi, sed non corporale, sed spirituale;" maintaining however, as strongly as his opponent, the reality of that presence [Ratramn. de Corp. et Sang. Domini; Migne's Patrol. cxviii. 815; Oxford ed. 1838]. The great liturgical commentator, Walafrius Strabo, was also an opponent of Radbert, and that portion of his work which deals with the subject is much more in accordance with the writings of their Catholic predecessors [Walaf. Strab. de Reb. Eccl. xvi. xvii.]. Another opponent was Erigena, but his opinion seems to have been utterly at variance with that of the Church, being that the Eucharist is a mere memorial of Christ's Death in past time, and not of His Presence in the Sacrament, a typical act of feeding by which the mind of the faithful communicant intellectually and piously reminds him of the work of his Lord [Döllinger's Ch. Hist. iii. 73, Cox's transl.].

This epoch of the thousand years' controversy does not appear to have been prolonged beyond the death of Paschasius Radbertus. Its revival by Berengarius and Lanfranc in the twelfth century shews, however, that it must have been extending its effects far and wide on the popular mind: and the views of Radbert were finally stamped upon the authoritative theology of the Roman Church, under the name of Transubstantiation [DICT. THEOL. s. v.], by the fourth

Council of Lateran in the year 1215. [BERENGARIUS.]

PASSALORYNCHITÆ. A sect of early mystics who derived their name from πάσσαλος, a gag, and ρύγχος, a muzzle, it being their custom to place a finger across their lips and nose to prevent themselves from breaking silence during worship and meditation, as a literal fulfilment of the words "Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, and keep the door of my lips" [Ps. cxli. 3]. St. Augustine wished to change the name of the sect to that of "Dactylorynchitæ," unaware apparently that the Greek word was sometimes used for a gag as well as for a stake. The sect was probably the same as that called Tascodrungitæ. [Philast. Hær. lxxvi.; Aug. Hær. lxiii.; Prædestinat. Hær. lxiii.]

PASSIONISTS. [PATRIPASSIANS.]

PASTORELLI. [PASTOUREAUX.]

PASTOUREAUX. These fanatics first appeared in the north of France about 1251 A.D. Their rise was due partly to the growing hatred of the clergy, who already in the thirteenth century were, in the minds of the peasants, associated with the tyrannous lay proprietary, partly to the crusading frenzy, to which the piety of St. Louis had given a marked impetus. They also expressed, in an irrational way, the peasants' genuine loyalty to their king, whose absence in Egypt served to aggravate their misery. Their name originated in the fact that most of those who took part in the movement were shepherds.

This movement commenced in Flanders. Suddenly a mysterious personage, who bore the name of "the Master of Hungary," appeared in the villages, inviting all shepherds, herdsmen, and labourers to join in the work of the rescue of the King and the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre. He was an aged man with a long beard and pale emaciated face, who, it was said, spoke all languages by miracle, and claimed to act by direct authority of the Virgin. When he preached, the divine letter containing his instructions was kept clasped in one of his hands, the fingers of which were never even for a moment unclosed, lest he should lose the supernatural commission. This conduct readily imposed on the credulous multitude, while terror amongst the higher orders spread the wildest rumours as to his origin and character. He was said to be an apostate Cistercian monk; in his youth he had denied Jesus Christ; he had been, nay, was a Mahometan; he it was that in his youth had led the crusade of children who had plunged by thousands into the sea or been sold in slavery to the Saracens; finally, he was an emissary of the Soldan of Egypt. Most of this is manifest fable; but this person's facility for preaching makes it probable that he was really a monk, while his title, "the Master of Hungary," leads to the suspicion that he was in some way connected with the Bulgarian Manichees. He certainly had great powers of organization, for, as he proceeded through France, and as his following of credulous boors was augmented by numbers of profligate desperadoes, he appears to have instituted and maintained a tolerable discipline. Two lieutenants, who bore the title of masters, and numerous captains of thousands, received his orders and transmitted them to the obedient multitude.

Marching through Flanders and Picardy, he entered Amiens at the head of thirty thousand men; thence he passed to the Isle of France, gathering the whole labouring population in his wake. None of the cities dared to close their gates against him; the horde of shepherds had become an army. On their banners were emblazoned the Lamb and the Cross, the Virgin with her angels appearing to the Master. In battle array they reached Paris to the number of one hundred thousand men. Blanche, the Queen Regent, in some wild hope that these fierce peasants might themselves aid in achieving, or compel others to achieve, the deliverance of her son, suffered them to be admitted into the capital.

But now their hostility to the Church became apparent. They not only usurped all the priestly functions, performed marriages, distributed crosses, offered absolution to those who joined their crusade, but they inveighed against the vices of the priesthood. "They taunted," says Matthew Paris, "the Minorites and the Friar preachers as vagabonds and hypocrites; the White Monks" (the Cistercians) "as covetous of lands and the robbers of flocks; the Black Monks" (the Benedictines) "as proud and gluttonous; the canons as half-laymen given to all manner of luxury; the bishops as hunters, hawkers and voluptuaries." It is noteworthy that the popularity of the Pastoureaux, at least in the cities, was won by thus heaping reproaches on the mediæval clergy.

The Master, emboldened by impunity (he had actually been admitted into the presence of the Queen), now worked his will in Paris. Mounted in the pulpit of the Church of St. Eustache, wearing a bishop's mitre, he preached and blessed and consecrated, married and granted divorces; while his swarming followers mercilessly slew the priests who endeavoured to oppose them. After a short stay they quitted the city. The unwieldy host divided into three bodies. One went towards Orleans and Bourges, one towards Bordeaux, one to the Mediterranean coast. The first troop, led by the Master in person, entered Orleans, notwithstanding the resistance of the bishop and the clergy. Finding the populace favourable to the insurgents, the bishop issued his inhibition to all clerks, ordering them to keep aloof from the profane assembly. Unfortunately the command was not obeyed. Some of the younger scholars were induced to attend the preaching which had awed Paris and her University. One of them foolishly interrupted the preacher; he was immediately struck down; the scholars were pursued; many were killed. The bishop laid the city under an interdict and fled. Leaving Orleans they shortly reached Bourges, where, penetrating into the Jewish quarter, they plundered the houses, and massacred the inhabitants. Here the executive, at length convinced of their danger, decided to act. The moment selected was judicious, for the Pastoureaux were not expecting opposition. The Master was about to, or had failed to, perform some pretended miracle when the assault was commenced. A soldier rushed forth and clove the head of the Master; the royal bailiff and his men-at-arms fell on the panic-stricken followers; the excommunication was read; such of the shepherds as were not massacred were hanged. Simon de Montfort at Bordeaux adopted similar measures with the second division. Their leader was seized and thrown into the Garonne, his followers cut down by the soldiery or hanged by the magistrates. The third division, which reached Marseilles about the same time, met with a similar fate.

Seventy years later, in the time of Philip V., this spasm of fanaticism was repeated. This rising, which was almost identical in character with that already described, took place under the same pretence of a crusade, though under a very different king. Again the leader was a priest and monk who claimed supernatural gifts; again the disciples were found amongst the miserable peasants. The insurrection, perhaps more extended in scope, meeting with no encouragement, was less terrible in result. These enthusiasts commenced their career as mere mendicants, and it was not until many of them had been hanged that, in self-defence, they displayed any violence. It was with this object that the large body which reached Paris in the spring of 1320 A.D. commenced hostilities. Encamping in the Pré aux Clercs they claimed the release of their imprisoned brothers, and, in default, forced the prison of St. Martin, St. Germain, and the Chatelet, and set at liberty the inmates. Having succeeded in this rescue they set off southward. This time they appear to have passed by the great cities of Central France, but 40,000 entered Languedoc and commenced a massacre of the Jews. At Verdun, on the Garonne, a royal castle whither the Jews had fled for protection, a frightful butchery took place. At Auch, Gimont, Castel Sarraasin, Toulouse and Gaillac, similar cruelties were perpetrated. They then hurried to Avignon, but failed to enlist the sympathies of the Pope. John XXII. excommunicated them, alleging as the ground of this measure that they had taken the cross without papal authority. Further, he invoked the civil power, and found the Seneschal of Carcassonne only too obedient. By his orders all the roads in the district were rendered impassable, all the supplies of provisions stopped. Thus hemmed in on all sides, in a malarious and barren country, the greater part of the Pastoureaux perished of famine and disease, and the survivors were put to death. So suddenly began and ended these two outbreaks of religious Jacquerie.

Literature of Pastoureaux. The original authorities as to the earlier fanatics are Matthew Paris and William of Nangis, of the latter the Continuator Nangii. Of modern accounts Sismondi's History of France, vols. vii. and ix., and Velly's, v. and viii., are the best. See also Du Cange, s. v. Pastorelli.

PATERINI. An Italian name for the Paulicians, or Manichæan heretics who migrated from Bulgaria to Italy in the eleventh century. The name was used as a common designation of heretics in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and was also given by married priests to those who opposed the marriage of the clergy, as if such opposition indicated a Manichæan view of marriage [Mosh. Ecccl. Hist. ii. 33, n. 2, Stubbs' ed.]. As the word "pataria" signifies, in the dialect of Milan, "a popular faction," it has been supposed by some that the opponents of the clergy were called Paterini on account of their popularity, and that these being generally infected with the Albigenian errors, the name became a common designation of heretics [Neander, Ecccl. Hist. vi. 67, Bohn's transl.]. The Patarins were among the sects condemned by the Council of Lateran, A.D. 1179 [Harduin's Concil. vii. 163].

PATERNIANI. A sect of Manichæan heretics mentioned by St. Augustine and Prædestinatus as believing that the upper or intellectual part of the body was created by God, and the lower or sensual part by the Evil One. They were also called Venustians, and were condemned for their immorality as well as their heresy by Damasus in a council held at Rome in A.D. 367. [Aug. Hæres. lxxxv.; Prædest. Hæres. lxxxv.; Labbe's Concil. ii. 1038.]

PATRICIANI. A sect named by all the early heresiologists as followers of a heretic named Patricius, whom Philaster describes as a Roman [Philast. Hæres. lxii.]. They maintained the principle afterwards common to all Manichæan heretics, that the substance of the body was created by the Evil One and not by God; and this they carried to such a length that they justified self-destruction as a righteous act, by which a man becomes perfect through separation from his evil body [Aug. Hæres. lxi.; Prædest. Hæres. lxi.]. St. Augustine also classes them with Basilides, Carpocrates, Marcion, and other precursors of the Manichees, as repudiating the Holy Scriptures [Aug. contr. Adversar. Leg. et Proph. ii.]. Nothing is known of Patricius beyond the bare statement of Philaster, and as the heresy of which he is said to be the founder is not mentioned by Epiphanius, Danaeus thinks it probable that it arose after his time, perhaps about A.D. 380. Prædestinatus says that the Patricians sprung from the northern parts of Numidia and Mauritania.

PATRIPASSIANS. As their name imports, the Patripassians held that God the Father became incarnate, and suffered for the redemption of man. This heresy presupposes a denial of the distinction of Persons in the Godhead [MONARCHIANS], and the word Father, in the statement of the Patripassian tenet, is not used to signify the Father of the Begotten Word, but to signify the Godhead, One single Hypostasis, the Father of all.

It will be readily seen that there may be two forms of Patripassianism; one, which in the Person of the Redeemer substitutes for the Divine Nature of the Word the one undistinguished God; the other, which attributes a capacity of suffering to the Godhead itself. The former asserts that the Father of all becoming incarnate, suffered in the same way as Catholic doctrine asserts that Christ suffered, namely, as to the Human Nature, not as to the Divine Nature, which is Itself impassible: the latter, not excluding this suffering of the One Person constituted of Two Natures, asserts that the very Nature of the Godhead is itself passible. The former of these two doctrines was ascribed to the Praxeans and Sabellians, and it followed so directly from their Monarchian tenets, compared with their estimate of the Person of the Redeemer, that it may be doubted whether their denial of Patripassianism was really anything more than a denial of the latter doctrine. The former doctrine again was avowed by the Noëtians, and there is some reason to think that they held also the latter. [PRAXEANS. SABELLIANS. NOËTIANS.] The latter doctrine is also involved in the Arian and Apollinarian heresies. Pearson has pointed this out as a thing not generally understood. To his words, The infinite Nature cannot, by any external acquisition, i.e. by the assumption of humanity, be any way changed in its intrinsic and essential Perfections, he subjoins the note, That Arius made the Nature of the Word to suffer in the Flesh is not so frequently and plainly delivered as his heresy, condemned at Nice, is known [Expos. of the Creed, Art. iv. p. 187, ed. 1741]. To the authorities which Pearson gives may be added that of Athanasius, who says of the Apollinarians that they must either with Marcion make the Death and Resurrection a mere appearance, or with Arius declare the Godhead of the Logos to be passible [cont. Apollin. ii. 12]. Of these two forms of error, the former is repugnant to the Christian mind rather from the antecedent error of the denial of the Persons of the Godhead [MONARCHIANS], than from the consequent error itself. For this consequent error, great as it is, does not of itself violate the sanctity of the Godhead, as the second form of Patripassianism does, inasmuch as it attributes to the θεός of the single Hypostasis that (and no more) which Catholic doctrine attributes to the θεός of the Word. But the second form of Patripassian error "harbours so low an estimation of the Divine Nature as to conceive it capable of diminution. It makes the Essence of the Godhead subject to the sufferings of the flesh" [Pearson, loc. cit.].

The Aquileian Church added to its Credo in Deum the words Invisibili et Impassibili. Rufinus states this was done to meet the Sabellian heresy. His commentary applies the words to the denial of the two forms of Patripassianism which have been named. But, regarding the Aquileian Creed, see Ffoulkes on The Athanasian Creed, ch. i.

PATTALORYNCHITES. [PASSALORYNCHITES].

PAULIANISTS. The followers of Paul of Samosata. [SAMOSATENES.]

PAULIANISTS. [PAULITÆ.]

PAULICIANS. These heretics were a Manichæan sect of Asiatic origin, and first appeared in the western part of Armenia in the seventh century. At that period the primitive Manichæanism of Africa, directly derived from the teaching of Mani, (and which at no time possessed continuous communication with the East,) had been for more than a century crushed or dispersed by Roman persecution; and the sources of Paulicianism must be sought therefore in the body of Manichæan influence and belief, which, after the execution of Mani, found a refuge from proscription within the eastern frontier of the Roman Empire. There, for more than three centuries, the heresy learned to modify its language and institutions in accordance with the requirement of an orthodox but unsettled country; and when it appears in the seventh century under the name of Paulicianism, it is found to bear evident traces of this modification. Thus we find the Paulicians, while retaining the characteristic errors of Manichæan dualism, both renounced the dangerous dogma of the apostleship of Mani and explained or rejected the more odious portions of his teaching, and it is thus that the Paulician heresy may be said to represent a reformed or schismatic development of Manichæism.

The precise origin and date of the title "Paulician" is wrapt in some obscurity, but, at any rate, the name is not older than the seventh century and the reign of Constans II. Its origin is attributed to one Paul, the son of a Manichæan woman named Callinice, who with his brother John is said to have preached the reformed heresy in the country lying near the sources of the Euphrates. This story however rests on no solid foundation, and is probably a Western invention. Even if such a person as this Paul did exist, his fame has been eclipsed by the more fruitful labours of Constantine, who must be looked upon as the real founder of the Paulician sect. For seven-and-twenty years (that is, from about the year 660 to 687 A.D.) this Constantine, or Sylvanus, as he was afterwards called, laboured to erect the Paulician church. Starting from Man-analis, near Samosata, he preached throughout Armenia and Pontus, and the success of his missionary enterprise was so great that it at length provoked the interference of Constantinople. An imperial commissioner, by name Simeon, was despatched by Constantine Pogonatus, the fourth of the Heraclian emperors, to Colonia, the scene of this preacher's latest success; but the conduct of the Paulicians so favourably affected him that he exchanged the rôle of persecutor, first for that of convert, subsequently for that of martyr. An apostate (Justus) betrayed his former brethren, and enabled the Byzantine government everywhere to detect and punish the heresy. Though marked with the usual circumstances of cruelty on the part of the imperial authorities, and of devotedness on the part of the heretics, the persecution was wholly ineffectual, and in the reign of the emperor's successor another Paul revived and extended the heresy in Cappadocia.

Whatever was the precise origin of the Paulician name, it is certain that these heretics claimed the special protection or a monopoly of the pure doctrine of the Apostle of the Gentiles; but notwithstanding this claim, and notwithstanding the invariable assumption by their leaders of names which (like Sylvanus, Tychicus, Titus, and Timothy) are peculiarly connected with the ministry of St. Paul, the tenets of the Paulicians were distinctively Manichæan and by no means Pauline. They however emphatically repudiated the apostleship of Mani [προθύμως ἀναθεματίζουσι Σκυθίανον Βουδδάν τε καὶ Μάνεον, Photius, i. e. 4], but, except that they rejected his individual inspiration, they differed as to no material dogma from the old Manichæans. They taught the essential evil of matter, the eternal hostility of the two principles; they denied the inspiration of the Old Testament and the Deity of the Jehovah; they despised the Cross, and, holding the Valentinian doctrine that the spiritual Christ passed the body of the Virgin like water through a pipe, were naturally accused of insulting her memory; they taught a purely illusory baptism, and had no Eucharist at all; they excluded their ministers or scribes (who bore the humble title of συνέκδημοι, or fellow-voyagers) from all government in their community; above all, they were iconoclasts, and placed the Scriptures in the hands of the laity. The greater part of these errors were, it will be seen, shared by the early disciples of Mani. The abandonment of the Eucharist, of which the older sectaries retained but a meaningless profanation, is but the natural development of the leading tenets of dualism, and the subordination of the clergy is only a matter of discipline. An apparently graver difference exists in the fact that the Paulicians blended the two orders of virtue, the "perfect" and the catechumen; but this was a modification natural enough in a comparatively barbarous community, nor is it other than a reasonable development of that equality between the lay and clerical perfect which was a fundamental principle, or, at least, an invariable usage of ancient Manichæism. These changes had moreover the specific advantage of giving to the Paulicians a more consistent and rational creed, and a more united and enthusiastic communion. They were enabled, too, in this way, to combine the discordant elements of democracy and sacerdotalism, for each Paulician respected in himself the sacredness of an individual "perfect." But few differences existed in the two canons: the Paulicians certainly, the Manichæans possibly, excluded the Petrine Epistles, and the former, while including the Acts of the Apostles and the epistle of the Paulician Sergius, rejected the works of Mani, which indeed had probably early disappeared, or at least were not easily accessible in Armenia. Finally, by substituting for the crude method of denial of the authenticity of adverse scripture the more convenient system of metaphorical explanation, they avoided the charge, if not the punishment, of sacrilege.

From the close of the seventh century to the middle of the ninth the Paulicians suffered continuous and unremitting persecution. If we except, as a measure of kindness, the transportation in the eighth century by the Emperor Copronymus of a small colony from Asia to Thrace, and perhaps one short time of truce in the reign of Nicephorus Logotheta, the treatment which the Asian Paulicians, from the time of their first appearance, received from the emperors fully justifies their subsequent revolt. Even heretical emperors were unable to afford them much protection, for as iconoclasts they were too unpopular to venture on the open toleration of an odious heresy, and the orthodox princes had no temptation to be lenient. Constantine Pogonatus and Justinian II. head the list of persecutors, while Leo the Armenian and the glutton Michael, who eclipsed their fame, were in turn cast into the shade by the Empress Theodora, who, while she restored the images to the Eastern Church, promised it the absolute extirpation of the Manichæan heretics. During her brief reign no less than 100,000 Paulicians perished by the imperial cruelty. The whole sect revolted. Led by Karbeas, himself an officer of the imperial army, whose father had been impaled by the imperial executioner, they established themselves at Tephrike, a fortress in the mountains of Trebizond, and there, in alliance with the Saracen emir, they preserved their independence, and harassed the dominions of the Emperor. The imperial forces, led by Michael the drunkard, were quite unable to cope with the enthusiasts, and suffered at their hands a shameful defeat under the walls of Samosata. On the death of Karbeas, the place of leader was supplied by Chrysocheir, a heretic of equal ability and greater fierceness. Under his standard the Paulicians enjoyed the pillage of Nice, Nicomedia, and Ancyra, and stabled their horses in the famous church of the Ephesians; but he at length fell in an obscure skirmish, and Basil the Macedonian reduced the impregnable Tephrike. From that time, though far from being exterminated, and always dangerous by their alliance with the Mahometan sultans, they never again seriously threatened the peace of the Empire. Throughout these troubles the Paulician colony of Copronymus had remained unmolested in its Thracian home. By the close of the ninth century the Paulician preaching had perverted the faith of the Bulgarians, and caused alarm and sorrow to the provincial archbishop. In the next century (the tenth) they were reinforced by a large and powerful colony, which John Zimisces transported into Thracia from the mountains of Pontus. They soon obtained possession of Philippopolis; their courage made them favourites with the Bulgarians, on whom they conferred their heretical faith, and with whom they were confounded in their national appellation. Their valour made them respected by the Government, but their missionary zeal was terrible to the Church. The close of the tenth century is marked by the rise in Bulgaria of an obscure body of dissenting heretics, a circumstance strongly testifying to the robust condition of Paulician Manichæism. [BOGOMILES.]

The last persecution of the Paulicians, which was comparatively bloodless, was undertaken by Alexius Comnenus at the close of the eleventh century. He had more than once recognised the valour and punished the independence of his Bulgarian troops. He now adopted a characteristic scheme of conversion. Fixing his winter quarters near the Paulician capital, he superintended the erection of an orthodox rival in the city of Alexiopolis. Thence for many weeks the Emperor τρισκαίδεκατὸς ἀπόστολος, as his daughter devoutly terms him, preached and argued against the dangers of heresy. Honours and emoluments were showered on the converts; the obstinate suffered imprisonment and confiscation. The new city built expressly for those who yielded to the imperial persuasion was enriched with every privilege the Empire could bestow. Many converts were made, for the greedier and less zealous Paulicians readily accepted the gold and the orthodoxy of the Emperor. Philippopolis, divided against itself, was wrested from their hands; the leaders who were faithful to their error were imprisoned or exiled, and their property distributed among their less faithful brothers. For once cruelty was absent from the councils of the imperial inquisitor, and the only heretic who suffered death was Basil, the deluded founder of the wretched Bogomiles. On the departure of Alexius from Bulgaria, an event soon followed by his death, most of the converted heretics recanted, and the old faith of Paulicianism recovered its former influence; but its missionary zeal was on the wane, and with its loss of activity its distinctive character disappears. Before the thirteenth century it seems to have succeeded in establishing relations with the sects of Italy and France, the scene of the latest development of revived Manichæism. But from the close of the eleventh century Paulicianism as such ceases to be significant.

After the eleventh century the history of Paulicianism is involved in obscurity, and confused so much by the rise, development and destruction of the Albigensian movement that it is difficult to decide how much of later Manichæism can properly be called Paulician. At the end of the twelfth century Matthew Paris informs us that a Paulician pope or primate named Bartholomew governed from some spot on the confines of Bulgaria affiliated societies in France and Italy. This probably is the error of an ill-informed person, although it is reasonably clear that community of creed and interest had at that date brought the Manichæism both of East and West into communication. After the destruction of the Albigensian heresy [ALBIGENSES] Western Manichæism in its ineffectual life in Bosnia must have drawn much of its vitality from Paulician sources, but in the absorbing interest of the struggle between Christian and Mahometan the existence of these inhabitants of a barbarous district was almost forgotten. In the middle of the fifteenth century two "Waywodes," or native princes of Bosnia, are recorded as having supported the Manichaean heretics, and in the same century these Paulicians (if they may be so termed) tasted for the last time genuine orthodox persecution. This persecution, commenced by Stephen Thomas, King of Bosnia, in A.D. 1420, was carried on by Stephen Thomas, his successor, and was terminated about the year A.D. 1463 by the conquest of the country by the Ottoman Turks. From time to time various dignitaries, of whom the most renowned was the Cardinal Carvalho, have claimed the honour of having converted the Paulicians, and it is certain that they attracted the attention both of Nicolas V. and Pius II. The latest missionary efforts directed towards them were due to Deodatus of Sophia, who attempted the conversion of some Manichæans on the borders of Bulgaria about the close of the seventeenth century. At the present day a few barbarous heretics still hold dualistic opinions in the Danubian provinces, and these have also been classed with the Paulicians, but they are known to practise bloody sacrifices, and by their barbarism they would seem more akin to the Bogomiles than to the Paulicians. At present an accurate account of their religion and opinions is wholly wanting.

PAULI JOANNITES. A name given to the ATTINGIANS, and sometimes to the Paulicians in general, from Paul and John, the founders of the heresy.

PAULITÆ. An obscure sect of the Acephali, followers of Paul, a patriarch of Alexandria, who was deposed by a council [A.D. 541] for his uncanonical consecration by the Patriarch of Constantinople, and who, after his deposition, sided with the Monophysites [Niceph. Hist. Eccl. xlix.]. They are mentioned under the name of Paulianists in the treatise on the reception of heretics which was written by Timothy of Constantinople [Timoth. de Triplici Recept. Hæret. in Cotelierii Monument. iii. 377].

PAULUS. [RATIONALISTS.]

PAUPERES CATHOLICI. A society formed under the auspices of Innocent III. [A.D. 1198-1216], composed of Waldenses who had returned to the Church, and intended as a missionary community for the conversion of others. The ecclesiastics and better educated were to busy themselves with preaching, exposition of the Bible, religious instruction, and controversy with the sectarians. Others not qualified to undertake such work as this were to live in communities by themselves, occupied in devotion and good works. The Pope granted them several concessions, in accordance with the prejudices of the Waldenses; as, for example, that they should not be called upon to take up arms except against the heathen, nor to take an oath in courts of law in any but criminal causes. The society was originated by Durand of Osca, and maintained itself for many years in Catalonia under his guidance. But it seems never to have met with the success that it ought to have done, the wrong-headedness of the Waldenses, like that of the later Puritans, standing in the way of all reasonable schemes of comprehension. [Neander's Eccl. Hist. vii. 361.]

PAUPERES DE LOMBARDI. [WALDENSES.]

PAUPERES DE LUGDUNO. [WALDENSES.]

PECULIAR PEOPLE. A quite recent sect of very ignorant people, found chiefly in Kent, whose principles are very similar to those of the American TUNKERS. The characteristic which has been most prominently brought forward is their refusal to adopt any material means for recovery from sickness; their dependence being placed entirely on prayer.

PELAGIANS. An influential school which sprang up early in the fifth century, and which derived its appellation from its founder Pelagius. Its distinctive feature was the denial of original sin and its consequences.

[I.] The Greek name by which the founder of this school is familiarly known is merely a translation of the Latin "Marigena," or the Welsh "Morgan," and he is sometimes called "Brito," either to denote his nationality or to distinguish him from another Pelagius of Tarentum. St. Jerome says that "by descent he belonged to the race of the Scots in the neighbourhood of the Britons,"¹ that "he was heavy from feeding on Scotch porridge."² A Christian poet describes Pelagianism as—

"Dogma quod antiqui satiatum felle draconis Pestifero vomuit coluber sermone Britannus."

[Prosper. de Ingrat. cap. i.]

Some description has also reached us of his personal appearance; he had broad shoulders, a thick neck, and a fat face;³ and these physical characteristics may have suggested the charge of voluptuousness,⁴ which is not supported on any other grounds. The exact time and place of his birth are uncertain, although tradition fondly pointed to the year B.C. 354, the date of the birth of his great future antagonist St. Augustine [Dempster, Eccles. Hist. of Scotland]. He embraced the monastic profession, and became a monk in the famous abbey of Bangor, or, according to another account, its abbot, with two thousand or more monks obedient to his rule [Ussher, Eccles. Brit. Antig. cap. viii.].⁵ There is no historical ground for the belief that Pelagius resided in early life in Eastern Europe, or that he is to be identified with a monk of the same name whom St. Chrysostom alludes to as having gone astray [Chrysost. Ep. iv. tom. iii. p. 567]; it seems to have been based on [a] his acquaintance with the Greek language, [b] his oriental tone of thought, and [c] the intellectual rather than practical character of the heresy, all of which may be only proofs of the intimate connection which early existed between the British and Eastern Churches. Towards the close of the fourth century he left Britain for Italy, and took up his quarters at Rome, where he became acquainted with several of the leading ecclesiastics of the time; among them the saintly Paulinus, afterwards Bishop of Nola [A.D. 409-421]; Rufinus of Aquileia; Coelestius, variously described as an Italian or a Scotchman, his future companion in thought and travel, and almost equally famous with himself. In the year 411, after the sack of Rome by the Goths under Alaric, Pelagius and Coelestius left Italy in company for Africa, where, after a very few years together, Pelagius left his companion encountering the strong opposition of the African prelates, and took up his abode in Palestine, where he first found a friend and then a foe in Jerome, at that time resident in Bethlehem. Pelagius had by this time acquired both a fame for his learning and a reputation for his piety. This is frequently and candidly admitted by St. Augustine [de Peccat. Mer. et Rem. iii. 1, Ep. clxxxvi. 1, etc.], and is attested by the fact that he was requested by Juliana, a noble Roman lady of the Anician family, then an exile in Africa, to write a letter to her daughter Demetrias on her profession of virginity. In this letter, which is extant among Jerome's works, he for the first time expressed his views in print in such a manner as to cause letters of remonstrance and confutation to be composed by St. Augustine, and Alypius, Bishop of Tagaste. Soon afterwards [A.D. 415], he was publicly accused of heresy by Paulus Orosius, a young Spanish ecclesiastic sent into Palestine by St. Augustine, nominally to study under Jerome, but in reality to raise opposition against the teaching of Pelagius. The synod before which the charge was investigated was held at Jerusalem, and presided over by its bishop John, who was extremely partial, if not friendly to the accused, and inclined to resent the vehement conduct of Orosius. Much difficulty was caused by the inability of Orosius to speak Greek and of the Council to speak Latin, while Pelagius, who was acquainted with both languages, was placed in a position of advantage. It was eventually resolved to refer the whole controversy to Pope Innocent I., which was tantamount to shelving it at least for the present. But it was not to sleep. About this time Jerome published his three books against Pelagianism, in the form of dialogues between Atticus and Critobulus, the former a Catholic and the latter a Pelagian [printed in S. Aug. Opp. vol. x. Benedict. edit.]. A fresh accusation was laid against him within the same year, at the instance of Heros of Arles and Lazarus of Aix (Aquæ), two deposed Gallican bishops, before Eulogius, metropolitan of Cæsarea. A synod of fourteen bishops was held at Diospolis (Lydda) for its investigation—the Synodus Miserabilis of Jerome [Epist. 79, edit. Vellars]. Neither of the accusers appeared, pleading illness as an excuse. Orosius also was absent, and Pelagius, skilled in controversial tactics, succeeded in securing his own acquittal on consenting to disavow the opinions held by Coelestius, and condemned at the Synod of Carthage [A.D. 412]. Even this he did in an equivocal manner. In the first place, he would only find fault with them as foolish instead of erroneous; in the second place, he adopted hypothetical language, “whether these are Coelestius’ sayings or not, let them look to it that say they are his. I never held so, and I do anathematize any one that so holds.” Pelagius was very pleased with this result; he wrote exultingly to announce it to St. Augustine, and was encouraged to bring out his work on Free-will. But the African Church was not content with the verdict of the small assemblage of Diospolis. Several synods were convoked, one at Carthage attended by sixty-eight bishops, another at Milevum by sixty-one bishops; at both, in consequence mainly of information afforded by Orosius, Pelagius was condemned, and Pope Innocent I., on being appealed to by such leading prelates as St. Augustine of Hippo, Alypius of Tagaste, and Aurelius of Carthage, yet without asking or receiving any explanation from the Pelagian party, confirmed their verdict. But in the next year Innocent died [A.D. 417], and was succeeded on the papal chair by Zosimus. Coelestius forthwith appeared at Rome with letters in his favour from Prayllius, who had lately succeeded John in the see of Jerusalem, and Pelagius. He was granted several private interviews, at which he tried to persuade the new pope that certain of Pelagius’ views about original sin were mere superfluous speculations [St. Aug. Opp. vol. x. app. p. 97], and in proof of whose orthodoxy he presented a long creed, the two last clauses of which are here quoted, to prove in how nearly orthodox language the Pelagians were ready to express their views on free-will, and how humble an attitude they were ready to assume before a favourable pope.

“Free-will we do so own as to say that we always stand in need of God’s help [St. Aug. criticises this as insufficient: de Gratia Christi, cap. 33]: and that as well they are in an error who say with the Manichæans that a man cannot avoid sin, as they who affirm with Jovinian that a man cannot sin. For both of these take away the freedom of the will. But we say that a man always is in a state that he may sin or may not sin; so as to own ourselves always to be of a free-will.

“This is, most blessed pope, our faith which we have always learned in the Catholic Church, and have always held. In which, if there be anything which is perhaps unwarily or unskillfully expressed, we desire it may be amended by you (si quispiam ignorantie error obrepsit vestra sententiâ corrigatur), who do hold both the faith and see of Peter. And if this our confession be approved by the judgment of your apostleship, then whoever shall have a mind to find fault with me will shew not me to be a heretic, but himself unskilful, or spiteful, or even no Catholic."

The Pelagian party thus fortified, and with this professed readiness to anathematize all that was condemned by the papal see, succeeded in carrying their point. Zosimus declared their orthodoxy unimpeachable (tales etiam absolutæ fidei), and addressed a circular letter to the whole African episcopate, demanding either that their accusers should appear personally at Rome within two months or that the charges should be abandoned. But the dogma of papal infallibility having not yet been invented, the decree of Zosimus did not meet with unquestioning acquiescence or respect. In the East, Theodotus, Bishop of Antioch, held a synod at Jerusalem, to which Pelagius was cited, and where his views were condemned [Marius Merc. Common. cap. 3; Tillemont's Mém. xiii. p. 756]. In Africa, Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, refused to comply with the directions of Zosimus, and was supported in this course not only by two local synods but also by a third and provincial council, attended by two hundred and fourteen bishops, who, after asserting their independence of Italy, proceeded to pass nine canons in condemnation of Coelestius and Pelagius [a detailed description of which will be found in Tillemont's Mém. vol. xiii. p. 739]. When news of these various proceedings reached Rome, whither also the Carthaginian canons had been despatched, the papal policy changed, and both the civil and ecclesiastical authorities combined in condemnation of Pelagius. Several edicts were issued by the Emperor, apparently at the request of the North African bishops, one of them being addressed to Aurelius himself. Theodosius and Honorius agreed to publish a joint rescript [for the full text see Ussher, Brit. Eccles. Antiq. cap. x. p. 272] banishing Pelagius and Coelestius and all who held their views. Zosimus, too, excommunicated them, not without being justly taunted for his tergiversation by the condemned party [August. contra Julian. lib. vi. sect. 37], and ineffectually whitewashed by the more orthodox writers. The majority of the Italian bishops acquiesced in this decision, but nineteen who refused to subscribe the papal document were deposed from their sees, among them one who became a leading controversialist on the Pelagian side, Julian, Bishop of Eclanum¹ (Avellino), against whom Augustine wrote six books, and whose remonstrance against the arbitrary character of these proceedings is still partially extant in the form of a letter addressed by him to Rufinus, Bishop of Thessalonica

[quoted by August. contra Duas Ep. Pelag. lib. iv. sec. 20]. The ejected party next demanded, but unsuccessfully, a general council to decide the question, in a letter declaratory of their faith, composed by Julian, and addressed to the Pope. Baffled on this point they appealed for sympathy in more distant places, Constantinople, Ephesus, Thessalonica, but were everywhere condemned, especially at a synod held in Cilicia [A.D. 423], and presided over² by Theodore, Bishop of Mopsuestia [A.D. 392-428]. The latter appears, however, before his death to have inclined to Pelagian views, and to have been the author of a book, of which an abstract is given by Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople [A.D. 858-891], entitled, "Against them that say men sin by nature and not by will," and from a careful analysis of whose system Neander proves its identity in many points with Pelagianism [vol. iv. 420-427]. Other prominent holders of Pelagian views were Leporius, a monk and priest of the South of France, who, on being compelled to flee his native country, passed over to Africa, where he was led to abjure his heretical notions by Augustine [A.D. 426]; and Anianus, a Deacon of the Church at Celeda in Italy, the author of several tracts, the translator of some of the Homilies of St. Chrysostom, and one of those clergy who was deposed by the sentence of Zosimus, A.D. 418. Pelagianism received its "coup de grace" at the third General Council of Ephesus [A.D. 431], being alluded to in the Synodical Letter prefixed to the acts of that assembly, and in the first and fourth canons, the latter of which runs thus:

"The holy Synod gives it in charge that all who fall away, and either publicly or privately adhere to the opinions of Nestorius and Coelestius, be deposed."

Throughout the remainder of this century occasional allusions are found to the continued existence of the views thus condemned. Letters are extant written by Pope Leo [A.D. 440] to the bishop of Aquileia warning him not to admit Pelagians into that communion for which they clamoured, and to the bishop of Altino in Lombardy on the same subject [A.D. 444]. Two letters also were sent by Pope Gelasius to Honorius, Bishop of Dalmatia, complaining of their increase in that province [A.D. 495]. Nothing is known with certainty of the time or place or manner of the death of Pelagius himself. By some that event is placed in A.D. 418, by others a few years later, while others maintain that he lingered on for a long time after his excommunication in obscurity. There seems to be no historical ground for the vague expression of Sianda and other lexicographers, "miserabiliter decessit." It has been supposed that he revisited Britain, but this rests only on the slender ground that Germanus, Bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus, Bishop of Troyes, were sent over to England [A.D. 429] to combat the growing tendency to Pelagianism [Bede, Eccles. Hist. lib. i. 17].

¹ A full history of the life and views of Julian is to be found in Tillemont's Mémoires, vol. xiii. art. ccvii.-cccx. His course was marked by boldness and an unwillingness to shroud his views under the ambiguities of language. Hence he is called "jactantissimus Pelagiani erroris assertor" [Prosper, in Chron. ad ann. 439].

The moral character of Pelagius, in spite of the aspersions previously alluded to, was above suspicion. St. Augustine himself candidly allows his adversary to have been a good and praiseworthy man.¹ His learning, too, was beyond dispute, and is evidenced by the many works of which he was the author; but none of which are extant with the exception of his Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles, an Epistle on Virginité, and his Confession of Faith, which have been accidentally preserved among the works of St. Jerome.

[II.] There is some difficulty in ascertaining what Pelagius really taught, for several reasons: [1] Because we gain our information almost exclusively from his adversaries, especially from St. Augustine's works, and from St. Jerome's letter to Ctesiphon, and his Dialogues, or from the long letter addressed by Pope Celestius to the Gallican bishops [A.D. 431], preserved in the appendix to vol. x. of the Benedictine edition of St. Augustine's works, p. 133; or from the Commonitorium of Marius Mercator, a layman resident in North Africa; or still later in the confutation of Julian's views found among the Venerable Bede's works in the Preface to the Canticles. [2] From a willingness on Pelagius' part to adopt the most orthodox language, provided that he might interpret it in his own way. Thus using "grace" not in the Augustinian sense, but to denote all the moral and spiritual powers which God has conferred ab initio on human nature, he was willing to subscribe to such a sentence as the following: "I do anathematize any one who says or thinks that the grace of God, by which Christ came into the world to save sinners, is not necessary both every hour and moment, and also in every action; and they that deny this grace incur eternal punishment" [Aug. de Pecc. Orig. cap. 22].

Keeping in view these circumstances, the general account of Pelagianism seems to be as follows: The prevailing tendency which Pelagius found in the monastic system, under which he was brought up, was an over-reliance on the sacraments and sacramental ordinances of the Church, and, in spite of these spiritual privileges, considerable, sometimes habitual, deviation from the laws of rectitude. The remedy he thought would be a creed which made man more dependent on his own exertions, and this view he proceeded to develop into a logical system. As a foundation it was necessary to assume that a just God would not visit the sins of one man on the heads of others, and that therefore neither the free-will nor the moral lives of mankind could be affected by Adam's fall. Men came into the world pure, disease and death being not due to sin, but the natural accompaniments of the elements of which human bodies are formed, and baptism being not a cleansing rite, but a form of admission into God's kingdom. Internal grace was neither necessarily nor usually bestowed, because God had been sufficiently bountiful, in granting us the privilege of using our natural faculties, in giving us a revealed gospel, and in intrusting His Church with the power of dispensing forgiveness for sins committed. With such aids, which were not what the Catholic party meant by grace, though the Pelagians made the controversy a complicated one by so terming them, man by his own free-will would be able to keep all God's commandments, and if he failed it was his own fault, and if he succeeded it was his own merit. Thus underlying the whole dispute there were these general and irreconcilable grounds of difference. There were two wholly distinct modes of contemplating human nature in its present condition. St. Augustine started from the position that man finds himself here in a state of inherited corruption, a point of view of which Pelagius repeatedly expressed his rejection. The former would only regard human nature in one of two conditions: either as it existed in its unfallen state in Paradise, in communion with the original Source of goodness; or as it exists now, estranged from the Source of all goodness, and enslaved by the foreign power of evil. Pelagius placed human nature, furnished by God as its Creator with the moral faculties, in a middle and unbiassed position between good and evil. The further deduction of St. Augustine was, that since the first man by his free-will became alienated from God, this free-will, once the fountain of all good, was now only active to sin, and that man therefore needed a new supervenient grace in order to be brought back to goodness. The ultimate deduction from Pelagian principles was, that there was no room for the recognition of anything supernatural, that God, having once for all created human nature, and provided it with all the powers requisite for its preservation and development, permitted it to go on with the powers bestowed upon it, and according to the laws implanted in it, so that the continuous operation of the Divine agency was with reference only to the preservation of its powers and capacities, not to any concursus in order to their development and exercise.

[III.] Such being a general survey of the two positions occupied by Pelagianism and Augustinianism, it will be useful to enumerate separately the erroneous elements of the former.

1. The denial of original sin, and, as a necessary consequence, of its remission in baptism.² This denial was supported by such arguments as, that its existence would imply the doctrine of the propagation of souls as well as bodies, that it was inconsistent with the freedom of the will, that it made marriage sinful, a charge which is entered into at length by St. Augustine in his letter "de Nuptiis et Concupiscentiâ," addressed to the Consul Valerius. The Pelagians in their turn were hardly pressed with the argument drawn from infant baptism. The Catholics argued, "that infants have sin is proved from the need they have of baptism; and other than original sin they cannot have." The Pelagians did not deny the necessity of infant baptism, but rejoined sometimes that they were not baptized for forgiveness but for something else; sometimes that though they were ostensibly baptized for forgiveness, it was not that they had any sin, but that the uniformity of words might be preserved; or because they were baptized into the Church, where forgiveness was to be had for those that wanted it; or because they were baptized with a sacrament which had the means of forgiveness for any that had sinned or should sin; or because infants actually had sin, not by propagation from a sinful stock, but either before they were born, in a former state, or since birth by peevishness and such like imperfections. On other occasions Pelagius sought an escape by this argument: "If baptism takes away original sin, then children who are born of parents both baptized must be without that sin" [Aug. de Grat. Christi, c. 8], to which St. Augustine replied, that as a circumcised parent begets an uncircumcised child, as pure wheat, when sown, produces both wheat and chaff, so a parent who is spiritually cleansed begets a son that resembles him, not according to that state in which he is by spiritual regeneration, but according to the state in which he is by carnal generation. Another argument of Pelagius was that if only the body and not the soul was derived from the parents, how was it consistent with our conception of divine justice that the soul should be involved in the guilt of original sin? [Aug. de Pecc. Mer. lib. iii. 10.] St. Augustine, in reply, contented himself with mentioning various other difficulties which we are not permitted to solve, and pointed out the rationalistic tendency of all such inquiries.

2. The denial of the necessity of grace. At the same time that Pelagius denied the necessity of divine grace in the Catholic acceptance of the term, he admitted it as God's gift in these subordinate senses. 1. In His giving us a free-will. 2. In giving pardon for past sins, and encouragement to avoid future shortcomings—a limited sense which was condemned by the fourth canon of the Council of Carthage [A.D. 418], which asserted those to be accursed who said, "that the grace of God, by virtue of which we are justified through Christ, refers merely to the forgiveness of past sins, and not to assistance to secure us against falling under sin for the future." 3. In opening our understanding by giving us the law and the light of the Gospel—a narrow view condemned by the fifth canon of the same council: "Let him be accursed who teaches that this grace helps us to keep from sinning, only so far as it opens our minds to a knowledge of the divine commands, so that we are made acquainted with what we must strive after and what we must avoid, but that it does not bestow on us a disposition to love and a faculty to practise such commands." 4. The grace of baptism wherein an adult person that has sinned obtains the remission of sins, and the inheritance of the kingdom of God. 5. In bestowing the kingdom of heaven as a reward to encourage us. 6. In generally facilitating and assisting us by doctrine and revelation; in declaring to us the things that shall be hereafter, that we may not be wedded to the present; in discovering to us the wiles of the devil; in enlightening our understanding by the means of His grace. Julian summed up these various effects of grace when he said that God helped us by commanding, blessing, sanctifying, chastising, inviting, enlightening. Pelagius recognised three progressive forms of righteousness: [1] that of the heathen, achieved by Socrates and other illustrious pagans; [2] that of the Jews who lived under the law; [3] that of Christians who live under grace. Augustine, on the contrary, traced all that was really righteousness to the same source. The virtues of the heathen were only seeming virtues, and were dictated by vainglory or other personal motives. The righteousness of the saints of the Old Testament was due to faith in a promised Saviour, as that of Christians was due to a faith in the same Saviour already come. Or the difference of view may be gauged by analyzing an action into its three constituent parts, the capacity, the will, and the act; the posse, velle, and esse. In the Augustinian system, the two first were attributed to grace, and the latter only to free-will; in the Pelagian system, the two latter were attributed to free-will, and the first only to grace. The strong expressions with which Holy Scripture abounds, favouring, in their literal interpretation, the views of St. Augustine, were explained away to suit the requirements of the Pelagian scheme. "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion" [Rom. ix. 15], was interpreted to mean, "I will have mercy and compassion on those who, I have foreseen, will by their actions merit mercy and compassion." The passage in the Epistle to the Philippians, "It is God that worketh in us to will and to do" [ii. 13], was explained as meaning only, "He works in us to will what is good and holy, when He consumes what is offered to our earthly desires by the greatness of the future glory and the promise of rewards, when He excites the prayerful will to longing after God by the revelation of His wisdom, when He counsels us to all goodness" [Aug. de Grat. Christi, cap. 10].

3. The assertion of complete free-will. As the Pelagians denied the original corruption of human nature, so they magnified the present freedom and goodness of it. Some of them presumed so far on the freedom of the will, as to assert that we have no need to be assisted by God to avoid sin, after He has once granted to our nature the power of free-will. Hence the offence which Pelagius is said to have taken when he heard a bishop utter, as expressive of his own feelings, the words of a prayer in St. Augustine's Confessions, "My God, bestow on me what Thou commandest, and command what Thou wilt," "Da quod jubes et jube quod vis"

[Confess. lib. x. 29]. In support of their position all the old dilemmas of the Sophists were reproduced and raised, "God's commands are either possible or impossible," "Sin is either a thing that can be avoided or that cannot be avoided," "Sin is either a thing of will or of necessity," etc., most of which were answered seriatim by St. Augustine [Lib. de perfect. Just., Hom. ad Eutropium]. If the grace of God was necessary to every good action, there was no room, urged Pelagius, for free-will, and to avoid this, instead of denying grace, he sometimes sought to identify it with free-will, although by this process the difficulty, instead of being solved, was only thrown further back. The Augustinian theory seemed to imply that God had a predilection for some of His creatures more than others, and bestowed grace on men in varying degrees, as a free gift, and not as a reward of their merits. If there is a difficulty in accepting this doctrine, how is it removed by the identification of grace with free-will, that is, with man's natural power of doing good? That power must be the gift of the Creator; yet it is not equally possessed by men; some are born with more spirit, or with a better character, or with a stronger inclination to virtue, or with less violent passions than others. A predilection on God's part is equally implied. Such powers are still a purely gratuitous gift at His hands which cannot have been merited by mankind before they were born, though its bestowal must have been predetermined by Omniscience.

4. The possibility of a perfectly sinless man. This was a logical deduction from the previous positions. When Pelagius found persons excusing their shortcomings on the ground of the weakness of human nature, and the impossibility of keeping the Divine commands, he said that instead of attributing their faults to a source which reflected on the Creator Himself, they should seek the cause in the feebleness of their own wills. By way of encouragement he proceeded to name certain persons whom he asserted to have been without sin; Abel, Enoch, Melchizedek, and about twenty more; also certain women, Deborah, Hannah, Judith, and above all the Blessed Virgin, in confessing whom to have been without sin he anticipated the modern Church of Rome, and he disagreed with St. Augustine in considering the tenet to be de fide [Aug. de Nat. et Grat. cap. 36]. His argument was a curious one. No sins are recorded as having been committed by these persons; therefore we may conclude that they were sinless, at least to assert otherwise would be to make a statement unauthorized by Holy Scripture.¹

5. The existence of a middle state for infants dying unbaptized. Pelagius considered that newborn infants were in the same condition as Adam before his fall. What became of them in case of their death? Sometimes he was content with the ambiguous reply, "Whither they do not go I know, whither they go I know not." Sometimes he taught the existence of a threefold state; damnation for sinners; heaven for baptized persons who lead a holy life; and a middle existence of neither pain nor pleasure, "Limbus Infantium," for infants dying unbaptized, before they have committed actual sin.

6. That Adam's fall injured himself only, and not mankind. The commonly received theory of the physical and moral consequences of the transgression of the first man on the entire race was rejected as encouraging moral indolence, as inconsistent with the justice of God, and as conflicting with the Pelagian theory of the absolute freedom of the will. "Even the individual," argued Julian, "cannot by means of a simple transgression suffer a change in his moral nature; he retains the same freedom of the will; the past sin no longer injured the first man when he had repented of it. How then was it possible that the entire human nature should be corrupted thereby?" The only sense in which it could be allowed to have been injurious to the human race was by its evil example. That death which Scripture asserts to have entered the world through the fall [Rom. v. 12], was interpreted to mean spiritual death only.² This partial view of the effects of the fall led to a correspondingly deficient conception of the effects of the Atonement, not always boldly asserted, but inevitably implied by the preceding positions, namely—

8. That as neither death nor sin passed upon all men by the fall of Adam, so neither are righteousness or life necessarily due to the death and resurrection of Christ. The redemption was not necessary to man's salvation, but was beneficial, as the Fall had been injurious, by the example afforded by the life of Christ. Man was as capable of securing salvation by the proper use of his own powers, as of drawing on himself damnation by their misuse, God having given him a law which prescribes nothing impossible, and to which He therefore expects a perfect personal obedience. Thus Pelagianism, fully developed, and in its worst aspect, made the atonement superfluous, and altered the character of Christ, while in its best aspect it fell far short of that idea of sanctification which is only the work of Christ, and that inner connection between Christ and the faithful resulting in their justification by Him.

Besides the above generally received views of Pelagius, a few doctrines of an eccentric character were held by some of his followers in Sicily.

Hilary writing thence [c. A.D. 410], enumerates the following, and asks St. Augustine's opinion on them.

1. That a rich man, if he keeps his wealth, and does not sell all he has, cannot enter into the kingdom of God; and that it will not avail him if he uses his riches well.

2. That it is not lawful to swear under any circumstances.

3. That the church of which it is written that it has neither spot nor wrinkle, is the church in which we now live. [Ussher, Brit. Eccles. Antig. p. 229. Aug. Ep. 88.]

Arminians have been frequently charged with verging on Pelagianism. The Remonstrants at the Synod of Dort [A.D. 1618-19], rebutted the charge by confessing that Divine grace was necessary, not only as it illuminates the understanding, but as it gives strength to the will to avoid sin; not only as it teaches us what we ought to do, but also as it gives us desire and power to do that which we ought.

[Pelagianism is treated of at length by St. Augustine in the following books: de Nuptiis et Concupiscentia, ad Valerium, lib. ii.; contra Duas Epistolas Pelagianorum ad Bonifacium, lib. iv.; Enchiridion, lib. i.; de Gratia et Libero Arbitrio, lib. i.; de Correctione et Gratia, lib. i.; de Prædestinatione Sanctorum, lib. i.; de Dono Perseverantiæ, lib. i.; contra Julianum Pelagianum, lib. xii.; de Gestis Pelagii, lib. i.; de Octo Dulcitii Questionibus, lib. i.; Comment. in Psalm. li.; *Sermo x. item xiv. de verbis Apostoli item in Sancti Johannis Nativitatem. PEPUZIANS. [MONTANISTS.]

PERATÆ. A very obscure sect, first named by Clement of Alexandria, and described in some detail by Hippolytus, the latter being followed by Theodoret, without any fresh information about them being added by him. [Theod. Hæret. fab. i. 17.]

They appear to have been called Peratæ, or

Peratici, in the first instance from the country to which they belonged, Eubœa, i.e. the land beyond [πέραν] the continent, as Peræa was the district beyond Jordan, and this is the only fact stated about them by Clement of Alexandria. [Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. 17 ad fin.] But they afterwards gave another meaning to the name, that of "Transcendentalists" [Περᾶται], because through their knowledge of divine mysteries they were qualified to "proceed through and pass beyond destruction." Hippolytus says that they originated with Euphrates the Peratic, and Celbes the Carystian, the latter being also called Ademes and Acembes the Carystian both by Hippolytus and Theodoret, but no particulars are given about either.

The Peratæ appear to have been a local sect of Gnostics, whose peculiar γνῶσις was a recondite philosophy founded on theories associated with the constellations of astronomers, and on serpent-worship. Hippolytus says that they and their doctrines had been very little known until he described them, and that the latter were so intricate that it was difficult to give a compendious notion of them. But, after stating many details of their strange system, he goes on to sum it up in the following terms. According to them, the universe is Father, Son, and Matter, each of the three having endless capacities in itself. Intermediate between Matter and the Father sits the Son, the Logos, the Serpent, always being in motion towards the unmoving Father and towards moving Matter. At one time the Son is turned towards the Father, and receives powers into His own Person; at another time He takes up those powers and turns towards Matter. Then Matter, devoid of attribute and being unfashioned, moulds itself into forms from the Son which the Son moulded from the Father. They believed further in a Demiurge who works destruction and death, and that men could be saved from his power only through the Son, Who is the Serpent.

But in addition to this fundamental corruption of Christianity, the Peratæ had also many secret mysteries, which Hippolytus says could not be mentioned by him on account of their profanity. [Hippolyt. Philosoph. v. 7-13, x. 6.]

PERÆANS. [PERATÆ.]

PERATICÆ. [PERATÆ.]

PEREMAYANOFTSCHINS. A sect of Russian dissenters, which takes its name of "re-appointers" from the practice of re-ordinating those popes or priests who secede to them from the Church. The Peremayanofschins are a branch of the POPOFTSCHINS, the practice of re-ordination being their chief distinction.

PERFECTI. A name assumed by the stricter Catharists of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Reinerius, who had himself been a Catharist, and who speaks of a census of the sect taken by themselves, says that there were only 4000 of these, although the "Credentes," or general body of the Catharists, was innumerable. These "Perfect" Catharists were analogous to the Manichean "Elect;" professing to live an extremely strict life, in imitation of Christ and His Apostles. From among them were taken their bishop, "Filius major," "Filius minor," and deacon, some of whom were brought up from their childhood on a rigid fish and vegetable diet. [Reiner, contr. Waldens. in Bibl. Max. xxv. 266, 269.] The Perfecti also called themselves "Consolati" and "Boni Homines."

PERFECTIBILISTS. A controversial designation of those who hold the doctrine that Christian perfection is attainable during the present life.

Among ill-informed persons this doctrine has often been taken up on the ground of those passages in St. Paul's Epistles in which he refers to the τέλειοι [1 Cor. ii. 6], or those who having been first among the Catechumens, then among the Baptized, were at last received among the ranks of Christians, who were entitled to the highest grace that could be given, τὸ τέλειον, the Holy Eucharist. But many mystical divines have believed that a life of profound devotional contemplation leads on to such an union with God that all which is base and sinful in the Christian's soul becomes annihilated, and there ensues a superhuman degree of participation in the Divine perfection. Such a doctrine was held by the great mystic whose works pass under the name of Dionysius, and from him was handed down to the Hesychasts, the strict Franciscans, the Molinists, the Jansenists, and the German Mystics, from whom it passed on to the English Methodists, among whom it has always been a special tenet that sanctification may, and ought to, go on to perfection.

But Perfectibilists in theory are very often Antinomians in practice. Thus the Fraticelli, the Brethren of the Free Spirit, the Beghards, the Anabaptists, and the Familists, all claimed to have attained a state of perfection in which no act, however evil in others, could in them be condemned as sinful. Similar opinions have been held by great numbers of Methodists; and in quite recent times the PERFECTIONISTS of America and the PRINCETES of England have carried the doctrine of perfectibility on to Antinomianism in as extreme a form as it was carried by the Familists.

PERFECTIONISTS. A licentious American sect of Antinomian Communists, established about the year 1845 by John Humphrey Noyes. They are also known as "Bible Communists" and "Free Lovers."

Noyes was an Independent preacher at Yale College, New Haven, when he professed to have discovered from the writings of St. Paul that the Christian Church and all the sects are alike in error, and determined to set up a new church of his own. Being a man of a not uncommon class, susceptible of strong religious feelings, while at the same time ready to give unbridled license to his passions, his new community was to be professedly under the entire control of the highest religious principle, and yet entirely free from the control of the ordinary rules of morality. He accordingly established a community (somewhat similar to those of the Shakers), at Oneida Creek, in which the following four principles are recognised: [1] that all its members are reconciled with God; [2] that being so reconciled they are saved from sin; [3] that man and woman are entirely equal; [4] that there should be a perfect community of goods. The "reconciliation" on which the system is grounded is simply an assurance of faith that such a reconciliation has been effected; so that if a man or woman feels this, the feeling is full evidence upon the subject. Being so reconciled, the person declares the fact before the community, and is then said to "stand up and confess holiness." Having so confessed holiness, they are accounted, and are to account themselves, "perfect," so that they can neither go backward into unholiness or forward to greater perfection. Henceforth also all that is done by the person confessing holiness must necessarily be good, because done by a perfect person, to whom all things are pure, and to whom all things are consequently permitted.

On this principle an iniquitous system of "free love" or "complex marriage" has been established as the true interpretation of equality of the sexes. This is, in reality, an open and shameless abolition of monogamy and of the marriage bond, and the substitution for marriage of a community of women which is subject only to such social restrictions as are necessary to obtain free inclination on both sides, and to secure the peace of the community. The latter is effected by obtaining the general consent of the community to every licentious union, and to every fresh partner in licentiousness, that is entered into.

There are three settlements of this antichristian sect in America, one of about 300 persons at Oneida Creek, and two smaller ones at Brooklyn and Wallingford. Assuming to be "perfect," the members of it practically discard all positive religion or devotion, and their place of worship at Oneida is described as "a chapel, a theatre, a concert-room, a casino, a working-place, all in one; being supplied with benches, lounging chairs, work-tables, a reading-desk, a stage, a gallery, and a pianoforte." The English sect of the PRINCETES is of an analogous kind. [Dixon's New America, 213, 6th ed.]

PETER THE FULLER. [MONOPHYSITES.]

PETILLIANISTS. Those who adhered to the party of Petillian, the Donatist Bishop of Carthage, in his controversy with St. Augustine.

PETRITES. The followers of Peter Mongus, the Monophysite Patriarch [A.D. 477-490] of Alexandria. [Timoth. Presb. in Combefis. Hist. Monothelit. MONOPHYSITES.]

PETROBRUSIANS. The sect of the Petrobrusians, or as they are commonly, but less correctly called, Petrobussians, was the earliest of the anti-sacerdotal communities which the profound discontent inspired by the tyranny of Rome called into existence at the beginning of the twelfth century. They were the followers of an eloquent but ignorant heretic named Peter de Bruays. The date of his birth is unknown, nor are we better informed as to his family, early life, or personal character. All the information which has reached us of this remarkable person is contained in a tract or epistle composed for the refutation of his doctrines, and addressed to certain Bishops of Dauphiné and Provence (at that time fiefs of the Holy Roman empire) by Peter the Venerable, Abbot of Clugny, afterwards renowned as the protector of Abelard. Although the account of an enemy is always to be read with suspicion, the high and disinterested character of the Abbot of Clugny gives more than ordinary value to his narrative. The time of the composition of the preface to the refutation (the body of which was of earlier date) was shortly after the death of De Brueys, which took place about A.D. 1125. At this time, the author tells us, the heresy had been flourishing for twenty years.

Like many others of the reformers, Peter de Brueys was an ecclesiastic, apparently one of the secular clergy, and it would seem the possessor of a benefice in some diocese in Southern France, a region where the degradation of the clergy had reached its lowest point of infamy. An ambitious man, he quitted his meagre benefice and unhonoured profession for the popular rôle of reformer. His principal doctrines, which (with one exception, his repugnance to the Cross) were more ably extended by his more powerful successor, Henry the Deacon [HENRICIANS], were partly Rationalistic, partly what is in this day termed Evangelical. At first the preaching of Peter seems to have been confined to the inculcation of a loose system of general morality; but time and impunity so favoured heretical cultivation that the seeds of dogmatic errors "per xx fere annos sata et aucta quinque præcipua et venenata virgulta produxerunt."¹

The capital charges upon which he is arraigned are: [1] He rejected infant baptism, alleging that no miraculous gifts were possible in that ceremony, which he declared to be wholly void when performed on the person of an irresponsible infant. [2] He denied that any special sanctity resided in consecrated buildings; forbidding the erection of churches, and directing that such churches as did exist should be pulled down. [3] In particular he objected to the worship of the Cross, alleging that the accursed tree should be held in horror by all Christians as the instrument of the torture and death of the Redeemer. [4] He denied any sort of real presence in the Eucharist. Whether or not he retained the office of the communion as a memorial rite is unknown, but as his rejection of the Eucharist as such seems inevitable, it is reasonable to suppose that he proscribed it altogether. [5] He was bitterly opposed to prayers, oblations, alms, and other good deeds done on behalf of the dead. Besides these five capital errors, which form the subject of the Clugniac Abbot's refutation, must be added a total prohibition of chanting and all use of sacred music. Puritanical as some of these tenets seem, de Brueys was no lover of asceticism. He inculcated marriage, even of priests, as a high religious usage, and would have abolished all the fasts of the Church. The deleterious effects of his teaching are thus summed up by the authority we have quoted: "The people are re-baptized, churches profaned, altars overturned, crosses are burnt, meat eaten openly on the day of the Lord's Passion, priests scourged, monks cast into dungeons, and by terror or torture constrained to marry." The scene of the labours which had this result was the ancient Narbonensian Province. The dioceses of Arles in Provence, Embrun, Die and Gap in Dauphiné, and some districts lying further east, were the greatest sufferers from his preaching. Strangely enough this popular heretic met his death at the hands of the people. Seized by a mob in an émeute caused by his preaching (but which some assume to have been organized by the ecclesiastical authorities) he was committed to the flames at St. Gilles in the Arelatensian diocese. His career, which commenced about A.D. 1104, was thus terminated about A.D. 1125.

PETRO-JOHANNITES. A name given to the partizans of Peter John Olivi [A.D. 1279-1297], a monk of Beziers, the founder of the Fraticelli schism among the Franciscans. He was a disciple of the Abbot Joachim, and following in the steps of his master, wrote a Commentary on the Revelation containing interpretations of a similar character to the prophecies of Joachim. From his birthplace he is called Peter of Serignan, and from his monastery Peter Biterrensis. When Pope Nicolas III. issued a new interpretation of the Rule of St. Francis [A.D. 1279], with the view of suppressing the fanaticism which was rising among the "Spirituals" of that order, a party was formed to resist it under the leadership of Olivi; and this party of Petro-Johannites, or strict Franciscans, became after his death the party out of which the FRATICELLI took their rise. [Wadding, Annal. Min. Fratr. Oudin, de Scriptor. Eccl. iii. 584. Baluze, Miscellan. i. 213.]

PETZELIANS. An obscure sect of Socialists which existed for a short time in Upper Austria under the leadership of a priest named Petzel, but was put down by the Government as being more of a political than a religious character.

PHANTASIODOCETÆ. A term used by Theophylact in his commentary on the fourth chapter of St. John. [DOCETÆ.]

PHANTASIASTS. [DOCETÆ.]

PHARISEES. A religious party among the Jews which grew up during the last two centuries of their national existence, and which represented strict Judaism. They are first heard of under the name of "The Assidæans" [Chasidim, i.e. "The Pious"], who are described as "mighty men of Israel, even all such as were voluntarily devoted to the law" [1 Macc. ii. 27, 42], and as joining the army of Mattathias in the early part of the Maccabæan struggle for national freedom [B.C. 166]. At a later time the name of Pharisees [Perishim, i.e. "Separatists"] was probably given to them by their opponents, the Sadducees, who held the reins of political power, much as the representatives of the ancient Muscovite Church, the "Staroverzi," or "Old Believers," are regarded as Separatists by the modern rulers of Russia.

At the time this party of strict Jews first arose a strong effort was being made by Antiochus Epiphanes [B.C. 175-164] to destroy the national character of the Jews, and among the latter themselves there were many young men who were willing to promote his objects, being captivated by the Greek customs with which they were beginning to become acquainted. These Hellenizing Jews paid Antiochus 440 talents of silver to depose Onias the high-priest, and appoint for his successor one of their own party named Jeshua. The new high-priest at once changed his honourable Jewish name for the Greek name Jason, and as one proof of his determination to break down the distinctive nationality of the people, he caused the "chief young men" to "wear a hat" or "fez" in the place of the ancient turban. He then paid Antiochus 150 talents of silver more for the privilege of building "a place for exercise" or gymnasium, in which the young Jews might be trained up to the athletic sports of the Greeks; and for the further privilege of calling "them of Jerusalem by the name of Antiochians."¹ When this place of exercise was completed its attractions were so great that the priests actually forsook their duties in the Temple to waste their time over "the game of Discus." Thus Jason "forthwith brought his nation to the Greekish fashion, . . . and putting down the governments which were according to the law, he brought up new customs against the law." To such an extent did this high-priest carry his contempt for the old national faith that he actually sent an offering of "300 drachms of silver to the sacrifice of Hercules" at the annual games of Tyre; an act which so scandalized even his own messengers, "who were Antiochians," that they diverted the offering from its purpose, and gave it as a contribution towards "the making of galleys" [2 Macc. iv. 7-20]. It was shortly after the death of this Hellenizing high-priest that Antiochus Epiphanes polluted the great altar by a mock sacrifice of swine, and turned the Temple into a temple of Zeus or Jupiter Olympius [1 Macc. i. 47; 2 Macc. vi. 2]. He then issued a decree "to his whole kingdom, that all should be one people, and every one should learn his laws," when "many of the Israelites consented to his religion" [1 Macc. i. 42, 43].

It was when "the abomination of the desolation" was thus set up in the shape of an idol altar on the great altar of the Temple, and other idol altars throughout Judæa, that "The Pious" and courageous among the Jews banded together to restore the national worship and the national law. This was effected under the leadership of Judas Maccabæus, and the Feast of "the Dedication," which was kept in the time of our Lord [John x. 22], was a lasting memorial of the good work which the Assidæans, or early Pharisees, had effected by their valour, commemorating as it did the day when, nearly two centuries before [B.C. 166], the Temple service was restored; and "there was very much gladness among the people, for that the reproach of the heathen was put away" [1 Macc. iv. 55].

This restoration marks, probably, the beginning of the transition from the military to the simply religious phase of the party; the Assidæans, whose zeal restored pure Judaism by means of the Maccabee wars, becoming in the next generation the Pharisees, whose zeal defended it by their teaching. They became the educated, scholarly, class among the Jews; men of whom St. Paul, "a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee" [Acts xxiii. 6], "taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, and zealous towards God" [Acts xxii. 3], was a fair specimen. Hence they received the name of "Scholars" [Chaberim] or Divines, because they made the knowledge and practice of the divine law the one great object of their life. It was in the pursuit of this object that the Pharisees investigated and collected the great body of tradition respecting the law and its observances, which was always current—partly by word of mouth, and partly by written commentaries—among the educated Jews. The Sadducees rejected all interpretation of Scripture but that which came from each man's own mind, professing to stand by the simple letter of the law; but the Pharisees strove to gather up the wisdom of all preceding generations, as well as to make the best use they could of their own reason, and looked upon the Word of God as a mine of wealth which no ages of human research could ever exhaust. It was out of the midst of their body that the great Scribes and Doctors arose; men, like Gamaliel, whose pious wisdom in the Sanhedrim [Acts v. 34-40] sounds almost like the words of an old prophet, and to whose training the Christian world is indebted, so far as human learning and the developement of intellectual power are concerned, for the greatness of St. Paul.

In the times of the New Testament, the Sadducees were the "rulers of the people," but the Pharisees were the teachers of the people. They had not, however, escaped from those influences which wrought so much degeneration in the Jewish character during the last generations of their national existence; and they were not excepted from the denunciations which St. John the Baptist and our Lord so freely poured out upon the Jews of that time. There were, especially, many among them who lost sight of practical religion in theoretical religion, who made much of lesser duties, such as tithing "mint, rue, anise, and cummin," and neglected greater duties, the "weightier matters of the law," who exaggerated the value of their interpretative system to such an extent that they made "the Word of God of none effect" by their traditions, who made long prayers out of mere ostentation, and who as to their morals were but "whited sepulchres." The existence of a large body of such "hypocrites" among the Pharisees shews that the Pharisaic system was, like all else belonging to the Jewish nation, in a condition of mortal decay. Many years before, the more ascetic element of the party had broken off into a sect, the ESSENES; and it is not unlikely that their schismatical position had brought discredit upon asceticism in general. But without an almost ascetic severity and self-denial, a strict practical observance of Judaism was impossible, however strictly its rules might be laid down in theory. Yet there is no evidence that the Pharisees were morally below the level of the Jewish people at large; and the popular identification of the words "Pharisee" and "hypocrite" is a popular error which is very inconsistent with the true history of a body of men who were probably at all times the best men among the Jews. St. Paul did not speak in condemnation of his former life when he said to Herod Agrippa, "After the most straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee" [Acts xxvi. 5].

In the last great struggle of the Jews for their lost freedom, a class of military Pharisees arose under the name of "Zealots," in whom the ancient self-devotion of the Assideans was revived. But Christianity had absorbed the best elements of the Jewish nation, and the fanatic Zealot was but a degenerate representative of the heroic Assidean. After the fall of the nation, Judaism and Pharisaism became substantially identical; the traditions of the Talmud and the Mishna representing that cumbrous overlaying of the Word of God for which the learned Jews were condemned even in the time of our Lord. PHÉMIOZITÆ. [BARBELITES.]

PHIBIONITÆ. A local name of the Gnostics [Epiph. Hær. xxvi. 3]. As Valentinus was said to be a native of Phrebonitis, on the coast of Egypt [Epiph. Hær. xxxi. 2], it is not improbable that his sect was at first called by the name of Phrebonitæ, and that this was afterwards corrupted into Phibionitæ.

PHILADELPHIAN CHURCH. [SOUTHCOT-
TIANS.]

PHILADELPHIANS. A society of Theosophical Pietists founded in the year 1695 under the name of "The Philadelphia Society for the advancement of Piety and Divine Philosophy." It originated with an aged lady named Jane Lead, who died in 1704 at the age of eighty-one. She had spent many years in the study of Jacob Boehm's works; and herself wrote many books, the mystic character of which is indicated by the title of one published in 1695, "The Wonders of God's Creation manifested in the variety of Eight Worlds, as they were made known experimentally to the Author." In establishing the Philadelphia Society she was assisted by a physician named Pordage, who was in Holy Orders, but had taken to the practice of medicine when ejected from his benefice as a Nonjuror. He was the author of "Divine and True Metaphysics," in three volumes, and also of "Theologia Mystica," and some ascetic works. Another of the Philadelphians was the learned physician Francis Lee, who contributed the historical Prolegomena to Grabe's Septuagint, and the "Occasional Annotations" on physiological and other scientific subjects to Parker's admirable but unfinished commentary, entitled "Bibliotheca Biblica." Dr. Lee edited the "Theosophical Transactions" of the Society, and also the later works of Mrs. Lead, who in her old age was blind. A third physician who became an active member of the Society was Lot Fisher, who caused all the works of Mrs. Lead and her associates to be translated and splendidly published in Dutch. A fourth principal coadjutor was Thomas Bromley, author of "The Sabbath of Rest," and of some works on Biblical subjects.

The Philadelphia Society contributed largely to the spread of that mystical piety which is so conspicuous in the works of the good and learned William Law, and which affected in no small degree the early stages of Methodism. Mrs. Lead herself, however, combined much fanaticism with her pietism, professing (like Swedenborg in a later generation) to hold intercourse with spirits. This fanaticism imparted itself to many members of the Philadelphia Society, and imaginary apparitions of good and evil angels became, for a time, a prominent feature of their religious life. In other respects their mysticism was of the ordinary character, making the contemplative life the basis of religious knowledge and practice.

A small work entitled "The Principles of the Philadelphians," published in 1697, gives a curious exposition of their mysticism.

PHILETUS. A heretic of Apostolic times, who is coupled with Hymenæus by St. Paul as one of those who "concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is passed already" [2 Tim. ii. 17, 18]. Nothing further is known respecting him than what is recorded in the few words of the Apostle. [HYMENÆUS.]

PHILIPOTSCHINS. A small sect of Russian dissenters, who, after the disturbances at Strelitz under Peter I. [A.D. 1689-1725], in which they had taken part, fled for refuge to Lithuania, where they formed a new denomination under the leadership of a monk named Philip, known among themselves as Pustos-Wiat, or the Saint of the Desert. They are sometimes called Brûleurs or Tueurs from their tendency to suicide, which they considered meritorious, and which they accordingly courted, sometimes burying themselves alive, sometimes starving themselves to death. It was rather on points of practice than of doctrine that they differed from the orthodox church, whose baptism they only rejected as invalid, because "Amen" was repeated four times in the course of the service. Without a regular priesthood [STAROVERTZI], they elected one of their number as an elder, who was called the Starik, who occupied the position of a pope or priest, and remained unmarried; but the duty of preaching was left open to any one who felt himself "called by the Spirit" to undertake it. Accusations of laxity of morals were brought against them, of renouncing marriage, and living in spiritual brotherhood and sisterhood, the truth of which was never clearly established; for when the Empress Anne [A.D. 1730-1740] sent commissioners to inquire into the state of their monasteries, they shut themselves up and burnt themselves alive within their own walls rather than give any evidence on the subject.

PHILIPONIANS. [PHILIPOTSCHINS.]

PHILIPPISTS. The party of moderate and conciliatory Lutherans who sided with Philip Melancthon against the rigid Lutherans headed by Flacius Illyricus, the dispute between whom acquired the name of the Adiaphoristic Controversy. The Philippists were strongest in the University of Wittenberg, the opposite party in that of Jena. The former were in the end accused of being Calvinists at heart, and were much persecuted by the ultra-Lutheran party. [ADIAPHORISTS.]

PHILIPPINS. [PHILIPOTSCHINS.]

PHILOPONISTS. A section of the Tritheists of the sixth century who followed John Philoponus, a layman of Alexandria, famous as a grammarian and philosopher. The Philoponists formed the main body of the Alexandrian Tritheists; being, however, divided from the CONONITES on the subject of the resurrection of the body. Philoponus maintained that both the matter and form of bodies will be restored at the resurrection, but the Cononites limited the restoration to their matter only. John Philoponus received his surname, "The Laborious" [ὁ φιλόπονος], on account of his great literary industry. He wrote a work on the Hexæmeron, another on Easter, a treatise against the materialism of Proclus, another against the work written by Jamblichus in favour of Image-worship, a book on the Resurrection, and another on the Trinity, together with Commentaries on Aristotle and other secular works. [Niceph. Hist. Eccl. xviii. 45-48. Joann. Damasc. de Hæres. lxxxiii. Walch, Hist. Ketz. viii. 702. Cave, Hist. Liter. i. 267.]

PHOTINIANS. A sect of Sabellian heretics which arose in the fourth century, under the leadership of Photinus, Bishop of Sirmium in Lower Pannonia. Photinus was a native of Galatia, and a disciple of Marcellus of Ancyra, under whom he served as deacon [Hieron. de Vir. iii. 107; Hilar. Pict. Frag. Hist. ii. 19]; but the dates of his birth and consecration are not known. The councils in which he was condemned on the appearance of his heresy range from A.D. 336 to 351. His tenets were nearly identical with those of Paul of Samosata.¹

Photinus held the tenet of an Antitrinitarian Monarchia, and that Jesus Christ was born of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary; that a certain portion of the Divine Substance, which he called of Paul [Pearson appears to take ἀπὸ οὐρόυ to mean partially: on the Creed, note p. 119, fol. edit.]; Socrates and Sozomenus class together Sabellus, Marcellus, Paul, and Photinus; Theodoret says that Photinus differs from Sabellus only in phraseology. Hilary of Poitiers, Jerome loc. cit., Pseudo-Hieronymus [Hæc. xxxvi.], Isidore of Hispalis [Hæc. xxxviii.], Honorius [Hæc. liii.], Pope Damasus [Theod. H. E. v. 11], say that Photinus revived the heresy of Ebion. This statement, in any accurate sense, we may dismiss, as Pearson does. [EBIONITES.] Sulpicius Severus [Chron. ii. 37] having said that Marcellus asserted the Sabellian heresy, adds that Photinus introduced a new heresy, "a Sabellio quidem in unione dissentiens, sed initium Christi ex Maria prædicabat." The evidence that Photinus held the "Unio" outweighs the testimony of Sulpicius. So, too, Marius Mercator must be held in error in stating that Photinus denied the miraculous birth of our Lord [Diss. de XII. Anath. n. xvii. t. ii. p. 128; Garner]. Of greater weight than any authority yet named must be the authority of Hilary of Poitiers; and those who identify Photinism with an advanced Sabellianism must be able to give a reasonable explanation of Hilary's statements. For Hilary expressly confronts both Sabellus and Arius with Photinus. The passage is long, but it must be given in full: "Jam vero qua fidei nostræ victoria Hebion, qui Photinus est, aut vincit aut vincitur: dum Sabellium arguit, eum hominem neget filium Dei; dum ab Ariomanitis confutatur, eum in homine nesciat Dei filium. Adversum Sabellium Evangelia sibi ex filio Mariæ defendit: Arius ei Evangelia per solum Mariæ filium non relinquit. Adversum hunc, qui filium negat, homo ab eo usurpatur in filium. Ab hoc ei, qui ante sæcula filium nesciat, filius Dei solum negatur ex homine. Vincant, ut volunt, quia se invicem vincendo vincuntur: dum et hi, qui nunc sunt, de natura Dei confutantur, et Sabellus de sacramento filii refellitur, et Photinus natum ante sæcula Dei filium vel ignorare arguitur, vel negare. Sed inter hæc Ecclesiæ fides, evangelicis atque apostolicis fundata doctrinis, et adversus Sabellium tenet filii professionem, et adversus Arium Dei naturam, et adversus Photinum sæculi creatorem: et hoc verius, quod hæc ab his invicem non negantur. Naturam enim Dei in operibus Sabellius prædicat, sed operantem filium nescit. Hi vero filium nuncupant, sed veritatem in eo naturæ Dei non confitentur. Hominem autem Photinus usurpat, sed in usurpato sibi homine nativitatem Dei ante sæcula ignorat" [De Trin. vii. 7]. Here Photinus is said to hold a Sonship beginning from Mary, while Sabellus allows none at all. The later part of this assertion is clearly contradictory to the statements of Epiphanius, which are supported by Augustine and others; for these aver that Sabellus taught that the Son came into the world as a Ray from the Father. By comparison with these statements the "Deus protensus usque ad Virginem" named by Hilary is referred by commentaries to Sabellus. [SABELLIANS.] According to these statements Sabellian doctrine and Photinian doctrine, as condemned at Sirmium, are perfectly equivalent as regards the Sonship of our Lord. But Hilary's assertion is true of the first stage of Sabellianism, in which there was held to be, properly, no Son at all, the Father being Son. Accordingly Pearson remarks that Photinus differs from Sabellus, being far from a Patripassian. Understand then Hilary, in the chapter which has been quoted, to be speaking of the first or Patripassian stage of Sabellianism, and the chapter becomes clear. The only question remaining undecided is the comparatively unimportant one, whether Sabellus himself passed into the second stage into which his school undoubtedly passed, as Epiphanius asserts him to have done; or, whether, as a strict interpretation of Hilary would lead us to think, he continued to hold Patripassian doctrine, and the doctrine of the "Deus protensus" is not really his, but belongs only to his followers who deserted him. The evidence before us leads to the conclusion that Sabellus did pass out of the Patripassian stage, and that Hilary, in the somewhat rhetorical passage we have quoted, the Word, descended upon and acted through the man Jesus Christ; that on account of this association of the Word with the human nature Jesus was called the Son of God, and even God Himself; that the Holy Ghost was not a distinct Person, but a celestial virtue proceeding from the Deity [Epiph. Hær. lxxi.; Hilar. de Trin. vii. 3, 7, viii. 40; Rufinus, Comm. in Symb. § 39; Socr. H. E. i. 18, 19, 30; Sozom. iv. 6; Theod. Hær. fab. ii. 11, Dial. ii. vol. iv. p. 52, ed. 1642; Augst. Ep. 1. ad Bonif. and Serm. in Matth. xii.]. These tenets are sufficiently stated in the article SAMOSATENES, and other articles regarding the various Monarchian sects; and it will be requisite only to point out wherein Photinus differed from Paul. In this Marius Mercator is our first authority.¹ Marius writes (in words which Lardner said the learned would more easily understand than he could translate): "Differentia itaque inter Samosatenum et Photinum ista sola est, qua Paulus Verbum Dei προφορικὸν, καὶ πρακτικὸν λόγον καὶ ἐνεργητικόν, id est, prolativum et potestatis effectivum Verbum sensit, non substantivum, quod Græci οὐσιώδες dicunt" [Diss. de XII. Anath. Nestorii, Num. xix.]. This statement of Paul's doctrine agrees exactly with the statement in the article Samosatenes in the words of Athanasius. Marius asserts that Photinus held the Divine element that acted in our Lord's Person to be "substantivum, or οὐσιώδες." Now Photinus denied the personality, and consequently the Sonship of the Word, but allowed Its eternity as existing in the one undistinguished God. We are therefore thrown back upon the tenet described in SABELLIANS as the division of the Union, namely, that the "Deus protensus," not being a distinct Person, is separable from the God-head, or that a certain portion of the Divine Substance added to the human nature formed Jesus Christ the Son of God.

The conclusion that this was the doctrine of Photinus is supported by a remarkable chapter in Philaster (the chapter which has some of the language of the Athanasian Creed), the 93rd, "Est hæresis quæ dicit veluti triformem Deum esse et compositum, ut quædam pars Patris, quædam Filii, quædam Spiritus Sancti sit." Philaster enounces the doctrine of the Three Persons of the One God, and proceeds, "Immensibilis est igitur hæc Trinitas, invisibilis," etc. "Cum enim dicit mittere Patrem Filium, et Filium mittere Spiritum Sanctum, personarum causa dicit, non loci separatione distinctos ostendit, propter Sabellium scilicet et Photinum hæreticos." Then he speaks of Sabellius: "Cum ergo dicit misisse Patrem, et missum fuisse Filium, personarum causa dicit, ne quis aut ipsum Patrem aut ipsum Filium esse æstimet, quod ita sentiens delirat Sabellius." He turns to the other error, namely of Photinus, "Et ne iterum missus Filius de cælo æstimetur non esse ubique in Patre, dixit quidem se missum a Patre, ubique tamen esse cum Patre ostendit, dicens, Pater qui me misit mecum est. Non ergo separationem loci dixit." A belief in a local separation of one part of the "triformis Deus" is attributed to Photinus; and it is rightly noted that this belief denies the attribute of God, that He is Immensus, ἀπειρος, ἀμέτρητος. The fourth Lateran Council [A.D. 1215] declaring that God is "Immensus," is said to have had in view this heresy of Photinus [Dec. i., de Fide Catholica].

The description of this sect by Vincent of Lerins is thus found to be correct as far as it goes, but incomplete in that it does not define the nature of the Divine element which Photinus conceived to be superadded to the man Jesus to constitute Him the Son of God. Vincent says: "Photini ergo secta hæc est. Dicit Deum singulum esse et solitarium, et more Judaico confitendum. Trinitatis plenitudinem negat, neque ullam Dei Verbi, aut ullam Spiritus Sancti putat esse personam. Christum vero hominem tantummodo solitarium asserit, cui principium adscribit ex Maria; et hoc omnibus modis dogmatizat, solam nos personam Dei Patris, et solum Christum hominem colere debere" [Vincent. Lirin. adv. Hær. xvii.]. If to this we add from the second stage of Sabellianism the tenet, that there acted in and through the man Jesus an element from the nature of the Deity, impersonal, yet substantive, which is to be again resumed into the Deity, our conception of Photinianism will, it is thought, be complete.

The statements of the errors of Photinus made by the councils which condemned him (so far as the acts have come down to us) have been left for verification. Photinus was, first, condemned with Marcellus [Sulpic. Sever. ii. 36]. This was probably at Constantinople,² A.D. 336, for then the Arians in synod deposed Marcellus [Socr. i. 36; Sozomen. ii. 33]. Secondly, in the Semi-Arian Council, the second of Antioch, A.D. 344 [Socr. ii. 19]. Thirdly, in the Council of Sardica, A.D. 347, when Marcellus was acquitted, but the sentence against Photinus was not reversed [Sulpic. Sever. ii. 36; Epiph. Hær. lxxi.]. Fourthly, in a council at Milan in the same year [Hil. Frag. Hist. ii. 19; Socr. ii. 36, Valesius' note]. Fifthly, by a council at Rome, A.D. 349 [see authorities in Cave's Hist. Lit. ad ann. 349]. Sixthly, in a Synod at Sirmium, A.D. 349, when he was deposed by the Western Bishops, but through the affection and opinion of the people could not be removed [Hilar. Frag. Hist. ii. 21]. Seventhly, at the second Synod of Sirmium, A.D. 351, by the Eastern Bishops, when, being convicted by Basil of Ancyra, he was banished [Socr. ii. 29; Sozom. iv. 6, Valesius' note in Socr. for the date]. The foregoing enumeration is that of Pearson, except that the Roman synod is added [cf. Newman's Treatises of Athanas. i. 160. n.].

argues upon his earlier tenets, which doubtless would be in such a case rather quietly ignored than formally recanted. We much miss on this point Ittigius' promised dissertation [Hist. Photini. cap. ix.]. Besides the difference in their conception of the Logos, Photinus appears to have believed that the Logos inhabited Christ from the time of the Nativity; Paul, that the Logos did not descend into the Son until He had merited the gift by His holy life. [See Stillingfleet on the Trinity, p. 50.]

Out of these, the second-named council, which issued the Macrostiche, anathematized Paul of Samosata, and further, those who hold the doctrine of a Logos, impersonal and unsubstantial, now προφορικὸς, now ἐνδιδακτός, who say that Jesus Christ was not before the world, but only from the time of Mary, when His kingdom began, which kingdom is to have an end. Of which sort, they say, are the followers of Marcellus and Photinus, who do away the existence of Christ before the worlds, and His divinity, that they may seem to establish the "Monarchy."

Here, it will be observed, no distinction is made between πλανησμός, strictly taken as a "dilatatio substantiæ," and the Marcellian πλανησμός, which consisted in the ἐνεργεία of the Λόγος. [MARCELLIANS.] But the language of the Council of Sirmium [A.D. 251] is very explicit: "Si quis dilatata substantiam Dei Filium dicat facere, aut latitudinem substantiæ ejus Filium nominet, anathema sit." There can be little doubt that this is directed specially against Photinus. The fifth article (which Pearson says aims clearly at Photinus) is really more general; it is directed against those who say that the Son existed before Mary only in the foreknowledge and purpose of God. Then follow articles against two classes to whom the former would apply, those who held the "dilatatio substantiæ," and those who held the "prolativum verbum," the Photinians and the Marcellians. The last article, as directed against the head and front of the heresy, must be quoted: "Si quis Christum Deum Filium Dei ante sæcula subsistentem et ministrantem Patri ad omnium perfectionem non dicat, sed ex quo de Maria natus est, ex eo et Christum et Filium nominatum esse, et initium accepisse ut sit Deus, dicat: anathema sit." One observation may be made with regard to what has been said of Hilary's putting Photinus in opposition to Sabellius. The synod was called against Photinus: Hilary says, "to meet the heresy which was renewed by Photinus." Now it is clear that the errors denounced are those of the different branches of Sabellianism. The Patripassianism of Noëtus, e.g. is condemned in Art. xii. Now when we find the earlier articles which have been named (v. to viii.) clearly applying to a developed Sabellianism, it follows surely that the opposition stated by Hilary was, as was argued, only to the early stage [Hilar. de Synodis. 1174, et seq.]. The Bishops of Italy, in their letter to the Illyrian Bishops, say that Photinus was condemned "partiaria Sabellii hæreditate" [Hil. Frag. Hist. xii.].

Next after these decisions, there meets us the seventh Canon of Laodicea. There appears to be no sufficient reason for excluding "Photinians" from this canon, and the mention of them proves beyond doubt that the council cannot be of the early date, A.D. 320, assigned to it by Baronius and Binius. We adopt therefore the later date, 366. It is ordered that catechumens or communicants converted from Photinianism shall not be received without anathematizing all heresy, especially that in which they have been engaged, and that the communicants having learned the creeds, and being anointed with the chrism, may receive the Holy Mysteries.

The General Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, beginning with a general condemnation of heresies, named Photinians after Sabellians and Marcellians [Can. I.]; and sanctioned the addition to the Creed of the clause, "Whose kingdom shall have no end." The contrary opinion was held by Marcellus as well as Photinus. It appears from Cyril's Catechetical Lectures that the clause had been already added to the Creed by some of the Eastern Churches. The Allocution of the Fathers of Chalcedon to the Emperor Marcian, A.D. 451, describes Photinus and Marcellus as introducing a new blasphemy against the Son, denying His existence, and reducing the Trinity to a Trinity of names. Against them therefore the Fathers have declared the dogma of three Hypostases [Harduin, Conc. ii. 645]. The second Council of Arles, A.D. 452, decreed "Photinianos sive Paulianistas secundum Patrum statuta baptizari oportere." The "statuta Patrum" are the Apostolic Canon XLVI. [XLVII.], and particularly the 8th Canon of the first of Arles; and as the principle of that canon is applied by the second council to the case of the Bonosiacs, who coming from the same error yet retain the Catholic form, and are not to be baptized, it appears to follow without doubt that the Photinians had changed the form. Further, since at Laodicea Photinian baptism was allowed, it follows that the form was changed between the times of these two councils. In the 7th Canon of Constantinople, which treats of Baptism, the Photinians are not specified, but Sabellians are ordered to be baptized, and all other heresies, especially such as come from the country of the Galatians. The council evidently proceeded on the same rules as the councils of Arles.

Photinians are specified in the Constitution of Gratian, Valentinian and Theodosius, A.D. 381, against heretical conventicles and for restoring churches to Catholics. Also in that of Theodosius and Valentinian, A.D. 428, to the same purpose as the former, and imposing on heretics severe civil disqualifications [Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 6, 65].

PHTHARTOLATRÆ. One of the two principal divisions into which the sect of the Monophysites broke up in the early part of the sixth century. The name was given to them by their opponents the Aphthartodocetæ, and was compounded of the Greek words for "corruptible" [φθαρτός] and "worship" [λατρεία]; indicating the tenet of the sect, that the human body of the Saviour was subject to the corruptibility incident to ordinary human nature. The sect was known in Antioch by the name of "Severians," from Severus its founder, the deprived Monophysite patriarch; in Egypt by the name of "Theodosians," from a rhetorician of Alexandria who became a disciple of Severus, and the leader of his sect in that city after his death [A.D. 535]. The sect was known among Western writers by the name of "Corrupticolæ."

Severus became Patriarch of Antioch in the year 511, and was deposed by order of the Emperor Justin in the year 520. He fled to Egypt after his deposition, finding Alexandria a safe place of retreat, and so greatly is his memory venerated by the Jacobites even to this day as one of the chief founders of their sect, that the day of his entrance into Egypt is observed as a festival. While at Alexandria, Severus was brought into controversy with Julian, the deprived Monophysite bishop of Halicarnassus, the founder of the Aphthartodocetæ, and maintained against him the opinion that the natural body of Christ was necessarily subject to the natural wear and tear to which all human bodies are liable, and hence to the necessity of food and rest. If it were not so, Severus contended, the truth of His Passion would be denied, and an additional support would be given to the heresy of Manes, who followed the Docetæ in asserting that our Lord took merely the semblance of a body, and not a real and substantial one. The Phthartolatræ, however, never went the length attributed to them, as a consequence of their argument, by their opponents—that the body of Christ was capable of corruption after death.

The tenets of the Phthartolatræ were those which eventually prevailed among the Monophysites in general, notwithstanding an edict of Justinian in the year 563 in favour of their opponents. But a large party among them had early adopted the opinions of Themistius, and, driving the doctrine of Severus beyond its proper limits, had attributed imperfection to the soul of our Lord, and earned for themselves the name of AGNOËTÆ. [Evang. Hist. Eccl. iv. 11. MONOPHYSITES. APHTHARTODOCETÆ.]

PHRYGIANS. [MONTANISTS.]

PHUNDAITES. The Bogomiles were so called from the peculiar "phunda" or girdle which they wore. [BOGOMILES.]

PHYGELLUS. One of those of whom St. Paul writes to Timothy, "This thou knowest, that all they which are in Asia be turned away from me; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes" [2 Tim. i. 15]. The Apostle seems to speak of them as in some way deserting him in his missionary work rather than as forsaking the faith. Tertullian, however, in the next century, speaks of them as "erring concerning the truth," in respect to the resurrection of the body [Tertull. de Resurr. Carn. xxiv.], and Epiphanius classes them with Cerinthus, Ebion, and others who denied the Divine Nature and miraculous conception of our Lord. [Epiphanius. Hæc. li. 6.]

PICARDS. [BEGHARDS.]

PIETISTS.¹ The specific appellation of a party of Reformers in the Lutheran Church, who appeared in Germany towards the close of the seventeenth century, and were in fact the Methodists of that country. They cannot be strictly described as a sect, for they neither claimed nor desired any severance from the main body of the Lutherans, nor did they promulgate any special theological doctrines. But the party is important, for amongst their numbers were many distinguished persons whose opinions strongly influenced the subsequent teaching of Protestantism. In this way the Pietistic tendency was specially noteworthy: first, because it was indifferent to all scholastic definition, when such differences of opinion were considered points of cardinal importance; secondly, because it laid great stress upon the duties of active morality at a time when morality was particularly neglected. Historically, Pietism may be described as the formularization of the popular discontent at the arid dogmatism which the Church's continuous conflict with Geneva and Rome had made endemic in the Lutheran pulpits, and it was at the same time a protest against the low state of public morals engendered by the miserable delays of the Thirty Years' War.

The leader of the movement, Philipp Jakob Spener (who has been called the Fénelon of Germany), was born at Rappolzweiler, in Elsass, in the year 1635. He was educated in Strasburg in the strictest sect of the Lutherans, under the eye of the famous professors Sebastian Schmidt and Conrad Dannhauer. After completing his theological education at the various seats of Protestant learning, he was appointed public pastor at Strasburg in 1662, whence, after a few years, he passed by invitation to Frankfort. There his career as a preacher was at first marked by a violent advocacy of the teachings of Luther, and an equally violent denunciation of the opinions of Calvin. Serious remonstrance from some influential Calvinists followed, and, strange to say, the remonstrance was listened to. Indeed, Spener appears to have soon convinced himself that these polemical addresses were undesirable, and that the need for virtue was more urgent in Germany than that for sound doctrine. Acting upon this conviction, and to the grief of the more zealous Lutherans, he turned the current of his powerful eloquence from the exclusive denunciation of Calvinism to the exclusive advocacy of morality. It was in this cause, and in an endeavour to evangelize his congregation, that he established those meetings which, under the name of "Collegia Pietatis" or "Collegia Biblica," formed, subsequently, the distinguishing feature of Pietism.

About 1670, Spener, being at that time pastor in Frankfort, set on foot, first at his private residence, and subsequently in the church, gatherings, where all his congregation were welcomed to hear the pure Scripture read and its difficulties explained. The name of "Collegia" and Sisters of the Pious and Religious Schools." The aim of this society was in no way sectarian, but directed wholly to the education of the poor.

was adopted for these meetings from the resemblance to the gatherings of the Mennonites of Holland, who were known in Germany under the name of COLLEGIANTS. This practice of Spener's was well received, and became popular with the laity, particularly with the poorer classes, though regarded with jealous eyes by the old Lutheran and aristocratic party; nor was this mistrust diminished when Spener's admirers began to attract notice by their ostentatious asceticism of dress and demeanour, and their absence from all, even the most innocent, amusements. Nevertheless, during a long series of years, no overt act of hostility interrupted Spener's evangelical labours, and it was during this period that he composed his celebrated Pia Desideria, a work which sufficiently sets forth the modest aims and genuine piety of the founder of Pietism. The full title of the book, originally intended for a preface to a republication of Professor Arndt, but subsequently printed in a separate form, is "Pia Desideria, or Earnest Wishes for the Good Improvement of the True Evangelical Church, with some Christian Proposals for that end." It consists mainly of an expression of the need of reform in education, particularly with reference to the Bible, and of regret at the injury which the incessant preaching of dogma was effecting on the public morals. The work added greatly to the fame of the author, and assisted the spread of the peculiar opinion of Spener, that a virtuous life was of greater importance than a correct creed. The revivalist feeling spread rapidly through Germany, where the institution of "Collegia," being in complete accord with the national instinct, soon attained great popularity. Up to this time Pietism had spread without exciting commotion, no persecution having yet been attempted; but this fortunate state of things did not long continue.

In 1686 Spener removed to Dresden, where he was high in favour with the Electoral Prince. Thither he brought with him numerous theological students, amongst whom were Francke, Antony and Schæde, destined to be the shining lights of Pietism. Some of these shortly afterwards removing to Leipsic, commenced lecturing in Collegia in imitation of their leader's practice, giving in their lectures particular prominence to the correction of the errors contained in Luther's translation of the Bible. As this translation was regarded as little short of inspired by the body of educated Lutherans, this freedom of criticism was far from popular. It was in particular badly received by the older members of the University, who also took umbrage at the delivery of these lectures in the vulgar tongue. All kinds of adverse rumours were spread abroad; and opinion was further irritated by the conduct of the Pietist audience, who, with the ardour of new converts, changed their dress and manners of everyday life for a marked and ascetic habit. Considerable disturbances arose from time to time; and on one of these occasions (it is said at a funeral discourse delivered at the grave of one of Francke's congregation) the term "Pietist" was finally fixed and adopted as the soubriquet of Spener's admirers. In the end the lecturers were accused of heresy, and a commission was directed to investigate the matter. The learned Thomasius—who was a fervent admirer of Spener—undertook the defence; but although Francke and his friends were triumphantly acquitted, the biblical lectures were prohibited. This inopportune prosecution made the fortune of Pietism; and Collegia sprang up rapidly in every considerable town with a German-speaking population. In Hamburg and Giessen, Frankfurt, Gotha, and the towns of Switzerland, the revival was more than ever successful; and to such an extent was the old party at Leipsic enraged by this success, that the acquitted Pietists and their advocate were driven from the University by threats of personal violence.

The leader of Pietism himself had at this time left Dresden, having given offence to the Elector by rebuking him for drunkenness, and was now in 1691 at Berlin, under the protection of the Duke and future King of Prussia. There his influence was sufficient effectually to succour his expelled followers; and under his patronage the exiles founded the University of Halle as the home for the proscribed opinions. Meanwhile a serious attack was made on Spener by the Wittenberg divines, who at length formally arraigned him for false doctrine and impiety. Spener energetically and successfully defended himself, and his work, "The True Agreement with the Confession of Augsburg," which sets forth a complete justification of his teaching, became the leading authoritative treatise on ultra-evangelical Lutheranism. These persecutions and this defence set the seal to the division of the Lutherans into what may be properly called a right and left party—a division which, with more or less continuity, has ever since existed in that communion.

It was not, however, from men of learning like Francke and Spener, nor from the Universities that Lutheranism had anything to fear. But in the practice of the Collegia there was a genuine source of danger. Ignorant and fanatical persons, arrogating to themselves an insight to which they had no claim, gave the rein to their fancies, and mistook them for the prompting of the Holy Spirit. Thus they went so far as to speak of the Lutheran Church as Babylon, and prophesied its impending dissolution. Spener died in 1705, and, shortly afterwards, the commotions at Augsburg, Giessen, Dantzic, Hamburg, Erfurt, and other places, had become so intolerable, that the executive interfered by the imposition of severe penal laws, and finally proscribed the overt exercise of Pietism. Thus all opportunity for the development of the Pietists into a completely organized sect was effectually destroyed.

The principal reforms demanded by the Pietists, to be gathered from the writings of their leaders, were these: First, that the theological schools should be reformed by the abolition of all systematic theology, philosophy, and metaphysics, and that morals and not doctrine should form the staple of all preaching; secondly, that only those persons should be admitted into the Lutheran ministry whose lives were examples of living piety. In support of this last proposal, they urged the quasi-Wickliffite doctrine, that the theology of the wicked cannot be a true theology ; and (some of them at least) added that the ministrations of the wicked are inefficacious. Other doctrines, some of them of a violent character, are attributed to certain men of mark who were connected with the Pietistic movement, such as Arnold Dippel and Petersen ; but these were for the most part either the result of hatred for the Lutheran order, or, as in case of the last-named writer, of simple delusion. An exception must be made of Schädle, who, undoubtedly, opposed the Lutheran practice of confession. Though an undoubted Pietist, he was singular in this opinion. It deserves mention that the Pietists were accused of impugning the special Lutheran view of the doctrine of justification by faith only ; but the accusation was unfounded. Spener and his followers never denied that good works were unnecessary to salvation, they only desired that this difficult doctrine should not be preached to the congregation.

Debarred from the exercise of special external ceremonies, Pietism has, from the beginning of the eighteenth century, preserved a meagre and unimportant existence up to the present time. First, the Wolfian philosophy ; secondly, that of the Encyclopédists ; finally, modern Rationalism, has, since the death of Spener, given to Lutheran Christianity opponents of a calibre sufficient to employ all its powers of resistance, and this has made it perhaps unwilling to renew a frivolous and internecine conflict.

The dead formalism of Halle indeed long continued, and may, in a sense, still be said to preserve the tenets of Spener in a fossilized condition, but the quickening ardour of the leaders of the movement that made Pietism a force has long since disappeared. A temporary reanimation is to be noted, commencing about 1827 by the appearance of a publication edited by Hengstenberg ; but the movement was quite unimportant, and since 1835 European attention has not been attracted to the Evangelicalism of Spener. [The best account of Pietism is to be found in Hossbach, Spener und seine Zeite ; Illgen, Historia Collegii Philobiblici ; Bretschneider, die Grundlage des Evangelischen Pietismus ; Märklin, Darstellung und Kritik des modernen Pietismus ; with which Binder's Des Pietismus und die moderne Bildung, Brucker's Historia Critica Philosophiae, Shroceck's Kirchen. nach der Reform. can be advantageously compared.]

PIRNESEANS. A mediæval sect, taking its name and origin from John Pirnensis, an anti-sacerdotalist schismatic of Silesia, A.D. 1341. His principles were those common to the mediæval sects, and illustrated especially in the BÉGHARDS and the BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT. It is thought probable that they were in some way connected with the STRIGOLNIKS of Russia, although the latter belong to a much more recent time. [Krazinski, Reform. in Poland, i. 55.]

PLOTINUS [born A.D. 205, died A.D. 270]. A native of Egypt, the most celebrated follower of Ammonius Saccas, although a bitter foe of Christianity, closely connected with its schools on the side of Mysticism. Where doubt had been considered to be the true atmosphere of philosophy he aspired to give certainty. To Pyrrhonism he opposed a system of pure intellectualism, and engaged to lead his followers into positive truth. The soul, he said, is in a state of debasement through contact with a body of matter ; it is alienated from the eternal and infinite Source of its being, in whose nature it still participates. It is the mission of a true philosophy to restore this interrupted union, and to lead back the soul to a blissful oneness with the Source of all goodness and unity. He affirmed with his dying breath, "I am striving to bring the God Which is in us into harmony with the God Which is in the universe." But he did it by confusing subject and object, in the same manner as Fichte and Hegel and modern pantheists. That harmony is true knowledge, and philosophy alone can teach it. It is a knowledge, he said, that is more than philosophy, to which he only possessed the clue, existing not in the imagination, but as absolute verity, not in set words and phrases, but in subjective truth. It is cognizable by a higher power than mere intellectual thought ; this power is self-consciousness, νοήσις, the knowledge which reason possesses of its own being ; that itself is the truth and the substantive existence of the being man. This knowledge is not to be reasoned out as though its object were without the perceiving soul, but it is of such a nature as to fuse together all distinction between the subject and object of knowledge. We do not discern reason, but reason discerns itself. It is perceptible in no other way. Supersensate truth can only be known in the spirit. Philo had already held similar opinions with respect to union of the soul with God. However great, he said, the gulf may be between man and the Deity, it may be bridged over through the manifestation of God to the soul. It is not only that the mind mirrors out to itself God the Creator and Preserver of the sensible world of matter,¹ whereby is gained a consciousness only of the existence of the Deity, but no adequate idea of His Being or Nature. To aspire to know this were mere folly ;² man cannot see God, but God reveals Himself to man in the reasonable soul,³ and this revelation constitutes his highest happiness. We have here the germ of all those semi-fanatical aspirations after a union with the Deity that afterwards became the soul of mystical theology, descending through the Neo-Platonic school and Dionysius (Pseudo-Areopagita) to the school of St. Victoire, and thence to Bonaventura, Eckhart, and Gerson.¹ Where this is accorded to man, his soul is no longer led by the subordinate powers of divine relation nor by angelic influence, but by God Himself; and man, though "a little lower than the angels," is raised to a level with them. Numenius also defined the divine Unity as Reason and Goodness, and said that the soul was capable of such a close union with it as to involve positively no diversity.² The outer rays of the Divine Nature nourish and support our bodily nature; by internal contemplation of the Deity we rise above the body, and emerge into the purer life of reason, being made partakers of a blessed existence. It was a prolepsis of Fichtean and Hegelian Pantheism. Plotinus fairly outsoars his predecessors. Intellect as the principle of unity does not satisfy him; something yet more recondite there must be from which it emanates, which Plotinus names "the First," or "the undefined and undefinable, the source of motion and rest, itself devoid of either as being infinite." Such human notions as Thought and Will are wholly inapplicable to the Absolute, with which nothing else can have relation, and whom no attribute can limit. Itself nothing in respect of all things, it is yet the power and energy of all. Plotinus aspired to reach back to this principle through the contemplative faculty of the soul itself, an emanation from intellect, the second principle, as light proceeds from the sun by effulgence rather than emanation. Intellect, as the source of every living principle, contains within itself the principle of multiplicity; in it are stored the universal ideas that are spirit and life; the intelligible world—κόσμος νοητός. Nothing of human reason, nothing of material sense, can have anything to do with union of the soul with its origin, for the One is an incomprehensible essence. The soul united with it exists in a divine ecstasy; it is then conscious of nothing earthly; mortal sense has no part in that which transcends all human reason. The whole soul is filled with a God-like delight; it is one with the Beautiful, which is no longer external to it but inherently one.³ The soul is distracted at such a time with no earthly thoughts, but as the divine vision comes and as it goes it is wholly absorbed in it.⁴ Such moments of privileged existence are few and short, but they portend the bliss that awaits the soul when released from matter. If the Divine Principle is the centre of all, the rapt soul is concentric with it, ὥσπερ κέντρῳ κέντρον συνάψας. The nature of the vision may not be disclosed to the uninitiated, τὸ μὴ ἐκφέρειν εἰς τοὺς μὴ μεμνήμενους, and when it is enounced in such terms as Sight and Vision, this is only in default of adequate means of expression. Also, when we speak of the Deity as perfect goodness, it is a goodness that is inconceivable by us, who have no other gauge to apply than human virtues that can have no place in the Deity. Courage involves the possibility of fear; self-restraint the notion of some object of desire; moderation is the antithesis of excess. Virtue therefore is not the final good at which the soul must aim, but it is the means of attaining that end; and the soul in pursuing it emerges into a higher state of being, an ecstatic condition, a reduction of the soul into its first simple elements, a surrendering of itself wholly to the essence of its contemplation;⁵ but the Divine Principle only exists in a man in the degree to which he is conscious of the indwelling principle within him. The Third Principle, in subordination to the First Good and to Intellect, is the supramundane and vital Soul of the universe, the Source of all life, subsisting with the Intellect, of which it is the animal counterpart in the Divine Substance, and impressed with the forms of eternal ideas, by it unconsciously conceived and propagated. The three principles are co-eternal, forming a kind of hierarchy of order and dignity, from whence the pseudo-Dionysian notion of a celestial hierarchy was derived, and with which different gradations of excellence—gods, demons, genii and heroes—are connected. There are three steps of access towards the highest good: harmony, that occupies itself with lower matters of sensation; love, that contemplates the immaterial and vast, and finds its only repose in full possession of its object; and wisdom, that becomes absorbed in communion with the First Good. Their representative characters are the musician, the lover, and the philosopher. No glimpse of truth is attainable by the common herd. Purifications, prayers, and spiritual exercises are the means whereby the soul learns to soar far above all earthly considerations, not merely into the presence, but into actual union with the Deity, where intellect becomes one with essence. This Trinity of principles and powers, devoid of all hypostatic individuality, may have been borrowed from the Christian faith, but it has nothing else in common with it; in fact, in the hands of Plotinus, it was a formidable weapon of attack upon Christianity; and in an opposite direction his conversion of the old heathen mythological notions into allegory, as a gradational element in the hierarchy, helped to give new life to the expiring theories of heathenism. In either case his teaching was equally prejudicial to the cause of truth. As Intellect is one, though infinitely varied, so the soul of Nature is one, yet teems with a multiplicity of life. The same mysticism runs through the writings of the Neo-Platonic school.¹ In Jamblichus, and afterwards in Proclus, mysticism took a more theurgical direction; the First God, or the Absolute, in more modern phrase, was represented as infinitely remote; certain intermediate δαίμονια alone afforded the possibility of communion with Him [Proclus, Theol. Plat. iii. 14]. It may be observed that the entire new Platonic school has been divided by de Gérando into three branches: Plotinus [A.D. 250] and Porphyry [A.D. 280 Syriace, Malchus] representing the Roman branch, which exhibited an essentially philosophic eclecticism, and was only so far tintured with Oriental tradition as it taught the mystical union of the soul with God as an essential truth; the school of Alexandria had Jamblichus [A.D. 363] and Hierocles [A.D. 485], the harmonizer of Plato and Aristotle, as its main lights, and by its union with the theosophy of the East served as the main basis of mystical theology; while the school of Athens, where Plutarch and Syrianus taught, and of which Proclus [A.D. 450] is the exponent, affected to revert to the ancient sources of Greek wisdom as embodied in the Orphic hymns.

The writings of Plotinus, as arranged by Porphyry, are contained in six books, each book being subdivided into nine sections or Enneads. Their general object may be stated to be an exposition of the Absolute Unity, the source and origin of all the successional development exhibited in the varied phenomena of the universe. Their style, obscure in the extreme, has aggravated the confusion of these writings. Plotinus seldom delivered his lectures from written notes; his pupil Porphyry therefore persuaded him to compose some work as a standard of authority on the abstruse topics that he handled. His neglect of revising that which he wrote, and his want of scientific method, have added to the obscurity of the books that bear his name. But for the friendly aid of Porphyry in revising and correcting this obscurity would probably have been hopeless. Longinus plainly confessed that many of the subjects handled by Plotinus² were beyond his comprehension. No writing of Plotinus has come down to us which openly attacks Christianity; though it is very possible that the Ennead κατὰ γνωστικούς [ii. 9] may have been partly levelled against the teaching of the Church.

PLYMOUTH BRETHREN. A sect which originated almost simultaneously in Dublin and Plymouth, about the year 1830, the members of which, calling themselves "The Brethren," came to be called from their headquarters in England the "Plymouth Brethren." The principal founder of the sect was a clergyman, who had been a barrister, named Darby, from whom the Plymouth Brethren are sometimes called "Darbyites." Giving up his ministrations in the Church of Ireland, he established a small sect in Dublin under the name of SEPARATISTS, and then came to England, and went about as an independent preacher, organizing small societies of the strictest Calvinistic type of Evangelicalism for the promotion of personal piety, which were soon converted into congregations claiming to be independent of all other religious communities. The chief peculiarity of these congregations is that they are without any separate ministry, every "brother" and "sister" being considered to have a full right to "prophecy" or preach whenever he is moved to do so. They also administer baptism to all adults, whether baptized before or not; and substitute a kind of weekly love-feast, in which bread and wine are passed round from one to another for the Holy Eucharist. Like many other small sects the Plymouth Brethren maintain that true Christianity is not to be found in the Church or among the sects, but only among themselves. They are also strong Predestinarians and Millenarians. In their own phraseology they are "the assembly of God," not meeting together by human will, but "gathered to Jesus by the Holy Ghost." Hence they consider that they need no human ministry, but are under immediate Divine presidency, which is the fulfilment of the promise, "Where two or three are gathered together in My Name there am I in the midst of them." This they call the "many-men ministry" in contradistinction to the "one-man ministry" of ordinary Christian congregations.

The Plymouth Brethren are a rather widely spread and growing sect, but they have little organic unity, being broken up into many sections by the differences of opinion (often followed up with great animosity and bitterness) arising from their "many-men" ministry. At the same time there is much attraction for the leisurely class of what may be called semi-professional society which is found in towns inhabited by retired officers, etc., in the system of every one having a psalm or an interpretation; and the sect is largely recruited from this class of persons. [Guinness' Who are the Plymouth Brethren? Dennett's Plymouth Brethren, their Rise, etc.]

PNEUMATICS. [AMBROSIIANS.]

PNEUMATOMACHI. The name "Adversaries of the Holy Spirit," given to that party which, upon the subsidence of the Arian controversy, was distinguished by the denial of the Catholic faith regarding the Third Person of the Holy Trinity; some denying His Divinity, others His Personality also.

The heresy of the Pneumatomachi is commonly connected with the name of Macedonius; but since Macedonius was so closely connected with the Semi-Arian party that the term Macedonian was used as equivalent to Semi-Arian;³ and since there were others than Semi-Arians who held the heresy, the more comprehensive name is to be preferred. The appearance of the party is to be dated A.D. 360, when Athanasius wrote against them, giving them the name here adopted. Athanasius was then in the deserts of Egypt, and Serapion, Bishop of Thmuis, in Lower Egypt, requested his interposition. The heresies themselves were no novelties. It was a part of the Arian creed that the Holy Spirit was a created being, superior it might be in dignity, but no-wise different in nature from the angels: and in the Gnostic systems we meet with Christ and the Holy Ghost as Æons [VALENTINIANS], the latter being held, in some cases at least, to be not a distinct Person, but a divine energy diffused through the universe. But there was a great difference in the mode in which these heresies were held. They then appeared, not as proceeding from a special opposition to the greatness of the Holy Spirit, but as deductions from some other leading heresy to which they were subordinate. Thus in the case of the Arians, with which our present subject is concerned, the denial of the divinity of the Holy Spirit follows upon the denial of the divinity of the Son. For as it is impossible to advance the Third Person of the Trinity above the Second Person, the controversy turned therefore on the divinity of the Second. Dealing with this, the Council of Nicæa did not deal specifically with the subordinate heresy, but left it to stand or fall with the leading one. But when the leading heresy was abandoned, and yet the subordinate heresy retained, then the latter not only became prominent, but was seen to be adopted on its own independent grounds, for its own sake. The Arian half converted to Catholicity was properly a Pneumatomachist. Such were those whom Athanasius dealt with in his letter to Serapion. They were seceders from the Arians who had embraced the true faith regarding the Son, but retained their error regarding the Holy Spirit.¹ They were consequently opposed both by Catholics and Arians, but their true controversy was with the former: their contest with the latter (Athanasius urges) could be only pretended, inasmuch as both agreed in opposing the doctrine of the Trinity [ad Serap. i. 1, 2, 9, 32]. This class then differed from the later Macedonian class: it held Homoiousian doctrine regarding the Son, whereas the Macedonians were Homoiousians. Athanasius calls them also TROPICI, from their figurative interpretations of Scripture; but this is rather an epithet than a proper name.

In comparison with the Macedonian party, this earlier party can have been but small. It was however reinforced a few years later, as we shall shew, upon the return of a large portion of the Semi-Arian body to catholicity. The adoption of the truth concerning the Son leads almost necessarily to the adoption of the truth concerning the Holy Spirit. The arguments of Athanasius [ad Serap. i. 29, iv. 7] shew forcibly how untenable a position is that which maintains a Duality instead of a Trinity. The original Monarchian tenet from which the Arians started is much more easily admissible.

The Pneumatomachi of the Macedonian school were the Semi-Arians left behind in schism when, in the year 366, the majority of the sect gave in their assent to orthodoxy, and were received into the Church. Before this time Macedonius had joined the Semi-Arian party. He had been appointed Bishop of Constantinople by the Arians, being then an Anomœan or Acacian [Phot. Bibl. Cod. 257]; but professing Semi-Arian opinions, was deposed by the Arian Council of Constantinople, A.D. 360 [Theod. Hist. Eccl. ii. 6]. He then invented the artifice of the "Homoion," and connecting himself closely with the Semi-Arian party, gave them his name [Theod. Hær. fab. iv. 5]. At first therefore the term Macedonian was simply equivalent to Semi-Arian, and Socrates calls the reply of Liberius to the Semi-Arian legates a letter to the bishops of the Macedonians [Socr. Hist. Eccl. iv. 12]. The name of Macedonius appears in this reply. The good faith of this transaction is (to say the least) very doubtful,² and we are in uncertainty as to the opinions which Macedonius really held at the close of his life. But there is no uncertainty as to the course of the heresy. The letters of Liberius were exhibited at the Council of Tyana, and the deputies who presented them were acknowledged as members of the Catholic body. This was probably in A.D. 368. A council was appointed to meet in Tarsus to complete the work of reconciliation, but just before the meeting thirty-four Asiatic bishops assembled in Caria, refused the Homoiousian; and Valens, at the instigation of the Arian Eudoxius, by whom he had been recently baptized, forbade the council [Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vi. 12]. From this time however Semi-Arianism disappears from ecclesiastical history. The controversy regarding our Lord's divinity was ceasing, and the denial of the divinity of the Holy Spirit became the distinguishing tenet of the Semi-Arian party, the tenet thus becoming associated with the name Macedonian, which the Semi-Arians had recently acquired. Many called them Marathonians, saying that Marathonius, Bishop of Nicomedia, had introduced the term Homoiousion [Socr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 45].

It is to be noticed here that several writers, when treating of the present heresy, use the word Semi-Arian in another sense than that now given it. Philaster [Hær. lxvii.] defines the Semi-Arians thus: "Hi de Patre et Filio bene sentiunt, unam qualitatis substantiam, unam divinitatem esse credentes, Spiritum autem non de divina substantia, nec Deum verum, sed factum atque creatum Spiritum prædicantes." And Augustine [Hær. iii.]: "Macedoniani de Patre et Filio recte sentiunt, quod unius sint ejusdemque substantiæ vel essentiæ, sed de Spiritu Sancto hoc nolunt credere, creaturam eum esse dicentes. Hos potius quidam Semi-Arianos vocant, quod in hac questione ex parte cum illis sint, ex parte nobiscum." This use of the term Semi-Arian is now to be avoided, the distinctive mark of that party being the Homoiousion. But these two authorities shew that the original Pneumatomachi, against whom Athanasius wrote, must have been largely reinforced from those who joined the church under Liberius. This appears also from Epiphanius [Hær. lxxiv.], who states that the Pneumatomachi proceeded partly from the Semi-Arians and partly from the orthodox. In the preceding article he had defined the Semi-Arians by the Homoiousion; and the "orthodox," it cannot be doubted, were not the old Nicenes, but those who from the Arians had come over to the Homoiousion and had been accepted by Liberius as orthodox. Thus of the Pneumatomachi some were orthodox regarding the divinity of the Son, some retained the Homoiousion, and these latter are properly Macedonians, being Semi-Arians.

All these started with the tenet of the sect from which they sprung, namely, that the Holy Spirit is a created being, of the same order as the created angels [Theod. Epiph. l.c.]. And the authorities of Philaster and Augustine are sufficient to shew that this was retained by the majority of the party. But another opinion arose early. It proceeded—Eustathius of Sebastia being an example [Socr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 45]—from a reluctance to call the Holy Spirit a creature. But as they who felt this reluctance would not consent to call Him God, it followed necessarily that they were obliged to deny His Personality. Still they assigned to the impersonal Spirit that which is assigned to the Personal Spirit by Catholics, to be the Vinculum¹ of the Persons of the Godhead. This is noted by Augustine [Hær. lii.]: "Quamvis a nonnullis perhibeantur non Deum, sed Deitatem Patris et Filii dicere Spiritum Sanctum, et nullam propriam habere substantiam." And what Catholics regard as God the Holy Ghost working in the world, they regarded as a divine energy diffused through the world. Mo-sheim represents this, it appears upon insufficient grounds, to be the tenet of the Macedonians in general [Walch, Hist. der Ketz. iii. p. 98].

The heresy of the Pneumatomachi was condemned, first, in a synod at Alexandria, A.D. 362, held by Athanasius on his return [Athan. Synod. Epist. ad Antioch.];² secondly, in a synod in Illyricum, A.D. 367 [Epist. Synod. ad Orient.];³ Harduin, Concil. i. 794; Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vi. 22; thirdly, in a synod at Rome, A.D. 367 [Damasi Epist. ap. Theod. Hist. Eccl. ii. 22]; fourthly, in another synod at Rome, A.D. 382 [Damasi Epist. ap. Theod. Hist. Eccl. v. 11, Vales, n.]; and lastly, in the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, by which, in opposition to the heresies of Macedonius, Apollinaris, and Eunomius, the Nicene faith was confirmed and more fully stated. The first canon anathematizes the "Semi-Arians or Pneumatomachi;" the seventh canon uses the name Macedonians, and orders the admission of converts from this heresy to be by unction. To the simple article of the Nicene Creed, "I believe in the Holy Ghost," were added those clauses (excepting the Filioque) which stand at present as the complement of the Catholic faith.

The Macedonians were invited to the Council of Constantinople in the hope that the reconciliation interrupted at Tarsus might be effected, but the hope was not realized [Socr. Hist. Eccl. v. 8; Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vii. 7].⁴ The council completed the work which was begun at Nicæa; and finally declared the Catholic faith regarding the Holy Trinity. Against its determination the Semi-Arian, now the Pneumatomachist, party was not able to make any effectual resistance.

POLISH BRETHREN. [SOCINIANIS.]

POLISH PROTESTANTS. The Reformation did not succeed in finally establishing itself in Poland, in consequence not so much of the opposition of the Government as of the dissensions among the Protestants themselves. During the reign of Sigismund I. [A.D. 1506-1548] Lutheran congregations began to be secretly held in Cracow and other chief cities, but the movement did not become of public importance till the days of his successor Sigismund Augustus II. [A.D. 1548-1570]. Several circumstances then combined in its favour. In the very first year of the new reign a large number of refugees, expelled from Bohemia by Ferdinand on account of their religious tenets, settled in Poland. These BOHEMIAN BRETHREN, as they are called, were akin to the Waldensians in their views, and a branch of the older Hussites. Secondly, the King himself, although not prepared openly to desert the Catholic Church, was by no means unfavourable to the Reformed opinions. He would listen to the exhortations of the famous Polish ecclesiastic Laski (John à Lasco); Melancthon wrote letters to him; Calvin dedicated to him his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews. In the year A.D. 1560 he granted full liberty of opinion to Dantzic, Thorn, and Elbing, towns in Western or Polish Prussia, a district which, having voluntarily submitted to Casimir III. [A.D. 1333-1370], had been finally incorporated with Poland [A.D. 1466], and in which Knade, Beuchenstein, and a Dominican friar named Klein had, in the earlier part of the sixteenth century, created disturbances by their Lutheran preaching. On the death of Sigismund the Polish monarchy became elective, and the bias of subsequent rulers was generally Romish, especially in the case of Sigismund III. [A.D. 1587-1632], during whose reign Protestantism became nearly extinct. Its overthrow was due partly to the fierce persecutions which it was made to pass through during the greater part of the seventeenth century, but largely also to the dissensions existing between its four chief parties, the Lutherans, the Swiss, the Waldensians, and the Socinians, although an attempt at reconciliation had been made, and a consensus drawn up between the first three bodies at a synod held at Sandomir A.D. 1570, and again at Vlodislaw A.D. 1583.

² The Epistle states that Arians, on their reception into the Church, are to anathematize those who say that the Holy Spirit is a created being and divided from the substance of Christ. A true renunciation of Arian doctrine is to abstain from dividing the Holy Trinity, from saying that one of the Persons is a created being.

³ "We write that you may know the Arians are condemned, who assert that neither the Son nor the Holy Spirit are of the substance of the Father." The Synod was held at Valentinian's order, who had heard of controversies in Asia and Phrygia. [Theod. II. E. iv. 7.]

According to statistics obtained in Poland A.D. 1855, out of about four million inhabitants a quarter of a million belong to the various Protestant communities.

POMORANE. A small Russian sect, "dwellers by the sea," so called from their proximity to the Lake Ladoga and the White Sea, or from Pomori, a village in the government of Olonetz, where they appear to have originated [c. A.D. 1675]. They form a subdivision of that class of Russian Dissenters who reject the theory of a settled ministry [BEZPOPOFTSCHINS], and are themselves split up into numerous small factions, called Feodorians from their leader Feodorus, Abacunians from Abacun, etc. They reject the reforms of Nikon with as much rigidity as the Starovertz, and rebaptize all who join their sect from the Church or from other communities.

POMORYANS. [POMORANE.]

PONGILUPUS. The Franciscans attribute the origin of the FRATICELLI to Hermann Pongilupus of Ferrara, who died A.D. 1269, and at whose tomb in the principal church of that town miracles were said to be wrought. In his lifetime he had practised great austerity as one of the CONSOLATI: but some years after his death [A.D. 1300] charges of heresy were brought against him, and a judicial process having been brought against him, his bones were burnt and his tomb demolished by order of Boniface VIII., the object being to put an end to the extravagant veneration shewn to his memory by the populace. Mosheim considers that it is an error to connect Pongilupus with the Fraticelli, and says that he was one of the BAGNOLIAN sect [Mosh. Eccl. Hist. ii. 207, Stubbs' ed.]. Natalis Alexander speaks of him as reviving several vile practices of the Gnostics. [Wadding, Annal. Minor. Fratr. vi. 279. Natal. Alex. Hist. Eccl. viii. 87.]

POOR OF LYONS. [WALDENSES.]

POOR PRIESTS. This name was given to, or assumed by, Lollard clergy of the fourteenth and fifteenth century, who wandered about the country holding what are called in modern times "missions" wherever they pleased, without any cure of souls being given to them, or license by the bishop of the diocese. The name "poor" seems to shew an association of idea with the "Pauperes Catholici" and the "Poor of Lyons."

POPPLICIANI. A common name for the Catharists of France. It is probably a corruption of Pauliciani. The name is given by Matthew Paris, "Gallice etiam dicuntur ab aliquibus Popeliciani." [Matth. Par. ad ann. 1236.]

POPOFTSCHINS. That division of Russian Dissenters which retains the office of "pope" or priest in its ministrations and services. This is done in a large degree by means of priests who secede from, or are no longer permitted to minister in, the Church. The Popoftschins are divided into five principal sects, the Starovertz, the Diaconoftschins, the Peremayanoftschins, the Epefanoftschins, and the Tschernoboltsi.

PORPHYRIANS. This name was given to the Arians in an edict of the Emperor Constantine issued in the year 325, the reason stated being that, as they had emulated the impiety of Porphyry in their errors, so they ought to be named after him [Socrat. Hist. Eccl. i. 6]. This decree was afterwards quoted as a precedent by Theodosius the Younger, who ordered that the Nestorians should, in a similar manner, be called Simonians. It may be doubted whether either name extended much beyond the four corners of the edicts in which they were given. [Baron. Annal. ad ann. 325, lxxxiv. lxxxv.]

PORPHYRY. [NEO-PLATONISTS.]

PORRETANUS. The Latinized name of Gilbert de la Porée, Bishop of Poitiers, who held opinions respecting the personality and the essence of the Holy Trinity analogous to those of the Tetratheitæ or DAMIANISTS of the sixth century. Porretanus distinguished the Divine Essence from the Three Divine Persons, and each Person from His attributes: and as a consequence of this distinction he seems to have gone far towards a denial of the Incarnation, respecting which he ventured to set forth the proposition "Quod Divina natura non esset incarnata." Porretanus was accused by two of his clergy of teaching blasphemy, and his opinions were brought before Pope Eugene III. by his archdeacons Arnald and Calo, and by St Bernard. A council was held at Paris in the year 1147, and another at Rheims on March 21st, 1148, and his opinions being condemned at the former, Porretanus recanted them at the latter. It does not appear that any large party was formed by Porretanus, but some are spoken of under his name as his followers. [Gallia Christiana, ii. 1175. Harduin, Concil. VI. ii. 1297. Mansi, Concil. xxi. 712.]

PORT-ROYALISTS. [JANSENISTS.]

POSITIVISTS. A modern school of sceptics which owes its origin to Auguste Comte [A.D. 1797-1857], and which holds for its fundamental principle that nothing is to be believed but that which can be positively demonstrated. It is a philosophy rather than a religious system, although from his philosophical deductions Comte professes to form a religion of his own.

The Comtean philosophy aims at effecting that for the entire group of sciences which the Baconian method did for knowledge generally: to apply inductive generalization to the laws that govern the several sciences, and by reducing them under the head of general principles, to bring all under one category of unity. The idea is grand and vast; and he advanced so far on the path towards demonstration as to shew that there is no innate inconsequence in the idea. It was a recapitulation of every antecedent philosophical development, as Bacon's Inductive Method was a comprehensive generalization of all that had come to hand two centuries before. It was perhaps this analogy between the systems of Comte and Bacon, as an interrogation and interpretation of experience, that gave to the former a reputation among English thinkers, such as Dr. Brown,¹ Bentham and James Mill, almost before his system was known in France.

Comte professed to evolve no new principle; he claims only to adhere to the traditions of the greatest masters of thought, Descartes and Leibnitz, Bacon and Newton. His theory of antecedents and succession in lieu of cause and effect was that of Hume; our ignorance of real substances and real causes was declared by Kant. Positivism aims at unity; the working out of a system sufficiently general to affect every variety of scientific idea, and so irresistibly convincing to the reason as to be absolutely "positive." To make a science positive in the Comtean sense is to give to it its final scientific constitution, by pursuing to their logical consequences those of its truths which link it with the rest. Positivism raises each science in succession from its empirical condition, and incorporates it with every other positive science as a co-ordinated and coherent body of doctrine. Knowledge, it affirms, can only be co-extensive with the range of phenomena. We can neither know the essence of things, nor understand their real mode of production; our ideas of phenomena also are purely relative; succession and resemblance being the principal data. These relations are exact and undeviating, ever succeeding as similar results under the operation of similar circumstances. These resemblances and unvarying sequences constitute the laws of phenomena, and give to us our only means of knowledge. Essence and causation, whether effective or final, are equally beyond our powers of observation, however true an existence they may have. Our power of controlling phenomena consists ultimately in the accuracy of our observation of their natural sequences. Foresight depends wholly upon this tact. The various sciences are assumed by the Positivist to have reciprocal points of relation, which will bring them eventually under the same category. But circumstances hitherto have kept these relations in the background so that they have eluded detection. Thus all is linked together in one continuous chain. Nature has no breaks. The entire cycle of sciences is in harmony with itself; but the harmonizing elements have been kept in abeyance by the incompetence of its professors to deal with them in a large inductive spirit. Each man of science has his own speciality, and however expert he may be in dealing with the arcana of his own particular faculty, he is usually a bad generalizer, blind to the mutual relation of the respective sciences, and unable to seize the universal principles that pervade them all. The very division of labour that assigns to each man his own particular portion of the field of knowledge for cultivation prevents him from taking a comprehensive view of all. Men of science have not the philosophy, and philosophers have not the science that together enable the intellect to work out the positive principles that lie in the depths of attainable knowledge. The "Natur-philosophie" of Schelling and Hegel is an instance in point; even Newton could not conceive the existence of gravitation without a subtle ether through which it might act. This anarchy M. Comte held could alone be reduced to system and order by a doctrine that should be "positive," as deduced from the positive sciences; and at the same time as wide in its generalizations as metaphysical reasoning; though free from the indeterminate vagueness of metaphysics. If, therefore, Bacon's was a "Nova Instauratio," Comte's is "Novissima;" both with a telescopic sweep collect inductively the materials for deduction—the one affecting facts, the other positive doctrines and vital principles. His system is purely utilitarian. Intellect is to have the general good as its only aim; any private end is selfish and immoral. All independent thought is a reaction from Positivism; and cultivation of abstract science is useless, beyond the point at which one science lays the foundation of the science next in order. Astronomy, for instance, needs only to be pursued so far as the planetary system is visible to the naked eye, and exercises a perceptible gravitative or irradiating influence on the earth. Comte had an intense hate for all abstract reasoning as morally dangerous in fostering pride, and as being to the many essentially dry and repulsive.

In working out his Positivist system Comte establishes with logical precision one step after another. Positive philosophy includes science in all its relations. The same method applies to all investigations: physics, ethics, politics, and the subordinate sciences, all fall under the same category. Classification marshals the several sciences in the natural order in which they must be attacked. The simpler come first, as paving the way for the more complex and difficult. Mathematics are the foundation of astronomy and physical science; and chemistry stands in the same relation to biology which this latter occupies with respect to sociology, itself the wide basis of religion. The order of evolution is as a fundamental law. All human science has had its orderly progression, and through the successive stages of the theological, the metaphysical, and the positive phases. The terms are not happily chosen by Comte to express his particular ideas; but they are his.² Metaphysics with him is a comprehensive term of condemnation; an intermedi-

² Mr J. S. Mill proposes to substitute on the score of clearness, for theological, the personal or volitional explanation of nature; for metaphysical, the abstractional ate limbo to which he condemns all attempts at positive science which are unscientifically misdirected. Transition from one condition to another has been determined in different cases with more or less rapidity. By theology Comte means a belief in supernatural power, either in philosophy or in religion. Beginning as the merest Fetichism, it becomes first Polytheism, and rises eventually into the belief of one God, the Ruler and Governor of the universe, to Whom the disposal of events that are ruled by the inevitable operation of their own laws is ascribed by the untutored mind. Under its metaphysical phase, philosophical thought passes on from the idea of a supernatural Being overruling all things throughout the universe to that of abstract forces inherent in the various cosmic substances, and giving rise to those phenomena which, under the preceding phase, had been ascribed to a Divine will. This leads to the positive, in which the mind, divorcing itself from all inquiry into causes and essences as utterly futile and vain, applies its energies to the diagnosis and classification of the laws which regulate effects; the definite and invariable relations of sequence and analogy in which all things stand to each other. The highest flight of the human intellect will be, at some future time, the demonstration that all phenomena issue forth from one general principle. Thus the several sciences have had this uniform progression; the Sun-god of heathen mythology made way for the harmony of the spheres, and the mystical properties of numbers under Pythagoras; to be succeeded in due course by the positive result of the discovery of the law of gravitation and of attraction. A knowledge of dynamics and gravitation raises astronomy as a science to so completely positive a condition, that the recurrence of celestial phenomena may be predicted as certainly as the position of the sun at any given hour to-morrow; the incidence of an annular eclipse is so certainly foreknown that astronomers betake themselves to the exact spot upon the earth's surface from whence it may be best observed. The sequence of the occultation of Jupiter's satellites is so unvarying that the seafaring man has no better method for determining his exact position on the pathless deep. Nothing can be more positive than a science that can shew such results as these. So also meteorology, already advanced in some degree in the same direction, will become absolutely positive, when its laws and invariable sequences are wholly known. "Snow and vapours, wind and storm, fulfilling His word," will be found to be determined in their most capricious phenomena by laws that in principle are one with those of every other law of Nature. Thunder, ascribed of old to the nod of Jove, and in the Italic school to the whirl of the spheres reaching us through the rent clouds, is by positive science identified with electricity; but a yet wide generalization may bring the laws both of gravitation and electricity under the operation of one and the self-same principle. Even mathematics has had its theological phase in the mystical properties applied to numbers by Pythagoras, and adopted by the Gnostics; also in the deification of geometrical properties by the Egyptians. [Plut. de Is. et Os. 56, compare 47; and Irenæus, Cambr. ed. introd. pp. xxiv. xxv.]

The positive system, therefore—discarding all notion of supernatural power and of forces interposing between phenomena and their evolution, as in fact Descartes had already done—takes account solely of phenomena; it traces down their laws—that is, the unvarying character of their sequences, their tendencies and reciprocal analogies. The determination of these laws is henceforth to be the highest aim of the human intellect. Positive philosophy is content with the demonstration of such laws; it troubles not itself with their cause. Things as yet are only tending that way. Biology is in its metaphysical stage; and metaphysicians weary themselves with vain attempts to reach back to the first cause of life, and to discover whether the vital principle consists of electricity or galvanism or some neurochemical action. Sociology also is still in its primitive theological state; and men persist in believing that human actions are rewarded and punished by a Supreme Governor, whom they have never seen and cannot know. If there be a Supreme Being He must be bound by the laws that uphold the regular course of Nature. Positivism will eventually enable men to predict the occurrence of phenomena in every science as infallibly as in the forecasting of astronomy.

Comte's classification of the fundamental sciences, as preliminary to the successful investigation of their laws, is certainly remarkable. As in mathematics, principle is evolved from principle, and the most intricate and complex proposition depends ultimately on simple postulates and axioms; so is it with the sciences. All have the orderly progression. The phenomena exhibited by each determine their mutual relations; and the order of their dependence is defined by the simplicity or generality of those phenomena—the most simple are the most general. Proceeding, therefore, from the study of the most simple or general phenomena, the Positivist must advance onwards towards the mastery of those that are in the highest degree complex. The sciences have their scale of subordination, and must be taken methodically, and this not with the mere view of facilitating study, but as an essential element of Positivist discipline.

Philosophy is reducible into abstract and concrete sciences: abstract science involving the laws that govern the rudimental phenomena of nature in every possible form; while concrete science affects the individual phenomena. Abstract science, as coming first in natural order and as the basis of concrete science, is of earlier development. It forms a group of six; their order is determined by successive accretion.

1. MATHEMATICS, including the science of num-or ontological; and for positive, in its objective aspect, phenomenal, and subjectively, experiential.

ber, arithmetic and algebra; extension, geometry; dynamics, statics, and mechanics.

2. ASTRONOMY, based upon 1 + {gravitation and attraction}.

3. PHYSICS, depending upon 1 + 2; natural phenomena being affected by planetary movement and influence, heat, light, electricity, etc.

4. CHEMISTRY depends on 1 + 2 + 3; especially on the last named phenomena.

5. BIOLOGY depends on 3 + 4 + its own laws.

6. SOCIOLOGY involves in a greater or less degree all the preceding.

Of these, Physics include a group of sciences; such as barology, the science of weight; thermology, of heat; acoustics, optics and electrolology. Barology ranks first, as being connected with astronomy; and electrolology last, as preparing the transition to chemistry. Chemistry entered into its positive stage under Lavoisier about the middle of last century. Sociology has not become in any degree positive; theological and metaphysical modes of thought still retard its progress.

There is certainly comprehensiveness in the grasp that Comte has taken of the cycle of sciences that bears a favourable comparison with the generalizations of the greatest thinkers. But when we follow him into the region of sociology, and master his draftings of the laws that should regulate man as a social and religious being, the result is utter disappointment. All is an Utopian optimism; moral standard there is none, unless indeed it be in the entire denegation of self that he enforces. Its only other redeeming point is his connected view of universal history, filling two out of the six volumes of which his Cours de Philosophie Positive consists, and which are remarkably rich in ideas and analytical power. The philosophy of history in his hands becomes a science.

Comte would devise a religion that should embrace every form of belief, incorporating Judaism and Mahometanism with Christianity. Practically his religion, "teneatis risum," is gynolatry. The idea of a Deity, he declares, only grew out of Fetichism; in Baconian phrase, it is an "idolum specus," a fond notion of the superstitious past. Still there must be some concrete object round which religious veneration must gather. The unseen Benefactor is the abstract idea of Humanity, the "Grand Etre," which includes also man's humble companions, his dog, his horse, and his cat. But the object of Positivist adoration must be something thoroughly well known to the intellect, and have a warm life in the affections; something that needs our service, which Omnipotence does not. From whence does man derive holier lessons of love and affection than from his female relations? wife, mother and daughter representing the present, past and future. Therefore they are only fitting objects of Positivist adoration. They are our guardian angels; and if such relations are denied to any lone being, or are unfortunately unsuited for religious cultus, any other type of womanhood, even historical so that it be real, may be substituted. Mental commemoration of these concrete feminine virtues is the great devotional act. Two hours daily, and variously divided, are to be given up to such edifying contemplation. Prayer also must be offered to the idolized ideal; an outpouring of feeling, such as mysticism endeavours to realize as its evidence of union with the Invisible. Comte in his matrimonial relations was singularly unfortunate; he was separated from his wife, and formed a liaison with a married woman, Clotilde de Vaux, who died within the year. He would allow of divorce only in the solitary case of infamy contracted by a judicial punishment. It was the misfortune of his Clotilde to have been thus qualified. Second marriages also were discouraged; matrimony being held strictly to make of two one flesh, and to involve a vow of perpetual widowhood on the part of the survivor; for remembrance is as life to the deceased, and in the case of the wife it is her apotheosis of posthumous adoration. Under the head of religious cultus must be mentioned also the Positivist red letter days. A collective worship is due to the "Grand Etre," Humanity. This public service employs seven days altogether per month. The Positivist calendar perpetuates its benefactors. It excludes the French "philosophes" of the last century; though Voltaire and Diderot have their niche. Protestants also are rigorously excluded. Comte mimicked wherever he could ecclesiastical rites and institutions; he had his infidel travestie of Church sacraments, the ninth and last being a public judgment by the spiritual power of the life of the departed, and, if merited, incorporation into the "Grand Etre" is decreed, and the newly canonized is added to the objects of Positivist adoration. This surviving memory of the departed is the only futurity recognised in the wretched craze termed Positivist religion. It knows no future life whatever beyond this change through death from objective to subjective existence in the memory of survivors. To be worshipped in the "Grand Etre"—Humanity—is a sufficient immortality.

The Positivist religion also has its hierarchy. There are two powers in the State. [1] The spiritual, consisting of the theoretical class, "proletaires" or workmen, and the women and children. This includes the clergy or the educational, and the philosophical, legal and medical sub-classes, which are maintained by a small State stipend, with which they are to be content; for to have the confidence of the masses, who are poor, its members must themselves be poor. [2] A supreme pontiff is to be head of this hierarchy for the whole human race, divided into small kingdoms no larger than Belgium, with Paris as the metropolis of the world. All functionaries have the power of naming their successors, to get rid of the elective principle, for which, and for deliberative assemblies, Comte had a supreme contempt; neither had he any respect for learning, and for the sake of "hygiène cérébrale" he would burn all books in existence, with the exception of about a hundred, chiefly of the poetical class. Such is Positivism in its scientific and religious aspects. Comte's theory with respect to capital and labour is pure Socialism, in which principles, as a St. Simonian, he was brought up. But he demanded a more complete abnegation of self than any ascetic devotee. "Vivre pour autrui" was his motto, and this, his great moral principle, he termed "altruism." To love our neighbours as ourselves is egotism. We must not love ourselves at all, but aim at the highest perfection by bestowing all our love upon others. Ascetic discipline is only to be restricted by the consideration of health; to preserve the healthy exercise of every faculty is the Positivist's first duty. Indulgence in food, or in anything not necessary for bodily vigour, is immoral; and every gratification of sense, however casual, is an "inevitable infirmity." Still a moderate "luxure" is to be allowed to the rulers of the Positivist state on account of their arduous duties. [Aug. Comte, Cours de la Ph. Pos., and Miss Martineau's translation. Catéchisme Pos., translated by Congreve. Positivist Calendar. Lewes, Comte's Phil. of the Sciences; Biographical Hist. of Ph. J. S. Mill, Positivism.]

PRAXEANS. Of those Monarchians who retained or tried to retain the Catholic faith that our Lord Jesus Christ is God and Man, Praxeas, the founder of this heresy, is the first named in history. [MONARCHIANS.] The heretical tenet that there is no distinction of Persons in the Godhead, coupled with the acknowledgment of a Divine Nature in our Lord, leads logically to the conclusion that the Father was incarnate and suffered. Whence, although he himself shrunk from the inference, Praxeas is reckoned with the Patripassians. He did not form a schismatical party. Philaster states that the Sabellians, called also Patripassians and Praxeans, were cast out of the Church [Hær. liv.], but we cannot infer from this that Praxeas himself was excommunicated.

Our knowledge of Praxeas is derived almost entirely from Tertullian's treatise against him. Augustine, as well as Philaster, names him and his followers under the heresy of Sabellius; and excepting from Tertullian, we have only the bare mention of his name as a heretic. From Tertullian it appears that he came to Rome from Asia, and the words of Tertullian, "œconomiam intelligere nolunt etiam Græci," appear to contain an allusion to his nation. It is probable that he learnt his heresy from a school in Proconular Asia which produced Noëtus. [NOËTIANS.] If he held his heresy while in Asia he can scarcely have been, as he is often said to have been, a Montanist. There was a connection between the later Montanists and the Sabellians; but the earlier Montanists were free from Sabellianism. Tertullian's words imply no more than that Praxeas had in Asia become acquainted with the character of Montanist pretensions and doctrine. [MONTANISTS.] In Asia Praxeas had suffered imprisonment ("de jactatione martyrii inflatus, ob solum et simplex et breve carceris tædium," is the polemical notice of it), and with the credit attaching to a confessor he preached his false doctrine at Rome. Whether the doctrine met with resistance, toleration or favour is not told,¹ but that Praxeas' endeavours to propagate it had but little effect we are entitled to infer from the silence of Hippolytus. The Refutation of Heresies was called forth by this very controversy, and Hippolytus details carefully the tenets of Noëtus, and the action of the Bishop of Rome with regard to them. Had Praxeas prepared the way to any considerable extent for Noëtus, some notice of his influence would surely have been given, whereas all that can be said is, that in the separate tract against Noëtus, the opening words will include, but without naming, disciples of Praxeas joining Noëtus. It is easy to suppose that Victor, discovering the heresy of Praxeas, and not wishing, for his own sake, to disgrace one upon whose information he had acted, and by whom perhaps he had been influenced in the matter of the Montanists, quietly sent Praxeas from Rome. From Rome Praxeas went into Africa.² There he held a dispute, probably with Tertullian, acknowledged his error, and delivered to the Church a formal recantation. But he returned again to his errors, and Tertullian, now a Montanist, wrote his Tract in confutation of them.

The date at which Praxeas arrived at Rome, and the length of his stay there, are not accurately known, but he reached Africa before Tertullian became a Montanist [Tertull. adv. Prax. i.]. Different dates, from A.D. 199 to 205, are assigned for this latter event. The history of the Montanists is best understood by supposing Praxeas to have been at Rome in Victor's time, and the date of Tertullian's Montanism to have been the earlier date.

Praxeas held that there is only one Divine Person, that the Word and the Holy Ghost are not distinct substances; arguing that an admission of distinct Personalities necessarily infers three Gods, and that the identity of the Persons is required to preserve the Divine Monarchy. He applied the titles which in Holy Scripture are descriptive of Deity to the Father alone; and urged particularly the words from the Old Testament, "I am God, and beside Me there is no God," and from the New Testament the expressions, "I and My Father are One," "He who hath seen Me hath seen the Father," "I am in My Father, and My Father in Me." While Tertullian unhesitatingly charges Praxeas with holding Patripassian tenets as necessarily following from his principles, Praxeas himself appears to have shrunk from the inference. "Ergo nec compassus est Pater Filio; sic enim directam blasphemiam in Patrem veriti, diminui eam hoc modo sperant, concedentes jam Patrem et Filium duos esse; si Filius quidem patitur, Pater vero compatitur. Stulti et in hoc. Quid est enim compati, quam cum alio pati? Porro, si impassibilis Pater, utique et impassibilis. Aut si compassibilis, utique passibilis" [Tertull. adv. Prax. xxix.].

² We take "hic quoque" in Tertullian's "Fruticaverant avenæ Præcanæ; hic quoque superseminatæ," etc. to mean Carthage; and that Tertullian speaks of himself in "per quem traductæ," etc.

The course of controversy brought out, in the example of the Praxeans, the second and altered position which Monarchians are obliged to assume when pressed by the difficulties of their original position. It is shewn, as Tertullian remarks, that they are driven to conclusions involving the elements of Gnosticism. The Praxeans, when confuted on all sides on the distinction between the Father and the Son, distinguished, in the Person of our Lord, the Jesus from the Christ. They understood "the Son to be flesh—that is, man—that is, Jesus; and the Father to be Spirit—that is, God—that is, Christ." Thus Tertullian says, "They who contend that the Father and the Son are one and the same, do in fact now begin to divide them rather than to unite them. Such a monarchy as this they learned, it may be, in the school of the Valentinus" [ibid. xxvii.]. Now this separation of Jesus from Christ was common to all the Gnostics. They were unanimous in denying Christ to have been born. Jesus and Christ were to them two separate Beings, and the Æon Christ descended upon Jesus at His Baptism. The difference between them and the Praxeans appears to be that they would not say that Jesus was the Son of God, whereas the Praxeans are represented as arguing from the angel's words to Mary, that the Holy Thing born of her was the flesh, and that therefore the flesh was the Son of God. Tertullian shews in opposition to them that the Word was incarnate by birth.

In Praxean doctrine then, in its second stage, we have Jesus called the Son of God, solely, it will follow, on account of a miraculous birth: Christ, or the Presence of the Father, residing in Jesus: Jesus suffering, and Christ (= the Father) impassibilem sed compatientem. The interval between this and Gnostic doctrine is easily bridged over; and we have the cause of the comparisons and identifications that are often made of Sabellianism with Gnosticism. [MONARCHIANS.]

The heresy of Praxeas, as distinguished from that of Noëtus, did not make much progress. It was almost unknown in Africa in the time of Optatus [i. 37].

PRECISIANS. [PURITANS.]

PREDESTINARIANS. Those who maintain that God's foreknowledge of all things necessitates His predestination from eternity of the righteous to everlasting life, and of the wicked to everlasting death.

Some traces of this doctrine are to be found in the language which was used by St. Augustine in his refutation of Pelagianism, and the author of Prædestinatus speaks of those who corrupted the doctrine of St. Augustine into a heresy. These he calls Predestinarians, and it is supposed that they were the monks of Adrumetum, who are said to have thus treated St. Augustine's language. But the earliest authentic instance in which the doctrine was brought forward in its extreme form is that of Gottschalk [*—868], a monk first of Fulda, and afterwards of Orbais in the diocese of Soissons. While he was on a pilgrimage to Rome, in A.D. 847, Gottschalk preached this doctrine of a twofold predestination in so open a manner as to attract the attention of Rabanus Maurus, who charged him with heresy as teaching that God predestines some to sin. The question was brought before a council of bishops at Mayence, of which city Rabanus was archbishop, in the following year [A.D. 848], when Gottschalk maintained that Christ died only for the elect, and that the rest of mankind were inevitably predestined to eternal perdition [Mansi, Concil. xiv. 914]. This doctrine being condemned by the council, Gottschalk was sent to his metropolitan, Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, who called another council at Chiersey in 849. Here he was defended by Ratramnus, the opponent of PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS in the Eucharistic controversy, and also by Remigius, afterwards Archbishop of Lyons; but notwithstanding these powerful supporters he was condemned a second time, and ordered to undergo the penalty of flogging, which the Rule of St. Benedict imposed upon monks who troubled the Church. After this condemnation, Gottschalk was imprisoned in the monastery of Hantvilliers, where he died, without being brought to recant his opinions, about the year 868. [Ibid. 919.]

While the friends of Gottschalk were endeavouring to obtain his absolution and release, Hincmar put forward Johannes Scotus Erigena to answer them, which he did in 851 in his treatise "de Prædestinatione," in which he raised up a cloud of adversaries by the freedom with which he contradicted the established doctrines of the Church as to the nature of good and evil. Further controversy being thus aroused, Hincmar summoned a second council at Chiersey in 853, which confirmed the decision as to the real doctrine of the Church arrived at by the previous council [ibid. 995]. A rival council was called by the opposite party from the provinces of Lyons, Vienne and Arles, which met at Valence in 855. But instead of fully confirming the opinion of Gottschalk, this council considerably modified it, by declaring that although sin is foreknown by God, it is not so predestined as to make it inevitably necessary that it should be committed [ibid. xv. 1]. Hincmar now wrote two works on the subject, one of which is not extant, and the other entitled "De Prædestinatione Dei et Libero Arbitrio, adversus Gottschalkum at ceteros Prædestinatianos." Having thus explained his views at length, they were substantially accepted in the form of six doctrinal canons by the Synod of Langres, and by that of Toul [A.D. 859] held at Savonnières a few days afterwards [ibid. 525-7], and thus the controversy terminated. [Manguin, Collect. auctor. de Prædest. et Gratia. 1650. Ussher, Gotteschalci et Prædest. contro. Hist. Cellot, Hist. Gotteschalci Prædest. 1655.]

During the Middle Ages there were but few Divines who held strong Predestinarian opinions, the most conspicuous of those who did so being Thomas Bradwardine [A.D. 1290-1349], Warden of Merton College, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. His work on the subject is entitled "De Causa Dei contra Pelagium, et de Virtute causarum, ad suos Mertonenses," and in this he gave free-will so low a place that he may be almost called a Necessitarian.

At the time of the Reformation, however, the subject of Predestination was revived by a controversy between Erasmus and Luther, the former writing an able "Diatribe de Libero Arbitrio" in 1524, and Luther following it up with his halting treatise "de Servo Arbitrio," in which he went so near to the Predestinarians as to deny that any free-will can exist in man before he has received the gift of faith. Calvin exceeded all previous Predestinarians in the dreadful dogma of the Divine decrees which he enunciated [CALVINISTS]; and in later years the controversies of the MOLINISTS and the JANSENISTS on the subject of free-will were carried on with great acrimony [Sismondi, Hist. Prædest. in Zachar. Thesaur. Theol. ii. 199]. The Scotch Presbyterians and the English Puritans followed Calvin too closely not to be Predestinarians in the strictest sense. The later Low Church party in the Church of England have tempered down the opinions of their Puritan predecessors, and are not often disposed to go beyond the doctrine of "Predestination to Life," as stated in the 17th of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, which carefully excludes the double Predestination of Gottschalk and the Predestinarians. At the census of 1851 two congregations calling themselves "Predestinarians" were returned.

PREPON. An Assyrian disciple of the heretic Marcion, living when Hippolytus wrote his Refutation of all Heresies, about the end of the second, or early in the third, century. He is named also in Theodoret's account of Apelles [Theodor. Hæc fab. i. 25]. Hippolytus states that the principles of Prepon were laid down in a work which he inscribed to Bardesanes; but he appears to have diverged from Marcion only in alleging "that what is just constitutes a third principle, and that it is placed intermediate between what is good and bad." This intermediate principle Hippolytus identifies with the "Musa," or impartial Reason, of Empedocles, a myth to whom is attributed the restoration to the good power Unity of what is disturbed by the wicked power Discord. [Hippol. Refut. Hæc. vii. 19.]

PRESBYTERIANS. A sect, the leading principle of which is that the ministry of the Christian Church consists of only one order, that of Presbyters or Elders. Bishops are considered to be identical with Presbyters, and Deacons to be only lay officers appointed to relieve the poor. The government and discipline of the Church rests, on the Presbyterian theory, with collective bodies of teaching (or clerical) elders, generally called "ministers," and ruling (or lay) elders—who are generally meant when "elders" are spoken of—gathered in Synods, and not with individual persons as in the Episcopal system, or with individual congregations as in the Independent system.

The founder of the Presbyterian sect was Calvin, who established the system at Geneva in the year 1541. It was established in Scotland in a modified form (with superintending presbyters in the place of bishops), under the influence of John Knox, in the year 1560; in the Genevan form under that of Andrew Melville in the year 1592: and has continued, in the latter form, to be the national religion of the Scottish people from that time to the present day. [SCOTCH KIRK.]

IN ENGLAND the principles of Presbyterianism are to be traced at work among the LOLLARDS of the fourteenth and fifteenth, and the PURITANS of the sixteenth century; but the first actual separation from the Church of England of any of those who held them took place in the year 1572, when a society was formed on the Calvinistic principle at Wandsworth, near London. "The heads of the association were Mr. Field, lecturer of Wandsworth; Mr. Smith of Mitcham; Mr. Crane of Roehampton; Mr. Wilcox, Standen, Jackson, Bonharn, Saintloe, and Edmonds; to whom were afterwards joined Mr. Travers, Charke, Barber, Gardiner, Crook, Egerton, and a number of very considerable laymen.¹ On the 20th of November eleven elders were chosen, and their offices described in a register, entitled 'The Orders of Wandsworth.' This was the first Presbyterian Church in England. All imaginable care was taken to keep their proceedings private, but the bishop's eye was upon them, who gave immediate intelligence to the High Commission, upon which the Queen issued out a proclamation for putting the Act of Uniformity in execution; but though the Commissioners knew of the Presbytery, they could not discover the members of it, nor prevent others being erected in the neighbouring counties" [Neal's Hist. Purit. i. 301, ed. 1732]. There is no trace, however, of any large number of Presbyterian congregations existing before the Civil War. Heylin says that after establishing that at Wandsworth the sect was restrained from "practising any further" by the Queen's proclamation for Uniformity, and also by the odium brought upon separatists through the fanatic act of Peter Burchet in stabbing Sir John Hawkins [Heylin's Hist. Presb. 275]. The Puritans had, in fact, about this time, devised a plan by which they could carry out the principles of Presbyterianism without leaving the Church; and this, probably, is the true reason why so few separate congregations were formed by them. But as early as June 28th, 1576, a Presbytery was set up for the four Channel Islands—Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, and Sark—Cartwright having gone for the purpose to Guernsey, and Snape to Jersey. The progress of Presbyterian principles within the Church, and of the ultimate establishment of the Presbyterian system during the Commonwealth, is traced out in another article. [PURITANS.]

At the Restoration, many of the 800 ministers who vacated the benefices of the Church under the operation of the Act of Uniformity [NONCONFORMISTS] were doubtless Presbyterians; but the greater number were Independents, who were much less inclined to accept Episcopacy than the party which had already lived under its shadow for about three quarters of a century. On the passing of the Toleration Act, however, in the year 1689, Presbyterian meeting-houses began to be erected in considerable numbers. Before the end of the century, as many as fifty-nine were reckoned in Yorkshire, and it is asserted by Presbyterian writers that there were as many as 800 congregations of Presbyterians distributed through the several counties of England. They became one of the "three denominations" who received the recognition of the State, and were permitted to petition the Crown in a corporate capacity; and in the business meetings of deputies from these denominations the Presbyterians had two representatives for one Baptist and one Independent.

In 1691 an attempt was made to bring about a doctrinal union between the Independents and the Presbyterians. The opposition of the two sects to each other during the latter days of the Commonwealth had established a very bitter feud between them; but it was now seen that they could contend against the Church much more vigorously when united than when separated into two bodies. Terms of union were therefore drawn up under the title of "Heads of Agreement assented to by the United Ministers in and about London, formerly called Presbyterian and Congregational," and these were accepted by a large number of each sect in London and in the country districts also. Almost immediately afterwards, however, dissensions arose between the two sects in consequence of the controversy about Dr. Crisp's publications [CRISPITES], and after many hickering papers had been printed on either side, the union was broken off in the year 1696. [History of Union, etc., and the causes of the breach of it, 1698.]

But notwithstanding the number of Presbyterian meeting-houses which had been erected, the organization of Presbyterianism was very imperfectly kept up. The "discipline" which has flourished so well in Scotland under the form of

"kirk-session" never obtained a firm footing in England, nor has the sect ever possessed a completely organized system of Presbyteries, Synods, and General Assembly. It was probably the absence of this system, with its close espionage of the doctrine preached by Presbyterian ministers, which led some of the latter into a laxity of opinion through which they quickly passed from Calvinism to Unitarianism. In the year 1719, two preachers of the sect at Exeter, who had adopted the Arian views then becoming so fashionable, were turned out of their chapels by the trustees for refusing to subscribe to the doctrine of our Lord's Divinity. On May of that year 19 out of the 75 Presbyterian ministers of Devon and Cornwall refused to accept the test offered them, which was subscription to the second of the Thirty-Nine Articles; while at a meeting at Salters' Hall 57 out of 110 voted against requiring from ministers any declaration of faith in the Holy Trinity.

From that time the Presbyterians are little heard of as a distinct sect in England. Nearly all their ministers and trustees became Unitarian, and hence their meeting-houses became generally alienated from their original purpose. Of 206 Unitarian meeting-houses in England and Wales in the year 1824, as many as 170 had originally been Presbyterian; but many of these it appears were kept up entirely because they had endowments, these being sometimes received by ministers who had no attendants at their chapels, so much had Presbyterianism declined in England. [Manchester Socinian Controv. xliv.] The few congregations which remained true to the Westminster Confession of Faith were in the northern counties, where sympathy with Scottish neighbours tended to keep alive the flame of Presbytery after it had died out in those parts of England removed from Scottish influences.

Within the last half-century there has been some revival of the sect; and in the year 1836 it was reorganized under the rule of the "Synod of the Presbyterian Church in England in connection with the Church of Scotland." Attempts to bring about an actual union of the English with the Scottish body failed through legal impediments, it being found that such an union would carry the jurisdiction of the Northern Establishment into forbidden regions. In 1844, therefore, the name of the English portion of the sect was changed to that of "The Presbyterian Church in England." This now numbers seven presbyteries, and about seventy congregations. In addition to these there are also about the same number of congregations belonging to the UNITED PRESBYTERIANS, and fifteen which are outlying congregations of the Scottish Kirk.

In IRELAND as well as in England there was a strong Puritan section of the clergy holding Presbyterian principles during the earlier years of the seventeenth century; but the party was not consolidated into a separate community until the Civil War broke out, when, on June 10th, 1642, a presbytery was established at Carrickfergus, which soon became the parent of others in various parts of Ulster; and the Covenant was taken by a considerable proportion of the people of Ulster in the summer of 1644. While the Civil War was going on in Scotland great numbers of the Scotch emigrated to the North of Ireland, and these made a large addition to its Presbyterian population, a strong bond of fellowship being also established between the two communities. For a time their ministers in Ireland were silenced by Cromwell because they refused to take the "Engagement" of fidelity to the Commonwealth; but for the last five or six years of his administration he treated the Irish Presbyterians with less severity, and at the Restoration they numbered nearly eighty congregations, with seventy ministers. Sixty-one of these were obliged to give up the benefices into which they had intruded—Jeremy Taylor deprived thirty-six in one day—and only seven out of the seventy conformed to the Church by receiving Episcopal orders. Within a few years the Presbyterians of Ulster were however organized into a compact sect, and in 1672 a "Regium Donum" of £700 a year was granted to their ministers by Charles II., a sum soon afterwards increased to £1200, and at the Union to about £15,000. The political and social schisms which have broken out among the Presbyterians of Scotland, dividing them into BURGHERS, ANTI-BURGHERS, etc., have been faithfully reproduced on a smaller scale among those of the North of Ireland, but their two principal divisions are into a "Synod of Ulster" and a "Presbytery of Antrim." The whole number of Presbyterian congregations in Ireland is about 600.

In AMERICA the Presbyterians first obtained a footing in the opening years of the eighteenth century, through the immigration of Scotch and Irish members of the sect. The earliest organized Presbyterian congregation was one established at Philadelphia in the year 1703, but the tide of emigration soon carried over additions to their number; and they, too, quickly became subject to the same spirit of bitter controversy which characterized the Presbyterians in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and which everywhere caused the same disintegration into parties and sects on points of minute difference respecting ecclesiastical discipline. These differences were aggravated by the revival preaching of George Whitfield in the year 1739, when the "New Lights" enthusiastically sided with him, while the "Old Lights" as earnestly opposed him. This led to a separation of the former in 1741 under the name of the "Synod of New York," and the two bodies remained apart until 1758, when they once more united. In 1789 the Westminster Confession was adopted, and a General Assembly was formed, there being then 419 congregations with 188 ministers. The War of Independence broke up many of these congregations, but the sect was strengthened in 1801 by an alliance with the Congregationalists; although about the same time occurred the secession of the "Cumberland Presbyterians," or advocates for the introduction of lay-teachers where ministers regularly educated for examination by the Presbytery cannot be obtained. In the year 1834 there were 230,000 communicant Presbyterians, with 1900 ministers, in the United States. Fresh dissensions which arose led first to the abrogation of the union between the sect and that of the Congregationalists; and secondly to the separation of the "New School Presbyterians" from the "Old School Presbyterians," the former agreeing with the abrogation in question, the latter dissenting from it. The "Old School" adheres to the Westminster Confession, but the "New School," who are also called "Puritans," hold a somewhat mitigated Calvinism. The Old School Presbyterians number about 300,000 members, with 3600 chapels and 2700 ministers. The New School numbers about 130,000 members, with 1400 chapels and 1500 ministers. Both are active missionary bodies, and each possesses five colleges.

It is stated by a recent writer that the American Presbyterians are adopting a Liturgy, one being named, which is entitled "The Church Book for St Peter's, Rochester," the contents of which are, "the Order for Public Worship, the Order of Administration of Baptism, the Order of publicly receiving Baptized Persons to the Fellowship of the Church, the Order of Administering the Lord's Supper, the Marriage Service, the Funeral Service, Morning and Evening Prayers for Families, a Psalter for responsive reading, the Nicene and Athanasian Creeds, Psalms and Hymns with tunes for Congregational singing." [An English Layman's Recent Recollections of the Anglo-American Church in the United States, ii. 119.]

PRESBYTERIAN SYNOD OF SECEDERS IN IRELAND. This name was given to a section of the Irish Presbyterians formed in 1818 by an union of the BURGHERS and ANTI-BURGHERS. They were incorporated into the general body of Irish Presbyterians in 1840.

PRIMIANISTS. A local name for the Donatists at Carthage, as followers of their bishop Primian, one of the chief opponents of St. Augustine.

PRIMITIVE METHODISTS. [METHODISTS.]

PRINCEITES. A small sect established about the year 1840 by a fanatic clergyman of the extreme Evangelical school named Henry James Prince, and professing to be a new dispensation of the Holy Ghost, in Prince's person, by which the dispensation of Christ is superseded.

The founder of this sect began life as House Surgeon to the General Hospital at Bath in the year 1832, when he was twenty-one years of age. While on a visit to his brother, then Vicar of Shincliffe, near Durham, he was impressed with a desire to change his profession, and endeavoured to obtain admission as a student in Durham University. Failing in this he went, in March 1836, to Lampeter College, which had been founded by Bishop Burgess in 1822 for Welsh students; and soon after going there he organized a small body of the students on the plan of the early Oxford Methodists, under the name of the "Lampeter Brethren." These met together for prayer and "revival" under the leadership of Prince, and singular to say, devoted much time to the study of, or rather meditation upon, the Song of Solomon. Among the young men forming this association those whose names were afterwards most conspicuous were Prince, George Robinson Thomas, Lewis Price, and A. A. Rees, the last of whom became brother-in-law to Prince, but soon afterwards parted from his company. At this time Prince and his associates belonged to the extreme section of the Evangelical school, as is shewn by his "Letters addressed to his Brethren" published in 1841, and by "Brother Prince's Journal," from 1835 to 1839, which was published in 1851. In the "letters" there is a good deal of mysticism, illustrated by geometrical diagrams, on the union of souls with each other by absorption into the Divine Nature; speculations which foreshadow the subsequent fanaticism.

On leaving Lampeter in 1840, Prince first married an old Roman Catholic lady who had lodged with his mother, and was then ordained to the curacy of Charlinch near Bridgewater, the rector of the parish, Samuel Starky, being one with whom he was afterwards closely associated in the sect which he formed, but who was an absentee from his living, and a wealthy valetudinarian. At Charlinch (which was the future settlement of the sect) Prince says that "there was not," on his arrival,—"with the exception of his own household—so much as one person either converted or awakened among all the people committed to his charge;" and during fourteen months of hot Evangelical preaching, although "three persons from a neighbouring parish were converted, there did not appear to be even a stir among his own people" [Prince's Charlinch Revival, 1842, p. 5]. But although he produced no effect upon his people, Prince had by this time excited himself into the belief that the Holy Spirit had taken entire possession of him, so as to unite him with Himself. At the same time, also, the absent rector of the parish was converted to his curate's opinion by reading one of Prince's sermons when he believed himself to be dying, and he returned to Charlinch to take part in the revival. Prayer-meetings were now held at the rectory (for the rector himself was unable to speak in his church) with the usual hysterical excitement among women and children; and the proceedings in the end became so outrageous that Dr. Law, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, withdrew Prince's license as curate.

The aged and infirm wife whom the fanatic had married now died, and Prince immediately took as her successor Miss Starky, the sister of his rector, and, like that clergyman, one of his converts. Another curacy was obtained at Stoke by Clare in Suffolk, where the same proceedings were carried on as at Charlinch—a second of the Lampeter Brethren, George Robinson Thomas, taking the place of Prince at the latter place. After bearing with the revival extravagances, however, for many months, Bishop Allen took the same course that had been taken by Bishop Law, and Prince being again dismissed from his curacy, a third of the Lampeter Brethren, Price, was again left as his successor.

The transition from Evangelical notions to fanatic notions on the subject of the work of the Spirit is shewn by concluding remarks in Prince's account of the Charlinch revivals, which was printed while he was at Stoke. "Many," he says, "can bear the external piety that consists in good congregations, flourishing schools, Evangelical views, a Gospel ministry, and the various kinds of religious societies, prayer-meetings, and pious institutions now so prevalent," . . . but "few of those who are praying for the coming of the Holy Ghost would be able to bear Him if He should come," and "He would find but few vessels fitted to receive Him. . . . To all this may be added also that, when the Spirit works with extraordinary power, it must necessarily lead him by whom He works to act in some respects in an extraordinary way, so that even godly men and ministers may be induced to look on him and his doings with suspicion and distrust" [Prince's Charlinch Revival, 1842, pp. 68, 71]. The meaning of these latter words was shortly after disclosed at a meeting of the Lampeter Brethren, held at Swansea in June 1842, for the purpose of considering the best means of increasing their usefulness in the ministry. Prince took the lead, and a few weeks afterwards sent each of the Brethren a printed copy of articles of agreement, which led to the disclosure that he professed to dictate to them with the voice of God, as "the Holy Ghost personified" [Rees' Rise and Progress of the Heresy of the Rev. H. J. Prince, 1846, p. 8; Deck's Heresy of Mr. Prince, 1845]. This blasphemy was—unconsciously no doubt, for Prince was not likely to know of his predecessors in heresy—a revival of the long-enduring heresy which was maintained by the AMALRICIANS early in the twelfth century, by the WILHELMIANS of the thirteenth, and by many of the disciples of Abbot Joachim in that and later ages: a heresy which was also the logical terminus of much of the enthusiastic doctrine respecting the personal indwelling of the Holy Spirit, by which the teaching of the Puritans, the Methodists, and the Low Churchmen from whom Prince sprang, was characterized. [DICT. OF THEOL., SPIRIT, n. 2.] Rees, who would not accept Prince's claims in this extreme form, left the brotherhood and set up a "Free Church" at Sunderland, where he continued for many years. Starkey, Thomas, and Price, with some others, continued to believe in their leader, and his party was strengthened by the addition of a railway surveyor named Cobbe, who built a chapel for Thomas at Spaxton, near Charlinch, and thus formed the nucleus of the future establishment of the sect.

For it was now determined that a community should be established with Prince at its head. A temporary one, under the name of "the Agape-mone," or "Abode of Love," was set up at Weymouth, where Prince joined Starky; and, by means of exciting revivals, about two hundred persons were persuaded to join the sect of which it was the centre; their leader terrifying them with the declaration that the dispensation of grace had now closed, and that in future only those would be saved who accepted him as the Holy One of the new dispensation of the Spirit. Among those who at this time, or very shortly afterwards, joined the sect, were a number of wealthy ladies, who made over their property to Prince. From four such named Maber he obtained £10,000, from four others named Nottidge (three of whom he induced to marry his coadjutors Price, Thomas, and Cobbe) he received £24,000: and these contributions, with many smaller ones, enabled him to build a large "Agapemone" around the chapel already erected at Spaxton. The institution so established was a sumptuous abode in which the fanatic and his friends lived in the greatest luxury, not making any further efforts to extend the pretended new dispensation, but settling down to the enjoyment of the wealth acquired from the female converts: and it may be mentioned as an illustration of the life adopted, that not long afterwards, when a party of the Agapemone community visited the Great Exhibition of 1851, the quondam Evangelical curate of Charlinch was to be seen driving about Hyde Park in a carriage and four, preceded by hatless outriders, the latter riding uncovered because they were in attendance upon "the Lord" in the person of Prince.

The principle on which the sect was ultimately consolidated was that the Lord Jesus having suffered to redeem the spirit only, and left the flesh where He found it, alienated from God under the curse, Prince took upon him new flesh to redeem the flesh,¹ and whosoever believes on him will not die, but will henceforth be without sickness or pain [Mr. Prince and the Agapemone, 1858]. "The Holy Ghost fulfilled the Gospel in Brother Prince, by being and doing in him fully all that He was sent by the Father to be and to do: so that He left not anything undone in Brother Prince of all that it was in Him as the Spirit of the dispensation to perform" [Testimony of Br. Prince, Voice the Second, 62]. The journal already mentioned was published, its author says, "to exhibit to the professing Church of Christ an actual instance of the complete accomplishment by the Gospel of all that for which the Gospel was given, namely, the destruction of the work of the devil in the human soul" [Brother Prince's Journal, Pref. x.]. And he says of himself at the end: "The professing people of God under the Gospel—the Christian Church in these the last days of their dispensation—may see in him in whom their dispensation is made perfect the likeness and glory of Christ. They may see this, for one 'changed into the same image from glory to glory' is there. But what will they see?—O righteous Father, the world hath not known Thee! O holy Saviour, Thine house hath wounded Thee! O gentle Spirit, Thy people have despised Thee! Alas, my Lord, let them not see in Thy Beloved"—the title assumed by Prince—"the only one of her mother, and the choice one of her that bare her, one that has a devil and is mad, a man carnal, sensual, and selfish, a frequenter of low company, one that speaketh blasphemy, and a deceiver of the people—led by the devil into error, even whilst he was living upon Thee as truth" [ibid. xv.].

Assuming these blasphemous pretensions, Prince appointed his friends Thomas and Starky as the two "Anointed Ones," or "witnesses" spoken of in the Apocalypse, and others of his community he named the seven angels of the seven trumpets. But assuming also that "God, according to His promise, did create a new Heaven by fulfilling the Gospel in Brother Prince," the community adopted the same kind of life as that of the American PERFECTIONISTS; maintaining that there was no further necessity for prayer, and using their chapel as a luxurious drawing-room in token that the new life is a heavenly life of continual enjoyment and thanksgiving. It is also one of their tenets that those who are perfect will never suffer pain or die; and that such of their community as have died are, by that fact, proved not to have been perfect.

PRISCILLIANISTS. The early prophetesses of Montanism were Priscilla and Maximilla [Hipp. Refut. viii. 12]: and from this Priscilla the whole body of Montanists may have been called Priscillianists. But Augustine [Hær. xxvi. xxvii.], associates Priscilla with Quintilla, calling the earlier prophetess Prisca. It seems therefore that the Priscillianists are a later subdivision of the Montanists, called from a second Priscilla. Christ, it was said, revealed Himself in a female garb to her and to Quintilla. Epiphanius identifies their followers with the Artotyritæ [Hær. xlix.], adding that among them women are consecrated bishops and priests. They were also called Quintillianists.

PROCLIANISTS. One of the two sects into which the Montanists divided, and which took its name from Proclus, as the other did from Æschines. They are named by the author of the supplement to Tertullian's work de Præscriptione Hæreticorum [Hæres. viii.], as holding a common blasphemy with the Cataphrygians, but their distinctive tenet is not mentioned. Eusebius speaks of a work of Caius against Proclus, in which he silences the rashness of the Proclianists in composing new books of Scripture [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 20]. Philaster and St. Augustine say that they denied the Incarnation altogether [Philast. de Hæres. lvi.; Aug. de Hæres. lx.]: but this statement is modified by the author of Prædestinatus into a charge that they believed the Son of God to have appeared as Raphael or Gabriel had done, not by taking flesh: which was a form of Docetic heresy [Prædest. lx.]. Philaster speaks of the Proclianists as disciples of the SELEUCIANS or HERMIANS.

PROCLUS. A zealous antichristian Platonist of Athens [A.D. 410-485]. He wrote a work against Christianity in eighteen arguments, entitled Epicheiremata XVIII. contra Christianos, the substance of which is an argument that the world is eternal. The work was printed, with the confutation of John Philoponus, in Greek, at Venice in A.D. 1535, and in Latin at Lyons in A.D. 1557.

PRODICIANS. These heretics appear to be an offshoot of the Carpocratians, and the same with those who were afterwards called ADAMITES, of whom Prodicus is said by Theodoret to have been the founder [Theodor. Har. fab. i. 6]. All accounts of them come originally from the Miscellanies of Clement of Alexandria, where he speaks of them as practising the profligate habits of the Carpocratians. The Prodicians, he says, "falsely call themselves Gnostics. They say that they are by nature the children of the Supreme God, but they live and will in the abuse of their lineage and freedom, for all their will is licentiousness; they hold themselves bound by no law, and claim to be above all control as royal children and lords of the Sabbath. The law, they say, is not written for the king." He goes on to describe them as practising the Antinomian life indicated by these principles [Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 4], and as rejecting the use of prayer and worship, because they had risen above the bondage of the Demiurge [ibid. vii. 7]. They claimed also to possess some secret books of Zoroaster [ibid. i. 15]. Prodicus is associated with Valentinus by Tertullian, but without any particulars being given of his heresy [Tertull. adv. Prax. iii.].

PROGRESS, SCHOOL OF. [RATIONALISTS.]

PROTERIANS. The Catholic party in Alexandria which did not submit to Peter Mongus, the Monophysite patriarch, whose adherents were called "Petrites," but continued to maintain the orthodox faith for which Proterius was persecuted and murdered. [MONOPHYSITES.]

PROTESTANTS. A name originally given to a party in Germany which protested, in the year 1529, against a decree of the Diet of Spire respecting religion. It was afterwards assumed by Lutherans and Calvinists in general to distinguish themselves from Catholics, especially from Roman Catholics.

The religious divisions which had been caused in Germany by the disputes between Luther and the Ultramontane party were met at first by an edict of the Emperor Charles V. and his dependant princes at the Diet of Worms [A.D. 1521], in which Luther and his party were declared to be enemies of the Empire, the princes engaging to execute this edict to the utmost of their power by suppressing the new sect. The Lutheran party proving too strong for this, another Diet of the princes, which met under the presidency of the Archduke Ferdinand, the Emperor's brother, at Spire, in Bavaria [A.D. 1526], tempered the Edict of Worms by requiring that all controversies should cease, and decreeing that each prince should be at liberty to settle the affairs of religion within his own dominion as he should see fit, until a general council of the Church was called for the determination of all disputed questions. Three years later another Diet of the princes met, under Ferdinand, at Spire [A.D. 1529], at which the Edict of 1526 was revoked by a majority of them, and all changes in religion were declared to be unlawful until they had been sanctioned by a general council. Against this revocation by the majority a remonstrance was drawn up by the minority, which consisted of the Elector of Saxony, the Marquis of Brandenburg, the Duke of Brunswick-Lüneburg, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Count of Anhalt. This remonstrance was read by them in public on April 19th, 1529, taking the form of a protest against the act of the Diet, and an appeal to a general council. Fourteen of the cities—Strasburg, Nuremberg, Ulm, Constance, Lindau, Memmingen, Kempten, Nördlingen, Heilbronn, Reutlingen, Issna, St. Gall, Weissenburg, and Windesheim—afterwards subscribed this protest, "and this," wrote Sleidan, a few years afterwards, "is the origin of the name of 'the Protestants,' which has now become famous, and has got into common use not only in Germany but among other nations also" [Sleidan, de Statu Relig. 2nd ed. 1559, p. 68].

The name was not accepted cordially by the English Reformers as a designation for members of the Church of England. Thus Bishop Ridley wrote in the year 1555: ". . . and to speak plain, and as some of them do odiously call each other, whether they be Protestants, Pharisees, Papists, or Gospellers;" ". . . call me a Protestant who listeth, I pass not thereof" [Ridley on the Lord's Supper, 9, 14, Parker Soc. ed.]. "It hath been always a Popish practice," wrote Calfhill of image worship in the year 1565, "but that of men professing the Gospel, of Protestants (as ye call them), there hath been any such delusion is not in any writing of any age to be found" [Calfhill's Answ. to Martiall on the Cross, 134, Parker Soc. ed.]. This shyness of the name extended down a century later, for when the Upper House of Convocation proposed an address to the Crown in the year 1689, in which Convocation was made to thank William III. for the zeal which he shewed "for the Protestant religion in general, and the Church of England in particular," the Deans, Archdeacons, and Clergy of the Lower House would not consent to the address being presented with these words in it, and stood out until it was altered to thanks for the King's pious zeal, and care "for the honour, peace, advantage, and establishment of the Church of England: whereby we doubt not, the interest of the Protestant religion in all other Protestant churches, which is dear to us, will be the better secured under the influence of your Majesty's government and protection" [Cardwell's Conf. 444, 446].

The feeling thus shewn in previous centuries has also extended to High Churchmen of modern times, who have always objected to the designation of Protestant as being [1] one of too negative a character to express at all justly the principle of Catholic resistance to the uncatholic pretensions and practices of Rome: and [2] as being a name which is used by so many sects as to be inclusive even of heresy. The fact indicated in the second objection has led to grave misunderstandings respecting the principles of the Church of England on the part of the Continental and the Eastern Churches.

PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS. The term Confessions of Faith is applied primarily, and with most propriety, to those summaries of the Christian faith which were put forth and accepted from time to time by the early Church, and are known to us as the Apostles', the Nicene, and the Athanasian Creeds. Secondly, when men began to deviate from the Catholic faith, they were anxious to embody their new doctrines in forms analogous to the orthodox creeds; and the term "Confession of Faith" was used to denote the creeds of heretical bodies, such as that submitted by the Arians at the Council of Rimini [A.D. 359]. Thirdly, when the great schisms from the Catholic Church took place in the sixteenth century in the various countries of Central Europe, the numerous Protestant communities which sprang into existence severally drew up lengthy documents known in history as confessions of faith, consisting in most cases of between twenty and forty articles, in which were detailed the various new views of doctrine and practice, which were to form a substitute for, or an addition to, the Catholic faith of more than fifteen hundred years.

It would be inappropriate here to discuss at length the controversial question as to how far the various views put forward in these confessions of faith are consistent with the primitive doctrines of the Catholic Church, or how far they may be excused or justified as a reaction against certain extravagances of the mediæval Church; yet a few reflections of a general character suggest themselves. [1] The mere existence of such Confessions of Faith as binding on all or any of the members of a Christian community is inconsistent with the great principles on which the Protestant bodies justified their separation from the Church, the right of private judgment. Has not any member as just a right to criticize and to reject them as his forefathers had a right to reject the Catholic creeds or the canons of general councils? [2] They appear to violate another prominent doctrine of the Reformers, the sufficiency of Holy Scripture to salvation. If the Bible alone is enough, what need is there of adding articles? If it is rejoined that they are not additions to but merely explanations of the Word of God, the further question arises, amid the many explanations, more or less at variance with each other given by the different sects of Protestantism, who is to decide which is the true one? [3] Their professed object being to secure uniformity, the experience of three hundred years has proved to us what may not have been foreseen by their originators, that they have had a diametrically opposite result, and have been productive, not of union, but of variance.

As it would be impossible within the limits of a work like the present to insert the original documents in full, a short account is annexed of the principal Protestant confessions of faith, with a general view of their contents, a more detailed description being given of the two confessions of Augsburg and Basle, the former as deviating least, the latter as being one of the most widely removed from the standard of Catholic teaching.

Confession of Augsburg [A.D. 1530]. This formal statement of faith was drawn up by Melancthon, Jonas, Pomeranus, and others, at the suggestion of the Elector of Saxony, for presentation to Charles V., and the States of the German Empire. Clement VII. who was Pope at this time, had been urged to call a council in which the new tenets and certain alleged grievances might be openly and fairly discussed; but he took a different view of the policy which it was desirable to pursue, and called upon the Emperor to stamp out heresy by violent acts of repression. Charles, however, having a Turkish war in view, was unwilling to encounter a civil war, and procured permission to summon a local council at Augsburg for the purpose of allaying divisions. Here the Confession which takes its name from that town, although it was merely an enlarged form of articles previously drawn up at Schwabach and Marburg, was presented to the Emperor in Latin and German, being read aloud in the latter language by Christopher Bayer, Chancellor of Saxony.

The Confession of Augsburg consists of twenty-eight articles, the first twenty-one being definitions of doctrine, the latter seven protests against error in practice. The first article treated on the Unity of the Godhead and the Trinity. The second on original sin. The third on the Two Natures, and the Incarnation, the Atonement, the Descent to Hell, the Ascension, and the future coming to judgment of Jesus Christ. The fourth on justification by faith; which faith, it is explained in the fifth and sixth articles, is formed by the Holy Spirit, ordinarily imparted to Christians through the ministration of the Word and Sacraments, and productive of good works as its fruits, which are enjoined by God, and are to be performed in a spirit of obedience to Him. The seventh asserts that there is only one Church, whose unity consists in identity of doctrine and sacraments, not in uniformity of ceremonial or practice. The eighth that sacraments do not lose their effect though administered by evil persons. The ninth that Baptism is necessary to salvation, and that Infant Baptism is to be retained. The tenth asserts the real presence in the Eucharist, the oldest Latin copy in these words—"That in the Lord's Supper the Body and Blood of Christ are truly present and distributed to those who eat." The German translation thus: "That the true Body and true Blood of the Lord are indeed present under the species of bread and wine in the Lord's Supper." The eleventh ordains that private confession should be retained, but that an exact enumeration of sins committed is not always necessary. The twelfth asserts that penitence consists in contrition and faith, but that it is not genuine unless accompanied by its inseparable fruits, good works. The thirteenth that faith in the promises annexed to them is necessary for a beneficial use of the sacraments, which are not mere signs on man's part of his profession of Christianity, but pledges of God's love towards him. The fourteenth that only those duly appointed may preach and administer the sacraments. The fifteenth that church ceremonies should be universally observed, though not as in themselves necessary to salvation, nor as meriting grace, nor as a satisfaction for sin. In the sixteenth the authority of civil magistrates is declared to be legitimate. The seventeenth asserts the future coming of Christ to judgment, and the eternity of His rewards and punishments. The eighteenth that the human will and reason cannot be absolutely just in their decisions unless illumined by the Holy Spirit. The nineteenth that God is not the cause of sin. The twentieth that good works are indispensable, though the efficacious cause of the remission of sin is the meritorious sacrifice of Christ, and not those works in themselves. The twenty-first that on this principle the merits of the saints are to be considered as objects for our own imitation, but not as possessed of any efficacy apart from the merits of Christ. The last seven articles consisted of protests against certain abuses which were represented as having recently sprung up in the Church.

The first against the withholding of the cup from the laity. The second against the compulsory celibacy of the clergy. The third against the saying masses for money, special words being introduced to prove that these words were not aimed against the mass itself (retinetur enim missa apud nos, et summâ reverentiâ celebratur). The fourth was against the necessity of a special enumeration of sins in auricular confession. The fifth against the particular enumeration of the varieties of food to be abstained from at times of fasting. The sixth, against irrevocable monastic vows. The seventh against the growth of spiritual power beyond its proper limits, and its interference in secular matters and with royal prerogatives.

In conclusion, it was hinted that other abuses might have been named, such as indulgences, pilgrimages, the interference of regulars with the duties of the secular clergy, and a few other points, but that they were omitted because the compilers wished to manifest their conformity to the Catholic Church, both in doctrine and ceremonies, and the absence of any intention on their part to introduce any new or impious dogmas.

Only a few persons on the Catholic side, among them the Archbishop of Cologne and the Bishop of Augsburg, were content to accept this confession as it stood. A committee was immediately formed by the majority to draw up a confutation, which, while accepting certain of the articles, was a direct rejection of others, especially the last seven. This document was submitted to the Emperor on August 3rd of the same year. He at first ordered the reforming party to accept it, but finding his directions ineffectual, allowed a conference to be held on August 16th between Eck, Bernard of Hagen, and Vehe on the Catholic side, and Melancthon, Pontanus, and Heller on the Lutheran. This conference came to nothing. The Emperor then, having been previously authorized by the Pope, held out a prospect of a general council, if the Reformers would allow ecclesiastical matters to remain in statu quo until it could be summoned together, an offer which would probably have been accepted had it been made a few months earlier, but which was now unanimously rejected; and the conference separated on November 19th without any conciliation having been effected.

The Confession of Augsburg—rejected by the Catholic Church as too Protestant, and by the Anabaptists and Swiss reformers as too Catholic, especially on account of its assertion of the Real Presence in the Holy Eucharist—became eventually [A.D. 1577] the distinctive formula of the Lutherans. Luther himself said respecting it, in a letter addressed to the Elector of Saxony [May 15th, 1530]: “It pleases me extremely, and I do not know how to alter it for the better.”¹ An apology for it, composed by Melancthon, and published A.D. 1531, is also still considered one of the symbolical books of the Lutherans.

Confession of Basle [A.D. 1532-6]. This was also called the Helvetic or Mylhusian Confession, and is of importance as being one of the most widely accepted of the many confessions of faith promulgated in the sixteenth century. It was composed originally in German only, by the ministers of the Protestants at Basle, who met together under a feeling, shared by many others, that the Lutheran Confession of Augsburg retained far too much of both Catholic doctrine and practice, especially with reference to the sacraments and sacramental ordinances. This first edition, known as that of Basle, became more strictly the Helvetic Confession, where it had been reconstructed [A.D. 1536] by Bucer, Capito, and the theologians of Wurtemberg, in the name of all the Swiss churches, and had been accepted by them in the following year at a synod held at Smalkalden. Another edition, having been revised by Bullinger, was published in Latin soon after A.D. 1560, and after being publicly accepted by the magistrates of Mulhausen, was approved and subscribed generally by all the Protestant Evangelical communities. In a short Latin preface, it is said to be accepted by all the “ministers of the Church of Christ” in Switzerland (Zurich, Berne, Mulhausen, Geneva, Schaffhausen, and other leading towns being especially named), “as a testimony to all the faithful that they remain in the unity of the true and ancient Church of Christ, teaching no new or erroneous doctrines, and having no connection with any sects or heresies; a fact of which all pious persons are invited to assure themselves by its perusal.”

The Confession of Basle consisted of twenty-seven articles of various length. The first five treated of Holy Scripture, which each man was to interpret for himself by the light of love and faith, rejecting human traditions, however probable or generally received, if based on any other principle of interpretation. The sixth treated of one God and Three Persons. The seventh, eighth, and ninth on the fall, original sin, and free-will, the latter meaning our independent ability to do evil, but our inability to do good, unless prevented by the grace of God. The tenth and eleventh on the Person, Nature, and Work of Christ. The twelfth and thirteenth assert that under the Gospel we are saved by the merits of Christ only, and not by good works. The fourteenth that there is an invisible church, whose limits are known to God only, though possessed of external rites and discipline. The fifteenth, that the power of the keys is not confined to any assigned order of men, but is freely bestowed by God on what persons and in what manner He will. The sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth, while rejecting the Pope, grant the wisdom of retaining for the Church the power of setting apart pious and competent persons for the ministry. The nineteenth describes the duties of ministers to be the preaching forgiveness of sin through Christ, constant prayer for the people, the study and defence of the Bible, and the admonishing, and, if necessary, excluding by church discipline those who lead scandalous lives. The twentieth treats of the sacraments, which are not only bare signs of union but symbols of divine grace, and like the ministry of the Word, are the means through which God, the sole Fountain of grace, is pleased to work. The twenty-first of Baptism, which is to be administered to infants, because charity presupposes the offspring of Christian parents to be of the number of the elect. The twenty-second of the Lord's Supper, in which men contemplate Christ crucified, and feed on him by faith (quæ quidem percipiuntur fide—sanguinem fidei oculis intuentes, ac salutem nostram non sine cœlestis vitæ gustu meditantes). The twenty-third, twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth of church assemblies, from which vases, vestments, torches, altars, gold, silver, images, and all such profane adjuncts are to be excluded, and all those who teach new or impious doctrines are to be banished. The twenty-sixth of civil magistrates, whose authority is recognised, and part of whose duty is considered to be the defence of true religion by the suppression of blasphemy. The twenty-seventh of marriage, which ought to have both a religious and a civil sanction, and of monastic celibacy, which is declared to be an abominable superstition.

This confession was received as orthodox by all the Reformed non-Lutheran bodies in Switzerland, France, and Flanders, and eventually became the standard of doctrine of all Protestant Evangelical Churches.

Confession of Belgium [A.D. 1561]. In the earlier years of the Reformation, the Belgian Protestants designated themselves "Associates of the Conference of Augsburg," assuming this title from political motives, because Lutherans were regarded at the Spanish Court as more orthodox, and therefore more tolerable than the disciples of Calvin; but in A.D. 1561 they ventured to produce a confession of their own. It was first composed by Guy de Bres in the Walloon language, and was printed in French in the following year [A.D. 1562]. It was subsequently approved by the Protestant Synod of Flanders [A.D. 1579], and confirmed at the Synod of Dort, at the same time that the five Arminian Articles, which had been put out nine years previously, were condemned [A.D. 1619], and again at the Hague [A.D. 1651].

In its contents it is very similar to that adopted by the French Reformed Church, its tone being ultra-Zwinglian on all points connected with the Sacraments, especially the Holy Communion, in which the elements are declared to be mere symbols, which ought only to be received by those who are regenerate, not by Baptism, but by the eternal decree of Almighty God. [Art. 35.]

Confession of Bohemia [A.D. 1532]. This was published in Bohemia after having been submitted for the approval of Luther, Melancthon, and the academy of Wurtemberg. It was afterwards formally presented to Ferdinand, King of Hungary and Bohemia [A.D. 1535].

Gallican Confession. The first Protestants in France were called Lutherans, and were inclined to the doctrines of that Reformer, but the proximity of Geneva and Lausanne, and the zeal of Calvin, Beza, and others, led them to adopt those more fully developed Protestant tenets whose holders are known in history as the Huguenots (Eingenossen, confederates). Their first synod was held privately in Paris [A.D. 1559], at which a confession, a catechism, and a directory of public worship drawn up by Calvin were adopted. A fuller confession of faith, compiled by Beza, was presented to Charles IX. at Poisy [A.D. 1561], as that of the United French Protestants, signed by the Queen of Navarre, her son Henry IV., the Prince of Condé, and other distinguished persons. Five years afterwards a copy was sent to all the French pastors, and having been accepted by them, it has been considered since that time [A.D. 1566] as the confession of faith of the French Protestant Church.

Confession of Heidelberg or Palatine Confession [A.D. 1575]. The Palatine countries oscillated during the greater part of the sixteenth century between the two forms of Reformation presented by Luther and Calvin. Lutheranism having first got a footing in the country, was abolished by Frederick III., Elector Palatine [A.D. 1560], restored by Lewis [A.D. 1576], and again abolished by John Casimir [A.D. 1583]. The Palatine Catechism composed by Zechariah Ursinus in 1563, and the Confession, which was drawn up in 1575, were received by the whole body of Protestants in those parts, and obtained recognition at the Synod of Dort [A.D. 1619].

The Scottish Confession [A.D. 1560] was drawn up by Knox and his associates, and was ratified by a Parliament held at Edinburgh, in which the Reforming party were supreme. It was subscribed by James VI. in his youth, and again received public recognition in A.D. 1590, 1596, and 1638, in which year it was formally submitted and approved along with the National Covenant at a General Assembly held at Glasgow. [SCOTTISH KIRK.]

burg were not contented with much of the tenor of that confession, especially with reference to the Holy Eucharist; and, in consequence, in the following year the four imperial cities of Strasburg, Constance, Menningen and Lindau accepted another confession which had probably been drawn up in the interim by Martin Bucer, and which was presented by them to Charles V. They agreed in the main with the confession of the preceding year; but their modified views of the doctrine of the Holy Communion were thus expressed: "All that the Evangelists, Paul and the holy Fathers have written respecting the venerable Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ our preachers teach with the greatest fidelity. Hence, with singular earnestness, they constantly proclaim that goodness of Christ towards His followers whereby, no less now than at His last Supper, to all His sincere disciples, as oft as they repeat this Supper, He condescends to give by the Sacraments His real Body and His real Blood, to be truly eaten and drunken, as the food and drink of their souls, by which they are nourished to eternal life; so that He lives and abides in them, and they in Him." Soon afterwards, for the sake of union, they dropped their distinctive views, and subscribing to the Confession of Augsburg, became part of the Lutheran Church.

The Confession of Westminster [A.D. 1643] was, generally speaking, the product of the Puritan agitation of the seventeenth century, but the immediate work of the Assembly of Divines held at Westminster. [PURITANS.]

They drew up a Directory of Public Worship and a Confession of Faith, which bears decided marks of the Presbyterian ascendancy, both in its strong predestinarian views and in the inconsistency of claiming for men the right, on the score of conscience, to desert the Catholic Church, and yet to impose on others their own Presbyterian views under severe civil and ecclesiastical penalties. The confession was approved by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland [A.D. 1647], and again [A.D. 1690] on the renewed establishment of Presbyterianism after the Revolution, when it was ratified as the national standard of belief. It is printed officially in a volume issued by the Scottish Kirk under the title "Confessions of Faith."

A Saxon Confession was drawn up in Latin by Melancthon [A.D. 1557] for presentation at the Council of Trent.

The Confession of Wurtemberg, composed for the same purpose, was presented [A.D. 1552] by Christopher Duke of that country.

A Polish Confession of the Calvinistic Poles was submitted at the Synod of Gzenger [A.D. 1570].

To the above list some writers have erroneously added the Greek Confession of Cyril Lucar, Patriarch of Constantinople [A.D. 1621-1638], submitted to and accepted by a Greek synod [A.D. 1629], and the Anglican Thirty-nine Articles, ratified by the Upper and Lower Houses of Convocation [A.D. 1571], forgetting that both these Churches have repudiated the uncatholic interpretation of which those articles have to some persons appeared capable, by their formal acceptance in public documents of the early general councils, and by ever refusing by act or word to forego their right and title to be considered living portions of Christ's Holy Catholic Church.

PROTESTERS. [ANTIBURGHERS. ORIGINAL SECEDERS. RESOLUTIONERS.]

PROZYMITES. A controversial term used by some mediæval writers as a designation of the Eastern Church for its use of leavened bread [ζύμη] in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist. So Eastern controversialists have called the Latins by the converse term of Azymites.

PRUSSIAN PROTESTANTS. [GERMAN PROTESTANTS. UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH.]

PSALLIANS. [EUCHITES.]

PSATHYRIANS. A party of Arians were so called, as followers of Theoctistus, a zealous pastry-cook [ψαθυροπώλης] of Constantinople, who maintained the heresy of Arius in the form that the First Person in the Holy Trinity existed before the Son had a being; thus denying the Eternal Generation of the latter. The Psathyrians were condemned at the Council of Antioch, A.D. 361. They were also called Douleians and Cyrtiani. [Theodor. Hær. fab. iv.]

PSEUDAPOSTOLI. [FALSE APOSTLES.]

PSILANTHROPISTS. Those who maintain the extreme form of Unitarian doctrine that our Lord was merely [ψιλός] a man [ἄνθρωπος] and not God and man [Θεάνθρωπος] in one Person.

PSYCHICS. A party name given to the orthodox by the TERTULLIANISTS, who called themselves "Spirituals" [Prædest. Hær. lxxxvi.]. The distinction was drawn from St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians, where he writes of the ψυχικός, the "natural man" who cannot receive "the things of the Spirit of God," and the πνευματικός, or "spiritual man," who discerns them spiritually [1 Cor. ii. 14, 15].

PSYCHOPANNYCHITES. A controversial term for those who maintain the opinion that souls sleep in a state of unconsciousness during the interval between death and the general resurrection. Calvin wrote a treatise against them in 1534, and there is much against them in Henry More's works. Pagitt says in his "Heresiography," written about 1638, that the heresy revived in his time through the publication of a work entitled "Man's Mortality."

PSYCHOPNEUMONES. Those who maintained the opinion that the souls of the good after death become angels, and that the souls of the evil become devils. [Aug. Hæres. lxxviii.; Prædest. Hæres. lxxviii.]

PTOLEMÆANS. A Gnostic sect of the second century, followers of Ptolemy, "whose school," says Irenæus, "may be described as a bud from that of Valentinus" [Iren. adv. Hær. i. pref. 2]. Irenæus also associates Ptolemy with Heracleon as if the "Æons of Ptolemy and Heracleon" were their joint invention [ibid. ii. 4]. In another chapter the same writer describes the doctrines of the followers of Ptolemy and Colorbasus [ibid. i. 12]. Ptolemy is also named by Tertullian, but without any particulars of his history [Tertull. contr. Valent. xxxiii.], and in a very few words by Philaster [Hær. xxxix.], Augustine [Hær. xiii.], Prædestinatus [Hær. xiii.], and the continuator of Tertullian [Pseudo-Tertull. Hær. xii.]. Epiphanius gives an Epistola ad Florum written by Ptolemy. The only difference between the Ptolemæans and the Valentinians in general appears to have been in respect to the number of Æons which they invented for their respective systems, and the name of Ptolemy is associated particularly with that of Heracleon as regards a duplex system of four. [HERACLEONITES. Epiph. Hær. xxxiii.]

PUBLICANL. [POPICIANS.]

PUCCIANITES. The followers of Francis Puccius, an heretical writer of the sixteenth century, who maintained the principle that Christ having made an Atonement for all men by His death, no other means are now necessary for salvation than those which are provided by natural religion. This heresy he embodied in a work published in the year 1592, and dedicated to Clement VIII.

PUERIS SIMILES. A sect of Anabaptists spoken of by Bullinger in his treatise on Anabaptism. They practised childish tricks under the notion that this was being childlike, as required by the Gospel precept of entering into the kingdom of Heaven by becoming as a little child. Hence they would ride upon sticks and hobby-horses, and take off their clothes that they might practise the innocence of childhood; ending, of course, in practising the very reverse.

PURITANS. A party in the Church of England of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries which endeavoured to introduce the Genevan doctrine and discipline of Calvin in the place of the system established by the English Reformation.

The name was derived from the frequent assertion of those who composed the party, that the Church of England was corrupted with the remains of Popery, and that what they desired was a "pure" system of doctrine and discipline; but the English word "Puritans" happens accidentally to represent the Greek name "Cathari" which had been assumed by the Novatians, and which had been adopted in Germany during the Middle Ages in the vernacular form "Ketzer" for the Albigenses and other opponents of the Church. It first came into use as the designation of an English Church party about the year 1564 [Fuller's Ch. Hist. ix. 66], but after a few years it got to be used also as inclusive of many who had separated from the Church of England. It was gradually superseded as regards the latter by the names of their various sects, as Independents, Presbyterians, Baptists, etc., and as regards the former by the term "Nonconformists." At a still later time, towards the end of the seventeenth century, the Church Puritans were represented by "Low Churchmen," and the Non-church Puritans by "Dissenters."

The presence of a Puritan party in the Church of England is, however, traceable for two centuries before the name of "Puritan" was assumed. In the fourteenth century the common people had become alienated from their parish priests by the influence of the Friars, who had authority from the Pope to preach and to receive confessions wherever they pleased, and quite independently of the ordinary clergy. This extra-parochial system of mission clergy weakened the hold of the Church upon the populace at large; and, when the Friars themselves began to lose their influence, alienation from the clergy developed into alienation from the Church. Thus arose the LOLLARDS of the fifteenth century, a party which made no attempt to set up separate places of worship or a separate ministry, but which introduced its anti-sacerdotal principles into many parish churches, and made many of the clergy as strong opponents of the existing ecclesiastical system as was Wickliffe himself. During the trying times of the Reformation the party thus formed was largely augmented by those whose opposition to Romish abuses had, by a similar excess, developed into opposition to the whole of the established ecclesiastical system; men who thought that "pure" doctrine and "pure" worship could only be attained by an utter departure from all that had been believed and practised during the times when the Church of England had contracted impurities of doctrine and worship through popish influences.

While Luther's movement was at its height the party which thus became the progenitors of the Puritans was formed into a society under the name of "The Christian Brethren," which seems from the faint view we get of it to have been very similar to that organized by John Wesley two centuries later. The headquarters of the Brethren were in London, but they had gained a footing at both the Universities, apparently among the undergraduates and younger graduates. As early as the year 1523, a body of Cambridge residents "met often at a house called 'the White Horse' to confer together with others, in mockery called Germans, because they conversed much in the books of the divines of Germany brought thence. This house was chosen because those of King's College, Queen's College, and St. John's might come in at the back-side and so be the more private and undiscovered" [Strype's Eccl. Mem. i. 568, ed. 1822]. Among those mentioned as so meeting are the names of Barnes, Arthur, Bilney, Latimer, and Coverdale, familiarly known as precursors of the Puritan movement in Edward VI. and Queen Elizabeth's reigns. A few years later, in 1527, similar gatherings were detected at Oxford, where the names of Frith, Taverner, Udal, Farrar, and Cox, Edward VI.'s tutor, are found among those who met together for the same purpose [ibid. i. 569]. Among the Oxford party the men of Wolsey's College held a conspicuous position, and his leniency towards all who were brought before him on charges of heresy was very striking.

The principles which were developed among the more extreme section of these early Puritans may be seen by an extract from a work written by William Tyndale (himself a friar and a priest), who was their representative man. Writing of the ministerial office, he says: "Sub-deacon, deacon, priest, bishop, cardinal, patriarch, and pope, be names of offices and service, or should be, and not sacraments. There is no promise coupled therewith. If they minister their offices truly, it is a sign that Christ's Spirit is in them; if not, that the devil is in them. . . . O dreamers and natural beasts, without the seal of the Spirit of God; but sealed with the mark of the beast, and with cankered consciences. . . . By a priest understand nothing but an elder to teach the younger, and to bring them unto the full knowledge and understanding of Christ, and to minister the sacraments which Christ ordained, which is also nothing but to preach Christ's promises. . . . According, therefore, as every man believeth God's promises, longeth for them, and is diligent to pray unto God to fulfil them, so is his prayer heard; and as good is the prayer of a cobbler as of a cardinal, and of a butcher as of a bishop, and the blessing of a baker that knoweth the truth is as good as the blessing of our most holy father the pope. . . . Neither is there any other manner of ceremony at all required in making our spiritual officers than to choose an able person, and then to rehearse him his duty, and give him his charge, and so put him in his room" [Tyndale's Obed. of Christ. Man, Park. Soc. ed. pp. 254-9]. Such principles struck at the whole ecclesiastical system of the Church of England, for Apostolical succession, Episcopal ordination, and a supernatural ministerial gift, have always been recognised as its foundation-stones.

These floating elements of Puritanism had, however, very little compactness and unity except in the one particular of opposition to the principles and practices which then prevailed in the Church of England. But in the latter years of Henry VIII.'s reign, Calvin was consolidating a system of doctrine, worship, and ecclesiastical discipline which was exactly calculated to weld together in a useable form the individual particles which had previously been comparatively powerless for want of cohesion. Calvin gained some personal influence in England, during the reign of Edward VI., by means of pertinacious letters addressed to the King, the Protector Somerset, and Archbishop Cranmer; but the principles of his system were chiefly propagated through the introduction of some of his foreign disciples into positions of influence in the Church of England. Thus an Italian named Pietro Vermigli, who had been an Augustinian friar, was made Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, and is known to history as Peter Martyr [A.D. 1500-62]. A similar appointment was made at Cambridge, where the Regius Professor of Divinity was a German, named Martin Bucer [A.D. 1491-1551], who had been a Dominican friar. Paul Bücher, or Fagius, a companion of Bucer, was destined for the professorship of Hebrew at Cambridge, but died in 1549. Bernard Ochinus [A.D. 1487-1564], ex-Vicar-General of the Capuchin Friars and Confessor to Pope Paul III., came from Geneva with Peter Martyr, and was made Canon of Canterbury, being afterwards banished from place to place on the Continent for his Socinianism and his advocacy of polygamy. John à Lasco [A.D. 1499-1560], a Pole, was an inmate of Lambeth Palace, where he and other foreigners formed a kind of Calvinistic Privy Council to Cranmer;¹ and John Knox [A.D. 1505-72], a Scotch priest, was at one time carrying out his duties as chaplain to the young King, and at another going on a roving commission to preach down the Church in Northumberland, Durham, and the other Northern counties. [Jackson's Works, iii. 273.]

Under these influences, and others of a similar nature, the country was made familiar with the Puritan scheme of Ecclesiasticism by which the Calvinist party wished to supplant, or as they said to complete, the English Reformation. [1] First, Presbyterianism was to supersede Episcopacy, as it had already done in Geneva, and as it shortly did in Scotland. [2] Secondly, The Book of Common Prayer was to be so altered that all responses, especially the Litany, were to be done away with, as well as everything that had come out of the ancient services: and Divine Service was to consist chiefly of extempore prayer and preaching. [3] Thirdly, The "Discipline" was to be introduced into every parish, in the shape of a kind of parish vestry, which was to have authority to superintend the morals of all the parishioners, dealing out spiritual censures and excommunications upon all offenders, as was being done under Calvin's austere rule in Geneva. To this latter point the party attached great importance, the following statements respecting it being collected from their writings by Bishop Bancroft: "The want of the eldership is the cause of all evil. It is not to be hoped for that any Commonwealth will flourish without it. This Discipline is no small part of the Gospel, it is of the substance of it. It is the right stuff and gold for building the Church of God. This would make the Church a chaste spouse, having a wonderful brightness as the morning, fair as the moon, pure as the sun, and terrible like an army with banners. Without this Discipline there can be no true religion. This government is the sceptre whereby alone Christ Jesus ruleth among men. The Churches of God in Denmark, Saxony, Tigrin, etc., wanting this government, are to be accounted maimed and unperfect. The establishing of the Presbyteries is the full placing of Christ in His Kingdom. They that reject this Discipline refuse to have Christ reign over them, and deny Him in effect to be their King or their Lord. It is the blade of a shaken sword in the hand of the Cherubins, to keep the way of the tree of 'life.' Ridiculous men, and bewitched," is his indignant comment on these quotations, for which he gives the references; "as though Christ's sovereignty, kingdom and lordship were nowhere acknowledged or to be found but where half a dozen artisans, shoemakers, tinkers, and tailors, with their preacher and reader (eight or nine Cherubins forsooth), do rule the whole parish." [Bancroft's Dangerous Positions and Proceedings, published and practised within this Island of Brytaine, under pretence of Reformation, and for the Presbiteriall Discipline, 1593, p. 43.]

This Puritan "platform," as it was called, attracted large numbers, especially among the lower classes, in London, Norwich, Northampton, and other large towns: and its hold upon its devotees was so great that they went willingly to the martyr's fire on its behalf, nine-tenths of those who suffered in the reign of Queen Mary and Philip of Spain suffering for it under the name of "the Gospel."¹ It was first formally set forth in England by Martin Bucer in a Latin work entitled "De Regno Christi Jesu Servatoris nostri," published in the year 1557. Bucer had written his work in the year 1551 for the instruction of Edward VI.; and there is probably some truth in the assertion made by the Puritans that it made so much impression on the young King, that if he had grown up he would have imposed their "platform" upon his subjects; and thus, according to their idea, "perfected the Reformation."

In the early part of Queen Elizabeth's reign the Church was embittered by the contentions of the Puritan clergy respecting the ceremonies and vestments prescribed for their use by the Book of Common Prayer. Although the Lutherans had continued to use the vestments, and many of the ceremonies, which had been in use before the Reformation, these had been entirely discarded by the Calvinists: and some of the younger English clergy, under the lead of Bishop Hooper (who had lived abroad from 1540 to 1547 among the Calvinists), wished to discard them also from the Church of England. The difference of opinion on the subject was carried to Frankfort by those who fled from England during the reign of Mary, and the extraordinary bitterness of the disputes which arose there are recorded in a volume entitled "The Troubles at Frankford." On their return to England the Calvinistic section of the clergy came back with their antipathy to old customs much strengthened, and they were accustomed to speak of them as "relics of the Amorites," "dregs of Popery," and "leavings of Idolatry." The use of cope and surplice, altar crosses and of "lights before the Sacrament;" bowing at the Name of Jesus, signing with the Cross in Baptism, and using the wedding-ring in marriages; kneeling at the reception of the Holy Communion, and making responses in Divine Service,—all these were regarded as antichristian customs which could not be borne with by those who desired the "pure Gospel" as it was preached in the little town of Geneva. Even the square academic cap with the clergyman's strait-collared and long-tailed cassock or "gown" were looked upon as superstitious; and when the "Council's pleasure" was declared to the London ministers "that strictly ye keep the unity of apparel, like this man who stands here canonically habited with a square cap, a scholar's gown priestlike, a tippet, and in the church a linen surplice, . . . great was the anguish and distress of those ministers, who cried out for compassion to themselves and families, saying 'We shall be killed in our souls for this pollution of ours'"² [Neal's Hist. Purit. i. 211, ed. 1732]. In addition to all these objections, they objected also to "the bishops affecting to be thought a superior order to presbyters, and claiming the sole right of ordination and the use of the keys;" to the bishops being Lords of Parliament; to the titles and offices of archdeacons, deans, chapters, and other officials belonging to cathedrals; to the jurisdiction of bishops and their chaneellors in spiritual courts; to the want of a godly discipline; to the observance of Festivals or Holydays; to the cathedral mode of worship, and the chanting of Psalms by turns; to the use of organs or other musical instruments; to the frequent repetition of the Lord's Prayer, the use of responses in Divine Service, and the use of forms of prayer in general; to the use of godfathers and godmothers at Baptism; to the use of the rite of Confirmation by laying on of the Bishop's hands; and, in short, to nearly everything that could be named in the customs and ceremonies of the Church of England [ibid. 235-240].

It has been the practice of many writers respecting this period to represent the ceremonies and customs which the Puritans thus declined to observe as trifles of no importance, the non-observance of which ought to have been conceded to them for the sake of peace by the rulers of the Church. But while some of them—such as kneeling at the Holy Communion—are far from unimportant, the resistance which was offered to them was only a part of that determined resistance to the whole system of the Church of England by the pressure of which the party hoped, in the end, to have the Calvinistic system substituted for it. Never were men more determined to have their own way, to work for it, to suffer for it, to fight for it: and short of giving them their own way entirely there was no peace to be had with the Puritans.¹

The Act of Supremacy [1 Eliz. 1], which was passed in the year 1559, provided for the appointment of Commissioners to exercise the Visitatorial Jurisdiction of the Crown, and advantage was taken of this provision to establish a permanent Ecclesiastical Commission, which, under the name of the "High Commission Court," became as odious to the Puritans as that Judicial Committee of the Privy Council which had acquired the name of the "Star Chamber Court,"² and both of them were abolished together in 1641 by 16 Car. I. ch. 10. These commissioners endeavoured in vain to enforce obedience to the "Injunctions" and "Advertisements" which were set forth by the Crown with the object of securing uniformity. Many of the Puritan clergy were deprived of their benefices on account of their refusal to obey the law, but notwithstanding this "they travelled up and down the counties from church to church," says Bishop Jewell, "preaching where they could get leave, as if they were apostles," and supported themselves as their predecessors the friars had done, by the alms of the people. The University of Cambridge added to the number of these roving preachers, by exercising a privilege granted by Pope Alexander VI., by which the University could license twelve special preachers a year, who should be at liberty to preach anywhere in England without Episcopal license or control. "Lecturers" were also elected by many parishes, for the express purpose of maintaining Puritan doctrine in churches where the rector or vicar was of a different colour; these lecturers fanned the flame of discord by their refusal to recognise in any degree the authority of the Prayer Book. They were educated to their work chiefly by means of "prophesyings," which were meetings of clergy associated together for the purpose of discussing difficult questions of Scripture.

¹ This character was given of them even by their friend Bullinger, Calvinist pastor at Zurich, who thus wrote to Beza respecting the Puritan leader at Oxford, Sampson, Dean of Christ Church: "Sampson never wrote a letter without filling it with grievances: the man is never satisfied. . . . When he was here, I used to get rid of him in a friendly way, as well knowing him to be a man of a capacious and unquiet disposition. England has many characters of this sort, who cannot be at rest, and never can be satisfied." [Zurich Letters, ii. 152.]

Highly as these were praised by Archbishop Grindal [Fuller's Ch. Hist. ix. 4], the tone of the discussions is indicated by the Confession of Faith each was required to subscribe, which condemned among other things "distinctions of meats, apparels, and days, and briefly all the ceremonies and whole order of Papistry, which they call the Hierarchy" (that is, of the Church of England, which was then commonly so called), "which are a devilish confusion, established as it were in spite of God, and to the reproach of religion."³ [Strype's Ann. i. 41.]

To secure, as far as possible, the appointment of such clergy in vacant parishes, a Presbyterian system of trial and of election by the people was established to supplement the ordinary system of presentation and institution. Thus one Axton, Rector of Moreton Corbet in Leicestershire, when brought before the Bishop of Peterborough for refusing to wear the surplice and to use the ceremonies enjoined in the Prayer Book, denies that he is rector or "parson," but declares that he was chosen pastor "by the free election of the people and leave of the patron. After I had preached about six weeks, by way of probation, I was chosen by one consent of them all, a sermon being preached by one of my brethren, setting forth the mutual duties of pastor and people" [Neal's Hist. Purit. i. 258]. The bishop reminded him that he received his tithes because he had been instituted and inducted as "parson" of the parish; but Axton's view was, "I receive these temporal things of the people because I, being their pastor, do minister to them spiritual things." Another of their number, when examined before the High Commission on the same subject, says, "I think they observe as much as they can the order prescribed in the said Book of Discipline, as about Proudlove of Weedenbeck, his admission (as I have heard), and Snapes and Larke. The manner whereof is, that they renounce the calling they have had of the bishops, and do take it again from the approbation of the 'Classis.' And again, they will be content to accept Orders from the bishop as a civil matter, but do not thereby count themselves ministers until the godly brethren of some Classis have allowed them." He gives, as one instance among many, "one Maister Hocknel," who had been in Orders six or seven years, who was presented to a benefice, and went for his new "call" to Snape, Penry, and some other Puritan clergymen. In this case his examination by the Classis and his sermon before them were unsatisfactory, and they refused to "call" him to the ministry. "Hereupon," naïvely says the writer, "Maister Hocknel and they fell out: and he (contemning their censure)

³ The pious and learned Dr. Thomas Jackson wrote respecting these meetings, "But since the liberty of prophesying was taken up, which came but lately into the northern parts (unless it were in the towns of Newcastle and Berwick, where Knox, Mackbray, and Udal had sown their tares), all things have gone so cross and backward in our Church, that I cannot call the history of these forty years to mind, or express my observations upon it, but with a bleeding heart." [Jackson's Works, ii. 273.]

did proceed and took possession of his benefice." [Danger. Posit. 113.]

In a similar manner, the Puritan clergy endeavoured gradually to supplant the system of the Prayer Book ; first, by shewing extreme contempt for it, and secondly by supplementing it with the system of the Discipline ; the singularly dishonest plan which they adopted being thus described by the contemporary writer already quoted. "The most of them, that are but doctors (as they term themselves) and readers of lectures in other men's charges, do seldom or never come to the service which is read in the church, according to Her Majesty's laws, but under pretence of studying for their sermons do absent themselves until service be done, or at the least almost finished, and then they come in (gravely I warrant you) and do go to this their own form of service." The form referred to is that of the Book of Discipline, and consisted of a metrical Psalm, a short admonition to the congregation how to prepare themselves rightly to pray, an extempore prayer containing the confession of sins, the Lord's Prayer, and then the sermon. After the sermon, other extempore prayers for grace, for profit from the sermon, for the Church, and for all particular callings, then the Lord's Prayer, another metrical Psalm, and a blessing. Those who held benefices evaded the use of the Prayer Book by employing "readers," a practice which continued down to quite recent times, the preacher contemptuously ignoring the service by sitting in the vestry till sermon time arrived. "The rest of the fraternity," says the contemporary writer from whom these particulars are taken, "that have cures of their own, some of them will have a 'Parliament Minister' (as they term him) under them, to say service, and then he himself dealeth as it hath been noted of the doctor : but others that are not able to have such a one, they for their 'safer standing' (as their term is) do use some piece of our service book, and peradventure read a lesson (which things they affirm may be performed as well by those that are not ministers as by them) : and then they, in like sort, do begin their own ministerial function, and proceed according to the fore-said fashion, subscribed unto and promised"¹ [Bancroft's Danger. Posit. 103]. The Puritan laity adopted a similar plan of escaping the yoke of the Prayer Book : a later writer saying of them, "They will hear our sermons but not our Common Prayer ; and of these you may see every Sunday in our streets, sitting or standing about our doors, who, when the prayers are done, rush into our churches to hear our sermon" [Pagitt's Heresiography, p. 94, ed. 1662]. Thus the Puritan party endeavoured to minimize to the utmost the ordinary devotional system of the Church and the principle on which its ministry is grounded, and magnify—even by evasion and misrepresentation—the Presbyterian system which was thus subtly creeping in.

The active measures which were taken by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners at last drove many of the Puritan clergy from their ministrations, licensed or unlicensed, in the churches. The chief leaders of the separation thus formed were, according to the Church historian Fuller, seven London clergymen, named Colman, Halingham, Benson, Button, White, Rowland, and Hawkins.² "These had their followers of the laity, who forsook their parish churches and assembled with the deprived ministers, in woods and private houses, to worship God without the offensive habits and ceremonies of the Church" [ibid. 241]. This separation of some of the Puritans from the Church of England took place in the year 1567 ; on June 19th of which year a congregation of one hundred of them was broken up by the Sheriffs of London in Plumbers' Hall, "which they hired for that day under pretence of a wedding" [Strype's Life of Grindal, 315]. Another congregation, with Richard Fitz, their pastor, had been detected, and committed to the Bridewell a month before, on May 20th, 1567, but where these met is not known. In the following year some of them appear with the full organization of a separate sect, Grindal writing as follows to Bullinger on July 11th, 1568. "Some London citizens, with four or five ministers, have openly separated from us, and sometimes in private houses, sometimes in fields, and occasionally even in ships, they have held meetings and administered the sacraments. Besides this, they have ordained ministers, elders, and deacons after their own way. The number of the sect is about two hundred, but consisting of more women than men. The Privy Council have lately committed the heads of this faction to prison, and are now using means to put a timely stop to this sect." A few months later Browne is found organizing Independent congregations in London and Norfolk [INDEPENDENTS] : and almost at the same time, in the year 1572, Field, one of the writers of the "Admonition to the Parliament," established the first English congregation of Presbyterians among his Admonitionist friends at Wandsworth, near London, the parish of which he had been Lecturer. [PRESBYTERIANS.] It was in the same year that a book was printed abroad and widely circulated in England, entitled "A Full and Plain Declaration of Ecclesiastical Discipline out of the Word of God, and of the

² The first three of these, Colman, Halingham, and Benson, were actually Jesuits, or in the employment of Jesuits ! There names were set down in a document found on a Jesuit named Heath in 1569, as those of persons employed "to sow faction among the heretics" [Curteis' Bampt. Lect. 63 n. 67]. That many Jesuits were employed as Puritan preachers is asserted by writers of the time, and their assertions are corroborated by documentary evidence still preserved among the Burleigh Papers. [ROMAN CATHOLICS.]

Decline of the Church of England from the same." This volume was written by Walter Travers, chaplain and tutor in the family of Lord Burleigh, and afterwards Lecturer at the Temple, where he had that controversy with Hooker, then Master of the Temple, which led the latter to write his immortal work on "the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity." Travers' volume was introduced by a preface written by Thomas Cartwright [A.D. 1535-1603], who had been for a few months, in 1570, Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, and who was for many years the leader of the Puritans within and without the Church. Cartwright and Travers were both then connected with the Presbyterian congregation at Wandsworth, and their book was received by the Puritans as the authoritative exposition of the Presbyterian Discipline.

But although many of the Puritans thus formed separate sects, a very large proportion of them still continued in the Church; and very subtle measures were taken by some of their leaders a few years later, under Cartwright's advice and direction, for the inoculation of the country with Presbyterian principles in such a manner as to avoid the forfeiture of their benefices. On May 8th, 1582, sixty clergymen from the Eastern Counties met at Cockfield in Suffolk, of which parish one of them, Knewstubb, was vicar,¹ to consult about the ordinary Puritan platform, "apparel, matter, form, days, fastings, injunctions," etc. They adjourned to Cambridge, and from thence to London, "where they hoped to be concealed by the general resort of the people to Parliament. At length, under the guidance of Cartwright, the late Margaret Professor, and of Travers, afterwards Hooker's opponent, and who was at present domestic chaplain and tutor in the family of Lord Burleigh, this Convocation of Puritan Clergy framed the following systematic plan for grafting their new system on to that of the Church. The document is of sufficient importance to be given at full length.

"Concerning Ministers.

"Let no man, though he be an University man, offer himself to the ministry; nor let any man take upon him an uncertain and vague ministry, though it be offered unto him.

"But such as be called to the ministry by some certain church, let them impart it unto that Classis or Conference whereof themselves are, or else unto some greater Church Assembly, and if such shall be found fit by them, then let them be commended by their letters unto the Bishop, that they may be ordained ministers by him.

"Those ceremonies in the Book of Common Prayer which, being taken from Popery, are in controversy, ought to be omitted and given over, if it may be done without danger of being put from the ministry. But if there be any imminent danger to be deprived, then this matter must be communicated to the Classis in which that church is, that by the judgment thereof it may be determined what ought to be done.

"If subscription to the Articles of Religion and to the Book of Common Prayer shall be again urged, it is thought that the Book of Articles may be subscribed unto according to the Statutes 13 Eliz., that is, unto such of them only as contain the sum of Christian faith and doctrine of the Sacraments. But for many weighty causes neither the rest of the Articles in that book nor the Book of Common Prayer may be allowed; no, though a man should be deprived of his ministry for it.

"Concerning Churchwardens.

"It seemeth that churchwardens and collectors for the poor might be thus turned into elders and deacons.

"When they are to be chosen let the church have warning fifteen days before of the time of elections, and of the ordinances of the realm; but especially of Christ's ordinance touching appointing of watchmen and overseers in His Church, who are to foresee that none offence or scandal do arise in the Church; and if any such happen, that by them it be duly abolished.

"Of Collectors for the Poor, or Deacons.

"And touching deacons of both sorts (viz. men and women), the church shall be monished what is required by the Apostle; and that they are not to choose men of custom and of course, or of riches, but for their faith, zeal, and integrity; and that the church is to pray in the meantime to be so directed that they make choice of them that be meet.

"Let the names of such as are chosen be published the next Lord's day, and after that, their duties to the church, and the church's towards them shall be declared; then let them be received unto the ministry to which they are chosen with the general prayers of the whole church.

"Of Classes.

"The brethren are to be requested to ordain a distribution of all churches, according to these rules in that behalf that are set down in the Synodical Discipline, touching 'classical, provincial, comital, or of commencements and assemblies for the whole kingdom.

"The Classes are to be required to keep acts of memorable matters, which they shall see delivered to the comital assembly, that from thence they may be brought by the provincial assembly.

"They are to deal earnestly with patrons to present fit men whensoever any church is fallen void in that Classis.

"The comital assemblies are to be admonished to make collections for the relief of the poor and of scholars, but especially for the relief of such ministers here as are put out for not subscribing to the articles tendered by the bishops; also for relief of Scottish ministers and others, and for other profitable and necessary uses.

"All the provincial synods must continually aforehand foresee in due time to appoint the keeping of their next provincial synods; and for the sending of chosen persons with certain instructions unto the national synod, to be holden whensoever the Parliament for the kingdom shall be called, and at some certain time every year." [Dangerous Positions and Proceedings, 1593, p. 46; Neal's Hist. Purit. i. 345.]

From the contemporary writer just quoted, it appears that the organization thus established soon spread over the country: and from the evidence of one of the Puritan ministers, he gives a specimen of it as it was stated to exist about the year 1557 in Northamptonshire. "The whole shire was divided into three Classes. 1. The Classis of Northamptonshire, consisting of these ministers: Master Snape, Master Penry, Master Sibthorpe, Master Edwards, Master Littleton, Master Bradshaw, Master Larke, Master Fleshware, Master Spicer, etc. 2. The Classis of Daventry side, consisting of these: Master Barebon, Master Rogers, Master King, Master Smart, Master Sharpe, Master Proudloe, Master Elliston, etc. 3. The Classis of Kettering side, consisting of these: Master Stone, Master Williamson, Master Fawsbrooke, Master Patinson, Master Massey, etc. This devise (saith Master Johnson) is commonly received in most parts of England (as I have heard in sundry of our meetings), but especially in Warwickshire, Suffolk, Norfolk, Essex," etc. [Dang. Positions, etc. p. 77.] In these counties, and as far as they were able to do so throughout England, they made a secret survey of all the parishes, ascertaining the value of benefices, the character of incumbent and people, etc. "The end propounded of this survey was, viz. that if upon signification to the brethren abroad what was done there, they would likewise make the like survey in other countries, the Parliament (if need required, and to the better furthering of their purposes) might have a general view of all the ministers of England that impugned their desires . . . for the bringing in of discipline and Church government" [ibid. 88]. In addition to these measures, orders were issued to all Puritan clergy that "every minister (as occasion served) should teach the Discipline unto the people as well as the other parts of the Gospel" [ibid. 134.] Every influence possible was also brought to bear on magistrates of all degrees, from the President of Wales downwards, to get them to support the Disciplinarians, even at the expense of disobedience to higher authority [ibid. 136]: and theories about obedience to sovereigns were circulated which were simply those theories of rebellion that were ultimately carried into practice [ibid. 141].

This matricidal conspiracy of the Puritan clergy against the Church of England was only one part of a very widespread organization which took in the laity also, and which moved on stealthily but steadily towards its object during half a century, until that object was attained. As early as the year 1585, the conspirators boasted that they had a party which was 100,000 strong [ibid. 133], and in 1589 they were already taking into consideration "how archbishops, bishops, chancellors, deans, canons, archdeacons, commissaries, registrars, apparitors, etc. should be provided for, that the Commonwealth be not thereby," on their expulsion from their benefices, etc. "pestered with beggars" [ibid. 127.] The movement was supported, for political purposes, by the Earl of Leicester, Sir Francis Walsingham, Sir Francis Knollys, and, to some extent, by the Cecil's; and had so much support in Parliament that several Bills were introduced, though not carried, to legalize its progress. It also received assistance from the growing sect of the Brownists, especially through the pamphleteering ability of John Penry, the author of the ribald tracts which were published under the pseudonym of "Martin Mar-Prelate."¹ And thus, notwithstanding the endeavours of the High Commission Court (often under direct orders from the Queen) to suppress the conspiracy, as one dangerous to the State as well as the Church, it had attained such dimensions by the end of the reign that the Puritans had become a very powerful party in the country, and were too strong to make secrecy any longer necessary.

For a quarter of a century the Puritans can hardly be said to have been opposed by any party in the Church, the opposition offered to them coming entirely from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or Court of High Commission, and the Privy Council. But about the time when the Mar-Prelate libels were being published, Dr. Richard Bancroft [A.D. 1544-1610], chaplain to Archbishop Whitgift, laid the foundation for a revival of Reformation principles, as opposed to

Presbyterian or Calvinistic principles, in a sermon which he preached at Paul's Cross on February 9th, 1588-9, the Sunday before the meeting of Parliament. In this sermon he laid down the principle of Episcopacy as of Divine institution, as that which was the true and only Scriptural mode of Church government; and shewed that the Presbyterian system, or "Discipline,"¹ was one of mere modern invention, founded in the wilfulness and selfishness of man, and not in any revelation from, or obedience to, God. This Divine origin and authority of the Church system had already been maintained by Archbishop Whitgift in his controversy with Cartwright [Strype's Life of Whitgift, ii. 51]; it was followed up in detail in Saravia's "Treatise on the various Degrees of Ministers of the Gospel as they were instituted by the Lord, and delivered on by the Apostles, and confirmed by constant use of all Churches" [A.D. 1590]; and it was the fundamental doctrine of Hooker's "Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity," written between the years 1586 and 1591, and published in the year 1594. About the same time it was also elaborated in Bishop Bilson's "Perpetual Government of Christ's Church" [A.D. 1593-4]; and in the same year Bancroft exposed and refuted the Presbyterian system in his "Dangerous Positions" (already quoted and referred to), and his "Survey of the pretended Holy Discipline." By these works a younger school of clergy was trained up in the true principles of the English Reformation; and although they were not able to stem the tide of Puritanism altogether, they erected a bulwark for the Church on which the Caroline Divines could take firm theological and literary standing in the deadly struggle that occupied their generation, making the subjugation of English intellect by Presbyterianism for ever impossible.

When the long reign of the High Church Queen Elizabeth was brought to a close in the year 1603, and she was succeeded by the Scottish King James, who had lived in the midst of the Presbyterian system and had outwardly conformed to it, the hopes of the Puritans were raised to a confident height. On his journey to London he was met by a deputation of the party bearing the "Millenary Petition," a memorial signed by 750 clergymen, in which the whole platform of Puritanism was set forth, the petitioners complaining that "we, to the number of more than a thousand of your Majesty's subjects and ministers, all groaning as under a common burden of human rites and ceremonies, do, with one joint consent, humble ourselves at your Majesty's feet, to be eased and relieved in this behalf," and praying for "a Conference among the learned" for the settlement of the points in dispute [Fuller's Ch. Hist. X. i. 27]. In consequence of this petition the King summoned representatives of the Puritan clergy to appear before him, with nine bishops, four deans, and two other doctors, for the purpose of considering the grievances which were represented to exist, and of providing remedies if necessary. These met at Hampton Court on January 14th, 16th, and 18th, 1603-4, and from the place of meeting their consultation acquired the name of the Hampton Court Conference. But although so many were summoned, the number of the Church party who were eventually called in to take part in the actual Conference was much reduced, and the names of the acting Divines on either side were as follows:—

Bancroft, Bishop of London.	Reynolds, President of C. C.
Bilson, " Winchester.	Coll., Oxford.
Montague, Dean of Chapel Royal.	Sparks, Regius Prof. Div., Oxford.
Andrewes, Dean of Westminster.	Chaderton, Master of Emm. Coll., Cambridge.
Overall, " St Paul's.	Knowstun, Vicar of Cockfield.
Barlow, " Chester.	Galloway, Minister of Perth.
Bridges, " Salisbury.

It is noticed by the historians of the time that while the bishops and deans appeared in their canonicals—as was and still is customary in the presence of the Sovereign—the Puritan clergy discarded even their University gowns, and, with perverse want of taste and judgment, wore furred gowns such as are still worn by City Aldermen. On the first day the consultation was restricted to Members of the Privy Council. On the second the actual Conference took place, those above named being present, and also a large number of privy councillors. The result which was arrived at on the third day was that the King considered most of the Puritan requirements unreasonable, and inconsistent with the status of the Church of England; but that some verbal changes should be made in the Prayer Book, and that an addition should be made to the Catechism explanatory of the Sacraments. But the Puritan Divines did not in reality state the Puritan case in any detail. Probably they felt how weak that case would be when stated before such men as Bilson, Andrewes, and Overall; and how easily those learned Divines would have shewn its shallowness and want of authority. [Barlow's Sum and Substance of the Conference . . . at Hampton Court, 1604. Cardwell's Conferences.]

Cartwright, the leader of the Puritan clergy, had died a few weeks before the Hampton Court Conference, on December 27th, 1603. Archbishop Whitgift died a few weeks after its close, on February 29th, 1603-4. No leader arose among the Puritans equal to Cartwright, while Bancroft, the successor of Whitgift, was a man of far higher ability than the latter, and so much better able to contend with them, that Lord Clarendon says of him, "he had almost rescued the Church out of the hand of the Calvinian party, and very much subdued the unruly spirit of the Nonconformists." He died on November 2nd, 1611 (having lived to see the completion of that noble revision of the English Bible which had occupied the most learned divines of the Church of England during the years of his primacy), and was succeeded by George Abbott, the Bishop of London. Abbott was a strict Calvinist, very indifferent to the Church system, and far from unfavourable to the "Discipline" or Presbyterian system. During his long primacy [A.D. 1610-1633] the power of the Puritans increased to such an extent that in a few years after his death they attained the object at which the party had been aiming for nearly a century, the establishment of Presbyterianism in the place of Episcopacy.

A great stimulus was given to the party by the success of the Calvinists at the Synod of Dort, held in the year 1618. [DORT, SYNOD OF.] The English Calvinists had been foiled in their attempt to force the "Lambeth Articles" on the Church of England in the year 1595, and again at the Hampton Court Conference [DICT. OF THEOL., LAMBETH ARTICLES]; but the presence of the English Commissioners, sent to Dort by King James, seemed (though falsely) to give force to the decision of the Synod in the Church of England, and the Puritans regarded that decision as foreshadowing their own victory over English "Arminians," as they called the members of the High Church party. They thus raised such a controversial agitation that, on August 22nd, 1622, the King issued Injunctions prohibiting any preachers under the rank of bishop or dean from preaching "in any popular auditory on the deep points of Predestination, Election, Reprobation, or of the Universality, Efficacy, Resistibility or Irresistibility of God's grace." A proclamation of a similar tenor was issued by Charles I. on January 14th, 1626; and for the same purpose the "Declaration" was prefixed to the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion in 1628, enforcing their plain grammatical sense. These attempts to temper the bitterly controversial spirit of the Puritans had, however, no effect; and the latter were greatly strengthened as a party by the House of Commons, which had now been seized with that strange religious madness that affected it for so many years. After a long debate on the "Declaration," the House of Commons passed the following resolution:—"We, the Commons in Parliament assembled, do claim, protest, and avow for truth, the sense of the Articles of Religion which were established by Parliament in the thirteenth year of our late Queen Elizabeth, which by the public act of the Church of England, and by the current exposition of the writers of our Church, have been delivered unto us. And we reject the sense of the Jesuits and Arminians, and all others that differ from us" [Neal's Hist. Purit. 193]. This was the first of that marvellous collection of resolutions and ordinances respecting religion of which Sir Simonds D'Ewes is stated to have declared, that "in bulk and number they did not only equal but exceed all the laws and statutes made since the Conquest" [Fuller's Ch. Hist. iii. 490]. When the Long Parliament opened, on November 3rd, 1640, its distinctly Puritan temper was shewn by an order to Bishop Williams, Dean of Westminster, to place a Communion Table in the middle of the Abbey for the members to receive the Holy Communion on the following Sunday, instead of celebrating it in the usual place at the Altar in the Choir. Having thus shewn the direction in which their prejudices leaned, the Long Parliament then appointed a Committee of the whole House for hearing grievances about religion, the Committee being afterwards subdivided into more than twenty; and from that time the course of Parliamentary agitation and legislation went steadily onward to the end.

During the spring and summer of the following year [A.D. 1641] there was a long struggle for the expulsion of Bishops from the House of Lords, and when the Puritan party had failed in carrying their Bill for this purpose, another Bill was brought in, founded on a petition recently presented, which provided for "the utter extirpation of all Bishops, Deans and Chapters, Archdeacons, Prebendaries, Chanters, with all Chancellors, Officials, and Officers belonging to them; and for the disposing of their lands, manors, etc. as the Parliament shall appoint." This Bill also was thrown out: but not long afterwards twelve of the Bishops, who were in London at Christmas time, were attacked by a mob of apprentices led by Sir Richard Wiseman, and prevented from taking their places in the House of Lords. The mob at the same time attacked Westminster Abbey, but were driven off by the Westminster scholars and others, who had collected on the alarm, and Sir Richard Wiseman was mortally wounded (in a manner very similar to that in which Lord Brooke was killed, in March 1653, during the assault which he was leading on Lichfield Cathedral) by a stone thrown from the Abbey leads. For protesting against their violent detention from the House of Lords ten of the Bishops were sent to the Tower the next day, December 27th, 1641, and there they remained until May 5th, 1642. Meanwhile an Act of Parliament was passed, on February 14th, 1642, depriving them of their places in Parliament, and no Bishop sat there again for twenty years. Shortly afterwards they were deprived also of their official incomes, and some of them were reduced to great poverty and want.

In the beginning of the Civil War which now broke out, the General Assembly of Scotland accompanied the invasion of England by Scottish troops by a fresh attack upon the English Church, sending a letter to Parliament on August 3rd, 1642, to urge that there should be "one confession of faith, one directory of worship, one public catechism, and one form of Church government, in both Kingdoms" [Rushworth's Collect. v. 388]. Upon this the English Parliament obediently passed a resolution: "That this government by Archbishops, Bishops, their Chancellors and Commissaries, Deans and Chapters, Archdeacons, and other ecclesiastical officers depending upon the hierarchy, is evil, and justly offensive and burdensome to the Kingdom, a great impediment to reformation and growth of religion, very prejudicial to the State and government of this Kingdom; and that we are resolved that it shall be taken away." A Bill for the utter abolition of Episcopacy was shortly afterwards brought in, and was passed on January 26th, 1643. This was supplemented on October 9th, 1646, by an ordinance "for the abolishing of Archbishops and Bishops, and providing for the payment of the just and necessary debts of the Kingdom, into which the same hath been drawn by a war mainly promoted by and in favour of the said Archbishops and Bishops, and other their adherents and dependents." After September 6th, the names and titles were to be "wholly abolished and taken away," together with all authority and jurisdiction; and all the possessions of the sees were to be placed in the hands of a Commission of Aldermen and others named in the Act—subsequent Ordinances defining the public uses to which they were to be applied. [Rushw. Hist. Coll. vii. 373.]

While the abolition of Episcopacy was thus being effected, the Puritans were also preparing for the climax of their long labours, the establishment of Presbytery in its place. By an "Ordinance" of Parliament dated June 12th, 1643 (the Ordinance replacing a Bill introduced in the previous October but never carried), an Assembly of Divines was summoned to meet at Westminster to perfect the work of Reformation which the Parliament had begun, and to settle the government of the Church in nearer agreement with that of Scotland and of other reformed communions abroad. [Rushworth's Hist. Coll. vi. 327.] This Assembly met in Westminster Abbey on July 1st, 1643, sat until the autumn of 1647, and did not finally vanish (it was never formally dissolved) until the dispersion of the Long Parliament by Cromwell in the year 1652. It originally consisted of 121 clergy, most of whom were Puritans, and of 30 lay assessors. Of the few clergy belonging to the moderate section of the Church party who were summoned (including Archbishop Ussher, Bishops Brownrigg, Westfield, and Prideaux), most refused to attend because a Royal Proclamation had been issued forbidding the Assembly, and the rest fell off after the first meeting. The permanent part of it was entirely Presbyterian in colour, though a few "Independents"—half political and half religious in their independency—subsequently came to light in the body.¹ The first actual work of the Assembly was the acceptance of the Scottish "Solemn League and Covenant" for the extirpation of Episcopacy, and setting up of Presbytery, which was adopted with the forms of an oath by the Assembly and the Parliament on September 25th, 1643 [COVENANTERS], and was afterwards imposed upon every one in England who by threats or persuasions could be induced to subscribe to it. Its next work was to prepare a "Directory for Public Worship," similar to that which had been published by Cartwright half a century before. Afterwards the Assembly compiled a most voluminous and verbose "Confession of Faith," with equally diffuse "Longer" and "Shorter" Catechisms, all these formularies being still in use as the Standards of Faith and Worship among the Presbyterians of Scotland. [SCOTCH KIRK.]

On January 4th, 1645, the following Ordinance of Parliament abolished the use of the Book of Common Prayer: "The Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, taking into serious consideration the manifold inconveniences that have arisen by the Book of Common Prayer in this Kingdom, and resolving, according to their Covenant, to reform religion according to the Word of God, and the example of the best reformed Churches, have consulted with the reverend, pious, and learned Divines called together for that purpose, and do judge it necessary that the said Book of Common Prayer be abolished, and the Directory for the Public Worship of God, hereinafter mentioned, be established and observed in all the churches within this Kingdom." [Rushworth's Hist. Collect. vi. 839.]

This was supplemented on August 23rd by another ordinance making the use of the Prayer Book penal. After reciting the ordinance of January 4th abolishing its use, this ordinance goes on to enact that the Directory shall be delivered to the parish constable of each parish by the members of Parliament for the county or town in which such parish is situated, to be paid for by the parishioners, and to be used by the ministers on the next Sunday. "And it is further hereby ordained by the said Lords and Commons, That if any person or persons whatsoever shall at any time or times hereafter use, or cause the aforesaid Book of Common Prayer to be used, in any church, chapel, or publick place of worship, or in any private place or family within the Kingdom of England, or Dominion of Wales, or port and town of Berwick, That then every person so offending therein, shall, for the first offence, forfeit and pay the sum of five pounds of lawful English money; for the second offence, the sum of ten pounds; and for the third offence, shall suffer one whole year's imprisonment, without bail or mainprize." At the same time those who refused to use the Directory were to be fined forty shillings for every offence; and those who wrote or preached against it were to be similarly fined, not less than five or more than fifty pounds; while all Prayer Books were to be delivered up to the authorities, under a fine of forty shillings. [Ibid. vii. 205.]

The final establishment of the Puritan "Discipline" took place under similar ordinances. On August 19th, 1645, directions were given by "the Lords and Commons (after advice had with the Assembly of Divines) for the election and choosing of ruling elders in all the congregations, and in the classical assemblies for the cities of London and Westminster, and the several counties of the Kingdom, for the speedy settling of the Presbyterian government." On June 5th, 1646, an ordinance was passed "for the present settling (without further delay) of the Presbyterian government in the Church of England." On August

¹ They were five in number, Thomas Goodwin, Fellow of Catherine Hall, Cambridge; William Bridge, Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge; Jeremiah Burroughs, of the same College; Sidrach Simpson, of Queen's College, Cambridge; and Philip Nye, who had been educated at Oxford. [Fuller's Ch. Hist. iii. 461, ed. 1837.]

28th, 1646, there was an "Ordinance of the Lords and Commons for the Ordination of Ministers by the classical presbyters within their respective bounds, for the several congregations in the Kingdom of England;" and one on January 29th, 1647-8, "for the speedy dividing and settling of the several counties of the Kingdom into distinct classical presbyteries and congregational elderships." The Puritan "platform" was thus established on the ruins of the Church and the Monarchy, the Archbishop of Canterbury having been beheaded, the bishops and clergy driven from their duties, the Prayer Book having been outlawed, and the King awaiting in prison the last sad scene of what has been not inaptly called his "martyrdom," which took place within sight of the places where the Assembly and the Parliament were sitting by whom the ruin was effected.

The hour in which the Puritans attained their final triumph was, however, the hour in which their power began to wane. During the next twelve years Sectarianism broke up their ranks, the country became tired of their tyranny, and while the BAPTISTS, INDEPENDENTS, and QUAKERS, with minor sects which separated from them, cared nothing for the "Discipline" of the Presbyterian system, the people at large began to long for the return of that old Church which had been so recklessly thrust aside. By the time the longed-for restoration had taken place the Puritans as a party in the Church of England had ceased to exist. [NONCONFORMISTS. LOW CHURCHMEN.]

The temporary ruin which the Puritans brought on the Church was the result in no small degree of that strong self-appreciation which led them to look with extreme contempt on the works of former times. Their own days they looked upon as far better than the days of their fathers, and though there was no constructive ability in the party at any time to replace by those which were better the institutions, the fabrics, the works of art, and the literary treasures which they despised, yet they destroyed them in the most ruthless manner, perceiving nothing admirable in anything that was old, and utterly regardless of the fact that they who inherit national heirlooms from their fathers are trustees of them for their own children. Thus it is to them, chiefly, that we owe also the ruin of hundreds of national buildings, such as Fountains, Tintern, Reading, St. Mary's, York, Whitby, and Tynemouth. Even the cathedrals themselves were scarcely spared by them, Puritan deans, like Whittingham of Durham, stripping them of their lead and much besides for the profit of themselves and their families. Probably there were not a few Puritans in the sixteenth century who agreed with Beza when he wrote: "I could wish those great temples . . . had been demolished from the beginning, and others more convenient for sermons and the administration of the Sacraments had been erected" [Beza's Colloq. ii. 29]: or in the seventeenth century, who agreed with another writer, "As for pompous cathedrals . . . I have no more to say for them, but that it were well if, with the high places, they were pulled down, and the materials thereof converted to a better use"¹ [Nehushtan, 1688, p. 73]. The dense "Philistinism" of the party could see nothing but idols in the beautiful sculptures and paintings with which English churches had until their time abounded, and the destruction of these by them long left the impression that there had been no national school of art, and that England had been in a rude condition as regards everything artistic, while other nations had reached almost the perfection of taste and design.² Nor was it merely in matters connected with the Church that the Puritans shewed their utter want of culture: for libraries were destroyed by them without any attempt to select the books which might be offensive to their system from those which were not so: all the noble collection of volumes contained in that which is now known as the Bodleian Library being, among others, burned or sent abroad, and the very shelves and desks sold as worthless lumber by them in 1550 [Macray's Annals of Bodl. Libr. p. 11].

It may be observed, in conclusion, that there has never been any revival of the original "Puritan platform" in the Church of England since it had its trial during the time of the Commonwealth. The Calvinistic doctrine which they held was inherited by the Low Church party, but no important section of the Church has ever since the Restoration advocated the introduction of the Presbyterian system of Church government instead of Episcopacy. The Disciplinary idea as to the oversight of morals was to some extent revived by the Societies for the Reformation of manners, and by the class system which John Wesley borrowed from the Moravians. But the former soon became intolerable, and the latter has never gained a firm footing in connection with the Church. Although, therefore, the Puritans have been in some degree represented in later generations, the most distinctive features of their system have never been reproduced; and Puritanism may thus be said to have burned itself out in the fierce successes to which it attained in the middle of the seventeenth century.

² "Among other directions sent from the King" James I. "one was for repairing of the chapel" of Holyrood House, "and some English carpenters were employed, who brought with them portraits of the Apostles to be set in the pews or stalls." It was soon rumoured that idols were being set up in the Royal Chapel, and the Bishop of Galloway, who was Dean of the Chapel, wrote to the King on the subject. "The answer returned by the King" [on March 13th, 1617] "was full of anger, objecting ignorance unto them that could not distinguish betwixt pictures intended for ornament and decoration, and images erected for worship and adoration: and resembling them to the constable of Castile, who being sent to swear the peace concluded with Spain, when he understood the business was to be performed in the chapel where some anthems were to be sung, desired that whatsoever was sung, God's name might not be used in it, and that being forbore, he was content they should sing what they listed. Just so, said the King, you can endure lions, dragons, and devils, to be figured in your churches, but will not allow the like place to the Patriarchs and Apostles" [Spottiswoode's Hist. Ch. Scotl. iii. 239, ed. 1851].

PUSEYITES. A name given to High Churchmen of the "Tractarian" school, from Dr. Edward Bouverie Pusey, Canon of Christ Church, and Regius Professor of Hebrew, for more than a third of a century, in Oxford. In the year 1870 Dr. Pusey wrote respecting this party-name as follows: "I never was a party leader. I never acted on any system. My name was used first to designate those of us who gave themselves to revive the teaching of forgotten truth and piety, because I first had occasion to write on Baptismal Regeneration. But it was used by opponents, not by confederates. We should have thought it a note against us to have deserved any party name, or to have been anything but the followers of Jesus, the disciples of the Church, the sons and pupils of the great Fathers whom He raised up in her. I never had any temptation to try to form a party, for it was against our principles.

. . . Then, personally, I was the more exempt from this temptation, because God has given me neither the peculiar organizing abilities which tempt men to it, nor any office (as that of an Archdeacon) which would entitle me directly to counsel others. . . . My life, contrary to the character of party-leaders, has been spent in a succession of insulated efforts; bearing, indeed, upon our one great end, the growth of Catholic truth and piety among us, or contrariwise, resistance to what might hinder, retard, or obscure it; but still insulated." [Pusey's Eirenicon, iii. 338.]

PYRRHONISTS. A name given to the extreme school of Sceptics, which denies the possibility of attaining to any certainty or absolute truth. It is derived from Pyrrho of Elis [B.C. 360-270], the originator of Greek Scepticism. This extreme form of doubt was revived at Alexandria in the first century after Christ by Ænesidemus, but lay dormant again for many centuries, until it was again resuscitated in the philosophy of Kant. [SCEPTICS.]

QUADRISACRAMENTARIANS. A controversial name for some German reformers in Wittenberg and its neighbourhood, who maintained that there are four Sacraments necessary to salvation, namely, Baptism, the Lord's Supper, Absolution, and Holy Orders. Some who held such an opinion are mentioned by Melancthon. [Melancthon's Loc. Comm.]

QUAKER BAPTISTS. [KEITHIANS.]

QUAKERS. The popular name of a sect which represents the extreme form of Puritanism, and which originated about the year 1650 in Yorkshire, Durham, Lancashire, and Cumberland, under the leadership of three young men named James Naylor, Richard Farnworth, and George Fox.

The idea of "quaking and trembling" was very common among the extreme Puritans, and the founders of the Quaker sect probably derived it as a prominent characteristic of religion from the TRASKITES. The early use of the name is illustrated by one of the first publications of the sect, a tract of Richard Farnworth of Balby in Yorkshire, printed in 1652, and entitled "A Discovery of Truth and Falsehood, . . . written from the Spirit of the Lord by one whom the Prince of the World calls a Quaker, but is of the Divine Nature made a partaker." They began by calling themselves "The people of the Lord," "The people of God," "Children of Light," etc.; but they soon accepted the popular title given to them, as when in 1653 Naylor, in his "Power and Glory of the Lord shining out of the North," quotes many texts of Scripture to shew that the earth trembled and quaked, that Isaac trembled exceedingly, that Moses feared and quaked, that the Lord bade His disciples quake for fear, and that therefore saints ought to be Quakers. Thus they were, in their own language, "the people called Quakers," "the poor Quakers," "the despised Quakers." Afterwards it became customary for them to use the name "Friends," as in "A True Account of the Proceeding, Sense and Advice of the people called Quakers, at the yearly meeting of Faithful Friends and Brethren," in 1694; and towards the end of the last century this was formally fixed upon the sect in the title "Society of Friends." In Pagitt's Heresiology, which was written shortly after the rise of the sect, they are called "Quakers and Shakers" [Pagitt's Heresiol. 244].

Baxter says that the Quakers "were but the Ranters turned from horrid profaneness and blasphemy to a life of extreme austerity on the other side." "Their doctrines," he adds, "were mostly the same with the Ranters." He attributes their origin to Naylor, says nothing of Fox, and adds, "But of late one William Penn is become their leader, and would reform the sect, and set up a kind of ministry among them" [Baxter's Life and Times, i. 77]. Pagitt also traces them up to Naylor as their founder, and says that they were "thickest set in the North parts."

James Naylor [A.D. 1616-1660] was a Wakefield man, "a member," as General Lambert said, "of a very sweet society of an Independent Church." He certainly helped largely to spread the fanaticism which afterwards developed into Quakerism, especially in his native county and on the Fells of Lancashire and Westmoreland; but this fanaticism reached to such a height about the year 1655 that Naylor was repudiated by Fox and his friends. He was imprisoned in Exeter gaol, and while there allowed himself to be addressed by his followers as "The Everlasting Son, the Prince of Peace, the fairest among ten thousand," and it was believed, if not asserted by himself, that he had power to raise the dead to life. Having been set free, he went in triumphal procession through Glastonbury and Wells, men and women strewing his path with their clothes, and walking bareheaded before him, as in the case of the fanatic Prince in recent times. [PRINCEITES.] At Bristol the crowds carried this blasphemous parody so far as to shout Hosanna, and hymns were sung to his praise in the words of the Song of Solomon. The scandal caused by these proceedings led to Naylor's being again imprisoned by order of the Parliament, and having been brought to trial in 1656 before the House of Commons, he narrowly escaped capital sentence. After a violent debate, he was condemned to be pilloried at Westminster, whipped thence to the Old Exchange, to be there pilloried again for two hours, to have his tongue bored through with a hot iron, and his forehead branded with the letter B. Thence he was carried to Bristol, conveyed through the city on a horse's back with his face to the tail, and whipped publicly on the next market-day in five different places. He was then sent back to be kept in solitary confinement in London, with no other sustenance than what he could earn. After a time spent in prison he recanted, was released by the Rump Parliament, and readmitted into the Society which had disowned him. Naylor died at King's Ripton, near Huntingdon, just before the Restoration.

George Fox [A.D. 1624-1691], the other principal founder of the Quaker sect, was the son of a Leicestershire weaver, and was brought up as a cobbler in Drayton, his native village, in that county. As he grew up he became a victim to those fits of religious despondency which characterized the religious life of the lower classes in Puritan times: and under the influence of these he became unfit for work, and wandered about the country under the pretext of seeking rest for his troubled spirit. He applied for direction to a clergyman, the curate of Mancetter in Warwickshire, who told him to smoke tobacco and sing psalms. Another counselled a course of physic and bleeding, advice doubtless excellent so far as it went, but insufficient to satisfy the cravings of the ignorant enthusiast. All his advisers proving equally "blind guides" to him, he was thrown back upon his own resources. At length, in May 1646, light seemed to dawn upon him; his doubts were removed, and he obtained peace of mind. At the same time the revelation from above was granted to him (as he fancied), that it was not a university education which fitted a man for the ministry, but that the Spirit enlightened whom He would; and that, moreover, he himself was the subject of spiritual revelations. His belief was that every man, Christian or heathen, had naturally a portion of Divine light in him, the gift of the Spirit, which, if he would follow, he might attain to perfection. About 1649, Fox began to wander about the country in Warwickshire, Nottinghamshire, and Derbyshire, haranguing all who would listen to him. He used to force himself into the churches, and interrupt the service by wild denunciations, for which he was often beaten and imprisoned. He also delivered his testimony before magistrates, in part orally and in part by strange wordy epistles, for which he was rewarded by the stocks or imprisonment. The chief plea urged against him was contempt of court, since he regarded it as a deadly sin to uncover his head before the justices. At Mansfield, for example, where he had interrupted the service, he was beaten, placed in the stocks, and afterwards hunted with stones out of the town. At Derby, in 1650, he was brought before the magistrates for brawling, when Justice Gervase Bennet, an Independent, who signed the mittimus for his imprisonment, nicknamed him Quaker, alluding to the shakings which he made part of his ritual, and to his exhortations to his hearers to quake. In prison he converted his jailor, and issued pretentious warnings to magistrates, clergy and people, till the alarmed authorities afforded him facilities for escape, hoping thus, but in vain, to get rid of him. As he had brought under his influence a company of soldiers quartered in the town, the Parliamentary Commissioners offered Fox the post of captain. For his refusal he was again imprisoned; when in his confinement he revolved schemes for reforming the gaols and restraining capital punishment. Upon his release, in 1651, he extended his range to Lincolnshire, Yorkshire, Northumberland, and the Lake district, where he co-operated with Naylor, and drew together a large number of converts.

At this time the followers of Fox drew persecution upon themselves from the Puritans by their extravagances, the worst of which Fox did not imitate, though he did not withhold his approbation. Some went through the towns and villages naked for a testimony. One female proselyte presented herself in that state before the Protector in Whitehall Chapel. A man took up his station outside the Parliament House with a drawn sword, with which he assaulted every one who passed by.

These excesses led to so general a persecution of the sect by the dominant religionists, that, in the year 1657, there are said to have been 140 Quakers in prison, while in the six years previous [A.D. 1651-1657] as many as 1900 had been imprisoned, of whom 21 died under their persecution.

In 1659 they presented to Parliament a long protest against the ill-treatment that they had received; their leader being at the time in Lancaster Castle, where he was confined in a cell so smoky that he could hardly distinguish the miserable light that was allowed him. The accession of Charles II. procured his release, and that of 200 of his followers. The King was willing to grant them toleration, and made a favourable reply to a congratulatory address which they presented to him, pledging his word to that effect; but the rising of Venner kindled the suspicions of the Government: for though the Quakers were not really concerned in it, they had already given abundant evidence of that tenacious pugnacity by which the sect—in spite of its peaceable pretensions—has always been distinguished, and had not yet learned to veil their pugnacity by ostentatiously smooth words. Their refusal to take the oath of allegiance, though it sprang not from disaffection to the Government, but from a conviction of the unlawfulness of all oaths, told strongly against them, inasmuch that, in 1662, an Act was passed against them for refusing to take lawful oaths. In the same year a more specific Act was passed against them, prohibiting their assembling for public worship under the penalty of £5, and transportation for the third offence [14 Carol. II. c. 1.]. Men were transported to Barbadoes, and women to Jamaica, where they were sold as slaves to the colonists for a longer or shorter period. In 1665 it was actually ordered that no captain should be allowed to sail to the West Indies without a pass, which was only granted to those who professed themselves willing to transport Quakers [Sewel, Hist. vol. i.]. Though the Conventicle and Five Mile Acts were not directed particularly against them, they felt their effects more than did the other Dissenters, and that because their consciences would not allow them to conceal their opinions or to meet in secrecy. On the contrary, when their meeting-houses were closed, they would preach in the public streets. Two of their number, Penn and Mead, were brought before the Recorder of London, and indicted for having caused a riot in Gracechurch Street. They were acquitted after a lengthy trial, but the jurors were on that account fined forty marks each, and the two Quakers were sent to prison for contempt of court, because they refused to uncover their heads.

It was about this time that a great change came over the society. Fox was an uneducated man of narrow understanding, as appears in his many writings, some of which are in such atrocious English as to be barely intelligible. But he was now joined by men of higher social position, of superior intelligence and refinement, who, while they ever looked up to him as their master spiritually, practically took the management of affairs into their own hands, and gave a new tone to the Society. They also edited his writings and translated them into better English. Of these the most celebrated were Keith, Barclay, and William Penn. Henceforth we hear no more of disturbances in churches and outrages upon public decency, and on the other hand, if the Quakers were persecuted at all, it was partly in common with all other sects, and partly because they refused to pay tithes, to take oaths, or to give the proper marks of respect to persons in office.

At the accession of James II. they petitioned the King for toleration, on the grounds that he equally with them dissented from the Established Church. They complained that three hundred and twenty of their number had died in prison in the preceding reign, among whom were two celebrated preachers, Burroughs and Howgill. James was inclined to favour them, mainly for the sake of Penn, who was the son of Sir William Penn, an old naval friend.

William Penn [A.D. 1644-1718] had been drawn over to the Quakers while he was an undergraduate of Christ Church, and the first consequence of his conversion was that he refused to wear his surplice in chapel: for which, in 1662, he was expelled from Oxford. He openly joined the Quakers in 1666, to the great grief of his father, and when the young Quaker positively refused to "worship" the King by taking off his hat in the royal presence, the Admiral turned him out of doors. He was however shortly afterwards reconciled to him, and at his death left him lands to the yearly value of £1500, together with claims upon the Government which he afterwards turned to good account. Meanwhile Penn had twice suffered imprisonment, once on the occasion above mentioned, and before this for a tract, "The Sandy Foundation Shaken," in which he objected to the doctrine of the Trinity. Other writings of his attracted attention to the views of the Quakers from those who would have shewn scant courtesy to the wild ungrammatical rhapsodies of Fox. His connexion with America had brought him into great notoriety, so that, at the accession of James, Penn was the acknowledged mouthpiece of the Society. As such he was trusted and loved by James, partly on account of his own character, and partly because through the Quakers James very naturally saw a means for obtaining a better position for his own co-religionists.

Through Penn's influence, the Quakers enjoyed peace and quietness both in England and Ireland so long as James was on the throne. Nor did the Revolution make much difference to them, except indeed in Ireland, where they shared in the misfortunes of that unhappy country. In the insurrection of the native Irish, their loss has been estimated by Macaulay at £100,000, or more than three times as much in the value of our money [Macaulay, Hist. Eng. iv. 166]. But the great gain that befell them was through the Toleration Act, under which they were allowed to hold meetings in peace upon their signing a declaration against Transubstantiation, a promise of fidelity to the Government, and a confession of faith in the Trinity and in the inspiration of Holy Scriptures. On both these last points Fox and Barclay had given in their writings signs of heterodoxy, nor was Penn quite free from suspicion. In 1696 an Act received the royal assent allowing the affirmation of Quakers to be received in a court of law in place of an oath. Since that time the only change in their external position towards the State has been that, in 1723, they were admitted to the freedom of corporations without oath, and of course the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts brought the same relief to them that it did to other Dissenters.

The change which came over the sect at the end of the seventeenth century is shewn by the account given of it in the early editions of The Present State of England. After describing their origin, the writer goes on to say, "They practised formerly abstinence and self-denial, but now of late none are prouder or more luxurious than the generality of them. They formerly wore plain and coarse clothes, now the men wear very fine cloth, and are distinguished from others only by a particular shaping of their coats, a little plaited cravat, and a slender hatband. The women nevertheless wear flowered, or striped, or damask silks; and the finest linen cut and plaited in imitation of lace; but they wear no lace or superfluous ribbons. However they are extremely nice in the choice of tailors, sempstresses and laundresses. Those of the men who wear perriwigs have 'em of genteel hair and shape, tho' not long. They are as curious in their meats and as cheerful in their drink, and as soft in their amours, and as much in the enjoyment of life as others." [Chamberlain, Pres. St. of Eng. 1702, p. 259.]

In America the Quakers increased more than in England or Ireland, and have held their ground with greater tenacity, though their commencement was most unpromising, for they at first suffered severe persecution from the "Pilgrim Fathers" of New England. [INDEPENDENTS.] Two women of the sect were the first to appear at Boston in 1656, but they were not suffered to land. Their books were seized and burnt, and they themselves were imprisoned on board their vessel, and after a brief interval were sent back again. Eight others met with the like treatment in the same year; and a law was passed in the Colony forbidding their introduction on pain of imprisonment. Still they increased in number, so that in 1658 a more stringent Act was passed against them.

A fine of £100 was imposed upon any colonist who should bring in a Quaker, with an addition of £5 for every hour's concealment; the male Quaker for his first appearance in the country had one ear cut off, and was imprisoned until he should have worked out the cost of his passage back to England; for the second offence his other ear was cut off, and he was imprisoned in like manner. The women were for the first and second offence severely whipped and imprisoned, and for the third had their tongues bored through with a hot iron. To account for this greater severity in their case, it must be remembered that women were not only allowed, but encouraged by the Quakers to exercise the ministerial office. It must be remembered that all these severe punishments were inflicted, not for any overt act, as in England for brawling in churches, insulting magistrates, or outraging public decency, or for making any converts, but for the bare fact of their having landed in the colony. And this was done by those pretended champions of civil and religious liberty, the "Pilgrim Fathers," the Puritans of New England. But worse things yet remain to be told. The Quakers still increased in number, and therefore at a later period in the same year an Act passed the General Court of Boston, at the petition of the Puritan ministers, inflicting banishment for the first offence, and death for the second, that is, for mere re-appearance in the colony. A bare majority, that is, two out of three justices, without any jury, were thus made competent to inflict capital punishment.

And the Act was enforced. Many Quakers were exiled, and some who returned were put to death. Gough gives the particulars of two men and one woman who thus suffered in 1659. The persecution was stayed by the Restoration, one of the first Acts of the new Government being to require that the Quakers should be sent over to England and there tried. As a matter of fact the Act of 1658 was illegal, and henceforth fell through; but for a long time the Quakers were exposed to severe persecution throughout the States of New England. They were frequently whipped through three towns.

But they had shortly afterwards their city of refuge on the same continent in Pennsylvania. Fox himself had visited Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas, but it does not appear that his progress was attended by much success. Penn also appeared in America in 1677, and purchased an estate in New Jersey; but in 1681 the means of making a more important and lasting settlement were thrown into his hands. His father the Admiral had advanced money to the Government for the service of the navy, and as he was an intimate friend of the Duke of York, he fared better than the ordinary creditors of the Crown in those days. The son received in lieu of payment a grant of land on the West of the Delaware, large enough to make a European kingdom—an easy way of paying the debt, which cost Charles nothing, as the country was still in the possession of the natives, and did not produce one farthing of revenue. In 1682, Penn sailed thither with a large body of colonists, men of his own way of thinking, and founded the city of Philadelphia, which became the head of a State, called after him Pennsylvania by his devoted followers, but against his own wishes. But Penn was a conscientious man, and fully believed in the rights of the aborigines. He accordingly did what no other colonist in America before or after him, except his followers, ever did: he assembled the native chiefs, and purchased from them the land that he required. This statesmanlike example was followed afterwards by his successors in the province when they wished to extend their settlements: and the consequence was that Pennsylvania alone of the American States has never known the horrors of a war with the Indians.

Penn drew up for his colony a peculiar code of regulations. He allowed full toleration to all Deists, but required that his officials should be believers in Jesus, and men of unblemished moral character. A compulsory system of State education was established, requiring every child to be taught the elements, and at the age of twelve years to be put forth to some trade. Great crimes were punished by solitary confinement and hard labour. He restricted the punishment of death to cases of murder and high treason: an equitable court with a mixed jury settled all disputes with the natives. [Gough, Hist. v.; see also Bibliothèque Britannique, xv. p. 310.]

After some years' stay in America he returned home, and became a great and deserved favourite with James II. The Revolution brought him into corresponding disfavour with the new Government. James had protected him and those of his sect, and had moreover been his father's friend, whereupon Penn naturally clung to him in his adversity. He has been accused, in common with many others of all classes and parties, of corresponding with the exiled King, and even of being implicated in Preston's plot. He was more than once arrested, but the Government could get up no case against him. He was deprived indeed of his colony, but it was shortly afterwards restored to him by William, who declared that the only grave accusations against him were groundless. Upon his death he offered the government to the Crown for £12,000. His sect has continued to flourish there, and in America generally they have thriven better than in England. In 1856 the number of American Quakers was estimated at 160,000.

Though the Quakers have no authorized formularies to which they can appeal for confirmation of doctrine, they have not been without their disputes and schisms. The most celebrated was that of the Keithians, under George Keith, one of the most refined and learned of the early Quakers. He had followed Penn to America, but was there accused of holding erroneous views concerning the human nature of our Lord, which he supposed to be twofold, the one celestial and spiritual, the other terrestrial and corporeal [Crœsi Historia Quakeriana, iii. 446]. It is a question whether he really meant anything more than that our Lord is, as touching His humanity, of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting; but the early American Quakers had strong Deistical tendencies, and Keith was specially unpopular with his brethren because he opposed their system of allegorizing the Gospels, whereby the historical facts of our Lord's life on earth were explained away into a symbolical representation of the origin of Christianity. These views did not prevail extensively among the Quakers of Europe, but some of those in America even went so far as to say that Christ never existed at all except in the hearts of the faithful, thus carrying out to its logical extent the principle whereby Fox overruled our Lord's express injunctions respecting the Sacraments. But to these theories Keith offered a most strenuous opposition, and soon gathered together a large body of followers. In 1695 he was expelled from the Society by Penn, and returned to England, where he headed a congregation that met for worship in Turner's Hall, Philpot Lane. These restored the Sacraments, but retained the language, dress, and manners of Quakers, and accordingly were called Quaker Baptists. But this position was too anomalous for Keith to continue in it for long. In 1700 he conformed to the Church, took Holy Orders, and was presented to the living of Edburton, Sussex, which he held till his death [Burnet, Hist. of his own Times, ii. 249]. The Quakers however never forgave his desertion, and have charged him with neglect of his clerical duties, and rigorous exactions of tithes from his poorer parishioners. [KEITHIANS.]

The Keithians in America continued for some time to form a separate sect, but at length dwindled away to a very small body, which, in the course of the last century, became reabsorbed into the original body. For a change then came over the Quakers generally. Their ancestors of Philadelphia had displayed signs of a tendency towards Socinianism, and a denial of the personality of the Holy Ghost. Even Penn had fallen under suspicion, although he vehemently asserted his essential orthodoxy on both of these points in a pamphlet, "Innocency with her Open Face." No such suspicions can now be attached to the sect. In their reverence also for Holy Scripture the Quakers indeed go beyond their founder. In the beginning of the present century, when Elias Hicks, a minister of Philadelphia, taught that the inward light was superior as an authority to the Scriptures—the very principle of Fox—and that our Lord suffered as an example only, he was expelled from the sect. [HICKSITES.] In other matters also the Quakers have departed from their founder, as in their views on the unlawfulness of war. Fox complained that some of his disciples were dismissed from the Protector's army, although they could fight better than the best; and in a letter to Cromwell he exhorted him to come out and let no one take his crown: to let his soldiers go forth with a free and willing heart, so that he might rock the nations as a cradle [Letter and Advice, p. 27, etc.]. At the accession of Charles

II. it was first revealed to him that self-defence was unlawful. So they now disapprove of capital punishment, but Penn retained it in his laws for Pennsylvania, and the whole Society, at least the English branch, clamoured for the blood of Spencer Cowper in 1699, for the alleged murder of a Quakeress, and even appealed against the verdict of "Not guilty," as was possible in those days [Macaulay's Hist. Eng. viii. 233].

Upon the whole, the change that has come over the sect has been decidedly for the better. They are more orthodox than their original representatives on the doctrine of the Trinity and the value of Scripture. They have retained some strange but innocent peculiarities of dress and language, and have settled down into a sober and industrious body, peaceful and peace-loving except where tithes, and until lately, church rates, are concerned, when they display something of their old pugnacity.

The sect has always been conspicuous for works of practical benevolence. They have very few poor in their community, and such as they have are mostly those who have been reduced by some mischance from a better state of things, but they relieve and help them out of their own resources. In the case of many excellent reforms which this century has witnessed, either the first idea was started by Quakers, or they rendered valuable support to those who took them in hand. Thus Fox himself first suggested that reformation of prisons which Howard effected a century later. They were firm and useful supporters of Wilberforce in his efforts against the slave-trade. One of their number, Mrs Fry, devoted herself to the cause of education long before the idea of popular education had dawned upon the minds of ministers of State or members of Parliament. William Forster during the Irish potato famine lent invaluable aid to those who sought to lessen the sufferings of the unfortunate peasantry. He also distinguished himself by his efforts on behalf of the slaves in the United States; and interested himself in a work which, to him as a Quaker, must have been peculiarly distasteful, an attempt to promote the spiritual good of actors in London theatres. Though they ordinarily despise the fine arts as useless and frivolous, they have had a painter in Benjamin West, and a novelist in Mrs. Opie; neither of whom, it is true, attained to high excellence.

The number of the Quakers has been on the decline for the last hundred years and more. In England [this diminution has been marked and rapid. They find it difficult to retain their younger members, partly owing to their archaisms of dress and language, from which the youthful mind naturally recoils, while owing to the greater publicity of modern life, and the close blending together of different classes, they have become more conspicuous; and partly owing to their strictness, which will not make any allowance for the innocent desires of youth. Other elements in producing their decline have also been their direct opposition alike to the letter and to the spirit of Holy Scripture; their system of female preaching; their non-use of Sacraments, and the intense subjectivity of a religion of which the chief ordinance is meditation. The reading of Scripture and the voice of prayer are almost unknown in their meetings, which are marked chiefly by silence, varied by exhortations confined to a very limited range of subjects. Those who leave the Society usually join the Church, other sects of Dissenters having little or no attraction for them.

In 1800 there were 413 Quaker meeting-houses in the United Kingdom; these had diminished in 1871 to 372. Their numbers were set down in the census of 1851 as 14,000. There is a large number at Falmouth, where some of the descendants of Fox are still to be found, and also at Darlington near Durham.

About the year 1840 a secession from the Irish Quakers took place, the members of which have adopted a custom originated by some of the early ancestors of the sect in England, that of dressing wholly in white, from which they are called "White Quakers." What information has been obtained from a voluminous collection of tracts and broadsides printed by their leaders shews that they are Antinomians of the worst description, practising profligacy under the pretence of inspiration, and cloaking villainy in the most sanctimonious language current with the parent sect. The White Quakers are a small community, of which there are very few out of Dublin.

QUAKERS, SHAKING. [SHAKERS.]

QUARTODECIMANS. Those who celebrated Easter, or more strictly speaking the Paschal Feast, at the time of the Jewish Passover, that is, on the fourteenth day of the moon or month Nisan, whatever day of the week that happened to be. The name thus taken from the particular day of observance was, by some at least, extended so as to include, without regard to its proper meaning, all who did not obey the decrees of the Councils of Nicæa and Antioch, which ordered Easter to be kept on the first Sunday after the full moon. For Epiphanius says that some of the Quartodecimans in Cappadocia always kept their pasch on a fixed day, namely on the eighth of the Kalends of April, the 25th of March; maintaining, on the authority of the Acts of Pilate, that day to be the true day of our Saviour's Passion [Epiph. Hær. l.]. These, then, were not properly Quartodecimans, but were classed with them as disobeying the Nicene decree. The Nicene decree was founded on the custom of the Western Church, with which agreed the custom of the Churches of Palestine, Jerusalem, and Cæsarea. The Churches of Asia Minor followed the Jewish rule.

The matter had been debated between Polycarp and Anicetus when Polycarp visited Rome.

Polycarp urged that he had kept Easter according to the Asiatic custom, with St. John and the rest of the Apostles with whom he associated; Anicetus urged that he too was bound to maintain the custom of all his predecessors¹ in the See of Rome [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 24]. Neither of the two would give up the custom of his Church; but no breach of communion or of charity followed. About the year 196 a sharper controversy arose. Victor wished to introduce uniformity by enforcing the Western custom on the whole Church. His zeal, which, it must be allowed, led to intemperate and overbearing measures, was roused by the danger of the introduction of Judaism through this Judaic observance, and by a supposed connection between Quartodecimanism and Montanism. The former danger, it will be seen, was not imaginary; the latter connection may seem to have no foundation in principle, but it will be found as we proceed that Quartodecimanism has a tendency to connect itself with an undue rigour of discipline and practice. In the appendix to Tertullian's Treatise on Heresies, it is said that one Blastus, who joined the Montanists, wished to introduce Judaism, and advocated the Asiatic Easter custom. This Blastus appears at Rome as a leader of schism. Irenæus remonstrated with him in a letter "On Schism," but Blastus was deposed from the presbytery [ibid. v. 15-20]. Moved, as it appears, by the schismatical proceedings of Blastus, Victor pressed upon the Asiatic Churches the relinquishment of their ancient custom. Under the leadership of Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, they refused. Victor, strengthened by synodical determinations of the Churches of Cæsarea, Jerusalem, Pontus, Corinth, Osroene, and Gaul, to the effect that the Resurrection of our Lord should be celebrated only on the Lord's Day, up to which day the Paschal Fast should continue, issued letters of excommunication against the Asiatic Churches, and moved the Churches which sided with him to cease from communion with them. But the bishops, and particularly Irenæus, resisted this measure, admonished Victor of his too great haste, and restored peace. Both parties continued undisturbed in the observance of their own customs till the Council of Nicæa [ibid. v. 23, 24].

That there was real danger of Judaism entering through the Asiatic custom appears not only from the example of Blastus, but from the account which Hippolytus gives, some twenty-five years later, of the Quartodecimans. Considering the part which Irenæus took in the controversy, and that Irenæus, although he followed the Western usage in his own Church, had been a Quartodeciman by early association with Polycarp, whose example both he and Polycrates pressed so strongly upon Victor; considering also that Hippolytus was a disciple of Irenæus, the account given by the former is very remarkable. The sectarian spirit of the Quartodecimans is pointed out. They are described as contentious by nature, wholly uninformed as regards knowledge, and more than usually quarrelsome. Further, Hippolytus adds, they do not look to that which was spoken by the Apostle, "I testify to every man that is circumcised that he is a debtor to do the whole law" [Hippol. Refut. Hær. viii. 11]. If from this we are not entitled to infer with certainty that circumcision was itself introduced, it is quite certain that in Hippolytus' opinion the Asiatic custom was no longer the innocent custom it had been in the days of Polycarp and St. John, but that an attempt was founded upon it to enforce the whole law. If Hippolytus be a competent witness, the toleration procured by Irenæus was much misused; Victor, greatly as he may have erred in the manner of his proceedings, was right in his desire to put an end to the Asiatic custom; and the Councils of Nicæa and Antioch had a more pressing cause for their decrees than the mere love of uniformity.¹

Before proceeding to these decrees, one or two earlier enactments require notice. The seventh (or eighth) Apostolical Canon orders the deposition of clergy celebrating the paschal feast before the vernal equinox, as the Jews do. It is not necessary to enter into the subject of the defective Jewish calculations, which frequently brought the spring month Nisan before the equinox; for our present purpose it is to be noticed that this canon, while it does not forbid the keeping the paschal feast on the fourteenth day of the first month regularly calculated, supposes that the Christian Church is to make its own independent calculation, and not to rest on the current Jewish calendar. It is not improbable that the canon was made by Eastern Quartodecimans. Again, Epiphanius quotes an old Apostolical Constitution which directs that the feast should be kept at the same time at which it was celebrated by the brethren of the circumcision, without being concerned for mistakes in their calculations. But the constitution as we now have it (v. 16) directs the pasch to be kept after the equinox, not with the Jews, with whom Christians have no communion. Ussher refers the canon and the new constitution to the time of the Paschal Canon of Anatolius, an Alexandrian and Bishop of Laodicea [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 32]. His canon exists in a Latin translation by Rufinus, and is translated in the Ante-Nicene Library, vol. xiv. He insists strongly on the necessity of observing the pasch after the equinox.

The Council of Arles [A.D. 314] ordered that Easter should be generally observed on one and the same day, and that letters fixing the day should be issued as usual by the metropolitan [Can. i.]. The custom of the Gallic Church was to keep Easter on the Sunday, and this canon refers to the appointment of the same Sunday.

We may proceed now to the Council of Nicæa. One reason for summoning the Council of Nicæa was that they of Syria, Cilicia and Mesopotamia went haltingly (ἐχέλευον) with regard to the feast, and kept their pasch with the Jews [Athanas. de Synod. c. 5]. Eusebius [de Vita Const. iii. 5], and Sozomen [Hist. Eccl. i. 15], shew that the feast was kept by some not merely at the Jewish time, but after a Jewish fashion. Constantine had sent Hosius into the East to quiet if possible this dispute, as well as the dispute between Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria, and Arius. Hosius' mission was fruitless. At the council, therefore, a decree was made that Easter should be observed by all on the Sunday which followed the fourteenth of the moon next after the vernal equinox. It is agreed that Canon xxi., which is on this matter, is spurious; but there is no doubt that such a decree was made [Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 17-18; Socrates, Hist. Eccl. i. 9; Theod. Hist. Eccl. i. 10]. By the Council of Antioch [A.D. 341] this decree was re-enacted and guarded by a sentence of excommunication. From this time, therefore, it became a schismatical act to disobey the decree; and rules were made regarding the Quartodecimans, which treat them as schismatics or heretics. Thus the Council of Laodicea [A.D. 367] directs that converts from their body shall be received after they have anathematized all heresy, and may partake of the Holy Mysteries after they have been anointed with the chrism. Johnson notes upon this (from Aristenus) that the Quartodecimans were Novatians in not admitting lapsed persons to penance. Sozomen, however, states [Hist. Eccl. vi. 24] that about A.D. 374 the Novatianists in Phrygia, contrary to their former custom, began to celebrate their pasch at the same time as the Jews. And under the reign of Theodosius and Valentinian II. [A.D. 375-395], he narrates the controversies and schisms among the Novatianists on this point [vii. 18]. [NOVATIANISTS.] The Council of Laodicea, therefore, it must be concluded, made their enactment regarding the Quartodecimans without any reference to Novatian error. The Laodicean rule was again enacted by the first Council of Constantinople [can. vii.], A.D. 381; and by the second of Constantinople, or Quinisextine, A.D. 692 [can. xcv.]. About the year 370, according to Theodoret, or in the time of Arius, according to Epiphanius, flourished Audæus. He was a Syrian of Mesopotamia, much esteemed in his own country, as Epiphanius acknowledges, for holiness of life, and zeal for the faith. The freedom with which he censured the corrupt manners of the clergy brought upon him much ill-treatment, which he endured for some time, till at length he separated from the Church [Epiph. Hær. lxx.; Theod. fab. Hæret. iv. 9; August. Hær. l.]. He is charged by some with Anthropomorphism, and licentiousness, but Epiphanius acquits him; and when Epiphanius acquits it is generally safe to accept his verdict. Audæus was banished by the Emperor, and went among the Goths, many of whom he converted. His chief peculiarity was his Quartodeciman practice. This practice he maintained to be the ancient custom, confirmed by the Apostolical Constitutions. The Nicæan rule he held to be an innovation adopted in complaisance to Constantine. In this may be noticed again the tendency of Quartodecimanism to connect itself with the sects which pressed Church discipline into undue rigour, and carried asceticism to an extreme. [AUDIANS.]

The body of Quartodecimans then, it appears, passed into the Audians and Novatianists; the latter adding to their other causes of separation from the Church the Jewish celebration of Easter, the former separating on this point alone. For Augustine writes, from Epiphanius, that they separated themselves "culpendo Episcopos divites, et pascha cum Judæis celebrando." The inculcation of rich bishops can scarcely have been a formal cause of schism. The imperial laws were severe upon the Audians as schismatics. Theodosius the Great in one of his laws ranked them with the Manichees, forbade their conventicles, confiscated their goods, rendered them intestate, and liable also to capital punishment [Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 5; de Hæret. leg. 9; Bingham's Antiq. XX. v. 3].

Into the differences which arose from the difficulty of ascertaining the Sunday to be observed as Easter Sunday, it is quite unnecessary to enter. They were brought about by no difference of principle, but only through imperfect calculation. These variations appear in the history of the Churches of France and Britain, which retained the old Roman mode of calculation, and were found to be at variance with the new Roman or Alexandrian Canon, which was brought into use in the Roman Church by Dionysius Exiguus in the year 525.

QUESNEL. [JANSENISTS.]

QUIETISTS. A school of Mystics who profess to resign themselves in passiveness more or less absolute to an imagined Divine Manifestation. The quietude aimed at, beginning with an act of so-called resignation of self, is a state of mental inactivity, without thought, reflection, hope, or wish. In this state it is supposed that the soul is brought so immediately into the Divine Presence as to be merged in It by an essential union.

Quietism, accordingly, is not peculiar to Christianity, for it requires no basis of Christology. It results from every philosophical system, by an excess or perversion of contemplation, when the ethical tendency of the mind is too weak to preserve a just balance with the contemplative tendency. But, further than this, it will appear that the height of Quietism, as defined above, is really inconsistent with Christianity, in the state of mind inculcated, in the character of the Divine access sought for, and consequently in the nature of the promised union with the Deity. The further the Christian Quietist advances the nearer does he approach to the state of the heathen Quietist.

Christian meditation is no inactive process. The general rule that all knowledge shall be limited by religion, and referred to use and action, becomes in the instance of meditation the particular rule that "meditation shall be in order to the production of piety." Meditation therefore is "nothing else but the using of all those motives, arguments and irradiations which God intended to be instrumental to piety." Quietist contemplation professes to be a state superior to this. The Quietists call it indeed a vulgar error to say that in the prayer of rest the faculties operate not, and the soul is idle and inactive; but they assert at the same time that the soul operates neither by means of the memory nor by the intellect, nor by ratiocination, but by simple apprehension [Molinos, Spiritual Guide, i. 12]. What an active apprehension is when none of the powers of the mind are exerted it is difficult to see. It appears that the Quietists think to attain that repose of the mind which is the result of exertion, and that quiet rest in God which follows from the earnestness of meditative prayer, by altogether surceasing from the exertion and superseding the earnestness. Consequently, the mind being reduced to inactivity, the body has sway; and the state of perfect quietude, supposed to be a waiting for the Divine access, becomes that state (which may be produced by "mesmeric" process) in which the body suffers or simulates catalepsy, and the mind apes a divine trance. Quietism becomes mental sleep.

Christianity, in the next place, maintains a relation of the outward and the inward, of the corporeal and the spiritual. The Mediator is God and Man: and in virtue of the Incarnation the nearest approach to God is through Sacraments. Quietism aims at an entire abstraction from all externals, and seeks to put the spirit of man into direct and immediate union with the very nature of the Godhead. From this there inevitably results, instead of the Christian doctrine of the Communion of Saints, the doctrine of a pantheistic identification of the creature with the Creator, and an ultimate absorption of the soul into the substance of God.

The statements which have been thus made may be verified by history. Vaughan [Hours with the Mystics, i. ch. 2, p. 43, ed. 1860] observes that the "same round of notions, occurring to minds of similar make under similar circumstances, is common to mystics in ancient India and in modern Christendom." He gives a summary of Hindoo Mysticism; that it

[1] Lays claim to disinterested love, as opposed to a mercenary religion:

[2] Reacts against the ceremonial prescription and pedantic literalism of the Vedas:

[3] Identifies in its Pantheism subject and object, worshipper and worshipped:

[4] Aims at ultimate absorption into the Infinite:

[5] Inculcates, as the way to this dissolution, absolute passivity, withdrawal into the inmost self, cessation of all the powers—giving recipes for procuring this beatific torpor or trance :

[6] Believes that eternity may thus be realized in time :

[7] Has its mythical miraculous pretensions, i.e. its theurgic department :

[8] And, finally, advises the learner in this kind of religion to submit himself implicitly to a spiritual guide,—his Garu.

Of these articles the 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th give Quietism properly so called : and it is our part to inquire whether the manifestation of this doctrine in Christianity adds anything essential to the definition of article 5, so as to save Christian Quietism from the pantheistic conclusions of articles 3 and 4. Mystics, it will be observed, who start with pantheistic doctrine, will deduce from that doctrine article 5 as a rule : Christian mystics, on the other hand, adopting the rule of this article, are led by it into Pantheism.

The doctrine of disinterested love [art. 1] does not constitute Quietism, nor is it peculiar to Quietism. The controversy between Fénelon and Bossuet will immediately occur to the reader's mind.

The reaction against ceremonial prescription [art. 2] is not paralleled by the action of Quietism exclusively, against a formal routine of Church observances ; but by such action of Mysticism in general [see Knox, Remains, vol. iii. p. 145]. Article 7 relates to a matter incident, not essential, to Quietism. The mind not able to attain to passivity, or not content to rest in it, craves a sign. The entrance and extent of this theurgic element differences the mystic from the mystic of theopathy.

Lastly, it may at once be noticed that the second book of Molinos' Spiritual Guide is "Of the Ghostly Father, and the Obedience due to Him ;" but neither is this point peculiar to Quietism.

Again, Quietism is taught by the followers of Fo in China ; "for they say that all those who seek true happiness ought to be so far absorbed by profound meditations as to make no use of their intellect ; and that they ought through a perfect insensibility to sink into the repose and inaction of the first principle ; which is the true way of being perfectly like it and partaking of happiness" [Bayle, Dict. art. Spinoza, note B ; art. Taulerius, note F].

But, to come to that which directly affects the Christian Church, there is a remarkable similarity between the Mysticism of the Plotinian School and that of the Quietists. The aim of the divine philosopher was to enter into the immediate vision of Deity. "Unconditioned Being, or the God-head, cannot be grasped by thinking, or science, only by intuition. In this pure intuition, the good, or the absolute being, gazes upon itself through the medium of our own spirits. To close the eye against all things transient and variable, to raise ourselves to this simple essence, to take refuge in the absolute, this must be regarded as the highest aim of all our spiritual efforts" [Prof. C. A. Brandis in Smith's Biog. Dict. art. Plotinus, p. 427]. Plotinian contemplation may find a place in the system of John Smith and Henry More, but it may also pass as readily into the reveries of Molinos. It is to be considered whether the tendency of such contemplation is not to reduce the Father manifested in the Son to the cold abstraction of the Plotinian Deity.

In the Church there have been two kinds of Mysticism, one, a churchly Mysticism, which allies itself with the ordinances and rites of the Gospel, the other subjective or inward, which gradually rejects more and more all that is external, and even at last passes beyond the contemplation of the Humanity of our Lord, and the Sacraments which make men partakers of His Body, to "seek a resting-place beyond all that is created in the Logos as He existed prior to the Incarnation and Creation" [Dorner, On the Person of Christ, II. i. 233. MYSTICS.]

Those who hold that the Sacraments are generally necessary to salvation will see in this a very obvious and natural discrimination ; they will at once see that mystics of the former class have in their retention of church ordinances a check of excess and a guide of progress, according to their use of which their mysticism may be tolerated or approved ; while mystics of the latter class, in their passing beyond these necessary ordinances, stand self-condemned, and pretending to advance in divine knowledge are really retrograding towards heathenism. Nor will they who hold the true doctrine of the Sacraments find it strange that men who pass beyond the Sacraments of Christ presently pass beyond the contemplation of the Humanity of Christ. This unchristianizing of Christianity, the presenting the great drama without its central figure, the removing God Incarnate from the mystery of godliness, as the result of a perverted or depraved Mysticism, is exhibited more than once in the history of the Church. The words quoted from Dorner on the subject were used regarding Maximus Confessor. We may resume and continue them. "True love and knowledge unite to seek a resting-point beyond all that is created, beyond even the humanity of Christ : their final goal is the pure and bare (γυμνός) Logos, as He existed prior to the Incarnation and the Creation. It is clear that in the last instance Christ is hereby reduced to the position of a mere theophany, and that the historical significance of His Person is destroyed. The same thing appears also from his application to the professedly highest stage of the words. Even though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now know we Him no longer. So far was he from attributing eternal significance to the God-man, that he regarded the Humanity of Christ rather in the light of an hindrance to the full knowledge and love of the pure God,—an hindrance which must be surmounted by those who aim to reach the highest stage" [Dorner, loc. cit. and see note 48 there referred to]. So in Italy, Marsilius Ficinus and John Pico of Mirandola turned Christianity in many respects into a Neo-Platonic theosophy. So in England the doctrine of the Quakers was noted to be highly dangerous "as mingling with so many good and wholesome things an abominable slighting of the history of Christ, and making a mere allegory of it, tending to the utter overthrow of that warrantable though more external frame of Christianity which Scripture itself points out to us" [H. More, quoted in Vaughan, Hours, ii. p. 328].

In another article [MYSTICS] this subject is more opened, and the Schools of Mysticism of the Greek and Latin Churches classified. In the article HESYCHASTS is related the Quietism of the Greek Church. At present it is only necessary to point out that these Hesychasts had the same rule as the Hindoo Quietists, namely, that to produce the state of abstraction the eyes must be steadily fixed on some particular object. The Hindoos prescribed the tip of the nose, the Hesychasts the navel. Such a custom is like the ordinary mesmeric trick, producing an affection of the brain which simulates catalepsy, the torpor of a corporeal Quietism. It is remarkable that this gross Materialism should have connected itself with the subtle disquisitions regarding the light of God as distinct from His essence.

While this was in some minds the goal reached by unchecked subjective Mysticism, in other minds Pantheism was approached, sometimes reached, as by Amalric of Bena [Gieseler, Compend. iii. p. 298, note 10, and p. 467, Clark's transl.]. From the instances of history thus pointed out may be deduced the following proposition: that the Quietist, passing over the sacraments and ordinances of the Church in his endeavour to obtain through contemplation, individually and independently of the Church, an union with God, is led to pass over the Incarnate Son, and to suppose and hold a pantheistic identification of the creature and the Creator. This proposition is necessary as a preliminary to the consideration of the history of those to whom the name Quietist is commonly appropriated—Molinos and his followers.

Molinos' Spiritual Guide, published in Spanish in 1675, and the same year in Italian, passed through above twenty editions in different languages in six years. At Rome and Naples many of the clergy declared themselves in Molinos' favour, especially three Fathers of the Oratory, Coloredi, Giceri and Petrucci (author of several treatises and letters on mystic theology), who were all afterwards made cardinals: Cardinal Odescalchi, who, when made Pope in the next year (Innocent XI.), lodged Molinos in the Vatican: and Cardinal D'Estrees, the French Ambassador at Rome, who had procured the translation into Italian of Malaval's Dialogue, which is said to go even beyond the Mysticism of Molinos. The Jesuits in general were opposed to this doctrine of Quietism. They published several works in refutation of it, and induced the Inquisition to take cognizance of the Spiritual Guide and of Petrucci's Letters; and it is said that the Jesuit Esparsa, who had given an imprimatur to Molinos' work, was kept in seclusion. Not only were Molinos and Petrucci acquitted, but the writings issued against them were condemned as libels.

Petrucci was made Bishop of Jessi. About A.D. 1684, Père la Chaise induced the King of France, by motives partly of orthodoxy, partly of policy, to move against the Quietists. Cardinal D'Estrees, in obedience to the King, caused Molinos and Petrucci to be cited again before the Inquisition. When taxed with his own prior approval of their doctrine, he professed that he had only pretended friendship to obtain a conviction. Petrucci was dismissed, Molinos was imprisoned, and there was a lull in the controversy. In 1687 the activity of the Inquisition was renewed. Count and Countess Vespignani, and about seventy others, were brought up for examination on the charge (to state it in general terms) of neglecting the ordinances of religion, and giving themselves to solitude and inward prayer. The Countess averred that she had been betrayed by her confessor, and declared that she would discontinue confession. She and her husband were set free on promise of appearing when required. In a month about two hundred persons were cited. At this time the Pope himself was examined. There was issued a circular to the Italian prelates warning them that, under the pretence of the way of quietude, execrable errors were taught, and enjoining them to forbid and disperse assemblies of Quietists. There was added a list of nineteen articles of Quietist errors. The Pope was at length brought to assent to the final condemnation of Molinos by a Bull dated Sept. 4th, 1687, and he lived till 1690 in the prison of the Inquisition.

We must review this chapter of Church history by the help of the principles drawn from earlier history.

The second book of the Spiritual Guide is "Of the Ghostly Father, the Obedience due to Him; of indiscreet zeal, and of internal and external penance." Its thirteenth and fourteenth chapters are "Frequent Communion is an effectual means of getting all virtues, and in particular, internal peace." Molinos published also, about the same time as the Spiritual Guide, "A brief treatise concerning daily Communion," in which the practice is strongly recommended. There was no intention then of superseding Church ordinances; and it is no wonder that Molinos was classed with the acknowledged mystics of the Church. The dangerous tendency of his teaching however appears to have been detected by one of his early Jesuit opponents. "Segueri magnified the contemplative state highly, while he thought that few were capable of it, and considered it to be an extraordinary favour of God. He censured severely some of Molinos' expressions, such as that, He who had God, had Christ, as if this were an abandoning of Christ's Humanity." These particular words we cannot discover, but the following will prove Segueri's charge. "St. Thomas with all the mystical masters says that contemplation is a sincere, sweet, and full view of the eternal truth without ratiocination or reflexion. But if the soul rejoices in, or eyes the effects of, God in the creatures, and amongst them, in the Humanity of our Lord Christ, as the most perfect of all, this is not perfect contemplation, as St. Thomas affirms, since all these are means for knowing of God as He is in Himself: and although the Humanity of Christ be the most holy and perfect means for going to God, the chief instrument of our salvation, and the channel through which we receive all the good we hope for, nevertheless the Humanity is not the chief good, which consists in seeing God; but as Jesus Christ is more by His Divinity than His Humanity, so he that thinks and fixes his contemplation always on God (because the Divinity is united to Humanity) always thinks on and beholds Jesus Christ, especially the contemplative man in whom faith is more sincere, pure, and exercised" [Spir. Guide, Preface, Advert. II.].

By this we are to understand the following: "Know that he who would attain the mystical science must be denied and taken off from five things: [1] from the creatures; [2] from temporal things; [3] from the very gifts of the Holy Ghost; [4] from himself; [5] he must be lost in God" [B. iii, sect. 185]. Mystical perfection then resolves itself into a bare abstract belief in God's infinite essence; and, as Knox observes, is hostile to Christianity, because it necessarily disqualifies the mind for that distinct and intelligent contemplation of Immanuel, to which we are called by all and every trait, however minute, of the evangelic records [Knox, Remains, i. pp. 333-337].¹ Molinos, it is true (as Knox observes of Fénelon), tries to avoid the legitimate conclusions of this doctrine; but his very caveats on the point sound strangely in a Christian ear. "Hence it follows that the remembrance of the Passion and Death of our Saviour ought not wholly to be blotted out; nay, it is also certain, that whatever high elevation of mind the soul may be raised to, it ought not in all things to be separate from the most holy humanity" [Spir. Guide, I. cap. xvi. sect. 118].²

This nigardly concession only brings out more strikingly the relegation of the proper powers of the Gospel to an earlier and inferior stage of the Christian life, and the assumption that man can, and in his best state does, contemplate God simply in Himself, in His own pure spiritual essence.

Against the delusions of this doctrine the only safeguard is the use of the ordinances of the Church. Petrucci, accordingly, was dismissed on the second examination, when Molinos was imprisoned, because, as the Protestant author of the Letters from Italy phrases it, he mixed in his letters so many rules relating to the devotions of the Quire that there was less occasion given for censure in his writings: that is, he limited his mystical devotions by the rules and requirements of an adherence to the communion of the faithful. Again, the tendency of Molinos' teaching became still more apparent when Countess Vespignani, and doubtless others after her example, refused confession, such refusal leading, by the rules of the Church, to the omission of Holy Communion. There appears then to be little ground for the assertion that the opposition to Molinos was merely an opposition to true religion, or for the mere vulgar assertion that it arose from the lessening of the priests' profits. Nor does such a statement involve an approval of all the proceedings of the Inquisition.

That this system of Quietism conducts directly to a pantheistic identification of the creature with the Creator, through the annihilation of self, which is so much insisted on, is very clear. The chapter [iii. 19] on true and perfect annihilation ends thus: "The soul thus dead and annihilated lives no longer in itself, because God lives in it; and now it may most truly be said of it, that it is a renewed phoenix, because it is changed, transformed, spiritualized, and deified." This is different doctrine from St. Paul's [Gal. ii. 20], from St. John's [1 John iv. 9], from our Lord's [John xvii. 20-23]. And the term Deification is not an accidental hyperbole, but Molinos' usual language.

Fénelon and Madame Guyon were usually called Semi-Quietists: they were preserved from the extremes into which Molinos fell by the different temper of their minds. "A moral taste such as Fénelon's would naturally and necessarily place limits to the aberrations of understanding;" in M. Guyon the theurgic element very largely qualified the theopathic. Regarding Fénelon's doctrine of disinterested love, it is sufficient to refer to Butler's Sermons on the Love of Our Neighbour.

But this doctrine, demonstrated, by Butler's establishment of a different view, to be founded on pure ignorance of man's true nature, leads us to some general reflections on the moral character and tendencies of the subjective Mysticism we have been considering. That character and tendency is seen in the anxiety to detect a principle of criminal selfishness underlying the pleasure which a good man has in doing good, the testimony of his good conscience to his sincerity, the joy which he has in the Holy Ghost. The analysis which they made of the actions of their minds was probably correct. Probably they did detect an undue self-love and self-esteem. And for this reason: they were in that habit of introspection, instead of looking from themselves to Christ and Christ's members, which naturally engenders those feelings. They created the disease, and then strove to cure it, not by reversing their habit of mind, and returning to a healthy course of action, but by attempting to merge the true joys of religion in a state of mental torpor. Molinos' rule has already been quoted, that the Quietist must be taken off, as from the creature, including the Humanity of our Lord, so from the gifts of the Holy Ghost. Again we read, "The monster self-love puts its head everywhere—sometimes it cleaves to spiritual pleasures, staying even in the gifts of God, and in His graces freely bestowed" [Spir. Guide, iii. 3-20]. Again, "The very virtues acquired, and not purified, are a hindrance to this great gift of the peace of the soul; and more, the soul is clogged by an inordinate desire of sublime gifts, by the appetite of feeling spiritual consolation, by sticking to infused and divine graces, entertaining itself in them, and desiring more of them, to enjoy them, and finally, by a desire of becoming great" [iii. 4, 26]. As surely as a man is ill, or makes himself ill, who is every hour feeling his pulse and examining his tongue, so surely is there a morbid state of mind engendered by unceasingly turning the eye within instead of looking out of self to Christ. The unavoidable consequence is a remissness in good works. The chapter of the Spiritual Guide concerning indiscreet zeal is a sad example [ii. 3]. "No sooner dost thou find in thyself any new and fervent light, but thou wouldst lay thyself wholly out for the good of souls; and in the meantime it's odds but that that is self-love which thou takest to be pure zeal." "It is never good to love thy neighbour to the detriment of thine own spiritual good. To please God in purity ought to be the only scope of thy works." "One pure act of internal resignation is more worth than a hundred thousand exercises for one's own will." A contemporary comment was as follows: "Le Chap. 3 est détestable. Sous le titre, de zèle indiscret, il condamne toute la pratique de la charité tendant au salut du pro-chain" [Traité Historique, 1699, p. 122]. Knox identifies the doctrine of Molinos with that of the English mystic Law; and concludes that the moral characters of the doctrine are the worst part; they amount to this, that nothing commonly called vice is so essentially vicious as seeing, knowing, or feeling the reality of one's own virtue; and that no virtue is genuine that is earnest to feel its own progress, or even to be satisfied of its own existence [Remains, i. p. 343]. If Quietism tends to supersede Gospel faith, it tends also to supersede Gospel righteousness.

² It may be noticed that Molinos' tract on Daily Communion has been neglected in comparison with the Spiritual Guide. Also, that the English edition of the Spiritual Guide [1699] leaves out altogether the second book, the subject of which was named above, in which are the chapters on Frequent Communion. Whether any Italian editions were printed after Countess Vespignani's refusal of confession, without this book regarding the office of the confessor, we have not been able to ascertain. But the omission in the second English edition is significant, shewing the real tendency of Molinos' doctrine. An abstract of the Spiritual Guide was published in England in 1774, and is still reprinted for the use of Quakers.

RACCHEI. A name given by mistake to the ZACCHEI [Nicetas, Thesaur. Orth. Fid. in Bibl. Max. Lugd. xxv. 109, E].

RAKUSIANS. A Christian sect mentioned by Mahometan writers as existing in Arabia, but of whom nothing definite is known. Their tenets appear to have been those of the MENDÆANS or Sabians, still further corrupted by Ebionite influences. [Sprenger, Das Leben und die Lehre des Mohammed, i. 43, ii. 255, iii. 387, 395. Weil, Mohammed der Prophet, 249, n. 386.]

RANDALLITES. [FREE WILL BAPTISTS.]

RANTERS. A profligate sect of Antinomian heretics which became conspicuous under the name of Ranters during the Commonwealth, but was probably of older date and associated with the FAMILISTS, of whom Fuller speaks as their ancestors [Fuller's Ch. Hist. iii. 211, ed. 1837].

In Ross's Πανρεβεία the Ranters are described as making an open profession of lewdness and irreligion, as holding that God, angels, devils, heaven, hell, etc., are fictions and fables; that Moses, John the Baptist, and our Lord, were impostors; that praying and preaching are useless; that all ministry has come to an end, and that sin is a mere imagination. He says that in their letters the Ranters endeavoured to be strangely profane and blasphemous, uttering atheistical imprecations, and he gives a specimen which quite bears out his words. He also alleges that they sanctioned and practised community of women [Ross's Πανρεβεία, p. 287, ed. 1655]. Much of the same account also is given by Pagitt a few years later [Pagitt's Heresiography, pp. 259, 294. ed. 1662].

Baxter also writes respecting them: "I have myself letters written from Abingdon, where among both soldiers and people this contagion did then prevail, full of horrid oaths and curses, and blasphemy, not fit to be repeated by the tongue and pen of man; and this all uttered as the effect of knowledge and a part of their religion, in a fanatic strain, and fathered on the Spirit of God" [Baxter's Own Life and Times, 77]. And the following passage is found in a Life of Bunyan, added to an imitation of his work which is called "the Third Part of the Pilgrim's Progress."

"About this time," in Bunyan's early life, "a very large liberty being given as to conscience, there started up a sect of loose prophane wretches, afterwards called Ranters and Sweet Singers, pretending themselves safe from, or being incapable of, sinning; though indeed they were the debauchest and profligate wretches living, in their bawdy meetings and revels; for fancying themselves in Adam's state, as he was in Paradise before the fall, they would strip themselves, both men and women, and so catch as catch could, and to it they went, to satiate their lust under pretence of increasing and multiplying" [An account of the Life and Actions of Mr. John Bunyan, etc., London, 1692, p. 22]. In later times the name of "Ranters" has been given to the Primitive Methodists.

RASCHOLNIKS. A Russian word, denoting "Schismatics," and used as a general name for all those bodies which dissent from the orthodox and Established Church in that country.

Although a few sects, as the Strigolniks, existed as early the fourteenth or fifteenth centuries, the greater number arose either in the middle of the seventeenth century, among those who rejected the revision of Holy Scripture, and of the old liturgical books, proposed and carried out by the Patriarch Nikon at Moscow [A.D. 1654], or in the earlier part of the eighteenth century, in consequence of the innovating policy of Peter the Great [A.D. 1689-1725]. Many of the Rascholniks regard this Emperor as Antichrist, and his semi-political, semi-ecclesiastical reforms as impious, e.g. the amalgamation of Church and State under his own supreme personal rule; the alteration of the date of the commencement of the year from the first of September to the first of January; and the substitution of the date Anno Domini for Anno Mundi in the calculation of time. The general character of Russian dissent may be described as eminently conservative. Unlike English dissent, which is usually based on some deviation from time-honoured tradition, or some departure from Catholic teaching, it represents the most trifling interference with the hereditary ritual, such as the number of fingers with which the sign of the cross is to be made, the mode of pronouncing such a word as Jesus, the number of times in which an Amen or an Alleluia is to be repeated in the course of a service. It has also a tendency to develope into extreme fanaticism, as may be seen by reference to the SKOPTZI or KHLISTI; and it does not escape the proclivity of schism in all ages, and in all countries, to produce an increasing number of sects, and subdivisions of sects, more or less hostile to each other as well as to the Church from which they have originally sprung. The chief Russian sects are the Bespopofftschins, Besslovestnie, Blagoslovennie, Duchobortzi, Isbraniki, Istineeye Christiane, Karabliki, Khlisti, Kerjakis, Malakanes, Martinists, Morelschiki, Niconians, Njetowschitschini, Philipponians, Pomorane, Popofftschins, Rascolschiki, Sabatniki, Skoptzi, Starovertzi, Strigolniki, Wjetkaers, Yedinovertzi, of each of which some account is given in this Dictionary. RATIONALISTS. Those who maintain that reason is the sole guide to, and test of, truth in matters of religion, and especially in the interpretation of Holy Scripture.

The name is first found in use in a "Letter of Intelligence" written from London to Secretary Nicholas, in which it is said that "The Presbyterian and Independent agree well enough together. But there is a new sect sprung up among them, and these are the Rationalists; and what their reason dictates them in Church or State stands for good until they be convinced with better; and that is according as it serves their own turns. Some of them were at the House this day" [October 14th, 1647], "and much reason was propounded this day by divers of the agitators to the Council of War"¹ [Clarendon's St. Pap. ii. app. xl.]. Soon afterwards the Socinians were called Rationalists by Comenius, and in the eighteenth century the name was used in Germany to designate those who had been previously called NATURALISTS [Hahn, De Rationalismo: a disputation at Leipzig]. Both in England and in Germany the name is very commonly used as a designation of those who reject generally the idea of "Supernaturalism," whether as relating to faith or facts—the term "Naturalist" in this sense having dropped out of use.

I. THE RISE OF RATIONALISM. The remote ancestry of modern Rationalism may be traced to the NOMINALISTS of the Middle Ages, whose bold questionings of received dogmas had a continual tendency towards the denial of all which could not be proved by observation, and whose notions respecting Deity continually produced that evolution of opinions which later times have called Pantheism. But the more immediate origin of Rationalism is to be found in two influences, one early and one of later date, which sprung out of the Reformation of the sixteenth century.

[1] The first of these influences was the spirit of doubt—often developing into actual scepticism,—which was encouraged in the laity by the reckless assaults of Luther and Calvin, and still more, of their followers, on established beliefs. The twists and turns, and non-natural interpretations which were given to the words of Holy Scripture, for the purpose of justifying the novel theological positions which were taken up by these leaders of Protestantism, were such as to unsettle the minds of multitudes as regarded the plain sense of Divine Revelation. The ignorant followed the track opened out by their leaders, and widened it still more by the adoption of any wild, irreverent, or foolish interpretation that would serve their immediate turn: the educated followed in the same track, by learning still further to undervalue the authority of that which their leaders had treated with such reckless freedom. Thus, Lutheranism in Germany, Calvinism in France and England, became fruitful fields for the growth of Rationalism.

[2] The second great influence arising out of the Reformation was a reaction against the extravagant views which some Protestant Divines maintained on the subject of inspiration. These were carried to such a length that every word of a vernacular Bible was treated as if it had been undoubtedly inspired; that the vowel points of the Hebrew text (never used in Hebrew Bibles until about A.D. 500) were also considered as being endowed with the same high authority; that all influence of a human element in the composition of the books of Holy Writ was denied; and that criticism of every kind was discouraged, or even reprobated, as if it had been an insult to the Word of God. Against such extravagances the minds of scholars naturally revolted, and it was inevitable (according to all experience of human nature) that there should be an oscillation in the opposite direction, when others would deal with the Bible as they would deal with a collection of ordinary ancient writings, and deny it any supernatural character whatever.

The results of these two influences exhibited themselves first in the early English Deists, of whom Lord Herbert of Cherbury [A.D. 1581-1633], the elder brother of George Herbert the poet, may be considered as the representative. These professed a belief in the possibility of a revelation, and thought it most likely that a law of natural religion was divinely communicated to the earliest of mankind, which had since been transmitted by tradition to their descendants. But they would not allow that Revelation exists at present in any other form, and set aside the Bible without troubling themselves to examine it, just as they set aside everything else professing to be part of a supernatural system, as being à priori impossible. Very similar was the treatment of Holy Scripture by Hobbes [A.D. 1588-1679] and Spinoza [A.D. 1632-1677], both of whom may be said rather to have ignored it than to have made any elaborate attempt to refute its statements or to reconcile them with their own philosophical systems.

¹ This principle may be found in the pages of Chillingworth, whose religion was first that of the Church of England, then that of the Roman Catholics, then "the religion of Protestants," and finally that of the Socinians. "Your Church," he writes to the Roman Catholics, "you admit, because you think you have reason to do so; so that by you, as well as Protestants, all is finally resolved into your own reason" [Chillingworth's Relig. of Protest. 134]. Lord Clarendon said of Chillingworth that he "had contracted such an irresolution and habit of doubting, that at last he was confident of nothing:" and Dugald Stewart uses this characteristic of the Protestant champion as an illustration of the ruinous result which follows from bondage to the scholastic logic.

The earliest writer, indeed, who set himself systematically to oppose received opinions respecting Holy Scripture from the Rationalist point of view, as distinguished from that of the Deists, was a French Calvinist named De la Peyrère [A.D. 1594-1676], who published a work entitled Præadamitæ, in the year 1655, in which he anticipated many of the criticisms that have been put forth as if they were new in modern days. This author, says Lecky, "who fully admitted, though he endeavoured to restrict, the sphere of the miraculous, had been struck by some difficulties connected with the ordinary doctrine of original sin, and by some points in which science seemed to clash with the assertions of the Old Testament; and he endeavoured to meet them by altogether isolating the Biblical history from the general current of human affairs. Adam, he maintained, was not the father of the human race, but simply the progenitor of the Jews, and the whole antediluvian history is only that of a single people. Thus the antiquity which the Eastern nations claimed might be admitted, and the principal difficulties attending the Deluge were dissolved. It was altogether a mistake to suppose that death and sickness and suffering were the consequences of the transgression. Adam had by this act simply incurred spiritual penalties, which descended upon the Jews. 'In the day thou eatest thou shalt die,' could not have been meant literally, because it was not literally fulfilled; nor can the curse upon the serpent, because the motion of the serpent along the ground is precisely that which its conformation implies. The existence of men who were not of the family of Adam is shadowed obscurely in many passages, but appears decisively in the history of Cain, who feared to wander forth lest men should kill him, and who built a city at a time when, according to the common view, he was almost alone in the world. The mingling of the sons of God and the daughters of men means the intermarriage between the two races. The Deluge is an absolute impossibility if regarded as universal, but not at all surprising if regarded as a partial inundation. Proceeding to the history of a later period, La Peyrère in the first place denies the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. In defence of this position he urges the account of the death of Moses, and he anticipates several of those minute criticisms which in our own day have acquired so great a prominence. The phrase, 'These are the words which Moses spakè beyond Jordan,' the notice of the city which is called 'Jair to the present day,' the iron bedstead of Og still shewn in Rabbath, the difficulties about the conquest of the Idumæans, and a few other passages, seem to shew that the compilation of these books was long posterior to the time of Moses, while certain signs of chronological confusion which they evince render it probable that they are not homogeneous, but are formed by the fusion of several distinct documents. It should be observed, too, that they employ a language of metaphor and of hyperbole which has occasionally given rise to misapprehensions, special instances of Providential guidance being interpreted as absolute miracles. Thus, for example, the wool of the Jewish flocks was quite sufficient to furnish materials for clothing in the desert, and the assertion that the clothes of the Jews waxed not old is simply an emphatic expression of that extraordinary providence which preserved them from all want for forty years in the wilderness. At the same time, La Peyrère does not deny that the Jewish history is full of miracles, but he maintains very strongly that these were only local, and that the general course of the universe was never disturbed to effect them. The prolongation of the day at the command of Joshua was not produced by any alteration in the course of the earth or sun, but was simply an atmospheric phenomenon such as is sometimes exhibited in the Arctic regions. The darkness at the Crucifixion was also local; the retrogression of the shadow on the sundial in the reign of Hezekiah did not result from a disturbance of the order of the heavenly bodies; the light that stood over the cradle of Christ was a meteor, for a star could not possibly mark out with precision a house" [Lecky's Rationalism in Europe, i. 323, ed. 1865]. It cannot be said that this comparatively unknown French writer founded any school, and he probably only expressed, in an extreme form, the views of many whose faith in Holy Scripture had been thoroughly shaken, but who were looking for some less shocking justification of their opinions than that involved in the theory of the later Deists, that it is a mere congeries of impostures. It is however a theory which has been adopted by many later Rationalists, recommending itself to them by leaving open many important questions, such as those of the origin of the visible creation and especially of man, and also by not interfering in any great degree with the narrative of those events given in Holy Scripture.

II. ENGLISH FREETHINKERS.—The Deists and Freethinkers were necessarily Rationalists, and there is, unhappily, a regular succession of English writers of this extreme rationalizing class from the middle of the seventeenth century down to Hume and Gibbon, whose writings belong to the last half of the eighteenth. This school of Rationalists may be said to begin with Charles Blount [A.D. 1654-93], the third son of Sir Henry Pope Blount, who was himself known as a sceptical writer. The "Anima Mundi" of Charles Blount, in the writing of which he is supposed to have been assisted by his father, was professedly intended to vindicate Christianity against Paganism, by shewing the errors of the latter respecting the immortality of the soul. But it is, in reality, a keen ironical attack upon the Scriptural doctrine of the soul, and was probably put into such a form that it might more easily obtain the license for printing which was necessary at the time of its publication, in the year 1679. Of a similar character was his "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," which, by arguments against heathen sacrifices, endeavoured to prove that Christianity was an invention of priests. In a similar ironical style Blount attacked the miracles of Holy Scripture in his notes to an edition of "The Two First Books of Philostratus" on the Life and Miracles of Apollonius of Tyana, which was published in the year 1680, and to which he prefixed a motto from Seneca—"Cum omnia in incerto sint, fave tibi et crede quod mavis"—strikingly illustrative of the Rationalist's standpoint.¹ Blount wrote many smaller works, which had much influence in inculcating the educated classes with Rationalist principles during the last quarter of the seventeenth century. His "Oracles of Reason" made its appearance in 1693, under the editorship of his friend Gildon, shortly after its author had put an end to his life by suicide, because his deceased wife's sister refused to marry him. In this last work he borrowed largely, without acknowledgment, from the writings of De la Peyrère.

Shortly after the death of Charles Blount, an author equally bold—and like him a member of a Roman Catholic family, though subsequently a Protestant Dissenter—made his appearance in the same field of antichristian literature. This was John Toland [A.D. 1669-1722], who published in the year 1693 a volume entitled "Christianity not Mysterious," the object of which is fully shewn by its second title, "A Discourse shewing there is nothing in the Gospel contrary to reason nor above it; and that no Christian doctrine can be properly called a Mystery." This work was very notorious in its day, and was answered by as many as fifty-four writers in England, France, and Germany during the following half century. It is not a work of high talent, but its enunciation of the Rationalist theory was plain and undisguised; and it was thus intelligible to a much wider circle of readers than the irony of Blount or the philosophy of Hobbes had been.

Toland also endeavoured to lessen the authority of the New Testament by a book to which he gave the title of "Amyntor," published in 1698. In this he classed the apocryphal Gospels, and other works of a similar character to the number of eighty, with the authentic Gospels, pretending that there was no better evidence for the truth of the latter than of the former. [TOLAND.]

Lord Shaftesbury [A.D. 1671-1713] was an elegant writer, who gave a certain amount of lofty patronage to practical Christianity, as something to be admired and to be thought of rather favourably than otherwise, but who at the same time endeavoured to destroy its force and influence as an historical and intellectual religion, and thus drew nearer to the type of the modern Rationalist school than any of his predecessors. His "Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, and Times," in three volumes, appeared in the year 1711, and contained so much that is contrary to the received principles of Christianity as to elicit even from Voltaire the declaration that he was too bitter an opponent of it. Bishop Warburton has also handed down an opinion of Pope that Lord Shaftesbury's writings had done more harm to revealed religion in England than all the other works of infidelity put together. His criticisms on Holy Scripture are principally contained in the third volume of the "Characteristics," in which there are disquisitions on "Scepticism," the "History of Religion," "Inspiration," and other kindred subjects; but throughout the other volumes also he deals with every part of Revelation in the most contemptuous manner, and the highest place which he allows to it is that of a collection of works, established in use for purposes of order and government by public authority. The general tone of Lord Shaftesbury's Rationalism may be seen by his statement that the suspicion was natural to intellectual man "that the holy records themselves were no other than the pure invention and artificial compliment of an interested party, in behalf of the richest corporation and most profitable monopoly which could be erected in the world" [Shaftesb. Charact. iii. 336]. This "suspicion," which was rather a foregone conclusion than what it was called, Shaftesbury endeavoured to corroborate by critical objections against the Scriptures drawn from the variety of readings and of interpretations, from supposed interpolations and fraudulent dealings with the text; and in these objections he anticipated many of those that have been offered by modern writers.

Another layman belonging to the higher classes, Anthony Collins [A.D. 1676-1729], a contemporary of Lord Shaftesbury, carried still further the principles of the FREETHINKERS, as the Rationalist school now began to be named in England. His first publication was an "Essay concerning the use of Reason in Propositions the evidence whereof depends upon Human Testimony," published anonymously in 1709, and this was followed by many tracts and larger works, also anonymons, the last being a volume "On the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion," and on "The Quotations made from the Old Testament in the New," which did not appear until after his death. In his "Discourse on Freethinking" Collins also declares his opinions as to the result of a "rational" examination into the authority of Holy Scripture, and places the latter on the same footing as the Vedas, the Koran, and other "sacred books." Collins maintained, most uncritically, that the Gospels had undergone a general alteration in the sixth century; but he also maintained that the narrative which they contain had no foundation in fact, but was based upon the prophecies of the Old Testament, and that the whole New Testament was of an allegorical and not a literal character.

¹ Apollonius Tyanæus is said to have been born at Tyana in Cappadocia about the time of the Christian era, and to have lived until nearly the end of the first century, being thus exactly contemporary with St. John, and living through the time of our Lord and His other apostles. His life was written about a hundred years after his death, by a rhetorician named Philostratus, who seems to have mingled a few facts with a large amount of fiction, and especially to have imitated the Gospel miracles with the view of setting up Apollonius as a heathen rival of Christ. The birth of Apollonius is announced to his mother beforehand by Proteus, who himself becomes incarnate: a choir of swans is heard singing for joy on the occasion of his birth: he casts out devils, raises the dead to life, heals the sick, appears and disappears in a supernatural manner, and a Divine voice was heard calling him at his death. The Ecclectics of the third and fourth centuries set up a comparison between Apollonius and our Lord, but the idea seems to have lain dormant until it was revived by Lord Herbert and Blount. For an examination of this comparison see Cudworth's Intellectual System, iv. 15; More's Mystery of Godliness, iv. 9-12; Baur's Apollon. von Tyana und Christus; and Ritter's Geschichte der Phil. iv. 492.

Among those who learned at the feet of these Freethinking laymen was Matthew Tindal [A.D. 1657-1733], a Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, and Thomas Woolston [A.D. 1669-1733], a clerical Fellow of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge.

Tindal (who was a Roman Catholic during the reign of James II.) reproduced many of the arguments of Shaftesbury against the authenticity of the Scriptures in his "Christianity as old as the Creation," published in 1730. The object of this work was to establish the theory of the NATURALISTS, that what they called "natural religion," i.e. the guidance of reason and feeling, as originally given to mankind, is sufficient for all human necessities. True religion being thus established in a complete and in its only obligatory form at the Creation, any subsequent Revelation would be wholly unnecessary, and Christianity becomes surplusage.

Woolston was chiefly notorious for his "Discourse on the Miracles of our Saviour in view of the present controversy between Infidels and Apostates," Collins being the Infidel, and his opponents the Apostates. These Discourses came out in the form of six "Letters" during the years 1727-29, and obtained so rapid a circulation as to run into twelve editions in two or three years. Voltaire states, apparently from personal knowledge, that 30,000 of them were sold, and that large numbers were sent to America. Swift notices their great popularity in his biting poem "On the Death of Dr. Swift, written in November 1731," in the following lines, which he puts into the mouth of Lintot the bookseller, who cannot find a copy of the Dean's writings, for they are already out of fashion, but who offers among other publications these letters of Woolston on the Miracles.

"Here's Woolston's tracts the twelfth edition;

'Tis read by every politician;

480.

The country members when in town,
To all their boroughs send them down;
You never met a thing so smart;
The courtiers have them all by heart:
Those maids of honour who can read,
Are taught to use them for their creed.

* * * * *
He does an honour to his gown,
By bravely running priestcraft down.
He shews, as sure as God's in Glo'ster,
That Moses was a grand impostor;
That all his miracles were cheats,
Performed as jugglers do their feats;
The Church had never such a writer,
A shame he has not got a mitre."

Woolston was tried for blasphemy and condemned to a year's imprisonment, with a fine of £150. If he could have found sureties for his good behaviour he would have been released from prison, but freedom of thought does not generally develope freedom of fellowship, and numerous as were Woolston's readers no two could be found liberal enough to become his sureties, and he died in prison.

The character of Woolston was a very contemptible one, and his notorious work is no better. The general substance of it is that all Scripture is allegorical. This he alleges, not in the sense of Origen and other early writers, who maintained a primary literal sense, and made the allegorical sense only secondary; for Woolston maintained that Scripture has no literal sense, and that all its seemingly historical narratives are in reality mere allegories. "When he wants to utter grosser blasphemies than in his own person he dares, or than would befit the standing-point which he had assumed from whence to assault Revelation, he introduces a Jewish Rabbi, and suffers him to speak without restraint, himself only observing, 'This is what an adversary might say; to these accusations we Christians expose ourselves, so long as we cleave to the historic letter; we can only escape them by forsaking that, and holding fast the allegorical meaning alone.' . . . He is dealing with the miracle of the man sick of the palsy, who was let through the broken roof of the house where Jesus was, and thereupon healed [Mark ii. 1-12]. But how, he asks, should there have been such a crowd to hear Jesus preach at Capernaum, where He was so well known, and so little admired? And then, if there was that crowd, what need of such urgent haste? It was but waiting an hour or two till the multitude had dispersed; 'I should have thought their faith might have worked patience.' Why did not Jesus tell the people to make way? Would they not have done so readily, since to see a miracle was the very thing they wanted? How should the pulleys, ropes, and ladder have been at hand to haul him up? How strange that they should have had hatchets and hammers ready to break through the spars and rafters of the roof, and stranger still, that the good man of the house should have endured, without a remonstrance, his property to be so injured! How did those below escape without injury from the falling tiles and plaster? And, if there were a door in the roof, as some, to mitigate the difficulty, tell us, why did not Jesus go up to the roof, and there speak the healing word, and so spare all this trouble, damage, and danger?" As for his allegorical meaning, Woolston considers that "By the palsy of this man is signified a 'dissoluteness of morals and unsteadiness of faith and principles, which is the condition of mankind at present, who want Jesus' help for the cure of it.' The four bearers are the four Evangelists, 'on whose faith and doctrine mankind is to be carried unto Christ.' The house to the top of which he is to be carried is 'the intellectual edifice of the world, otherwise called Wisdom's house.' But 'to the sublime sense of the Scriptures, called the top of the house, is the man to be taken; he is not to abide in the low and literal sense of them.' Then if he 'dare to 'open the house of Wisdom, he will presently be admitted to the presence and knowledge of Jesus'" [Trench on the Miracles, 82, ed. 1850]. Such irrational stuff as this has become the daily pabulum of many more modern "Rationalists," and in the earlier half of the last century, when it was comparatively novel, there was doubtless a large class of persons of a similar kind whose reasoning powers had been imperfectly educated, and who took such folly for wisdom because it looked deep, and they could not see below its surface to discern its absurd shallowness.

This unworthy clergyman was, however, far eclipsed by one who became the great exponent of the true office which Reason holds in matters of religion, Joseph Butler [A.D. 1692-1752], who subsequently became Bishop of Durham, and whose "Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature," was published in the year 1736. This profound and solid work may be said to have extinguished Rationalism in England for a century, except so far as it was represented directly in the Essays of Hume and the fleeting writings of Lord Bolingbroke, and indirectly in the grand historical volumes of Gibbon. [Leehler's Geschichte des Englischen Deismus. SCEPTICS. DICT. OF THEOL., DEISM.]

III. GERMAN RATIONALISTS. The rough footings of German Rationalism were laid by Spinoza and Leibnitz, but the upper courses of the foundation were more methodically arranged by Wolff and Semler.

Christian Wolff [A.D. 1679-1754], a native of Breslau, became Professor of Mathematics in the University of Halle in the year 1707, and on the recommendation of Leibnitz. For some years Wolff employed himself entirely upon the duties of his office, and the production of mathematical text-books. His mind was always bent, however, towards theological studies, and before long he came to the conclusion that true theology must be a science which could be followed out with mathematical exactness of demonstration, and that only when so followed out could theology be true. He writes of himself, "Having been devoted to the study of theology by a vow"—that of his father before he was born—"I had also chosen it for myself, and my intention has all along been to serve God in the ministry, even after I had become Professor at Halle, until at length I was led away from it against my will, God having arranged circumstances in such a manner that I could not carry out my intention. But having lived in my native place, Breslau, among the Catholics, and having perceived from my very childhood the zeal of the Lutherans and Catholics against each other, the idea was always agitating my mind, whether it would not be possible so distinctly to exhibit theological truth that it would not admit of any contradiction. When afterwards I learned that the mathematicians were so sure of their ground that every one must acknowledge it to be true, I became anxious to study mathematics for the sake of the method, in order to give diligence to reduce theology to incontrovertible certainty." The inevitable corollary of this principle followed, namely, that what cannot be proved to demonstration, as a mathematical truth may be proved, cannot be true: and thus everything that is mysterious in religion must at once be swept away.

In the year 1719 Wolff published his "Rational Thoughts on God, the World, the Soul of Man, and Being in general;" and, in the following year, his "Moral Philosophy," shortly succeeded by a volume on "Civil and Political Philosophy." These works raised great opposition to Wolff among the Pietists, who then formed the most influential party at Halle, and this opposition was brought to a climax by a controversy which arose out of a lecture on the Morals of Confucius, in which he enthusiastically praised the philosopher. Court influences were also brought to bear against him, and at length, in November 1723, the King of Prussia, Frederick William I., deprived Wolff of his professorship, and ordered him to leave the kingdom within forty-eight hours. For seventeen years he resided at Marburg and Cassell, where he published many philosophical works, and especially his "Natural Theology," which appeared in the year 1737, and in which the supremacy of Reason over Revelation was boldly asserted. On this point Wolff maintained that a Divine Revelation cannot contradict reason and experience, nor command anything which is opposed to the laws of nature. But whose reason and experience are to be taken as the standard, or where the code of the "laws of nature" is to be found, he does not state. The inevitable result of accepting such a principle must be that those who adopt it subordinate Revelation to their own individual reason and experience, however narrow and untrained they may be.

Wolff was recalled to Prussia, and restored to his Professorship at Halle in the year 1740 by Frederick the Great, and became extremely popular as a leader of thought. His application of mathematical reason to philosophy and theology fell in with the tone of the age, and thus the Wolffian system quickly took possession of the German mind. "The system," says Professor Farrar, "soon became universally dominant. Its orderly method possessed the fascination which belongs to any Encyclopædic view of human knowledge. . . . The evil effects which it subsequently produced in reference to religion were due only to the point of view which it ultimately induced. Like Locke's work on the reasonableness of Christianity, it stimulated speculation concerning revelation. By suggesting attempts to deduce à priori the necessary character of religious truths, it turned men's attention more than ever away from spiritual religion to theology. The attempt to demonstrate everything caused dogmas to be viewed apart from their practical aspect; and men being compelled to discard the previous method of drawing philosophy out of Scripture, an independent philosophy was created, and Scripture compared with its discoveries. Philosophy no longer relied on Scripture, but Scripture rested on philosophy. Dogmatic theology was made a part of metaphysical philosophy. This was the mode in which Wolff's philosophy ministered indirectly to the creation of the disposition to make scriptural dogmas submit to reason, which was denominated Rationalism" [Farrar's Bampt. Lect. 215].

Still further, however, was this principle of the Rationalist school developed by John Solomon Semler [A.D. 1725-1791], who is generally considered as the father of modern Rationalism. This title does not, in reality, belong to him or to any other particular person, for modern Rationalism originated with many minds as has already been shewn. But that special school of Rationalists who busy themselves with the destructive criticism of Holy Scripture may justly look up to Semler as their modern founder.

Semler was brought up as a strict Pietist, but was unsettled in his opinions by the teaching of Baumgarten, who had succeeded Wolff at Halle, to which university Semler was sent from Saalfeld, his native place. At the age of twenty-six he was appointed Professor of Theology at Halle, and so continued for forty years. During that time he sent as many as one hundred and seventy-one different publications into the world, a proof of much industry, but a sign also of much haste and superficiality.

No man had ever previously shewn so thorough and unflinching a determination as Semler shewed in the "free handling" of Holy Scripture. His first attack was on the Canon; and the result of his labours appears in conclusions which get rid of nearly every book of the Bible. The Pentateuch he determined to be a collection of legends, Genesis especially being made up of broken fragments which were all that survived of the early fictions of our race. The Books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, the Kings, and Daniel are too doubtful to be of much value. The Books of Chronicles, Ruth, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and the Song of Solomon cannot be accepted at all as what they profess to be; and the Proverbs, though they may possibly have been written by Solomon, are more likely to have been written by unknown authors of moderate literary powers. The authenticity of the Gospels is very doubtful, the Catholic Epistles are a late production, and the Revelation was composed by some fanatic who had nothing to do with St. John.

Semler is also credited with the invention of the Positive Accommodation theory, which first appears in the preface to his Paraphrase of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans. According to this theory our Lord and His Apostles accommodated their teaching, in many points, to the prevailing opinions of those whom they taught that they might the more certainly win them. Thus it happens that the Divine Teacher said many things which are not to be taken as literal truths, and many such things also enter into the records of the New Testament. When the resurrection of the dead and the last judgment are spoken of, they are not spoken of as real facts, nor are angels or devils mentioned as real beings. The Jews believed in these things, and so Christ and His Apostles accommodated their teaching to the current superstitions of the time as matters of no consequence, that they might by such concessions gain the more influence in matters which they did consider important.

A third way in which Semler used his destructive criticism was by distinguishing between that which he judged to be only local and temporary in Scripture, and that which he considered universal and permanent. Many portions of the historical and the prophetic books were written for particular people and times, and when the persons and the age had passed away these parts of Scripture had no further application to any one, either in ancient or modern days. This theory by itself opens limitless fields of scepticism respecting Holy Scripture, for no more ready or plausible explanation could be given of any difficult or unacceptable passage than that it was "local" and "temporary," its sense or its importance having long since passed away.

It was thus that in his "Apparatus for the liberal Interpretation of the Old Testament," in his four volumes on the Canon, and in many successive works of a similar character, Semler laid broad foundations for the "historico-critical" school of later generations to build upon. He may also be said to have been the first to have carried out fully and unflinchingly the principle which others had acted upon, but had scarcely dared to proclaim aloud, that the Bible is a book which may be as freely criticised as any other book, and which is to be judged by the same rules. It was a principle likely to be snatched up with eagerness by the vain and self-confident; and much of the later Rationalism of Germany has arisen from the unwholesome pleasure which a people of literary tastes felt in their liberation from those restraints in regard to the Bible which had checked "free handling," while it was regarded as a collection of sacred writings whose special characteristics placed them in a different category from all others, and distinguished that book above all books as THE BOOK.

It was while Semler was thus undermining the authority of Revelation that Lessing published the famous "Wolfenbützel Fragments," which carried disbelief in the Scriptures further towards a general disbelief in the received truths of religion than had been done by Semler.

Gotthold Ephraim Lessing [A.D. 1729-1781] had already attained considerable literary dis-tion, but being always in debt and trouble from his improvident habits, was glad in 1770 to accept an appointment as librarian to the Duke of Wolfenbützel. In the ducal library of which he had charge Lessing discovered a manuscript work, written some years previously by Hermanu Samuel Reimarus [A.D. 1694-1765], Professor of Hebrew and Mathematics at Hamburg. This work was entitled "A Vindication of the Rational Worshippers of God," and had been privately circulated among his friends by Reimarus in manuscript. Lessing extracted from the copy which fell into his hands seven of the more important or most telling passages, and printed them successively under the title of "Fragments from the Library of Wolfenbützel," between the years 1774 and 1778. These pamphlets caused a sensation in the Germany of that period similar to that caused by "Essays and Reviews" in England three generations later; and in both cases it was the boldness with which received beliefs were contradicted that drew attention to productions otherwise not remarkable.

According to the Wolfenbützel Fragments, "the historical evidences of Christianity and of the doctrine of inspiration are clad in such a garb of superstition that they do not merit the credence of sensible men. The confessions framed at different periods of the history of the Church have savoured far more of human weakness than of Divine knowledge. They bear but slight traces of Biblical truth. The Trinity is incomprehensible, and the heart should not feel bound to lean upon what Reason cannot fathom. Nearly all the Old Testament history is a string of legends and myths which an advanced age should indignantly reject. Christ never intended to establish a permanent religion; and the work of His Apostles was something unanticipated by Himself. His design was to restore Judaism to its former state, throw off the Roman yoke, and declare Himself King. His public entry into Jerusalem was designed to be His installation as a temporal King; but he failed in His dependence upon popular support, and instead of attaining a throne He died upon the Cross. Belief in Scriptural records is perfectly natural to the Christian, for he has imbibed it from education and training. Reason is forestalled in the ordinary education of children; they are baptized before they are old enough to exercise their own reasoning faculties. Faith in Scripture testimony is really of no greater value than the belief of the Mahometan or Jew in their oracles, unless Reason be permitted to occupy the seat of judgment." [Hurst's Hist. Ration. 127.]

In the midst of such elements of unbelief as are here indicated arose the modern Critical School of Germany, and their influence is shewn in nearly every one of its writers. Ernesti [A.D. 1707-1781] and Michaelis [A.D. 1717-1791] by their narrow application of philological criticism to the New and Old Testament¹ had prepared the way for Semler; Eichhorn [A.D. 1752-1827] followed in the same track; and it was only natural that from such teachers a younger and still more daring school should spring, ready to apply the caustic acid of such criticism as their masters had invented to every page of the Bible. The best of this younger school was Ernest Rosenmüller [A.D. 1768-1835], Professor of Arabic and Oriental Literature at Leipsic, whose "Scholia in Vetus Testamentum," even in their unfinished state, extended to twenty-three volumes. Far more advanced representatives of it appeared in Heinrich Paulus [A.D. 1761-1851], who was Professor of Exegesis and Church History at Heidelberg for the last forty years of his life; in Frederick Schleiermacher [A.D. 1768-1834], Professor of Theology in the new University of Berlin from its opening in 1810 until his death; and above all in David Frederick Strauss [A.D. 1808—*], whose "Life of Jesus," published in the year 1835, reduced the whole Gospel to an agglomeration of myths. Among the lesser lights of the same school were Röhr, whose "Letters on Rationalism" were published at Aachen in 1813, and Wegscheider, whose "Institutions of Dogmatic Theology" appeared in 1815 at Halle.

The manner in which this younger school of critics developed from the elder, and in which (while often repudiating their interpretation) they extended the range of destructive criticism which their teachers had originated, may be shortly illustrated.

Rosenmüller is commenting on the sixteenth chapter of Numbers, and treats in due course of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Michaelis, he tells us, "thinks that an earthquake took place, which Moses as a messenger from God could foresee. But others (Rosenmüller omits their names, and they are not worth inquiring for) thinks that Moses had taken care privily to undermine the whole of the ground on which the tents of the sinners were, and that thus there was no wonder either that they fell in or that they should know they would. But, says Rosenmüller, with great calmness, these writers did not consider how such a thing could be done privately in the midst of so many men, and in the course of a single day. Being discontented with this wise explanation, he gives at some length Eichhorn's. Eichhorn thinks that the three offenders were burned alive with their property by order of Moses, and if we will interpret verses 31 and 32 according to the style of speaking and thinking among the ancients, he does not see that they contradict his theory.

"Paulus gives a dissertation on the miracle of the tribute money and the fish. 'What sort of a miracle is it,' says Paulus, 'which is commonly found here? I will not say a miracle of about sixteen or twenty groschen'" [2s. 6d.] "'for the greatness of the value does not make the greatness of the miracle. But it may be observed [1] that as, first, Jesus received in general support of Moses in 1773, and his Introduction to the N. T., in four volumes, in 1780, both written in Germany.

from many persons (Judas kept the stock, John xii. 6) in the same way as the Rabbis frequently live from such donations; as, secondly, so many pious women provided for the wants of Jesus; as, finally, the claim did not occur at any remote place, but at Capernaum, where Christ had friends, a miracle for about a thaler would certainly have been superfluous. But [2] it would not only have been superfluous and paltry,—it would have taught this principle, that Peter, even when he could have remedied his necessities easily in other ways, might and ought to reckon on a miraculous interference of the Deity, a notion which would entirely contradict the fundamental principle of Jesus on the interference of the Deity. . . . There is a great deal more of this, after which Paulus considers the narration, and shews that there is nothing of a miraculous appearance in it; for that if there had been, 'the fiery Peter would not have been cold-blooded at such a miracle,' but would have expressed himself as in Luke v. 8; that in the whole aim and tone of the narration there is no appearance of any wondering; that Christ only meant to give a moral lesson, viz. that we are not, if we can avoid it by trifling sacrifices, to give offence to our brethren: that He probably reasoned thus with Peter, 'Though there is no real occasion for us to pay the tribute, yet as we may be reckoned as enemies of the Temple, and not attended to when we wish to teach what is good, why should not you, who are a fisherman, and can easily do it, go and get enough to pay the demand? Go then to the sea, cast your hook, and take up πρῶτον ἰχθύν, the first and best fish. Peter was not to stay longer at his work this time than to gain the required money. πρῶτος often refers not to number but to time, and ἰχθύν may undoubtedly be taken as a collective. Peter must either have caught so many fish as would be reckoned worth a stater at Capernaum (so near to a sea rich in fish), or one so large and fine as would have been valued at that sum.'" The command "Open his mouth" is then learnedly explained as being for the purpose of taking the hook out. [Rose's State of Protestantism in Germany, 131, ed. 1829.]

In a similar manner Paulus explains the miracle of Christ walking on the sea. "'The fact is,' he says, 'that when Christ saw that the wind was contrary, He did not wish to sustain the inconvenience of such a voyage, but walked along the shore, and resolved to pass the disciples as the wind was against them. They coasted the shore from the state of the weather, and when they saw Him walking on the land they were frightened, and, on their calling out, Christ desired Peter, who as a fisherman was a good swimmer, to swim ashore to ascertain that it was He; Peter ran round to the proper side of the ship and jumped into the sea. When he was frightened by the violence of the waves, Christ, Who was standing on the shore, put out His hand and caught him'" [ibid. 135].

"Ammon, in his preface to Ernesti's Institutes, has given a dissertation on miracles in general, and wipes them away by wholesale. In Matt. iii. 17, it was thunder. In Acts ix. 4, St. Paul was in a transport. In Matt. viii. 3, καθαρίσαι is to declare one pure. In xiv. 23, he explains the passage, first, 'to walk on the shallows,' and then 'to swim.' In John xix. 34, νύσσω is to strike. In Luke xxiv. 40, it is quite clear that the nails were not driven through the hands or feet. Some miracles arose from the fancy of the sick, as Luke viii. 40; Acts v. 18, xiii. 12, xvi. 8, xix. 12. Some arise from mistaken opinions or embellishment on the part of the Apostles. The temptation of Christ is only an exaggerated account of various conflicts of opinions from which He suffered. The story of Ananias and Sapphira was merely an ornamented account of the fact that Ananias died of fear in a meeting of the Apostles, and his wife followed soon after" [ibid. 136].

In a similar manner this school of "Rationalists"—one cannot use the name for such interpreters without a smile at the absurd self-deception which its assumption involved—explained away everything relating to the history of our Lord. They set Him forth in general, though not always, as a pattern of moral goodness, but eliminated from the evangelical account of Him every trace of the supernatural. So Röhr in his Letters on Rationalism represents the Saviour as a great genius, the blossom of His age and generation, and unsurpassed in wisdom by any one before or after Him. His origin, culture, deeds, and experience are yet veiled, and the accounts we have of Him are so distorted by rhapsody that we cannot reach a clear conception of Him. He had a rare acquaintance with mankind, and studied the Old Testament carefully. He possessed a large measure of tact, imagination, judgment, wisdom, and power. His wisdom was the product of unbiassed reason, a sound heart, and freedom from scholastic prejudices. He knew how to seize upon the best means for the attainment of His human purposes. He embraced in His plan a universal religion, and to this He made all things minister. All His doctrines were borrowed from the Old Testament; and the most admirable can be found as far back as the time of Moses. He performed no real miracles, but things which He did seemed miraculous to those who witnessed them. He uttered no real prophecies, but His mind was so full of the future that some of His predictions came to pass, because they were made with a keen natural foresight which drew correct conclusions as to what would happen. His cures were effected by His skill as a physician, every Jew of that day having some medical knowledge, and His being above the average. His Apostles propagated Christianity because of the influence which He had gained with them; but His fame would have been little if Paul had not arisen to carry it beyond Palestine; but, after all, the spread of Christianity was not more remarkable than that of Mahometanism. To wind up his theory of Christ, Röhr apostrophizes Him as one of his own school, calling Him a Rationalist of pure, clear, sound reason, free from prejudice, of ready perceptions, great love of truth and warm sympathies, an exalted picture of intellectual and moral greatness. "Who," he adds, "would not bow before Thee," as if such an adoration of this made-up character fully answered the requirements of that Christianity whose first principle is the worship of the historical Christ.

Very few of the philosophical writers of Germany can be said, however, to have any faith in our Lord as such faith has ordinarily been understood in the Christian world. "If Christ could have been ignored, He would have been ignored in Protestant Germany, when Christian faith had been eaten out of the heart of that country by the older Rationalism. Yet scarcely any German 'thinker' of note can be named who has not projected what is termed a Christology. The Christ of Kant is the ideal of moral perfection, and as such, we are told, He is to be carefully distinguished from the historical Jesus, since of this ideal alone, and in a transcendental sense, can the statements of the orthodox creed be predicated. The Christ of Jacobi is a religious ideal, and worship addressed to the historical Jesus is denounced as sheer idolatry, unless beneath the recorded manifestation the ideal itself be discerned and honoured. According to Fichte, on the contrary, the real interest of philosophy in Jesus is historical and not metaphysical; Jesus first possessed an insight into the absolute unity of the being of man with that of God, and in revealing this insight He communicated the highest knowledge which man can possess. Of the later Pantheistic philosophers, Schelling proclaims that the Christian theology is hopelessly in error when it teaches that at a particular moment of time God became Incarnate, since God is 'external to' all time, and the Incarnation of God is an eternal fact. But Schelling contends that the man Christ Jesus is the highest point or effort of this eternal Incarnation, and the beginning of its real manifestation to men; 'none before Him after such a manner has revealed to man the Infinite.' And the Christ of Hegel is not the actual Incarnation of God in Jesus of Nazareth, but the symbol of His Incarnation in humanity at large" [Liddon's Bampton Lect. 19].

The general tone in which the German Rationalists now dealt with Holy Scripture at large may be seen in the "Institutiones Dogmaticæ" of Wegscheider, which were first printed in 1815, and which ran through many editions during the generation following. "Whatever narrations," he says, "especially accommodated to a certain age, and relating miracles and mysteries, are united with the histories and subject-matter of revelation of this kind, these ought to be referred to the natural sources and true nature of human knowledge. By how much the more clearly the author of the Christian religion, not without the help of Deity, exhibited to men the ideas of reason imbued with true religion, so as to represent, as it were, a reflection of the Divine Reason, or the Divine Spirit, by so much the more diligently ought man to strive to approach as nearly as possible to form that archetype in the mind, and to study to imitate it in life and manners to the utmost of his ability. Behold here the intimate and eternal union and agreement of Christianity with Rationalism. . . . The various modes of supernatural revelation mentioned in many places of the sacred books are to be referred altogether to the notions and mythical narrations of every civilized people; and this following the suggestion of Holy Scripture itself, and therefore to be attributed, as any events in the nature of things, to the laws of Nature known to us. As to Theophanies, the sight of the Infinite Deity is expressly denied; John i. 18; 1 John iv. 12; 1 Tim. vi. 16. Angelophanies, which the Jews of a later date substituted for the appearances of God Himself, like the narrations of the appearances of demons found amongst many nations, are plainly destitute of certain historic proofs; and the names, species, and commissions attributed to angels in the sacred books, plainly betray their Jewish origin. . . . The persuasion concerning the truth of that supernatural revelation which rests on the testimony of the sacred volume of the Old and New Testaments, like every opinion of the kind, labours under what is commonly called a petitio principii."

A new turn was given to German Rationalism by the establishment of the University of Berlin in the year 1810, or rather by the appointment of Schleiermacher as the head of its Theological faculty. This influential teacher originally belonged to the Calvinistic or "Reformed" section of German Protestants, and was brought up among Moravians. After giving up his connection with the latter (among whom he was to have become a preacher) he went to the University of Halle, where he sat at the feet of Semler. He became distinguished as a preacher at Berlin, but in 1804 was appointed to a Professorship at Halle. In 1807 he returned to Berlin, being designated for the Theological Professorship in the projected University, and when at last it was opened by King Frederick William, Schleiermacher began there his thirty years' brilliant career in that post. The fashion of the time in Germany was then tending towards comprehension, the King projecting the formation of an United Church out of the Lutheran and Calvinistic bodies into which Prussia was divided. Schleiermacher's inclinations ran in the same direction, but his attention was turned chiefly to a reconciliation of philosophy and theology. In attempting this he oscillated very far towards the extreme of Rationalism, although on the whole his influence tended towards a breaking up of the destructive school of criticism in Germany. He gave little authority to the Old Testament Scriptures, alleging that they are indebted for their place in our Bible partly to the appeals which are made to them in the New Testament, and partly to the historic connection between Church worship and that of the Synagogue. The Law of Moses he considered to be altogether uninspired, because it seemed to him to be irreconcilable with the goodness of God; but as the historical books are grounded on the Law, so they also must be uninspired. To the Old Testament prophecies he allowed some small measure of inspiration. Retaining a higher belief in the New Testament, and especially having a strong faith in a personal Christ, Schleiermacher yet considered that the accounts of the miraculous Conception, the Resurrection, and the Ascension of Christ were not positive truths, but "outward representations of general truths;" and miracles were, with him, only "relatively" miraculous, that is, they were wonderful when compared with ordinary experiences, but not actually supernatural.

Such principles as these when looked at by themselves appear to be very little different from those of preceding and avowed Rationalists. But viewed, by the light of the circumstances in which Schleiermacher was placed,—by the theology in which he had been trained, by his earnest desire for unity, and by his keen sympathies with both the sides which he wished to unite,—his theology, unsatisfactory at it is, must be considered as that of one who was groping his way back to a firmer footing of truth. It is known that his own views became more and more developed as he grew old, and it is also known that those who sat at his feet became more orthodox believers than himself. After his death the older school of Rationalists gradually became discontented with his writings, and the influence of his name very soon passed away in Germany, though English Rationalists—who take easily to cast-off intellectual clothes—long continued to look on him as a leader.

Hegel had passed away three years before Schleiermacher, and after his death his followers had divided into three parties, which called themselves Right, Centre, and Left Hegelians. The Right professed to reconcile the cloudy metaphysics of Hegel with orthodox Christianity, the Centre professed to be strict followers of their master, and the Left were Rationalists of the most extreme type. From among the latter party arose Strauss, who had sat under both Hegel and Schleiermacher, but at the death of the latter was only twenty-six years of age, though already engaged as a Theological Lecturer at Tübingen. A few months later, in 1835, Strauss published his "Life of Jesus," and at once achieved an European notoriety by the extreme character of his Rationalism.

In "Das Leben Jesu," Strauss endeavours to explain the Gospel narratives respecting our Lord on the principle of the "myth," wherever anything appears in them of a supernatural character. Having adopted a philosophy which utterly denied the possibility of the supernatural, the theologian who had to deal with the New Testament was driven to seek for some explanation of what he found there; and none of the theories propounded by previous Rationalists satisfying him, he took a line of his own, and laboured to reduce everything in the life of our Lord to a consistent agreement with the theory thus invented. But "it is far more," says Dr. Mill, "from a desire of working on a historical ground the philosophical principles of his master, than from any attachment to mythical theories on their own account, that we are clearly to deduce the destructive process which Strauss has applied to the Life of Jesus" [Mill's Pantheism, II. i. 11].

This destructive process "eliminates from the Gospel most of Christ's discourses, all of His miracles, His supernatural Birth, and his Resurrection from the grave. The so-called 'historical' residuum might easily be compressed within the limits of a newspaper paragraph, and it retains nothing that can rouse a moderate measure, I do not say of enthusiasm, but even of interest" [Liddon's Bampton Lect. 220]. The general theory of Strauss is that the minds of the Jews were in an excited state of expectation at the time when Christ appeared among them, and that He so far answered to the ideal which they had formed of their Messiah from the traditions of their fathers, that some of them accepted Him as such. His career is viewed as a perfectly natural one. Born of humble parents, He was baptized by John, collected a few disciples, inveighed against all who opposed Him, and failing to maintain Himself against them, suffered death at their hands. A good many years after His death popular imagination ran wild with stories about this obscure Nazarene, and then the Gospels were composed, not in accordance with the true facts of His life, but to embody these popular fancies. The writers of the Gospels did not wilfully intend to write down a congeries of falsehoods, but not possessing the critical faculty they just put down all the stories they heard floating about among lovers of the marvellous, little dreaming of the position which their curious but not very clever compilations would occupy in the esteem of future generations.

As for the details of the Gospel narrative, this youthful theological lecturer—he was about five-and-twenty when his Leben Jesu was written—could satisfactorily account for them all. The story of John the Baptist's birth grew out of the Old Testament myths of Isaac, Samson, and Samuel. That of the miraculous Conception of Jesus is a philosophical, dogmatic myth of early Christianity, grounded on a notion taken up from Isaiah vii. 14, and agrees with a habit common to all nations of assigning some marvellous origin to their Divine heroes. The Conception and Birth were in reality, the writer alleges, similar to those of all other children. The slaughter of the Innocents never took place as a fact, but the story of it is a poetical plagiarism of the myths respecting Nimrod and Pharaoh. The Epiphany star was invented to fit in with the alleged prophecy of Balaam. The Holy Child among the doctors was a myth founded on the precocity of Moses, Samuel, and Solomon. The miracles of Christ "are the halo of glory with which the infant Church gradually and without purposes of deceit clothed its Founder and its Head"

[Trench on Mir. 84]. The alleged sufferings of the Saviour were a myth made up from the Lamentations of Jeremiah, the older myth of the brazen serpent, and the poetical descriptions given in the twenty-second and sixty-ninth Psalms. The Resurrection he regards as a myth grounded on the necessity under which the disciples of Jesus were placed of reconciling His fate with the opinions which they had formed of Him. "When once the idea of a resurrection of Jesus had been formed in this manner, the great event could not have been allowed to happen so simply, but must be surrounded and embellished with all the pomp that the Jewish imagination furnished. The chief ornaments which stood at command for this purpose were angels; hence these must open the grave of Jesus, must, after He had come forth from it, keep watch in the empty place, and deliver to the women—who, because without doubt women had the first visions, must be the first to go to the grave—the tidings of what had happened. As it was Galilee where Jesus subsequently appeared to them, the journey of the disciples thither (which was nothing else than their return home somewhat hastened by fear) was derived from the direction of an angel: nay, Jesus Himself must already before His death, and as Matthew too zealously adds, once after His resurrection also, have enjoined this journey on the disciples. But the farther these narratives were propagated by tradition, the more must the difference between the locality of the Resurrection itself and that of the appearance of the risen One be allowed to fall out of sight as inconvenient; and, since the locality of the Death was not transferable, the appearances were gradually placed in the same locality as the Resurrection, in Jerusalem, which, as the more brilliant theatre and the seat of the first Christian Church, was especially appropriate for them." Lastly, the Ascension was a myth founded upon the stories of Enoch and Elijah; and those of the apotheosis of Hercules and of Romulus.

The only original idea in the work of Strauss, even if that can be so called, is the mythical theory. All the rest is an ingenious mosaic formed from the materials which he raked together by a most industrious perusal of the works of preceding Rationalists, German, English, and French. It was professedly written only for the learned, but it soon became known to a very wide range of readers, passed through many editions, and was translated into other languages. Twenty-nine years later the author followed it up with "Das Leben Jesu, für das Deutsche Volk bearbeitet," which was published at Leipsic in 1864: but this popularized replica of his former work has never obtained any wide notice. In the meanwhile he had aroused the attention of theologians in Germany and elsewhere, and the historical character of the Gospels was elucidated more clearly than ever by their writings. Among the many learned works drawn out by Strauss' "Life of Jesus" may be named Dörner's volumes on "The Person of Christ," in which the author gives an elaborate view of the course of opinion respecting our Lord. Neander also wrote a "Life of Christ" in opposition to that of Strauss, the line taken by him being very much that of his master Schleiermacher. Hengstenberg was among his most vigorous opponents in the pages of periodical literature, but his "Christology" was printed before the "Leben Jesu" appeared.

The "Tübingen School" of Rationalists was indirectly developed from Strauss, being composed of a not large clique of theologians, headed by Baur [A.D. 1792-1860], Schwegler and Zeller, who set themselves the task of moulding the negative system of Strauss into a positive system by the same processes of criticism. Their attention was principally directed towards the Apostolic age, and the key of their system is the idea that Christianity is not a divinely revealed and complete truth and life, but a vital force in process of development. In working out their principle this school relies chiefly upon the Pauline epistles, especially those to the Romans, Galatians, and Corinthians, which are considered to be most in accordance with the theory of an infant but growing Christianity that was feeling its way towards the light. The Books of the New Testament are looked upon as the productions respectively of an early Petrine or Pauline party, most of them having only a temporary object, and such of them being now to be regarded simply as literary monuments of a departed controversy, which may illustrate history, but cannot prove or teach truth. This is the latest phase of German Rationalism; but it has been so vigorously met by the works of Bunsen, Thiersch, Bleek, and others, that the influence of the school has not been very widely extended; and, like that of German Rationalism in general, it is rapidly on the wane.

IV. FRENCH RATIONALISTS. The revolution in the religion of the French people was as destructive as that in their political life, and no country of Europe ever so generally repudiated Christianity as did France during the last century, under the influence of Voltaire, Rousseau, the ENCYCLOPÆDISTS, and the fanatics who overthrew the monarchy. The climax was reached in the year 1793, when a number of the Parisian clergy, with Gobel, the Archbishop of Paris, at their head, gave up their offices as priests of the Church into the hands of the Convention, and renounced Christianity as an exploded superstition. At the instigation of Anacharsis Cloots—a rich Prussian nobleman who had, in his enthusiastic admiration of the Revolution, turned Frenchman and become a member of the National Convention—it was at length determined to set up Rationalism as the religion of the country instead of Christianity. The churches were despoiled of everything that had been used in Christian worship, and the symbols of the new religion which were set up in them were the busts of Marat and Lepelletier, which were also carried in procession under canopies as the reserved Sacrament had been carried on the Festival of Corpus Christi. The great cathedral of Paris, Notre-Dame, was then rededicated as "The Temple of Reason," every tenth day was ordered to be observed as a festival of Reason in the place of the Christian Sunday, and on November 10th, 1793, the first of these festivals was kept with great ceremony, an official procession of the Supreme Government of France taking place, in which the "Goddess of Reason" was personated by a young woman in theatrical costume carried aloft on a throne, and surrounded by girls dressed in white and crowned with roses. When this procession had arrived at the "Temple of Reason," hymns were chanted in praise of Reason, and then the multitude moved on to the National Convention, where the Procurator-General, Chaumette, addressed the assembly in words which stated the national renunciation of Christianity. "Legislators," he said, "Fanaticism has given place to Reason. Its craven eyes have been unable to bear the lustre of light. To-day an immense concourse has been gathered under those Gothic arches, which, for the first time, resound to the echoes of truth. There the French people have celebrated the only true worship, that of Liberty and Reason." The Convention then returned with the procession, and officially joined in the "Worship of Reason" under the vaulted roof of Notre-Dame [Thiers' French Revol. ch. xxviii.].

This absurd outburst of French Rationalism was but a temporary phase of it; but, absurd as it was, it represented not untruly the attitude of the nation towards Christianity. The Church gradually re-established its position as the national religion of France, and the Protestants returned to their Calvinism, but both Catholics and Protestants have continued to be largely infected with Rationalism, and comparatively few Frenchmen give an intellectual assent to the doctrines founded upon historical Christianity, or to historical Christianity itself.

The Christology of French Rationalists has been crystallized by Joseph Ernest Renan [A.D. 1823-] in his "Life of Jesus." Renan was originally educated for the priesthood, and became an ardent student of oriental languages while at St. Sulpice. He did not eventually enter into holy orders, but pursued his study of theology from the philological side, and in 1856, a few years after publishing his "Histoire Générale et Systèmes comparés des Langues Sémitiques," and his "Etude de la Langue Grecque au Moyen Age," was elected a member of the Institute on account of his philological learning. Renan's "Vie de Jésus" was written after an official expedition which he had made into Syria in the year 1860, and was published in 1863. It became rapidly popular in France, where 100,000 copies of it were sold in a short time, and was almost equally popular in other countries of Europe, which were quickly supplied with translations in English, German, Spanish, and Italian. In 1866 the "Life of Jesus" was supplemented by a volume bearing "The Apostles" for its title, the two being together entitled "The Origins of Christianity."

Renan's theories respecting Christianity are very similar to those of Strauss. Christ he alleges to have been an ordinary human being, the son of Joseph and Mary, but one whose character was developed in such a direction as to fit in with the ideal of the Messiah that had become fixed in the Jewish mind. By study of the Old Testament He became impressed with the imagination that He should become a great reformer of the world, and this was the key to His life, the idea of such a reformation developing into that of the formation of a "Kingdom of God." The miracles of the Gospel narrative Renan considers to be exaggerated accounts of natural occurrences; and the crowning miracle of the Resurrection is altogether denied, the account of it being founded on an hallucination of Mary Magdalen's excited mind. The phenomena of Pentecost are reduced to a thunder-storm, a strong wind which blew open the windows of the upper chamber, and an electric illumination of the air. In their ecstasy the Apostles uttered some inarticulate sounds which were thought to be foreign languages, and of which zealous interpreters professed to give the meaning. At a later time Paul was struck with fever and ophthalmia from sunstroke as he was going to Damascus; and the direction thus given to the fanatical mind of the last of the Apostles originated the later phase of Christianity as it became known throughout the compass of St. Paul's travels.

Thus Renan emasculates the narrative of the New Testament, repudiating all its supernaturalism, making out Christ to be only a man above men, and setting forth the Church of Christ as a community founded in the mistakes and the fanaticism of His followers. Had the "Worship of Reason" lasted a little longer, or had Robespierre been able to establish his reformation of it, the work of Renan would probably have been anticipated by two generations, his view of Christianity being exactly that which assigns to it a place in the Pantheon of Reason without accepting it as true. So polite a treatment of "superstition" would have much commended itself to the polished politeness of French philosophers, when the first fanaticism of Reason worship had worn off. The less polished repudiation of Christianity which marked the Rationalism of Comte is noticed elsewhere. [POSITIVISM.]

V. THE REVIVAL OF ENGLISH RATIONALISM. It has often been said that the English Deists gave Rationalism to Germany in the sixteenth century, and that it was re-imported thence into England in the nineteenth. This is scarcely an historical truth as regards the first part of the saying, since the foundation of scepticism laid by Spinoza was broad enough for all the subsequent structure of German Rationalism to build upon, and it may be doubted whether the earlier writers of the school were acquainted with the works of the English Deists to any great extent. But it is notorious that modern English Rationalism, although it is practically a revival of the school of Hume, Woolston, Tindal, and Collins, originated in the study of the destructive school of German critics, and not in that of English writers. It is in fact the result of a revived taste for the German language among the young men of the last generation, a taste which led those whose studies ran in the direction of theology or philosophy to obtain their knowledge from German authors; and, under the influence of the bias thus given, to accept those authors as final authorities before whom all others must bow. Had the mind of Coleridge [A.D. 1772-1834] been of a less desultory character, he would have left behind him a system of Christian philosophy which would have been a formidable opponent to this German influence; but Coleridge did little more than stimulate and strengthen the thinking power of his own generation and of the generation immediately following him. His influence went far in developing the intellectual school of High Church theologians, but he never formulated a system to a sufficient extent for that influence to be much felt as an educational power in the rather later revival of philosophical study.

A great impulse was, however, given to the rationalizing tendency which accompanied the revival of religion between 1830 and 1850 by the teaching of Julius Charles Hare [A.D. 1795-1855], who followed up a career of ten years' influential teaching at Cambridge with twenty years of influential preaching and writing after he became a Sussex Rector and Archdeacon of Lewes. The general tendency of Hare's teaching was that of drawing minds away from historical Christianity, and fixing them on an imaginative spiritualization of it. In particular, he combated the Protestant theory of the Atonement by setting forth the self-sacrifice of Christ's Life in the place of the great act of sacrifice which He accomplished by His Death; and made the latter a crowning act of self-denial and voluntary suffering, rather than an act of expiation. Hare's principal works were five volumes of Sermons, the first of which, published in 1840, was entitled "The Victory of Faith," and the last, six years later, "The Mission of the Comforter."

To Hare and his brother-in-law Maurice as theologians, to Whateley as a philosophical writer, to Thirlwall as an historian, and to Arnold as a teacher of the rising generation, the BROAD CHURCH SCHOOL owes its origin, a school which is always tending towards Rationalism, and out of which many extreme Rationalists have arisen among the laity, and a few among the clergy. None of these latter have, however, been men of much learning, or men endowed with great power as leaders, and neither in the Church of England, nor among English Dissenters, has Rationalism ever run to the same height of unbelief as among the German Lutherans or the French Calvinists of France and Geneva. External to all religious communities, there are indeed many who repudiate historical Christianity, just as they repudiate everything which assumes to be associated with a supernatural order of things. But the Rationalism of these classes is merely a part of the system which they profess, and they have developed unbelief to a much further extent in the direction of Positivism and Atheism. Among the principal of their intellectual leaders must be reckoned Henry Thomas Buckle, whose Materialist theories were propounded at length in his "History of Civilization in England," of which only one thick volume, the Introduction, was published, in 1856, when the author's death put an end to the work. But Materialism and the Worship of Humanity, such as are to be found in the work of Buckle and of his teacher, Comte, seem to be the natural terminus of Rationalism.

RATRAMNUS. A monk of Corbey in Aquitaine, who engaged in controversy with PASCHASUS RABBERTUS on the subject of the Holy Eucharist, in the middle of the ninth century. He is sometimes called Bertram the Monk, or Bertram the Priest, but it is thought that this is a corruption of B. Ratramnus, "Beatus" being sometimes prefixed to the names of venerated writers even when there had been no act of beatification. The work of Ratramn, which was entitled "De Corpore et Sanguine Domini," had much influence upon the English Reformation. It was published at Cologne in the year 1532, after having been brought into notice by Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, as early as 1526; and it largely influenced the minds of Archbishop Cranmer and Bishop Ridley. In 1548 an English translation of it was printed by William Hugh, under the name of "the Book of Bertram." It has often been quoted by mistake as a work of Scotus Erigena, was supposed by many Romanist theologians to be a forgery of the Reformers, and is excluded from the collection of Ratramn's works printed in the Bibliotheca Mariana, on the ground that it has been hopelessly interpolated by supposititious heretics.

RÉALISTS. A school of mediæval theologians, who adopted the doctrine attributed by Aristotle to Plato, that genera, or "universals," have an existence prior to and independent of the individual objects to which they relate, the formula of the school being "universalia ante rem."

This theory was brought into prominence by Johannes Scotus Erigena [c. 805-877], and was generally held by philosophical theologians until the rise of Nominalism in the eleventh century. Roscellin, the founder of the latter school [NOMINALISTS], was vigorously opposed by St. Anselm [A.D. 1033-1109], who looked upon the application of Nominalist theories to the "doctrine of the Trinity as involving the heresy of Tritheism." St. Anselm also maintained that the Realist doctrine was the only one reconcilable with the Incarnation, for that Deity could not have assumed Humanity unless the latter had a real objective existence, distinguished from that of individual men; a theory which he set forth in his treatise entitled "Cur Deus Homo."

The most distinguished champions of Realism after Anselm were William of Champeaux [A.D. 1070-1121], the opponent of Abelard, and St. Thomas Aquinas [A.D. 1225-1274]; the latter however holding the Realist opinion in the modified form that universals have a real existence prior to the individuals to which they relate through their antecedent existence in the Divine Mind. The Schoolmen in general held Realist opinions ranging between this theory and the extreme form of them maintained by St. Anselm. Wickliffe also was on the same side, although the freedom of his theology was more in sympathy with the Nominalist school.

The general tone of Realism is that of submission to authority and dogma: especially regarding that truth as most certain which is revealed by the All-Knowing and All-True; consequently regarding revelation as the true foundation of belief, and belief as the entrance-gate to a wide domain of knowledge on which the mind would not otherwise enter. [SCHOOLMEN.]

RECUSANTS. This term came into use in the reign of Queen Elizabeth as the legal designation of persons refusing [recusantes] to attend the services of the Church of England.

"In the beginning of the eleventh year of her reign," says Lord Coke, in his charge to the grand jury of Norfolk, "Cornwallis, Bedingfield, and Silyard, were the first Recusants, they absolutely refusing to come to our churches. And, until they in that sort begun, the name of Recusant was never heard of amongst us." Later on in the same charge he says, "The last sort of Recusants, though troublesome (yet in my conscience the least dangerous), are those which do, with too much violence, contend against some ceremonies in the Church, with whose indirect proceedings, in mine own knowledge, his Majesty is much grieved" [The Lord Coke, His Speech and Charge, 1607].

This application of the name to both Roman Catholics and Puritans is illustrated by the lists of Recusants, to one volume of which, containing the names and particulars of those registered in the reign of Charles II. up to the year 1671, there is a note affixed by the official compiler, that it is unreliable as a list of Popish Recusants, since it also contains the names of many Puritans [Brit. Mus. Add. MS. 20,739]. In the reign of William III. the Nonjurors were also classed among Recusants by Act of Parliament. But the name most commonly refers to ROMAN CATHOLICS.

REFORMED BAPTISTS. [CAMPBELLITES, AMERICAN.]

REFORMED CHURCH, GERMAN. That section of German Protestants which adopted the Calvinistic instead of the Lutheran phase of the Continental Reformation. Calvinism has, however, failed to gain a footing in Germany in its extreme form, and the "Reformed," as they are generally called, belong rather to the Zwinglian school modified by contact with Lutheranism than to that of the strict Calvinists, and adopt the Heidelberg Confession. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.] Several distinguished theologians have belonged to this section of the German Protestants, as Herzog, Ebrard, Lange, and Hagenbach. It is now being gradually absorbed into the UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH.

In America the German Reformed are a considerable body, and though not so numerous as the Lutherans, are said to number about 300 ministers and 100,000 communicants. As in Germany, the sect tends towards an union with moderate Lutheranism, and has within the last few years adopted "A Liturgy, or Order of Christian Worship," which is chiefly compiled from the Book of Common Prayer.

REFORMED PRESBYTERIANS. [CAMERONIANS.]

REFORMERS. [CAMPBELLITES, AMERICAN.]

REFORMERS, WESLEYAN. [UNITED FREE CHURCH METHODISTS.]

RELIEF SYNOD. One of the seceding bodies in Scotland which arose out of opposition to the system of Patronage. A majority of the Presbytery of Dunfermline having refused to take part in the induction of a minister to the parish of Inverkeithing who was unacceptable to the people, they were cited in 1752 before the General Assembly, and one of the number, Thomas Gillespie, minister of Carnock (who had been ordained amongst the Independents in England), being foremost in defence of the recusants, was deposed from the ministry, while three others were visited with a sentence of suspension, which lasted for thirteen years. This proceeding of the Assembly, which was urged on by Dr. Robertson, who was then rising into notice, was one of extreme severity, the only charge against Gillespie, "one of the most inoffensive and upright men of his time" [Moncrieff's Life of Erskine, p. 460], being that of mere absence on the day appointed for the presentee's induction, and not of any active opposition. Returning home at once, Gillespie met his wife at his manse-door with the words, "I am no longer minister of Carnock," to which she cheerfully replied, "Well, if we must beg, I will carry the meal-pock." His congregation, however, prevented any such hard necessity by still retaining him as their minister; and, upon the defeat of a motion in the Assembly of the following year for his restoration, a seceding body was constituted at Dunfermline. In 1757 a similar congregation was formed by Thomas Boston (son of Boston of Ettrick) at Jedburgh, in consequence of the forcible intrusion of a minister into that parish, where the people desired that Boston should be appointed. A third congregation was formed from a similar cause in 1760; and on October 22nd in the following year, the three ministers, Gillespie, Boston, and Thomas Colier, "formed themselves," in the words of their original minute, "into a Presbytery for the relief of Christians oppressed in their Christian privileges." They thus separated from the Kirk simply on the question of patronage, and had no doctrinal differences; they were free, however, from the bitterness of the old covenanting spirit, and, partly perhaps from the necessities of their isolated position, exhibited a temper of toleration hitherto unknown in Scotland. In 1772, when the number of congregations had considerably increased, it was resolved at a meeting of representatives that it was agreeable to their principles "to hold communion with those of the Episcopal or Independent persuasion occasionally, upon supposition always that they are by profession visible saints." Two ministers, who could not endure this "monstrous" desertion from old Presbyterian views, thereupon separated, and the Synod thenceforward accepted free communion as one of its fundamental principles.¹ Its uncontroversial and unaggressive position doubtlessly somewhat hindered its growth. In 1807 it numbered about sixty congregations, with 36,000 members; and in 1847 one hundred and fourteen, with about 45,000 members. In 1834 proposals were made for a union between the Secession and Relief Synods, the two bodies being identical in general views, and the latter having gradually become more like the former in opposition to the principle of Establishments, while the Secession were willing to relax their old declaration of adherence to the Covenant, and leave the practice of free communion an open question for each minister and congregation to decide for themselves. The negotiations lasted for several years, but at length the union was formally completed on 13th May 1847, when the two bodies assumed the name of the United Presbyterian Synod. Two Relief ministers dissented from this union, and continued in charge of congregations under their old name. These two congregations were in existence when the census of 1851 was taken, but appear now to be extinct.

RELIGIONAIRES. [HUGUENOTS.]

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES. Associations for the promotion of personal piety which were established among members of the Church of England about the year 1678, and existed until the rise of the Methodists in the following century.

They began with a few young men who had been impressed by the preaching of Dr. Horneck, preacher at the Savoy, and of Mr. Smithies, lecturer at St. Michael's, Cornhill. Under the advice of some clergymen these young men formed themselves into a body somewhat similar to the Societies of St. Vincent de Paul, which had been established half a century earlier in Paris, or like those of the Collegiants and other Pietistic communities in Holland and Germany. The members of the Religious Society so formed arranged to meet once a week for religious conference and devotion, the meetings being conducted with singing, prayer, Scripture reading, and exposition, and with special preparation for the Holy Communion. When daily celebrations of the Holy Communion were set up by James II. in the Chapels Royal, the Religious Society established a week-day service at St. Clement Danes in the Strand, and celebrations on holy days, for which latter they prepared by a careful observance of the Vigils preceding them. To all these means for the promotion of personal piety they added practical works of charity, contributing by their purses and by personal exertions to the establishment and maintenance of schools, the visitation of the poor, and support of missions in America.

The Religious Societies increased rapidly in number during the reign of William III., forty-two holding their meetings in London, and others in country towns, as also in the two Universities. They received the warm support of Robert Nelson—the Wilberforce of his day—of Tillotson, Compton, and other bishops. They were also closely connected with the Societies for the Reformation of Manners [q. v.], which were established in 1691, and were looked upon as efficient allies by the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge. That at Oxford was joined by John and Charles Wesley, and by George Whitfield, and the good practices with which the names of the founders of Methodism were so closely associated during their University life were those enjoined by the rules of the Brotherhood to which they had thus become attached.

One of the last of the annual meetings of the London Religious Societies was held at Bow Church in the year 1738; and it may be concluded that they disappeared before the Methodist revival, which in its earlier days was of the same "High Church" character. [Woodward's Rise and Progress of the Religious Societies, etc. Nelson's Address to Persons of Quality, p. 136. Nelson's Festivals and Fasts, pref.; Secretan's Life of Nelson.]

RELLYANISTS. [UNIVERSALISTS.]

REMONSTRANTS. [ARMINIANS.]

REMONSTRANTS. [RESOLUTIONERS.]

RENUNCIATOIRES. [APOTACTICS.]

REPRESENTERS. [MARROW-MEN.]

RESOLUTIONERS. In January 1649, an Act called the Act of Classes was passed by the Parliament of Scotland, incapacitating certain of the "Malignants," i.e. Royalists, and persons opposed to the Covenant, for State employment or power. After the Battle of Dunbar, the more moderate among the Covenanting party saw the need of admitting to military service those who had been thus incapacitated, and two Resolutions (supported by Robert Baillie amongst others) were passed by the Commission of the Assembly, approving of the employment, at least in defence of the country, of such persons, with the exception of those that were excommunicated and forfeited, or professed enemies to the Covenant and cause of God. In pursuance of these Resolutions, the Parliament, on 2nd June 1651, repealed the Act of Classes. But the Resolutions were vehemently opposed by a strong party, including James Guthrie and Patrick Gillespie among the ministers, and Argyle and Warriston among laymen, who refused to act in common against the common enemy, and issued a "Remonstrance" against any approach to a junction with the "Malignant" party. These were consequently known by the names of Remonstrants or Protesters, while their opponents were styled Resolutioners. Their disputes did not cease with the subjugation of Scotland by Cromwell, but were continued up to the time of the Restoration. Among the most active on the part of the Resolutioners, and employed as agent in England to thwart the endeavours of the Protesters to gain Cromwell's favour, was James Sharp, afterwards the well-known Archbishop of St Andrews. [D. Laing's Life of R. Buille, in Baillie's Letters and Journals, III. lxvii.-lxxii.]

RESTORATIONISTS. A sect of American Universalists who maintain that modified form of Universalism which is said by them to have been the original principle of the sect, namely, that the wicked will be restored to holiness and happiness after a temporary punishment in the future life. About the year 1818 Hosea Ballow, an Universalist preacher of Boston, began to teach that sin is entirely connected with the body, and that as death liberates the soul from the body, so also it frees the soul from the punishment of sin. The growth of this opinion led many of the Universalists to separate from that sect in the year 1831, and to form a separate community under the name of "Universal Restorationists" or "Restorationists," their congregations being found chiefly in Massachusetts. They are almost identical in all their opinions with the older English Unitarians.

RHEINSBERGERS. [COLLEGIANTS.]

RHETORIANS. An Alexandrian sect of this name is mentioned by Philaster as founded by Rhetorius, and maintaining the opinion that there was no harm in any heresy whatever [Philast. Hær. xci.]. St. Augustine remarks that this seems so absurd that he considers it incredible [Aug. Hær. lxxii.]. Philaster is the original authority for the existence of such a sect, but Prædestinatus speaks of them as if they were not unknown to him, adding to Philaster's statement that they advocated Christian fellowship with all who believed in the Incarnation [Prædest. Hær. lxxii.]. Even before Philaster's time St. Athanasius mentions a person named Rhetorius, whom he accuses of holding the opinion that doctrines are of no consequence, and that all heretics are right in their own way [Athanas. contr. Apollin. i. 6]. And at a later date St. John Damascene enumerates the γνώριμα as the eighty-eighth in his Catalogue of Heresies, who, it seems probable, were "knowledge" (or theology) "haters" in the sense of being anti-dogmatists, who had arisen from reaction against the subtleties of the Gnostics, the Antiochean and the Alexandrian schools of theologians, and who were identical with the Rhetorians of Philaster.

RITUALISTS. [HIGH CHURCHMEN.]

ROGATIANS. One of the numerous sects into which Donatism subdivided itself. They took their name from their leader Rogatus, and flourished in Mauritania Cæsariensis [c. A.D. 372-3]. [Augustine, Ep. 48, contra Cresconium Donatistam, lib. iv. cap. 70.]

ROGERIANS. An American sect of the Puritan RANTERS which appeared in New England about the year 1677 under the leadership of John Rogers, from whom they took their name. Their principal tenet was that worship on the Lord's Day is idolatry, which it was a matter of conscience to oppose; and hence they used to disturb the congregations in churches and chapels as the Ranters were accustomed to do in England [H. Adams' View of all Religions].

RÖHR. [RATIONALISTS.]

ROMAN CATHOLICS. A sect originally organized by the Jesuits out of the relics of the Marian party of clergy and laity in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and further organized into a Donatist hierarchy by Cardinal Wiseman in the year 1850.

The name is found in use as early as the year 1564, when the words "every Romish Catholique within England and Ireland or any of England's territories" are found in a paper of intelligence sent home from Italy for the information of Burleigh by Denny, the Queen's secret agent [Brit. Mus. Add. MS. 4784]. It also occurs in the charge delivered to the grand jury of Norfolk in the year 1607, by Lord Chief-Justice Coke. In a wide sense, all members of churches or sects recognised by the Pope as in communion with himself are often called Roman Catholics, but the name is more strictly applicable to the English sect.

A distinguished Roman Catholic writer of the last century dates the origin of his community from the accession of Queen Elizabeth. "In the year 1558," he says, "Elizabeth ascended the throne of England. At this time begins the real era of English Reformation; and consequently from this time Catholics are to be considered as a sect, dissenting from the National Church" [Berington's State and Behaviour of English Catholics from the Reformation to the year 1780, with a view of their present number, wealth, character, etc. 1780]. But this is antedating its origin by about twelve years, for although there was a strong Romanizing party in the Church during the early years of Queen Elizabeth's reign, it was not until the publication of the Bull by which the Pope excommunicated her in 1570, that those of the party who had not in the meanwhile been won over to the Reformation separated themselves from the national communion. They were not thoroughly organized into a sect until the arrival of the Jesuits, the first of whom came over in the year 1581; and had it not been for the work of these enemies of Catholic unity the Roman Catholics would probably have been reabsorbed by the Church as the Nonjurors were in the next century.

I. HISTORY OF ROMAN CATHOLICS. In the early stage of the Reformation the clergy and laity of England generally assented to the new order of things, although there were many who, like Bishop Fisher, Sir Thomas More, and the Charterhouse monks, were unable to agree with the Tudor view of the Royal Supremacy. The evidence of this general concurrence of Church and State is given in detail in the first volume of Blunt's History of the Reformation of the Church of England during the reign of Henry VIII.; and all that can be said on the subject in the short compass of this article is that the Houses of Lords and Commons, the Convocations of the Clergy, the Universities, and even the monastic bodies, all concurred in the repudiation of the Papal Supremacy, that absurd relic of Roman Imperialism, the repudiation of which was, and was well known to be, the backbone of the Reformation.

The development of an "extreme left," however, in the form of Puritanism, led naturally to the development of an "extreme right" in the form of revived Ultramontaniam; and although the reactionary party did not at once become Ultramontane, and was not large during the reign of Henry VIII., it was exasperated by the intemperate rule of the Privy Council during the calamitous reign of Edward VI., so that when Mary came to the throne it at once leaped into power under the leadership of Bishop Gardiner. The policy of the party during the first of the two years which then elapsed before Gardiner's death was that of his great master Wolsey, and was directed towards the restoration of that national system of ecclesiastical affairs which had existed in the latter half of the reign of Henry VIII., and not to the establishment of the Ultramontane system which eventually became the notorious characteristic of Queen Mary's reign. But a Spanish party had arisen in England through the Queen's engagement to Philip of Spain, and her marriage with him on July 25th, 1554. Her relationship to Cardinal Pole, and her personal affection for him, had also smoothed the way for that Italianized Englishman's return to his native country with the fullest powers of a Papal Legate. From the arrival of the latter, on November 24th, 1554, power passed out of the hands of Gardiner and the national party into the hands of Pole and the King of Spain, and under the influence of the Ultramontane party, formed by the union of these two foreign elements, England was "reconciled to the Holy See" on November 30th, 1554. Under the same influences—Philip himself being especially prepared for the work by a treatise on Heresies and another on the punishment of Heretics re-written for the purpose by his confessor, à Castro¹—that dreadful persecution of the Puritans began in which not a few of the orthodox clergy and laity also suffered, and which permanently alienated the people of England from Ultramontaniam.²

Upon the accession of Queen Elizabeth, the utmost tact and patience became necessary to prevent the Catholic Reformation from being crushed by the pressure of the two reactionary parties, the Puritan "Left" and the Roman "Right." Hence arose nearly two years of politic silence, temporizing, and delay on the part of her Government in settling the affairs of the Church. During these two years the influence of the Spanish party was gradually extinguished, and although a considerable section of the clergy and laity desired to retain the ancient rites of the Church of England, and to prevent a dissolution of the re-established communion with Rome, this party also was being gradually thinned as the Marian bishops and clergy died off.

When at length the Prayer Book system of the Reformation was re-established, there seemed good reason to hope that those of the reactionary party, who had at first been dissatisfied with it, were gradually becoming reconciled. During the early years of Queen Elizabeth's reign, say the Instructions given to Walsingham on his mission to France, those who afterwards became Recusants "did ordinarily resort, in all open places, to the churches and to divine service in the church, without any contradiction or shew of misliking." So also Sir Edward Coke declared at the trial of Garnet, on January 27th, 1605, in the following words:—"Before the Bull of Impius Pius Quintus, in the eleventh year of the Queen, wherein her Majesty was excommunicated and deposed, and all they accursed who should yield any obedience unto her, etc. there were no Recusants in England, all came to church (howsoever popishly inclined or persuaded in most points) to the same divine service we now use; but thereupon presently they refused to assemble in our churches, or join with us in public service, not for conscience of anything there done, against which they might justly except out of the Word of God, but because the Pope had excommunicated and deposed her Majesty, and cursed those who should obey her" [State Trials, i. 242].

Garnet tried to shew that this was a mistake of Sir Edward Coke's, yet he admitted the main fact even while contradicting the reason which the great Attorney-General had given for the change that afterwards took place. "I know divers myself," said Garnet, "who before that Bull refused to go to church all the time of Queen Elizabeth, though perhaps most Catholics did indeed go to church before. It was about the end of the Council of Trent where this matter was discussed by twelve learned men, and concluded not lawful. And this was occasioned for that Calvin himself held it not lawful for any Protestant to be present, not only at our Mass, wherein perhaps they may say there is idolatry, but not at our Evensong, being the same with theirs" [ibid. 250]. But Coke proved that this was "a gross error; for the last session of that council was in the year of our Lord 1563, which was in the fifth year of Queen Elizabeth; whereas I shewed, and am able to justify and prove, that their Romish English Catholics came to our service in our churches until the nineteenth year of her Majesty, which was many years after that council was ended" [ibid. 252].

When he was Lord Chief-Justice, Coke again repeated his assertion in the following words, in his charge to the grand jury at the Norwich assizes of 1607. His words were: "Notwithstanding the change of religion, it cannot be denied that for the first ten years of her Majesty's reign the estate of Roman Catholics in England was tolerable, though some were committed in the beginning of her coming to the crown, yet none but those whose precedent actions had caused the faith of their allegiance to remain doubtful; and so was the manner of their commitment mixed with such gracious clemency, as that they rather endured a favourable restraint than any straight or rigorous imprisonment. But as well those restrained as generally all the Papists in this kingdom, not any of them did refuse to come to our church and yield their formal obedience to the laws established. And thus they all continued, not any one refusing to come to our churches during the first ten years of her Majesty's government. And in the beginning of the eleventh year of her reign Cornwallis, Bedingfield, and Silyard were the first Recusants, they absolutely refusing to come to our churches. And until they in that sort begun, the name of Recusant was never heard of amongst us" [The Lord Coke, His Speech and Charge, 1607].

It was, perhaps, even earlier than this that the Jesuit Persons had written to the same effect, attributing the change to the teaching of the Jesuits. Some time after the year 1595, he wrote:—"Whereupon also the same devil" [emulation between laity and clergy, and between the secular priests and the monks] brought in the division of opinions about going to the heretical churches and service, which most part of Catholics did follow for many years; and when the better and truer opinion was taught them by priests and religious men from beyond the seas as more perfect and necessary, there wanted not many that opposed themselves, especially of the elder priests of Queen Mary's days. And this division was not only favoured by the council, but nourished also for many years by divers troublesome people of our own, both in teaching and writing"¹ [Persons' Brief Apology or Defence of the Catholic Eccl. Hierarchy, fol. 2].

Until the year 1570, therefore, there was no separate Roman community in England, although there was a party, but a gradually diminishing party, whose feelings were strongly prejudiced against the changes made in the reign of Edward VI., and who wished for the revival of that ecclesiastical position which had been adopted during the reign of Queen Mary. But this party remained for several years within the Church. There they remained until they were told by the Pope and the Jesuits that their duty to the former was inconsistent with this outward loyalty to the Church of their country. And there they would have remained still, if they had not enrolled themselves among that unwise minority of Englishmen who are found ready in every generation to submit to the dictation of foreigners, Calvin on the one hand, or the Pope on the other.

Long before the year 1570, however, an unprincipled and shocking conspiracy against the English Church and nation had been in process of concoction at Rome, where England has never been understood, and where little pains have ever been taken to understand it, until the Papal policy was stimulated by the talent and pertinacity of modern seceders from the Church of England. The earliest information which we possess respecting this conspiracy is contained in a paper sent to Burleigh from Venice, on April 13th, 1564, by Denum, a secret agent of the English Government, who had been sent to the Continent to gain what information he could respecting "foreign conspiracies and contrivances;" but Denum's information is confirmed by subsequent events and by the history of Pius V. which was written by Catena in the year 1586. Denum's paper has been already printed, though not very correctly [Strype's Mem. I. ii. 54]; but it is of so much importance towards elucidating the origin of the Roman Catholics that it is here given at length, from the copy of it preserved in the British Museum, the spelling being modernized:—

"A list of several Consultations amongst the Cardinals, Bishops, and other of the several orders of Rome now a contriving and conspiring against her gracious Majesty and the Established Church of England.

"Pius having consulted with the clergy of

¹ In the year 1606 Persons published a volume of 386 closely printed pages against the fifth part of Sir Edward Coke's reports. The last chapter, the sixteenth, is a reply to Coke's statement as given above. Yet after a quantity of mere rhetoric, Persons says:—"I deny not but that many others besides these" the deprived dignitaries "throughout the realm, though otherwise Catholics in heart (as most of them were) did at that time and after, as also now, either upon fear, or lack of better instruction, or both, repair to Protestant churches, the ease being then not so fully discussed by learned men, as after it was, 'whether a man with good conscience may go to the church and service of a different religion from his own.'"

Italy, and assembling them together, it was by general consent voted, that the immunity of the Romish Church and her jurisdiction is required to be defended by all her princes as the principal Church of God.

"And to encourage the same, the Council hath voted that Pius should bestow her Grace's realm on that prince who shall attempt to conquer it.

"There was a Council ordered by way of a Committee, who contain three of the cardinals, two of the archbishops, six of the bishops, and as many of the late order of the Jesuits, who daily increase and come into great favour with the Pope of late; these do present weekly methods, ways, and contrivances for the Church of Rome, which hold the great Council for the week following in employment how to order all things for the advancement of the Romish faith. Some of these contrivances, coming to my hands by the help of the silver-key, be as follow:—

"1. The people of England being much averted from their Mother Church of Rome, they have thought fit, sounding out their inclinations how the common sort are taken with the Liturgy in English, for to offer her Grace to confirm it with some things altered therein, provided that her Grace and the Council do acknowledge the same from Rome and her Council, which, if it be denied, as we suppose it will, then these are to asperse the Liturgy of England by all ways and conspiracy imaginable.

"2. A license or dispensation to be granted to any of the Romish orders to preach, speak, or write against the now Established Church of England, amongst other protestors against Rome, purposely to make England odious to them; and that they may retain their assistances promised them in case of any prince's invasion, and the parties so licensed and indulged (dispensed with) to be seemingly as one of them, and not to be either taxed, checked, or excommunicated for so doing. And further, for the better assurance of the party so licensed and indulged the party to change his name, lest he be discovered, and to keep a quarternal correspondence with any of the cardinals, archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, or other of the chief monasteries, abbeys, etc. At which quarternal correspondence shall not only give the Pope intelligence of heretical conspiracy, but be a full assurance of their fidelity to Rome.

"This proposal was much debated in the Council, which caused some of the Council to say, how shall we prevent it, in case any of the parties so licensed flinch from us and receive a good reward, and fall off from our correspondency.

"3. It was then ordered that there should be several appointed for to watch the parties so licensed and indulged, and to give intelligence to Rome of their behaviour; which parties are sworn not to divulge to any of those so licensed or indulged what they be, or from whence they came, but to be strange, and to come in as one of their converts, so that the party shall be cautious how and which way he bendeth.

"It was afterwards debated how it should be ordered in case any of the heretical ministry of England should become as they who had these licenses, and what should be done in that case.

"4. It was then answered by the Bishop of Mens that that was the thing they aimed at, and that they desired no more than separation amongst the heretics of England; and by so doing, in case an animosity be amongst them (the Church established by the heretic Queen, as they so termed her Grace), there would be the less to oppose the Mother Church of Rome, whenever opportunity served. This reason of the Bishops pacified the whole Council.

"5. It was granted, not only indulgence and pardon to the party that should assault her Grace, either private or in public, or to any cook, brewer, baker, physician, vintner, grocer, chirurgeon, or any other calling whatsoever, that should or did make her away out of this world, a pardon, but an absolute remission of sins to the heirs of that party's family sprung from him, and a perpetual annuity to them for ever, and the said heir to be never beholden to any of the fathers for pardon, be they of what order soever, unless it pleased himself, and to be one of those Privy Council, whosoever reigned successively.

"6. It was ordered, for the better assurance of further intelligence to the See of Rome, to give licenses to any that shall swear to that supremacy due obedience and allegiance, to her powers, to dispense with sacraments, baptism, marriages, and other ceremonies of our now Established Church in England; that the parties so obliged may possess and enjoy any office, employment, either ecclesiastical, military or civil, and to take such oaths as shall be imposed upon them, provided that the said oaths be taken with a reserve for to serve the Mother Church of Rome whenever opportunity serveth; and thereby in so doing the Act in Council was passed, it was no sin, but meritorious until occasion served to the contrary, and that when it so served for Rome's advantage the party was absolved from his oath.

"7. It was also ordered that all the Romish orders, as well regular as secular, to cherish all the adherents of the Mother Church of Rome, whenever occasion serveth, to be in readiness at the times that shall be appointed, and to contribute according to their capacities what in them lieth for the promotion of the Romish cause.

"8. It is ordered that the Romish party shall propose a match for the Queen of the Catholic princes for to further or to promote the Romish faith.

"9. It is ordered, upon pain of excommunication, and of a perpetual curse to light on the families and posterities of all those of the Mother Church of Rome who will not promote or assist by means of money or otherwise Mary Queen of Scotland's pretence to the Crown of England.

"10. It is also ordered that every Romish Catholic within England and Ireland, or any of England's territories, to contribute to those Romish bishops, parish priests, etc., that are privately or shall be by Rome set over them, to pay all the Church duties, as if they were in possession upon pain of excommunication of them and their posterity.

"11. It is ordered that the See of Rome do dispense with all parties of the Roman faith to swear against all heretics of England as elsewhere, and that not to be a crime, or an offence against the soul of the party, the accused taking the oath with an intention to promote or advance the Roman Catholic faith" [Brit. Mus. Add. MS. 4784 ff. 39-42].

Such were the secret plans of the Court of Rome for overturning the independence of the Church of England. A complete view of the subsequent progress of the conspiracy is found in the work of a contemporary Italian writer, devoted to the interests of the Papacy, Girolamo Catena, who makes the following statements in two chapters on the transactions of Pius V. against Queen Elizabeth in his life of that Pope :—

"How clearly the zeal of Pope Pius flamed out for retrieving the state of religion which was fallen and decayed, may be seen in the affairs of England. Besides the continual supplies and pensions which he gave to many persons of quality of that nation, and to such as had fled thence for the sake of the Catholic faith, he resolved immediately to send Vincenzo Lauro, Bishop of Mondovi, Nuncio into Scotland, where Calvin's heresy began to creep in, furnishing him with a good sum of money to be expended in the cause of religion, and of Queen Mary Stuart, who had still preserved herself Catholic. Vincenzo gave her that supply of money, together with his wholesome advice; but by reason of the many and great troubles of that kingdom, fomented by Elizabeth Queen of England, he, residing at Paris, could not penetrate so far into those affairs as Queen Mary desired, as well for the great devotion she bore to the holiness and bounty of the Pope, as for her great regard to the worth and singular prudence of the Nuncio. She, after having solemnly baptized the Prince her son according to the rites of the Roman Church, was several times reduced to such a condition by the snares and treachery of the heretics (whom Elizabeth secretly favoured, yet seeming to take pity on her, exhorting her to patience, and keeping her in hope of assistance, 'till she might entice and draw' her into her territories), that she passed at length into England to demand succours against her rebellious subjects, relying on the promises of the said Queen; who yet no sooner had her in her power but she shut her up in prison; fearing, lest if Mary prospered, who being nearest of blood to Henry VIII. was his lawful heir, she would lose her kingdom of England, who being born of Anne of Boleyn, not his wife but his concubine, might justly be driven out of it as illegitimate. Now Pius, taking into consideration, as well how he might help and deliver the Queen of Scots (whom neither imprisonment, nor bonds, nor threatened tortures, nor promised rewards could shake from the Catholic faith, or from the obedience to the Holy See), as how he might restore the true religion in England, and remove the very stink or source of so great evils (Elizabeth still aiding and abetting the dissensions in Christendom, especially in France and Flanders, and giving support to the Protestants in Germany), deputed certain persons who should go into that kingdom, and informing themselves of the state of the heretics and Catholics, should give him an account of both, animating the latter to set up again the ancient rites and worship. And as he was not permitted to have there an Apostolical Nuncio, or any public minister for the Holy See, he had diligent care that Robert Ridolfi, a Florentine gentleman, who resided in England under the show of a merchant, should move the minds of the people to a sedition for the destruction of Elizabeth. This gentleman operated after such a manner in the name of his Holiness, not only with the Catholics, of whom there are great numbers; but likewise with many of the principal Protestants, who concurred in this design for various reasons, some for the personal enmity they had with those who aspired to the next succession of the Crown; some prompted by more solid hopes in the change of the government; that there was reason to expect a good event. While these things were secretly in agitation, there arose a difference between the Catholic King and Elizabeth, on account of shipping and of money detained in London, which the King intended for the payment of his army in Flanders, and neither these nor the goods of the Genoese being restored as the Duke d'Alva demanded, he, by way of reprisal, seized on the effects of the English at Antwerp, and other places. Hence Pius, taking advantage of the occasion, pressed the King to favour the design of the conspirators in England, as he could not better secure his dominions in Flanders than by depressing the power of this Queen, who, while she was in a condition, would always infest those Provinces; and reminded him of the obligation of his religion, as the first motive to such an undertaking. The King gladly embracing this proposal, it was left to the care of Pius to manage dextrously with the Court of France, in order to its favouring the Catholics of England. But for this, he was to use, as he did, very different persuasives, representing chiefly the interest of the Queen of Scots, who was allied to the Crown of France, and of those noblemen who had assisted the same Crown, when the Admiral, at the head of an army, was attempting the ruin of the Royal family, these having kept back Elizabeth from declaring herself openly in behalf of the French rebels. Everything appearing to be well concerted in England, Ridolfi pushed the matter so strenuously that the greatest part of the nobility joined together, taking the Duke of Norfolk for their head, to whom the Queen of Scots, with her own consent, was promised in marriage. And that this insurrection might be of greater service to the said Queen, and Duke, and nobles, Pius at the same time published a Bull and sentence against Elizabeth, declaring her to be heretical, and deprived of her kingdom, discharging her subjects from their oath of fidelity and from all other duty whatsoever, and likewise excommunicating those that should hereafter obey her, in the same form granting full commission to all to withstand and oppose her. And, first of all, there being a difficulty of publishing the Bull in Spain or France for fear of provoking this wicked woman, he caused it to be published in that very kingdom, transmitting to Ridolfi many printed copies to be dispersed, as was accordingly done. Thus, none knowing whence they came, many persons were executed for having transcribed them with their own hand. Among others John Melela [Felton] "an English gentleman, having fixed a copy on the gate of the Bishop of London's palace, suffered a most cruel death, constantly affirming to the last that he had done well, and that he was ready to do it again, according to the tenor and purport of the said Bull; which so far influenced and excited the minds of the people, that they declared publicly against yielding any farther allegiance to Elizabeth, and if any head of the faction had then discovered himself, they would certainly have run into a sudden and open revolt. Whereupon Elizabeth, apprehending her danger, and not being altogether ignorant of the conspiracy of the nobles, began to arm, and to use the necessary precautions, as well to defend herself, as to lay hold on some of the parties that were engaged against her.

"Hence the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, fearing to be surprised on their estates, without tarrying for their companions, or for succour from abroad, rose with more than twelve thousand men, and by public declarations notified the cause of their rising to be the restoring of the Catholic religion, and the ancient laws of the kingdom.¹ Nor did they scour the country and march immediately against Elizabeth, as they ought to have done; and by which means they would have been sure of all their followers. But standing still, and not being able to maintain themselves in the field for want of money, at length retiring into Scotland, they did nothing at all, but gave occasion to Elizabeth to put the Duke of Norfolk under a guard upon suspicion, as also for fear of his marriage with the Queen of Scots, and to imprison many others, of whom Ridolfi was one. But Elizabeth, not being able to penetrate the depth of the conspiracy, they were all set at liberty except the Duke. In the meanwhile Pius had given Ridolfi a credit of an hundred and fifty thousand crowns, and was preparing a greater sum to advance the design. Ridolfi, being then a prisoner, could not distribute the money among those who were up in arms; yet afterwards he gave part of it to them to keep them on the borders of Scotland, part to the Duke of Norfolk, part to others of the conspirators, to hold them firm. Yet the alarm still sounding through the realm, Elizabeth called several persons to Court under various pretences, not daring to make a greater noise: who refused to come, and gave her plainly enough to understand that they owed her no manner of obedience during the interdict of the Bull; of which Elizabeth herself was heard to say, that it troubled her not so much for its substance and contents, as because it had Pius for its author, whose election and life she could not but esteem miraculous. Now that the work might proceed on at due foundations, they despatched Ridolfi to Pius, acquainting him, that on their side all things were now ready, and desiring that he would be pleased to lend his name to the undertaking, as designed for the cause of religion, and for setting the Queen of Scots on the English throne after her marriage to the Duke of Norfolk; as also that he would move the Catholic king to grant them the succours they had demanded. Pius, well comprehending all their measures, and approving them, and rejecting what the Duke d'Alva had written to dissuade from the enterprise, after Ridolfi had communicated it to him in passing through Flanders, sent the same Ridolfi to the King of Spain under pretence of carrying articles for a League, and gave him likewise Briefs to the King [of Portugal, with all necessary instructions and deliberations; at the same time writing to the Duke of Norfolk, and exhorting him to be of good courage, inasmuch as he should want no assistance. Ridolfi, presenting the Brief to the Catholic king, with the Pope's commission, by which he encouraged him to make the attempt, and speedily to send the desired succours, offering not only all his power, but even to go in person, if need were, for the obtaining so great a benefit to all Christendom, and to pawn all the substance of the Apostolical See, the chalices, the crosses, and even his own vestments; informing him exactly how feasible the thing was if he would only send into England a detachment of his army in Flanders, under the command of Chiapin Vitelli, in case that d'Alva was hindered. The King having signified his pleasure to this purpose by an express courier, and Pius having remitted by the way of Flanders a great supply of money, d'Alva was not pleased to forward the execution; as well that he might deny this honour to Vitelli (having in his place proposed his own son, whom neither the King nor Council accepted), as on account of the new troubles in France, it being necessary to use precaution with that Crown, lest it should discover that the Catholic king embarked in this design without its aid, and thereupon should interpose to hinder it, and so the arms both of France and England should be brought against Flanders, because the French would be jealous lest the Spaniard should make himself master of England, as the Spaniard would have been, could the French have attempted the like by their own strength, as they were never yet able to do: nor could the Pope give sufficient security in the case. Wherefore d'Alva wrote back to the Spanish Court, representing these difficulties and considerations. And, while his master gave him new orders, that, notwithstanding any objections, he should undertake the assistance of his friends in England in the manner that was resolved on, and sent Ridolfi to him with money for the performance, it pleased God, in His secret judgment, to permit that Elizabeth should be advised of the whole design by a person abroad, whose name is here concealed. Whence, using still greater diligence, and being more upon her guard, and having found at the passing of a river letters from the Duke of Norfolk with twelve thousand crowns, which he sent to his friends in Scotland to be ready with forces, she ordered him to be taken into stricter custody, many others being imprisoned, and among these his secretary, who at the torture, confessed his cipher, upon which the Duke, being convicted, was put to death, with many others. With what excess of sorrow the Pope regretted this disappointment, let the reader judge. The Catholic king lamented it before the Cardinal of Alexandria, telling him that never was there a fairer enterprise, nor better concerted, nor ever more union and constancy among the parties concerned, it having never been discovered by their means all the time it was in agitation. Nor indeed was it less easy; because, if only three thousand of the infantry had in one night and one day unexpectedly passed over from Flanders, and landed at a time appointed in a certain place near London where Elizabeth's guards were posted, as in the Tower and in the Palace, there was so good an understanding, and so many people prepared, that the blow had been given in England before it could have been heard of in France, the Queen of Scots had been set at liberty, and confirmed Queen of England, as lawful heir, and the Catholic religion restored in that kingdom. Especially there having been assurance given, that Thomas Stuckley, an English gentleman, by means of the correspondence he held in Ireland, should in a few weeks, with certain ships of war granted him by the King of Spain, and three thousand soldiers on board, reduce that whole island to the devotion of the Catholics; at the same time sending his own pilot with two ships, and two armed barks, to burn all the vessels in the River of Thames." [Vita del Gloriosissimo Papa Pio Quinto, scritta, etc., Girolamo Catena, dedicata al Santissimo signor nostro Sisto Quinto. In Roma con licenza et privilegi, 1587, pp. 112-118].

It was in the year after Catena had published the preceding narrative of this atrocious Papal conspiracy that the climax of that conspiracy was attained in the long-expected invasion of England undertaken by Philip II. with the great fleet named the "Armada." His expedition sailed in May 1588, and before August 5th of that year it was utterly ruined, partly by storms, partly by the resolute hearts and strong arms of Englishmen who loved their country, and in spite of those traitors who were inviting the enemies of England to her shores. After that notable failure, no foreign prince was ever so unwise as to endeavour to conquer England for the Pope, and henceforth the Papal party sought their ends (except in the case of the Gunpowder Plot and its abortive insurrection) by more ordinary means.

Meanwhile that party was diminishing in its native and growing in its alien element. For the old Marian party, which had come from within the Church of England, was almost extinguished by the lapse of time, and was being replaced by a party which had never had any connection with the Church of England.

The Marian Episcopate died out in a very remarkable manner. The last of the twenty bishops consecrated during Mary's reign was Christopherson, who was consecrated to the See of Chichester (while Scory, its Edwardian Bishop, was still living) on November 21st, 1557. Between that time and the consecration of the first twelve Elizabethan Bishops on December 17th and 21st, 1559, and on January 21st and March 24th, 1560, no fewer than seventeen sees became vacant by death. These were as follows:—

Another see, that of Llandaff, became vacant by the death of Kitchin in the year 1563, and there were then only eight survivors of the Marian Episcopate. One of these, Bonnor of London, was in prison; two, Goldwell of St. Asaph and Pates of Worcester, were living abroad, having deserted their sees on the death of Mary; five, Heath of York, Watson of Lincoln, Thirlby of Ely, Bourne of Bath, and Scott of Chester, were living as private gentlemen, having apparently resigned their sees. The last survivor of all was Watson, ex-Bishop of Lincoln, who was compromised by some treasonable conspiracy, and imprisoned in Wisbeach Castle, dying in the year 1584. With his death the Marian succession came entirely to an end, no attempt ever having been made by any of the surviving bishops to consecrate others.¹ And with the end of the Marian succession there came also to an end all connection whatever between the ancient Church of England and the new community of Roman Catholics. Until the old bishops had died there was a shadow of such a connection, and the small community under them might claim to run parallel with that which under the bishops of the Church represented the old and broad ecclesiastical stream that had flowed onward to the sixteenth century from Apostolic times. But when the death of Watson without any Episcopal heir had brought that portion of the succession which he represented to an end, the English Episcopate descended from Archbishop Parker became the only lineal representatives of the mediæval, Anglo-Saxon, and Primitive, Church of England. The Roman Catholic community of subsequent days no more flowed from the ancient Church of England than the Tiber flows from the Thames.

But the probability of the schism dying out for want of a ministry had been foreseen as early as the year 1568 by an acute Oxford seceder named William Allen [A.D. 1532-94], who had been a Fellow of Oriel in the reign of Edward VI., Principal of St. Mary's Hall in that of Queen Mary, received the empty title of Cardinal of England in the year 1587, and became Archbishop of Mechlin in 1589. During the early part of Elizabeth's reign Allen was in England, and endeavoured to prevent his friends from frequenting the services of the Church. But about 1566 he went abroad, and was ordained priest at Mechlin, where he became a reader in theology. His acquaintance with the state of the Marian party in England led him to the conclusion that the old clergy would not perpetuate the schism, and he therefore devised the plan of founding colleges on the Continent "for restoring," as Persons writes, "a new English clergy." The first of these colleges, or "seminaries" as they were called, was established at Douay in Flanders in the year 1568, under Allen himself. From 1576 until 1593 it was carried on at Rheims, whither it had been driven by a riot at Douay. But in 1593 it was reinstated at the latter town, and continued there until the French Revolution, when it migrated to Old Hall Green at Ware, in Hertfordshire, and is now known as St. Edmund's College, though originally dedicated to St. Thomas of Canterbury. Other seminaries were founded at Rome, Seville, and Madrid, in 1578, and others at Valladolid, St. Omer's, Paris, Liège, Lisbon, Louvain, and Ghent, during the subsequent forty years [Butler's Hist. Mem. ii. 172, 440]; and so energetically were these supported by the Court of Rome that dispensations were granted to those Roman Catholics who possessed abbey lands, freeing them from all spiritual censures on that account if they contributed to the support of seminaries [Fuller's Ch. Hist. 92].

At the foreign colleges thus established English youths were educated for the priesthood on the most extreme system of devotion to Rome and of antipathy to England and the English Church. Some of these began to come over in the year 1571, "apparelled like mariners," and with "captains' passports" obtained in the Low Countries [Harl. MS. 360, f. 25]. They landed as if they were coming to an enemy's country, and one in which the light of Christianity having been extinguished it was to be kindled again by their means, as it had been kindled among the heathen Saxons of Kent by the missionaries under St. Augustine. Secretly as they came, their movements were well known to the Government, and minute descriptions of their persons exist, one being described as having "little hair on the front of his forehead," another as "freckled," a third as a "pretty little fellow, of complexion something brown, and apparelled in blue," and so forth [ibid.]; but the Queen and her Government were not uneasy about them for the first few years, believing that the movement was only a temporary one, and would gradually from one cause or another cease [Sanders, de Schism. Anglic. 312]. Queen Elizabeth had been nineteen years on the throne before any seminary priest suffered punishment, but when the papal conspiracy was aided by them, and especially by those of them who were Jesuits, a very serious danger threatened the Queen and the nation, and it became necessary to treat those as traitors who unhesitatingly mixed themselves up with treason.

The historian of the Jesuit Mission in England says that one of the body named William Good was sent to Ireland for four years, leaving the country again in 1568, but that none came to England until Campion and Persons made their appearance there in 1581. The reason he alleges is that as in the Divine Counsels the Saviour was not sent into the world until it was sunk in darkness, so England was permitted to become dark and wicked before the Jesuits were sent to convert it [More, Hist. Miss. Anglican. Soc. Jesu. 1660, p. 33]. But a story is told by Strype which shews that More was mistaken, and that Jesuits were among the earliest of the so called "missionaries." According to this narrative one of them named Thomas Heath, brother to the former Archbishop of York, was at work early in the Queen's reign, and was discovered in a curious manner. From 1562 until 1568 he went up and down the country, preaching in the churches, and spicing his sermons with Puritanism of the most extreme type. At last he applied to the Dean of Rochester as a poor minister deserving preferment, and to test his ability the Dean gave him a preaching turn in the cathedral. While preaching a sermon, in which he cried down the services of the Church, he accidentally dropped a letter from his pocket, which had been addressed to him under the name of Thomas Fine from an eminent English Jesuit named Malt at Madrid. This letter, containing instructions respecting his mission, was carried to the Bishop of Rochester, and led to Heath's chamber being searched, when there were found in his boots and in his trunk a license from the Jesuits, a Bull from the Pope authorizing him to preach what doctrine the Jesuits ordered him to preach for dividing Protestants, with several books against Infant Baptism. Heath was put in the pillory, branded with an R as a Recusant, and condemned to imprisonment for life; but he died after being a few months in prison [Strype's Ann. ii. 273, ed. 1824]. Somewhat earlier, May 10th, 1566, the Pope had issued a Bull anathematizing the English heretics, and enjoining all wise and learned ecclesiastics "to labour, endeavour, and contrive all manner of devices to abate, assuage, and confound them." This was so interpreted as that it gave dispensations to mission priests for "devising of new tenets, doctrines, and covenants," . . . "provided that the device intended was to promote the advancement of Rome;" and also permitting them to go through the ceremony of marriage with what women they pleased, on the ground that heretical marriage was no marriage, and that by appearing to be married they could better carry on their work of converting the nation. Commissions were given to them under several names in case they should be discovered, and that when they had intelligence they might fly to another place and still keep correspondence with the convents to which they belonged [ibid. 219]. Added to these provocations there were many books sent into England by Allen, Bristowe, Sanders, Persons, and others, which were as damaging to the peace of the State as to that of the Church; and thus it is not surprising that the conduct of the seminary priests at last brought down severe punishment upon them. The old Marian clergy had been treated with kindness and liberality, and even the seminary priests had been merely placed under surveillance so long as they continued quiet; but after the year 1577, in which the first of the latter was executed for treason, a large number suffered imprisonment and death, about 120 in all being punished as traitors during the remaining years of the Queen's reign.

Roman Catholics are accustomed to balance these executions against the burnings of Queen Mary's reign, as if, in the later cases as well as in the earlier, the persons executed were sufferers for religion. But this allegation was disproved by Lord Burleigh in his work entitled "Execution for Treason, and not for Religion," printed in 1583.¹ He shews that the Seminary priests were arraigned under Acts of Parliament of Edward III.'s reign, about 1330, not under any new laws; that only those were condemned for treason who engaged in political conspiracies, and especially who maintained the effect of the Pope's Bull against the Queen. These persons always made a point of saying that what they did was done for religion, also that they suffered for religion; but it is sufficiently plain that when a conspiracy against a sovereign's life is entered into, whatever the ultimate object may be towards which the conspirators consider the sovereign's death as a step, those who thus conspire engage in an act of treason, and must risk the consequences. There was also published an official paper of six pages, entitled "A Declaration of the favourable dealing of Her Majesty's Commissioners appointed for the examination of certain traitors, and of tortures unjustly reported to be done upon them for matters of religion, 1583." This states, in addition, that the torture was never used to any of the accused persons, unless they gave evidence that they knew treasons which they would not reveal. If they said as Christian men, in such a manner as was usual and usually credited among Christian men, that they did not know, their allegation was always accepted. Those who were tortured were not so treated until after every endeavour had been used to get at the truth otherwise, and none, not even Campian himself, were so racked, but they were able to walk away from the rack, and to write with their hands, immediately afterwards.

These statements on the one hand are corroborated on the other by a publication which emanated from some of the seminary priests themselves, when they had come to see how much evil had resulted from the conduct of the Roman Catholics under the leadership of the Jesuits. This work was written, on behalf of a number of the secular priests, by one of their own number, named William Watson, and the title itself is instructive, being as follows:—"Important considerations which ought to move all true and sound Catholics who are not wholly Jesuitized to acknowledge, without all equivocations, ambiguities, or shiftings, that the proceedings of Her Majesty, and of the State, with them since the beginning of Her Highness' reign, have been both mild and merciful. Published by sundry of us the secular priests in dislike of many treatises, letters, and reports, which have been written and made in divers places to the contrary; together with our opinions of a better course hereafter for the promoting of the Catholic faith in England. Newly imprinted, 1601." The work is a manifesto against "the Jesuitical Hispanized faction" led by Persons, Garnet, and Blackwell, and speaks of the laity as being strongly under the influence of the Jesuits. Their historical statement of facts agrees exactly with that of Burleigh; and they say the State had good reason to make laws against them, considering what "outrageous" treasons were being practised, and having the Bull in view. "Sure we are, that no king or prince in Christendom would like or tolerate any such subjects within their dominions, if possibly they could be rid of them" [p. 21]. They attribute Throckmorton's plot, and those connected with Mary, Queen of Scots, in general, to the Jesuits, and declare the Pope himself to have "plotted with the King of Spain" at their instigation, for putting Mary on the throne of England. To the Jesuits also they attribute the contrivance of plots for the assassination of the Queen, mentioning Patrick Collen, Doctor Lopez, Yorke, Williams, and Squire as having been so employed by them.

The troubles inflicted have been "great we confess in themselves, but far less we think than any prince living in Her Majesty's case, and so provoked, would have inflicted upon us. Some of us have said many a time when we have read and heard speeches of Her Majesty's supposed cruelty, 'Why, my masters, what would you have her to do, being resolved as she is in matters of religion, except she should willingly cast off the care, not only of her State and kingdom, but of her life also and princely estimation?' Yea, there have been amongst us of our own calling who have likewise said that they themselves, knowing what they do know, how, under pretence of religion, the life of Her Majesty and the subversion of the kingdom is aimed at; if they had been of her Highness' Council, they would have given their consent for the making of very strait and rigorous laws to the better suppressing and preventing of all such Jesuitical and wicked designments" [p. 37]. And this, notwithstanding that "we profess ourselves with all godly courage and boldness to be as sound Catholic priests as any Jesuits or men living in the world, and that we do not desire to draw breath any longer on the earth than that we shall so continue."

Such evidence as this shews that the severities used towards Roman Catholics in the earlier times of the existence of their sect were actually forced upon the Government by the unscrupulous conduct of those who were endeavouring, as the chief part of their mission, to overthrow or to destroy the Queen; that by her destruction they might remove what they considered to be the chief barrier against the introduction of the Papal authority and system. It was no persecution of the "ancient faith" or of the "remnant of the ancient Church," as is so often represented by Roman Catholic writers, but simply and entirely the punishment, in self-defence, of sectarian priests who had come to this country with the arrogant profession of converting its people, but who strove to bring them under the yoke of Ultramontanism by acts which the law accounted, and would still account, treasonable.¹ That no great severity was shewn towards Roman Catholics on account of their religion alone is shewn by an order of Council, dated May 7th, 1581, at the very time when Campian the Jesuit was in the Tower for treason, directing that all Recusants shall be set free on recognizances not to depart the realm without license, nor to go more than three miles from home until they have conformed [Council Book, Lansd. MS. 1162, Brit. Mus.]. That great severity was shewn by Queen Elizabeth's government towards Roman Catholic traitors, as well as towards all other traitors, is not to be doubted. But severity to the few who were traitors to their sovereign and country was often necessary, in those times, to preserve the liberties of the many who were loyal to both.

¹ "After the promulgation of the Bull, six queries were generally proposed to the priests who were arraigned. They regarded the import of that Bull, the deposition of the Queen as pronounced in it, and what should be the conduct of good subjects in reference to both. Few answered, I am sorry to observe, as became loyal Englishmen and faithful citizens. They seemed, rather, to consider themselves as the subjects of a foreign master, whose sovereignty was paramount and whose will was supreme." [Berington's Memoirs of Panzani, Intro. 34.]

It has already been shewn that the formal organization of the Roman Catholics in England began with the Jesuits. On the death of Bishop Watson, the few secular clergy who remained felt themselves left entirely without a head, and the idea of continuing the old succession, if it had ever been seriously entertained, was necessarily abandoned. The Jesuits, henceforth, easily took the lead (although constantly and bitterly opposed by the secular clergy), and the "English Mission" was established under their leadership and under the sanction of the Pope. No pretence was at that time made by them to represent the old Church of England, their professed object being to effect a new conversion of the English people, and so to found a new branch of the Church. [Persons' Four Conversions of England. Berington's Panzani's Mem. Intro. 42.] This object was well understood by the partizans of the Pope on the Continent, and excited so much interest and expectation that an official letter of intelligence to the Lord Treasurer, dated August 31st, 1592, says, "Scarcely anything else is talked of in Italy but this combat of England." The writer adds, however, that in Germany there were many who disapproved of what was going on [Harl. MS. 35, f. 372].

For some years the direction of this arrogant and schismatical "Mission" was assumed by Robert Persons [A.D. 1546-1610], an Oxford seceder who had become a Jesuit in the year 1575, and having come to England with Edmund Campian² (an ex-fellow of St. John's, Oxford) under a commission from Gregory XIII., in July 1580, returned to Rome soon after the execution of Campian in 1581, and after being Rector of the English Seminary at Rome for some years, was eventually appointed "Prefect of the English Mission" in the year 1592. Father Persons himself was under the direction of Cardinal Allen, who was Archbishop of Mechlin, but neither of them left the Continent, Persons remaining in safety abroad while he stirred up sedition in England by means of his books and his Jesuit agents. This mode of government was very objectionable to the schismatical clergy, who all along felt themselves to be in a false position, and desired to place themselves in one that should seem more justifiable than that of a foreign mission, by having bishops appointed from their own body. After the death of Cardinal Allen, in the year 1594, this feeling grew stronger, and it ended in 1597 in an unanimous petition to the Pope for the restoration of a hierarchy "in which Bishops should be elected by the common consent of the clergy and appointed by them to different districts" [Mush, Declaratio Motuum, 21, 30]. Instead of acceding to the request so made, the Pope was persuaded by the Jesuits to appoint an Archpriest (or Rural Dean), George Blackwell [A.D. 1545-1613], an Oxford seceder, whose sole commission was a letter from Cardinal Cajetan, dated March 7th, 1598. This gave him authority over the 400 Roman Catholic clergy of England, but restricted that authority by appointing a council of six to act with him, and by prohibiting him from determining anything of importance without consulting the Superior of the Jesuits. The clergy remonstrated so strongly at the slight put upon them by the off-hand manner in which this appointment was made, that at last the Pope was persuaded to add the dignity and weight of his own commission, which was issued to Blackwell in the form of a Brief on August 17th, 1601. Blackwell, however, became a loyal Englishman under the influence of horror and disgust at the Gunpowder Plot, and taking the oath of allegiance to James I. was deprived of his office by the Pope for so doing in the year 1608.¹ Two other archpriests were appointed, George Birkhead, in 1608, and George Harrison, in 1615, but on the death of the latter, in 1621, the Pope was again petitioned to substitute bishops for these anomalous officers. This request was so far conceded that William Bishop was consecrated to the episcopal office on June 4th, 1623, and sent to England as Vicar-Apostolic, with faculties similar to "those of the late archpriests joined to those which ordinaries enjoy and exercise," but the authority was given only during the pleasure of the Pope, and the Vicar-Apostolic was not a Bishop with independent power, but only a delegate of another Bishop, the Pope, under the title of the "Bishop of Chalcedon." Now "it seemed to many," says Berington, "that the English Catholic Church was re-established in the renovation of her hierarchy. But the fond imagination, I fear, was founded on no truth. . . . The Roman Pontiff still continued to be, what the clergy of England had for many years permitted him to be, their only Bishop. How then, with him at our head, could it in the estimation of such men be said that we were without a church and a hierarchy of transcendent excellence? He governed us at one time by the agency of Dr. Allen, perhaps by that of Father Persons; at another by his archpriests; now by the Bishop of Chalcedon; and in after times, as it will appear, by a series of similar delegations" [Berington's Memoirs of Panzani, Introd. 105].

The first "Bishop of Chalcedon" died in less than a year after his appointment. He was succeeded by Richard Smith, under the same title, who retained the office until 1655, but lived most of the time abroad. For thirty years no successor to Smith was appointed, but in 1685 John Leyburn was consecrated under the title of "Bishop of Adrumetum," and England was afterwards, on January 20th, 1688, divided into the London, Midland, Northern, and Western Districts, by Pope Innocent XI. The Roman Catholics of Scotland were placed under the Archpriests and Vicars-Apostolic of England until the year 1694, since which time they have had Vicars-Apostolic of their own.

There is not space in this article to follow up in any detail the history of the Roman Catholic sect during the time that has elapsed between its original organization and the present day: and it must suffice to trace the course of that history only in general outline.

Early in the reign of James I. the efforts of the Jesuits at home, and of the Seminaries abroad, were so successful that both Houses of Parliament presented an address to the Crown, setting forth that there was a "mischievous increase of Papists in his Majesty's dominion of late," which they feel bound to represent to the King, with the dangerous consequences that were likely to result. Their dependence on foreign princes, the address said, was very evident; and there was also great danger if any ambitious man should become popular as the leader of the Popish party. The principal causes of this increase are stated to be the too great leniency which was shewn in enforcing the laws against Jesuits, Seminary priests, and Popish recusants; the influence which was exercised in their favour by foreign ambassadors, and the resort of the Papists to their chapels; their concourse to the City, and their frequent conferences there; the education of their children in foreign seminaries and colleges, which had been greatly enlarged of late; the insufficient instruction of the population; the licentious permittance of Popish books; and lastly, the employment of men in places of government who gave countenance to the Popish party [Harl. MS. 35, f. 452, Brit. Mus.].² Similar addresses were sent up to Charles I. on March 31st, 1628, and on this occasion also great importance was attributed to the immigration of Jesuits, and of children who had been educated in the foreign seminaries. It was also alleged that many schools at home were in the hands of Recusants, and that the latter were acquiring much wealth by clever management of money in the City—what in later times has been called "stock-jobbing" [ibid. 161, f. 228].

The great struggle for power which is thus indicated was continued during the Civil Wars by means of those disgraceful underhand practices to which the party devoted to the Pope seems always ready to resort; and Bishop Bramhall declares that nearly one hundred of the Romish clergy became soldiers in the Parliament's army that they might stir up further animosities against the Church of England, in the hope that its overthrow would eventually place their own party in the ascendant [Bramhall's Works, i. 95]. The establishment of Cromwell's iron tyranny was, however, very unfavourable to the prosperity and progress of the sect, and it was not until the latter part of the reign of Charles II. that it again began to flourish. The astute policy then adopted by the Jesuit leaders of the "English Mission" was to secure the co-operation of the Protestant Dissenters in attempting to secure what was called "toleration," but what was in reality freedom to carry on their never-ceasing endeavours to re-establish the Supremacy of the Pope in England. In the reign of James II. a very dangerous advance was made towards this end. In the year 1686, Father Petre, the Vice-Provincial of the Jesuits in England, was made a member of the Privy Council, and of the "junto," or Cabinet Council of the Prime Minister, the Earl of Sunderland. This body then consisted only of seven members, and Sunderland himself, with two or three others, being Roman Catholics, the government of England was practically in the hands of the sect. St. James' Chapel was appropriated to the use of fourteen Benedictine monks and the King's chaplains; the Savoy became a Jesuit monastery, the Franciscans set up their banner in Lincoln Inn Fields, the Carmelites in the City. At Oxford the Dean of Christ Church and the Master of University College established the Roman services in their college chapels;¹ and for the first time since the sect had been founded public chapels were opened for its use throughout the country. Four Vicars-Apostolic were also appointed by the Pope, and for each of them the Government provided an income of £1000 a year out of the Exchequer [Berington's State and Behaviour of Cath. 157]. But when the alliance of Protestant and Roman Catholic Dissenters had obtained from James II. the unconstitutional "Declaration of Liberty of Conscience," by which the latter hoped to pave the way for completing the work which had been so prosperously commenced, the clergy and laity of the Church were fairly aroused to the danger, and the imprisonment of the seven bishops who resisted this overbearing exercise of the prerogative caused the tide to turn.

After the Revolution of 1688, which followed this development of Romanism, and which was chiefly occasioned by it, the Roman Catholics began to decline in power; and although their ecclesiastical organization was more and more developed under their Vicars-Apostolic, it was not until they had succeeded in their long-continued efforts to obtain the removal of those civic disabilities which the treasons and disloyalty of the sect had brought upon them, that they again attained any prominent position in England. These disabilities were finally removed by what was called—with great exaggeration of their true bearing—"Roman Catholic Emancipation," in the year 1829 by 10 Geo. IV. ch. 7; and by a subsequent Act passed in 1832 [3 Will. IV. ch. 115] Roman Catholics were placed on the same constitutional footing as other Dissenters.²

It has already been said that the Deputy Bishops, or "Vicars-Apostolic," from 1623 to 1688, were only three in number, and that for a large portion of these sixty-five years there was not any Roman Catholic Bishop in England. The conduct of James II. and his Government was, however, so encouraging to the Papal Court, that on January 30th, 1688, Pope Innocent XI. divided England into four districts, appointing Vicars-Apostolic to each. This arrangement continued for a century and a half, during which time there were thirty-three of these schismatical bishops in England. On July 30th, 1840, Pope Gregory XVI. re-divided the four districts into eight; and fourteen Vicars-Apostolic were appointed to these between 1840 and 1850. All these Vicars-Apostolic had been consecrated nominally to dioceses "in partibus infidelium," and bore such titles as Bishops of Melipotamus, Ariopolis, Olena, Tloa, Samosata, etc. But, under the management of Cardinal Wiseman, Pope Pius IX., on September 29th, 1850, divided England into thirteen dioceses bearing English titles, namely, those of Westminster, Beverley, Birmingham, Clifton, Hexham and Newcastle, Liverpool, Menevia and Newport, Northampton, Nottingham, Plymouth, Salford, Shrewsbury, and Southwark. The twelve latter of these are considered to be within the Province of Westminster, of which Cardinal Wiseman became the first titular Archbishop in 1850, and Henry Edward Manning, formerly Archdeacon of Chichester, the second in 1865.

If anything was wanting before to complete the schismatical and sectarian position of the Roman Catholics, this was the crowning act; and in concluding the historical review of their sect no words can better be used to describe the position which has thus been assumed by them than those of Henry Edward Manning himself, written in 1845, when he was a leading "High Churchman." "The attempt," he writes, "to impose an uncanonical jurisdiction on the British churches, and a refusal to hold communion with them except on that condition, was clearly an act of schism. And this was further aggravated by every kind of aggression: acts of excommunication and anathema, instigations to warfare abroad and to rebellion and schism at home, are the measures by which the Roman Church has exhibited its professed desire to restore unity to the Church of Christ. It must never be forgotten that the act of the Bishop of Rome, by which a most grievous and stubborn contest was begun in the English Church, was taken not in the character of Patriarch, but in the title of Supreme Pontiff. The same Bull which made a rent in every English diocese professed to depose also the Queen of England. It was a power to give away not sees, but thrones also; and the effect of this has been, as in the East so in England, to erect altar against altar, and succession against succession. In the formation of sects in diocesan churches, in the exclusive assumption of the name Catholic, in the reordination of priests, and in restricting the One Church to their own communion, there has been no such example of division since the schism of Donatus" [Manning's Unity of the Church, 364, 2nd ed.].

² The disabilities under which Roman Catholics were placed were that they were disqualified for sitting in Parliament by 30 Ch. II. 2, § 1, in 1677; were excepted from the Toleration Act of 1689; were disabled from voting at elections by 7 & 8 Will. III. ch. 27, in 1696; and from inheriting or holding lands by 11 & 12 Will. III. ch. 27, in 1700. These disabilities were almost all imposed by the Government of William III.

II. ROMAN CATHOLIC DOCTRINE. The main point of difference between the Church of England and the Roman Catholics of England originally consisted in the claim made for the Pope, on the one hand, to exercise jurisdiction over the clergy and laity of England; and the denial of that claim, on the other, by the clergy in Convocation, and the sovereign, prelates and laity in Parliament. If this claim had been admitted on the accession of Queen Elizabeth, and perhaps during the earlier part of the reign of James I., the Pope and the Court of Rome would have been willing to have passed over other differences very lightly, or at least to have let them slumber until a council had spoken upon the subject. It is worth notice that the Book of Common Prayer as revised in 1559 was quietly accepted by the great body of Romanist laity; and also that the Pope himself saw so little to object to in it that he offered to give the book his full sanction if his authority were recognised by the Queen and kingdom. This fact is referred to in the first head of Dennum's paper from Venice in 1564 [p. 495]. In the same charge also, from which a quotation has already been made [p. 494] respecting the attendance of Roman Catholics at church, Sir Edward Coke states as follows: That the Pope [Pius IV.] "before the time of his excommunication against Queen Elizabeth denounced, sent his letter unto her Majesty, in which he did allow the Bible and Book of Divine Service as it is now used among us to be authentic and not repugnant to truth; but that therein was contained enough necessary to salvation, though there was not in it so much as might conveniently be, and that he would also allow it unto us, without changing any part, so as her Majesty would acknowledge to receive it from the Pope, and by his allowance; which her Majesty denying to do, she was then presently by the same Pope excommunicated. And this is the truth concerning Pope Pius Quartus as I have faith to God and men. I have oftentimes heard avowed by the late Queen her own words; and I have conferred with some Lords that were of greatest reckoning in the State, who had seen and read the letter, which the Pope sent to that effect, as have been by me specified. And this upon my credit, as I am an honest man, is most true." [The Lord Coke, His Speech and Charge, London, 1607. See also Camden, Ann. Eliz. p. 59, ed. 1615, Twysden's Historical Vindication of the Church of England, p. 175. Humphrey Prideaux's Validity of the Orders of the Church of England. Bramhall's Works, ii. 85, ed. 1845. Bishop Babington's Notes on the Pentateuch; on Numbers vii. Courayer's Defence of the Dissertation on the Validity of English Ordinations, ii. 360, 378. Harrington's Pius IV. and the Book of Common Prayer, 1856.]¹ It is manifest that the concession of the Prayer Book carried with it substantially the concession of the doctrinal phase of the English Reformation. There were probably, indeed, few of the English clergy or laity who would not gradually have accepted the official Reformation of the Church of England—a very different thing from accepting the Puritan interpretation of it—if the Pope's supremacy had not stood in the way. But the exclusion of the Church of England from the Council of Trent [A.D. 1545-1563] embittered the controversy between England and Rome; and raised further difficulties by petrifying opinions into dogmas with a positive minuteness from which the English mind has always revolted.

Notwithstanding this, the doctrines of the Council of Trent were held by English Roman Catholics with much less rigidity than by the Continental churches until recent times; and the following fair statement of them by a writer of the last century will shew that at that time they did not much differ, except in those articles which relate to the Papal Supremacy, and making allowance for differing modes of expressing the same truth from those of the Church of England as held by High Church divines:—

"[1] That Christ has established a Church upon earth, and that this Church is that which holds communion with the See of Rome, being One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolical.

"[2] That we are obliged to hear this Church, and therefore that she is infallible by the guidance of Almighty God, in her decisions regarding faith.

"[3] That Peter, by Divine commission, was appointed the head of this Church, under Christ its founder: and that the Pope, or Bishop of Rome, as successor to St. Peter, has always been, and is at present, by Divine right, head of this Church.

"[4] That the Canon of the Old and New Testament, as proposed to us by this Church, is the Word of God; as also such traditions, belonging to faith and morals, which being originally delivered by Christ to His Apostles have been preserved by constant succession in the Catholic Church.

"[5] That honour and veneration are due to the Angels of God and His Saints; that they offer up prayers to God for us; that it is good and profitable to have recourse to their intercession; and that the relics or earthly remains of God's particular servants are to be held in respect.

"[6] That no sins ever were, or can be, remitted unless by the mercy of God, through Jesus Christ; and therefore that man's justification is the work of Divine grace.

"[7] That the good works which we do receive their whole value from the grace of God ; and that by such good works we not only comply with the precepts of the Divine law, but that we thereby likewise merit eternal life.

"[8] That by works done in the spirit of penance we can make satisfaction to God for the temporal punishment which often remains due after our sins, by the Divine goodness, have been forgiven us.

"[9] That Christ has left to His Church a power of granting indulgences, that is, a relaxation from such temporal chastisements only as remains due after the Divine pardon of sin : and that the use of such indulgences is profitable to sinners.

"[10] That there is a Purgatory or Middle State, and that the souls of imperfect Christians therein detained are helped by the prayers of the faithful.

"[11] That there are seven Sacraments, all instituted by Christ ; Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Holy Order, Matrimony.

"[12] That in the most holy Sacrament of the Eucharist there is truly, really, and substantially the body and blood, together with the Soul and the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ.

"[13] That in this Sacrament there is, by the Omnipotence of God, a conversion or change of the whole substance of the bread into the body of Christ, and of the whole substance of the wine into His blood, which change we call Transubstantiation.

"[14] That under either kind Christ is received whole and entire.

"[15] That in the Mass, or Sacrifice of the Altar, is offered to God a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead.

"[16] That in the Sacrament of Penance, the sins we fall into after Baptism are, by the Divine Mercy, forgiven us.

"There are points of discipline also which regulate conduct, and to which we pay obedience, as fasting on particular days, communion in one kind, celibacy of Churchmen, use of the Latin language in public service, and other similar practices ; but as these vary, and may be either altered or suppressed by due authority, they belong not to what is properly styled the Faith of Catholics" [Berington's State and Behaviour of Eng. Catholics, 1780, pp. 143-148].

But in the middle of the nineteenth century the old tone of the Roman Catholics was again supplanted to a very great extent by the modern Ultramontane tone ; the change arising partly from the authoritative way in which the Pope and the Roman Court acted towards English Roman Catholics after 1829, partly from the more free intercourse which existed between England and the Continent, and partly from the zeal of some seceders from the Church of England, which led them to adopt the most extreme theology of the community to which they attached themselves. The imposition as articles of faith of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception by the Vatican Council of 1854, and of the personal Infallibility of the Pope by that of 1870, set up still higher the wall between Anglican and Roman belief, removed the Roman Catholic body in England still further from the Apostolic Church of England than it had stood before, and put a stop to those attempts to promote re-union which might otherwise have led to an eventual abolition of the schism.

III. STATISTICS.—The number of Roman Catholics in England and Wales has often been greatly exaggerated. Butler, in his "Historical Memoirs of the English Catholics," states that they were a majority of the population, that is more than 2,250,000, in the reign of Elizabeth : and Hallam, although he lowers this estimate considerably, still considers that they formed a third of the population at that time, or about 1,500,000. Both of these estimates are mere guesses, utterly unsupported by any historical evidence ; and such guesses are disgraceful in those who profess to write with authority for the guidance of public opinion to truth.

Sir John Dalrymple's Memoirs, on the other hand, preserve a memorandum, of which he says—"While King William was engaged in his project of reconciling the religious differences of England, he was at great pains to find out the proportions between Churchmen, Dissenters, and Papists. In his chest there is the following curious report in consequence of an inquiry upon that head"¹ [Dalrymple's Memoirs, App. to Part II. p. 14]. This report gives the number in a tabular form for each county, and also the general result, afterwards adding an equal number to each total for children under sixteen years of age. The numbers thus arrived at are as follows :—

	Conformists.	Non-Conformists.	Papists.
Province of Canterbury	2,123,362	93,151	11,878
Province of York . . .	353,892	15,325	1,978
Children	2,477,254	108,476	13,856
	2,477,254	108,676	13,856
	4,954,508	217,152	27,712

This estimate seems likely to be correct, as the total, 5,199,372, nearly agrees with the number at which the population of England and Wales is estimated about the time at which it was made : that population amounting to six millions in the beginning of the eighteenth century.

In the year 1767 the House of Lords, on the motion of Lord Radnor, requested the Bishops to obtain a census of the Roman Catholics, by means of inquiries to be made by the clergy of their respective dioceses. This inquiry is in fact ordered by the 114th Canon of 1603 to be made by the clergy every year, and the results of it to be presented by the archbishops to the Crown :

but it may be doubted whether this canon was ever strictly observed. As to the census ordered in 1767, Berington, speaking of it in 1780, hopes that a careful inquiry will be made by the bishops, but meanwhile gives his own estimate. "From the best information I can procure," he writes, "their number does not, at this day, exceed 60,000 : and this even I suspect to be far beyond the mark. . . . The few Catholics I have mentioned are also dispersed in the different counties. In many, particularly in the West, in South Wales, and in some of the Midland Counties, there is scarcely a Catholic to be found. This is easily known from the residence of the priests. After London, by far the greatest number is in Lancashire. In Staffordshire are a good many, as also in the northern counties of York, Durham, and Northumberland. Some of the manufacturing and trading towns, as Norwich, Manchester, Liverpool, Wolverhampton, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne, have chapels, which are rather crowded, but these constitute the greatest part of the number I have just given to their respective counties. In a few towns, particularly at Coventry, their number I find is increased ; but this by no means in proportion of the general increase of population in the same places. Excepting in the towns, and out of Lancashire, the chief situation of Catholics is in the neighbourhood of the old families of that persuasion. They are the servants who have married from those families, and who choose to remain round the old mansion for the convenience of prayers, and because they hope to receive favours and assistance from their former masters" [Berington, State and Behaviour of English Catholics, iii. 111-114].

If, instead of estimating the Roman Catholics at 50 per cent. of the population with Butler, or at 33 per cent. with Hallam, we reckon them as averaging about 60,000, or 1 per cent., from 1570 to 1800, we shall probably be not far from the truth.

Since the rise of manufacturing industry a very large number of Irish labourers has been required both in the field and in the factory ; and a majority of these being Roman Catholics the numbers of the sect in England and Wales have increased greatly in modern times. A very careful statistician has recently calculated that they now stand as follows :—

English Roman Catholics and their Children,	179,000
Foreign, do. do.	52,000
Irish, do. do.	732,560
	963,560

[Ravenstein's Denominational Statistics, 1870, p. 20.] As the population of England and Wales is now 23,000,000, the proportion of English Roman Catholics appears by these figures to be reduced to $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. ; including the foreigners it is exactly 1 per cent. ; and including both them and the Irish, it amounts to rather more than 4 per cent. In Scotland the proportion is very much higher, being not less than 10 per cent., the number in Glasgow alone being stated in Gordon's Glasgow Facies as 130,000.

The number of Roman Catholic clergy in England and Wales in 1780 is reckoned by Berington at 360, and he says that they "either live as chaplains in the families of gentlemen, and have the care of the little congregations around them, or else they reside in towns, or in some country places where funds have been settled for their support. The chapels are in their own houses" [Berington's State and Behaviour of Eng. Cath. 160].

In the year 1872 the number of clergy (including 16 bishops) was 1599, and the number of public chapels 1005, but many of the latter are only "stations" at which services were held occasionally, while many of the clergy are private chaplains or belong to monastic communities. Roman Catholic colleges, convents, and schools for the higher and middle classes are, however, very numerous ; and these are continually growing in wealthy endowments and in social power.¹

ROSCHOLSCHIKI. [ISBRANIKI.]

ROSENFELDERS. The fanatic followers of an impostor named Hans Rosenfeld, who had been a gamekeeper, but set himself up as the Messiah about the year 1763, and seduced a large number of followers in Prussia and the neighbouring states. Rosenfeld persuaded his followers that Christianity was a delusion, its priests impostors, and Frederick the Great neither more nor less than the Evil One, whom Rosenfeld was to depose, that he might afterwards govern the world himself as the Messiah, assisted by a council of twenty-four elders like those of the Apocalypse. This impostor deluded multitudes, and lived upon them in outrageous profligacy for twenty years. Eventually, in the year 1782, one of his followers, who still believed in him, appealed to the King, whom he believed to be the Evil One, to revenge him on Rosenfeld for the seduction of his three daughters. This led the King to order proceedings to be taken against the impostor, and he was sentenced to be flogged and imprisoned for the remainder of his life at Spandau ; after which his sect was dispersed. ROSICRUCIANS. This name was that adopted by a large section of the later fire-philosophers or THEOSOPHISTS, who were spread throughout all the countries of Northern Europe, about the beginning of the seventeenth century.

Considerable difficulty exists as to the origin of the name, as well as to the limits and character of the society. The name, popularly derived from "rosa" and "crux," seems at first sight to have some connection with the arms of Luther, which are composed of these symbols. But the term is really a chemical one, and barbarously derived from "ros," dew (in alchemistic belief a powerful if not universal solvent), and "crux," which in the alchemistic language is identified with light, because the figure of a cross contains, in various presentations, all the three capital letters of the word "lux." Moreover, the fire-philosophers applied the term "lux" to the seed of the red dragon, or to that crude and corporeal light which by due process of concentration was believed to produce gold. The Rosicrucians were in fact the philosophers who by means of dew sought for the alchemistic light, that is, for the substance of the philosopher's stone. A different derivation is however suggested by the earliest Rosicrucian publication, the "Fama Fraternitatis," which was published in Frankfort about A.D. 1610. In this work the founder and head of the fraternity is said to have been one Christopher Rosencreutz, a German, born A.D. 1388, who, during a pilgrimage to Damascus and the Holy Sepulchre, was entertained and instructed by certain wise men of the East, from whose hands he passed into those of the chemists of Egypt and Morocco, where his education was completed. Having thus obtained a thorough insight into the Kabbala and all magical arts, he is alleged on his return home to have commenced the reform of human knowledge; and it is pretended that having for this purpose admitted several pupils to his studies, the fraternity so formed preserved its continuity up to the seventeenth century. The publication of this singular fable divided popular opinion into two parties, one declaring the Rosicrucians to be a body of learned and orthodox reformers, the other holding them to be a band of ignorant dreamers, the purveyors of mischievous delusion.

As the Rosicrucian doctrines depended entirely on reasoning derived from facts testified to by heated imaginations and morbidly receptive senses, unanimity of opinion is not to be expected. The sectaries agreed, however, in holding: first, that the only true knowledge was to be derived by analysis of all bodies by the agency of fire; secondly, that God operates by the same laws in the kingdom of Grace as in the kingdom of Nature, and that there is therefore a complete analogy and coincidence between science and religion; thirdly, that a divine soul or energy is diffused through the fabric of the universe—this incorporeal existence being by some called "Archæus," by others the Universal Spirit. Holding these views, it is but natural to find that they expressed their religious doctrines in chemical terms. They also taught a vague and uncertain astrology, magie, and demonology.

The Rosicrucians obtained a factitious importance through their strenuous opposition to the Peripatetic philosophy, which was in their time dominant throughout Christendom. In their bizarre and irrational way they anticipated the great revolt against the Aristotelians, which the close of the seventeenth century saw in full vigour; but in this revolt, and in the scientific impulses which accompanied it, the idle dreaming of the Rosicrucians was incontinently swept away.

The great names of these alchemistic philosophers are Robert Fludd, an Englishman; Jacob Böhmen, a shoemaker of Görlitz; and Michael Mayer. The Helmonts, Knorr, Kuhlmann, Noll, and Sperber, complete the list.

Nearly all the leaders, however, whose names are mentioned above wrote some work to be found under their names. Examen Philosophiæ Fluddanæ, by Pierre Gassendi, is the first controversial work on this subject; Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, by Gottfried Arnold; and Historia Critica Philosophiæ, part iv., by Brückner, contain full information. ROWITES. [CAMPBELLITES.]

RUNCARII. An Antinomian sect of the Waldenses which is mentioned by Reinerius as agreeing for the most part with the Paterins, but as holding that no part of the body below the waist can commit mortal sin, because such sin proceeds "out of the heart." They probably took their name from the town of Runcalia, or Runkel. [Reiner. contr. Waldens. in Bibl. Max. Lugd. xxv. 266 f.]

RUPITÆ, or RUPITANI. A name given to the small Donatist congregation at Rome from their being driven to shelter among the rocks for the purpose of celebrating their religious services. [Schlosser, s. v.]

RUSSIAN SECTS. [RASCHOLNIKS.]

SABATNIKI. A sect of Russian Sabbatarians, or "Sabbath honourers," which arose in Novgorod [c. A.D. 1470], where some clergy and laity were persuaded by a Jew of Kiev, named Zacharias, into a belief that the Mosaic dispensation alone was of Divine origin. They accepted the Old Testament only, of which, being unacquainted with Hebrew, they used the Slavonic translation. Like the Jews, they were led to expect the advent of an earthly Messiah. Some of them denied the Resurrection; and being accused of practising several cabalistic arts, for which points of Jewish ceremonial may have been mistaken, were regarded by the common people as soothsayers and sorcerers. They were gradually becoming a powerful sect, one of their number, named Zosima, having even been elected Archbishop of Moscow, when in A.D. 1490 they were condemned by a synod, and a fierce persecution nearly obliterated them. But here and there, in remote parts of Russia, travellers have within the last century discovered fragmentary communities holding Jewish views, which have been thought to be relics of the older sect of Sabatniki. In Irkutsk they continue to exist under the name of Selesnewschshini. [Platon's Present State of Greek Church in Russia, Pinkerton's transl. 273.]

SABBATARIANS. Those who maintain that the observance of the Sabbath is obligatory upon Christians.

The early Jewish Christians of Palestine retained the whole Mosaic law, and observed consequently the Sabbath as well as the Lord's Day. From them the custom spread in the Eastern Church of distinguishing Saturday as well as Sunday by not fasting, and by fuller public prayer, with the Holy Eucharist. It is clearly in the power of the Church, or of any integral portion of the Church, to mark in this way the day of God's rest from the work of creation, which is a matter for perpetual remembrance. Nor is such an observance open to the charge implied in the word Sabbatarian if it be kept free from Jewish superstition. On the other hand, in the Western Church (though probably not from the beginning) the Sabbath was a fast-day. In this rule God's resting from creation must have been kept out of sight; for the divine Sabbath cannot be proposed as the occasion of a fast. The Western Saturday fast arose from opposition to Judaism, which was strong in the Western Churches, and particularly at Rome. To justify the fast on this ground requires the fact of a large and dangerous amount of Judaism in the rest of the Church. If the seventh day be considered with reference to the work of redemption, it may be viewed either in the light of the preceding day of the Crucifixion, or of the following day of the Resurrection: and it is in the power of each Church to solemnize it as a fast or festival as shall be judged most for edification. On the one hand, the Sabbatum Magnum or Easter Eve has always been held a fast preparatory to Easter Day; and similar considerations may influence a church in the observance of the Saturday as preparatory to the weekly Resurrection feast: or, on the other hand, it may be judged better to limit such preparatory fast to the yearly celebration, adopting it only for the winding up of Lent, and in the weekly celebration to direct the mind of the worshipper to the deep quiet joy of the rest in which the Father gave His Beloved sleep, and to the triumph of the good tidings brought on that day to the spirits in prison. Both views may be justified, and it is for each Church to judge for itself which it shall adopt. A wise and good man will, with St. Ambrose, at Rome keep fast with Rome; at Milan keep feast with Milan.¹

Of the custom of the Eastern Church we have the following rules:—In the Apostolic Canons, it is ordered that clergymen fasting on any Sabbath except one are to be deposed, laymen to be suspended from communion [can. 56]; clergy abstaining from flesh and wine on the Sabbath festival out of abhorrence, and not for mortification, to be deposed [can. 45 or 53]. This more special rule points to the Gnostic tenets, that creation is evil, and the Creator an inferior demiurge or evil angel. By the Apostolic Constitutions Sabbaths are regarded as festivals, except the Great Sabbath in which our Lord lay in the grave, on which day mourning on His account is more proper than joy for the creation. Public worship is to be celebrated, to hear the Prophets and Gospels, to offer the Oblation, to partake of the Holy Supper. Servants are to rest from work, that they may attend public worship [ii. 20, 59; v. 15; vii. 23; viii. 33]. At the Council of Laodicea [A.D. 367], the Gospels are ordered to be read on the Sabbath [can. 16]; Christians are not to Judaize and rest, but work on the Sabbath, and rest on the Lord's Day [can. 29]. On the Sabbaths of Lent consecration in the Holy Eucharist may be made [can. 49]. In the Canonical Answers of Timothy, Bishop of Alexandria [A.D. 380], the thirteenth puts the Sabbath and the Lord's Day on a level regarding the intercourse of man and wife. The 55th canon of the second Council of Constantinople or Quinisextine [A.D. 683] confirms the 56th Apostolical canon, and Balsamon observes that this is one great reason why the Romanists reject these canons.

Thus the only difference observed between the Sabbath and the Lord's Day was that labour was allowed or rather enjoined on the former, and abstinence from work was considered to be a mark of Judaism. For this reason the Ebionites were condemned for joining the observance of the Sabbath according to the law of the Jews with the observance of the Lord's Day after the manner of Christians. And in this sense we are to understand what Gregory the Great says, that Antichrist will renew the observance of the Sabbath [Greg. lib. xi. ep. 3.]

There is little or no doubt that such was the primitive custom in the West as well as in the East; that the Western fast is of later origin. Kaye sums up the evidence from Tertullian on this point, that the Sabbath "in Tertullian's time appears to have been kept as a day of rejoicing. Even the Montanists—anxious as they were to introduce a more rigorous discipline in the observance of fasts—when they kept their two weeks of Xerophagiæ, did not fast on the Saturday and Sunday. The Saturday before Easter Day was however an exception; that was observed as a fast" [Kaye on Tertullian, p. 409]. When Tertullian says the Catholics kept no Sabbath a fast except the Sabbatum Magnum, it is hardly possible that Rome was an exception [Tertull. de Jejuniis. p. 712, ed. 1641]. The Council of Eliberis [A.D. 305] introduced the Sabbath fast into Spain [can. xxvi.]. This was probably in imitation of Rome, in which case the introduction of the custom into Rome will lie between Tertullian's time and the Council of Eliberis—somewhere, that is, in the third century.¹

The Decretal of Innocent, or Epistle to Decentius, is no doubt spurious, but it was an early forgery, for it was received as genuine by Dionysius Exiguus; and it is evidence of the rule of the Roman Church in the fourth century. It decrees that the Sabbath is to be fasted as well as Friday every week, because on those two days the Apostles must have been grieved for our Saviour's Death and Descent into Hell. Bingham notices that Socrates makes the Roman Church to vary once more in this matter. For Socrates says that in his time they did not fast at Rome on Saturdays, even in Lent [Socr. Hist. Eccl. v. 22]. This statement Bingham thinks is to be distrusted, because the Quinisextine Council charges the Romans with keeping fast on Saturday. For a variation of practice at a later time see Catalani, Pontificale, iii. 37, ed. 1852. Gratian rests the Roman practice upon Innocent's Decretal.

It has been observed already that the terms of the Apostolic Canons, fasting "out of abhorrence, not out of mortification," refer to Gnostic tenets. Of this perversion of the Saturday fast the Marcionites give an example. They were in the habit of fasting, especially on the Sabbath, as being the day on which the Demiurge, or God of the Jews, towards whom they were anxious to shew no respect, ended the creation of the world and rested [Tertullian, adv. Marcion, iv. 12]. The perversion, on the other hand, of the Sabbath festival is the keeping it in a Jewish manner, and making it a means of introducing the spirit of Judaism. Ignatius [ad Magnes, cap. ix.] makes the Sabbath the test of adherence to the ancient order or the new hope. The canons already quoted shew both the danger and the carefulness of the Church to guard against it. Ancient Sabbatarianism was thus for the most part a literal observance of the Sabbath. The Western Church resisted this Judaism by the strong measure of turning the Sabbath into a fast; the Eastern by formally sanctioning labour on the seventh day, and by laying down the nature of the rejoicing proper to it.

Modern Sabbatarianism, properly so called, is rare; for in general modern Sabbatarians neglect the Sabbath altogether, and transfer its Jewish obligations and rules, with its name, to the Lord's Day. There is this common ground to the old Sabbath and the new Lord's Day, that both are days of rest; and for those who do not attain the truth, that in the former rest was the religion of the day, in the latter such rest is enjoined as ministers to the opportunities of religion, it is easy and natural to apply to the latter the rules of the former. A curious example of this Sabbatarianism is found in the Injunctions of the Abbot of Flay, A.D. 1201 [Johnson, English Canons, ii. 95]. They are an attempt to extend monastic rules to the Church at large. The Sunday rest is to begin at three o'clock on Saturday, and not only is buying and selling and pleadings in church and church porches forbidden, but "sive suspensio, sed dies; cibo dicitur superponi, ait Salmasius, quod est jejuniū." Victorinus flourished about A.D. 290.

den, but also all house-work and cooking. A woman weaving after three o'clock is struck with palsy. A man makes a cake at the same time, and when he eats it on Sunday morning it drops blood. The Archbishop of York countenanced the abbot's proceedings.

It may be that this antedating the Sunday, throwing its beginning into the Saturday, had some effect on the character of the festival. Archbishop Islip ordered that the Lord's Day should begin at Vespers on the Sabbath Day, "not before, lest we should seem professed Jews" [Constitutions, A.D. 1362; Johnson, ii. 426]. When it was made to begin earlier the opposition to Judaism would tend to lessen its festal character; and although the Saturday fast was formally terminated, the spirit of the fast might be extended into the commencement of the feast.

In England Sabbatarianism was adopted by the Puritans in their controversy with the Episcopalians. In the year 1595 one Dr. Bownde put out a Book of the Sabbath (reprinted with additions in 1606), in which he maintained that the Fourth Commandment and the Mosaic Sabbath laws attach themselves to the Lord's Day by a moral and perpetual obligation. Everything that could be classed as business or recreation was forbidden as a sin equal to adultery and murder. It is almost incredible (Fuller writes) how taking this doctrine was, partly because of its own purity, and partly for the eminent piety of such persons as maintained it. A writer of the time speaks of its great influence in the following terms: "I have read (and many there be alive which will justify it) how it was preached in a market town in Oxfordshire, that to do any servile work or business on the Lord's Day is as great a sin as to kill a man, or to commit adultery. It was preached in Somersetshire, that to throw a bowl on the Sabbath day is as great a sin as to kill a man. It was preached in Norfolk, that to make feast or wedding-dinner on the Lord's Day is as great a sin as for a father to take a knife and cut his child's throat. It was preached in Suffolk (I can name the man, and I was present when he was convened before his ordinary for preaching the same), that to ring more bells than one upon the Lord's Day to call the people unto the church is as great a sin as to commit murder" [Rogers on XXXIX. Art. 19, Park. Soc. ed.].

In the year 1618 James I. published for the county of Lancaster a declaration of liberty of sports, and soon after appeared a sect of Sabbatarians, who were long known under the name of their first teacher, John Trask, and were afterwards called "Seventh-Day Men." [TRASKITES.] In the year 1633 the controversy was revived by the publication of Theophilus Bradburn's Defence of the Sabbath Day. He maintained that the seventh day ought to be observed, and that the Lord's Day is an ordinary working day. Bradburn, before he was tried by the High Commission, was convinced of his error in a conference with White, Bishop of Ely. But his book occasioned the publication of the King's declaration regarding sports (a republication of James's declaration), and the order that it should be read in all churches. [SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.]

SABBATIANS. A Judaizing section of the NOVATIANS, who owed their origin to Sabbatius, a presbyter who had been ordained by Marcin [Socrat. Hist. Eccl. v. 20, vii. 15]. The Sabbatians were included among heretics who were condemned in A.D. 381 by the seventh canon of the Council of Constantinople [Mansi, Concil. iii. 563].

SABELLIANS. Heretics of the latter half of the third century, who took their name from a priest named Sabellius, and who opposed the doctrine of the Holy Trinity by maintaining that God is One Person only, though He manifests Himself in three modes or by the differing operations of three Divine energies. Sabellianism was thus the doctrine of One God exercising three Offices, as opposed to the doctrine of One God in Three Persons.

Sabellius was a native of the Libyan Pentapolis, probably of the city of Ptolemais, and is first heard of at Rome in the time of Zephyrinus. There he was perverted by Callistus to the heresy of Noëtus, and was forward among those who were striving to gain Zephyrinus to their side. There were doubtless differences of opinion, formed or forming, between Noëtus, Callistus, and Sabellius [see Milman, Lat. Christ. I. i. p. 53, ed. 1867], but it is clear that Sabellius was the legitimate successor of Praxeas and Noëtus, and was taken for the representative of their school. As such he appears in Novatian's treatise Concerning the Trinity [ch. xii. xxiii.], in which his heresy is stated simply to be the assertion that Christ is the Father, without any mention of the later speculations or modification of the heresy.

It has been usual [Cave, Hist. Lit. art. Novatianus] to date the Sabellian heresy from its outbreak in Pentapolis, and consequently to assign a late date to Novatian's treatise. Now that the "Refutation" of Hippolytus has been recovered, there can hardly be a doubt that Novatian wrote this treatise before his schism; and that Sabellianism, though as a doctrine it is of an earlier time [PRAXEANS], is to be dated as regards its name, from the time when Sabellius became the leader of the Noëtian school. Noëtus died about the year 220, at which time Isidore of Hispalis fixes the rise of Sabellianism. The outbreak of Sabellianism in Pentapolis occurred about the year 257. Dionysius of Alexandria sent legates to that province; and wrote three letters in refutation of the heresy, in which he was betrayed into expressions unorthodox in the other extreme. Complaint being made of this to Dionysius of Rome, he wrote four books in refutation both of the Sabellian heresy and of that which was ascribed to himself. These books were allowed to be orthodox [Thilo, Admonitio prefixed to S. Athan. Epist. de Sententia Dionysii. Oper. Dogm. Selecta, p. 92].

These Fathers give the heresy of Sabellius in terms as brief and simple as Novatian gives it. Dionysius of Rome states that Sabellius asserts the Son Himself to be the Father, the Father to be the Son; Dionysius of Alexandria, that Sabellius asserts it was the Father, not the Son, Who became man for us [Routh, Reliq. Sacr. iii. pp. 373, 401]. Athanasius, in his "Expositio Fidei," describes Sabellian doctrine thus: οὕτε γὰρ νιοπάτωρα φρονούμεν, ὡς οἱ Σαβέλλιοι λέγοντες μονοούσιον καὶ οὐχ ὁμοούσιον, καὶ ἐν τούτῳ ἀναιρῶντες τὸ εἶναι νιδόν. In accordance with these authorities, Philaster [Hær. liv.] states that Sabellius was a disciple of Noëtus, that the Noëtians were called also Praxeans and Sabellians as well as Patripassians and Hermogenians; and Augustine [Hær. xli.] professes himself unable to understand why Epiphanius reckons Sabellianism and Noëtianism as distinct heresies. That the Sabellians were called Hermogenians implies no more than that they had adopted Hermogenes' tenet of the existence of an eternal subject-matter, inherently evil, out of which the world was made: it does not prove that the Hermogenians were Sabellians. Tertullian's tract, "Adversus Hermogenem," not only contains no charge of Sabellianism or of Patripassianism (which the author of the treatise against Praxeas would hardly have omitted had there been any foundation for it), but it contains a testimony to the belief of Hermogenes in Christ as the Son of God. The testimony of Hippolytus to the same point is still stronger. [HERMOGENIANS.] On the other hand, it appears from an extract from the work of Dionysius against Sabellius occurring in Eusebius, that Sabellius borrowed from Hermogenes this tenet of the eternity of matter [Eusebius, de Prep. Evan. vii. 18, 19, Gaisford's ed. ii. 206; and see Viger's note, iv. p. 216].

The inadequate conception of the Deity which this simple form of Sabellianism involves has already been pointed out. [MONARCHIANS.] It may be noticed further, that to this form, more properly even than to the subsequently modified form, belongs that conception of the Trinity which is the very essence of Sabellianism; namely, that it is a Trinity not of distinct Persons, but of action and office. The Scriptures which speak of the Son cannot possibly be ignored. They are met by the pretended explanation that the one God, to Whom as the Source of all things the name Father is given, going forth to the work of redemption, united Himself with Jesus, and was then called the Son. In like manner, going forth to the work of sanctification, He is called the Holy Spirit. These are names only of office, expressing the relations in which God puts Himself to created beings. They state appearances (in which sense the word πρόσωπον was used), not Hypostases or Persons.

To this form again only the first degree of Patripassianism is attributable, which does not assert the Divine Nature itself to be possible, but asserts only the Person of Jesus Christ, in which the human nature was assumed by the Father, to have suffered "ratione humanæ naturæ." The difficulties of this creed, if any authority be allowed to Holy Scripture, are so great that it cannot long be held in its simple form. It is plainly contrary to Scripture to assert the Self-existent to be the same with the Begotten, the Sender with the Sent; and the tenet of the Incarnation of the Father, the One God without distinction of Persons, is most repugnant to every scripturally-informed mind. The struggle to avoid these difficulties, and yet to retain the primary doctrine of the Monarchians, suggested the doctrine of the dilatation and contraction of the Deity (called the doctrine of the πλατυσμός), namely, that there has been an expansion or dilatation of the Eternal Unity into a Trinity, and will be again a collapse into Unity. Athanasius, who has been quoted as attributing to Sabellius the simple doctrine of the νιοπάτωρ, that the Father is the Son and the Son the Father, states this doctrine of the πλατυσμός, saying that it was perhaps borrowed from the Stoics. "If the One (ἡ μόνος) being dilated became a Three (γέγονε τριπλᾶς), and the One was the Father, and the Three is Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, first the One being dilated, underwent an affection and became what it was not; for it was dilated, whereas it was not dilated. Next, if the One itself was dilated into a Three,—and that Father and Son and Holy Ghost,—then Father and Spirit became the same, as Sabellius held; unless the One which he speaks of is something besides the Father, and then he ought not to speak of dilatation, since the One was maker of Three, so that there was a One, and then Father, Son, and Spirit" [Athan. Orat. iv. contr. Arian. xiii., Newman's transl.]. Now it is true that in this passage Athanasius does not state that the Sabellians held the doctrine of the πλατυσμός, but that that doctrine leads to Sabellianism; and Newman is probably right in referring the general argument of that part of the discourse to the followers of Marcellus: but (as Newman remarks) πλατυσμός seems, by the allusion of Dionysius to it, to have been a word of Sabellius¹ [de Sentent. Dionysii, sec. 17]: "Thus indeed we dilate (πλατύνομεν) the Unity (τὴν μονάδα) into the Trinity without making division (ἀδιαίρετον), and again contract the undiminished Trinity into the Unity." Special stress is here laid on the ἀδιαίρετον, because Dionysius had charged the Sabellians with ignorance that such division of the Father from the Son cannot be.

This charge conducts us to further proof that the Sabellians held the doctrine of the πλατυσμός, and to the remarkable fact that, starting from the tenet of the identity of the Father and the Son, they arrived at the conclusion that the Father is separable and separate from the Son. These seemingly contradictory propositions they appear to have held together.

Arius, in his letter to Alexander, given by Epiphanius [Hær. lxi. 7], charges Sabellius with dividing the Unity and calling the Son the Father. His words are Σαβέλλιος ὁ τὴν μονάδα διαιρῶν, υἱοπάτορα εἶπεν. Wormius argues that this charge is false, inasmuch as he has shewn from Nazianzen and others that the heresy of Sabellius was rather a συναίρεσις than a διαίρεσις [Hist. Sabell. cap. i. p. 21].¹ The charge, however, is verified, not only by the words of Dionysius which have been quoted, but by Hilary of Poitiers, who mentions both the συναίρεσις and the διαίρεσις. Hilary uses the word "Unio." This word is found in Sulpicius Severus: "Suspecti ab Orientalibus habebamur trionymam solitarii Dei unionem secundum Sabellium credidisse" [ii. 42]. In the Indiculus de Hær. [Pseudo-Hieron.] cap. xxvi., Oehler has admitted into the text "Unionita" for "Onion," which stood in Menard's edition: "Sabellius, qui et Patripassianus, id est Unionita;" the correction having been made by Cotelierius. "Contra Unionitas" stands as the superscription of the Anti-Sabellian part of Prudentius' Apotheosis, but it is of course doubtful whether the words are those of Prudentius. "Unio," then, in Sabellian doctrine, takes the place of "Unitas" in Catholic doctrine, when the nature of the Deity is the subject. In place of the Unity of Three distinct Persons we have the entire coalescence of what are distinguished only in name, not in substance. In this sense Hilary represents Sabellius as eagerly catching at the Union. Sabellius "dum audit, Qui me vidit, vidit et Patrem, indiscretæ et indissimilis in Patre et Filio naturæ impie arripuit unionem, non intelligens naturalem unitatem sub nativitatis significatione monstrari: cum per id, quod in Filio Patre videtur, confirmatio divinitatis sit, non nativitatis abolitio" [Hilar. de Trin. vii. 5]. The Church rejects this doctrine: "Nobis autem in confessione nativitas est [the eternal generation of the Son]: et unionem detestantes unitatem divinitatis tenemus; scilicet ut Deus ex Deo² unum sint in genere naturæ, dum quod per nativitatis veritatem ex Deo in Deum exstitit, non aliunde quam ex Deo esse substituit" [ibid. vi. 11]. The doctrinal effect of the Union, as is here implied, is to destroy the eternal Paternity and Sonship in the Godhead. So more plainly: "Et idcirco usus est eo genere doctrinæ, ut in uno Domino Christo unum significaret et Deum, et in uno Deo Patre unum significaret et Dominum; nec tamen impiam nobis ad perimendam unigeniti Dei nativitatem inveheret unionem, et Patrem professus et Christum" [ibid. viii. 36]. See also the remarks on the Twelfth Anathema of the Semi-Arian Synod of Ancyra [A.D. 358] [de Synodis, 26, col. 1166, Benedictine ed.].

But while he thus dwells on the union as held by the Sabellians, Hilary at the same time unhesitatingly adopts the charge brought by Arius, that Sabellius divides the union. He quotes the letter of Arius: "Namque id sequitur: Nec sicut Sabellius qui unionem dividit, ipsum dicit Filium quem et Patrem." He notices the fraudulent intention³ of this condemnation of a heretic by heretics, but he adopts the charge: "Ignorat evangelica atque apostolica sacramenta sic credens Sabellius;" and he goes on to remark: "Cujus unionis divisio non nativitatem intulit, sed eundem divisit in Virgine" [ibid. vi. 11]; that is, the division of the union of the υἱοπάτωρ did not introduce an eternal generation of a Son of God, but took place when the Divine Nature, or a portion of it, became incarnate. This conclusion is supported by Philaster [Hær. xciii.], who ascribes to Sabellius the opinion that the mission of the Son by the Father involves a "separatio loci." [PHOTINIANS.]

The Sabellian doctrine of the Incarnation, as connected with the doctrine of the πλατυσμός, is told thus: "Plures etiam in corpus atque ex se protensum permanentemque Patrem loquuntur; ut assumptio illa carnis ex Virgine filii nomen acceperit, non qui ante erat Dei filius, idem hominis filius sit natus in corpore" [Hilar. Tract. in LXVII. Psal. 15]. And again: "Quidam ita evangelicæ fidei corrumpunt sacramentum, ut sub unius Dei pia tantum professione nativitatem unigeniti Dei abnegent; ut protensio sit potius in hominem, quam descensio: neque ut qui filius hominis secundum tempora assumptæ carnis fuit, idem antea semper fuerit atque sit Filius Dei: ne in eo nativitas Dei sit, sed ex eodem idem sit; ut unius Dei, ut putant, inviolabilem fidem series ex solido in carnem deducta conservet, dum usque ad Virginem Pater protensus, ipse sibi natus sit in Filium" [Hilar. de Trin. i. 16].⁴

The only Divine Sonship allowed by Sabellian doctrine being then that which took place in time, at the Incarnation, there was also at that time a division of the Union. Of what nature was that division thought to be? The Benedictine editor [note i. col. 834] writes: "Sabellius quidem in Trinitate, de qua non est hic sermo, unionem inducit; sed in Incarnatione, uti declaratur lib. vi. n. 7, unionem dividit, hoc est, in Christo personarum dualitatem invehit." Now the discourse thus commented upon is not at all of the Incarnation, but of the Divine Sonship as a part of the doctrine of the Trinity; and to say that the division of the Union is the division into two Persons of the one Person of God Incarnate is to remove the words "unionem

dividit" from their proper subject into a foreign subject. Besides which Hilary, speaking in vi. 11 of the same words of Arius, says "unionem detestantes," which he could not say of the union of the two natures in the Person of our Lord, for of that conjunction "Unio" may properly be used. This explanation then is inadmissible. In a subsequent note on the same words [d in col. 885], the same editor writes: "Hoc per se sonat personam in Christo non fuisse singularem ut explicuimus p. 833, not. i. sic tamen potius intelligendum videtur, ut Sabellius unionem in Virgine diviserit, quatenus post susceptam in ea carnem eidem Deo Patris ac Filii nomina adscribere coeperit; nomenclaturam augens numerum, non personarum." This second explanation appears to be quite inadequate. For the "unio" is "trionyma," and to give the name of Son to the "Deus protensus ad Virginem" can never be called a division of that union. We are forced therefore to conclude, if Hilary be a competent witness, that Sabellius did assert a separation of the "Protensio," which, reaching "usque ad Virginem," took the name of Son. This last step was taken to avoid the charge of Patripassianism, which could be escaped only by admitting a distinction of Persons in the Godhead, or by asserting that only a portion of the Divine Nature became incarnate, or by asserting (however unimaginable it may be) that the "Deus protensus" is separable from the "Monas" or "Deus solitarius." The latter assertion appears to have been made for "Sabellius, qui unionem dividit, ipsum dixit Filium quem et Patrem." But this assertion passes necessarily into the former assertion, and may be noted as the second stage of the heresy. The third stage is connected with other names [MARCELLIANS. PHOTINIANS], and comprehended the notion of a certain energy or power proceeding from the Deity to assume the nature of man.

Epiphanius states [Hær. lxii.] that the last-named doctrine was drawn from apocryphal writings, especially from the Gospel according to the Egyptians. It is highly probable that this Gospel is to be identified with that of Basilides [for which see Valesius in Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 7, and Routh, Rel. Sac. i. p. 88]; or, at least, there can be little doubt that it proceeded from the school which Basilides founded in Egypt. Epiphanius does not name the tenet of the existence of matter, eternal, replete with the germs of life, inherently evil, which the Sabellians held in common with Basilides; and his derivation of Sabellianism from the Gospel of Egypt must refer to his statement of the nature of the Deity. Having given the general Sabellian tenet that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are one and the same, three appellations in one substance and person [ἐν μιᾷ ὑποστάσει τρεῖς ὀνομασίες], he adds that this conception was compared to that of the constitution of man, likening the Father to the body, the Son to the soul, the Holy Ghost to the spirit; or to that of the sun, likening the Father to the round sun itself, the Son to the illuminating power, the Holy Ghost to the heating power: these being emitted, as rays of light and heat, to give knowledge and life, and, their mission accomplished, returning to the luminary. These notions might easily be borrowed from Basilides' doctrine of Æons, if these Æons are not considered as distinct persons, the Sabellian Son and Spirit being probably the Basilidean "Nous" and "Dynamis." Whether Basilides held or not his Æons to be distinct persons is a controverted point [Mosheim, de Rebus, ch. ii. 46, note O]; his connection with Sabellianism is an argument in favour of the opinion of Beausobre, that the Æons are merely virtues or attributes of the Supreme Being. Basilides leads us through Simon Magus to the Cabbala.¹

The statements of other Fathers of the Church agreeing with the conclusions which have been drawn, may be briefly noticed. Basil insists on the Judaism of Sabellius; it is but a reintroduction of Judaism to confess the Son in name, but in reality to deny his existence [Basil, Hom. contr. Sabell. et Ar. Sect. i. Epp. 189, 210]. This is repeated by modern writers, as by Marheinecke [Dogmengeschichte, iv. 205], but such is not the teaching of earlier Judaism.² [MONARCHIANS.] Basil states that Sabellius did not reject the fiction of unhypostatized persons [τὸν ἀνυπόστατον τῶν προσώπων ἀναπλασμένον. Ep. 210, 5]; inasmuch as, while he confounded the conceptions of hypostasis and substance, he endeavoured to distinguish the persons [διαφεῖν τὰ πρόσωπα], and inasmuch as the one hypostasis assumed various persons or appearances upon occasion and need [τὴν αὐτὴν ὑπόστασιν λέγων πρὸς τὴν ἐκάστοτε παρεπιπίπτονσαν χρείαν μετασχηματίζεσθαι, Ep. 236-6].

Augustine's statements in other works agree with that in his Tract on Heresies, and shew Sabellianism in its early stage. Thus "Breviter insinuavimus . . . esse hæreticos qui vocantur Patripassiani, vel a suo auctore Sabelliani: hi dicunt ipsum esse Patrem qui est Filius; nomina diversa, unam vero esse personam. Cum vult, Pater est, inquit; cum vult, Filius [Aug. Tract. in Joann. Evang. xxxvii. 6. See also adv. Quinque Hær. sec. 2; ad Orosium c. Priscill. et Origen. c. iv.].

In Ambrose [in Symbol. Apost.] is a statement of the leading doctrine of Sabellianism. From the de Fide [lib. v. cap. 6] may be quoted the words of Ambrose, "de Filii subiectione," for comparison with the tenet of Marcellus, "Quomodo igitur subjectum dicimus? Sabelliani et Marcionitæ dicunt, quod hæc fatura sit Christi ad Deum Patrem subjectio, ut in Patrem Filius refundatur. Si ergo ea erit Verbi subjectio ut resolvatur in Patrem Deus Verbum, ergo et quæ-

² See the remarkable letter of Isidore of Pelusium [143], the subject of which is given by the editors: "De mysterio S. S. Trinitatis ne quidem Veteri Testamento et Philoni Judæo plane incognito."

cumque Patri Filioque subjecta sint, in Patrem et Filium resolventur, ut sit Deus omnia et in omnibus creaturis. Sed absurdum est dicere: non igitur per refusionem subjectio."

Sabellius was condemned by an early council at Rome. This we learn from Hilary. His words are: "In urbe Roma sub Novato et Sabellio et Valentino hæreticis factum concilium ab Orientalibus confirmatum est" [Hilary, Frag. Hist. iii. 26, p. 1320, Ben. ed.]. If Novato be the correct word, this council must be that held by Cornelius [A.D. 252; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 43]. But it may be doubted whether it is not the council held by Stephen [A.D. 258], which is said to have condemned Noëtus, Sabellius, and Valentinus [Baluz, Nov. Coll. Ann. 258].

The Alexandrian councils held against Arianism involved determinations against the conflicting heresy of Sabellianism; particularly that of A.D. 324.¹ Of the decisions of Nicæa it is unnecessary to speak; but the following expressions in the reasons given for the δμοούσιον may be compared with the statements above made respecting the second stage of Sabellianism: οὔτε γὰρ κατὰ διαίρεσιν τῆς οὐσίας, οὔτε κατὰ ἀποτομὴν, ἢ ἀλλοιωσιν τῆς τοῦ πατρὸς οὐσίας τε καὶ δυνάμεως [Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 8]. Of the Post-Nicene councils, one at Rome [A.D. 373], held under Damasus, condemned this heresy, describing it in the simple terms that the Father and the Son are one and the same [Theod. Hist. Eccl. v. 11]. In one held at Constantinople [A.D. 381-2], the heresy is condemned as well as that of the Marcellians and Photinians; and Sabellian baptism is disallowed [canons i. vii.]. This was confirmed at the Council in Trullo [A.D. 683; canon 95]. It follows, therefore, in all probability, that the Sabellians had altered the form of baptism to suit their tenets. [PHOTINIANS.]

It cannot be inferred from the Trullan canon that Sabellianism was prevalent in the seventh century. The confirmation of foregoing conciliar decrees was general, without inquiry whether there were special need of such confirmation. And it may be concluded that in the fifth century Sabellianism was virtually extinct. For a late charge of the heresy against a portion of the Armenian Church by Benedict XII., see Raynald [Contin. of Baron.] vi. an. 1341, lx.

SABIANS. [MENDEANS.]

SABOTIERS. A name given to the Waldenses from the sabots worn by the French peasantry. The sabots of the Waldenses were, however, distinguished by a painted cross—"insabbatiati"—or else by sandals tied crosswise. They are described in an epistle of Innocent III. as "calciamenta desuper aperta" [Innocent, Epp. xv. 137]; and other writers speak of the Waldenses as wearing sandals, after the custom of the Apostles, and as walking with naked feet. Ebrard speaks of them contemptuously as assuming this name themselves: "Xabatenses a xabata potius, quam Christiani a Christo, se volunt appellari." The custom was doubtless adopted in imitation of the voluntary poverty of the Apostles, and in accordance with the names "Pauperes de Lugduno," and "de Lombardia," which they assumed. [Ebrard, contr. Waldens. in Bibl. Lugd. xxiv. 1572.]

SACCOPHORI. Wearers of rough garments in token of austere discipline. They appear to have been a subdivision of the Encratites, those, namely, who thought fit to make an outward profession of their rule. St. Basil puts together the Encratites, Saccophori, and Apotactics as an offshoot of the Marcionites [Basil, Can. Epist. II. can. 47]. Theodosius made a decree, which was renewed by Honorius, that some of the Manichees, who went by the name of Encratites, Saccophori, or Hydroparastatæ, should be punished with death [Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 5, de Hæret. leg. ix.].

Both the Marcionites and the Manichees held the doctrine of Two Principles; and it is no wonder that the Encratites are referred now to one, now to the other of these sects. But their true origin appears to be from the former. St. Basil's Canon is one relating to the baptism of these sects. [ENCRATITES.]

SACRAMENTARIANS. A controversial name given by the Lutherans to the Zwinglians to designate their belief that the consecrated elements in the Eucharist are merely sacramental symbols, and not in any way the means by which the Body and Blood of Christ are really and truly present to and conveyed to the faithful partaker of them. The third volume of Schlusselfburg's "Hæreticorum Catalogus" contains 492 pages "De secta Sacramentariorum qui Cingliani sen Calvinistæ vocantur." [ZWINGLIANS.]

SADDUCEES. A Jewish religious party which derived its name from some founder named Zadok, the word Sadducees being the Greek form of Zadokim or Zadokites. It is conjectured that they were the higher class, or aristocracy, of the Aaronic family, the nucleus of the class being the descendants of Zadok the high priest, of David's time, by whom Solomon was crowned. Thus the sons of Zadok are mentioned with an evident distinction in several of the later books of the Old Testament [2 Chron. xxxi. 10; Ezek. xl. 46, xlii. 19, xliv. 15, xlviii. 11]; and in a similar manner the connections of the high priest in the last age of the Jews are said to have been "the sect of the Sadducees" [Acts iv. 6, v. 17]. It was natural that a symbolical turn should be given to their name by any Jewish sect to which it belonged; and as "Zedek" signifies righteousness, the Sadducees were accustomed to explain their name as meaning "just men."

Although, however, the Sadducees were originally nothing more than a social class or a political party, they came to hold very distinctive theological opinions which marked them out as a religious sect in the time of our Lord and His Apostles. In a general way they were the opposite party to the Pharisees, and may be said to have represented the "liberal" or "free thought" school of Judaism as distinguished from the conservative and dogmatic school. Thus it is recorded of them that "the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit: but the Pharisees confess both" [Acts xxiii. 8]. As regards their denial of the resurrection, Josephus declares "their doctrine to be that souls perish with the body" [Joseph. Antiq. XVIII. i. 4]. It is clear that this denial was carried to its full extent, notwithstanding the apologies which are made on their behalf by modern writers; for in the very beginning of the ministry of the Apostles they were imprisoned by the priests and Sadducees solely on the ground that they "preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead" [Acts iv. 2]. St. Paul also used this unbelief of the Sadducees as a means of defending himself by enlisting the Pharisees on his side; for when he "perceived that the one part were Sadducees and the other Pharisees," he declared himself to be a Pharisee, and then exclaimed, "Of the hope, and resurrection of the dead, I am called in question!" [Acts xxiii. 6; cf. Matt. xxii. 23]. It is quite impossible to believe that the fearless Apostle would have endeavoured to save his life by misrepresenting the opinions of his opponents; and we must suppose his statement to imply the entire denial of a future resurrection by the Sadducees.

As they disbelieved the resurrection from the dead, so also the Sadducees denied the existence of angels or spirits. Modern apologists consider that all which they denied was the direct interposition of angels or spirits in human affairs, as in the case suggested by the scribes respecting St. Paul, "If a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him, let us not fight against God" [Acts xxiii. 9]. But the apology is grounded on mere conjecture, and is not borne out by the statement in the previous verse.

In agreement with this repudiation of established beliefs, the Sadducees took an exactly opposite line to the Pharisees respecting the interpretation of Holy Scripture, rejecting altogether the idea of an oral tradition transmitted from age to age, and accepting only the letter of the written law. Although there were doubtless many foolish traditions among those which were maintained by the Pharisees, it is easy to see that the profession of adhering only to the text of Holy Scripture, and the repudiation of traditionary interpretation, is in reality an assertion of an individual independence on the subject which is consistent with every degree of negative scepticism and positive error. Their principle also led the Sadducees into a hard and literal system of interpreting the law, so that customs, the force of which had passed away, were still looked upon as binding by them. Thus, when the Pharisees relaxed the rule of "an eye for an eye or a tooth for a tooth," and substituted pecuniary compensation to the injured person, the Sadducees insisted upon the exact fulfilment of the precept; and in a similar manner when the Pharisees considered the law satisfied if a widow rejected by a brother-in-law spat before his face, the Sadducees required her literally to spit in his face, not permitting the least relaxation of the Levitical rule. The same rigidity was maintained by them in all ritual matters, but especially in those connected with uncleanness, whether in priest or people. Thus, although the Sadducees were what we should now call freethinkers in respect to the supernaturalism of the Jewish faith, they were even more strict than the Pharisees in their maintenance of the ceremonial and ritual obligations of the Law.

Little is said respecting the errors of the Sadducees in the New Testament: the reason for which seems to have been that, although they were the strong political party of the time, they had no religious influence, the Pharisees being the theological and devotional leaders of the nation [Joseph. Antiq. XIII. x. 5]. The Sadducees rapidly disappeared from among the Jews after the destruction of Jerusalem, but they are in some degree represented in modern times by the Scripturists or KARAITES.

SAGARELLI. [APOSTOLICALS.]

SAINT SIMONIANS. [POSITIVISTS. SOCIALISTS.]

SAMOKRISCHTCHINA. A sect of Russian Dissenters whose name signifies "self-baptizers," and expresses the peculiarity by which they are distinguished from other Rascholniks.

SAMOSATENES. The followers of Paul, a native of Samosata on the Euphrates, but Bishop of Antioch [A.D. 260], who originated the heresy of Humanitarianism, which developed into Arianism. The Samosatenes were also called Paulianists.

This heretical bishop was notorious for loose opinions about morality, and was charged with conforming his life to these opinions [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 30]. He was also extravagantly addicted to luxury and state, and appears to have presented an early example of a kind of prelate very common on the Papal throne in later ages. Paul was intimately connected with Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra, and this association is asserted to have been one cause of his heretical opinions. Zenobia claimed to be descended from the Macedonian kings of Egypt, but the statement of Athanasius that she was a Jewess [Athanas. Ep. ad Solit. V. A. Opp. i. 857, Paris 1627] may be true of her maternal descent. Philaster states she was taught Judaism by Paul [Phil. Hæc. lxiv.], but the statement of Theodoret is more probable, namely, that she was of herself inclined to Judaism, and that Paul adopted the heresy of Artemon, which involved the denial of our Lord's divinity, to ingratiate himself with her [Theod. Hæc. fab. ii. 8]. Chrysostom's evidence is to the same effect [Chrysost. Hom. viii. in S. Johan.]. If this be true, there can be little doubt that Paul sanctioned the practice of circumcision, as Philaster states, and the testimony to his adoption of heresy through yielding to Judaism from worldly motives, is too strong to be explained away by the common charge of Judaizing brought against the whole class of Monarchians.

That Paul revived the heresy of Artemon is stated by Eusebius [Hist. Eccl. v. 28], by Augu-tine [Hær. xlv.], by Epiphanius [Hær. lxxv.], as well as by Theodoret. The Bishops of the Antiochene council write that Paul "abjured the mystery of our religion for the accursed heresy of Artemas. Let him write to Artemas, let the followers of Artemas hold communion with him" [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 30]. Again, Epiphanius, stating the principal Samosatene tenet to be that the Son does not exist as a distinct Person, but only in the one hypostasis of the Godhead [μὴ εἶναι τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐνυπόστατον, ἀλλὰ ἐν αὐτῷ τῷ Θεῷ], adds that this is the opinion of Sabellius, Novatus, Noëtus and some others, but that it is not held by the Samosatenes in the same manner as by them. The position of Paul then, among the heretics of the period, is this: he belonged to the Monarchian school, but had some peculiarities which kept him from joining either Theodotians or Sabellians.

[1] Paul held the oneness of God without distinction of Persons. He held, Epiphanius says, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, one God; and the Word and Spirit of God always in God, as in the heart of man is man's proper reason [ὥσπερ ἐν ἀνθρώπῳ καρδίᾳ ὁ ὕψος λόγος]. Hilary of Poitiers ascribes to him this primary Monarchian tenet in terms so closely resembling the language of the earlier Sabellians, that they are scarcely consistent with Epiphanius' assertion of a different mode of holding the tenet: and he adds that Paul used the word Homoousion to express this tenet: "Secundo quoque id addidistis, quod patres nostri, cum Paulus Samosateus hæreticus pronuntiatus est, etiam homoousion repudiaverint: quia per hanc unius essentiae nuncupationem solitarium atque unicum sibi esse Patrem et Filium prædicabat. Et hoc sane nunc quoque profanissimum Ecclesia recognoscit, Patrem et Filium in his nominum professionibus ad unionis ac singularis solitudinem negata personarum proprietate revocare." And again: "Quis secundum Samosateum, in Christo renatus, et Filium confessus ac Patrem, quod Christus in se sibi et Pater et Filius sit confitebitur?" [Hilary, de Synodis, 81, 82]. It will be seen, as we proceed, that Paul's doctrine regarding the Divine element in our Lord's Person could not be expressed in the terms "quod Christus in se sibi et Pater et Filius sit." Another passage in Hilary, which does not name the Samosatene heresy, appears exactly to express it: "Plures enim eludere dictum Apostolicum, quo ait Christum Dei sapientiam et Dei virtutem, his modis solent: quod in eo ex Virgine creando efficax Dei sapientia et virtus extiterit, et in natiuitate ejus divinæ prudentiæ et potestatis opus intelligatur; sitque in eo efficientia potius quam natura sapientiæ" [Hilary, Comm. in Matth. 9]. Here the Benedictine editor remarks, "Eam ipsam sententiam Paulo Samosateno attribuit Leontius" [de Sectis, Act. 3]. "Paulus Samosatenus subsistentem per se Dei sermonem in Christo fuisse non dicebat: sed volebat sermonem esse jussum quemdam ac mandatum, hoc est, Jussit Deus, ut ipse loquebatur, fieri per hominem illum quod volebat, idemque per illum faciebat." For Paul held that the Divine element in our Lord's Person was not the personal Word, nor (as the Patripassians said) the One undistinguished God, nor (as the later Sabellians said) a certain portion of the Divine Nature, or an impersonal emanation from that Nature, but only a heavenly Wisdom and Light (called the Logos) which dwelt, but not by a hypostatic union, in the Person of the man Jesus, and operated through Him. He confessed in Jesus, λόγον ἐνεργῆ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ καὶ σοφίαν [Athan. cont. Apollin. i. 20, ii. 3]; but he contended ἀλλήην εἶναι τὴν τοῦ λόγου οὐσίαν, καὶ ἄλλο τὸ ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς ἐν αὐτῷ φῶς, ἢ τὸ μὲν ἐν τῷ υἱῷ φῶς ἐν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα, αὐτὸς δὲ ξένος κατ' οὐσίαν ὡς κτίσμα [Athan. de Decret. S. N. 24]. Accordingly the Son was not, Paul said, before the Incarnation [Athan. cont. Arian. i. 25].

This follows directly from the primary tenet of Monarchianism, which the Samosatenes undoubtedly held. In seeming contradiction to it are the words of Paul in his disputation with Malchion, of which some fragments remain. Having said that the Logos associated itself with Jesus Christ, he proceeded: ἐκείνον δὲ τὸν λόγον ἐγέννησεν ὁ Θεὸς ἀνεπαρθένον [Routh, Reliq. iii. 300]. It must be remembered that these words were used in a dispute in which Paul was endeavouring to disguise his real opinions; and all testimony leads to the conclusion that the word ἐγέννησεν was used not of an eternal generation, nor of the begetting of the Son as a distinct person, but only of the production or calling into action that Wisdom which was to come upon Jesus Christ [see Routh's note on υἱὸς as = σοφία, iii. 350].

[2] As regards the human nature of our Lord, Paul held the miraculous birth, of a Virgin, by the power of the Holy Ghost [Athan. cont. Apollin. i. 20, ii. 3; Ep. Syn. Antioch. in Euseb. H. E. vii. 30]. Yet he is stated to have held Christ as to His nature a mere man [Dionys. of Alex. in Athan. de Synod. Macrosthiche, ibid. and Socrat. H. E. ii. 19]. How far below, and in what respects different from, the very man of the Catholic faith was the "mere man" of Paul's conception we do not exactly know.

[3] The Samosatenes held that Christ, not being God before the worlds, became God after His Incarnation by a certain promotion [μετὰ τὴν ἐνανθρώπησιν ἐκ προκοπῆς θεοποιεῖσθαι; Macros. as before]. The promotion is the association of the effective Word and Wisdom which was foreordained before the worlds, and from Nazareth manifested in actual being, that there might be one God over all, the Father [Athan. cont. Apollin. ii. 3].

Two councils certainly, perhaps three, were held at Antioch concerning this heresy. The first was in A.D. 264. Firmilian of Caesarea in Cappadocia appears to have presided. Dionysius of Alexandria was unable to attend on account of infirmity. He wrote a letter to the council on the matter in hand. At this council Paul's opinions were condemned, but no sentence of deposition was passed, Firmilian trusting to the promises of Paul, and hoping that the matter might be fittingly settled, and scandal avoided.

It is stated that Firmilian visited Antioch twice; and as he died before the council which passed the sentence of deposition, it is probable that there was an intermediate council.¹ The heresy breaking out afresh, another council was held in A.D. 269 [or 270]: It was attended, Eusebius says, by an almost infinite number of bishops; Athanasius reckons seventy [de Synod.]. Basil the Deacon, in the *Libellus Precum*² presented to the emperors against Nestorius, reckons a hundred and eighty. A letter was sent to Paul by six bishops, four of whom were at the former council, and all at the last council, stating the Catholic faith, and inquiring whether Paul so held and taught. This was probably one of the measures taken in the earlier stage of the council referred to by Theodoret [Hær. fab. ii. 8], who names attempts to heal the disease by writings [Routh, Rel. Sac. iii. 289, and note, 320]. These letters and long preliminary discussions being ineffectual, a formal disputation was held between Paul and a practised theologian Malchion; Paul's heresy was exposed, and sentence of deposition was passed. By the favour of Zenobia, Paul continued to hold his church and palace, but was dispossessed, A.D. 272, on appeal to Aurelian after Zenobia's defeat [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 27-30; Theod. Hær. fab. ii. 8].

It has been already noticed that Paul used the word Homoousion in expressing his tenets, and the passage of Hilary then quoted shews that the Antiochene Fathers consequently rejected the word. On this point, which belongs rather to the history of the adoption of the word at Nicæa, see Routh, Rel. Sac. iii. 362, and article ARIANS. From this time the Samosatenes, it may be concluded, formed a heretical sect. For at Nicæa their baptism was disallowed [can. xix.]. From this canon Augustine argues that they had renounced the Catholic form of baptism [Hær. xlv.], and he is followed by some modern writers. But Athanasius' testimony is clear to their retention of the true form, τὰ ὀνόματα λέγοντες οὐδὲν ἡττόν εἰσιν αἰρετικοί [Athan. cont. Arian. ii. 43]. The words were not used in the Catholic sense, and the rule of the first provincial synod of Arles [can. 8] did not prevail. The Nicene canon refers to an earlier decision, which is probably the Apostolic Canon xvi. [xlvii. Brun's ed.]

That the Samosatene heresy was not only implicitly condemned by the declaration of the true faith at Nicæa, but was explicitly taken into consideration, is also shewn by the Nicene Creed being quoted at the Council of Ephesus,³ A.D. 431, in the following terms: "Concerning the Incarnation of the Word of God, the Son of the Father, a definition of the bishops assembled in synod at Nicæa, and a declaration of that synod against Paul of Samosata" [Valesius, note d on Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 30, p. 318]. It is sufficient to notice that the heresy of Paul was condemned by the Semi-Arians at the second Council of Sirmium, A.D. 351 [al. 357]. The Samosatenes, called Pauliani, are specified in the Constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian, A.D. 428, against heretical conventicles, for restoring churches to the Catholics, and imposing certain civil disqualifications [Cod. Theod. xvi. v. 65].

SAMOSTRIGOLSCHTSCHINA. A sect of Russian Dissenters, whose name signifies "self-ordiners," and expresses the peculiarity by which they are distinguished from other Rascholniks.

SAMPSÆANS. The Sampsæans cannot properly be called either a Jewish or a Christian sect. They lay outside of Judaism, bordering upon it however on the side of the Essenes, from whom they appear to have separated. From the Essenes they differed in practising a more clearly defined worship of the sun. Their name, derived from the Hebrew Schemesch, implies this: Σαμψαῖοι γὰρ ἐρμηνεύονται Ἡλιακοί [Epiph. Hær. liii.]. Ezekiel was shewn in vision the worship of the sun among the abominations of Israel [viii. 16], but there is no proof that the practice was continued uninterruptedly from that time. It is more probable that a reverence, or some degree of adoration, of the sun was introduced with other Eastern elements into Essenism, and passed into worship in the coarser and more material system of the Sampsæans. But what their priesthood was, the point in which was the chief peculiarity of the Essenes, is not told. They were Hemero-baptists, and venerated almost to deifying the element of water. From Christianity they borrowed nothing more than the Name of Christ, which name they gave to a created angel, who formed at first the body of Adam, and resumes it at pleasure. He is accompanied, they supposed, by his sister, the Spirit, in female form. The particular form in which they expressed the notion, widely spread in the East, of the femininity of the Spirit was taken from the Book Elchasai, which they received.

Thus Epiphanius represents the relics of the Ossenes to have revolted from Judaism, and to have attached themselves to the Sampsæans, and so to have joined the Ebionites [Hær. xx. s. f.]. He identifies indeed the Sampsæans and the Elchasaites. But the reception of the Book Elchasai so altered the character of the sect that it is better to keep the names distinct, and to consider the Sampsæans as renegade Jews, who had adopted a considerable portion of nature-worship, and some features of the Iranic doctrine of angels, which led them to receive the revelation Elchasai, and to pass into a distinct heresy. The Sampsæans were found in Moabitis, Ituræa, and Nabathæa. [Epiph. Hær. liii. Scaliger, Elench. Tri-hær. Capp. i. xxvii.].

SANDEMANIANS. A name by which the sect of the GLASSITES is more generally known in England than by their original appellation. Robert Sandeman [1718-1771], the son-in-law of John Glass, added to the original teaching of the founder of the sect, by maintaining, in opposition to Calvinistic views, that faith is a simple assent to the Divine testimony concerning Jesus Christ, differing in no way in its own character from belief in any common human testimony. Sandeman, after having been engaged in controversy with James Hervey, and forming a congregation in London in 1762, removed to America, where he died. The sect never attracted any large number of followers; but it still exists as an insignificant body, possessing at the census of 1851 six places of worship in England (of which one is in London), with an aggregate attendance of about 750 worshippers, and the same number in Scotland, with an aggregate attendance of about 1000. The late eminent chemist, Michael Faraday, conferred some lustre on the London congregation by officiating as one of its elders. They observe various primitive practices with great strictness: e.g. weekly administration of the Lord's Supper, with a weekly offertory; love-feasts, i.e. the dining together between morning and afternoon services; the kiss of charity at the admission of a new member, and at other times; washing each other's feet as an occasional work of mercy; abstinence from things strangled and from blood; community of goods, in so far as that they consider the whole of their property liable for calls on behalf of the Church and the poor, and condemn the storing up of money for future and uncertain use. They consider all such amusements unlawful as are connected with games of chance, believing that the lot is a sacred thing. The members pray in turns, and the elders preach. Perfect unanimity is secured in all proceedings by the simple expedient of expelling any one who obstinately differs in opinion from the majority. They do not hold communion with any other denominations.

[Wilson's Hist. of the Dissenting Churches in London. Ritchie's Religious Life in London. Jas. Morison's New Theological Dictionary.]

SARIGANI. Asseman mentions an Arabian sect of this name which he thinks may have been a branch of the MENDÆANS. They held the opinions of Paul of Samosata and of Arius, but were converted and admitted to Catholic communion by Maranames, Metropolitan of Adjabus, in the year 760. Some, however, were found a hundred years later in Babylon.

SATANISTS. A name sometimes given to the EUCHITES on account of the theory which they are alleged to have held that the power of Satan over men makes it right for them to pray to him that he will not exercise it to their harm [Epiphan. Hær. lxxx.]. This opinion seems to be the same as that on which the worship of the YEZEDEES is grounded.

SATANNIANI. Heretics of this name are mentioned by the author of Prædestinatus as having derived their name from Satanianus, and as maintaining the opinion that the resurrection of the dead will be a restoration of bodies and souls to exactly the same condition in which they exist during the present life. This seems to be the same heresy with that which is numbered as the eightieth by Philaster, and the sixty-seventh by Augustine, and to whose adherents the name ÆTERNALES is given by Danaeus in his commentary on St. Augustine's tract on heresies.

SATURNINIANS. An early sect of Syrian Gnostics, appearing about the reign of Hadrian [A.D. 117-138], and taking their name from Saturninus, or Saturnilus (as he is called by Justin Martyr, Epiphanius, and Theodoret), a native of Antioch in Syria, and a disciple of Menander.

All that is known about the theories of Saturninus is contained in the work of Irenæus against heresies. In this he states that Saturninus, like Menander, set forth that there is one Supreme Unknown, the Father [Πατὴρ ἄγνωστος], from whom angels, archangels, powers, and potentates derived their being. By seven of these angels, removed far from the Supreme, the world was created; and when, during their work of creation, a bright image burst forth below the presence of the Supreme, which they could not retain in the lower world, they said among themselves, "Let us make man after our image and likeness." Man was accordingly made by the angels, but they had not power to make him an erect being, and so he continued to crawl upon the earth like a worm until the Supreme sent forth a spark of life, which gave him an erect posture, compacted his joints, and made him to live. This spark of life returns at the death of man to the Fountain of Life, from which it was derived, while the body decays into its original elements [Iren. adv. Hæres. i. 24]. A precisely similar account of the heresy is given by Tertullian in his treatise on the soul [Tertull. de Anim. xxiii.], and what later heresiologists record is substantially taken from Irenæus. The latter, however, goes on to mention opinions held by Saturninus, of which Tertullian says nothing. Thus he laid it down as a truth that the Saviour was without birth, without body, without figure, and only in appearance a man, not in reality, thus indicating that Saturninus had adopted the heresy of Cerinthus. He also maintained the notion of a Demiurge, who was the God of the Jews, and whom Christ came to destroy. The existence of good and evil men he accounted for by affirming that they were originally created of two kinds, the one good, whom Christ came to save, the other wicked, whom the devils succour, and whom Christ will destroy. Theodoret states that Saturninus was the first who taught that marriage and the propagation of the human race are the work of Satan [Theodor. Hæret. fab. i. 3], and that he held such an opinion is also stated by Irenæus. The latter also speaks of him as introducing a false asceticism, for "many of those who belong to his school abstain from animal food, and draw away multitudes by a feigned temperance of this kind;" from which it would seem that the Encratites may have had their origin among the Saturninians.

As these heretics are not mentioned by St. Clement of Alexandria, it is probable that they were not much known out of Syria. So little also is otherwise known of their history, that it may be concluded they represent a passing and local phase of that rapidly developing Gnosticism by which the Syrian Church was soon afterwards overrun.

SAXON CONFESSION. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

SCEPTICS. Scepticism is the converse of dogmatism, of which it is the reaction. It is doubt attaching itself to every object of thought with the method of science. To doubt is a necessary element in the investigation of truth, for thus alone can error be eliminated. But scepticism is the abuse of doubt, as fanaticism is the abuse of faith, or sophistry of dialectics. The human mind is sure to avenge itself on the spirit of dogmatism by a revolution in the opposite direction. Claiming liberty from prescription, it readily allows itself to be enthralled under a negative system, which ignores positive teaching, and in which nothing is true. Greece, the cradle of philosophy, gave birth also to scepticism. The Sophists had sown it broadcast when Socrates and Plato appeared on the scene. There was a vein of scepticism in the Socratic dictum, "One only thing I know, that I know nothing." Gorgias and Protagoras were followed in due course by the scepticism of Pyrrho [b. 380 B.C. d. 288; Diog. Laert. ix. 12; Cic. de Or. iii. 17; A. Gell. xi. 5] and the school of Megara. When the dogmatic teaching of Plato was superseded by that of Epicurus and the Porch, that side of his system alone was exhibited, on which the impossibility of demonstration being conceded, probabilities are discussed. Everything was open to argument; philosophy was only regarded as a useful mean for sharpening the wits, and as having little to do with objective truth; it was no longer a body of doctrine. Such was the New Academy under Arcesilas [B.C. 318], which resulted from the contests between the Stoical and Epicurean schools. Without being positively sceptical, it gave a first impulse to the philosophy of doubt¹ by denying the existence of any positive criterion of truth. Carneades followed him [of Cyrene, d. B.C. 130], and in antagonism with the Stoic Chrysippus, denied the objective reality of all knowledge whatever. There was nothing more substantial than probability; and Platonic ethics were toned down into duties based upon motives of prudence and convenience. The principles of the New Academy led naturally to a revival of Pyrrhonism by Ænesidemus of Alexandria, and his more methodical scepticism in the first century; a system of universal doubt closely described by Sextus Empiricus, the last of his school in the commencement of the third century. Ænesidemus was the precursor of modern scepticism in two respects. As denying the possible existence of any criterion of truth, he foreshadowed Kant. As uprooting the entire structure of metaphysics, by annihilating the notion of causation on which it is based, he indicated Hume [Hume, Essays and Treatises, vii. pt. 2]. Demonstration of any kind ceased to be possible; every effort of human thought was problematical, and the solid foundation of morals was broken up. Modern scepticism is built up on these lines that were laid down in the earlier days of Christianity. If Kant, as regards speculative reason, was sceptical, so too was Ænesidemus. If the "Critique of Pure Reason" distinguishes between subjective and objective elements of knowledge, in Kantian phrase, φαινόμενα and νοούμενα, the terms are borrowed from the Alexandrian; if Kant, in a spirit of scepticism, buoyed out the intricate channel of the criterion of truth, Ænesidemus had already taken the soundings; if the basis of the earlier scepticism was laid in the antagonisms of speculative reason, as "thesis" and "antithesis," they were revived in the "antinomies" of Kant. But many intermediate steps prepared the way for the "Critique of Pure Reason." On the revival of free thought in philosophy, the Cartesian system was built upon universal doubting as a reaction on the dogmatism of the schools. Then came a contest of scepticism, in which Hobbes and Gassendi from one end of the lists challenged Descartes, Malebranche, and Spinoza on the other; and from that day to this scepticism has been mixed up with the philosophical spirit [Buckle, Civ. in Engl. I. vii. viii.]. Thus with Locke as with Pascal, to cast aside philosophy was truly to philosophize. "Se moquer de la philosophie c'est vraiment philosopher" [Pascal, Pens. vii. 34].

France, England, and Germany have each had their school of Scepticism. Huet, educated by the Jesuits at Paris, and, though not himself a Jesuit, completely saturated with the atmosphere of the College ("il avait pris l'air de la maison"); Montaigne, whom a gentleman, said Hallam, "is ashamed not to have read, yet of whom he is heartily ashamed while reading;" the sceptical buffoon, the Abbé Charron, are representative men of the early Scepticism of France. Pascal, the scourge of the Jesuits, openly professed the sceptical no-creed. "Pyrrhonism," he said, "is the true thing; your philosophy is not worth an hour's trouble." In his letters he is the Jansenical churchman, in his "Thoughts" he takes a wider cast, and comes out as the thorough Pyrrhonist. It is necessary that the whole man should stand revealed. Hate, he said, with Hobbes, and not love is the master principle of life: "Tous les hommes se haïssent l'un et l'autre." The first principles of justice were denied by him; "that which is established alone is just" [Pensées, vi. 5, 6]. "Justice and injustice change their quality in changing climate" [iii. 8]. Custom was his only guide, to be followed simply because it is custom, and not because it is either reasonable or just [v. 40, x. 14]. His deduction of faith from custom is particularly odious [Pensées, x. 1]. Accident he deemed to be the arbitress of all. When the fate of the world trembled in the balance, it was determined by Cleopatra's profile.

When Cromwell had overthrown the church, demolished the reigning dynasty, and established his own, all was reversed again by a grain of grit in the ureter: "ee petit gravier s'étant mis la, il est mort, sa famille abaissée; tout est en paix, et le roi rétabli" [iii. 7]. Might is better than right; for right is subject to dispute, might is indisputable [vi. 7, 50]; and the memorable apophthegm, "la propriété c'est la vol," is only a more advanced enunciation of Pascal's doctrine, "sans doute l'égalité des biens est juste" [vi. 7]. For the à priori demonstrations of the Divine existence given by Anselm and Descartes he substituted an argument scarce worthy of the name from a "calculus of probabilities," "jouant Dieu a eroix et a pile," as it has been said [see Pensées, x. 2, and App. ed. Huet, p. 133, x. 1]. Life is a game, he said, in which he who lives as a Christian stakes his wager on the existence of God and Paradise; he who lives as an atheist speculates on annihilation. The Christian surrenders his life, but with the chance of eternal joy; he cannot lose, he may gain. The atheist plays for extinction; but there is the chance against him of an eternity of woe. He cannot gain, he may lose. Elsewhere he seriously doubts whether life is not a dream; if one-half of our existence is spent in sleep, in which consciousness is only an illusion, why should the other half be more real, from whence perhaps we wake when we deem that we fall asleep [Pensées, viii. 1]. Pascal was a complete "bifrons," assuming a high religious tone in his letters when the Jesuits were to be discomfited; but in his "Thoughts" we have the man himself. The mask is thrown aside. The juxtaposition of Mysticism with his sceptical principles [MYSTICS] completed the inconsistency of his character.¹

Bayle was the scholastical sceptic; always undecided and unstable as water, he was the very incarnation of doubt. The son of a Protestant minister, he joined the Church of Rome only to desert it again, and die Protestant. "I am a Protestant," he said, "in the fullest meaning of the term, for from my inmost soul I protest against everything that has been ever said or ever done." Manicheism obtained from him a warmer advocacy than Catholicism. Voltaire, himself a witty development of Bayle, termed him the Avocat-Général of Scepticism. Feuerbach, the most virulent enemy of Christianity in modern days, claims the kindred sympathies of Bayle [P. Bayle, Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte d. Philos. 1848].

England, in the latter half of the seventeenth century, began to shew front against the metaphysics and natural philosophy of Aristotle. Cartesian doubt was asserted as the only safe guide to the truth. In this spirit Glanville wrote his treatise, "On the Vanity of Dogmatizing" [A.D. 1661]; a second edition of which [A.D. 1665] received the more appropriate name of "Scep sis Scientifica." Shortly before the middle of the next century the older form of Deism developed by Toland, Chubb, and Tindal passed on into the scepticism of the younger Dodwell and Hume; the former of whom published [A.D. 1742] anonymously his "Christianity not founded on Argument; and the true Principle of Gospel Evidence assigned." The treatise is in the form of a letter to a young man at Oxford, and lays down as a necessary principle that the inquiry after truth must involve a renunciation of every prejudice and preconceived opinion instilled by education and early association; to be replaced by investigation and research conducted in a spirit of doubt. The term "rational faith," he says, involves a contradiction, and he promises his friend, that if he sets about "proving all things" he is sure to end in "holding fast" nothing. The treatise is headed with the text, "I have believed, therefore will I speak," and concludes with the words of King Solomon, "My son, trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not to thine own understanding" [Prov. iii. 5]. The writer's object is to shew that Reason is unable to lead the soul to Faith; and that there is an "irreconcilable repugnancy in their natures betwixt reason and belief" [p. 86]; he was perfectly aware to which side the freethinking spirit of the age would incline. Throughout he takes faith to mean a bare belief, such as the lost spirits may have; he sets out of the account the love that is its life, quickening faith from a cold intellectual condition to be the keen and faithful guide of everyday life, and raising it from a speculative to an eminently practical virtue. Leland's "Remarks on a late Pamphlet" appeared [A.D. 1743], and in the same year Chubb mentioned it in the preface to his "Enquiry concerning Redemption;" but only to condemn it, inasmuch as its principles were as adverse to Deism as they were to sound faith. Randolph, afterwards Bishop of London, answered it in "The Oxford Young Gentleman's Reply" [A.D. 1743], and "The Christian's faith a Rational Assent" [A.D. 1744]. At a later date Benson found it necessary to put forth another answer to it, entitled "The Reasonableness of the Christian Religion" [A.D. 1762]. Twenty years had not consigned to oblivion the obnoxious treatise.

David Hume, born at Edinburgh A.D. 1711, was educated at Rheims and at the Jesuit establishment La Flèche, in the department of Marne et Loire. He died A.D. 1776. His philosophical publications gave him the entrée of Baron Holbach's mansion at Paris. On his observing that he had never met with a thoroughgoing atheist, "You have been singularly unfortunate," was the reply, "but there are seventeen now at table with you." Yet there was nothing atheistical in his scepticism; he speaks at times as though he was scarcely sincere; and as though his scepticism was but an infinitely diluted dogmatism;² a question merely of graduated certitude. Locke affirmed that experience is the sole basis of all our knowledge; Berkeley, that our only experience of the external world is by perception; and that matter is apparent only and not real. Hume carried the same reasoning to a further point, and while he fully affirmed the sensualism of Locke, he held that not only matter but mind also is non-existent. If the occult substratum matter, whereby men arbitrarily account for material phenomena, is non-existent, because it is not founded on experience; so also, as Hume argued, we must deny the occult substratum mind to be the basis of mental phenomena, as being equally without our experience. If substance conveying impressions is mere inference, so likewise substance in which these impressions are conveyed is mere inference. Neither actively nor passively, neither objectively nor subjectively, has substance any real existence. If that which men call matter is nothing else than a conglomerate of impressions, mind is but a series of impressions and ideas; it is no substantial entity. Locke had already led the way in saying that we only know mind in its manifestation, we cannot know it in itself as the source of mental phenomena.¹ But all such reasonings are thoroughly unreal; nature is more logical than metaphysics; belief in the external world is inseparable from our own self-consciousness, as Hume in fact confessed. Can there then be any greater waste of time and thought than in the spinning of such unprofitable theories, which even the exponent must fain confess begin and end in "nil." In a religious point of view also, the universality of Christian belief is as convincing as the self-proving substance of matter is in physics. Faith is stronger than doubt; and the mind, when assailed by the sceptic's objection to miracles,² as being contrary to experience, is inherently convinced that He Who gave nature her laws can control them according to His own good pleasure, and that here the analogy of nature fails as a guide. Experience, that Bishop Butler has very justly termed "the guide of life," replaces in Hume's theory the relation of cause and effect. There is no such thing as causation with him; phenomena succeed each other in certain different sequences, and experience enables us to connect together these, under like conditions, unvarying sequences; but the antecedent has no causative power, and the consequent phenomenon is in no way effectuated by it; events follow each other, but no tie subsists between them. Experience is the only foundation of knowledge, and it tells us nothing of a particular providence or of a future state of rewards and punishments. If the teaching of natural religion is called into doubt, à fortiori revealed religion is discredited by the sceptic. Experience, according to Hume, declares miracles to be incredible, and the Christian faith, he asserts, to be wholly based on miracles. But this is not a correct statement. However heartily faith accepts the Gospel account in its plain literal meaning, it does so because it can trace in it the operation of Almighty Goodness and Wisdom. The Jews ascribed the Saviour's miracles to Beelzebub, because they were blind to the holiness of the cause in which they were wrought. We feel and know the holiness of the Christian Law, and this alone would compel us to have unfeigned faith in its miracles. They are not the Christian miracles then that prove to us the truth of Christian doctrine, whatever may have been their effect on the men who witnessed them, but the holiness and purity of that doctrine convince us of its divine origin; and the Gospel being the Word of God, from beginning to end it is the word of truth. Bishop Butler has shewn that there is no presumption from the analogy of nature against the credibility of miracles [ii. 2]. The particular interpositions of the will and power of God, that constitute what we call miraculous occurrences, for all we know may be the normal condition of the Divine government in other worlds as well as in this. Such manifestations of power, and the ordinary laws of nature of which we are observant, may be resolvable into one general principle, as the one law of gravitation that keeps sweet the flowing stream, maintains the planets also true to their orbits. The laws that bind nature in one planet extend their influence far beyond; like comets in the material world, they may have an eccentric action, yet like them they may be instances of God's orderly disposition; they may have a periodicity of effectuation if not of time, that as yet evades our faculty of perception. As light and gravitation are common to the whole planetary system, so may the miraculous display of divine power, under particular contingencies, be co-extensive with the creation that was first called into being by miracle. We might with equal reason deny cometary law because we cannot in every case calculate its necessary elements, as refuse belief to special manifestations of Divine power because they are contrary to daily experience; whereas their laws of action may embrace in their sweep not merely our own world but the universe.

Further, a miracle in its action cannot be called a violation of the laws of nature, as Hume imagined; "a miracle may be accurately defined a transgression of a law of nature by the particular volition of the Deity or by the interposal of some invisible agent." It is rather an introduction of a special cause [Dean Mansel on Miracles, s. 14] to be followed by its own proper effect, as shadow follows substance. As in this world one law often holds another in check and suspends its action, so the laws of terrestrial nature may be subject to the wider sway of cosmic laws. The Saviour's glorified appearance on the Mount of Transfiguration; His appearance in the midst of the disciples when the doors were shut; His walking on the waves, though facts that are contrary to our experience, and therefore termed by us miraculous, may have been, in strict obedience to a yet more universal law, anticipative of the laws that shall determine the second coming of the Glorified in the clouds of heaven. We know nothing of the laws of nature beyond those that control the speck of creation that we inhabit; and we have but a skin-deep knowledge of even those laws; clever juggling deludes our senses with mockeries that seem most real; may it not also be the case that facts, seemingly a "transgression of the laws of nature," are in strict obedience to those laws in their most universal operation.¹ Scepticism may here be met with its own weapons. We are ignorant, says the sceptic, therefore our only true wisdom is to doubt where experience is no guide. But that experience itself is incomplete, therefore we may rationally call in question its teaching. Moral reasonings are our better and safer guide. God is true and cannot deceive; let us endeavour to hear what He has said, and hearing to obey.

But he who has recast the whole plan of scepticism and given it an entirely new force is Kant. Grave and severe spirit, disdaining rhetoric and employing no other weapons than analysis and dialectics, Kant has devised the most damaging impeachment against all preceding speculative reasoning, and reduced doubt into a science. Happily, even in him, there is sufficient inconsistency to shew that the no-creed of doubt is wholly unable to satisfy the reasoning judgment. His scepticism, of a more transcendental cast than that of the sunshiny Montaigne or of the melancholy Pascal, involves sceptical principles, but he is always loyal to the instincts of truth and duty. His large soul was far superior to ordinary scepticism, and discarded principally all antecedent methods of working out the truth. Living in a century of change, disregard for every antecedent system was his natural inheritance. He imbibed his first notions from Hume, as he himself declares. Hume's scepticism, however, exhibited to him the weak points of metaphysical and philosophical reasoning, and its many arbitrary assumptions; though his own metaphysical theories are at times as inconsequent as those of his predecessors. He was the greatest innovator in such reasoning; the last metaphysician is usually the most original. In mathematical science every subsequent addition enriches; in metaphysical systems the last is more or less subversive of its predecessors. Thus Kant gained nothing from Aristotle or Descartes, Spinoza and Leibnitz, and not much from his more immediate master Hume; he has superseded theirs by a newer system; he destroys all antecedent grounds of metaphysical faith with a remorseless logic and a hardy scepticism, that he may build up again upon surer principles. Moral consciousness and the notion of duty in free agents are his great remedial mean.

The nature and bearing of his scepticism is this. In his "Critique of Pure Reason" he discards the objective, or that which is external to the mind, and occupies himself only with the subjective, or that which pertains strictly to and is inherent in the thinking mind. Confining himself then to the subjective, he examines the human intellect analytically, and reducing the laws that govern thought to a certain number of elementary conceptions, definitely classed, he shews that these conceptions have only a relative value; that they are unable to teach anything with respect to the essence of things; and that their whole practical utility consists in arranging the data of experience, and in reducing the various objects of human knowledge to a principle of unity by the process of generalization. Next, he submits the results of his analysis to a searching dialectical test; he takes the three main objects of metaphysical speculation, the soul of man, the external world, and God, and shews that there is no single dogmatic assertion with respect to the essence of the soul, the constitution of the universe, and the Being of the Deity, that may not be impugned as either resting on false reasoning or involving some "antinomy," or arbitrarily substantiating some abstraction.

Kant in his analysis resolves the elements of human knowledge under the three heads of Sensation, Intellect, and Reason. Intuition is the work of Sensation. Observation of the relations of things, and judgment, are of the province of Intellect. To combine the elements of judgment, and to connect consequences with their antecedents, is the work of Reason. Reason then involves the faculty of generalizing, and of setting out the relation that subsists between the particular and the universal. This implies the notion of one ultimate general principle, which is the condition of all else, and is itself the unconditioned. To argue from this idea to the nature of beings universal, is, as Kant says, a fruitful source of illusion, of which he professes to dispose, and by laying bare its psychological sources, to give the natural history of human error.

His principle of pure reason is this: the conditioned, as in the external world, being given, the conditions that it involves are also given, and hence by elimination the unconditioned. Reason, he says, conceives in self-consciousness an absolutely subjective Being; no attribute of any other subject; the thinking soul. It ascends from one object to another in the world of sense until it arrives at the conception of the remote cause of the universe, that comprehends all in one condition of existence, the unity of God. These three ideas, the soul, the universe, the Deity, cannot be demonstrated, since they are general truths, such as lie at the root of all demonstration. They cannot be realized in the intellect since they represent that which is beyond all possible experience. They have therefore a purely subjective value; they are ideas that extend not the domain of human knowledge, rather they circumscribe and limit it. Here metaphysical science attempts more than it can perform. Given the absolutely simple conception of our thinking being, it declares that being to be absolutely simple; which is inconsequent. Given a retrogressive series of phenomena, the idea of their first originating impulse is conceived, and each generalization has its contradictory antagonism or antinomy. Now, from the summed conditions of objectivity, metaphysical science concludes that there is a Being of beings, as the sole condition of the possibility, or ultimate reason of things; howbeit that such a Being is absolutely unknown to us. It transforms that existence, which is ideal, into real existence, and makes it the foundation of every other real existence. But the act is arbitrary, and therefore inconsequent. This is the current of Kant's scepticism; under which the soul, the world, the Deity, are made to crumble away "like the baseless fabric of a vision;" and the three sciences, based upon metaphysics, that is, rational psychology, rational cosmology and rational theology, are shaken to their foundation.

Further, it being a fundamental principle of reason that the conditioned or relative being given, the existence of the entire series of the relatively conditioned is involved, as also the existence of the unconditioned and absolute, Kant educes from thence his four mutually neutralizing antitheses or "antinomies."

If the world be considered under the categories of quantity and quality, it may with equal reason be affirmed to be either limited or boundless in extension and duration; in other words, finite or infinite. It may be formed of indivisible atoms; or it may be infinitely divisible. It is a mathematical antinomy. Or under the conditions of relation and mode, effects may be either referred back to a first cause, free and intelligent, or considered as an endless chain of results connected together by a blind necessity. Who is to say that Moses is right and Epicurus wrong? All such theorizing is purely arbitrary. It is a dynamical antinomy. Of these Kant considers the mathematical antinomy to be absolutely insoluble. For the dynamical antinomy a solution is possible, and he offers to work it out; involving the free agency of Man, the existence of the Deity, morality, and religion.

The idea of God as the Being of all beings is the highest conception of reason, and the most necessary; since by means of this idea human knowledge acquires unity, and the synthetic process is completed. But nothing more results from this than a Supreme Ideal, and not the reality of supreme existence. The intellect refuses its allegiance to an ideal relative existence; hence it transforms the ideal into a subjective reality; the act again being purely arbitrary.

In the same dogmatic way rational theology sets forth the existence of God in three arguments, each of which involves its own neutralizing antinomy: the argument from natural religion; the argument from design, or "a contingentia mundi;" and the ontological argument. Natural theology, he says, can teach nothing by its application of final causes with respect to the existence of the Perfect, the Absolute; because they are of wholly alien essence. The argument "a contingentia" he merges in the ontological, and directs the whole force of his reasoning against the metaphysical proof of the Divine existence, first elaborated by Anselm and adopted by Descartes. The dialectic reasoning of the schoolman and philosopher may be demolished; but the truth that they exhibit remains unaltered. Men will always continue to have faith in God as the most sacred instinct of the soul. So far religious philosophy has encountered only an enemy in Kant throughout the speculative section of his "Critique of Pure Reason." He has met metaphysicians with their own weapons, and shews practically by his own example that their principles lead to scepticism.

In the practical portion of his Critique he dogmatizes as the moralist, and develops the reasoning that leads back to the solid ground of faith in God. The relative perceptions of the intellect do not exhaust the capabilities of human consciousness; there are other à priori elements to be taken into the account on the practical side; such as moral duty, freedom. We have here a ground of faith that speculative research could never create. It indicates the old à priori method of Plato, arguing to the existence of Supreme Goodness and Beauty and Truth from those traces of the beautiful and good and true that exist within the soul of man. The metaphysician fails to carry out the proof of that existence to a favourable result; it leads only to a "non liquet;" to the moralist the sense of moral duty and freedom is as the clue that enables him to unravel the problem. Thus the practical "Critique of Pure Reason" supplements the speculative section; but there is a want of unity; the two can scarcely be worked up into one harmonious whole. His method of demonstration, in which he stands forth as the champion of philosophical and theological Rationalism, is in merest rough outline briefly this—

It is assumed as an ultimate fact that there is a moral law having a true relation to the conscience and the will, but needing no external reality to render it absolute. Will is the power of acting according to the prescription of such law; and will thus defined is one with practical reason, which is in tanto a law-inculcating principle; moral law has not its rise in moral sense, but vice versa, moral sense is a result of this innate law of action. Pure reason also of necessity includes the notion of moral freedom; which shews its power negatively in its independence of every object of desire, and positively in its antinomy. It is a reality, inasmuch as moral law is a reality. If I ought, then I can. If I have obligations, I am free to discharge them. Freedom therefore is an à priori condition of the moral law. Kant, then, starting with the fundamental conception of practical reason, or sense of moral duty, proposes to shew that such conception has an objectivity that no conception of speculative reason can pretend to have, for it prescribes immediately and absolutely that which ought to be done, and is obligatory on every reasonable being; it imparts also its own objective character to various other conceptions, (which is one of Kant's most strange paradoxes,) and in an immediate sense to that of freedom, which is inseparably bound up with the notion of practical reason; these two therefore, as one complex conception, manifest the existence of being "per se," "Ding an sich," or νοούμενον, for they exhibit the idea of free and moral being, bound by the obligation of duty, and aspiring to the noblest end of freedom, the attainment of supreme good. We have no consciousness, he argues, of our freedom of will. It is free not as a result, but as an à priori condition. It is an ideal that becomes realized by the objective constitution of moral duty.

This theory of freedom of will and moral obligation seems only to have been devised to cover the danger to which ethics had been exposed by his attempted demolition of the ontological argument of Anselm and Descartes. In matters of fact and experience, all with him is one long chain of necessary action; each result or phenomenon is determined by its antecedent, leaving no room for the idea of freedom. But in matters of duty each result or phenomenon, being a reasonable action, has its necessary relation with a freely moving will. This freedom having an objective character, is exoteric, and is transferred to the ideal world, and no antinomy results between the subjective thought and the objective freedom. It is by these complications that Kant arrives at the first postulate of "practical reason," the real existence of freedom of will; and having rescued morality from his sceptical wreck, he endeavours next to make a salvage of religion.

What then is the end for which man is striving, with the moral law for his principle and free will as its complement? Is virtue to be its own present reward, as the Stoics held, and there an end? or is an Epicurean happiness resulting from obedience to that law to be the object of aspiration? Neither one nor the other by itself; but supreme good is the harmonic mean between the two, though it cannot be realized in our present condition; virtue, in time, must still be imperfect. One of two things therefore must be the truth. Either the idea is a fallacy, or after this life is ended there must be some future state of indefinite perfectibility. A similar result is worked out with relation to happiness, as the end of human endeavour. Perfect happiness is unattainable on earth, and this goes to confirm the proof of a future state. But, further, the relation of virtue and happiness is in no sense dependent upon our will; and this relation cannot be established by anything short of a will more mighty than the universe, holding in its hand the destiny of man and of nature. If, therefore, the supreme good which practical reason teaches us to be the necessary object of our will, implies a primal supreme good from whence it derives its being, it follows that the existence of a Divine Being is also proved. Thus the objective reality of immortality and God are linked with that of freedom, which is itself an à priori objective condition of moral law of which we have immediate cognizance, and from which it is inseparable; and if Kant, on the speculative side of his Critic, is a sceptic, on the moral or practical side he is at least a Theist. He formulated his system in the apophthegm: "Act in all matters of duty in such a way as that the motive of thine action might be raised to the dignity of a universal principle of moral law."

Fichte during the lifetime of Kant developed these ideas in the direction of Deism, and gave a greater consistency and unity to the system. He discarded the limping antagonisms of the speculative and the practical conceptions of reason, with respect to the Divine existence, as anomalous; and replaced the idea of a lawgiving Deity, which he found to be arbitrary and anthropomorphic, with an order flowing necessarily from the nature of things, and issuing in the harmony of goodness and virtue. Others, such as Hegel and Schelling, have combined with Kant's theory Spinoza's pantheistic development of cosmic order. A reaction has now set in, and all this redundant speculation seems inclined to return into its ancient channel. But the Kantian moral teaching must always have a massive grandeur that redeems the adventurous rashness of his "Criticism of Pure Reason," and can never lose its character of positive and practical utility. SCHELLING. [RATIONALISTS.]

SCHISMATICS. Those who wilfully cut themselves off from the Apostolical succession of Bishops by which the organic unity of the Church is maintained within the boundaries of a state or nation. The principal historical schisms in the Church of Christ have been those of Novatus, Donatus, Luther, and Calvin. Organized schisms have also been formed in England by the Roman Catholics and by the various sects of Protestant Dissenters, in Scotland by the Presbyterians, and in Ireland, as in England, by the Roman Catholics and Protestant Dissenters. Such schisms are sometimes formed without any further heretical deviation from the Creed than that which is involved in breaking the unity of the One Catholic and Apostolic Church; and it has sometimes happened, as in the case of the English Roman Catholics, that they have received true though irregular orders from a foreign source so as to continue a valid priesthood. SCHOOLMEN. The Northern hordes that overran Europe in the sixth century buried all traces of civilization as beneath a dense mass of alluvial deposit. Before that time the Romans had established schools of learning in various towns of France [Cod. Theodos. xiv. tit. 9]. The study of Greek lingered here when it had died out elsewhere; but eventually all was buried in thick darkness until the time of Charlemagne. Though himself only able to affix the sign manual with the pommel of his sword, he was a great encourager of learning, rightly judging that civilization was his natural ally against the barbarians of the North and the Moors of Spain; a policy that was copied by King Alfred in coping with the Danes. This was the mainspring of Charlemagne's wars. He founded schools of learning throughout France, and placed over them the ablest teachers that the monasteries could furnish. Henceforth the "scholasticus," or teacher of the young, was found in every convent. Boethius, to whose eclecticism the scholastic system may be traced, was a Roman senator of the early part of the sixth century. Realistic notions had their origin in him. [CONCEPTUALISM.] Cassiodorus, senator and chancellor to Theodoric the Great, was also an Italian. He founded the Monastery of Viviers, and was its first abbot. Spanish learning was kept alive by Isidore of Seville, Taju of Saragossa, and Ildefonso of Toledo. Bede represented the learning of England in the eighth century; and it was principally from English and Irish monasteries that Charlemagne obtained his supply of teachers. Alcuin of York was placed by him over the palatine school that he founded for the benefit of his court.

John Scotus Erigena, his successor, was an Irish monk. He was the first after the revival of learning who joined the studies of theology and philosophy, an alliance that the schools ever after maintained. Yet he was far more of an eclectic philosopher after the school of Boethius than a divine. He led men's minds in the direction of Scholasticism, however he differed from the schools in making reason paramount, while he slighted ecclesiastical tradition, and only just abstained from challenging its authority. Richard of St. Victor named Erigena the "Inventor of Theology" [Lib. Ecer. 24], possibly on account of his theory that the truths on which theology is based may be discovered by à priori reasoning; an inversion of the Augustinian maxim "Fides præcedit intellectum." Theology, he said, contains the germ of every other science, and rests upon the authority of Scripture, and of tradition as approved by right reason. This was also one distinctive character of Scholastic theology; which exhibits throughout the same strange mixture of deference for authority and independent hardihood of thought. Theology also had its negative side, which denied that anything can be adequately predicated of the Deity; consciousness, love, existence, ascribed by us to the Supreme are mere arbitrary assumptions of the human mind, and veil its real ignorance. The authority that is paramount with Erigena is that of the Scriptures; the authority that must cede to "right reason"—that is, reason illuminated by a pure faith—is that of tradition and of the Fathers, the legitimate interpreters of Scripture. But they must not be quoted without urgent necessity, from charitable regard for those who have a lower range of intellect, and are only too prone to follow authority blindfold, and to disregard reason: "Nulla auctoritas te terreat ab his quæ rectæ contemplationis rationabilis suasio edocet." Of the Sacraments, as mysteries transcending all human reason, he scarcely speaks. Yet in his boldest flights, when he feels himself soaring far above the heads of ordinary mortals, Scripture and the Fathers are made to support his positions; exegesis becomes the handmaid of his philosophy, which is commended to weaker intellects under the patronage of Holy Writ. Erigena was an original thinker, having derived his materials for thought partly from the mystical Pseudo-Dionysius of the fifth century; partly from the Neo-Platonism of Plotinus, Porphyry and the Pantheistic Proclus; partly also from Maximus the Confessor [A.D. 662], who combined the ascetic piety of primitive monasticism with Pseudo-Dionysian mysticism. Thus his eclecticism covered a wide surface; and its mutual antagonism of Platonic and Peripatetic notions gave ample scope for discussion. He was a keen dialectician, but close attention to minute detail did not prevent him from taking a firm grasp of an entire subject in all its bearings. Scholastic and mystical theology received from him a first impulse so far as they were speculative, and his influence continued to be felt in a predominant degree until a wider knowledge of Aristotle was gained by the schools in the thirteenth century. Duns Scotus had evidently drawn from him; and the Dominican Eckart, excommunicated [A.D. 1329] for his Pantheistic assertion of the eternity of the world, and the sole existence of the Deity, obtained the main elements of his error from Erigena.

The theology of Erigena was a religious philosophy. He classifies all things as "things that are" and "things that are not;" the whole being included in the term nature. This nature is divided out into four species, as: [1] The nature that creates and is uncreate; [2] the nature that creates and is create; [3] the nature that creates not and is create; [4] the nature that creates not and is uncreate. [1] is the Divine Being, Whose relation to the universe is so described as to lead straight to Pantheism; [2] is the world of prototypal ideas, having its principle of unity in the Logos, agreeably to the systems of Plato, Plotinus, Philo and the Pseudo-Dionysius; [3] is the world of sense and its concentration in man, from whence Realism was afterwards developed; [4] return to God by predestined decree; "all things," as proceeding forth from the Divine existence and returning into it, may be termed uncreate as subsisting in the Absolute. Under this head he discourses upon Universal Grace, Redemption, Death, Eternal Life, Reward and Punishment. The germs of nearly every school of modern philosophy are foreshadowed in the writings of Erigena. Descartes, Spinoza, Kant, Fichte, Schelling, Hegel, Schleiermacher, all have their points of analogy with Erigena, who for that reason has been compared by Christlieb [Leben u. Lehre d. J. Sc. Erig. 464] to "bifrons Janus," standing midway between Plato and the schools; the one face tinged with the setting rays of Greek philosophy, the other bending an eagle gaze over the far distant regions of German thought, in anticipation of harvests of his sowing that should be reaped after the lapse of a thousand years. Yet, if he created a future, in time present he stood alone. He never formed a school.

The immediate effect of his teaching was to give a powerful stimulus to the study of dialectics; a term not to be accepted in the high Platonic sense of pure philosophy, nor in the Aristotelian meaning of logic in its wider acceptance as the science of words, but to be restricted to the dry rules and appliances of syllogistic reasoning, which gave their peculiarly austere character to the disquisitions of the schools. Dialectical reasoning was imported into the Carolingian schools from the monasteries of England and Ireland by Alcuin, Erigena and Clement. Gerbert, raised to the Papal See as Sylvester II. [A.D. 990], was a thorough master of logic, as shewn in his work, "De Corp. et Sang. Domini," and in a shorter treatise, "De Ratione" [Pez. Thes. Anecd. nov.]. In the middle of the next century Berengarius of Tours revived the discussion started by Paschasius Radbertus [A.D. 831] on transubstantiation with all dialectical appliances; and his opponent, Lanfranc, however distrustful of it in such a controversy, found himself compelled to make use of the same weapon.

Hitherto theology had been treated in the more flowing historical method of the Fathers, whose system of doctrine was built up on Scripture as interpreted by tradition. In the eighth and ninth centuries sentences were collected, and "catenæ" and "loci communes" were formed from their writings, which supplied the demands of what was called "positive theology," from which Scholastic Theology was distinguished as combining together faith and reason; faith being limited to belief in Scripture, and Church authority as based on tradition and synodical decrees. Reason also represented the dialectical method, and metaphysical disquisitions syllogistically conducted. These were held to be infallible methods for disclosing the truth: "Maximi plane cordis est per omnia ad dialecticam confugere; quo qui non confugit, cum secundum rationem sit factus ad imaginem Dei, suum honorem reliquit; nec potest renovari de die in diem ad imaginem Dei" [Berengar. de Sac. Cœn. 67]. Logic, however, was only regarded so far as it served the purposes of polemics, to clear the meaning of terms, and to demonstrate their differences and distinctions; nothing higher was expected from it. The Organum of Aristotle was known from Augustine's use of it; it was studied moreover in the Latin translation of Boethius and in the Isagoge of Porphyry; but the Master himself remained unknown. Peter Lombard does not even mention the name of Aristotle. At length more general knowledge of his works was revealed from a quarter where least of all it would be suspected to exist—among the Moors of Spain.

Syrian and Jewish physicians thoroughly conversant with Greek literature were high in favour with the Caliphs, who were mostly ostentatious patrons of learning. They indicated to them such pieces of Greek literature as were most deserving of their notice; and by the time of Almamûn, in the beginning of the ninth century, the Moors of Spain possessed translations of the principal philosophical works of Greece. Raymond, Archbishop of Toledo towards the middle of the twelfth century, gathered around him a staff of translators, principally Jews, the most renowned of whom was John of Seville. Through this channel many Arabic versions from Greek texts became known before the close of the century, Aristotle being the principle favourite. But the text was accompanied with the commentaries of Arab philosophers, who introduced a considerable breadth of Averroist notions wholly inconsistent with the Christian faith; and text and gloss alike were transfused into Latin. An interdict therefore was laid upon the study of Aristotle by the Council of Paris [A.D. 1209], but restricted six years later to the physics and metaphysics by the Papal Legate, Robert de Courçon; Gregory IX. afterwards limited the adverse decree till such time as the suspected works should have been castigated by divines. The condemnation of Aristotle only led to a greater demand for his works; and whereas, in the beginning of the thirteenth century, they were comparatively unknown, in the time of Thomas Aquinas [A.D. 1272], all the treatises had been translated into Latin and extensively read. From A.D. 1220 to 1225 were the years in which Peripatetic principles were largely imported into the schools of France. Michael Scott the warlock was the earliest translator of Aristotle, and something uncanny at once attached to his name.

"Michel Scotto fu che veramente Delle magiche frode seppe il giuoco."
[Dante, Inf. xx.]

The same may be said of Albertus Magnus, one of the earliest Schoolmen who worked Aristotelian notions into his system. Robert Grosseteste, Bishop of Lincoln, translated the Nicomachean Ethics, and was left unmolested. A knowledge of Aristotle was principally derived from Latin versions of Avicenna's [Ibn Sinâ] Arabic translation, with the commentary of Averroes [Ibn Roshd], both of which names are associated by Dante with the most learned names of Greece, and only not admitted into the kingdom of heaven from want of baptism;

"Euclide geometra e Tolomeo
Ippocrate Avicenna e Galieuo
Averroes che 'l gran commento feo."
[Inf. Cant. iv.]

Thomas of Aquino is said to have translated the works of Aristotle under the patronage of Urban IV. He more probably collated the various versions extant with the original Greek. The earliest of the Schoolmen who shews undoubted traces of Aristotle is Alexander of Hales. In his Summa he frequently cites Avicenna and Algazel as high philosophical authority [A.D. 1243-5]. This development of Scholastic thought by means of Peripatetic philosophy supplies a sharp line of distinction which separates all subsequent Schoolmen from their predecessors; and under this influence Scholasticism rapidly gained its culminating point. It has had a lasting effect also on theology. Cardinal Pallavicino, while he treats as an idle scoff the assertion that without Aristotle some of the doctrines of the Church would have remained latent ("noi mancavamo di molti articoli della fede"), yet declared the absolute necessity of Aristotle for applying the truths of Scripture: "Se Aristotele o Filosofia non ci desse le universali notizie comuni a tutte le cose, non potremmo poi con l'aggiunta luce della divina rivelazione applicare alle oggetti soprannaturali;" philosophy being useful as a foreign contingent if kept in due subordination, ("in maniera che servano ma non commandino") [I. Conc. di Tr. VIII. xix. 12]. In several German churches Aristotle's Ethics were read as gospel [Spanheim]. Though Aristotle was known only as a master of logic, and in Latin versions, Greek learning was by no means so totally extinct in these ages as is generally supposed. It was regularly taught with Latin in Carovingian schools at Osnaburg, the deed of foundation having determined "omnem clericum eleganter bilinguem esse." J. Scotus Erigena translated from the original the works of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, which were destined to have so decided an influence on Scholastic mysticism. At Limoges, in the tenth century, at Whitsuntide the "Gloria," "Sanctus," and "Agnus" were chanted in Greek [Jourdain, Trad. Lat. d'Aristotele, 44]. Gerwinus, Abbot of St. Riquier in Ponthieu, enriched the library with many Greek works, of which he was a devoted student [A.D. 1045-1075; Hist. Lit. de la France, vii. 93, 113]. Greek communities had a political existence at Arles and Marseilles for purposes of commerce; and a Greek monastery was established near the latter city. Of our own countrymen Abelard of Bath, at the end of the eleventh century, travelled in Greece and Asia Minor, impelled by a desire for studying Greek literature; and John of Salisbury in the twelfth, though not deeply versed in Greek, had been able to acquire a knowledge of it in his monastery. After that time a great impulse was given to Greek learning by the transmission to Paris of Greek MSS. from Constantinople, A.D. 1167, or forty years before that city was taken by the Crusaders under Count Baldwin. Students now flocked to the University of Paris in such numbers, that they exceeded, as it was said, the number of permanent inhabitants.

The future of the Schools was prepared in the two centuries that succeeded Erigena; in which the whole curriculum of learning was summed in the "Trivium," viz. grammar, logic, and rhetoric, the study of words; and the "Quadrivium," arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music, the study of things; music meaning only the rude form known to the Greeks.

The veins of thought were determined in their course, and a stream of life was flowing along them, when the controversy between Anselm and Roscellin arose in the eleventh century. Roscellin, Canon of Compiègne, was doubly an offender; he was heretical in his theology, heretical also in his philosophy, in that he opposed the opinion with respect to universal ideas, or "universalia in re," that may be traced back to Boethius, and through him to Porphyry; others, however, had preceded him [Ritter, Gesch. d. Ph. vii. 310]. His theological error was of the gravest kind; for he had argued himself dialectically into a belief of the threefold substance of the Deity: the Three Persons he declared to be distinct as three angels are distinct; but they are one in power; as angelic energy, though pervading the hosts of heaven, may be one. Having been condemned at Soissons [A.D. 1092], he at first recanted, then fled to England, where he retracted his recantation, and, under the protection of William Rufus, wrote against Anselm, his principal antagonist. Afterwards, being driven from England, he returned to France, and died a canon of Tours.

The philosophical question of universals was intimately connected with the subsequent fortunes of Scholasticism. The three principal systems with respect to the mind in its relation with the objects of thought that divided the philosophic world from the eighth to the fifteenth century, were the antagonism of Realism and Nominalism, and Conceptualism, which alone now survives. Realism erred on the side of excess, as Nominalism on the side of deficiency. For the Realist, accepting the Platonic notion of an external world of ideas, the counterpart of all that we see around us in the concrete world of matter, maintained that since these ideas are distinct from the mind, every conception of the mind represents its corresponding detached idea; and the ideal entity of things is absolutely adequate to the conceptions of reason. The abstract essence of things had in this system a real substantive existence. Abstract humanity had as distinct an existence as the individual being man; and the whole philosophic world professed a belief in these universal forms as existing independently of the conceptions of the mind; they were, as it was termed, "universalia ante rem," and those who held this notion were "reales." The Realist view was always the most popular with the Schools; for it flattered human vanity to think that the mind reflected as in a mirror those ideas of things visible that had existed before the beginning of the world, and by a mere act of volition summoned into its presence entities that people the invisible world of mystery.

Roscellin, affirming the existence only of "universalia post rem," denied the objective existence of these universal ideas, and affirmed that they were a mere vocal expression, a "flatus vocis," as fleeting as the breath that named them ; that the colour of a horse, for instance, had no independent ideal existence apart from the horse of which it was the accidental quality. Hence he was "nominalis." It was his Nominalism that led Roscellin into heresy ; and not heresy that predetermined his scientific creed. He spoke of the Three Persons in the Trinity as "tres res," understanding under the term "res" an entirety ; the Aristotelian $\tau\acute{\epsilon}$, the whole substance of that which exists. But he had before argued against the Realist view by shewing that as the idea of a house includes the subordinate ideas of foundation, walls, and roof, therefore that there can be no universal idea of a house in the Realistic sense ; because by removing wall or roof the entire notion of a house vanishes. The whole substance of the existing house is in his terminology "res," and as such cannot be resolved into its parts [Cousin, Œuvres inédits d'Abélard, 471]. Therefore it was a delusion for the Realist to talk of self-subsistent "universalia a parte rei ;" and rather than compromise his philosophical consistency he fell into heresy, and applied the same reasoning to matters of faith that he deemed to be conclusive as regards the world of sense. And this was the general character of the Nominalist School ; it was usually associated with a free-thinking spirit. Hence Leibnitz awards to it the highest praise. "Secta Nominalium omnium inter Scholasticos profundissima, et hodiernæ reformatæ philosophandi rationi congruentissima" [Leibn. in Niz. libr. de veris princ.] ; where the Nominalists being those "qui omnia putant esse nuda nomina præter substantias singulares, abstractorum igitur et universalium realitatem prorsus tollunt."

Nominalism erred on the side of deficiency. For it overlooked the instinctive habit of generalization inherent in the human mind, whereby it classifies the million objects of nature that surround it ; and observing the salient particulars of general resemblance, marshals them under distinct genera and species. Thus by a first generalization in concrete matters, and the same is true of abstract ideas, the animal and vegetable kingdoms are discerned from each other ; then the vertebrate animal, the quadruped, the ruminant, the cloven hoof, the ox. These distinctive characters were to the Realist independently existing forms, more real in their various entities than their counterparts of material substance ; and he needlessly introduced myriads of prototypal ideas, exactly adequate to the phantasms of thought but wholly independent of the mind in their metaphysical essence. The Nominalist, denying this separate existence of prototypal ideas, overlooked the process of generalization as a true function of the mind, and termed its results mere arbitrary mental distinctions ; "vox et præterea nihil," an empty name for things that needed a name if they were to be demonstrated. He failed to see that there was any relative suggestion, any general notion of resemblance arising from subjects capable of comparison, and interposing itself in the mind between the object of thought and the invention of the general term used to express it. To him the world was a mere multiplicity of objects ; he perceived no intervening operation of the mind ordering and classifying the confused mass, but with instant succession the generalizing term ranged itself in his mind correlatively with the ungeneralized matter. These questions were fought in the schools with the utmost energy. The Realist considered that the foundation of faith was laid in his system. The claims of reason were identified with his position by the Nominalist. When the first half century of this discussion had elapsed, John of Salisbury declared that more time had been spent upon it than by the Cæsars in conquering the world ; and more treasure expended than Cræsus ever possessed. Afterwards, when Ockham revived it, it was no longer confined to a strife of words, but became a question in which national honour was held to be involved ; and while the Emperor Louis of Bavaria upheld Nominalism in Ockham, Louis XI. of France sided with the Realists, and either party charged its opponents with committing the sin that may never be forgiven ; the Realist as the advocate of religious orthodoxy ; the Nominalist as the champion of free thought, and the claims of reason, which is the likeness of God in the soul of man.

The effect that Realism had on doctrine was considerable. Type and antitype became inseparably one. A confession of the real spiritual presence of Christ in the Holy Eucharist did not adumbrate the symbol and substance with sufficient closeness ; and the bread and the cup of blessing were declared to be the very material substance of the Lord's body. Humanity being the abstract universal "ante rem," was represented by Adam ; and his transgression was the sin of all humanity : all therefore sinned, "solum a voluntate primi hominis" [Durand. a S. Por. lib. ii. dist. 30, qu. 2]. So also original righteousness had been conferred on Adam, "Non in quantum erat singularis persona, sed in quantum erant in eo omnia individua naturæ humanæ virtualiter" [Nic. de Orb. lib. ii. dist. 30 ; see also T. Aq. Summ. Prim. Sec. qu. 81, 1]. It was especially favourable to the growth of Mysticism ; for it taught that all ideas and forms of things were latent in the soul of man as they subsisted in the mind of God ; that contemplation gave to the soul a true perception of them, and some glimpses of the pure happiness that will hereafter constitute the Beatific Vision. Then again ecclesiastical dogmata in the Realist theory were the exact counterpart of eternal verities : to vary in any minute particular resolved the whole ; and salvation was declared to be impossible for any who did not accept the entire doctrinal teaching of a realistic theology. Dominican Realism therefore applied itself with fervour to the conversion of such heretics as the Waldenses and Cathari.

The third system [CONCEPTUALISM] has already been discussed in a separate article ; it is the system of Locke and Reid ; but it may be traced far back in the controversy upon universals. Nominalism took this form in Abélard ; it indeed Conceptualism may be called a form of Nominalism, from which it varied as widely as from Realism. And long before Abelard it was the view of Plotinus and of the Neo-Platonic School of Alexandria, where a complete oneness was affirmed between truth in all its forms and the appreciating intellect, οὐκ ἔξω τοῦ νοῦ τὰ νοητά [A. Butler, Lect. ii, 354; Irenæus, Cambr. ed. Introd. xli.]. Porphyry disputed the position of the great master [Porph. V. Plot. sec. 18], and thereby gave its first impulse to Realism.

So much having been premised with respect to the characteristic elements of Scholastic theology, we may now trace their working in the principal Schoolmen, and determine the peculiar modifications of thought that led first to the development and then to the decline of the Scholastic theology of the Middle Ages. France was the principal seat of Scholasticism, and the record of teachers at Paris commences with William of Champeaux [de Campellis], Archdeacon of Paris, and Bishop of Châlons, who opened a school of logic A.D. 1109 [died A.D. 1121], and was the training preceptor of Abelard.

Scholasticism, "the ehivalry of theology," may be held to commence with Anselm, born [A.D. 1033, d. 1109] at Aosta in Piedmont; the successor of Lanfranc, first in the abbacy of Bec in Normandy, afterwards in the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury. He was the Augustine of the schools, and to Augustine's writings, after Scripture, he looked for the solution of every theological difficulty. Nominalism, in his opinion, was a most dangerous error, loosening the hold of authority in men's minds, making faith and reason dependent upon the senses, and tending to scepticism as certainly as it led Roscellin into heresy. It affected the Incarnation also, as seen from the Platonic point of view, by denying that the Word took upon Him human nature in the widest possible view; for Nominalism could see nothing beyond the individual human being in the Manhood of Christ.

The doctrine of the Atonement was brought to the front by Anselm, and his theory has given a certain direction to Protestant theology. Hitherto the benefit of Christ's death had been held to consist virtually in the restoration of life to those who lay under the ban of death; but in Anselm's view it is regarded essentially and principally as a satisfaction for the sin of the whole human race [Baur, Versöhnung], and as a sacrifice of infinite merit. This equivalent of infinite merit for the infinity of man's transgression formed a marked distinction in the sequel between the Dominican and Franciscan, the Thomist and Scotist theology; according to which latter the merit of Christ's sacrifice consisted only in the Divine acceptance of it. Anselm taught, in addition, that there was a satisfaction due on man's part before guilt could be removed; "necesse est ut omne peccatum satisfactio aut pœna sequatur." Works of righteousness represent this necessary condition, "ut qui per peccatum offenderat, per justitiam satisfaceret." The guilt of sin could only be atoned on the positive side by righteous works, or on the negative side by a subtraction of that eternal happiness which is the final cause of man's creation. Anselm guards against Dualism by denying that Satan had acquired any right over the fallen race, though his power is wholly consistent with the Divine Justice. God is the sovereign Lord, and alone has a sovereign right over man and his tempter, who are in fact fellow-servants [Cur Deus Homo, i. 7]. Similarly, Robert of Pulleyne, Archdeacon of Rochester [A.D. 1150], and praised by Bernard for soundness of doctrine, says that we were redeemed from the thralldom of Satan by the price of Christ's blood paid over, not to Satan, which Christ as God would never do, but, as Gregory of Nazianzum had already taught, to God, by Whose good pleasure man was manumitted and the Devil humbled. It was thought a harmless subject of discussion in the schools how far Satan had reason to complain in being spoiled of his prey by the redemption of mankind.

Anselm's adoption of the Augustinian maxim, "Fides præcedit intellectum," made it a favourite with the realistic school; "neque enim quæro intelligere ut credam, sed credo ut intelligam;" faith however meaning an intelligent belief, based upon the teaching of Scripture as interpreted by the Church; and such a faith is capable of still increasing light, "nisi credideritis non intelligatis" [Is. vii. 9]. Yet there was a strain of mysticism that gave warmth to the theology of Anselm. We must renounce the flesh, he said, and live up to the spirit before we can fathom the deep things of God; for "the natural man receiveth not the things of God." Practice and theory are so closely connected in matters of religion that a knowledge of God is impossible without the union of the two; moreover, where either is neglected, that which a man hath is taken away from him; the light becomes darkness, and how great is that darkness.

In this way the theology of Anselm harmonized the two main branches into which it soon divaricated; the religion of the head and reason, and the religion of the heart and spirit; the dialectical and the mystical element. These two principles were soon exemplified in Bernard of Clairvaux [d. A.D. 1153], and Peter Abelard [d. A.D. 1142]. Of these two the latter was the exponent of pure reason, the speculative divine, the Conceptualist; the former was the enthusiastic devotee, the transcendental religionist, the Realist. The highest aim of practical Christianity is the sanctification to God of every principle of the heart; but Bernard's was a yet more exalted aspiration, a superhuman yearning for absolute perfection, rapt contemplative devotion that left far behind the spiritual yearnings of ordinary humanity, and anticipated the glories of the life to come. This was the highest excellence of which human nature was capable: "omnino maximus, qui spreto ipso usu rerum et sensuum, quantum quidem humanæ fragilitati fas est, non necessariis gradibus sed inopinatis excessibus avolare, interdum contemplando, ad illa sublimia consuevit" [Bern. de Consid. V. i. 3]. It was an ecstatic penetration into heavenly places, as that of St. Paul; "nam raptum potius fuisse, quam ascendisse, ipse perhibet." The way to attain such spiritual perfection is first to order the whole life suitably to it, and then to press on to the mark in prayer and piety of heart. The relation of the spirit to divine knowledge is marked by him in the three factors, Opinion, Faith, and Perception. Opinion occupies itself only with probability, but faith and perception are in possession of the truth. Each of the three must keep within its own proper limitation; opinion must not degrade to its own level the high aspirations of faith; and faith must not dignify mere matters of opinion. Opinion that dogmatizes is rashness, even as faith that wavers is weakness. Faith is a spontaneous anticipation of the truth; perception is the clear and accurate knowledge of the Invisible. It is not the degree of certainty that marks the difference between faith and perception, but the degree of clearness; that which is still veiled to faith, from the very fact that it is an object of faith, is open as the eye of day to perception: "Fides non habet incertum, non magis quam intellectus; habet tamen involucrium, quod non intellectus." Faith cannot be made more certain of its objects, but it still needs the light of actual perception; and when that is vouchsafed nothing is wanting to blessedness. Mystic as he was, he was not the mysticism that neglects the means of real spiritual progress. He first raised his voice against the dry dulness of dialectical theology: "Res divinas non disputatio comprehendit sed sanctitas;" "orando facilius quam disputando et dignius Deus quaeritur et invenitur" [Bern. in Cant. 8].

That which was really hateful to him was the dialectical folly that knows not its own really narrow limits; the latitudinarian unprinciple that maintains not the high and holy character of faith; the speculative restlessness that chills the warmth of spiritual religion, and knows nothing of simplicity and humility; and upon one and all of these points he differed widely from Peter Abelard, whose living conceit of his philosophical powers was only equalled by the extravagant encomium on his tombstone:

"Cui soli patuit scibile quicquid erat."

Abelard's faults doubtless were patent to the eye of day; and Bernard saw in them a revival of Pelagian error, nor were his fears devoid of reason. His à priori reasoning also on the doctrine of the Trinity led him into something very like Sabellianism. He compared this highest mystery to the three parts of a syllogism that constitute one truth. He acknowledges in it God as the highest good; the Father as Omnipotence, the Son as Wisdom, the Holy Spirit as Love; in all "eadem essentia, sicut eadem oratio est propositio assumptio et conclusio." In this there is no recognition of distinct Personality; though the error may have been an error of judgment rather than of faith.

Abelard was early trained in dialectics under William of Champeaux. In philosophy he was a Conceptualist, in religion a Rationalist. At the request of his hearers he wrote his "Introductio in Theologiam," designed as an introduction to the study of Scripture. He defends in it the dialectical method, and complains of the increasing number of those who extol that kind of faith that yields an unreasoning assent to whatever is heard without examination; "qui facile credit levis est animo" [Ecclus. xix. 4]. The book was condemned by a papal legate at Soissons [A.D. 1121], and his own hands were compelled to cast it into the flames. His progressive development of faith is suggestive of merit "de congruo" and "de condigno," of a slightly later date. Thus he says that reason determines the soul in the direction of faith; but as yet it has no "merit" in the sight of God; love therefore raises it to such a trusting faith in God as Abraham had. The evidences of religion are then examined, which give substance to faith; thence by the aid of the Holy Spirit follows the full assurance of faith in the invisible things of God. Dialectical training is necessary for defending the truth against those who make use of that method of attack; "alio modo non possumus nisi has noverunt rationes ipsorum artibus offeramus."

He is most earnest in declaring the necessity for a disinterested love; "habe caritatem et fac quicquid vis" was his favourite Augustinian maxim. Man's justification from sin through the Atonement of Christ, which Anselm represented as an infinite equivalent for infinite guilt, amounting to an indefeasible claim on the Divine Justice, was placed by Abelard on the footing of love. God's grace kindles that love in man in return for mercy through Christ, which effectually destroys sin, and with it the guilt of sin. Love cannot exist without the faith that involves repentance; repentance therefore awakened by grace is the quality that leads to man's reconciliation with God. It is also of antecedent efficacy, and procured pardon for the holy men of old, because "they who went before, and they who followed after, cried Hosanna to the Son of David." Even the Sibylline verses express a true faith; and the Deistical thesis of Tindale, "Christianity as Old as the Creation," received its first impulse from Abelard [Abel. et Helois. Op. Paris, 1606, p. 553]. Penitent love, therefore, in Abelard's scheme makes that human satisfaction for sin which a return to righteousness effects according to Anselm: sin according to the latter involves original guilt derived from Adam; Abelard limits it to individual transgression.

Abelard's moral work, "Scito teipsum," contains the germ of Scholastic development on grace and free will. The exciting cause of sin, or concupiscence, he pronounces to be free from guilt; but sin consists in the act of yielding to it. If it be withstood it may be the handmaid of virtue; "quid enim magnum pro Deo facimus, si nihil nostræ voluntati adversum toleramus sed magis quod volumus implemus." The Semi-Pelagianism of later Schoolmen dates from Abelard. Another work that must have caused misgiving in the minds of many has come to light in the present generation, entitled "Sic et Non," "Yea and Nay" [Cousin, Œuvres inédits d'Abélard]; it is a collection of "Sententiæ Patrum," arranged under a hundred and seventy-five heads, not exhibiting the consent of antiquity, which had been the aim of all preceding sententiary collectors and compilers of "Locis communes," but exposing the differential side of patristical theology, without any attempt to explain or in any way to account for the discordance. His design seems to have been to shew that it is impossible to secure absolute unity in doctrinal statements, and that the Fathers are to be read in a free spirit, also to lead men to be careful how they brand every deviation from one standard with the name of heresy. In his preface, however, he says simply that his object is to render the minds of men more acute; for Aristotle, who taught men διαπορῆσαι καλῶς, declares that there is a "real use in doubting." We have here for the first time the ancient sceptical μέμνασο ἀπιστεῖν commended as a principle for Christians.

Some years had now elapsed since the publication of his incomplete "Introductio," and in the meantime Abélard's public instruction had been plentifully noted down by his admirers, and more than one work was in circulation under his name, but without his authority. The "Sententiæ Abélardi," published by Professor Rheinwald from the Munich MSS. [A.D. 1835], appear to have been such a compilation. William, Abbot of St. Thierry, accused Abélard of heresy in a letter to Bernard of Clairvaux. The works of Abélard, he said, cross the Alps and the seas, and his pupils are to be found among the most powerful [cardinals] in the court of Rome. The works principally indicated were the Theology, the Sentences, the "Scito teipsum," and his commentary on the Romans. Abélard having been informally condemned at the provincial council of Sens [A.D. 1140], then appealed to Rome, where he had many friends. Bernard, however, forestalled him by a letter to Pope Innocent II., in which the several counts of heresy against Abélard were set forth [Ep. 190, Op. Bern. Massil, 1719, i. 650]: the principal being that he encouraged open discussions on the Trinity among half-trained pupils; and that he brought down the deep things of God to the level of reason, as mere matters of fancy and opinion: "Quid enim magis contra rationem quam ratione rationem conari transcendere? Et quid magis contra fidem quam credere nolle quicquid non possis ratione attingere?" Abélard set out for Rome, but had not proceeded further than Lyons when sentence of condemnation reached him; his writings were ordered to be burnt, and himself immured in a cloister. He took refuge with his true-hearted friend Peter the Venerable, Abbot of Clugny, and having been transferred by him for his health to the priory of Châlons on the Saône, he there died, April 21st, A.D. 1142.

The condemnation of Abélard was a severe check to Scholastic rationalism; the dialectical system was woven too closely into the texture of school learning to be easily displaced; but its use was tempered down as theology gained a more earnest and practical tone. The canons of the church of St. Victoire at Paris impressed this character on the divinity of the Schools. Hugo [V. Blankenburg] à St. Victoire, born at Ypres at the close of the eleventh century, followed in the steps of Anselm, and taught that theological knowledge issues objectively from Scripture and tradition, and subjectively in a pure faith, which leads on to perception; faith occupying the middle position indicated by Bernard, being above opinion but beneath perception. All propositions as being either "ex ratione," or respectively "secundum," "supra," and "contra rationem," were either necessary truths, or as propositions probable, marvellous, or false and incredible. Natural religion falls under the second of these categories, "secundum rationem;" revealed religion under the third, "supra rationem." The relation of reason to faith thenceforth became fixed in the Schools. Hugo checked the excessive application of dialectics, and raised the mystical element to a recognised position, which, leaving the deeper doctrines of Christianity, touched the spirit with the fire of enthusiasm. The canons of the Abbey of St. Victoire were all more or less mystical in their theology, and taught their followers to withdraw their thoughts from the works of God in outward nature, and to fix them upon the operation of God within in the soul. Yet there is a Jewish anthropomorphism in their language with respect to the Divine Being, and a familiarity in handling sacred names that is scarcely reverent. As contrasted with the wrangling of the schools, Mysticism represented the peacefulness of the cloister. As regards the malice of the Tempter, Hugo agreed with Bernard and the Fathers. Satan, he said, offended God by corrupting his servant Adam; Adam offended God by allowing himself to be seduced; Satan offended man by deceiving him: thenceforth man was the Devil's bondman; unjustly as regards the Almighty, but justly with respect to himself as transgressor. Man could not set himself free from the Devil's power; therefore God worked out his salvation. But an atonement was required for the offence. This could only be by man's offering of perfect righteousness, and by suffering a punishment adequate to the offence. In himself man was utterly incapable of doing this. Therefore God was made man; the Son offered His perfect righteousness for the Father's acceptance, and suffered death in man's stead, thereby redeeming man from him that hath the power of death [de Sac. 4]. Like Abélard, he traces out the effect though not the substance of the Atonement in the three theological graces—Faith, Hope, and Love—that it quickens within the soul; and the Saviour most truly is "Via in exemplo, Veritas in promisso, et Vita in præmio." [Liebner's Hugo de S. Vict. 417.]

Hitherto no systematic body of divinity had been put forth, the Monologium of Anselm being the nearest approach. The Summa of William of Champeaux, Abélard's preceptor, has not come down to us, but that of Hugo has. The principal doctrines of the Church are there laid down and confirmed by texts of Scripture and patristical references, the questions and doubts of contempo-aries are then solved, and a conclusion drawn in accordance with Scripture and tradition. His other work on the Sacraments, the most important of early scholasticism, treats the subject in a more flowing and connected style, but not being crammed with quotations from traditional authorities, it was not much read. These two works, however, exercised a very visible influence over Peter Lombard and Thomas of Aquino, while his mysticism communicated itself to kindred spirits in Bonaventura and Gerson.

His pupil and successor, Richard, of the same foundation, was more deep and original in his views, and richer in speculative thought, though he fell short of his teacher in moderation and simplicity of character. He first reduced mysticism into something like system. Theology with him, as with his predecessors, was the centre of all other sciences, the bright star that gave its character to the entire constellation of human learning. The spirit of the time, as seen in his work, was to bind more closely the tie that connected Positive Theology with dialectics; and as a subsidiary aid to this latter element of the Trivium, to complete the work of the Sententiary writers, Vincent of Lerins, (in his Commonitorium), Gennadius of Marseilles, and Isidore of Seville, in the beginning of the seventh century. All such work, however, was surpassed by the "Sentences" of Peter Lombard, at first theological lecturer and then Bishop of Paris [A.D. 1159, died 1164]. This work constituted him by pre-eminence Magister Sententiarum, and gave inexhaustible material for commentators. The compilation was an enormous boon to the hair-splitting dialectician, from the number of analogies and discrepancies, the questions and answers, theses and antitheses, positions and counter-positions that it helped to develop and to solve. It made scholastic formalism yet more dry, and while it raised to its highest position the influence of authority and tradition, it threatened to fossilize for ever the rich products of theology. The character of Peter Lombard as a divine may be told as easily by this book as a geologist can describe the outward form and habits of an extinct species from a single bone. He was opposed to Platonism, and had a thorough dislike for philosophy with its impertinent "scrutatores et garruli ratiocinatores;" he cared not to follow in the track of those who hoped ardently to reconcile its teaching with theological truth. The only truth that he knew was to be elicited from Scripture and tradition; and their differences, if such existed, were to be adjusted by dialectical subtlety. His work, perhaps, had an especial bearing on Abelard's Pyrrhonist compilation, the "Sic et ita." It may be noted that the Roman theory of the Sacraments was fixed by Lombard.

As regards the Atonement, he reproduced Origen's idea of the Tempter foiled by the Sacrifice of the Cross: εἰς ὃν ἐμπέπτωκεν ὁ διάβολος ἀγνοῶν, εἰ γὰρ ἔγνω, οὐκ ἂν αὐτὸν κύριον τῆς δόξης ἐσταύρωσε [Orig. in Ps. xxxv. 8], the cross having been compared to a hunter's net. Gregory of Nyssa carried out the notion to an irreverent length, in saying that a deception was put upon Satan by the Incarnation, and that he was overreached as it were in his dominion over the souls of men; that he was taken as some leviathan of the deep, human nature being the bait, and the Divinity the hook [Or. Catech. 22-26; see Greg. M. Moral. 33-37]. The idea became a favourite one. "Illusus est diabolus morte Domini quasi avis," says Isidore of Seville [Sent. i. 24]. "Quid fecit Redemptor captivatori nostro? Tetendit ei muscipulam crucem suam; posuit ibi quasi escam sanguinem suum" [Pet. Lomb. Sent. iii. 19]. Peter Lombard made a near approach to the doctrine of the Atonement as set forth by Abelard; and whereas no greater proof could be given of God's love for man than the Atonement provided for his sin, so its natural issue is in the love that it kindles within man's soul; and it is this love that has an atoning power. "Accendimur ad diligendum Deum, qui pro nobis tanta fecit, et per hoc justificamur, id est, soluti a peccatis iusti efficiimur. Mors ergo Christi nos justificat, dum per eam caritas excitatur in cordibus nostris" [Sent. iii. dist. 19, A]. Sin is the bond with which Satan held men, and faith is its solvent: "Si ergo recte fidei intuitu in illum respicimus . . . a vinculis diaboli solvimur id est a peccatis" [ibid.]. Absolution was not authoritative as a priestly act, but declaratory: "Non autem hoc sacerdotibus concessit; quibus tamen tribuit potestatem solvendi et ligandi, id est ostendendi homines ligatos vel solutos" [Sent. iv. 18, F].

In the latter half of the twelfth century, Walter of St. Victor endeavoured to recall the schools from dialectical subtleties to a more spiritual theology, and inveighed against the four "Labyrinths," meaning the logicians of France, viz. Abelard and Gilbert de la Porrée, Peter Lombard and his namesake of Poitiers, of whom he speaks as though they were possessed of the spirit of all evil—"uno spiritu Aristotelico afflatus." Joachim of Floris, rapt in Apocalyptic mysticism, and John of Salisbury, the friend of Thomas à Becket, statesman and natural philosopher, attacked the same system from different points and on varying grounds. But in vain. The schools continued to resound with jangling divines, and commentaries on the Sentences were multiplied, till at the end of the first quarter of the thirteenth century those translations of Aristotle and of Græco-Arab philosophy appeared, to which allusion has already been made. The schools also now became the peculium of the Dominican and Franciscan orders, who from this time exercised a powerful influence over the theology of the future.

The Dominican Order took its rise in the commencement of the thirteenth century from Domingo [A.D. 1170-1221], a native of Calaruega in Old Castile, and of the Guzman family. He grieved to see the defection from the Church that was setting in. The simplicity of the Albigenses and Cathari contrasted strongly with the outward pomp and pride of the Roman hierarchy. The monastic orders had departed widely from the pious spirit in which they had been founded. Dominicus therefore determined to stem the tide of evil by a return to Apostolical simplicity, and to gain the masses by founding an order that should have something of the zeal and self-devotion of St. Paul. Having organized a body of preachers, he finally obtained a Papal Bull for the creation of the Dominican Order, A.D. 1216, as the "Fratres Prædicatores." The device of the order, a mastiff bearing a blazing torch in his mouth, was intended to symbolize its watchfulness in guarding the fold of Christ from wolves and robbers, and its zeal in spreading the light of the Gospel; but afterwards its enemies saw in it an emblem of Dominican tenacity of purpose in tracking down victims for the Inquisition, and of its appropriation to itself of an universal censorship, as the stolen bone of the dog. The establishment of a house at Paris under the name of St. Jacques obtained for the order the name of Jacobins. An office that Dominicus filled in the Court of Rome, that of principal preacher and master of the palace, including the censorship of all religious writings, descended as an heirloom in the order, and gave to it immense influence. Simplicity of life and the ministry of preaching were the distinguishing principles of the order. In the fifth year of its existence [A.D. 1220], absolute poverty and mendicancy were made binding on it. The Dominican Order was mainly instrumental in establishing Scholastic Theology upon Church authority and the dicta of St. Augustine. It was Thomist in its theology, and Conceptualist in its philosophy; in both of which points it was fiercely antagonized by the rival order of St. Francis, who were Scotists and Nominalists. So also the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin was warmly taken up by the Franciscans, and as stoutly resisted on the score of novelty by the Dominicans. Dominicus died A.D. 1221, and was canonized A.D. 1233.

The Franciscan Order took its rise from Francis, son of a wealthy merchant of Assisi [A.D. 1182-1226]. As Anthony, following the Saviour's counsel to the rich young man, sold all he had and took up his cross to follow Him; so Francis, copying the Saviour's example, collected first a body of disciples, and then sent them forth two and two, without scrip or purse, staff or sandal, that they might, by the simplicity of preaching, bring in souls to Christ. The Church could only be restored to its pristine purity by the sanctifying effect of poverty. The WALDENSES had gained a firm hold upon the affection of the people by their preaching and poverty, and lost ground could only be recovered for the Church by similar self-abasement. An order also which really maintained the poverty that was a fundamental principle of every monastery, exercised by its example a reforming efficacy on the rest, as well as on the Church at large; and it was regarded with special favour by the Court of Rome until the time of Ockham. An unconditional loyalty to the Holy See was a part of the Franciscan vow. The Bull that founded the order under the lowly name of "Fratres Minores" was issued [A.D. 1223] three years before the death of Francis.

Both orders, therefore, were based on the same fundamental principles, and both were content to minister for the good of others, rather than aim at any higher reward for themselves; but there were marked points of difference. The Dominicans made the conversion of heretics and infidels his main object. Evangelical poverty was not so much an essential element of his order as a serviceable aid for work; and that which the tender, sympathetic, imaginative Francis made the very life-blood of his system was adopted by the more stern and coldly calculating Dominic as his best "methodus operandi." The higher classes choosing their spiritual advisers from the monks of St. Dominic, caused it gradually to lose sight of poverty as anything more than a nominal attribute of the order. The character of the principals also communicated itself to the two houses. The Dominican was the hard, inflexible propagandist of Latin orthodoxy; cold, calm, and self-possessed; the many-sided man of the world, the terrible agent also of the Inquisition in its day. The Franciscan, with greater geniality and fervour, was the popular religionist, and had always a word and work of sympathising kindness for all. The confessional was his stronghold, as it was in after years of the Jesuit; and the same work that the Dominican performed by open discussion was achieved more systematically by the Franciscan, who was in possession of the affections of the people. Oxford was Franciscan to the heart.

Neither of these orders had any such literary character as the order of St. Benedict; but what they lacked in learning they abundantly made up in mother wit, sharpening the intellect with perpetual discussion among themselves, and making an active onslaught upon heresy outside the cloister. They maintained at the same time the character of scholastic discussion. The veneration of the Franciscan for his founder was second only to his love for the Saviour; the servant was the close representative to him of the Master, and the reputed impression of the stigmata, or five wounds of the Crucified Lord, on the person of St. Francis caused that veneration to deepen into something almost more than veneration. Hase, however [Franz v. Assisi ein Heiligenbild, 121, 143], has shewn that this myth first originated in a letter communicating the founder's death to the order in France, written by the Vicar-General Elias of Cortona; that it was before unknown, and that either the statement rested on no foundation whatever, or that the General himself impressed the marks on the dead body of Francis as he kept watch and ward over the sacred remains.

Alexander of Hales, near Gloucester, who died A.D. 1245, founder of the Franciscan School, was the first of the "Seraphic Order" who retained the title of Doctor: he was specially the "Irrefragable." Among his pupils were Bonaventura and Duns Scotus. His "Summa Theologiæ" was written by command of Innocent IV., and treated of the Holy Trinity, the Visible and Invisible Creation, the Fall, Sin, the Incarnation. He first exhibits traces of Arab influence, and often cites in his "Summa" Avicenna, Algazel, and Averroes as philosophers of high authority.

The work was still unfinished at his death, which determines the date at which the Moorish writers of Spain had begun to affect Scholasticism. He combined many of the characteristics of preceding Schoolmen, Anselm being his principal guide. His work is highly mystical, yet full of dialectical subtlety and trifling. It may be noted that he introduced several of the distinctive tenets of mediæval Romanism. His "treasury of grace," through the sales of indulgences, eventually led to the Reformation; and the dogma of the Immaculate Conception dates from him. He also gave a further development to the Pelagianizing notions of Abelard. The doctrine that subjects of refractory kings may consider themselves absolved from their allegiance, a weapon of such terrible keenness in the hand of the Jesuit, also had its origin in his "Summa." Something of the same kind may be found in the treatise "De Regimine Principum" of Aquinas.

Albertus Magnus [A.D. 1193-1280], of the noble house of Bollstadt, the "Universal Doctor," but known also by the soubriquet of "Simia Aristotelis," made a much wider application of Aristotelian principle. He and his pupil, Thomas of Aquino [A.D. 1244], were Eclectic rather than Realist or Nominalist, and may be considered as the true founders of the Scholastic system, the second period of which now commences. The foundation of Dominican Scholasticism, generally ascribed to Thomas Aquinas, from whom its partisans were termed Thomists, was in fact the work of Albert, who survived his pupil by six years. His great guide was Avicenna, but Averroes also contributed a contingent. His treatise, "De Unitate Intellectus contra Averroistas," was written at Rome by order of Alexander IV. [A.D. 1255]. The individual responsibility of each soul is a scriptural truth; but he treats it as a philosophical problem; and having produced thirty syllogistic arguments in favour of those who held that there was but one collective soul of man after death, he overpowers them with thirty-six others in maintenance of the orthodox belief, shewing a balance of six arguments in favour of the received faith. Albert rejected the peripatetic tenet of the coeternity of God and matter. But he allowed a Platonic first matter, existent in the mind of God from everlasting, which in due time received substantive existence. Yet he was no Pantheist. In the same ideal sense, time and the heavens and universal intelligence were eternal; human intelligence being an efflux from the Divine, though distinct from it, and endued with a like perfect freedom of will. By exercise of the speculative faculty man approaches God, and becomes "Deo quodammodo similis;" he then can kindle in others a divine intelligence, which is the knowledge (scire) that all desire, and in which contemplative perfection consists. His philosophy was thus an eclectic transcendentalism. His theology as a "science" is built upon an objective faith flowing from the "supermundane illumination" vouchsafed to the Fathers as the channel of tradition. Yet, from another point of view, faith as a subjective quality results in that perception of the truth which is the sum of human happiness. Theology and philosophy should harmonize, both being the result of experience either in things natural or supranatural. The supranatural expansion of the soul towards God shews that Averroist principle of an universal emanation from and return to God, which led Amalric of Bena and David of Dinant into Pantheism. Something similar had appeared in the teaching of Hugo and Alexander of Hales with respect to "pura naturalia" and superadded grace; but they now received a character and point from Albert, the authority of whose great name gave them a determinate influence upon the theology of his successors, just as his philosophy often threw off suggestive thoughts that bore their fruit in after generations.

He constructed a head of brass that could speak, which so horrified his pupil Thomas that he dashed it in pieces as a Satanic delusion. He was an ardent student of alchemy, and his researches brought to light many highly important chemical products. Sulphate of iron, nitrate of silver, cinnabar, a sublimate of mercury and sulphur, caustic potash, azurium, a triple compound by fusion of sulphur mercury and sal ammoniac, were stumbled upon as he toiled over his retorts and alembics. He first explained the nature of aërolites, and something very like gunpowder was known to him; he also taught potters to glaze their wares with minium, the red oxide of lead. Hence his name was in the mouth of all, and having to lecture at Paris for three years, the concourse was so great that he was compelled to give his instruction in the open air. The locality is still pointed out as the Place Maubert [Ma. Alberti], while a neighbouring street is known as the Rue de Maître Aubert. Some years after his death his tomb was opened, and his bones were distributed as relics among the princes and principal religious establishments of Christendom.

His pupil, Thomas Aquinas [A.D. 1224-1274], born at Sicca Rocca, near Aquino, a place of classical memory, as having been the birthplace of Juvenal [Sat. iii. 319], was the impersonation of all that is good and venerable in Scholasticism. He, as a Dominican, was the "Angelic Doctor." "If" as Bishop Hampden has said [Encycl. Metrop. xi. 793], "penetration of thought, comprehensiveness of views, exactness the most minute, an ardour of inquiry the most keen, a patience of pursuit the most unwearied, are among the merits of a philosopher, then may Aquinas dispute even the first place among the candidates for supremacy in speculative science." His Aristotelian philosophy was formed upon Averroes, cordially as he detested Averroism [Renan, Averr. ii. 7]. But it was an eclectic combination of Aristotle and Plato, through the medium of Augustine, together with traces of mysticism from the Pseudo-Dionysius. His "Summa," marking the culminating glory of Scholasticism, has always been held in the highest estimation; and Popes of different ages have declared that his writings are perfect and free from error. His close adherence also to Augustinian doctrine on the questions of Grace and Predestination and Final Perseverance, from which his adversary Duns Scotus swerved, has made him always a model of orthodoxy. At the Council of Trent his Summa was placed by the side of the Holy Scriptures as a guide for the decisions of the assembled Fathers. As regards the question of Universals, he was an eclectic; they were in his opinion phantasms of the intellect. He did not altogether discard the emanational theory of his master Albert, though he handles it with much care, as perceiving its tendency towards Pantheism. The universe, he says, proceeded from the energy (actus purus) and the will of God; but the will of God was not the first cause: for will is itself the principle of Intelligent Mind, and the two coincide in the Absolute, both revealing themselves in creation as Infinite Love. Reason may demonstrate in natural theology the being and unity of God, but not His essence; relatively, but not absolutely; this knowledge, to be acquired by natural means, he terms the "preamble of faith" and "prima credibilia," but supranatural vision can only be helped by supranatural means, such as direct revelation and Scripture. Reason cannot demonstrate the objects of faith. Theology as a theoretical science and philosophy may go to work in the same way to produce conviction, but their first principles are widely different; philosophy proceeds from axioms that are more or less cognizable by the senses; theology proceeds from articles of faith, from whence the truth is gradually unfolded; and the primary credenda of theology are her axioms. Both proceed forth from God, and are referable to His wisdom; theology therefore can no more contravene the dictates of right reason than philosophy can really discredit the theological verities that it cannot fathom. "Gratia naturam non tollit sed perficit." The objects of faith, moreover, are the more readily apprehended, in that they are wholly in harmony with the light of man's first undimmed reason; they are "res sensibiles," that retain "aliquale vestigium in se divinæ imitationis." But there must always remain a sharp line of distinction between what may be known by reason and what by revelation in theological matters; these latter may be "supra" but never "contra rationem." Tradition rests not its claims to be heard on mere prescription—there is an undercurrent of reason that determines its true direction. Yet Thomas Aquinas is not altogether free from the scholastic failing of making faith a mere objective quality, i.e. an intellectual and traditional faith, and of curbing reason in its high prerogative of leading on the current of human thought. His Areopagite transcendentalism gives a warmer colouring to principles that hitherto shewed themselves as mere dicta of dry Scholasticism.

His view of the Atonement agrees with that of Anselm; but he limits its application to Original Sin, which gave rise to the wording of our second Article as adopted from the Augsburg Confession. He assigns also to man's unaided power an efficacy that Augustine would have termed Pelagian. God's offer of salvation is free to all mankind, as already stated by Anselm; and the Incarnation was wholly a matter of necessity, as entirely congruous with the Divine Nature [Sum. iii. qu. 1, art. 1]. For God is good, and He must, as bound by the law of His Being, vouchsafe His goodness in its most perfect form to man; hence the Incarnation was a necessary event. The Son also as the Word and protideal form of all has a necessary relation with the creature; it became Him therefore to enter into personal relation with the creature by means of the Incarnation [ib. qu. 3, art. 8].

The Summa of Thomas stands out, like the poems of Dante in the next century, grand in the colossal proportions and well-balanced relations of its several parts. "It would, as it might seem, occupy a whole life of the most secluded study to write, almost to read" [Milman, Lat. Chr. vi. 451], extending as it does over twelve hundred folio pages. It nowhere contravenes the received theology of the Church of Rome; and where freedom of thought appears to swing loose from the faith, yet the interests of the latter are never prejudiced. The Summa is divided into three main parts, of which the second is subdivided into the Prima Secundæ and Secunda Secundæ. The first part establishes the claim of theology to be regarded as a science capable of demonstrative proof, to which every other science is ancillary, and proceeds to treat of the Divine Nature, Providence, and Predestination; the creation, visible and invisible; and human nature in relation to the general scheme. The second part in its first section considers man as a moral being, and as the recipient of divine grace; involving the questions of free will, original sin, and justification. Justification consists of three particulars—1. Remission of sins; 2. Infusion of grace; 3. Faith that moves the soul towards God as the author of justification, and is "informis" as yet—aversion from sin being the spontaneous act of recovered freedom of will. Justification is thus a movement "de contrario in contrarium," a transmutation "de statu injustitiæ ad statum justitiæ." The second section is the complement of the former, and is the most important of the entire work, as a grand exposition of Christian ethics. It analyzes the complex elements of man's moral nature in a manner worthy of his great master Aristotle; grouping the graces as theological and ethical, as infused and acquired,—the sevenfold gifts of the Spirit: the theological virtues being Faith, Hope, and Charity; the ethical comprising the cardinal virtues, Justice, Prudence, Fortitude, Temperance. The third part deals with the doctrines of the Incarnation and of the seven Sacraments of the Latin Church: two subjects that are inseparable from each other, the Eucharist conveying the very substance of Christ to the faithful communicant, the rest in a subordinate degree exhibiting a participation of His grace in varying mode. An analogy is marked out between the seven Graces and the Sacraments, each member in the one system being the correlative of something similar in the other. Thus baptism, as the remedy of original sin, corresponds with Faith; extreme unction, as the remission of venial sin, with Hope; the Holy Eucharist, as removing the penal consequences of transgression, with Charity. And so with respect to the other Graces, prudence is represented by Holy Orders as the remedy of ignorance; justice or righteousness by penance, the supplemental safeguard of contrition, and the ordained means of obtaining remission of deadlier sins; temperance by matrimony, as a check to inordinate desire; fortitude by confirmation, as the remedy of weakness.

The Summa concludes by comparing the two main phases of religious life, the contemplative and the active; and while, under the guidance of Aristotle the former is preferred, an ecclesiastical direction is given to the preference, and the monastic life is shewn to be of all the most perfect.

This truly great work has done more than any other to fix the exact meaning of theological terms; and if due allowance be made for the peculiarities of Roman theology, it will always be a basis for the studies of the divine that is at once deep, solid, and vast.

Bonaventura, or Giovanne di Fidanza [A.D. 1221-1274], of the Franciscan Order, was the contemporary of Thomas, having been born three years before him, but dying in the same year, just as he had been preferred to the Cardinalate, when his funeral was attended by a Pope, an Emperor, and a King. He was known as the "Seraphic Doctor;" the distinctive title of his order, as in the case of Aquinas, being appropriated to its most illustrious member. He was a follower of Aristotelian ideas, yet Plato and Dionysius had a preponderating influence, which shewed itself in weaning him from an excessive attention to dry dialectics, and in giving a practical fervour to his theology, with him a science of action. He philosophized only so far as philosophy coincided with theology; the return to God of the soul tainted with original sin was his thesis. The complete devotion of the soul to God was the idea that chiefly inspired him, and a single-hearted life in Christ after the complete subjugation of every selfish principle. He united in himself the scholastic and mystic, the first supplying the form, the latter the substance of his theology. But there was nothing extravagant in his mysticism. There are certain bounds in its heavenward aspirations that the soul cannot pass. The light of the soul and intellect is fourfold. There is the external light that guides the intellect to the knowledge of science, and the light of sense that enables us to comprehend the external world in its various phases; the light of reason that leads the soul to appreciate the verities of the intellectual world, and the light of grace that reveals to man virtue in her holy beauty, and universals as they exist in God. Into this light man must struggle at whatever sacrifice and disregard of the other inferior varieties of illumination; and in the end be absorbed into the Absolute One. Without exactly touching Pan-theism, his opinions tended manifestly in that direction.

Raymund Lull [A.D. 1234-1315], the "Doctor Illuminatus," left writings which, like those of Bonaventura, are full of practical piety [see Neander, Allg. K. Gesch. x. 597-602, Hamb. 1845]; but he formed the impossible idea of establishing certain rules, or an "ars generalis," whereby the truth might be elicited in theology and every existing science. It shews that a desire for reform was beginning to take hold on men's minds. In substance the idea of his "ars generalis" was a syncretism of Greek Christian and Averroist philosophy; the latter element having full weight given to it from a hope of effecting by it the conversion of the Moors. He was an ardent teacher of the Immaculate Conception; for unless there had been complete freedom from sin, "sive actuali sive originali," the Word could not have been Incarnate of the Blessed Virgin. It was the Immaculate Conception that prepared the way for God made Flesh. "Sic præparavit viam Incarnationis per Sanctificationem, sicut sol diem per auroram" [in lib. ii. Sent. q. 96].

Lull was a pupil of Duns Scotus, and on one occasion making a gesture of dissent from that which was enounced "ex cathedra," the lecturer in a pique bade him parse Dominus, thinking to expose his ignorance, "Dominus quæ pars?" to which he received the reply, "Dominus non pars sed totum." Lull afterwards wrote an ontological treatise entitled "Dominus quæ pars?"

Duns Scotus [A.D. 1274-1308] was born in the North of England, in the year in which Thomas and Bonaventura died. He died of apoplexy (though he was stated to have been buried with too much haste by the monks) at Cologne. Having only completed his thirty-fourth year he must have written a folio volume of 800 pages annually from his twentieth year. The words inscribed on his tomb give his history:

"Scotia me genuit, Anglia me suscepit, Gallia me docuit, Colonia me tenuit."

Oxford had the honour of being his earliest instructor, where he studied the exact sciences of the Quadrivium. His lectures at Paris were crowded by thousands. Duns Scotus started, like his predecessors, from an unwavering faith in the truth of ecclesiastical doctrine; but he made a nearer approach to the School of St. Victor than to the systems of either Anselm or Aquinas. He was the great authority for the Franciscan, as Thomas was for the Dominican School. Though the main frame-work of his system was Aristotelian through the various translations that were now before the world, yet it was really Platonic. Theology with him was equally a science with philosophy; but they worked collaterally and by no means in unison with each other. His theology was purely practical, "operatio eorum quæ persuadentur." Original sin is communicated by natural propagation "ex fomite;" its punishment, if unremoved by baptism, is deprivation of the Beatific Vision [Sent. ii. 32]. Concupiscence is connatural in man, and is not the substance of original sin.

The use of dialectical reasoning, worked up to a more subtle point in him than in any of his predecessors, obtained for him the name of "Doctor subtilis," though his opponents fixed the name of "Quodlibetarius" upon him, in allusion to his method of stating the pro and con of important arguments, and leaving his hearers to draw the conclusion for themselves. He gave fresh life to Realism. The germ of more modern thought is often to be found in Duns Scotus. Unity of substance, plurality in its manifestation, was the formula of Realism at the end as at the commencement of its course in the Scholastic age. "Nulla in essentia diversitas, sed sola multitudo accidentium diversitas," are the words of William of Champeaux. Descartes and Spinoza reproduced the idea. Duns repeated from Avicembron the notion that every form of existence is material, and Hobbes adopted it from him. He also indicated the inductive principle in anticipation of Bacon and Newton. He is thus the main connecting link between the philosophy of antiquity and of more recent times. His philosophy is inconsistent with a steady orthodoxy, earnest as he was in his endeavour to express himself as a zealous Catholic. He was in fact the father of more recent scepticism, and while he paved the way for future Pantheism, he gave a Pelagian tone to doctrines of grace that ill agree with the severe orthodoxy that he affected. His metaphysics were obscure and did no harm to the many; his words in general carried a Catholic sound, and he was safe. At length Dominican jealousy was aroused by his teaching; and the "angelic order" rose as one man to defend their sainted Thomas against his strictures; and the wars of the rival schools lasted from that time till the Reformation had become an established fact. The resolution of Scholasticism was unconsciously prepared by Duns Scotus and his rationalizing tendencies.

As regards the atonement Duns Scotus combats the position of Thomas, but adopted from Anselm, and followed by Pope Clement XI. in the Bull Unigenitus, that the merit of the Passion and Death of Christ being infinite, was an adequate satisfaction for the infinite demerit of sin. The merit of Christ, he says, pertained to His human nature, and was therefore finite. But it was a sufficient atonement: for it was accepted of God, and was therefore good. This acceptance theory was also followed by Ockham and the later Nominalists. To speak of sin as an infinite evil he termed a Manichean notion; for it makes it equal with Him Whom it offends. The Scotist theory is in direct antagonism with that of Anselm. He even states that a mere man (de possibili dico), if born without sin, as was Christ, and the recipient of the highest degree of grace, might have worked out the annihilation of guilt as well as an eternity of glory; for even under the present condition of things the Blessed Virgin and the Saints "meruerunt pro nobis." Nay, each man now might make satisfaction for himself, inasmuch as every man receives the gift of primary grace (in distinction from the secondary grace of repentance after baptism), and if without his own good this grace is vouchsafed to him, whereby he merits blessedness, he might also merit the annihilation of guilt, "potuit etiam meruisse deletionem culpæ." Hence he concludes that the Christian scheme of redemption was not absolutely "necessary," except by the divine ordinance, which ruled that so it should be [In Sent. dist. 19, pp. 428-430], and made it necessary, "necessitate consequentiæ;" therefore we are the more bound to love Him, "ideo multum tenemur ei." In a spirit of Rationalism, he says that Christ seeing the depth of sin into which the Jewish people had sunk, "maluit mori quam tacere, . . . et ideo pro iustitia mortuus est." The whole work of redemption, therefore, is made by him essential only as being the divine plan, and he departs "toto cælo" from the position of Aquinas, that the death of Christ is "satisfactio non solum sufficiens sed superabundans," by reason of the infinite worth of that life, "quæ erat vita Dei et hominis." The question then falls back upon the absolute will of God. On that will everything depends. Good is not good but as decreed by the Absolute. He does not love the good because they are good, but they are good because He loves them. By that will the sacrifice of the death of Christ was ordained from eternity and human intellect is here estopped. The Thomist ontology, on the other hand, taught that the absolute goodness of the Deity did not depend conditionally on the absolute will, but that the absolute will of God was based on the attribute of absolute goodness. In the will of the Deity were implied at the same time absolute freedom, and yet absolute dependence on the laws of His own being. God "cannot deny Himself." And the Son became Incarnate that He might harmonize by mediation these conflicting attributes.

The Thomists were always distinguished by their steady maintenance of Church principle and opposition to rationalizing heresies. In philosophy they were eclectic Conceptualists, and followed the Aristotelian theory of universals, while the Scotists were Platonic Realists. With the first the intellect determined the will, "intellectus invenitur superior motor" [Thom. Aq. Summa c. gent. iii. 26, 1, see also Prim. sec. qu. 19, art. 10]; with the latter the will was the supreme motive power of the inner man, "voluntas est motor in toto regno animæ, et omnia obediunt sibi" [Duns Sc. in Sent. ii. dist. 42, qu. 4, 2]. Hence, in theology the Thomists took their stand upon the necessity for an intellectual knowledge of the truth, and of God as the first cause of all things. They were close followers of the Augustinian view of sin and grace; yet with a toning down of its harsher features, and with a lofty moral involving the element of human merit as Augustine never would have admitted it. The Scotists referred the gift of grace to Divine predestination based upon prescience, and affirmed that man had sufficient strength left after the Fall to achieve his first "meritum de congruo;" they described original sin in a Semi-Pelagian way as inseparable from the finite; and grace as the naturally ordained development of spiritual life. They allowed the power of the keys to be efficacious to the remission of eternal as well as temporal punishment; but the priest exercised the power only as an implement in the hand of God, who could give efficacy to baptism even though administered by an angel of darkness. The Thomist recognised in the merit of Christ an infinite worth, by reason of his Divine nature (satisfactio superabundans); the Scotist ascribed to it a value decreed by the Father to be effective (acceptatio gratuita), making it to appear that Christ died only for the sake of truth and justice, and as a declaratory act of God's purposes of mercy.

A new element of diversity was introduced by the greater attention that was paid to Biblical learning; this also helped to weaken the position of Scholasticism. As in the twelfth century, Peter, precentor of Paris, and Othlone had returned to scriptural exposition, so in the thirteenth Roger Bacon [born A.D. 1214], a Franciscan, and styled for the geniality of his disposition and depth of his attainments in physical science, "Doctor mirabilis," claimed for Scripture its high authority as the ultimate appeal in matters of controversy [Opus Majus, A.D. 1266, and Ep. de Lawe S. Scr.]. He endeavoured to call men back, laymen as well as clerics, from a servile following of tradition to the Scriptures in the original languages. He ventured even to impugn the critical accuracy of the Vulgate, and atoned for his offence by a ten years' incarceration, from whence he only emerged to die [A.D. 1284]. The Dominican Hugo of St. Cher was more fortunate, for he received the Cardinal's hat [A.D. 1244], though he had ventured to purify the text of the Vulgate by a comparison of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin MSS. He also composed a concordance that fixed the present arrangement of the Bible according to chapter and verse, and a scriptural commentary, "Postillæ in universa Biblia." He died A.D. 1260.

Philosophy in all its phases had now occupied the schools from the ninth to the fourteenth century. Metaphysics had been introduced by Erigena; the question of universals by William of Champeaux and Roscellin; logic by Anselm and Abelard. Then the sudden infusion of Aristotelian ideas put an entirely new face on scholastic teaching, and germs of thought were quickened that were destined to emancipate the human intellect, and bear fruit in after centuries in the Novum Organum of Bacon. These results were powerfully helped forward by the Nominalism of William of Ockham in Surrey, the "Doctor invincibilis." He was one of the great mediæval names of which Merton College may be justly proud, a pupil of Duns Scotus, and by religious profession a Franciscan. "The wittiest" [Hooker], and "the hardest and severest intellectualist" of all the Schoolmen [Milman]; the "carus magister" of Luther, and "deliciæ quondam nostræ" of Melancthon, Ockham was, according to Selden, the best writer on ecclesiastical power before the revival of literature. He was the Rupert of the schools; having formed his own independent line, he pressed on with a vigour that bore down every obstacle, and combated every false pretension though backed by the enormous power of the Church of Rome. He was at the same time remarkably clear-headed and acute, and true to the hardy and independent spirit that had always distinguished the opponents of Realism from the days of Roscellin and Abelard. A deep metaphysician, a keen logician, he was at the same time an uncompromising foe to the temporal power and unapostolic luxury of Popedom [Ockhami Defensorium; Brown's Fasciculus, ii. 440]. Yet he was far more reverent than any of his predecessors in the handling of sacred subjects, and resolutely refused to enter into those ontological discussions with respect to the Divine Nature that so frequently gave to the schools the air of bewildered folly.

The various rays of light that struggled through the darkness of the two preceding centuries were focussed in Ockham, and from him projected into the dim future. His Nominalism struck a blow at the whole scholastic system from which it never recovered; though it established a current of rationalistic philosophy that led in the first instance to the Reformation, unfortunately also to the free handling of theological subjects by later Deists and rationalizing divines. Hobbes and Leibnitz, Locke and Kant, were forestalled in various particulars by the teaching of Ockham. Realism had become so completely interwoven in the entire texture of the schools, that its period of decay caused the general break up of much that was faulty and effete in the main substance of the web. The revival of Nominalism therefore by Ockham was a decided step in the onward march of the human intellect, and prepared the way for a sweeping reform, both in theology and philosophy, a question now only of time. Papal pretensions had become unbearable, and when the imperious Bull "Ausculta fili" was burnt at Paris in presence of Philip the Fair, his nobles and whole people [A.D. 1302], and the feat proclaimed through Paris by a poursuivant with a flourish of trumpets [Fleury, xc. 7], the way was paved for John Huss, the precursor of Luther. Ockham was a complete demagogue; but his fury was principally directed against the abuses that gave strength to the enemies of the Church. The voluntary poverty of the Fraticelli, and the hold that it gave them on popular respect and regard, caused Ockham to inveigh against Papal avarice [Defensorium Ockhami], and to demand the return of his order to its original constitution of poverty. For this he was cast off by the brotherhood, and excommunicated by the Pope; ostensibly, however, for taking part with the refractory Emperor Louis of Bavaria, to whose court he now fled for protection. This he received by mutual compact in return for the service of his powerful pen against the Pope [Avent. vii. 955]. Both parties were faithful to the agreement, and when [A.D. 1344] an arrangement was proposed between the Emperor and the Pope, Louis refused to give up Ockham as one of the conditions. Ockham, always at home in polemics, was writing a fresh work against the Pope when death arrested his pen, A.D. 1347, in which same year the Emperor also died.

Ockham's hardihood of thought led him into Pelagianism, with which he was always taxed by the leaders of the Reformation¹ [Laurence, B. Lect. p. 59]; and it was he who gave its first impulse to the notion of merit "de congruo," though virtually it is identical with the "dispositio ad gratiam" of Aquinas [i. dist. 41, qu. 1, art. 3]. The penitential distinction also of "attrition" and "contrition," combined by Thomas under the latter term, were divided out by Ockham, after which time they were generally separated the one from the other [Scot. iv., dist. 14, qu. 2].

The five principal Schoolmen have been aptly designated by Milner [Lat. Chr. vi. 451], as Albert the Great the philosopher, Aquinas the theologian, Bonaventura the mystic, Duns Scotus the dialectician, Ockham the politician. They were the leaders of that great intellectual movement of the Middle Ages that, when all was without form and void, was the herald rather of future life than in itself life. But with all their labours they effected little, the Summa of Aquinas alone being excepted. Mental philosophy was kept in abeyance by the shadowy visions of Realism. Their system was but a reproduction of the Neo-Platonic Eclecticism of Plotinus, stained with the Pantheism of Proclus. Their natural science was successful only so far as the pursuit of alchemy led them to stumble on useful chemical results. Their theology, so far as it was sound, is better studied in the tomes of the Fathers, from whence their isolated texts were culled for discussion. Hence, it has been said, and not untruly, "With all their researches into the unfathomable they have fathomed nothing; and with all their vast logical apparatus they have proved nothing to the satisfaction of the inquisitive mind" [Milman Lat. Chr. vi. 452].

SCOTOPITES. One of the many names of the Circumcellions. It is found in Isid. Hispal., and in Gratian's Decretals, II. xxiv. 3. [CIRCUMCELLIONS.]

SCOTTISH BAPTISTS. This branch of the sect of the Baptists owes its origin to an Anti-burgher minister of Coupar-Angus, named Carmichael, who quitted the Scotch Secession, and was dipped by Dr. Gill in London in 1765. The Scottish Baptists are Calvinistic in doctrine, and more congregational in government than English Baptists, as well as stricter in discipline. They maintain the necessity of a plurality of pastors in every congregation, and the exercise of public mutual exhortation by the members. At the census of 1851 they were returned as having fifteen meeting-houses in England, with 2037 sittings. In Scotland the Baptists were returned as having in general, without distinction of separate branches, 119 places of worship, with 26,086 sittings. [Eadie's Cyclopædia. Religions of the World, 1870.]

SCOTTISH CONFESSION. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

SCOTTISH KIRK. A Presbyterian community² founded on the ruins of the ancient Scottish Church in the sixteenth century, and established as the national religion of the country by Acts of Parliament, passed before and at the time of its Union with England.

I. EARLY PRESBYTERIANISM OF SCOTLAND. It has been shewn in the article on the PURITANS, that the steady onward flow of Reformation by authority, in the Church of England, was met by a strong current of opposition to the Episcopal system of Church government, and by a persistent endeavour on the part of the Puritans to introduce into England that system of parochial tyranny which went by the name of "The Discipline." After a bitter struggle, which lasted for a century, the Reformation by authority at length gained the better of the lawless democratic movement, and Episcopacy was firmly established in England as soon as ever a short trial of Presbyterianism had shewn its unfitness for the English nation. In Scotland the same elements of agitation were at work, but under very different circumstances, and with a very different result. "As we cast our glance upon Scotland towards the end of the first quarter of the sixteenth century," writes Principal Tulloch, "we behold a very disturbed picture—the king, the great nobles, and the clergy sharing between them an authority which has not worked itself into any consistent and beneficent form of national order. In comparison with the well-developed, massive and richly-pictured life of England at the same period, there is a great rudeness and disorder, and, in a word, barbarism, in Scotland. . . . While in England, accordingly, we see a balanced movement proceeding gradually and under royal sanction, in Scotland we behold an insurrectionary impulse long repressed, but at length gathering force till it breaks down and sweeps all barriers before it" [Tulloch's Leaders of the Reform, 257]. The Reformation movement in Scotland was, indeed, to a far greater extent than in England, a political movement. There was little or no contest between the national rulers and the Pope, but there was a bitter contest between the Crown and the people; a contest so bitter that the monarchy escaped destruction only by the removal of the throne to England; and while that removal secured the political authority of the Crown, it led to the final ruin of the Church and the establishment of Presbyterianism.

² "Kirk is the official designation of the Scottish Presbyterian Establishment, but is only the archaic form of the English word 'Church'" [DICT. OF THEOL., CHURCH]. It is convenient in use as distinguishing the Presbyterian community from the Episcopal Church of Scotland, but it is not so commonly heard among Scottish people as formerly.

Amidst the "barbarism" and "insurrectionary impulse" which thus characterized the Scottish Reformation, a leader arose in the person of John Knox [A.D. 1505-1572] who took his colour from these elements of the movement, and whose force of character enabled him to guide it in whatever direction he chose. When Luther was first coming into notice, Knox was a student at the University of Glasgow, and had gained some notoriety there as an able and enthusiastic defender of Mediæval Theology. In the year 1530 he was ordained to the priesthood, having some cure, probably in connection with St. Andrews. About five years afterwards his opinions began to turn in exactly the opposite direction to that in which they had been conspicuously bent hitherto, and in 1542 he avowed himself a Calvinist.

At this time the tide of theological revolution was setting in strongly in Scotland. A young monk named Patrick Hamilton [A.D. 1504-1527], whom the abuses of the times had raised to the high office of Abbot of Ferne while he was a mere boy, had learned something of Lutheranism during a short stay in Germany, and returned to Scotland as zealous for the Germanism of that day as many a youth of two-and-twenty is, under similar circumstances, for the Germanism of the nineteenth century. Although a monk and an abbot, and only twenty-two years of age, Hamilton also returned to England with a wife: and when, in addition to all his other transgressions, he set himself up as a teacher of novelties to men old enough to be his grandfathers, the cruel spirit of the times soon got rid of the troublesome youth by sending him to the stake for heresy. He was burnt at Glasgow on February 29th, 1528. From that time men began to inquire about the new doctrines, and a "reforming" party sprung up quickly. With that old coarseness of the Scottish tongue which is sometimes taken for picturesqueness, a "merie gentleman" told the Archbishop of Glasgow, "Gif ye burn more, let them be burnt in how" [hollow] "sellars, for the reik of Mr. Patrick Hamilton has infected as many as it did blow upon."

Whether Knox was one of those who were infected in this manner or not it is impossible to say, for no facts are known respecting his history for fourteen years after Hamilton's death, except that he became a priest, and that soon afterwards he shewed a leaning towards the principles which he openly avowed in 1542, and for which he was degraded from the priesthood in 1543.

Knox is next heard of as the constant companion of George Wishart [A.D. 1514-1546], one of the conspirators hired for Henry VIII. by Lord Hertford (afterwards the Duke of Somerset) to assassinate Cardinal Beaton. Although Knox constantly accompanied Wishart about in his preachings with a "twa-handed sword," his protection was not sufficient to secure the latter from being apprehended on charges of treason and heresy; and being found guilty of both he was strangled and burnt three months before an opportunity had been found for assassinating the Cardinal; the execution of Wishart taking place on March 1st, and the death of Beaton on May 29th, in the year 1546. After the latter event the assassins defended themselves in the Castle of St. Andrews for more than a year, but they were eventually taken prisoners by the French, Knox being among them, on July 29th, 1547.

Knox is said to have been sent to the galleys, and to have suffered great hardships; but he soon found his way to England, for less than six months after he had been taken prisoner, that is in December 1547, he appears in the State Papers as one of the preachers licensed by the Privy Council of Edward VI., and he remained in England during the whole of the young King's reign, being appointed one of the Royal Chaplains. On October 21st, 1552, the Privy Council appointed him one of the Commissioners for reviewing the Articles of Religion [MS. P. C. Register, B. Mus.]. On January 2nd following, the Council ordered a letter to be written "to Lord Russel, Lord Windsor, the Justices of the Peace, and the rest of the gentlemen of the county of Buckingham in favour of Mr. Knocks the preacher" [ibid.]. On February 2nd, 1553, they wrote to Cranmer desiring the Archbishop to collate him to "the Vicarage or Parsonage of All Hallows in Bread Street, vacant by the preferment of Thomas Sampson to the Deanery of Chichester"¹ [ibid.]. A little later the Duke of Northumberland desired to appoint him to the Bishopric of Rochester, that he might "be a whetstone to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and a confounder of the Anabaptists of Kent." The death of Edward VI., on July 6th, 1553, put an end, however, to Knox's career in England, and he immediately fled from the danger which he and others expected to arise out of the accession of Queen Mary.

For a short time Knox became chaplain to the English refugees at Frankfort, but the dissensions which he excited among them became so serious that the authorities of the city would not allow him to remain, and he took up his residence at Geneva, where he lived from 1555 to 1559 as pastor of the English congregation there. While safe from the power of the English government, he wrote and sent into England an inflammatory and treasonable little book entitled, "The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women," in which he set forth [1] that the Queen being a woman was under the curse of God; [2] that she was a bastard, and therefore an usurper; [3] that it was the duty of the nobility and estates without further delay to remove her from authority, and afterwards to execute against her the sentence of death. This work, and another similar to it, written by Knox's friend Christopher Goodman, produced a seditious spirit among their Protestant friends who remained in England, and had naturally much influence in provoking the Privy Council of Queen Mary to treat them in that merciless manner which is matter of history.

The disappointments which Knox had met with as to preferment in England had prepared his mind for the lesson of Presbyterianism which he was to learn in Geneva. The rule of Bishops had become as unsavoury to him as the "regiment" of Queens, and the position held by Calvin at Geneva shewed him a way by which he could reach a position of almost unlimited influence among the Protestants of Scotland, whose inclinations he had tested during a secret visit which he had paid to his long-forsaken native country in 1555-6. The accession of Queen Elizabeth in 1559 gave Knox and his friends hopes that their party would be able to carry on their work of agitation without danger under the shadow of her influence even in Scotland; and he returned thither at once, an organization of the reforming party having already been effected by a body of revolutionary nobility and gentry violently opposed to the Queen Regent, who styled themselves "The Lords of the Congregation."

The work which Knox now set himself to do was that of destroying the Ecclesiastical Institutions of Scotland, and substituting in their place a system similar to that which Calvin had recently invented and established at Geneva. The Queen Regent had endeavoured to direct the reformation tendencies of the age in the same authoritative manner that had been adopted by the English Government during the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., and had issued a proclamation which prohibited any person from preaching or administering the Sacraments without authority from the bishops. This proclamation being disregarded, four of the preachers who had disobeyed it were charged with exciting sedition, and their trial was fixed to take place at Stirling on May 10th, 1559. On the second of that month Knox landed in Scotland, and on his arrival in Edinburgh being known he was declared an outlaw. The Lords who were opposing the Crown gathered round him, however, and formed so strong a party that it was determined he should appear at the trial of the preachers, and he went northward for that purpose as far as Perth. While there Knox preached in the cathedral one of his passionate invectives against the worship of images and the idolatry of the Mass, and within a very few minutes after the sermon had ended the Church was gutted by the mob, all the vestments, sacred utensils, and ornaments of every kind being treated with sacrilegious insult and destroyed. From the cathedral the mob proceeded to the monasteries, and gathering numbers as they went, were soon strong enough to overcome the authorities, so that the houses of the Dominicans, Franciscans, and Carthusians were in a few hours brought to a state of utter ruin.

This riot at Perth brought the revolution to a climax. The Queen Regent herself marched against the city with the intention of restoring authority, but the Lords of the Congregation had formed so compact an organization that, although they retired to St. Andrews, they were able quickly to carry their purpose against her. From that time until James VI. of Scotland became James I. of England the former country was practically governed by a faction of the nobility and the preachers, Knox being the chief instigator of all the revolutionary measures in Church and State by which the authority of the Crown and the constitution of the Church were destroyed, and the country involved in unceasing civil war. The example set by the rioters at Perth was followed at Stirling, Lindores, Cupar, St. Andrews, and in other parts of the country; many of the clergy and monks were driven away, the laity took possession of the ecclesiastical property for their own use, and the first part of the work, that of destruction, was completed in an incredibly short space of time through the absence of any efficient control on the part of those whose office it should have been to have prevented such outrages on law and order.

The introduction of the Presbyterian system was formally confirmed by the Scottish Parliament that assembled at Edinburgh after the death of the Queen Regent, which took place on June 10th, 1560, and before any authority for its meeting had been received from Queen Mary, who did not arrive in Scotland until 1561. Early in August 1560, this self-appointed Parliament passed an Act which embodied a Calvinistic Confession drawn up by Knox, assisted by five preachers named Winram, Spottiswood, Willock, Douglas, and Row, and which was enacted to be "The Confession of the faith and doctrine believed and professed by the Protestants of Scotland." Three other Acts of Parliament were passed on the 22nd and 23rd of the same month: the first abolishing the authority of the Pope in Scotland, the second repealing all previous Acts connected with the Church, the third enacting that all who celebrated, or were present at, Mass should be punished on the first offence by imprisonment, on the second by banishment, and on the third by death.

The constitution of the Scottish Kirk, whose creed was thus established by Act of Parliament, is to be found in "the Book of Policy" or "Discipline," drawn up by Knox, and adopted by the first "General Assembly" (composed of six ministers and thirty-six laymen), which met at Edinburgh on December 20th, 1560. The most important portion of this is contained under the "fourth and fifth heads," which provide "concerning ministers and their lawful election." In these "heads" Knox divided Scotland into ten "dioceses," which were each to be governed by a "superintendent," who was to be appointed by "the ministers of the province, with the superintendents next adjacent," from among those who had been nominated by any of "the churches within the diocese." His preaching was to be tried, and his "learning, manners, prudence, and ability to govern the Church," were to be examined into, but "other ceremonies than this examination, the approbation of ministers and superintendents, with the public consent of elders and people, we do not admit." The office of these "superintendents" was to "travel from place to place for establishing of the Church," to "preach the word," and to "visit his churches;" and he was to be subject to the censure and correction of the ministers and elders of his diocese. Each of them was to be provided with "six chalders of beer, nine chalders meal, and three chalders oats for provand to his horse, with five hundred marks money, which may be augmented and diminished at the discretion of the Prince and Council of the realm." They were not to remain in one place above three or four months, were to preach thrice a week at least, and were "not to rest till the churches be wholly planted and provided of ministers, or at the least of readers." They were in their visitations to "try the life, diligence, and behaviour of the ministers, the order of their churches, and the manners of their people; how the poor are provided, and how the youth is instructed;" they were to admonish where admonition was needed, and to "take note of all heinous crimes, that the same may be corrected by the censures of the Church."

The "ministers" came next in order, and they also were to be elected by each congregation for themselves, being subsequently examined "as well in life and manners as in doctrine and knowledge," by "men of soundest judgment, remaining in some principal town next adjacent to them," who are defined as the "ministers and elders" of the place. "Other ceremonies than the public approbation of the people, and the declaration of the chief minister that the person there presented is appointed to serve that church, we cannot approve; for albeit the Apostles used the imposition of hands, yet seeing the miracle is ceased, the using of the ceremony we judge not to be necessary." Each minister was to have "forty bolls meal, and twenty bolls malt, with money to buy other provision to his house and serve his other necessities," all payments to be made a quarter in advance and to be modified at "the judgment of the church" year by year. The children of ministers were also to have all privileges that could be given to them. Where "true ministers" could not be provided for, "readers" were to be appointed, each of whom was to be paid forty marks a year for teaching the children of the parish, "reading of the Common Prayer and the books of the Old and New Testament," and exhorting and explaining, if he were fit to do so, in which latter case he was to have a larger stipend "till he come to the degree of a minister."

"Elders" and "deacons" were to be elected every year on the 1st of August, but might be re-elected year by year. The elders were "to assist the minister in all public affairs of the church: to wit, in judging and decerning of causes, in giving admonition to licentious livers, and having an eye upon the manners and conversation of all men within their charge." They were "also to take heed to the life, manners, diligence, and study of their ministers, and if he be worthy of admonition, they must admonish him—if of correction, they must correct him—and if he be worthy of deposition, they, with the consent of the church and superintendent, may depose him." The deacons were "to receive the rents and gather the alms of the church, to keep and distribute the same as they shall be appointed by the ministry and the church; yet they may also assist in judgment the ministers and elders, and be admitted to read in public assemblies, if they be called, required, and found able thereto."

Further provisions of this first "Book of Discipline" are for either a sermon or the use of the Common Prayer¹ every day in great towns, "with some exercise of reading the Scriptures;" in other towns such order was to be observed as the churches in the town should appoint. "The day of public sermon we do not think the common prayers needful to be used, lest we should foster the people in superstition, who come to the prayers as they come to the Mass, or give them occasion to think that those are no prayers which are conceived before and after sermon." The "administration of the Lord's Table" was to be confined to the first Sundays in March, June, September, and December, "that the superstitious observation of times may be avoided as far as may be: for it is known how superstitiously people run unto that action upon Easter, as if the time gave virtue to the Sacrament, whereas the rest of the whole year they are careless and negligent, as though it belonged not unto them but at that time only." Respecting Baptism, it was ordered to be administered with water only, "the Word and declaration of the promises preceding." Marriages were to be performed openly in the face of the church and after banns, but no ceremony is enacted. They are also forbidden "if the man be within thirteen years of age, and the woman within twelve at least." It was recommended that Burials should take place without any religious ceremony or sermon, but these might be tolerated with the consent of the minister.

This Book of Discipline sets forth substantially the system which has been permanently adopted in the Kirk of Scotland, except that the system of "superintendents" was quickly dropped, their work being done by "presbyteries," which answer to English "Rural Deaneries." The Book was submitted to Parliament, but did not at that time receive formal Parliamentary sanction. It was also submitted to the Privy Council, and a number of Privy Councillors subscribed to it, but only in their private capacities. Spottiswoode, the historian of the Church of Scotland, remarks that "most of these that subscribed getting into their hands the possessions of the Church, could never be induced to part therewith, and turned greater enemies in that point of Church patrimony than were the papists or any other whatsoever." The Book of Discipline was issued in a revised form several years after the death of Knox, in 1578, but the Second Book, drawn up in 1581, was ratified by Act of Parliament in 1592. Meanwhile, in 1580, "The National Covenant, or the Confession of Faith," of which a description is given in the article on the COVENANTERS, was imposed upon the Scottish people.

The "Presbyterian Church Government and Discipline, that is to say, the government of the Church by Kirk-Sessions, Presbyteries, Provincial Synods, and General Assemblies," was "ratified and established by the 114 Act James VI. Parl. 12, Anno 1592, entitled Ratification of the Liberty of the Kirk, etc., and thereafter received by the general consent of" the "nation to be the only government of Christ's Church within" the "Kingdom" of Scotland [Act, 7th June 1690].

Contemporarily with this introduction of the Presbyterian system in 1560, the Parliament of Scotland passed an Act for the demolition of those Monasteries and Abbey Churches which had not yet been destroyed. "Thereupon ensued," says Spottiswoode, "a pitiful vastation of churches and church buildings throughout all the parts of the realm; for every one made bold to put to their hands, the meaner sort imitating the ensample of the greater and those who were in authority. No difference was made, but all the churches were either defaced or pulled to the ground. The holy vessels, and whatsoever else men could make gain of, as timber, lead and bells, were put to sale. The very sepulchres of the dead were not spared. The registers of the church and bibliothèques were cast into the fire. In a word, all was ruined, and what had escaped in the time of the first tumult did now undergo the common calamity, which was so much the worse, that the violences committed at this time were coloured with the warrant of public authority. Some ill-advised preachers did likewise animate the people in these their barbarous proceedings, crying out, 'That the places where idols had been worshipped ought by the law of God to be destroyed, and that the sparing of them was the reserving of things execrable.' . . . The report also went that John Knox, whose sayings were by many esteemed as oracles, should in one of his sermons say, 'That the sure way to banish the rooks was to pull down their nests'" [Spottiswoode's Hist. Ch. Scot. i. 372, ed. 1851].

II. THE SCOTTISH KIRK AND THE STUARTS. The peculiar course which the Reformation took in Scotland was in nothing more strange than in its results as to the Episcopate. Some of the old bishops turned with the times, and either retained the revenues of their sees, as did Robert Stewart, Bishop of Caithness and Earl of Lennox, or made over those revenues to some of their relatives, as did Alexander Gordon, Bishop of Galloway: in both cases ceasing to exercise the Episcopal office although retaining the Episcopal title. As these old bishops died off, nominal successors were sometimes appointed by the Crown, or the Regents acting in the name of the Crown; and thus there were titular bishops of the ancient sees who were never consecrated nor even in priests' orders.¹

This continuance of a nominal Episcopate, side by side with the Presbyterian establishment, was much favoured by the Court party, but it is difficult to say whether from reasons of self-interest as regarded the ancient revenues of the sees, or in the hope that the shadow of an Episcopate might some day be turned into a reality. In the year 1572 the Earl of Morton persuaded the principal nobility to agree that the titles of Archbishops and Bishops should be continued during the minority of James VI., and that the persons bearing them should be entitled to sit in Parliament: and to conciliate the Presbyterians, it was also agreed that these bishops should be chosen by an assembly of Presbyterian ministers, and be subject to the General Assembly. But in practice the appointments fell into the hands of the Crown, while the titular bishops thus appointed and the General Assembly were in constant opposition to each other.

When the young King James VI. became nominally independent, though only twelve years of age, in 1578, the General Assembly of preachers took much bolder action in respect to these titular bishops than they had ventured to take while a strong-handed nobleman was Regent. Meeting at Dundee in July 1579, they first passed an "ordinance" declaring that the office of bishop had no warrant in the Word of God, and commanding "all persons either called to the said office, or that should be called thereto at any time thereafter, to demit and forsake the same, as an office whereunto they were not called by God: as also to desist and cease from preaching, ministering the sacraments, or using in any sort the office of a pastor, till they should be admitted of new by the General Assembly, under pain of excommunication." After this, in 1580, they issued the "National Covenant," previously referred to, by which "the government of the Kirk by bishops" is "declared to be unlawful within this Kirk." At this time Andrew Melville [A.D. 1545-1622], Principal of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, was rising into power as a champion of strict Presbyterianism, and becoming Moderator of the General Assembly in 1582, he excommunicated a minister of Stirling, named Robert Montgomery, who had, contrary to the decree of that self-important body, accepted from the Crown the titular Archbishopric of Glasgow. The "Raid of Ruthven" shortly followed, the avowed object of which was to protect the Kirk from the designs of the King and his friends by taking possession of his person. This opposition of the Presbyterian faction to the free action of the Crown, and the restraint under which he was placed by Lord Ruthven and his party, gave

James a lasting hatred of Presbyterianism, and when he had at last found a home in a more free country, he declared, that although he had lived among Puritans from ten years of age, he "ever disliked their opinions," and that "since he had ability to judge he was never of them." He had, moreover, learned a lesson by experience which he put into the concise epigram, "No Bishop, no King" [Cardwell's Conf. 184, etc.]. This personal aversion of the King to Presbyterian principles, and his shrewd conviction that the spread of them menaced the existence of the Crown, led him to support the titular bishops of Scotland in every way that he could: and when he succeeded to the Crown of England he took measures for grafting a true Episcopate upon the Kirk, evidently with the view of gradually assimilating the ecclesiastical system of Scotland to that of England.

In this purpose the King was probably supported by a strong anti-revolutionary party in Scotland: for in the year 1606 the Scottish Parliament passed an Act "for the restitution of Bishops," the purpose of which was that of enabling the Crown to restore to the titular bishops such portions of the estates of their respective sees as still remained in its hands. In the same year James I. endeavoured to pave the way for the restoration of Episcopal authority by proposing to the General Assembly that the titular bishops should act as permanent moderators or presidents in the presbyteries within their dioceses, thus giving them much more power in the administration of ecclesiastical affairs; and the proposition was, after some resistance, adopted by the Assembly, and put in practice throughout the Kirk. After this the King frequently urged the bishops to take on themselves the administration of all Church affairs, and as they were unwilling to do so without the consent of the ministers, an Assembly was at last called to consider the question in June 1610, the Earl of Dunbar, Sir John Preston, and Sir Alexander Hay, being Commissioners for the King, and John Spottiswoode, titular Archbishop of Glasgow, being Moderator. At this Assembly nine resolutions were assented to, which practically re-established the jurisdiction of the Crown and the bishops. [1] The Royal supremacy was put on the same footing as in England: [2] the titular bishops being ex officio moderators of all presbyteries within their dioceses, ordinations of ministers were placed, substantially, in their hands as the head of the ordaining presbytery: [3] admissions to benefices were to be made only by the bishops, as in England: [4] every minister at his ordination was to take oaths of allegiance to the Crown and of obedience to the bishop of the diocese: [5] ministers were to be suspended or deprived by the authority of the bishops, not of the presbyteries: [6] and lastly, the bishops were to hold Diocesan Synods twice every year.

The jurisdiction of the Episcopate being thus restored, James I. prepared to restore it to its proper spiritual position by having some of the titular bishops consecrated. Accordingly, John Spottiswoode, Archbishop of Glasgow, Andrew Lamb, Bishop of Brechin, and William Conper, Bishop of Galloway, were summoned to London, where the King told them that he had restored the revenues of the bishoprics and had appointed worthy men to them; but that as he could not make them bishops, nor could they make themselves so, he had called them to England that they might be consecrated, and that being thus made true bishops instead of mere titular ones they might return to Scotland to consecrate the rest. To avoid any pretence that the Archbishops of England could have to reclaim old jurisdictions in Scotland, they were excluded from taking any part in the business, and the three Scottish bishops named were consecrated on October 21st, 1610, in the chapel of London House by Abbot, Bishop of London, Andrewes, Bishop of Ely, and Montagu, Bishop of Bath and Wells.¹

When these measures had been taken, James I. established an Ecclesiastical Commission in Scotland similar to that commonly known as the "High Commission" in England. He also issued a set of Injunctions, in the same manner as Edward VI. and Elizabeth had issued theirs for England. These Injunctions required that the Scottish archbishops and bishops should reside in their cathedral cities; that they should repair their cathedrals as far as they could; that they should visit their dioceses at least every third year; that they should take steps for resettling the boundaries of their dioceses so as to make them more manageable; that strictness should be observed in admitting ministers, and that none should be admitted without Episcopal imposition of hands; that lay elders, having neither warrant in the Word, nor example in the primitive Church, should be reduced to the status of churchwardens, to be chosen by the minister and approved by the ordinary; and that the General Assembly should consist of bishops, deans, archdeacons, and such of the ministry as should be selected by the rest. These Injunctions were received without any disapproval, but the Ecclesiastical Commission raised "great discontent," says Spottiswoode, "among those that ruled the estate; for that they took it to be a restraint of their authority in matters ecclesiastical, nor did they like to see clergymen invested with such a power."

In the General Assembly of 1616 it was enacted "that a Liturgy or Book of Common Prayer should be formed for the use of the Church: that the Acts of the General Assemblies should be collected and put in form, to serve for canons to the Church in their ministration of discipline: that children should be carefully catechized and confirmed by the bishops, or, in their absence, by such as were employed in the visitation of churches." The King declared the last enactment to be a "mere hotch-potch," and suggested that children should be catechized by their parish ministers, and that the bishops themselves should alone confirm them. He also tried to introduce the observance of more reverence at the Holy Communion, and told the Archbishop of St. Andrews "that the minister's ease and commodious sitting on his tail hath been more looked to than that kneeling which, for reverence, we directly required to be enjoined to the receivers of so divine a sacrament." He was equally anxious that Christmas Day should be kept, a Church custom of which the Scottish mind has a very singular horror. After much resistance had been offered to these proposals, the "five articles" containing them were assented to by the General Assembly at Perth in 1618; and three years afterwards, in 1621, the "novations," as they were called by the Scottish Puritans, were ratified, under the name of "the Five Articles of Perth," by the Scottish Parliament.

At the time of James I.'s death in the year 1625, very little had been done towards carrying out the resolution passed in the General Assembly of 1616 that a Liturgy should be prepared for use in the Kirk. In the following year the King had introduced the English Prayer Book into Holyrood Chapel, in 1620 an Ordinal had been adopted by the Bishops, and shortly before the King's death a draft of a Liturgy had been sent to him by Spottiswoode, then Archbishop of St. Andrews, which had been returned with some revisions, but was never brought into use. Charles I., in continuation of his father's Church policy in Scotland, desired Laud, just after he had become Bishop of London in 1629, to communicate with some Scottish bishops, including Archbishop Spottiswoode, on the subject. Laud wished that the English Prayer Book should be introduced into Scotland without any alteration, and the King agreed with him; but after two or three years Charles gave way to the urgency of some of the Scottish bishops for a Liturgy of their own, and although Laud still "delayed with his obedience," he was at last required, in company with Bishops Juxon and Wren, to assist the Scottish bishops in preparing a Scottish Prayer Book. The chief compilers of it were Maxwell, Bishop of Ross, and Wedderburn, Bishop of Dunblane; but although Laud took great interest in the work, he had nothing to do with the compilation, and very little with its subsequent revision before publication. He did, however, urge the Scottish bishops to introduce the Prayer Book so prepared only in a legal and constitutional manner, and greatly objected to its being done, as it was eventually done, solely on the authority of the Crown. The Scottish Prayer Book, very similar to the English Prayer Book, but with some changes in the direction of the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., was at last authorized by a Royal Proclamation dated December 20th, 1636.¹ A book of Canons had been imposed upon the Kirk with still more imprudence and high-handedness in the preceding year.

While all this was being done in Scotland, the Puritan party both there and in England was growing stronger and bolder, and discontent in each country was encouraged and strengthened by correspondence between the two sections. This discontent at last broke out in Scotland with such sudden force as to bring the lately re-established Episcopal system to utter ruin. The King's Proclamation had ordered that all parishes should be provided with Prayer Books by Easter 1637, and the bishops ordered that the clergy should begin to use them in Divine Service on July 23rd, 1637. Edinburgh had recently been erected into an Episcopal city, and it was there that the first attempt to obey this order was made. But in St. Giles' Church, which had been made the Cathedral, the Dean and the Bishop were both assaulted by a mob of women, who, with an indecent violence to which probably no other nation except the French could shew a parallel, threw the stools which they used to sit on at the heads of those dignitaries, and endeavoured to pull them out of the reading desk and the pulpit. In the afternoon the Bishop escaped murder only by the timely appearance of the Earl of Roxburgh. This riot had been arranged as long before as the preceding April by a minister named Alexander Henderson and some other leading men of the Puritan faction, and the women had been hired to make the attack on the clergy, with the assurance that the men would support them and go on with the quarrel. Notwithstanding these riotous proceedings the Scottish Prayer Book was however taken into use by many of the clergy for several months, although both it and the Canons were petitioned against by others.

On February 19th, 1638-9, a Royal Proclamation was promulgated, the object of which was to assure the people of the King's sincere desire for the promotion of religion in the changes which had been made, and deprecating the disorders which had arisen. This had no sooner been issued than, carrying out a preconcerted plan of organized resistance, the leading Puritans first protested against the proclamation, and then formed a Convention of the Estates, consisting of four representative bodies of nobility, lairds, burgesses, and ministers, called "the Four Tables," which was to overrule all other authority in the kingdom of Scotland, with the nominal exception of the King. This body re-established the "Covenant" of 1580 and 1598, and, in conjunction with the General Assembly, added a clause to be subscribed with the Covenant by all classes of persons, stating that "the five articles of Perth, the government of the Kirk by Bishops, the civil places and power of Kirkmen, upon the reasons and grounds contained in the Acts of the General Assembly declared to be unlawful within this Kirk, we subscribe according to the determination foresaid." The Assembly also declared that it could not be dissolved, or its proceedings in any way controlled, by the Crown; and the Moderator, Henderson, wound up by a prayer in which he invoked upon the King the curse of Jericho: "Cursed be the man before the Lord that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho: he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it." But this cursing of those who disagreed with them came as naturally to Covenanters as to Popes.

The result of these measures was that the Episcopal system was utterly overthrown, and the Presbyterian system, without the "superintendents" of Knox, or the "Tulchan bishops" of James I., was established in its place. The acts of all the General Assemblies which had sat since 1606 were repealed, the bishops were deposed from their Episcopal offices, two alone being allowed to act even as ministers, and the rest being excommunicated. "All that we have done these thirty years," said Archbishop Spottiswoode, "is thrown down at once." He and most of the other bishops left the country, and only one of them all, Sydserf, survived until the Restoration.

Of the Civil War which followed nothing need here be said. It is only necessary to add, as regards the twenty years which followed the transactions narrated above, that the Presbyterianism of the Scottish Kirk largely influenced the course of Puritanism in England, and that a Puritan uniformity between the two countries was so far established that the "Confession of Faith," the "Larger Catechism," and the "Shorter Catechism," set forth by the Westminster Assembly of Divines, were adopted as the formularies of the Kirk, and still continue to be its standard of belief.¹ The Puritan "Directory of Public Worship" was also similarly adopted. [COVENANTERS.]

On the Restoration of Charles II. the Scottish Parliament immediately released all who had subscribed the Covenant from their obligation; and in a subsequent session, held at Edinburgh early in 1662, passed an Act, which stated that the Crown and Parliament "doth hereby redisintegrate the state of bishops to their ancient places and undoubted privileges in Parliament, and to all their other accustomed dignities, privileges, and jurisdictions, and doth hereby restore them to the exercise of their Episcopal functions, presidency in the Church, power of ordination, inflicting of censures, and all other acts of Church discipline, which they are to perform with advice and assistance of such of the clergy as they shall find to be of known loyalty and prudence." Sydserf, Bishop of Orkney, was however the only Scottish bishop living, and once more therefore it became necessary to obtain consecration in England. Accordingly, four Presbyterian ministers, James Sharp,² Andrew Fairfowl, Robert Leighton, and James Hamilton, went to London, where, having first renounced their Presbyterian ordination, they were ordained deacons and priests, and on December 15th, 1661, were consecrated respectively to the Sees of St. Andrews, Glasgow, Dunblane, and Galloway, by Sheldon, Bishop of London, Morley, Bishop of Worcester, Sterne, Bishop of Carlisle, and Lloyd, Bishop of Llandaff. Returning to Scotland, these new bishops consecrated six others on May 7th and three on June 1st, 1662, and thus a hierarchy, composed of fourteen bishops, was re-established in Scotland. This was kept up in regular course until the invasion of England by William III., and as many as thirty-eight Scottish bishops were consecrated between December 15th, 1661, and September 4th, 1688, exactly double the number of those who were consecrated in England during the same twenty-seven years. During the same period all the ministers of the Kirk received holy orders at the hands of the bishops; but as many as four hundred of those whom the bishops found occupying benefices in 1662 are said to have refused ordination, and consequently to have given up their ministrations in the Kirk.

III. LATER SETTLEMENT OF PRESBYTERIANISM IN THE KIRK. The Revolution Parliament of Scotland in 1688 passed an Act "abolishing Prelacy and all superiority of any office in the Church in this kingdom above presbyters," and as the bishops and most Episcopalians continued to adhere to James II., the Presbyterians were henceforth able to carry everything their own way with William III. and his government. On June 7th, 1690, an Act was passed in the Scottish Parliament by which our sovereign Lord and Lady, the King and Queen's Majesties, and three Estates of Parliament, ratified and established the Confession of Faith of the Westminster Divines, and "the government of the Church by Kirk-sessions, Presbyteries, Provincial Synods, and General Assemblies." At the Union of the two Kingdoms in 1707 the Presbyterian schism was established by authority of the English Parliament [3 & 4 Ann. c. 6; 4 & 5 Ann. c. 15], an "Act of Security" having previously been passed in Scotland, enacting that the Presbyterian form of Church government should "continue without any alteration to the people of this land in all succeeding generations."

With this settlement ended the combination of the Scottish Presbyterians, except so far as they were still opposed to Episcopacy. A process of disintegration has separated from the Kirk one body after another, until the great division of the FREE KIRK movement seemed to threaten its existence altogether. Supported, however, by Acts of the English Parliament, and by the endowments inherited from former times, the Kirk is still a flourishing body, numbering about half the people of Scotland.

SCHWENCKFELDIANS. A sect of German Anti-Sacramentalists founded by Caspar Schwenckfeld [A.D. 1490-1562], a nobleman of Silesia, at the time of the Reformation.

At the first outbreak of the German Reformation it was joined by Schwenckfeld, whose position gave him the opportunity of promoting its objects in his own district, around Ossing, and also in Silesia generally, he being one of the councillors of the Duke of Liegnitz. But as early as the year 1524 he began to shew discontent with the teaching of Luther, especially with his theory of Consubstantiation: and imagining that the true doctrine respecting the Holy Eucharist had been confided to him by a special revelation, he propounded an idea which afterwards pervaded Protestant theology very extensively through the teaching of Zwingli. This was that our Lord's words of Institution are to be understood as if He had said "My Body is this"—a spiritual food, which nourishes the soul as bread does the body, "My Blood is this"—a spiritual drink, which nourishes the soul as wine does the body. His theory went on to maintain that the Sacraments are not means, but only signs of grace; and that the benefit which they signify comes, not in, through, or with them, but directly from God: for "the Almighty, Eternal Word," he says, "proceeds out of the mouth of God directly and immediately, and not through the Scripture, through external word, through Sacrament, or any other created thing in earth or heaven" [Schwenckfeld, de cursu Verbi Dei, 1527].

The opinion thus broached by Schwenckfeld, and his opposition to Luther's doctrine of justification by faith, which he considered as having a tendency to Antinomian license, led to his banishment from Silesia in 1527. Settling for a time at Strasburg, he there developed an heretical theory respecting the Human Nature of our Lord, which really lay at the root of his error respecting the Eucharist. This he stated in a work entitled "Quæstiones vom Erkantnus Jesu Christi und seiner Glorien," in which he maintained that the Human Nature of our Lord is not that of a being created by God as other beings are created, but derived in some higher manner from the Divine Nature, on the one hand, and from His Virgin Mother on the other. Thus, as to Christ's Human as well as His Divine Nature, he maintained that He was naturally the Son of God.

Schwenckfeld supported his opinions vigorously by his writings, and was opposed with no more than his usual bitterness towards all opponents by Luther, who gave him the ribald nickname of "Stenckfeld." In Schlusselfburg's "Catalogue of Heresies" this name is the only one given, his tenth volume of 600 pages being entitled "de secta Stenckenfeldis."

He did not, however, organize a sect himself, although one was formed from among his adherents in Silesia, which attained some notoriety after his death. The members of this sect underwent severe persecution from the Lutherans, but increased in numbers and became a formidable rival to that community in Silesia. Early in the eighteenth century the Jesuits sent missionaries among the Schwenckenfelders, and in 1725 the Emperor ordered that all their children should be brought up as Catholics. Most of them then fled into Saxony; whence, after eight years, some removed to Altona in Denmark, and embarked in 1734 for Pennsylvania, where a small body of them still exists, retaining their extreme Anti-Sacramentarian opinions, and using the German language in their services. A few returned from Saxony to Silesia in 1763, when the latter country came under Prussian rule. [Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzer-historie, xvi. 20. Dörner's Person of Christ, II. ii. 143, Clark's transl.]

SCHWESTRIONES. A name of reproach, "Sisterers," given to the LULLARDS and BEGHARDS.

SE-BAPTISTS. An insignificant sect which struck off from the Brownists [INDEPENDENTS] early in the seventeenth century, and received this name from the act of their leader, Smith, in baptizing himself. But it is not clear that self-baptism was really the practice of the sect. "Mr. Smith," says Neale, in his "History of the Puritans," "was a learned man and of good abilities, but of an unsettled head, as appears by the preface to one of his books, in which he desires that his last writings may always be taken for his present judgment. He was for refining upon the Brownists' scheme, and at last declared for the principles of the Baptists; upon this he left Amsterdam, and settled with his disciples at Ley, where, being at a loss for a proper administrator of the ordinance of baptism, he plunged himself, and then performed the ceremony upon others, which gained him the name of a Se-Baptist. He afterwards embraced the tenets of Arminius, and published certain conclusions upon those points in the year 1611, which Mr. Robinson answered; but Smith died soon after, and his congregation dissolved." [Neale's Hist. Purit. ii. 49, ed. 1732.]

SEBUÆL. This name is given to the second of the four Samaritan sects named by Epiphanius, the other three being the Essenes, Gorthæans, and Dosithæans [Epiph. Hæc. xi.]. Lightfoot, in his Horæ Talmudicæ, considers them to be identical with the SABÆANS.

SECESSION KIRK or ASSOCIATE SYNOD. The first great offshoot of the Scottish Presbyterians after their re-establishment by William III. Although they had been united in their opposition to Episcopacy, the Presbyterians soon began to quarrel among themselves. First, the Cameronians protested against the relaxation of any testimony of adherence to the Solemn League and Covenant and to all therein involved. Next, the restoration of lay patronage and the intrusion of unacceptable presentees into recusant parishes, roused a spirit of dissatisfaction, which found vent first in the Secession and subsequently in the Relief movement. Patronage was the leading cause of dissension ; but other causes were also found in the condemnation, on the one hand, of the Marrow of Modern Divinity in the General Assembly in 1720 [MARROW-MEN], and in the lenient dealing, on the other hand, by the Assembly in 1717 and 1726-9, with Professor John Simson, of Glasgow, who was alleged to have maintained Pelagian and Arian views,¹ and in 1736 with Professor Archibald Campbell, of St. Andrews, who was charged with unscriptural tenets, in teaching that "the sole and universal motives to virtuous actions are self-love, interest, or pleasure ;" that "the laws of nature in themselves are a certain and sufficient rule to direct rational minds to happiness ;" that "men, without revelation, cannot by their natural powers find out that there is a God," etc. Simson was suspended from office in 1729, Thomas Boston protesting against the inadequacy of the sentence ; but Campbell was dismissed uncensured upon his proffering explanations which were held to be sufficient.

Before this, however, the Secession movement had begun. In 1732 an Act passed the Assembly (which was repealed in 1734) restricting the right of electing a minister, when a patron did not present, to the Protestant heritors (or landowners) and elders of the parish, excluding all the other members of the congregation. Against this Ebenezer Erskine preached a violent and inflammatory sermon, at a Synod-meeting at Perth, in October of the same year, for which he was censured by the Synod ; he appealed to the General Assembly in the following year, but there his expressions were condemned as offensive, and he was sentenced to be rebuked and admonished. As usual in such cases, he protested (with three other ministers, William Wilson, Alexander Moncrieff, and James Fisher) against the decision, and declared that he would preach upon all proper occasions as before. Thereupon he and the others were in August of the same year [1733] suspended, all of them protesting again that the sentence was null and void, and that they would still exercise their ministry. In November, after having rejected the proposals of a committee appointed to negotiate with them, the four ministers were dismissed from their several parochial charges, and declared to be no longer ministers of the Church. Another protest followed, in which they declared that they were now, "for many weighty reasons, obliged to make a Secession." They then constituted themselves a Presbytery, and published a "Testimony" in their vindication.

¹ He denied original sin, maintaining that the souls of infants are created as pure and holy as that of Adam before the Fall, and appeared to impugn the supreme Deity of our Lord in affirming that "the Three Persons of the adorable Trinity are not to be said to be numerically one in substance or essence." But among the propositions which the Seceders condemned as "dangerous and pernicious errors, dishonouring to a God of truth, and having an evident tendency to subvert the souls of men," were also these ; that it is probable that none are excluded from the benefit of the remedy for sin provided by God except those who exclude themselves by actual sin, and reject God's revelations, and that therefore the heathen may share in the benefit of Christ's reconciliation ; that God has promised to bless with success the use of the means of grace to those who go about them with seriousness, sincerity, and faith ; that it is more than probable that all baptized infants dying in infancy are saved ; and that it is therefore probable that of the whole race of mankind more are elected and saved than reprobated and damned—a proposition very unacceptable to the true Presbyterian, who glories in reprobation, etc.

But in the following year the General Assembly evinced an earnest desire to reconcile the seceders. Among other conciliatory and healing measures they repealed the obnoxious Act respecting election of ministers, and, above all, they empowered the Synod of Perth to restore those who had been deprived to their respective charges, while that Synod itself went so far as to elect Ebenezer Erskine himself for its moderator. Because, however, the Assembly had not confessed the sinfulness of its own past actions, and penitentially acknowledged itself to have been in the wrong throughout, the four ministers refused to be reconciled ; and as the Assembly shortly afterwards maintained an unacceptable presentee in his appointment to a parish, and dismissed Professor Campbell from trial without censure, they published in December 1737 a second and longer document, entitled "Act, declaration, and testimony, for the doctrine, worship, discipline and government of the Church of Scotland ; by some ministers associate together," etc., in which they give an historical review of the "defections" of the Establishment, enter largely into the cases of Simson and Campbell, and, finally, deliver their own testimony respecting what they regard as true Presbyterian principles, including the denunciation of all toleration to others.² In 1737, the sectarian party was strengthened by the accession of two other ministers, Ralph Erskine and Thomas Mair, and two more joined them shortly afterwards ; and on May 12th, 1740, the whole eight were deposed from the ministry of the Established Kirk by sentence of the Assembly. In 1747, the number of congregations connected with the Secession had risen to thirty-two, but in that year a dispute arose about the civic oath taken by burgesses, and the newly-constituted body was at once subdivided into the two parties of BURGHERS and ANTIBURGHERS. In 1820, two later sub-sections of these subdivisions, called the New-Light-Burgbers and New-Light-Antiburgbers, were united, whereupon they assumed the somewhat paradoxical title of The United Secession ; their joint congregations then amounting to 262.

The Seceders from this time assumed a position of hostility towards all Church-establishments, in this respect departing from the principles of their founders as well as from those of the old Covenanters. Amongst themselves a controversy arose respecting the extent and application of the Atonement.³ Mr. James Morison was deposed in 1841, and his father, Mr. Robert Morison, in 1842, for maintaining, among other things, that Christ made atonement equally for all men, and not (as the Secession held, following the Marrow of Modern Divinity) that, while in relation to men all sinners are bidden to claim their share in Christ's finished work, yet in relation to the effectual purpose of God and of Christ Himself, He died only for the redemption of the elect, a view which makes the Gospel-call of welcome appear only a fiction with regard to many. [MORRISONIANS.] Other depositions followed of ministers who objected to say that the Atonement infallibly, of itself, secures the salvation of any definite elect number, irrespective of the "divine purpose of application;" but proceedings which were instituted in 1843 and 1845 against two Divinity Professors, Drs. Balmer and Brown, who were accused of varying, in some almost infinitesimally slight degree, by quibbles about words, from the strictness of Calvinistic dogma on election and reprobation, were quashed by large majorities in Synod.

² Among the sins protested against were the sin of circulating "an idolatrous picture of our Lord," (probably the well-known and once popular broadside, which gave the traditional portrait of our Lord, together with the apocryphal letter to Abgarus, etc.,) and the sin of repealing the penal statutes against witches.

³ A previous controversy had arisen in 1754, which led,

In 1847 the United Secession or Associate Synod agreed, after long negotiation with the RELIEF Synod, upon terms of union with that body, their doctrinal standards and their causes of dissent from the Establishment being nearly identical; and the formal incorporation of the two sects took place at a meeting of the Synods on May 13th. They then assumed the name of UNITED PRESBYTERIANS; and a notice of the present condition of this numerous and influential body will be found under that heading. At the time of the union, the Secession numbered 402 ministers, and there were associated presbyteries in Ireland and America.¹ [M'Kerrow, Hist. of the Secession. Andrew Thomson, Historical Sketch of the Origin of the Secession Church. Act, Declaration, and Testimony, by some Ministers Associate together. Andrew Robertson, Hist. of the Atonement Controversy in connection with the Secession Church. ANTIBURGHERS. BURGHERS.]

after tedious dispute, to the deposition of one of the original ministers of the Secession, Thomas Mair of Orwell, in 1757, between whom and the majority of his brethren there was only this "shade of difference" [Robertson's Hist. p. 129], that while they held that Christ's death was sufficient in its own nature for all sinners, he added that this sufficiency was also pleadable by every sinner individually, as that which had been divinely appointed for himself. So intolerant of difference is sectarianism!

mental tenet that the duties and interests connected with the world which we see around us are those with which alone we have any concern.

The Secularists are Anti-Supernaturalists of the most extreme type; so far Atheists that they consider the existence of a personal God to be an open question for belief in which no sufficient proofs are adduced, and so far Pantheists that they consider "nature" to be the only God whose existence can be at all demonstrated. The facts and doctrines of Christianity are, of course, denied by them, the details of their denial being founded on the usual Rationalist arguments: and as regards morals they are Positivists, considering morality simply as a question of utility and social good.

Although the Secularists profess to be a school of independent thinkers, their principles are in reality nothing more nor less than the echo of Rationalism and Positivism among the less educated classes of thoughtful men, chiefly among the working classes.

SECUNDIANS. A Gnostic sect of the second century, owing for their leader Secundus, "who was born," says Hippolytus, "about the same time as Ptolemæus," and was thus contemporary with the immediate followers of Valentinus.

Irenæus represents the Secundians as a branch of the Valentinian school [Iren. adv. Hæres. I. xi. 2]; but although they emanated from that school [Hippol. Refut. VI. xxxii. xxxiii.], they introduced a principle so distinct as to render Secundus more properly the rival than the disciple of Valentinus. Secundus placed at the head of his Æons, whom he appears to have considered as real substances or persons, two principles, Light and Darkness. "He divides the Ogdoad into a pair of Tetrads, a right hand and a left hand Tetrad, one Light and the other Darkness." [Iren. l.c.; Hippol. l.c.; Tertull. adv. Valent. 38.] This admission of the principle of Dualism constitutes an essential difference between the Secundians and the Valentinians. It is evidently borrowed from the Oriental philosophy, and brings the Secundians so far nearer to the Manichees. Accordingly Dorner classes as adherents of the Dualism whose character was predominantly physical, the Ophites, Saturnilus, Secundus, and subsequently the Manichæans; as adherents of pantheistic Monism, Valentinus and his widespread school, especially Heracleon his contemporary, Ptolemæus, and Marcus [Dorner's Person of Christ, I. App. p. 448].

There is also mentioned as a distinction between the Valentinians and Secundus that the latter did not derive the power Achamoth from any one of the thirty Æons, but from the fruits which issued out of their substance [Tertull. ut sup.]. He invented first four more Æons, and then four in addition [Ps.-Tert. xiii.].

The Secundians were Docetæ. Augustine [Hæres. xii.] and Auctor Prædestinati [xii.] charge them with gross immorality. The latter adds that they were condemned by Diodorus, Bishop of Crete.

SEEKERS. A sect of Puritans, afterwards merged in that of the Quakers, who professed to be seeking for the true Church, Scripture, Ministry and Sacraments. Baxter says of them: "They taught that our Scripture was uncertain; that present miracles are necessary to faith; that our ministry is null and without authority, and our worship and ordinances unnecessary or vain, the Church, ministry, Scripture, and ordinances being lost, for which they are now seeking. I quickly found that the Papists principally hatched and actuated this sect, and that a considerable number that were of this profession were some Papists and some infidels. However, they closed with the Vanists, and sheltered themselves under them, as if they had been the very same" [Baxter's Life and Times, 76].

SELEUCIANS. Seleucus and Hermias were successors of Hermogenes, and leaders of his school. They are known to us only from the notices of Philaster, Augustine, and the Author of Prædestinatus. Their heresy is that of Hermogenes, with some additions of further heretical doctrine and practice. They were of Galatia, but of their history nothing is known. Hermias is supposed by some to be Hermogenes. The later or developed tenets, however, ascribed to Hermias forbid this identification. [Philast. Hær. lv.; August. Hær. lix.; Prædest. Hær. lix.]

To the tenets of their master [HERMOGENIANS] they made the following additions:—First, they rejected the sacrament of Baptism, that is, of baptism with water, on account of the promise of a baptism with fire [Luke iii. 16]. Fabricius here warns his readers that this statement does not prove the Seleucians to have used a baptism with fire. Certainly it is no proof of such usage, but since there were attempts made by some heretics to introduce the element of fire into the sacrament of baptism, the Seleucians, who rejected the element of water, may be suspected of the attempt. [See the anonymous tract, de Baptismo Hæreticorum, in Fell's Cyprian, p. 30; and the quotation from Heracleon in the Fragments of Clemens Alex., Opera, ed. Klotz, iv. p. 39.] Secondly, the Seleucians denied the resurrection of the body. The resurrection of man's body, they said, is only its revival in the children of his begetting. Thirdly, the Seleucians denied the existence of a visible Paradise. Taken alone, this denial, so far from being judged heretical, will be thought only correct, for the visible Paradise was supposed to be a place on earth. But in this case the denial appears to have proceeded from the heretical denial of the resurrection of the body. [Regarding the visible Paradise see HIERACITES, note 2. The denial is said to have been after Plato. It is sufficient to refer to the well-known passage, Phædo, sect. 143.]

The rejection of baptism with water, and the denial of the resurrection, appear to be a consistent following out of the principle of the inherent evil of matter, which Hermogenes held, but expressed with some ambiguity. The sects which rejected baptism with water were those which held this principle, and believed that the world was created by an inferior demiurge [Bingham, Antiq. XI. ii. 1-4]. The wild notion that our Lord laid aside His Body and deposited it in the sun arose from extending this principle into an application to the glorified Body. Consistently, the resurrection of man's body is denied altogether. It is easier to deny the resurrection altogether than to allow the resurrection and to provide for the subsequent laying aside of the body.

SELF-BAPTIZERS. [SE-BAPTISTS.]

SEMI-ARIANS. The name by which the great bulk of the Arian sect of heretics became distinguished from the strict Arians after the Council of Nicæa. They were a large body of clergy and laity of great political influence in the Eastern Empire, who were opposed alike to the strict definition of orthodox Nicene theologians like St. Athanasius, and to the equally strict definition which characterized the logical intellectualism of the old Arians, revived under the leadership of Aëtius and Eunomius. According to the habits of thought then prevalent (absurdly sneered at by Gibbon and other "free" or loose "thinkers"), each of the three parties embodied their distinctive tenet in a single term, which became a creed in itself. The orthodox were represented by "Homœousios," which signified that our Lord is of one substance with the Father, and thus shut out entirely the idea of His being a created Person. The old Arians, on their revival, adopted the term "Anomœios," which signified exactly the opposite, and, defining the Son to be unlike in substance to the Father, expressed the idea that He was a created and not an uncreated Being. [ANOMÆANS.] The Semi-Arians, halting between these two opinions, endeavoured to find a resting-place for their theology in the middle term "Homoiousios," which was an expression so far definite as to signify that the Son is of a similar substance to the Father, but so far indefinite as to permit a great variety of interpretation respecting the extent to which such similarity makes Him to differ from created beings. The practical result of this compromising theology was that the Semi-Arians called our Lord Divine, but would not allow that He is "equal to the Father as touching His Godhead," and thus simply and truly God. A similar distinction between Divine Nature and Deity has been revived in recent controversies.

The Semi-Arian party first came into prominence at the Council of Nicæa [A.D. 325], under the cautious leadership of Eusebius the ecclesiastical historian, who was Bishop of Cæsarea. [ARIANS.] His successor in that see, Acacius [A.D. 338], temporized still further, openly acknowledging that our Lord is no created being, yet pertinaciously declining to adopt the orthodox doctrine of His Eternal Deity. [ACACIANS.] Towards the close of Constantine's life, family influences brought him over to the Semi-Arian party, and during the reign of his son Constantius they had entire possession of the imperial court. While they were thus at the height of their political power the reactionary movement of the old Arians began at Antioch, and the vigorous attempt which was made to supplant the vague and varying creed of the political Semi-Arians by an intellectual development of the heresy in its original form [ÆTIAN. EUNOMIAN.], eventually led to the disintegration of the party.

During the fifty-six years that elapsed between the Council of Nicaea and that of Constantinople [A.D. 325-381] as many as eighty councils are on record, a large number of which were held by the Semi-Arian bishops in support of their contests with the orthodox and with their own sects. Of these synods St. Hilary says—personifying one of the heretical side—“We determine yearly and monthly creeds concerning God; we repent of our determinations; we defend those who repent; we anathematize those whom we have defended; we condemn our own doings in those of others, or others in us; and gnawing each other, we are well nigh devoured one of another” [Hilar. ad Const. ii. 5]. Nothing in fact was more conspicuous than the unsettled variableness of the Semi-Arian creed. Two Confessions of Faith were drawn up at the Council of the Dedication [Socr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 10], held at Antioch during the consecration of Constantine's magnificent church there [A.D. 341]. Another was drawn up and sent to the Emperor Constans by the bishops of Palestine a few months afterwards [ibid. ii. 18]. Four years later [A.D. 345] another council assembled at Antioch, and again the Semi-Arian bishops who composed it drew up a Confession of their faith [ibid. ii. 19]. At Sirmium [A.D. 351] another creed was set forth by them [Sozom. Hist. Eccl. iv. 6]; and again at the same place seven years later [ibid.]. At Ancyra a synod was held [A.D. 358] by Basil, the bishop of that see, for the purpose of combating the Anomœan movement which was then going on under the leadership of Aëtius, encouraged by Eudoxius, Bishop of Antioch. Here Basil and eleven other bishops drew up a petition to the Emperor, asking him to take measures for confirming the Homoiousian declarations promulgated at Philippopolis, Sirmium, and other synods; and this petition, made in the face of the fully-developed Arianism then being brought out by the Anomœans, may be regarded as a movement backward from the Semi-Arian standpoint towards that of the Nicene faith: no creed being drawn up by them. From this time the reaction went steadily on, growing stronger at the Western Council of Ariminum [A.D. 359], and the Eastern Council of Seleucia [A.D. 359]. In a few years it was so stimulated by the progress of the Anomœan section of the Arians, and by the development of the Macedonian heresy respecting the Third Person of the Holy Trinity out of the Arian respecting the second, that in the year 366 as many as fifty-nine Semi-Arian bishops recanted their errors and subscribed to the Nicene Creed [Socr. Hist. Eccl. iv. 12]. There is no evidence of any large number of the party afterwards existing. Many others, doubtless, came back to the Church, not a few plunged into the heresy of the

MACEDONIANS, and some, like Eudoxius of Antioch, became avowed Anomœans. [ARIANS. DICT. OF THEOL., art. SEMI-ARIANS. Newman, Hist. Arians. Pusey's Councils of the Church, ch. v.]

SEMEDALITES. A sect of ACEPHALI, which sprung up originally under the name of BARSANIANS, at the end of the fifth century. They had no succession of priests, and professed to keep up the celebration of a valid Eucharist by placing a few crumbs of some of the bread which had been consecrated by Dioscorus into a vessel of meal [σπειδαλις], and then using as fully consecrated the bread baked from it. [Damasc. de Hæres. iii. Baron. ad ann. 535. Neale's Patriarchate of Alexandria, ii. 22.]

SEMI-JUDAIZERS. Two sects have been known by this name in Poland. [1] The first of these was originated by Francis David, superintendent of the Socinian community in Transylvania, and was opposed by Faustus Socinus, although their distinctive principle of refusing worship to Christ appears not to have differed from that of Socinus himself. When it was found impossible to obtain a recantation from David, he was thrown into prison, where he died at an advanced age in the year 1579. [2] A sect of the same name was established a few years later by Martin Seidelius, a Silesian. He developed the Socinian heresy into an opinion that while a Messiah had indeed been promised to the Jews, He had never appeared, and would never appear, on account of their unbelief. This opinion he followed up with another respecting the Christ of the Gospels, that He was a teacher whose only office was to re-proclaim the laws of natural religion; but this blasphemer at the same time rejected the Gospels and the whole of the New Testament as works of a much later date than that attributed to them. In Russia a similar sect is called SABATNIKI. [Zeltner's Hist. Crypto-Socin. i. 268, 355. Biblioth. Fratr. Polon.]

SEMI-PELAGIANS. This name was invented by the Schoolmen to designate a large number of persons who, chiefly in Gaul, during the fifth century, embraced a modified form of Pelagianism. The movement was a reaction no less against the extreme views on Predestination held by St. Augustine in his later years than against the extravagant assertions about Free-will made by Pelagius.

As early as A.D. 426, the monks of Adrumetum, in Byzacene Africa, betrayed some alarm at expressions used by St. Augustine in a letter [Ep. 194] addressed to Sixtus, then a priest, afterwards Bishop of Rome. But the real founder of Semi-Pelagianism was the famous Cassian, an Eastern monk of Scythian extraction [Gennad. de Viris illustr. 61], who had been trained in a monastery at Bethlehem, and had resided afterwards among the monks of Egypt prior to taking up his residence at Constantinople. Here he was ordained deacon by Chrysostom, and was selected by the clergy of that city, during the banishment of their bishop, to proceed on a mission to Innocent I. at Rome, where he probably received priest's orders [Noris, Hist. Pelag. lib. ii. c. 1].

He subsequently migrated further west, and settled at Marseilles. Here he founded monasteries for both sexes, becoming himself abbot of one of them, dedicated to St. Victor [c. A.D. 415]. While holding this office he found time to write several books, which have earned him the title of the founder of Semi-Pelagianism.¹ Information of these circumstances was at length conveyed by two laymen, Hilary, and Prosper of Aquitaine, to St. Augustine, driven from his home by the Gothic invasion and a refugee at Marseilles; and the news reached him just long enough before his death to enable him to write the works "De Prædestinatione Sanctorum" and "De Dono Perseverantiæ" [A.D. 430]. After this [A.D. 431] they appealed to Cœlestine at Rome, in the hopes of obtaining an official condemnation of Cassian's doctrines. The Popes generally throughout the controversy declared themselves on the orthodox side, especially Sixtus III., Leo I., and, somewhat later, Hormisdas; and the present occasion was no exception, although Cœlestine avoided the real difficulty by using mild terms, and regretting the agitation of curious questions (quæstiones indisciplinatæ): a decision which the Semi-Pelagians, led by Vincent, affected to interpret in their own favour. It was either the unsatisfactory result of this appeal, or the spread of the objectionable views, which shortly induced Prosper to compose the "Carmen de Ingratis,"² and still later "Pro Augustino Liber contra Collatorem," and the "De Vocatione Gentium," the latter of which however, being anonymous, has also been attributed, by an anachronism, to Ambrose of Milan, and with rather more probability to Leo the Great.

About this time, A.D. 434-435, Vincentius, a native of Mauritania Cæsariensis, the afterwards celebrated monk of the Abbey of Lerins in Provence, began to attack the extreme predestinarian views of St. Augustine. His "Commonitorium," now a handbook of orthodoxy, is supposed to have been originally directed against the Augustinian development of the doctrines of grace and predestination; and slight indications of its bias are considered (by Vossius, Noris, Natalis, etc.) to be afforded by the absence of any condemnatory allusions to Semi-Pelagianism or laudatory allusions to St. Augustine.³ The same abbey produced another prominent champion of the new school in the person of Faustus. He was a native of Great Britain [Ussher, Antiq. Eccles. Brit. cap. xiii.], but at this time was Abbot of Lerins, whence he was promoted [A.D. 456] to the bishopric of Riez, which he held till his death [A.D. 491], with the exception of three years of banishment suffered at the hands of the Arian king Euric [A.D. 481-484]. His main controversy was with one of his clergy, named Lucidus, who held advanced predestinarian views, and whom he first tried to silence by argument, in a book entitled "De Gratia Dei et Humanæ Mentis Libero Arbitrio," and then summoned before a council at Arles [A.D. 475], which, as well as a synod held at Lyons in the same year, decided against Lucidus and in favour of the Semi-Pelagian doctrines of his bishop.

Among the moderate but distinguished advocates of the same views, towards the close of this century, must be mentioned Gennadius, a priest of Marseilles, most of whose writings are lost; and among their opponents on the orthodox side, Claudianus Mamertus, Avitus Bishop of Vienne, and Cæsarius, Bishop of Arles [A.D. 501-542], the author of a book "De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio." They were supported in their opposition by the consistent action of the Roman prelates. Pope Gelasius condemned the writings of Faustus in a decretal epistle [A.D. 493]. Hormisdas [A.D. 514-523] confirmed the verdict of his predecessor at the request of an African bishop, Possessor, and also of certain Eastern monks, who, wishing for a still stronger declaration of opinion, made a further appeal to Fulgentius of Ruspe, one of the sixty African bishops exiled by the Vandals from Byzacene Africa to Sardinia, and subsequently recalled by Hilderic. Fulgentius employed the leisure afforded by banishment in writing two books in confutation of Semi-Pelagian views, "De Incarnatione et Gratia" and "De Veritate Prædestinationis et Gratia," and was the cause of a circular letter being issued in the name of the African bishops, his own included, in condemnation of Faustus.

Shortly afterwards [A.D. 529] the judgment already procured from Italian and African prelates was re-echoed at the Council of Orange, in the province of Arles, under the leadership of Cæsarius. Its four short canons, signed by fourteen bishops,⁴ subscribed by six prefects of Gaul, and confirmed in the same year at the Council of Valence, in the province of Vienne, asserted—

[1] That by the sin of Adam free-will has been so perverted and weakened, that none have since then been able to love God, or believe in Him, or to do good actions for His sake, unless Divine grace has prevented them.

[2] After grace has been received by baptism, all baptized persons are able by the divine assistance and co-operation, to do all things that belong to the soul's salvation, if they are willing to work with faith.

[3] We not only do not believe that some persons have been predestined to evil by the divine power, but we pronounce anathema against all who incline to hold such an opinion.

[4] We also profess and believe that in every good work it is not we who begin, and who are afterwards assisted by the mercy of God; but God Himself first inspires faith and love, without any previous good works on our part, so that we faithfully demand the sacrament of baptism, and after baptism are able, with His assistance, to accomplish what is pleasing to Him. Whence it is most clearly to be believed that the marvellous faith of the thief whom the Lord summoned to Paradise, of the centurion Cornelius to whom an angel was sent, and of Zacchæus who was found worthy to entertain our Lord, was not natural but the gift of God.

Cæsarius despatched these canons to Rome, where they were ratified by Boniface II. From this time the Semi-Pelagians, as a clearly defined body, ceased to exist, although persons inclined to hold the same or very similar opinions have always existed both within and outside of the Church.

The general object of Semi-Pelagian doctrine was described by Cassian in his Collations to be a protest against two extremes, the Augustinian denial of free-will and the Pelagian infringement of grace. This explains the name "Predestinarians," which they conferred on the orthodox party, and the taunt of Prosper, that they could neither agree wholly with heretics nor with Catholic Christians, but that they devised some third position of their own, neither making peace with the one nor remaining loyal to the other.

The following positions are deduced from Cassian's works; not, indeed, laid down with the logical sequence and consistency which marks the argumentative writings of St. Augustine, but as inferred from a comparison of passages.

Since the Fall all men have original sin and are subject to death, but they have not lost a knowledge of God or free-will. It can neither be maintained (with St. Augustine) that the commencement of what is good in us always originates in God, nor (with Pelagius) that it always originates with ourselves. Sometimes it is God Who first implants good thoughts and purposes in us. Sometimes it is man who takes the first step, and whom God afterwards supports with His assistance. In either case the grace of God is unmerited, not absolutely but relatively, as it bestows on the weak and worthless efforts of man such favours here and so great reward hereafter.

From these and other writings four points of Augustinian teaching may be specified as rejected by the Semi-Pelagian school.

[1] Unconditional election.

This point came up in connection with the discussion about the fate of infants dying after baptism, or without it. The Semi-Pelagians asserted that God granted to the former the grace of justification and salvation, because He foresaw that if they had lived they would have been faithful; that He denied this favour to the latter, because He foresaw that had they lived they would have been rebellious. St. Augustine maintained that the difference of conduct on God's part towards these infants was the consequence of an unconditional decree of predestination in favour of the former, and he did not shrink from the dreadful alternative which was forced upon him by the inexorable rigour of his logic in the case of the latter.

[2] The inability of man under any circumstances to do good.

[3] The constraining influence of grace on free-will.

[4] The final perseverance of the Saints.

On the other hand, the Semi-Pelagians made an equally emphatic protest against the accusation of pure Pelagianism which was sometimes attempted to be brought against them. "Let no one imagine," said Cassian, "that we give support to the profane notion of some, who assert that the sum of salvation is in our own power, and by ascribing everything to free-will, make the grace of God to be dispensed according to each man's merit" [Collat. xiii. 16]. Unlike Pelagius, he did not deny;—

[1] The existence of original sin in all men.

[2] Its results, such as concupiscence, death, the loss of right of succession to eternal happiness. Nor did he assert that

[3] Human nature is still as healthful as it was in the time of Adam's innocence.

[4] Or that man is able without the assistance of grace to perform every kind of good work, to reach the highest degree of perfection, and to accomplish the work of his salvation by his own natural power.

But he insisted that original sin has not so far weakened human nature, that man is unable naturally to desire to have faith, to quit sin, or to recover righteousness; that when he entertains these good dispositions God recompenses them by the gift of grace, so that the commencement of salvation actually may rest with man and not with God, although this was not necessarily and always the case.

SEMLER. [RATIONALISTS.]

SENTENTIARIJ. A name given to those who slavishly follow Peter Lombard's system of "Sentences." [SCHOOLMEN.]

SEPARATES. A sect of Calvinistic Methodists which had a short duration in North America in the middle of the last century. It originated about the year 1740 in the preaching of Whitefield, and at first took the name of "New Lights," but being organized into separate societies by a preacher named Shubal Stearne, they took the name of Separates. In the year 1751 Stearne joined the Baptist sect, and carried many of his followers with him, when the name which they had assumed ceased to be any longer used.

SEPARATION OF EASTERN AND WESTERN CHURCHES. The suspension of acts of communion and friendship between those Churches which were situated within the boundaries of the Eastern Empire of Rome and those which were comprehended within the Western Empire. This suspension of communion was formally declared in the year 1054, and has not since been revoked.

From the earliest age of the Church there had been diversities of custom and modes of thought among the Asiatic Churches and those of Europe which tended towards isolation in feeling and, in some degree, in opinion. The Paschal controversy dated from the time of Polycarp of Smyrna and Anicetus of Rome [A.D. 160], and as early as A.D. 180, Victor, Bishop of Rome, had threatened the Eastern Churches with excommunication for commemorating our Lord's Death on the anniversary day of the month, whatever day of the week that might be, instead of on a Friday. Later on, the various heresies which arose so rapidly in Asia and Alexandria caused the Eastern Churches to be looked on with suspicion by those of the West. The transactions connected with the Monophysite heresy led to an actual breach of communion between the Bishops of Rome and the East, which lasted for thirty-five years [A.D. 484-519]; and another similar suspension of communion sprung from the Monothelite controversy in the year 667, which ended in the condemnation of Pope Honorius [A.D. 625-638] as a heretic by the sixth Œcumenical Council in A.D. 681. [MONOPHYSITES. MONOTHELITES.] The Iconoclast controversy also caused intense bitterness between the two sections of the Church, and did more than anything else to prepare the way for permanent alienation. [ICONOCLASTS.]

But it must also be remembered that the separation of the two Empires had much to do with the separation between the Churches within their respective boundaries. The political rivalry and jealousy which arose between Rome and Constantinople naturally extended itself to the relations between the patriarchs of the two cities; and an aggregation of the neighbouring dioceses around each of these two principal and imperial ones was equally inevitable. The tendency to a geographical and political division began still more to influence the tendency towards ecclesiastical division when the Western Empire fell entirely into the hands of the Germanic races, and the Greek character assumed by Rome in the early centuries of Christianity altogether passed away.

Although, therefore, an unity of the Church, which should consist of close subjective as well as objective union, was possible enough while the Christian world was bound together by the common tie of an united imperial nationality, as it was during the first three centuries of Christianity, that external unity became more and more vague as the disintegration of the Empire went on. Very little ecclesiastical intercourse was held between East and West after the accession of Charlemagne to full imperial authority over Europe in A.D. 800: and such attempts as were made to renew it generally ended in formalizing differences, which, if let alone, might have died away in course of time through the comparative vagueness of their character.

The most important of those differences arose from the insertion of the words "and the Son" after the words "proceeding from the Father" in the article of the Nicene Creed respecting God the Holy Ghost. This change in the Nicene

Creed was first made at the Council of Toledo [A.D. 589], when the Goths were giving up their Arianism and becoming orthodox in the sixth century. So late as the ninth century, however, when an appeal on the subject was made to Leo III. [A.D. 795-816], although he allowed the "Filioque" to be orthodox, he ordered the Constantinopolitan Creed in its integrity to be engraved on silver tablets both in Latin and Greek, and hung up in the Church of the Lateran as a standard copy. It was formally inserted in the Creed for use in Divine Service by order of the Emperor Charlemagne about A.D. 788; and at last Pope Benedict VIII. [A.D. 1014] ordered the Creed to be so used throughout Western Christendom. Thus a change of much importance was made in the Creed set forth by the General Councils on the authority of Provincial Councils and of the Bishop of Rome; and whether the insertion of the "Filioque" made the truth asserted more exact or not, it is certain that the Eastern Church was justified in protesting, as it did all along, against any change whatever being made except under the sanction of an authority as binding on the whole Church as that which originally set forth the Creed at Nicæa and Constantinople.

Fresh trouble between Rome and Constantinople arose out of the appointment of Photius to the patriarchal throne of the latter city by the Emperor Michael III. in A.D. 858. Photius was recognised by all the bishops of his own patriarchate, but having been consecrated by Gregory, Bishop of Syracuse, whom Pope Nicolas I. had deposed, he was therefore excommunicated by the latter. Photius in return excommunicated the Pope, and the quarrel went on growing until, at the death of Photius (while in exile) in the year 891, the Pope arrogantly insisted on the degradation of all bishops and priests who had received their orders from the patriarch. This arrogant assertion of authority embittered the relations between the Churches still more, and from that time all friendliness between Rome and Constantinople may be said to have been interrupted.

The final suspension of communion arose out of conduct almost equally intemperate on the part of Michael Cerularius, Patriarch of Constantinople, who, immediately on his accession in A.D. 1053, assumed the title of "Universal Patriarch," and, further to exasperate Rome, caused all the churches and monasteries which the Latins had in his city to be closed on account of the differences which existed between the Latin and the Eastern rites. In justification of this harsh measure he wrote a letter to the Bishop of Irai in Apuleia, which he directed him to communicate to the Pope, Leo IX., and to all the Western Church; and in this letter, among other assertions equally unwarrantable, he declared that the Western custom of using unleavened bread invalidated the Holy Eucharist [Carrisii Thes. Monument. Eccl. iii. 281, sqq.]. The Emperor endeavoured to allay the indignation which this intemperate conduct of the patriarch excited at Rome; and having persuaded Cerularius to enter into negotiations with the Pope, the latter sent three legates to Constantinople in 1054, entrusted with his formal reply, in which he retorted the charges of error, and told the patriarch that unless he recanted these errors he would be visited with an irrevocable anathema from God and from all Catholics. The legates declared also that they had come not to argue about the points in dispute, but to insist on the adoption of Latin customs by the Eastern Church, and behaved with extreme insolence, such as has too often characterized the ambassadors of the Popes. [Coteler. Eccl. Græc. Monum. ii. 138, 145, 164.]

Being countenanced in some degree by the Emperor, who wished, for political reasons, to conciliate the Pope, the legates then passed sentence of excommunication on "all who contradicted the faith of the holy Roman Apostolic See." Before leaving Constantinople they had also the arrogance to lay on the altar of St. Sophia an excommunication of the patriarch, and of all who supported him, on the ground of heresy. "Let them," wrote the legates, "be Anathema Maranatha, cum Simonicis, Valesiis, Arianis, Donatistis, Nicolaitis, Severianis, Pneumatomachis, et Manichæis, et Nazarenis, et cum omnibus hæreticis, imo cum Diabolo et angelis ejus, nisi forte resipuerint." The particular heresies alleged by the legates were such as the marriage of the clergy and the use of the Nicene Creed without the "Filioque," and others of a similar kind, which were in reality cases in which the conservative spirit of the East had retained ancient customs that had been set aside by the Church of Rome and the churches which looked to it as their guide. As soon as the legates had left Constantinople the patriarch summoned a council and retorted the excommunication.

Excommunications were sown broadcast by some of the prelates of the Middle Ages, (as they were by the Presbyterians in Scotland at the time of the Reformation,) and it is very difficult to estimate either their spiritual value or their influence upon the subsequent course of events. But as regards those in which the long-growing alienation between East and West culminated, it may be doubted whether they can be taken for more, historically, than passionate expressions of an instinct which told the world that the Eastern and Western races had diverged so far from each other that external ecclesiastical unity was no longer possible. If there had been less of Papal arrogance on both sides, the ecclesiastical divarication would have followed the divergence of the two races without being accompanied by any such extraordinary bitterness as to interpose obstacles to occasional acts of friendship and communion in after times: and the Churches of the East and West, which were inevitably drifting away from each other, would have done so in silence and in peace. As it was, the quarrels which accompanied the separation of the two ecclesiastical races were accompanied by insults on both sides, which made reunion possible only after formal reconciliation, and they have not known enough of each other in subsequent times to make such a reconciliation easy. It was attempted by the Eastern Church in the year 1274 at the Council of Lyons, when the Emperor Michael Palæologus and a few Greek bishops accepted the "Filioque," and submitted themselves to the Papal supremacy: but this act was not recognised by the Eastern Church at large. It was attempted again at the Council of Florence in the year 1439. The question of the Filioque was argued before the Council, and some concessions were made on both sides, the Emperor, John Palæologus, and thirty Greek bishops being present. A decree of union was drawn up in Greek and Latin, which was signed by the Emperor and several bishops; but, as in the former case, the concessions made were greater, especially that respecting the supremacy of the Pope, than the Eastern churches at home were prepared to endorse. One of the Greek bishops present had said, "Mori malo, quam unquam Latinizare," and this saying represented the feeling of the Eastern Church in general much better than the acts of the Emperor and his friends, for at a council held at Constantinople in 1450 those acts were formally repudiated. In quite recent days, as late as 1848, Pope Pius IX. wrote an "Encyclical Letter to the Easterns," exhorting them to union; but as the exhortation was combined with the requirement that the Easterns should submit themselves entirely to the supremacy of the Pope, his overtures were of course rejected.

It is, in fact, this arrogant claim to supremacy which is, and always has been, the chief obstacle to a renewal of open communion between the East and the West. As to the "Filioque" of the Nicene Creed, "the discrepancy is one of words, for the Greeks confess that the Spirit is not only the Spirit of the Father, but of the Son; that He has the same Substance, Divinity, and Majesty, as the Father and the Son; that He receives of the Son, and so cannot speak of Himself; that He is manifested and given to us by the Son; and therefore we may charitably conclude that while, from a veneration for the Councils of Nicæa and Constantinople, they wish to keep the Creed untouched, they do in fact maintain that truth so necessary to salvation" [Forbes on Nicene Creed, 263]. On the other hand, to use the words of Manning, once Archdeacon of Chichester, and afterwards titular Archbishop of Westminster, "be the faults of the Greek churches never so great, they cannot be laid in the balance against the usurpation of a supreme pontificate by the Bishop of Rome. This attempt of the Roman patriarch to subject the four Eastern patriarchates to his exaggerated jurisdiction is a claim which, so long as persisted in, must throw upon the Roman Church the sin of keeping open an inveterate division" [Manning on Unity of the Ch. 358].

It need hardly be added that the suspension of subjective unity between the East and West does not affect their objective unity. The organic ties of constitution, liturgy, substantial doctrine, and sacramental life, still remain, for each retains by means of these communion with the Divine Head of the Church and the Fountain of its life. Those whom God has joined together by such sacred inner bonds man cannot sunder by cutting those outer cords by which visible unity is maintained.

It may also be hoped that the increasing intercourse between the East and Europe may help forward Christian intercourse between the Churches. Change of language, change of habit, territorial alterations, want of opportunity to set right misunderstandings, and many other such causes, have contributed largely to maintain the division; and the influence of all these is being daily lessened by the singular facilities for intercommunication which have been opened out in recent times. Sanguine minds will likewise remember that Rome does not now represent the whole Catholic Church of Europe, and may look forward to a time when the great Anglican Church may have given to it the office of drawing East and West into an outward fellowship consistent with that true objective Unity in the Body of Christ by which they have always been, and still are, bound together.

SEPARATISTS. The name assumed by some of the Puritans, perhaps the early TRASKITES, who so called themselves because they professed to be separated from the world. They condemned all taste in dress, and all joyousness in life, meeting innocent merriment with the text, "Woe to you that laugh, for ye shall mourn." They cultivated melancholy looks, sighed often, eschewed music and all festivities, condemned the bearing of arms, and refused oaths. In these principles we recognize the class of Puritans afterwards represented by the Quakers. [Pagitt's Heresiography, p. 67, ed. 1662.]

SEPARATISTS was likewise a general name used in the seventeenth century for all persons who separated themselves from the Church of England. Some were also called "Semi-Separatists." "They will hear our sermons, but not our Common Prayer, and of these you may see every Sunday in our streets, sitting and standing about our doors, who, when prayers are done, rush into our churches to hear our sermon." [Pagitt's Heresiography, p. 94, ed. 1662.]

SEPARATISTS. A German Pietist sect assumed this name about the close of the last century at Würtemberg. Meeting with much opposition on account of their proceeding further than the Pietists in general, and actually forming a body distinct from the Lutherans, a portion of them emigrated to America in the year 1803, where they formed the HARMONY SOCIETY. Those who remained in Germany became known as KORNTHALITES.

SEPARATISTS. [1] An Irish sect of SANDEMANIANS established in Dublin by a seceding clergyman named Walker early in the nineteenth century. They are sometimes called "Walkerites." [2] Another sect of Sandemanians was formed under the same name at New Ross by two clergymen named Kelly and Carr. [3] A third sect was formed professing strict Evangelical and Millenarian tenets by a clergyman named Darby; and these are sometimes also called "Darbyites" as well as Separatists. From these sprung the PLYMOUTH BRETHREN.

SERPENTINI. [OPHITES.]

SERVETIANS. The followers of Michael Servetus, or Miguel Serve de [A.D. 1509-1553], a Spaniard, who developed Unitarianism in the direction of Pantheism among the Calvinistic Reformers.

Servetus was the son of a notary named Réves or Serve, at Villaneuva in Arragon, and was educated for the Civil Law at the University of Toulouse. At twenty-one years of age he accompanied Quintana, the Confessor of Charles V., to the coronation of the Emperor at Bologna. From thence he went, by way of Lyons and Geneva, to Basle, where he became acquainted with Ecolampadius, and afterwards to Strasburg, where he associated with Bucer and Capito. Both at Basle and Strasburg Servetus had made himself notorious by his public denial of the doctrine of the Trinity, and when only twenty-two years of age he ventured to print a work entitled De Trinitatis Erroribus, which was followed the next year by another entitled Dialogorum de Trinitate libri duo. In these works Servetus maintained the peculiar theory, that before the Creation of the world God had produced within Himself two personal representations, or manners of existence, which were to be the means of communication between Himself and men: that these two representatives of the Deity were called the Word and the Holy Ghost: that the Word was united to the Man Christ, Who might thus be called God: that the Holy Ghost animates all nature, and produces in men all that is good in them: and finally, that both these representatives of Deity would, after the destruction of the world, be re-absorbed into the Person of God.

Having seen these two books through the press at Haguenau, Servetus returned to Basle and thence to Lyons, living in the latter city until about the year 1536, when he went to study medicine at Paris. Under the name of Michael de Villeneuve, he afterwards practised for a short time as a physician at Lyons, and in 1541 went to live in the household of the Archbishop of Vienna, where he resided until nearly the close of his life, openly a good Catholic, but secretly writing his last and worst work. At Paris Servetus is said to have become acquainted with Calvin, but it may be doubted whether he had visited that city before Calvin's final departure from it, and it is not certain that they ever met before the close of Servetus' life, though they corresponded for fifteen or sixteen years.

In the year 1553 Servetus published a third work in support of his opinions, which had now taken a strongly pantheistic colour, entitling it Christianismi Restitutio. This was printed anonymously, but its authorship was discovered and its author imprisoned by the Inquisition. He escaped from prison, but his effigy was hanged and burned amidst a pile of his books, shewing what fate he would have met with if he had remained. From Vienne he purposed going to Naples to practise again as a physician, but taking Geneva on his road, lay concealed there for a month, when he fell into the hands of the magistrates, who had received information of his presence from Calvin, the latter having declared seven years before that if Servetus came to Geneva he should not leave the city alive.

Having escaped the fate of a heretic at the hands of the Roman Inquisition at Vienne, Servetus was now put on his trial for heresy before the Protestant Inquisition at Geneva. After long controversy, in which Calvin took a very active and violent part, Servetus was condemned to death as a heretic on October 26th, 1553, and on the following day he suffered a miserably protracted death by fire in the great stronghold of Calvinism, and with the full acquiescence of Calvin. An elaborate treatise in support of his execution was published by Beza under the title De Hæreticis a civili Magistratu puniendis; and it was also defended by Melancthon and other Protestant writers as a "just and honourable proceeding" [Quart. Rev. lxxxviii. 551].¹

The followers of Servetus were principally to be found in Lombardy, the best known of them being Bernardino Ochino [A.D. 1487-1564]. They were driven from Lombardy by the Inquisition, and also from Switzerland, where they had taken refuge, eventually finding a home in Poland among the followers of the elder Socinus, with whom they amalgamated into the sect of the SOCINIANS.

The eleventh volume of Schlüsselburg's Hæreticorum Catalogus, extending to 623 pages, is entirely occupied with a treatise De Secta Servetianarum; and a Life of Servetus was published in 1748—republished with additions in 1749—by Mosheim the ecclesiastical historian.

SETHIANS. The last chapter but one of the book of Irenæus against Heresies contains a most obscure account of some Valentinian Gnostics who are generally understood to be the Ophites and the Sethians [Iren. adv. Hær. xxx.]. Neither of these sects is named throughout the chapter, nor is there anything to distinguish the opinions of one from the other, if indeed these two sects are intended. Hippolytus devotes four chapters of his fifth book to the refutation of their heresy, but gives no account of their history. Epiphanius was doubtful whether the sect had not become extinct in his time, but thought he had met with traces of it somewhere in Egypt. Philaster and Augustine are equally silent respecting their history.

The sect derived its name from the peculiar veneration with which its adherents regarded the patriarch Seth; a veneration set up, perhaps, in opposition to that of the CAINITES for Cain. Whether this was or was not the real origin of their sect, they professed to believe themselves descended from Seth, while a large portion of mankind was descended from Cain, of whom Ham was the representative in the Ark. They also believed that our Lord was Seth appearing again in the world. Many writers identify the sect with that of the Ophites, and they were plainly part of the great heretical family of Gnostics. Hippolytus says that their doctrine was all contained in a book called "The Paraphrase of Seth," of which nothing is known. [Hippol. Refut. v. 14-17. Epiphan. Hæres. xxxix.]

SEVENTH DAY BAPTISTS. The modern representatives of the TRASKITES, or Sabbatarians of the seventeenth century. They have never been numerous in England, and at the present day there are not above forty or fifty in the whole country, with two small meeting-houses. A community of the sect was formed by an emigrant named Stephen Mumford, at Newport, Rhode Island, about 1681, and there are now said to be about fifty congregations of them, numbering 6000 members, in the United States.

SEVERIANS. A sect of Encratite Gnostics, successors of the Tatianists, whose complicated system of Æons they abandoned, but whose Encratite notions of creation they developed or heightened.

Epiphanius supposes their leader Severus to have preceded Tatian, but Eusebius, Theodoret, and Jerome make him Tatian's successor. These latter authorities are followed by most ecclesiastical historians, and the silence of Irenæus and Hippolytus regarding Severus renders the later date most probable. But of his history nothing is known.

The system of Tatian as regards the Deity and the powers emanating from Him was identical, or nearly so, with the system of Valentinus. [VALENTINIANS. TATIANISTS.] From the brief notices which have come down to us, Severus appears to have exchanged this elaborate system for a simpler one founded upon that of the Ophites and Sethians. For Epiphanius [Hær. xlv.] ascribes to the Severians a belief in the well-known Gnostic power Ialdabaoth, who appears in the Ophite system as the first offspring of Bythus and Ennoia [Iren. i. 30]. The Severians held that Ialdabaoth was a great ruler of the powers, that from him sprang the Devil: that the Devil being cast down to the earth in the form of a serpent produced the vine, whose snake-like tendrils indicate its origin: that the Devil also created woman and the lower half of man. Ialdabaoth was the Demiurge of the Ophites, the first descendant of the first man (Anthropos), for so they called the manifestations of power from the Bythus of the Deity. After him were six others in succession; to whom belonged, and among whom were distributed, the prophets of the Old Testament. These several and successive generations were so many steps of degradation; a notion taken, as the names were taken, from the Cabbala. But the Severians appear to have arrived at the same conclusion at one step, making the Devil the immediate offspring of Ialdabaoth. And they divided the work of the Demiurge between Ialdabaoth and the Devil, as between good and evil powers.

The origin of these extraordinary and blasphemous

mous fictions is not far to seek. Men of ascetic temperament, striving, perhaps sincerely, but with unchastened and unhumiliated intellects, to attain to innocency; oppressed by the contemplation of the intermixture of good and evil in the world; perplexed by speculations on the origin of evil, which were the source of early heresy; and surrounded by other speculations of heathen and Cabalistic philosophy, were led to believe that the world was created by different principles, by powers of different natures. The mind of man, his reason and conscience, were referred to beneficent powers, his senses and appetites to inferior and noxious powers. The evils of the world were seen to arise mainly from the passions of intemperance and lust. And as in the first transgression, Adam referred his sin to the gift of Eve, so they lightened their sin to themselves by representing wine and women, not their own lusts, as tempters. These were thought therefore to be the work of an imperfect, an evil creator. This train of thought was embodied in the allegory (for it can hardly be looked upon in any other light), that man from the head to the navel was framed by the beneficent power, thence downwards by the evil power; that woman and the vine were created by the evil Demiurge.

Eusebius states that the Severians made use of the Law and Prophets and Gospels, giving them a peculiar interpretation, but abused the Apostle Paul, and rejected his Epistles, rejecting also the Acts of the Apostles [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 29]. Augustine, on the other hand, states that they rejected the Old Testament [Aug. Hær. xxiv.]. It may be that both these statements are too hastily generalized from partial data: that as the Ophites distributed the prophets among their seven gradually deteriorating powers, so the Severians divided them between Ialdabaoth and his evil offspring. In estimating the force of Eusebius' words there must be borne in mind also the habit of the Cabalistic Gnostics to appeal to the Old Testament.

The tenet of the creation of the world by an inferior Demiurge presupposes the inherent evil of matter, and it is a natural deduction from this to deny the resurrection of the body. The Severians followed out their principle to this conclusion, according to Augustine [Hær. xxiv.]. Natalis Alexander, resting on Eusebius' statement that they admitted the authority of the Law and the Prophets, denies the probability of Augustine's report. But the peculiar interpretations which Eusebius tells of will well admit the rejection of the resurrection of the body. The Severians, it need hardly be added, were Docetæ, as were the Tatianists. Later still appeared another party among the Encratites who renounced all property.

SHAKERS. A name given to the early Quakers. They are thus called "Shakers or Quakers" by the continuator of Pagitt's Heresiography, who wrote about the year 1661. [Pagitt's Heresiogr. 244, ed. 1662.]

SHAKERS or SHAKING QUAKERS. An American sect founded by an English emigrant named Ann Lee, about the year 1776. Their general character is very similar to that of the Quakers, but they use a peculiar vibratory dance in their religious services, of a similar fanatic kind with the custom of the JUMPERS, from which they take their distinctive name. They also assume the titles of "The United Society of Believers" and "The Millennial Church."

About the year 1747 some Lancashire Quakers, who had become disciples of the CAMISARDS, formed themselves into a society, professing to be influenced by no creed or custom in use among Christians, but to be governed from time to time as the Spirit of God should dictate. The original leader of this society was Jane Wardley, and two other leading members of it were a Manchester man and his wife named Townley. Ann Lee, daughter of a Manchester blacksmith [A.D. 1736-1784], was drawn over to the society by the Townleys when she was about twenty-two years of age, when she had become the wife of a blacksmith named Abraham Stanley. Some years afterwards, in 1770, she was elected by the members of their society as their "spiritual Mother in Christ," in consequence of a supposed special revelation which she had received: and from that time she was always known, as she is still remembered, by the name of "Mother Ann."

This woman, who earned her living by preparing beaver's fur for the hatters, professed to work miracles and to speak with tongues, as the Irvingite women professed to do sixty years afterwards. But she also seems to have made a blasphemous, or a mad, claim to divinity, saying to those who addressed her as they would have addressed an ordinary person, "I am Ann the Word." In the year 1776 she emigrated to America in company with her husband and some relatives, who acknowledged her pretensions; and the family, numbering about ten persons, settled at Watervliet, seven miles from Albany. Here the number of the Mother's followers began rapidly to increase: but the founder of the sect died in the year 1784; her place being taken by James Whitaker, one of the Lancashire men, and afterwards by an American Baptist preacher named Father Joseph. Since the death of Father Joseph in 1796, two men and two women have been elected in regular succession as the "ministry" of the sect; but it is a superstition of the Shakers that Ann Lee is still with them in an invisible form, and hence her successors are only considered as her deputies and representatives.

Dr. Dwight became acquainted with the Shakers in January 1783, when he was detained at one of their settlements by a snow-storm, "In their worship," he says, "these people sang in what they called an 'unknown tongue.' It was a succession of unmeaning sounds frequently repeated, half-articulated, and plainly gotten by heart, for they all uttered the same sounds in succession. . . . They practised many contortions of the body and distortions of the countenance. The gesticulations of the women were violent, and had been practised so often and in such a degree as to have fixed their features in an unnatural position ; made them goggle-eyed, suffused their eyes with blood, covered their faces with sickly paleness, and made them appear like persons just escaped, or rather just escaping, from a violent disease. The motions of the men were very moderate, and seemed rather to be condescendingly than earnestly made" [Dwight's Travels].

The principal settlement of the Shakers is now at New Lebanon, a city of their own creation, which they began to build soon after Mother Ann's death ; but they have seventeen branches of the community in several other places in the United States, and altogether they are said to be about 6000 in number. They repudiate the use of sacraments, alleging that all external ordinances were superseded when Christianity was established in the world. They also consider that true Christianity was never taught between the Apostolic age and the rise of their sect. Although they do not impose celibacy as a necessary rule, married couples do not continue to live in their settlement.

A modern writer describes their worship at the present time in the following words : " The men and women, all clad in grey cloth and wearing list slippers, occupied distinct positions in the place of meeting. A short extemporaneous address was delivered by an elder of the party, who reminded his auditory of the mercies they had all experienced during the past week, and bade them therefore unite with him in ' cheerful expressions of gratitude to their heavenly Benefactor.' Upon the conclusion of this brief exhortation, twelve of the company arranged themselves in two lines, back to back, in the centre of the apartment ; the rest of the congregation stood up in couples around them, the men forming one segment of the circle, the women the other. Thereupon those in the middle commenced singing in a loud voice some doggrel verses to a very lively tune :—

' I love to dance and love to sing,
And, oh ! I love my Maker :
I love to dance and love to sing,
And love to be a Shaker,' etc.

The several couples, perpetually smiling or giggling at each other, and flapping their hands in mid-air, accompanied this strange kind of psalmody by a quick but monotonous shuffling of their feet, being an apology for a dance. This grotesque scene was prolonged to an hour and a half, at the end of which time the company dispersed to their homes" [Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. xii. 366].

The tenets of the Shakers are set forth by themselves, in very mystical language, in " The Testimony of Christ's Second Appearing," and in " A Summary View of the Millennial Church."

SIFRIDENSES. [SISCIDENSES.]

SIMONIANS. The earliest of those philosophical heretics who ultimately acquired the name of Gnostics, and who owed their origin to the antichristian influence and teaching of Simon Magus during the thirty or forty years that followed our Lord's Ascension.

The personal history of Simon Magus is very obscure, but some few facts respecting him are to be drawn from the pages of the New Testament and of early Christian writers. He must have been contemporary with the period of our Lord's earthly life and ministry, at least for many years ; for within about a year of the Ascension St. Luke represents him as having " long time " had influence among the Samaritans, using sorcery, bewitching them, and giving out that he was some great one, so that " they all gave heed " to him, " from the least even to the greatest, saying, This man is the great power of God." There is no record that Simon ever came within the range of Christ's teaching, or of that of any of the Apostles or Evangelists until after the personal ministry of our Lord had ceased. But when Philip the deacon preached " the things concerning the kingdom of God and the Name of Jesus Christ " among the Samaritans, Simon Magus was among those who believed and were baptized ; and, continuing for a time with Philip, the sorcerer himself was astonished at " the miracles and signs which were done." This astonishment at powers which so evidently exceeded his own was increased when he saw a still greater miracle follow from the subsequent ministrations of the Apostles Peter and John, whose hands having been laid upon the baptized Samaritans, " they received the Holy Ghost," Whose presence was manifested by some evident token, similar perhaps to those signs which had been seen and heard on the Day of Pentecost, or those which were afterwards manifested at Joppa and Ephesus. This great wonder excited Simon's ambition to exercise the same power as the Apostles, and he offered money to Peter and John to purchase the power of them. The reply of St. Peter stamped such bargaining for " the gift of God " as a heinous crime, to which in subsequent times the name of "simony" was given, from the name of him by whom it was first committed. But the words of the Apostle seem to point to something beyond this particular crime, as if Simon, who is declared to be " in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity," was still in heart the sorcerer, although he had believed in the kingdom of God and the Name of Jesus, and had been made a Christian by baptism [Acts viii. 9-24]. Justin Martyr, writing about a century after this event, says that Simon, whom he calls a native of the Samaritan village Gitto, " did mighty acts of magic " at Rome in the time of Claudius Cæsar [A.D. 41-54]. Irenæus, writing about thirty years later than Justin [A.D. 182-188], says that Simon, " not putting faith in God a whit the more," set himself eagerly to contend against the Apostles, in order that he himself might seem to be a wonderful being, and applied himself with still greater zeal to the study of the whole magic art, that he might the better bewilder and overpower multitudes of men." Both Justin Martyr and Irenæus declare that the sorcerer was honoured as a god ; and the former twice tells the Emperor Antoninus Pius, to whom he addressed his first Apology, that " as a god he was honoured by you," meaning the Romans,

"with a statue, which statue was erected on the river Tiber, between the two bridges, and bore this inscription in the language of Rome, 'Simoni Deo Sancto.'" This statue is said by Irenæus to have been set up by Claudius Caesar, and is also spoken of by Tertullian.¹ Justin Martyr adds that "almost all the Samaritans, and a few even of other nations, worship him, and acknowledge him as the first god" [Justin Mart. Apol. I. xxvi. lvi. Iren. adv. Hær. xxiii. Tertull. Apol. xiii.].

From Simon Magus, according to Irenæus, "all sorts of heresies derive their origin," and it has been the constant tradition of Christian writers that heresies at least began with him. The short account given of his opinions by Irenæus, however, left much mystery around the particular heresy which was propagated by Simon himself, and although it was clearly seen that there were some links of connection between it and the later Gnostic heresies, it was not possible to follow up the connection in any detail. The recent discovery of "The Refutation of all Heresies," a work written by Hippolytus early in the third century, has thrown much more light on the subject, and especially by giving us a summary of a work by Simon Magus himself, "The Great Announcement, a Revelation of the Voice and Name recognisable by means of Intellectual apprehension of the great indefinite Power," in which his system was set forth.

That system was one of thorough and unflinching Pantheism. He introduced into his very definition of the Divine Nature that its substance is exhibited in material things. He ascribed the formation of the world to certain portions of the Divine Fulness, Æons, thus exhibiting themselves in act and energy, so as to become perceptible to the senses of men. According to this system the Divine Power resides potentially, and may be manifested actually, in the person of each individual man. A further development of the theory of emanations was devised, to bring within his reach the claim to be himself the "great power of God," and his pretensions to this title were supported by magic.

The statement of Irenæus relates exclusively to this latter part of this system [Iren. adv. Hæres. i. 23]. It is precisely the part by which Simon would be commonly known. Of the former part, or the system itself, we have a full description in Hippolytus [Hippol. Refut. Hær. vi. 2-15], taken from Simon's own work. From these authorities the following account of the heresy is to be drawn.

The originating principle of the universe is Fire: for it is written, "God is a consuming fire."² Of the principle of this Fire is begotten

² The comment of Hippolytus upon Simon's use of this the Logos, in which exists the Indefinite Power, the Power of the Godhead, the image of which Power is the Spirit of God, Which was wafted over the water. A favourable interpretation might reduce this to a statement of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. But the confounding of the creature with the Creator occurs, as we shall see, in the description of the Spirit as the image of the Indefinite Power. Neither can we substitute, as is done in some modern histories, "God dwelling in Light which no man can approach unto" for the originating Fire, without a virtual suppression of the blasphemous errors connected with this latter name. Simon goes on to state that the Indefinite Power, which is Fire, is not a simple and uncompounded essence (as Fire is held to be by those who make it one of the four simple, unalterable elements by the varied combinations of which all things are produced), but of a twofold nature, having a secret part and a manifest part, the secret hidden in the manifest, and the manifest deriving its being from the secret. These, Hippolytus remarks, are what Aristotle denotes by "potentiality" and "energy," or what Plato styles "intelligible" and "sensible." The manifest portion of the original Fire comprises in itself all material things, and the whole Fire is a treasury or fountain of things intelligible and sensible.

Having by this general assumption prepared the way for his cosmogony, Simon proceeds as follows. He supposes that portions of the Divine Fulness can act as separate powers, and that the Logos takes and employs six such portions, Æons. These are called Roots, and that primary ones, of the originating principle of generation. They are in pairs, Mind and Intelligence, Voice and Name, Ratiocination and Reflection [Noûs καὶ ἐπίνοια, Φωνὴ καὶ ὄνομα, Λογισμὸς καὶ ἐνθύμησις]. In them resides, co-existently, the entire Indefinite Power, potentially with regard to these "secret" portions of the Divine Substance, actually when the images of these portions are formed by material embodiment. For Mind and Intelligence becoming "manifest" are Heaven and Earth, Voice and Name are Sun and Moon, Ratiocination and Reflection are Air and Water. The Indefinite Power becomes then the seventh actual Power, the Spirit of God wafted over the water, which reduces all things to order.

The Logos, which employs these divine agencies, roots, or Æons, in which resides the Indefinite Power, is described as He who stood, stands, and will stand. Hippolytus pointed out that these words might be used of Christ, in a Catholic sense, to mean "who was, is, and is to come;" and some commentators, apparently misunderstanding Hippolytus' remark, have attributed this meaning to the words as used by Simon. But Simon interprets them otherwise, "He has stood above in unbegotten power. He stands below, when in the stream of water He was begotten in a likeness. He is to stand above, beside the blessed Indefinite Power, if He be fashioned into an image." The Æons employed by Him are male and female, these general terms describing the Divine Mind, or its portions as reflecting upon itself, and as reflected upon; or as the articulating power and the utterance. The active or male of these Æons is from above, the passive or female from below; and their union generates all things. "The Logos, frequently looking to the things that are being generated from Mind and Intelligence, that is, from Heaven and Earth, exclaims, 'Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth, for the Lord hath spoken.' He who utters these words is the seventh Power, He who stood, stands, and will stand."

The first pair of roots or Æons, to which is assigned priority, and apparently primacy, is referred to the first three days' work in the Mosaic account of the Creation. Clearly too the second pair is to be referred to the fourth day, the third pair to the fifth and sixth days. Voice and Name are stated to be Sun and Moon, Ratiocination and Reflection are Air and Water. Sun and Moon may be represented as from above and below, Active and Passive, the Giver and the Receiver, Powers by which mundane things are generated. The productions from Air and Water on the fifth and sixth days correspond to the conceptions of Ratiocination and Reflection. A little ingenious word-play will make out a very tolerable analogy. All these generations of the six days are reduced to order by the seventh or Indefinite Power, the Spirit which contains all things in itself, an image from an incorruptible form.

The arrangements of this pantheistic cosmogony being effected, there occurs a vestige of Creation. The Deity proceeded to form man, taking clay from the earth. He formed him not uncompounded, but twofold, according to His own image. The image is the Spirit, and whoever is not fashioned into a figure of this will perish with the world, inasmuch as he continues only potentially, and does not exist actually. There exists in every man therefore in a latent condition that which is incorruptible, potentially, that is, not actually; and this is He who stood, stands, and is to stand. He is to stand (according to the words quoted above) when He shall be fashioned into an image. It appears then that every man may become, not a member of Christ by having the Spirit of Christ, but an embodiment of the Logos; an "image," that is, of the Logos, a conversion of the "secret" portion of the Divine Power into the "manifest."

It remained then to shew how this power, latent in all men, was manifested and brought into action in Simon, how he was made the image of the Logos.¹ There was excoagulated for this purpose

a further development of the theory of emanations, by which the pretensions of his paramour Helena to be a female Æon might tally with his own pretensions to be the image of the Logos, and mark him, to the exclusion of others, as that image. This is told by Hippolytus in the thirteenth chapter, and his account is to the following effect. After the formation of the world, in the power of the ensuing Sige, the two lower pairs of Æons are resumed into the superior or primary pair Nous and Ennoia. Nous and Ennoia are thus represented as offshoots from all the Æons. The medium of their union is the Power that sustains and nourishes all things—He who stands. The action of the Divine Mind as subject upon itself as object, the union that is of Nous with Ennoia, is the begetting of the Logos. Consequently, when these were embodied as images, a female represented Ennoia, and Simon might represent himself as the Power of God, either as the Father in the person of the superior Æon, or the Logos, who is one with the Father. These doctrines of the Great Announcement confirm and make intelligible the statement of Irenæus, that Simon taught: "It was himself who appeared among the Jews as the Son, but descended in Samaria as the Father, while he came to other nations in the character of the Holy Spirit" [Iren. adv. Hæc. i. 23].² In Simon's system the Persons of the Holy Trinity are confused, and it was open to him, professing himself to be the Power of God, to assume the name of any one of the Three. He said precisely the same thing of Jesus Christ [Hipp. Refut. Hæc. vi. 14].³ Irenæus continues that Simon declared Helena to be the first conception of his mind, (i.e. as God,) the mother of all; that she, leaping forth from him and comprehending the will of her father, descended to the lower regions of space, and generated angels and powers by whom the world was formed (there is a variation here from the teaching of the Announcement, which will be noticed presently); that these angels ruled ill the world they had made, and through jealousy detained Helena or Ennoia among them; that she was shut up in a human body, and appeared in one female form after another.⁴

This leads us to our Lord's place in Simon's system. The world being ill managed by the angels, Jesus was transformed, and being assimi-

the term in the Great Announcement, and few will now doubt that Ignatius does refer to the Gnostic Sige.

² Burton, writing before Hippolytus' treatise was discovered, thought these statements of Irenæus to be incredible [Bampton Lectures, iv. pp. 106, 107]. Upon which Mill remarked, that there is nothing in such statements which should appear so incredible in itself to any who have seen precisely the same statements in heathen pantheists as to necessitate any critical method for explaining away the apparent absurdity [On Panth. Principles, i. 18].

lated to the rulers, and powers, and angels, came for the purpose of restoration. Only in appearance, not in reality, was He a man, and in appearance only He suffered. [DOCTR.] He appeared in Judæa as Son, in Samaria as Father, among the Gentiles as Holy Spirit.¹ Origen's words, therefore, that the Simonians by no means confess Jesus to be the Son of God, but say that Simon is the power of God [Orig. contr. Cels. v. p. 272, Spencer's ed. 1677], are verified by the confusion of the Persons, by the denial of the humanity of Jesus Christ, as well as by the subsequent superseding of Jesus by Simon.

A difference between Irenæus and "the Announcement" was noticed just now, namely, that Irenæus states the doctrine to be that the world-making angels sprang from Ennoia, while the Announcement states that the Logos took roots of the originating principle, of which roots Ennoia was one. It will be noticed too that the Simonian disregard of the prophets [Iren. adv. Hær. i. 23; Hipp. Refut. Hær. vi. 14] is not very consistent with the appeals to the prophets in the earlier part of the Announcement [see Hipp. vi. ch. v. quoting Isaiah, ix. quoting Proverbs and Jeremiah, xi. quoting Isaiah].² Now Irenæus' 23rd chapter has so strong a resemblance to the quotations from the Announcement in Hippolytus' 14th chapter, as to make one think that Irenæus used the Announcement. Why then did he omit all notice of the theory of its earlier part? Is it that the former part was really earlier, written before Simon Magus abjured Christianity, that the later chapters (as they have every appearance of being) were an afterthought, that again the earlier doctrine was changed into the more Gnostic doctrine of the generation of Æons from Ennoia, and that this final stage is described by Irenæus?³ This supposition of a more complete Gnosticism adopted at a later time by Simon is almost implied in the assertion that Simon introduced the distinction between the Supreme Being and the Creator. [See Iren. i. 27; Greg. Nazian. Orat. de Hieronymo; August. de Hæres. I. i.; Ittigius, I. ii. 11.] The cosmogony of the Announcement scarcely bears out the assertion. But the assertion may have been made in consequence of the development of Simon's doctrine by others.

Such was the system of Simon. The correctness of the opinion of Epiphanius will be allowed that the heresy is not properly classed with those that bear the name of Christ [Epiph. Hær. xxi. 1]. The Simonians pretended to be Christians that they might insinuate themselves into the Church; and many caught in their wickedness were excommunicated [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 1 and 13].

The pretensions of Simon were supported by the delusions of magic, and magic in several forms was practised by the sect. There is nothing unreasonable or unscriptural in supposing that supernatural agencies, the power of evil spirits, may have been permitted to enter into those delusions. Such a supposition does not involve the subjection of those powers to the will of man. [DOCTR. OF THEOLOGY, MAGIC.] Our Lord's words, [Matt. xxiv. 24-26] that false prophets and false Christs shall arise, who shall shew great signs and wonders, surely must refer to something more than the impositions of jugglers.

The statement made by Irenæus respecting the lewdness of the sect is confirmed by the "Great Announcement" itself, which speaks of promiscuous intercourse of the sexes as "sanctifying one another" [Hippol. Refut. Hær. vi. 14. NICOLAITANES].⁴

Of the numbers of this sect Justin Martyr writes, as has been already said, that almost all the Samaritans and a few even of other nations worship Simon. Simon had been much honoured in Rome. But this did not continue long, for his influence fell before St. Peter's preaching [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 14]. Origen writes about A.D. 240, that not thirty of Simon's followers could be found in the whole world [Orig. contr. Cels. i. 57].⁵ The progress of Gnosticism brought the Simonians into sects named from other leaders.

By almost universal consent Simon is regarded as the first propagator in the Church, but acting from without, of principles which developed into Gnosticism.⁶ From the Simonians, writes Irenæus, knowledge, falsely so called, received its beginning [Iren. adv. Hær. i. 23]. Hippolytus identifies the Roots of Simon's system with the Æons of Valentinus [Hippol. Refut. Hær. vi. 15]. This remark points out the transition from Simon's system to that of Valentinus. Simon rejected the notion of absolute creation, from an adoption doubtless of the common heathen tenet, that nothing can come from nothing. But instead of asserting an independent eternity of matter, he asserted matter to be the manifestation of the Divine Substance. In the formation of the world he retained the agency of the Logos, who took the roots of the Divine Substance, which roots produced all things by generation. This is doubtless very different from the tenets of developed Gnosticism, in which the world-making angels act independently of the Supreme Being: still, the notion of absolute creation being once rejected, it was easy to drop the agency of the Logos, or to reduce the character of the Logos to that of an inferior Æon, and to represent the roots of the Divine Substance as emanations from that substance.

² See, however, Burton's remark that the Gnostics rejecting the Jewish Scriptures still appealed to them in support of their own doctrine; and his anticipation that if their writings had come down to us we should find them arguing that though the prophets were not inspired by the Supreme God they still could not help giving utterance to truths [pp. 39-40].

This, it appears, was the change made by Valentinus in the connection, first effected by Simon, of Christianity with Gnosticism. The necessity for the change lay in the adoption of a different tenet concerning matter. Valentinus, if not asserting broadly the full Gnostic tenet that matter is itself essentially evil, at least attributes to it a resistance to the pervading principle of Divine life, so as to be capable of producing evil. [VALENTINIANS.] This was not consistent with the Simonian representation of matter as the manifestation of the Divine Substance. It was necessary to have recourse in the formation of the world to an inferior Demiurge.

The Simonian confusion of the creature with the Creator led to the denial of the existence of evil in the outward acts of the creature, and must have lain, doctrinally, at the root of their horrible excesses. The Gnostics, holding that matter was essentially evil, could consistently teach the necessity of austerity and mortification of the flesh: and some did so teach.

Again, the Platonic tenet, that there are heavenly archetypes or ideas of all earthly things, appears to be in its strongest form in the first principle of the Simonian cosmogony, in which Heaven and Earth are outward manifestations of Mind and Intelligence. It would be possible to introduce this tenet in a modified form into Gnosticism by supposing the world-creating angels to be reflexes of the Supreme Mind, and matter to be unresisting:¹ but Gnosticism in general held that the Demiurge proceeded from the highest God only at an infinite distance, and was as incapable of willing the perfect as of restraining the opposition of matter [Gieseler, Comp. Eccl. Hist. i. 137]. In the unreality of our Lord's body Simon and the great bulk of the Gnostics agreed.² Thus Simon, adding to his Samaritan education an initiation into the Cabala and its magic as a student at Alexandria, (for on this point the statement of the Clementine Homilies [ii. 22] is so probable that it may be accepted,) learning something of Christianity from Philip, soon set himself up as a rival of the Jesus Whom he had abjured; and lost his life, if the narrative of Hippolytus may be received, in an attempt to exhibit in his own person (by being buried alive) a resurrection, the reality of which, in the case of Jesus Christ, he denied [Hippol. Refut. Hær. vi. 15].³

SIMONIANS, ST. [POSITIVISTS. SOCIALISTS.]

SIONITES. A small community which attracted some attention in Norway in the first half of the eighteenth century. They called themselves Sionites, as professing to set forth the reign of the King of Sion, with Whom they claimed to be in such close communion that their acts were identified with His: but they also took the name of "strangers and pilgrims." It was their custom to wear long beards, a linen girdle—analogous to a custom of the PHUNDAITES—and to have the word "Sion," with some mystical character, embroidered in red on their sleeves. They gave passports to persons whom they charged to aid in establishing the Kingdom of Sion; but causing some trouble to the Government by these "Fifth Monarchy" ideas, they were exiled from Bragernes in the year 1743 and obliged to settle at Altona. One of their number, George Kleinow, professed to be a prophet, and under his guidance they repudiated the baptism of their converts, and re-baptized them when they entered their community. Christian VI. eventually issued orders for dissolving the community on account of its disobedience to the laws, and its pretensions of setting up a kingdom which claimed to be independent of them. [Grégoire's Hist. des Sectes Relig.]

SIPHORI. A sect is found under this name in Gennadius Massiliensis, but it is supposed to be a misreading for SACOPHORI. [Gennad. Massil. De Eccl. Dogmat. s. v.]

SISCIDENSES. A sect of the Waldenses which is mentioned by Reinerius as agreeing with them in everything except that they received the Sacrament of the Eucharist [Reiner. contr. Waldens. in Bibl. Max. Lugd. xxv. 266 f.]. Gieseler thinks that their name is properly spelt Sifridenses, and that they took it from some local leader named Sifried. [Gieseler, Comp. Eccl. Hist. iii. 446, n. 6, Clark's ed.]

SIX PRINCIPLE BAPTISTS. The oldest sect of American Baptists, claiming descent from the original settlement of Roger Williams at Providence in Rhode Island, in the year 1630. The full name which they gave to themselves is "The Ancient Order of the Six Principles of the Doctrine of Christ and His Apostles." The six principles are those mentioned in the first three verses of the sixth chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, namely, Repentance from dead works, Faith towards God, the Doctrine of Baptisms, Laying on of hands, Resurrection of the dead, and Eternal judgment. The doctrine of Baptisms they explain as referring to the baptism of St. John, the baptism of the Holy Ghost at Pentecost, the baptism of Christ's sufferings, and Christian baptism by immersion. The "laying on of hands" is interpreted of the rite of Confirmation, which (administered by themselves) is required as a strict rule of communion among them, none being admitted who has not been "under hands." The sect numbers about 5000 members, chiefly among the uneducated class of country-people.

SKOPTZI. A name signifying "eunuchs," given to a Russian sect of the Bezpopofschin Dissenters, and derived from their practice of self-mutilation, which they supposed to be warranted by Scripture [Matt. xix. 12].

The general characteristic of this sect of fanatics, even among those who do not adopt this extreme course of action, is one of self-mortification and asceticism. They perform self-imposed penances, such as flagellation, wearing hair-cloth shirts and iron chains and crosses. They profess great respect for Peter III., the murdered husband of the Empress Catharine [A.D. 1762], of whom they keep pictures in their houses, in which he is represented with a scarlet handkerchief tied round his right knee, (which is supposed to be one of their masonic signs,) and whom they expect to revisit the earth as the true Messiah, and, having rung the great bell of the Church of the Ascension in Moscow, to summon the elect, and reign over all the true Skoptzi. They are noted for their anxiety to procure converts, and he who gains twelve is dignified with the title of Apostle. Their chief peculiarities of practice and doctrine are the rejection of the resurrection of the body, a refusal to observe Sunday, and the substitution of certain rites invented by themselves in lieu of the sacrament of the Eucharist. They call themselves "Karablik," which means "a small ship," and Baron Haxthausen, travelling in Russia in the earlier part of the present century, and attending one of their places of worship, heard a hymn of which the following is a translation :

"Hold together, ye crew ;
Let not the ship go down in the storm,
The Holy Ghost is with us !
Fear not the breakers nor the storm,
Our Father and Christ is with us !
His mother Akulina Ivanovna is with us !
He will come, He will appear,
He will ring the great bell of the Uspenski ; (the Church of the Ascension in Moscow.)
He will call together the faithful crew,
He will set up masts which never fall,
He will spread sails which never rend,
He will set a rudder which steers safely.
He is near us ! He is with us !
He casts anchor in a secure harbour ;
We are landed ; we are landed.
The Holy Ghost is with us !
The Holy Ghost is near us !
The Holy Ghost is in us !"

They are a numerous sect, in some governments, as that of Orel, comprising whole villages, and they have many adherents among the jewellers and goldsmiths of St. Petersburg, Moscow, and other large towns.

SMYTONITE CONTROVERSY. A dispute which arose in the Secession Kirk about the middle of the eighteenth century respecting the elevation of the Elements in celebrating the Lord's Supper. One of the ministers of that body, Mr. Smyton of Kilmaurs, considered such elevation an essential part of the ordinance, and pressed its authoritative enactment, but the Synod determined (with an unusual tolerance of variety) that it should be left an open question.

SOCIALISTS. A politico-religious sect which professes to have discovered and to practice the "science of human happiness" in the development of the social as distinguished from the individual life.

The founder of this visionary sect was Count St. Simon [A.D. 1760-1825], who derived its principles chiefly from the social philosophy of Rousseau. He started with the idea of reforming three evils which he considered to have fallen upon society : namely [1] Isolation and hostile competition in industry ; [2] Diversities of opinion on the most important subjects among men of learning and science ; [3] Individualism, which lay at the root of all other evils. To remedy these evils St. Simon offered a new and perfect system of religion, philosophy, and government, founded in Pantheism, equality, and the elevation of industry into a religion. He defined God as "all that is" or universal nature, and the chief attribute of Deity as "the social principle," or love and union ; thus deifying the material upon which industry is employed, and consecrating industry by making it a series of operations upon deified material. Thus labour was regarded in the St. Simonian system as the one sacred duty of life, the best labourer as the most religious man, and the only true social distinction as that merit which resulted from labour.

The system of worship belonging to this new religion was a dreamy idolatry of art. The poets were to provide poetry-suitable for recitation in the public assemblies, and by means of which the worshippers should become preachers to each other. The musicians were to invent soul penetrating, emotional, music for this poetry, by means of which the mutual preachers would be rapt into an elysium of social joy. The architects and painters were so to embellish the temples as to teach sentiments of fear, joy, and hope.

The social system of St. Simon was that which has acquired the name of Communism, and consisted chiefly in the abolition of the law of primogeniture, the absorption of all property and results of industry into one common public stock, and the distribution of this common fund to each person according to their merit. Upon this community of property Father Enfantin, one of the leading St. Simonians, engrafted community of women, when the French Government thought it necessary to interfere, and St. Simonianism was suppressed by authority in the year 1832. It survived, however, in a "philosophical" form in the system of Positivism, which owes its origin to Comte, one of the disciples of St. Simon ; and the latent power which it still possesses over the minds of the French working-classes was shewn in a terrible manner by the "War of the Commune," which followed the German conquest of France, in the year 1871.

Robert Owen, the founder of English Socialism, a native of New Lanark, was contemporary with St. Simon [A.D. 1771-1858] for two-thirds of his long life, and no doubt derived his ideas to a large extent from those of the French visionary. He endeavoured to propagate Socialism by establishing workshops on the principles of co-operation originated by Fourier in connection with the St. Simonians; and from these as a base he extended his system widely for a time both in Great Britain and in America. That system was, in a few words, one of co-operative industry combined with infidelity, and with as much freedom respecting the relations of the sexes as could be adopted without provoking the arm of the law. In the exalted language of the Socialist, this is described as making man rational and happy by abandoning all the absurdities of "past religions, governments, men-made laws, artificial marriages, modes of producing and distributing wealth, of buying cheap and selling dear, and all other past and existing institutions," and setting up instead a system in which man may "enter on a new life, surrounded by new conditions, all of which will be superior, and in which the spirit of universal charity and love will govern the population of the earth as one enlightened and affectionate family, upon a system of perfect equality, according to age, education, and condition; the education and condition of all being made as superior as the concentrated knowledge and power of the race can devise, and, with the materials at its control, can execute" [Robert Owen in Religions of the World, p. 313, ed. 1870]. The theories of Comte have to a considerable extent taken the place of those of Owen during the last quarter of a century, and English forms of Positivism have been developed out of them in a similar manner to that in which English Socialism was developed out of St. Simonianism.

SOCIETIES FOR THE REFORMATION OF MANNERS. These appear to have sprung from the Religious Societies which were established in London and elsewhere for the promotion of personal piety in the latter half of the seventeenth century. [RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.] They were not bound down to one uniform plan, but were all pledged to one uniform object, that of recovering the nation out of the depths of profligacy into which it had sunk during the prevalence of irreligious anarchy under the Commonwealth and of French manners under Charles II. One in London was composed of magistrates, members of Parliament, and lawyers, for the purpose of enforcing the laws against swearing, drunkenness, and the profanation of the Lord's Day; another of tradesmen, for the suppression of prostitution. Others for similar objects were established in large provincial towns, and correspondence was kept up between them to strengthen their hands by co-operation and union.

Such unauthoritative interference with vice was well-intentioned, but far too high-handed for the English temperament; and when seventy or eighty warrants a week came to be executed by means of one of these Societies in London alone it was to be expected that the members and their agents would meet with some rough treatment. Two were, in fact, murdered while endeavouring to carry out the objects of the Society, and others narrowly escaped a similar fate. Most of the Bishops supported the Societies, by the recommendation of Archbishop Tenison, and they were also supported by the well-known Robert Nelson. But they were opposed by the High Churchmen of the day, including Archbishop Sharp, who set his face against their introduction within his province. They were also opposed by the press, especially by Defoe, who justly remonstrated against the suppression of immorality by means of informers and penalties, and sarcastically recommended the upper classes to try the reformation of manners by example, before they tried to effect it by such means. The evils of such organizations was being conspicuously illustrated at this very time in New England. And neither there, nor under the somewhat similar Kirk-session discipline of the Scotch Presbyterians, was any real reformation of manners effected.

Perhaps the best result of these Societies was the foundation in 1699 of the "Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge," the germ of which was the following resolution agreed to by some of their chief promoters: "Whereas the growth of vice and immorality is greatly owing to gross ignorance of the principles of the Christian religion, we whose names are underwritten do agree to meet together as often as we can conveniently, to consult, under the conduct of the Divine Providence and assistance, how we may be able, by due and lawful methods, to promote Christian knowledge."

The Societies for the Reformation of Manners existed from about 1691 until about 1730, when they had gradually died out. Wesley tried to revive them in 1757, but after a short time the attempt failed. [Woodward's Religious Societies, etc. Nelson's Address to Persons of Quality, p. 153. SOCIETY PEOPLE. [CAMERONIANS.]

SOCIETY OF FRIENDS. [QUAKERS.]

SOCINIANS. The Antitrinitarian opinions which spread from Italy and took root principally in Poland, were systematized by Faustus Socinus. In doing this he made great use of the writings of his uncle Lælius Socinus. Lælius had also contributed much to the spread of those opinions. It is therefore generally stated that Lælius Socinus was the first author of the Socinian sect. These two belonged to a family of lawyers at Sienna. Lælius, the third son of Marianus Socinus, born in the year 1525, left Italy upon the breaking up of the debating club at Vincenza to which he belonged [ANTITRINITARIANS], travelled for four years in France, England, the Netherlands, Germany, and Poland, and then settled in Zurich. At Cracow there was a secret society for the discussion of religious questions, its members being in general opposed to the pretensions of the See of Rome, in which Antitrinitarian tenets had been broached by Spiritus of Holland. Lælius appears to have determined the leading man of this society, Leimanini, who was already wavering, in favour of the new heresy. But when settled at Zurich his opinions were not openly avowed, nor can he be altogether acquitted of the charge of dissimulation. He was intimate with the leading Reformers, and was in the habit of propounding his opinions only in the way of doubt and inquiry. In the year 1552 Calvin warned him to check his itch of inquiry, "ne tibi gravia tormenta accersas." The words "gravia tormenta" received a very significant commentary in the next year from the burning of Servetus. Some historians (Natalis Alexander among them) state that Lælius left Zurich upon the death of Servetus; but Bayle's statement appears to be more probable that he took care not to discover his thoughts but in a proper time and place, and behaved himself so dexterously that he lived among the mortal enemies of his opinions without being in the least degree injured by them. In the year 1558 he was in Poland still in the company and correspondence of the leading Reformers. In that year John Burcher, an Englishman, wrote from Cracow to Bullinger, "I have found out Lælius, to whom I gave your letter." Bullinger, four months before, had written to Utenhovius: "Habes vivam epistolam, D. Lælium Socinum Senensem Italum. Hunc tibi peramanter et diligentissime commendo" [Original Letters, Parker Soc. ii. p. 700]. Blandrata was then in Poland, being honourably received by the Protestants; and two years before, Gonezius, a Pole, had openly avowed in the Synod of Seceminum his denial of the Trinity. Public disputations, it appears, were also held on the subject. What part Lælius took in these proceedings is not exactly known, but he retained the goodwill of both parties so far that, at the intercession of Melancthon, he obtained from Sigismund of Poland and from the Emperor Maximilian II. the privileges of an ambassador, that he might revisit Venice in safety to recover his paternal estates. After this Lælius returned to Switzerland, and died at Zurich in May 1562. Faustus was then at Lyons. He set out immediately on hearing of his uncle's death, and obtained possession of his papers, which he made use of afterwards. It was not however until the year 1578 that he took part in the affairs of the Antitrinitarian body.

Meanwhile, notwithstanding the warnings of Calvin, heresy gained ground; and each synod that was held with the view of bringing all the Reformers to an agreement in faith, shewed an increase of the heretical party. In 1565, after a conference had been held in consequence of a petition from Gregory Paul, minister of a church in Cracow, to the National Assembly, the inevitable schism took place. Sigismund Augustus had granted liberty of conscience to all the sects which forsook the Church of Rome; and about 1570 John Sienienius, Palatine of Podolia, gave the seceders a settlement in Racow. They differed widely among themselves; some (the Farnovians) holding opinions very nearly Arian, some (the Budneians) being Psilanthropists, and others endeavouring to hold a middle course. This controversy was carried on with much vehemence in Transylvania, where Blandrata had settled as court physician. Among those who refused worship to Christ was Francis David, a Hungarian, superintendent of the Transylvanian societies, whose doctrine greatly disturbed the Antitrinitarians of Transylvania. Blandrata sent for Faustus Socinus in 1578 to pacify these troubles. Faustus had spent twelve years in the court of the Duke of Tuscany, and three years at Basle in the study of divinity. When Blandrata's invitation reached him, he had just ended a disputation at Zurich with Francis Puccius. David, not yielding to Socinus' arguments, was thrown into prison, where he shortly died. His followers were called "Semi-Judaizers" by Socinus and his party, and a treatise was written against them by the former under that title. Socinus retired in the next year [A.D. 1579] to Poland. At first he was not received by the party which he wished to join; he was accused of having advised the persecution of David, and his opinions differed in some respects from those generally held by the party. He did not cease, however, on this account to exert himself on their behalf. He gradually overcame all opposition, and the Antitrinitarian party formed themselves into one community under his superintendence and direction.

Upon their separation from the other Reformers, the first care of the Socinians had been to provide themselves with a version of the Bible agreeable to their tenets. This done, they drew up a "Catechism or Confession of the Unitarians:" of which a full account may be seen in Mosheim [Hist. Cent. XVI. III. ii. 10]. This elder Catechism was supplanted by the Racovian Catechism, which was drawn up by Faustus Socinus principally from the papers of Lælius, corrected and enlarged by others, and published in Polish in 1605, and in Latin in 1609, with a dedication to James I. of England. The academy of Racow (from which town the Catechism has its name) was founded by Jacobus a Siennio, to whom Racow belonged, and who became the zealous patron of the Socinians. The academy exerted itself in the dissemination of its heresy by the publication of controversial books, and by sending missionaries to other countries. The sect was now organized. The affairs were managed by synods on the presbyterian platform, which had control of its public funds and full power over its ministers. Until the year 1638 the sect was prosperous. In that year some Racovian students broke a highway cross at the entrance of the town. Complaint was made by the Catholics, and the Diet of Warsaw ordered that the college should be demolished, the church of Racow shut up, the Socinian printing-press destroyed, the ministers and teachers of the sect banished. It is evident that the breaking of the cross was only an occasion laid hold of by one of two contending parties to measure strength with their opponents. During the next twenty years Socinian worship was continued in many places of the kingdom, but with occasional acts of severity against the sect, such as the destruction, by the judges of Lublin, of the churches of Kiselin and Beresc in Volhynia, under the pretence that teachers from Racow had fled thither; and the banishment of Jonas Slichtingius for publishing a book, "Confessio Christiana." In the year 1658 the final blow came. It was discovered that, during the Swedish invasion of Poland, the Socinians, intending to raise themselves upon the ruins of the state, kept intelligence with Ragotski, Prince of Transylvania, who had attacked Poland at the same time. The Catholic lords in the Diet of Warsaw passed a law against Socinianism. All Socinians were obliged to abjure their heresy or leave the kingdom within two years. The 10th of July 1660 was the day fixed for their departure. This law, confirmed afterwards in other diets, was executed with wanton cruelty and insult, over and above the inevitable misery accompanying such a measure. Thus the Socinian societies, after an existence of a hundred years in Poland, were at length destroyed.

In Transylvania Socinianism obtained so firm a footing, through the influence of Blandrata, that no attempts to suppress it were made by the government. The sect was tolerated. Attempts were made to form settlements in Hungary, Austria, and Holland, but were defeated by the opposition of the Roman Catholic and the Reformed Churches.

In England, Socinianism did not prosper. The Anabaptists fell into the Eutychian heresy rather than the Socinian. In the year 1612, Leggatt and Wightman were condemned to be burnt for denying our Lord's divinity; but they formed no party. The only Socinian congregation in England was gathered by John Biddle during the Commonwealth. He was a native of Gloucester, and kept the grammar-school of that town. After two imprisonments for heresy, he was a third time held to trial, when Cromwell banished him to the Isle of Scilly. Brought back by a writ of Habeas Corpus, he was set at liberty, and became minister of an Independent meeting in London. Soon after the Restoration he was committed again to prison, and died in prison in the year 1662 [Life, prefixed to the first volume of Socinian tracts, The Faith of our God, London, 1691]. Biddle was succeeded in the leadership by his pupil, the well-known Thomas Firmin, but the congregation disappeared, and with it the Socinians, properly so called, of England.

The Catechism of 1574, mentioned above, was only a transition from the varying doctrines of the Antitrinitarian body to the definite doctrine of Socinus. Mosheim remarks of it, that it breathes the spirit of Socinianism even in its most important parts, and shews that, through the influence of the writings of Lælius Socinus, the Arians, who had formerly the upper hand in the community of the Unitarians, were changing their sentiments concerning the nature and mediation of Christ. This Catechism rejects infant baptism; in which rejection is to be traced probably the denial of original sin and of the Atonement, which forms the common ground occupied by the Antitrinitarians and a large body (at least) of the Baptists. Of the Racovian Catechism, which succeeded this earlier form, we are warned by Mosheim that it is no more than a collection of the popular tenets of the Socinians, and by no means a just representation of the secret opinions and sentiments of their doctors: that it seems to have been composed less for the use of the Socinians themselves than to impose upon strangers. The true principles of Socinianism are to be sought in the accredited writers of the sect. In Socinian theology, more perhaps than in that of any other sect, there appears the assumption that God's Nature and Being are comprehensible by the human intellect, that man's reason can determine the conditions of God's existence. Scripture is explained and bent to suit a foregone conclusion.

It was first laid down¹ as a reasonable maxim, that God is of such simplicity of nature as not to admit of a distinction of Persons. It was held, further, that the essence of the Godhead cannot possibly be united with manhood, the Infinite with the finite, between which there can be no "proportion:" that even if the existence of a distinct Person, the Son of God, were supposed, it would be in itself impossible to form a unity out of two totalities; and as both Catholics and Arians teach that the Son had a perfect existence prior to the Incarnation, the union of the two Natures in one Person of Christ is impossible.

Accordingly, the Socinians held Jesus Christ to be only man, but man by a miraculous conception. "The seed of a male was implanted in the Virgin by God, in consequence of which Jesus remained free from the sinful inclinations of other men, nay more, received a will which tended naturally to holiness, which could not stray nor even be tempted."

Jesus, thus born and thus endowed, was anointed with the Holy Ghost at His baptism; the Holy Ghost being, according to the first Socinian principle, not a divine Person but an energy or power of the Godhead. It was principally as King that He was thus anointed, and there was conferred on Him at the time a partial royalty, with the promise of the full royalty of God.

¹ Dörner (from whom this statement is abridged) considers the maxim, "nulla proportio est finiti cum infinito," a maxim recognised both by the Middle Age and the Reformed Church, to be the fundamental maxim of Socinianism; stating the different conception of the maxim thus: "The Socinians based this absolute difference of essence, not on the circumstance that all things are absolutely dependent on the absolute God, but inversely, in a completely Scotistic manner, on human freedom, combined with the doctrine of the natural darkness in things divine of that which is placed outside of God" [Div. II. vol. ii. p. 249, Edinb. transl.]. Regarding the application of the maxim contained in the following words—"Cognoscentis ad cognitum oportet esse aliquam proportionem, cum cognitum sit perfectio cognoscentis. Sed nulla est proportio intellectus creati ad Deum; quia in infinitum distat. Ergo intellectus creatus non potest videre essentiam Dei"—St. Thomas Aquinas writes: "Proportio dicitur dupliciter. Uno modo certa habitudine unius quantitatis ad alteram, secundum quod duplum, triplum, et æquale, sunt species proportionis. Alio modo quælibet habitudine unius ad alterum proportio dicitur. Et sic potest esse proportio creaturæ ad Deum, in quantum se habet ad ipsum, ut effectus ad causam, et nt potentia ad actum. Et secundum hoc intellectus creatus proportionatus esse potest ad cognoscendum Deum" [Summ. Prim. Quæst. xii. art. i. ad. 4].

Jesus was also endowed with a higher knowledge peculiar to Himself: and that He might have the vision of God, was raised up to heaven for a time before entering on His office. Through His Death, and after His Resurrection and Exaltation, He entered upon His royal government, becoming the representative of God, with fulness of power for the work of redemption. His Resurrection was solely the work of God; a new birth, whereby He became actually the first new creature, personally free from death and imperfection. Such is the exaltation of humanity in Christ, that as governing the Church in His own Person, He may justly be termed a God, and worship is due to Him; due to Him, however, not in His own right, but as God's plenipotentiary.

The Socinians denied the Atonement, and consequently, in any proper sense, the Priesthood of Christ. They never wearied of controverting that office with its necessary premisses: they totally lacked a deeper consciousness of sin and guilt: Christ is the Saviour because He shews the way of salvation: the sacraments confer no grace, neither indeed is grace required by man: the view taken of religion was solely the moral and legal view.

To the Socinians have succeeded the modern Unitarians, distinguished from their predecessors principally by the denial of the miraculous conception of our Lord, and the repudiation of His worship. The Socinian theology had also considerable influence in forming the modern Rationalist school. [RATIONALISM.]

SOUTHCOTTIANS. The followers of a deluded woman named Southcott, who professed to be a prophetess, and who, during the last few months of her life, announced that she was about to become the mother of "Shiloh," who was coming to establish the Millennium. The Southcottians also call themselves the "Philadelphian Church."

Joanna Southcott [A.D. 1750-1814], the founder of this sect, was, according to her own account, descended from an old family of Hertfordshire gentry, who had lived on an estate named Wotton for many generations. Her great grandfather, William Southcott, was an austere man, who interfered with the marriage of his daughter so as to break her heart, and drove his son William to leave his home for the purpose of crossing the Atlantic to settle in Pennsylvania. The daughter, Sarah Southcott, is described by Joanna as giving herself up entirely to religion. "Her private meditations and many hymns she composed were afterwards printed, and my mother had the work in her possession; some of them I learned when I was a child, as I greatly delighted in them" [Second Book of Wonders, 89]. William, the brother of this lady, was wrecked on some coast where he was for a time protected by Jews, and then sent home in a ship, which landed him at Topsham in Devonshire. There he married a Miss Mauditt, who became the mother of Joanna's father and of another son, with whom she was shortly left a widow through her husband's adventurous disposition taking him again on a voyage, and this time a fatal one, to Pennsylvania. The widow married a worthless man, who wasted her property, and thus the father of Joanna had to make his way in the world under the pressure of poverty, and although he continued on the same farm for seventeen years, he was at last reduced to such a condition that Joanna went as a domestic servant to a tradesman's family in Exeter. The former position of the family still, however, haunted both the old man and his children. Once at midnight, on Old Christmas-Day, he heard a voice calling to him "Southcott, Southcott, thy name must spread far and wide: there is a lady in Hertfordshire who hath great possessions for thee, and wants thy family to possess it" [ibid. 102]. "All the Southcotts were proud," says Joanna's sister, "and though we were come to nothing, still we were a proud, empty family." "And that I'll grant was true," adds Joanna herself, "a bottle filled with wine wants no more, but an empty bottle wants to be filled" [ibid. 108].

With these traditions of former position, and with experience of much trouble on the way from prosperity to poverty, Joanna Southcott had strong religious feelings which, up to the time when she was forty years of age, found their satisfaction in Methodism. In the spirit of many of that rising sect, she was accustomed to expect special and detailed guidance in answer to prayer, and she nursed this idea until the "direction" was developed into "inspiration," so that the communications which she believed herself to receive from Heaven were not only respecting the affairs of her own life, but also respecting public events, and especially respecting those connected with the Second Advent of our Lord. According to her own account, these revelations began to be made to her in the year 1792, but although they were written down, the papers were sealed up as they were written, and not opened until several years afterwards. About the time named by her many minds were impressed with the idea that the dreadful events of the Reign of Terror, and of the French Revolution in general, foreshadowed the end of the world; and millennial speculations, some of the wildest character, are to be found in abundance in the pamphlets of the day. The mind of Joanna was influenced by one of the wildest of these speculators in prophecy, Richard Brothers,¹

¹ RICHARD BROTHERS was a fanatic naval lieutenant on half-pay, who gave himself out to be the "nephew of God Almighty," "the Branch," "Michael the Prince," and "the Signet of Peace," by whom the Jews were to be restored to the Holy Land and the Millennium to be established. He was taken up by the Avignon Society of MARTINISTS, and thus became a tool in the hands of the French and English Democrats. In 1791 he predicted that London would shortly be destroyed by an either directly or through William Sharp, who was one of his disciples [Gent. Mag. lxxvii. pt. 2, pp. 701, 902], and who, after that fanatic's removal to a lunatic asylum, became closely associated with Joanna, and defended her claims in various publications.

The first publication of Joanna's "prophecies" was in the years 1801, 1802 and 1803, these professing to be revelations made to her ten years before. "I have this to inform the public," she writes in 1803, "that the prophecies of this book shew the destruction of Satan, and the coming of Christ's kingdom. . . . Here my readers may ask me what ground I have to affirm this belief? I answer, from the truth that is past I have ground to believe the other truths will follow. From the former I judge the latter. The war that I foretold in 1792 we should be engaged in followed in 1793. The dearth which came upon the land in 1794 and 1795 I foretold in 1792, and if unbelief did abound, that a much greater scarcity would take place, and which too fatally followed. I foretold the bad harvest in 1797. I foretold in letters sent to two ministers in Exeter, what would be the harvests of 1799 and 1800; that the former would be hurt by rain, and the latter by sun:—these followed as predicted. The rebellion which took place in Ireland in 1798 I foretold in 1795, when the Irish soldiers rebelled in Exeter against the English officers. . . . I foretold the secret thoughts and conversations of people in Exeter which took place in 1792. This was acknowledged to be true by Mr. Eastlake of Exeter, before the Rev. Stanhope Bruce, the Rev. Thomas Webster, the Rev. Thomas P. Foley, Messrs. Sharp, Turner, Wilson, and Morison, January 2nd, 1802, whilst they were at Exeter examining into the truth of my character and writings" [Warning to the whole World from the Sealed Prophecies, etc. 123]. These pretended predictions were conveyed partly in prose, but chiefly in doggerel like the following:—

"Fast the storms are hastening on:
But if England does awake,
And come to perfect day,
'Tis other nations I shall shake—
The sunshine here you'll see;
For as the clouds this day dismissed.
The sunshine at the end;
Then shining days I'll bring to pass earthquake, and during the following three or four years he published many prophecies on public events, and appeals to the people of England of a dangerously exciting and inflammatory character [Moser's Anecd. of Brothers, 1795]. The crowds that resorted to him daily for months in 1794-5, at last made it necessary for the Government to interfere. Brothers was apprehended on March 4th, 1795, and the Privy Council having appointed a commission of physicians to examine him, they declared him, on March 27th, to be a lunatic. On May 4th he was sent to St. Luke's madhouse, to be confined during the King's pleasure. There is a surprising number of publications of the time respecting his prophecies: but his chief supporter in the press and in Parliament was a member of the House of Commons named Nathaniel Brassey Halsted, one of the survivors of the Black Hole of Calcutta, who actually made a speech in the House supporting Brothers' pretensions on March 31st, 1795. Much information respecting Brothers is to be found in the Gentleman's Magazine, lxxv. pt. 1.

And stand your every friend.
So now 'tis time for to awake."
[First Book of Sealed Prophecies, 41.]

Ridiculous as the prophecies of Joanna Southcott now appear—and in several thick volumes of them there is nothing but nonsense and blasphemy—multitudes of people believed in her pretensions, and these were by no means confined to the uneducated classes. Several clergymen were among her supporters, a lady named Townley became her secretary, another lady left her property worth £250 a year, and she exhibited many rich presents which she had received from her wealthy disciples. The latter obtained, in return, papers which she called her "seals," from the circumstance that every one of them was certified by the impression of a seal which she had found in sweeping out a house in Exeter after a sale by auction, the use of which was afterwards revealed to her [Twort's Letters, Epistles, and Revelations, etc. 55]. The device on this seal was the following—the interpretation given to the two letters being obvious. This seal was affixed to most of the voluminous writings which she printed: but the papers given to her disciples generally contained the words, "The Sealed of the Lord—the Elect Precious Man's Redemption—To inherit the Tree of Life—To be made heirs of God and joint-heirs of Jesus Christ:" and the persons receiving them were then said to be numbered among the mystical hundred and forty and four thousand of the Apocalypse.

About fifteen months before her death Joanna Southcott began to print her "Books of Wonders," of which five were published in 1813 and 1814. The Sixth Book was not printed until 1852. These were intended to announce new pretensions to which this singular fanatic now began to lay claim. Although she was now past sixty years of age, she declared that she was about to become a mother, that her child would be supernaturally conceived, and that he would be the Shiloh in whom the Millennium was to be established. In making this announcement she writes: "Since this powerful visitation of the Lord came to me, like that in ninety-two, I have fresh things revealed to me every day. I am awaked every morning between three and four o'clock; I sit up in my bed till the day breaks; and have communications given to me as soon as I am awake. When the day breaks I rise and go down into the dining-room by myself; the moment I enter the room I feel as though I was surrounded with angels; feeling a heavenly joy which I cannot describe, and which has taken from me my natural appetite. . . . As soon as I had finished my last Book new things were revealed to me; and I was ordered to have seven respectable friends to meet together at four o'clock on Thursday afternoon, September 23rd, to hear read what had been revealed to me, and what I was directed to do, that they might be witnesses" [Second Book of Wonders, 1]. The revelation was pretended to have been given in such terms as these:—"The Psalms of David that were never fulfilled in man, but now I have told thee that they shall be fulfilled in the son that shall be born of thee this year; for this shall be the king that I shall enable with ten thousand to destroy those that rise up against him with twenty thousand," etc. [Fourth Book of Wonders, 44].

During the year 1814 the newspapers abound with paragraphs referring to the expectations thus raised in the minds of Joanna's numerous followers; and a writer of the time says that the sacred name of Shiloh was introduced into songs sung by the ballad singers in the streets and in places of amusement, and made Christianity itself to be scoffed at [Eusebius' Letter to Ahp. Cant. 1815]. Many presents were made to her in anticipation of the child's birth, and among them a very costly child's crib, of which a large copperplate engraving exists which is sometimes bound up with her "prophecies," a horned lamb being represented as lying within it. A little more than four months before her death, on August 7th, 1814, Joanna was visited by a London physician of some eminence, Dr. Reece; and, singular to say, he gave way to the belief entertained by herself and her friends, and although convinced that she was a virgin, and that her age was sixty-four, announced his conviction that she was pregnant: a belief which he apparently did not give up until a post mortem examination had proved there was no foundation for it whatever [Reece's Correct Statement, etc., 1815].

Joanna Southcott died on December 27th, 1814, and by her own express directions her body was kept warm for four days in expectation that, being in a trance, she would revive, and that the child would yet be born. These expectations not being fulfilled, her body was buried in St. Marylebone Churchyard, the following inscription being placed on her tombstone:

"While through all thy wondrous days
Heaven and earth enraptured gaze,
While vain sages think they know
Secrets thou alone canst shew,
Thine alone will tell what hour
Thou'lt appear in greater power!"

Before her death, the Rev. T. P. Foley, Rector of Old Swinford, was directed to make the following communication to her believers: "Joanna has had a command from the Spirit of the Lord, that no more preachings or meetings of the friends after Sunday next are to be holden till after the birth of Shiloh, the Prince of Peace; and she desired me to communicate this intelligence to you (Rev. Mr. Eyre); and she wishes you will stop them all at Bristol and Bath, and wherever you may know they are holden. Nothing now is to be published or printed in the papers by the friends without orders or permission from the friends in Weston Place. Signed, Joanna Southcott." "The believers were also ordered by the Spirit" (says Mr. Foley), "through Joanna, to attend on a Sunday the Protestant churches near them. Some that believed in the order, fulfilled it; and some did not fulfil it, but kept their meetings" [Living Oracle or Star of Bethlehem, 1830, p. ix.]. Little was heard, therefore, of Joanna's followers for some years. But in 1825 a man named Charles William Twort pretended to be the Shiloh whose coming had been predicted, and published a number of letters under such titles as "The Vision of Judgment or the return of Joanna from her trance," "The Living Oracle or the Star of Bethlehem," "Letters, Epistles, and Revelations of Jesus Christ, addressed to the believers in the glorious reign of Messiah." These were signed "Zion, the Lord is here," sealed with a seal impressed with a dove, and called the "Epistles of Shiloh," and dated from the year of the Millennium 1825. A similar impostor arose about the same time from among the Southcottians named George Turner, who issued epistles of the same kind, and whose followers were called "Turnerites." The last leader of the Southcottians was John Wroe of Bowling, near Bradford, who assumed that position about 1822, and whose followers afterwards became notorious at Wakefield and in Australia. [CHRISTIAN ISRAELITES.] On June 15th, 1855, the foundation-stone was laid of a large mansion, subsequently called "Melbourne House," at Wrenthorpe, between Wakefield and Bradford, which was formally opened on Whitsun Day, 1857, in presence of a vast number of Wroe's followers from all quarters. The house is built in the classic style, has extensive greenhouses, and is fitted throughout in the interior with mahogany and cedar. This was professedly intended for a community of Southcottians, but "Prophet Wroe" bequeathed the property to a grandchild, and the sect cannot regain possession of it. There are now only three or four other congregations of the Southcottians in England.

SPINOZA. The philosophic doctrine of Benedict Spinoza has never yet been popularized; it is unconnected with any system of public worship; and "its followers," said M. Stoup, writing for his day, "dare not discover themselves, because it overthrows the foundation of all religion." It is however of importance that it should be noticed here somewhat in detail; its author having been the founder of so-called Biblical criticism, and parent of the modern German school of speculative philosophy; all the great metaphysicians of that country adopting his fundamental principles, and differing with him only on points of detail.

Baruch, or as he Latinized his name, Benedictus, de Spinoza, was the son of a Jewish merchant at Amsterdam, and was born on the 24th of November 1632. It was in the first instance intended that he should follow his father's profession, but his early passionate love of study subsequently induced his parents to allow him to devote himself to learning. Very soon the boy won the heart and admiration of the chief Rabbi Saul Levi Morteira, and great indeed were the expectations raised by his shrewdness and ability. Nothing seemed too good or too fair to look for from him. Boyhood passed into youth. His mind gradually expanded. And now little by little it was perceived he was beginning to break loose from the faith to which he had been born, and to think for himself independently. Little by little, too, it was seen he was withdrawing from the established worship of the synagogue, and retiring more and more upon himself. As he changed, so the countenance of his friends changed towards him. Mild persuasions were followed by urgent remonstrances; remonstrances by threats; and threats by preparations for his excommunication. But his mind even at that early age was extraordinarily fixed and fearless. The very severities proposed against him conveyed the impression to his mind that they who resorted to them were incapable of answering his difficulties, and knew themselves to be so. Accordingly he voluntarily withdrew from the synagogue. But the sentence of excommunication was nevertheless pronounced, if not as a terror to him, at least as a warning to others; and from that day he was a stranger to his own people and his father's house, and his connection with any religious body was at an end.

Our next glimpse of Spinoza is when received into the house and assisting to teach in the school of one Van den Ende, a physician of Amsterdam, learning Latin—and at the same time love, from his daughter. But alas—femina est mutabile,—the damsel jilts the philosopher for the sake of a Hamburg merchant, and Benedict is once more an outcast. “Hoc odium erga rem amatam majus erit pro ratione lætitiæ, qua zelotypus ex reciproco rei amatæ amore solebat affici . . . ad quod denique accedit, quod zelotypus non eodem vultu, quem res amata ei præbere solebat, ab eadem excipitur, quâ etiam de causâ amans contristatur,” says he [de Affect. Schol. Pr. xxxv.], in after life, looking calmly backward. Time passes, and again we find him critically circumstanced. This time he is being tempted by wealth and honour. He has settled at Voorburg, a little village near the Hague, determined to devote his life entirely to philosophy, working with his hands for the supply of his daily wants, and gaining for himself a bare subsistence by polishing lenses for telescopes and microscopes. His Principia Philosophiæ Cartesianæ has appeared, the most profound and accurate digest of the teaching of Descartes in existence, and become a text-book in the schools. The fame of its author being noised abroad, the Prince Palatine offered him the chair of philosophy in the University of Heidelberg. But Spinoza declined it. “I do not look,” he says, “for any higher worldly possession than that which I now enjoy.” Consistently, when the inheritance of his fathers comes to him, he makes it over to his sisters Miriam and Rebecca, though they have forsaken and despised him. A wealthy citizen, Simon de Vries, out of pity for his poverty, leaves him a fortune, but he refuses to receive it. In his living he is more than temperate. A basin of milk porridge, with a little butter, costing about three halfpence, was to him a day's sustenance; and this, not from any self-restraint or self-mortification, but because he was naturally abstemious, and finding this sufficient, cared not for more. “Although often invited to dinner,” as the Lutheran pastor Colerus, to whom we are indebted for most of what we know of the domestic life of the philosopher, remarks, “he preferred the scanty meal that he found at home to dining sumptuously at the expense of another.”

Thus, “in the still air of delightful studies,” went the philosopher on his way. In his forty-fifth year, in the full vigour and maturity of his intellect, consumption, which had long threatened him, became firmly established, and made rapid progress. On the Sunday on which he died he would not allow his host and hostess to stay from divine service to wait on him, particularly as it was their purpose to partake of the Holy Communion. Though he had not become a Christian on giving up Judaism, he nevertheless could reverence the convictions of those who received that faith in sincerity and unaffected devotion. When asked by his landlady respecting her religion he said: “Your religion is a good one, you ought not to seek another, nor doubt that yours will procure you salvation, if you add to your piety the tranquil virtues of domestic life.” Waiting patiently, on their return from service, he talked with them after a friendly sort about the sermon, and presently settling into a calm, expired in peace, on the 21st of February 1677. After his death his goods (with the exception of the MS. of his Ethics) were sold by auction to defray the expenses of his burial, and realized about £40 sterling of our money.

An edition of his works appeared at once after his death; those which had been printed during his life being bound with those previously unpublished, the latter under the title—“B. D. S. Opera Posthuma.” The name of the author was only indicated by initial letters, we are told in the preface, because a little before his death he begged expressly that his name might not be mentioned; for, as he says, “The innocent love of approbation easily glides into ambition and selfishness, whereby men, under a false show of consideration for others, are apt to excite discord and sedition; . . . and he that sincerely desires to help others by word or deed . . . will be careful not to have his name associated with his work, or to give any other cause for envy.” [Ethics, pt. iv. append. cap. xxv.]

The collected works submitted to the world at this time were as follows:

1. The Principia Philosophiæ Cartesianæ, to which is added an appendix, under the title Cogitata Metaphysica, enlarging on certain points not exhausted in the preceding. Amsterdam, 1663.

2. The Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. Hamburg, 1670.
3. The Elleica.
4. The Tractatus Politicus.
5. The Tractatus de Intellectus emendatione.
6. The Epistolæ et ad eas Responsiones.
7. Compendium Grammatices lingue Hebrææ.

Amsterdam,
1677.

To these must be added :

8. A treatise on the Rainbow.
9. A small treatise on God, and on Man and his wellbeing—both long presumed to be lost, and only recently discovered.

The first, fifth, and ninth treatises will not detain us, their interest being chiefly historical, as foreshadowing his greater works. The seventh and eighth, again, do not concern us.

The Epistolæ are of great interest as specimens of an extremely clear and terse style, as shewing us the class of men with whom Spinoza was on intimate terms, and as containing expositions of most of the difficulties his doctrine presented to the best and ablest men of that time, and still does present. Five-and-twenty are between Spinoza and Henry Oldenburg, the first secretary of our English Royal Society. Through Oldenburg Boyle also became interested in the philosopher. The rest of the seventy-four are chiefly received from or addressed to foreign scholars, amongst whom we find Leibnitz, one of the most popular and distinguished philosophical writers of his day. Nearly all are upon subjects of the most profound interest and importance, and strike to the very foundation of all knowledge and religious belief.

The publication of the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, by which Spinoza was chiefly known during his lifetime, produced a sensation throughout Europe of which in these days we can form little idea. It was condemned and forbidden to be sold in almost every country. But the very labour which was taken to suppress it excited curiosity, and many were the quaint titles used, after the fashion of that day, in order to disguise it, and facilitate its dissemination. The Spanish edition was entitled—Henriquez de Villacorta, M. Dr. a Cubiculo Philippi IV., Caroli II., Archiatri opera chirurgica omnia, sub auspiciis potentissimi Hispaniarum Regis [Lewes, Hist. Philos. 393]. Looking abroad upon the world, and seeing the number of “sects, heresies, and schools of thought” within the Christian religion alone, to mention no other;—men boasting of the peace, the joy they experience, the brotherly love they feel, while in actual life they contend with the bitterest acrimony, and are full of intolerance and unappeasable hatred towards one another, one defending and extolling a doctrine as divine, while another condemns it as devilish;—distinguishable only by the place of worship they frequent, and the profession of this or that body of opinions, not by the consistency of their lives or conversation—What, he asks, can the explanation be? What the remedy? The explanation he believes to be—an entirely mistaken idea as to the nature of that Word of God to which all alike profess to refer for authority; and the remedy—an entirely new examination of the Scriptures, in a spirit devoid of prejudice, in order to ascertain, if possible, what is and what is not essential for a man to know for his soul’s health,—what is and what is not unessential, and within the limits on which his mind may be left at liberty to think for itself.

The work consists of twenty chapters. The first two consider the nature of prophecy and the prophetic office, and conclude that the prophetic writings are merely of weight in such things as concern the usages of life and virtuous conduct; and that on other subjects they concern us little. The gift of prophetic foresight is attributed to a quicker and more lively imagination than that of common men. The third chapter treats of the election of the Jews, and of the question whether the gift of prophecy was peculiar to them; denying the latter, and affirming of the former that it was apparent merely, not real; the various passages of Scripture which would seem to prove the contrary being in condescension to the state and circumstances of the Jewish people, who in their then stage of civilization would have been incapable of happiness could they have known God favoured any other nation. The fourth is on the Divine Law, the first precept of which is that a man shall love God unconditionally, with all his heart, not for the sake of benefit or fear of punishment, “but from this only, that he knows God.” The fifth treats of religious ceremonial observance, and faith in the historic narrative; of the reasons why rites and ceremonies are useful, and those to whom they are necessary. The sixth is on miracles. A miracle, in the light of anything above or contrary to nature, is regarded as an absurdity; for [1] nothing can happen contrary to the established order and course of nature, which is eternal and unchangeable. [2] Miracles, even if possible, could not make known either the nature or attributes of God, already revealed and illustrated in the regular and invariable order of nature; and, conceived as events contravening the established order of nature, so far from proving the existence of God, would actually lead us to call it in question. [3] Where, in Holy Scripture, the decrees and will of God are spoken of, nothing else is meant than the order and law of nature, which are in fact the eternal order and law of God. [4] Many common things in Scripture appear miraculous merely from the peculiar language in which they are recorded, as for instance where it is said God hardened the heart of Pharaoh, meaning only that he was firm and uncomplying; or where it is said God opened the windows of heaven, meaning only that a good deal of rain fell; and so on. The seventh chapter is in defence of a purely rational interpretation of Scripture by each person for himself, independently of any extrinsic authority. The eighth is to prove that the Penta-teuch, and the books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, and Kings, were all written "ages after the things they relate had passed away. And when we regard the argument and connection of these books severally, we readily gather that they were all written by one and the same person, who had the purpose of compiling a system of Jewish antiquities, from the origin of the nation to the first destruction of the city of Jerusalem. The several books are so connected one with another, that from this alone we discover how they comprise the continuous narrative of a single historian. . . . Who this was, however, cannot be so readily shewn, although . . . I am led to suspect that it was Ezra. . . . The books in question could have been written by no one before Ezra. . . . Perhaps he was led to call the first five books of his history by the name of Moses, because in them especially are comprised the incidents in the life of the great prophet. For the same reason Joshua . . . etc. etc." Ninth, the same subject continued, with criticisms of the Hebrew text and marginal notes of the Hebrew codices, and additions up of figures, etc., reminding us of much which has appeared in our own day. Tenth, the remaining books of the Old Testament. The two books of Chronicles are thought likely to have been written after the restoration of the Temple by Judas Maccabæus. "The Psalms were also collected and divided into five books during the epoch of the second Temple." "The Proverbs of Solomon, I believe, were also collected about the same time, or at least in the time of King Josiah;" and the Prophecies are of several dates, not set down in any definite order, but as they happened to be collected here and there. As regards the canon of Holy Scripture, it is concluded that "before the time of the Maccabees there was none; and that the books we have were selected from a number of others on the sole authority of the Pharisees of the second Temple, . . . and whoever should seek to demonstrate the authenticity and authority of the Hebrew Scriptures . . . must shew that the council of the Pharisees could not err in their selection of the books they admitted; and this I think no one will ever be able to demonstrate. The eleventh chapter is devoted to the question whether the Apostles wrote their Epistles in the character of Apostles and Prophets, or merely as Teachers; and to a consideration of the office of the Apostles; and it is concluded that they preached and wrote the history of Christ by the aid of natural light alone. The twelfth is on the true covenant of the Divine Law; why the Scriptures are called sacred; and in what sense they are said to be the Word of God. And here the distinction is drawn between the idol of ink and paper—which it is alleged the vulgar fall down and worship under the impression that it, and it only, is the Word of God, and the true Word of God, which is not confined to any particular book or set of books whatever, but is a living inspiration of the Divine Mind. Nevertheless, it is admitted that the Word of God is contained in Holy Scripture; and that, in so far as is necessary to salvation, the latter have come down to us uncorrupted. The thirteenth enlarges on what the author believes to be the true end and use of Holy Scripture. These were not written to make a fighting ground for different sects, or repository of intricate speculative doctrine requiring supernatural light to understand, but are essentially an inculcation of the plainest and simplest duties—such as even the dullest may apprehend, namely, obedience to God, which consists in the love of our neighbour in all "reverential submissiveness;" and in support of this position, the text—"He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law; . . . love is the fulfilling of the law" [Rom. viii.], is quoted. The fourteenth chapter is on Faith, which is defined thus:—"To entertain such thoughts of God as, if wanting, obedience to Him is withheld; and, obedience given, adequate thoughts are implied." "To the true Catholic Faith (Fidem catholicam), then, belong those dogmas only which obedience to God absolutely demands, and which, neglected, obedience is absolutely impossible. Of all other articles of faith, every one as he best knows himself, and as he finds these calculated to confirm him or otherwise in godly and neighbourly love, may be allowed to think as he pleases. Were such a course followed, there were no room left, methinks, for controversy within the bosom of the Church. Nor will I now shrink from specifying the heads of an universal faith, which are also the dogmas of Scripture. They are these:—There is a Supreme Being, who delights in justice and mercy, whom all who would be saved are bound to obey, and whose worship consists in the practice of justice and charity towards our neighbour." Faith and Science, Theology and Philosophy, are next shewn to have nothing in common with one another; the scope of the former being only piety and obedience, while that of the latter is truth. "Neither is subordinate to the other, but each holds sway in its own sphere without prejudice to the other." The fifteenth chapter enlarges further on the different provinces of Theology and Philosophy, and claims for the latter an absolutely independent domain. The sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth, are on the ideal of a perfect government, in accordance with the principles above enunciated. The nineteenth defines the (absolute) authority of the state in all that pertains to public worship. Lastly, the twentieth chapter concludes that, since each person differs from another in capacity and disposition, and no two are capable of seeing a thing exactly in the same light, in the free state every one must be at liberty to think what he likes and to say what he thinks.¹

The Tractatus Politicus rises on the founda-

tions of the preceding treatise. As the right of every individual is commensurate with his power to exist and operate, so in like manner the body and mind of an entire government has just so much right as it has might; and each single citizen or subject has just so much less right as the state in itself surpasses him in might. The question then is, by what form of government can the largest possible amount of liberty, right, or power, be acquired for the greatest number; intellectual liberty that is, and freedom according to the ordinance of nature; for the vile, the profligate, or the sinner is not free, but a slave; and as his power is small and feeble against temptation, so must his rights in the state be correspondingly curtailed. The monarchical form of government is weighed in the balance, and found wanting. The aristocratic is better, but not perfect. The democratic is, as might be anticipated, the best and indeed only true form of government. At this point the question of female voting arises for consideration. It is decided in the negative. "I exclude women and slaves," he says, "who are in the power of men and of masters, and likewise children, and minors as long as they are under the power of parents and guardians." And another reason, besides their comparative weakness, why women should not vote, is that men, as a rule, have no intellectual, but only sensual love for them, and would have their domestic happiness embittered or destroyed did their wives shew favour or enthusiasm towards other men, as would be necessary if they assumed civil rights. Only the first ten and part of the eleventh chapters of this work were completed. "Reliqua desiderantur," closes the question of women's rights abruptly. "Morbo impeditus, et morte abreptus, hoc opus non ulterius perducere valuit."

The greatest and most highly finished of Spinoza's works, and that of most interest at the present time, is undoubtedly the Ethics. To this, the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus may be read as a kind of detached preface. Every system must have some foundation—gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble. Thomas Aquinas constructed the Summa Theologiæ out of Holy Scripture and patristic tradition by the aid of reason; Calvin his Institutes out of the Scriptures alone by the aid of reason; some will have nothing save the Bible, and the Bible only, without reason; Spinoza accepted no external aid whatever, and built his system by the aid of reason out of the admissions of the reason herself alone: and to this day it remains one of the most marvellously subtle, audacious, and stupendous efforts of reasoning in existence. Fearlessly he throws across the abyss of human ignorance a bridge of mathematically demonstrated propositions, by which he essays to connect the lowest things of earth with God their maker. An intricate tangled maze of rafters and girders, as fine as gossamer threads, stretches itself before us, upheld by chains of rigorously appointed reasoning, without flaw or break anywhere in them that can be discovered. As from the nature of a triangle or circle one property after another is made by the mathematician to follow and be deduced, so here by the philosopher proposition is made to follow proposition in unrelenting logical sequence, and lead on to yet another and another. Taking the fundamental axiom of Descartes, that whatsoever is clearly perceived in consciousness is true, in consciousness he finds a certain number of elementary propositions, which appear to him as evidently true, and therefore as necessarily to be received, in philosophy, as the propositions of Euclid are in mathematics. On these he builds. If these are false, all is false. If these are admitted, then all else follows inevitably and of necessity. There is no power of withdrawal. The student finds himself in a region in which all revealed truth, so far from being rested on, is not even made room for. It is not that in particular there is any hostility towards Christianity; it is that the revelations alike of Jew and Gentile are ignored. It is not that there is found abuse or insult; it is that the Levite passes by on the other side indifferent, and proceeds of himself to demonstrate all our most important practical duties independently; such as for instance the love of one's neighbour, the forgiveness of injuries, the return of good for evil, the crucifixion of the affections and lusts, and the love of God above all things. The whole question therefore on examination will be found to resolve itself into this:—Is human reason of itself alone able to find out a sure way of salvation? The Christian solemnly and in all earnestness believes that it is not. Spinoza thought that it was.

When one thinks of the enormous number of ponderous tomes in which systems of philosophy are apt to be delivered, the size of the Ethics of Spinoza becomes extremely curious and significant. It consists in the edition of 1677 but of 264 small quarto pages of good sized print. To him, as has been said, "lucid and concise geometrical form seems to have been as easy as versification was to Pope." The extreme difficulty of applying the mathematical method to philosophy he makes light of, and insists on treating mind and morals, intellect and affections, God and nature, "precisely as if the question were of lines, planes, and solids" [Intro. de Affect.]. The whole is divided into five parts. [1] De Deo, in which God is proved to be the beginning and foundation of all existence. [2] De Mente, in which the nature and powers of the intellect are worked out. [3] De Affectibus, or the nature of the affections, emotions, or passions. [4] De Servitute Humana, or the misery and thralldom of those whose lives are governed by their emotions. [5] De Libertate Humana, or the blessedness of those whose lives are governed by their intellect.

Part I. De Deo.—The foundation of all being and existence according to Spinoza is substance—Substans, that which stands under all appearance, supporting it and giving it the appearance of reality—the Self-standinghood of the Germans—the Substantia of the Schoolmen¹—namely,

God. "Save God no other substance can exist or be conceived" [Pr. xiv.]. But this one substance is possessed of an infinity of attributes, each of which expresses an infinite and eternal essence. Of these we are capable of apprehending two only—extension and thought. God appears to us the infinitely extended Being when conceived under His attribute of extension; as the infinitely cogitating Being when conceived under His attribute of thought. All material things in the world are modes of God's attribute of extension; all ideas and conceptions are modes of His attribute of thought. "All that is," therefore, "is in God; and without Him nothing can exist or be conceived" [Pr. xv.]. And, since God is not only the efficient but the essential cause of the existence of all things, it follows that His connection with them (as a cause) is immanent or abiding, not extrinsic or transient [Pr. xviii.]. He is moreover a Free Cause, understanding by free that He exists and acts solely by the necessity of His nature, not that He acts according to His well-pleasing, or that He can act in opposition to His nature. No—"From the infinite power or infinite nature of God all has necessarily followed, or by the same necessity does follow, as from eternity it has followed and to eternity it will follow, that the three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles." "All has followed"—the efficient, immanent and ever-present invisible Cause, Order, Law, or whatever else is conceivable under the term Natura naturans; the sensible, visible, material, or whatever else is conceivable under the term Natura naturata. "Has followed from God." It is not God, but as conceivable and distinguishable apart from God as effect is conceivable and distinguishable apart from cause. "Has followed necessarily;"—for things apart from Him have no power of determination; each depending for its essence and existence on an antecedent cause, this on another, this on yet another, and so on to infinity, until we reach the First Cause, i.e. God. There is therefore nothing in the nature of things that is contingent—all is necessary and eternal; the very fact that a thing is as it is, implying that it could not have been otherwise, since then it must have been not perfect if now it is perfect, but imperfect; and the understanding and will, or the very essence of God could be other than it is, which is absurd. It is almost needless to add that, in this view, neither prayers nor sacrifices can avail to alter the mind of God, and that not even the most heartfelt repentance can condone for sin, the penalty of which must needs be paid to the uttermost, and borne, not sullenly, but cheerfully and willingly, as the inevitable order and will of God.¹

quest. iii. art. v. "Videtur quod Deus sit in genere aliquo. Substantia enim est ens per se subsistens: hoc autem maxime convenit Deo: ergo Deus est in genere Substantie." The whole doctrine of Transubstantiation turned upon this subtle distinction between the invisible and intangible Substance, and the visible and tangible accident, or mere appearance.

Part II. De Mente.—In accordance with what precedes, the body of man is concluded to be a mode expressing the essence of the Deity under the aspect of Extension; the mind—a mode expressing the essence of the Deity considered under the aspect of Thought; so that whatever is clearly and distinctly, that is, adequately perceived in the mind, is present in the mind of God, in so far as it constitutes the essence of the mind of man, and must therefore necessarily be objectively true. But all our ideas are not thus clear. Our knowledge is classifiable under these heads. [1] That grounded on Opinion or Imagination, confused representations of the senses, vague experience, and remembrance of things heard or read. [2] That grounded on Reason, notions common to mankind of the properties of things. [3] Intuitive knowledge, which is of the highest order, "issuing from adequate ideas of the attributes of God to adequate knowledge of the essences of things." "In so far as our mind perceives things truly, it is part of the infinite intelligence of God; and it is as much matter of necessity that all clear and distinct ideas of the mind should be true as that the idea of God in our mind is a truth." The Imagination pictures things as contingent, associating them in the mind with notions of the past and future; the Reason sees them as necessary, ever-present, and true, i.e. as they are in themselves; and such necessity is the very necessity of the eternal nature of God. As regards the Will;—absolute or free will does not pertain to man. For being determined to will this or that by a cause which is itself determined by an antecedent cause, this by a third, and so on to infinity, the mind of itself has no power of willing or of not willing. "Men think themselves free because they are conscious of their volitions and appetites, but ignorant of the causes by which they are disposed to desire and will."

Part III. De Affectibus.—Having treated the nature of the mind or soul in so far as thought, idea, perception, and volition enter into its constitution, its nature, as manifested in the Affections or Emotions, is considered. By an Affection or Emotion is understood a state of body whereby its power of acting is increased or diminished, aided or controlled; and we act when something takes place within us of which we are ourselves the adequate cause;—suffer, when anything takes place within us or without us of which we are only partially the cause.² By Desire or Appetite is understood the very essence of man, whereby he is determined to do those things even it may be to the third and fourth generation, does not, however, to Spinoza's mind prevent God's receiving the sinner again into favour. "God forgives those who repent of their transgressions. There is no man that has not sinned; were not God element and forgiving, therefore, all might despair of their salvation; nor were there else any sense in believing that God is merciful." [Theol.-Pol. cap. xiv.]

² Anger or rage, for instance, is not an increased action as at first sight it might appear, but passion (namely suffering, or imperfection) induced in the mind by confused and inadequate ideas connected with the object of our anger or rage.

that subserve his preservation. Joy is the transition from a less to a greater degree of perfection or power of being. Sorrow is the transition from a greater to a less degree of perfection or power of being. And to one or other of these three Emotions all other conceivable Emotions may be referred. Thus Love is Joy, associated with the idea of an external object as a cause. Hatred is Sorrow, associated with the idea of an external object as a cause. Anger is the desire with which we are moved by hate to do him an injury whom we dislike, etc. etc.

Part IV. De Servitute Humana.—Desires which spring from true knowledge of what is good and what is bad for us, may be ruled and restrained by various affections; but the knowledge itself cannot be so ruled or restrained; and hence the significant words of the poet—

“Video meliora proboque, deteriora sequor.”

Thus are men obnoxious to passions, inconstant in their resolves, and rebellious to the precepts of reason, though these make no demands against nature, virtuous life being indeed harmony with the laws of nature. The foundation of all true virtue, of all true happiness, lies within the sphere of these laws and their observance; the first and greatest of all being that which impels us to preserve our minds and bodies in a state of integrity as respects ourselves, and in a state of harmony as respects our fellow-men and nature at large. Virtue is therefore to be sought and prized for its own sake, there being nothing more excellent in nature, nothing more advantageous to ourselves, nothing more beneficial to others. And the highest virtue, or greatest good of the mind, is the knowledge and love of God. All that relates to this belongs to Religion. All that relates to our duty as respects our fellow-men belongs to Piety. All that conduces to good understanding and kindly fellowship is Good; whatever, on the contrary, leads to difference, hatred, or ill-feeling is Evil.

Space will not allow of enlargement on the formal demonstrations of the good and evil of the Affections seriatim, or on the scarcely less important scholia to the various propositions in which the pleasure and advantage of a life of virtue are discoursed on, often with great eloquence. But it may not be amiss, by way of illustrating the thoroughness and detail with which this part of the work is executed, to mention that among the Virtues even politeness (Humanitas) finds a place, and cheerfulness. “Cheerfulness and merriment are the sunshine of existence, and nothing but sour and sorry superstition denounces and calls them evil. . . . No Divinity, none but an envious demon, could take delight in my misery.¹ Nor do tears and groans and superstitious terrors—all signs alike of impotence of mind, ever lead to a virtuous life; the more, on the contrary, our minds are possessed with joy, to the higher perfection do we (pro tanto) rise, and the more truly do we participate of the Divine Nature. . . . A wise man accordingly will refresh and recreate himself in moderation with pleasant food and drink, with sweet odours, with the beauty of growing plants, ornaments, music, athletic games, theatres, and with such other things as can be used without harm to others. For the human body is composed of very many parts of diverse nature, which continually require new and varied sustenance, in order that the body may remain equally fit for all things which can follow from its nature, and consequently that the mind also may be equally fit for understanding more things at once” [Schol. Pr. xlv.]. Even the matter of dress is not thought beneath the notice of this philosopher. “It is not a disorderly and slovenly carriage,” he says, “that makes us sages; much rather is affected indifference to personal appearance an evidence of a poor spirit, in which true wisdom can find no fit dwelling-place.”

Part V. De Libertate Humana.—If we dis sever an emotion or affection from the thought of its external cause, and with it associate other thoughts, then will the agitations of mind that arise from the emotion be destroyed. Moreover, affections cease to be passions as soon as we form a clear and distinct idea of them [vide supra]. And when we contemplate things as necessary, the power of the mind over the affections is increased. The grief felt for the loss of good, for instance, is mitigated if we see that it could by no possibility have been retained; and torn by our affections in excess, we are brought to think of and call into play such powers as we have of ordering and controlling them in consonance with reason and experience. When we think of all the benefits that accrue from friendship and the social state, consider the peace of mind that springs from a good and reasonable life, and know that men act by the necessity of their nature, we shall not be disposed to repay hate by hate, or injustice by injustice, but much rather to overcome hatred with good, injuries by magnanimity, etc. And in such a course we shall be greatly strengthened by reflecting that all the affections of the body are ultimately referable to God, immanent in all; for we know that all that is in God, and that without Him nothing can exist or be conceived. In proportion as this is realized, the love of God, and with it also the love of our fellow-men, will be enkindled within us [Prop. xv.].

“Each wild desire is lull’d to rest,
That rent the heart, or rack’d the brow;
The love of man now fires the breast,
The love of God is kindling now,” —a love incapable of being sullied by selfishness, envy, jealousy, or any of the pollutions of a meaner love, and which is increased the more others also are united with us in the same loving bonds. Now “the human mind cannot be absolutely destroyed with the body; something of it remains which is eternal” [Prop. xxiii.]; that part which is possessed of “the intellectual love of God,” for instance, “which arises from the third kind of intellection" [vide supra, Pt. II.] "is eternal" [Prop. xxxiii.]; and "the mind is not obnoxious to passions except during the continuance of the body" [Prop. xxxiv.], remaining henceforth for ever

"Pure, and mirror-bright, and even."

Were it a matter of doubt, however,—did we not know that the soul was eternal,—yet "piety, religion, and all else, which in the fourth part we have shewn to pertain to strength of mind and generosity, would have to be held of last importance" [Prop. xli.]. The scholium to this proposition is very characteristic. "The common persuasion of the vulgar would seem to be otherwise. For most men appear to think themselves free only so far as they can give way to lust, and fancy that they are hindered of their rights when held to live in conformity with the prescriptions of the Divine law. Accordingly they esteem piety, religion, and whatever else is referred to true strength of mind, as burdens which after death they hope to lay aside, when also they hope to receive the reward for the slavery, namely, piety and religion, which they have endured in this life. But not fully are they led, even by this hope, to live—so far as their slender and weak capacity admits—in conformity with the prescription of the Divine law; it is rather the fear of frightful punishments after death that influences them; and it is said that unless such hope and fear were in men, and on the contrary they were to believe mind perished with the body, they would no longer live wretched, weighed down under the load of piety, but do all things after their lust, and obey fortune rather than themselves. Such things seem to me not less absurd than it would be if a man, because he did not believe himself able to nourish his body for ever with good food, were to straightway fill himself instead with deadly poisons, or if because he saw the mind was not eternal or immortal, he were to wish himself demented and without reason,—things which seem so absurd that they scarcely deserve to be recounted." And yet how is it that, practically, the great mass of mankind are led by hope and fear rather than by reason? The answer is contained in the Scholium to the last proposition; in the closing words of the Ethics:—OMNIA PRÆCLARA TAM DIFFICILIA QUAM RARA SUNT.

Having now gone through all the writings of the philosopher it will be possible for us to construct a Spinozistic Creed, as follows:

"I believe in one Infinite [Eth. I. xi.] and Undivided [xii. xiii.] God, Eternal [xi. xix.] and Unchangeable [V. xvii.], existing and acting by the sole necessity of his nature [I. xvi. xvii.]; of infinite Attributes, whereof two only are capable of being conceived by man—Extension and Thought [II. i. ii.], whereof he himself is the Identity [4]; of all things the Free Cause [I. xvii.], immanent not transient [I. xviii.]; in Whom all things consist [xxv.], and without Whom nothing can exist or be conceived [xv.].

"By whom all things are made; not truly by design or for the sake of any end, contingently, of free-will, or absolute well-pleasing, but pre-determined and following necessarily from the absolute nature or infinite power of God [I. xxvi. xxvii. xxviii. xxix. xxxiii. and append.].

"Of which world is Man [II. x. et seq. iv. append. ch. x.]; whose consciousness is the basis of all certitude [xx. xxxii. xxxiii.], in which whatsoever is clearly perceived is true [xxxiv.], and exists objectively in nature [xxxviii. xxxix. xlv.]; whose will is not free, but necessary or constrained [xlvi. lix.]; whose acts and desires alone are good so far as they are defined by reason [IV. xxii.-xxviii. append. ch. v.]; and whose salvation, liberty, and beatitude consists, not in the reward of virtue, but in the virtue itself whereby affections are restrained [V. xli.], and in the constant and eternal knowledge and love of God [IV. xxviii., V. xxxii. xxxiii. Schol. xxxvi.]; whose worship by man consists in the exercise of obedience, charity, and justice [Theol.-Pol. xiii.]. And I believe in the communion and fellowship of all men in so far as they are led by reason [IV. xxxv. xxxvii. xlv. lxxi. lxxii. lxxiii.]; and in the eternity of the mind" [V. xxiii. xxxix.].

It is hoped that, for general purposes, this exposition of the doctrine and historical position of Spinoza will be found sufficient. The doctrine is not atheistic, though it has often been said to be so, because God is taken as the foundation and cause of all things even to the exclusion of whatever else either is or can be conceived. On the other hand it is not absolutely pantheistic, because a distinction is made throughout between the world and its Creator, between the natura naturans and the natura naturata, between the Cause and the effect. Still less is it materialistic, the reason why it has been said to be so arising from ignorance of the metaphysical meaning of the word Substance. That it was apprehended as a system of Idealism by the greatest minds of the age to which it belongs, is clear alike from contemporary criticism and from the subsequent course of the history of philosophy.

SPIRITUALISTS. A name assumed by the strict Franciscans in the disputes which arose respecting the manner of observing the Rule of St. Francis in the latter half of the fourteenth century. [PAULO-JOANNITES. FRATICELLI.]

SPIRITUALISTS. The name assumed by a body of superstitious persons in England and America who profess to hold communication with the spirits of the departed. This is supposed to take place through "mediums," that is to say, men or women who possess the special and exceptional qualities which are required to bring them en rapport with disembodied beings. With such persons the spirits converse by means of sounds similar to raps made upon tables or walls, these raps being arranged into an alphabetic form on a system analogous to that used for electric telegraph instruments. The "rapping" on tables and other articles of furniture is sometimes supplemented by their motion, so that tables, couches, chairs, etc., move about a room, or are hoisted by the spirits above the floor to float between it and the ceiling. The theory of the Spiritualists is that disembodied spirits have lately discovered these means of communicating with the world, and that they do it by electric detonation.

Insatiable credulity is a conspicuous characteristic of the Spiritualists, and much that has been called Spiritualism ought to have been called Imposture. But it is probable that some as yet unexplained forces brought into action by volition have given rise to phenomena which have been put to the credit of spirits.

STANCARISTS. The followers of Francis Stancari, who was brought into note by his controversies with Osiander, Bullinger, Melancthon, and others of the Lutheran and Calvinistic Reformers.

Stancari was an Italian, who had been ejected for heresy from the University of Mantua. From thence he went to Switzerland, where he occasioned so much dissension that he was driven away by the Calvinists, and obliged to take up his quarters with the Lutherans of Prussia, eventually becoming Professor of Hebrew at Königsberg in the year 1548. From Königsberg he migrated to Cracow in Poland, where he filled the same office, and where, by propagating Unitarian opinions, he was an effectual ally of Socinus. His turbulent nature made him the cause of great dissensions in Poland also [Mosh. Ecll. Hist. III. ii. 1, § 37], and he was imprisoned by the bishop. Escaping from prison, he fled to Pinchovia, where he appeared as a furious iconoclast and anti-sacerdotalist. After a life constantly spent in fierce controversy, he died in the year 1574.

Osiander and his followers had maintained peculiar views respecting the Atonement of our Lord, alleging that it was as God alone He offered it, for that as man He Himself needed it, and therefore could not offer it for others. The Stancarists went to the opposite extreme, and attributed the Atonement to our Lord's Human Nature alone, excluding from it altogether His Divine Nature. Further than this, they maintained that the Divine Nature in its propriety had no existence in Christ, and that He was only called God the Word metaphorically. They also held a theory that He had two Natures, the one as Mediator, the other as the author of Mediation, and was therefore in one sense "sent," in the other "One Who sent." Another notion which they held was that the Holy Eucharist is not the medium of any present gift of grace, but only the pledge or ἀρραβών of one to come.

The heresy of the Stancarists was eventually absorbed by that of the Socinians. [Bayle's Dict. iii. 2649. Schlussemburg's Catal. Hæret. ix. Stancari's de Trinitate et Mediatore Dom. nostr. J. C. adv. H. Bullinger. P. Martyr. et Joan. Calv. etc. Basle, 1574.]

STARKEYITES. [PRINCEITES.]

STAROBREDZI. [STAROVERTZI.]

STAROVERTZI. A name signifying "men of the ancient faith," and assumed by the majority of those who refused to acquiesce in the reforms introduced in the Russian Church in the seventeenth century, and especially in the revision of Holy Scripture and of the Liturgical books effected by the Patriarch Nikon [A.D. 1654]. An enumeration of the points which were held to justify this open act of schism in forming a separate body will give some idea of the extreme tenacity with which the Slavonic population clings to the traditions of their ancestors.

[1] They insisted that only the double and not the triple Alleluia should be repeated during Easter-tide.

[2] That seven loaves should be presented at mass instead of five.

[3] That the sign of the cross should not be made, according to the orthodox practice, by joining the three first fingers, but by uniting the fourth and fifth fingers with the thumb, without any inclination of the index and middle fingers.

[4] That the cross imprinted on the host at mass should be octangular instead of square.

[5] That the recently printed and revised editions of sacred books should not be received, but that the ancient copies should be retained, and that Nikon should be regarded as Antichrist.

There were other and still smaller points of dispute, as to whether the name "Jesus" was to be pronounced loudly or softly, and whether it was proper to turn to the right hand or the left in certain processions. Coffee and tea were strictly forbidden. Priests who took spirits were held to be incapable of administering the sacraments. Potatoes were a fruit of the devil, because it was probably a potato which Eve handed to Adam. Smoking was not allowed, apparently on the Scriptural ground that "not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man, but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man" [Matt. xv. 11]. The tendency to fanaticism, so universally found in Russian dissent, did not fail to appear among the Starovertzí. Some of them declared all temporal or civil government to be antichristian, taught the community of goods, extolled suicide, and voluntarily burned themselves alive, rather than be forced into compliance with the rites and customs of the national church. They were found chiefly among the peasants, or those who had risen from the peasant class; and their poverty may have been one of the causes of their possessing no places of public worship, and meeting in each other's houses instead. They were persecuted under Peter I. [A.D. 1689-1725], who laid double taxes on them; but his successors, especially Catharine II. [A.D. 1762-1796], and Alexander I. [A.D. 1801-1825], have adopted a milder policy with the hopes of winning them back to the Eastern Church. It was proposed that they might retain their old liturgies and rites, and continue to enjoy the ministrations of their own clergy, if they would consent to receive ordination at the hands of the orthodox bishops; and the conciliatory title of "Yedinovtzi," or "co-religionists," was bestowed upon those who shewed any readiness to conform. Very little success has however attended these attempts at reconciliation.

STAUROLATRÆ. [CHAZINZARIANS.]

STEBLERI. [BACULARII.]

STEDINGERS. A politico-religious sect which arose in Germany early in the thirteenth century, and which took its name from a district on the borders of Friesland and Saxony, that which is now called Oldenburg, where it numbered many adherents. They appear to have been a section of the same Manichæan heretics who in Southern Europe were called ALBIGENSES. In the year 1232-4 a crusade was organized against them under direction of Gregory IX. by Gerhard, Archbishop of Bremen, and Conrad of Marburg nearly exterminated them with a force of 40,000 soldiers. Their principles were of the usual anti-sacerdotal class of the continental heresies of this period, and they gave opportunities to their enemies by mixing up heresy with a lawlessness that was easily interpreted as rebellious. [Ritter, Diss. de pago Steding et Stedingis hæret.]

STERCORANISTÆ. "Si qui fuerunt, fuere nonnulli nono sæculo, qui Corpus Christi quod in Eucharistia continetur secessui, ac dejectioni obnoxium esse putabant, ita ut corruptis speciebus, et ipsum Corpus Christi corrumpere-tur." [Sianda, Lexicon Polem. Mabillon, Act. S. Bened. præf. ad sæc. iv. II. xxi. Pfaff, De Stercoranistis mediæ ævi. 1750.] A somewhat similar question was discussed in a controversy between Amalarinus and Guntrad, about the beginning of the same century. [D'Achery, Spicileg. iii. 330.]

STRATIOTICI. [MILITES.]

STRAUSS. [RATIONALISTS.]

STRIGOLNIKS. A Russian sect which arose in Novogorod at the close of the fourteenth or early in the fifteenth century. A Jew, named Horie, joined by two Christian priests, Denis and Alexie, and afterwards by an excommunicated deacon named Karp Strigolnik, preached a mixture of Judaism and Christianity, and gained so many followers that a national council was called to suppress him. Among the practices which his followers objected to were the payment of a sum of money by the clergy to the bishops on ordination as simoniacal, and confession to a priest as unscriptural. Strigolnik himself was thrown into the river and drowned during a riot which occurred in the streets of Novogorod, but the opposition of his followers to the Russian Church continued for many years after his death. [Platoff, Present State of Greek Ch. in Russia, Pinkerton's transl.]

STUDITES. [ACCEMITÆ.]

SUBLAPSARIANS. A section of the Calvinists who so far modify the original dogma of their master respecting Predestination as to believe that while the Fall of Adam was divinely foreseen and divinely decreed, and the Fall of all his posterity was equally foreseen and decreed as following upon that of himself, yet it was only after the fall of Adam had taken place that the particular election of some of that posterity to salvation took place. In contradistinction to the SUPRALAPSARIANS, they hold that the perdition of the non-elect occurs not in consequence of a direct decree of condemnation, but because they are passed by and left to their fallen state. This fine-drawn distinction has arisen out of a repugnance to admit the full bearing of the dogma of absolute decrees on our estimate of the Divine attribute of love; but the Sublapsarians do not come any nearer than the Ultra-Calvinists to an agreement with St. Paul's declaration that "God our Saviour . . . will have all men to be saved" [1 Tim. ii. 4]. The term was first applied to the REMONSTRANTS.

SUBSTANTIALISTS. The Lutheran hæresiologist Schlusselfburg gives this name as a synonym of the Manichees in his Catalogue of Heresies, the second volume of which is entitled "De secta Manichæorum seu Substantialistarum."

SUN-CHILDREN. [AREVURDIS.]

SUPRALAPSARIANS. A name given to the extreme Calvinists who accept entirely the dogma of Calvin respecting an eternal, absolute, and unconditional decree by which God predestined some of mankind to salvation and some to perdition even before the Fall had brought sin into the world. The form in which Calvin himself stated this doctrine will be found at page 97 in the article on Calvinists.

Beza followed his master Calvin in holding and teaching the dreadful doctrine of absolute decrees of election and reprobation, but the name of Supralapsarians was first given to the Gomarists who opposed the Arminian party (who had been called SUBLAPSARIANS) at the Synod of Dort [A.D. 1618]. The dogma of the Supralapsarians is but a form of Fatalism, and when Hobbes grafted on it his theory of absolute necessity, many who had held it were led to see its tendency and to give up their belief in it.

SUSO. [FRIENDS OF GOD.]

SWADDLERS. An absurd nickname given by the Irish Roman Catholics to the early Methodists. It is said to have originated from John Cennick preaching a sermon on the Babe "wrapped in swaddling-clothes," the ignorant Roman Catholics who heard it or heard of it supposing the "swaddling-clothes" to be an invention of the Protestants. In the year 1738 a ballad-singer named Butler actually raised riots in Dublin and elsewhere to the cry of "Five pounds for the head of a Swaddler," and he and his allies called themselves "Anti-Swaddlers." [Stevens' Hist. of Method. 110, 113.]

SWEDENBORGIAN. A theosophical sect whose fundamental opinion is that the Last Judgment took place in the year 1757, when "the Old Church," or Christianity in its hitherto received form, passed away, and all things became new through revelations made to a Swedish gentleman named Swedenborg. They consequently call their community "the New Church," and "the New Jerusalem Church." But although their opinions are grounded on these alleged revelations, they owe their origin as an organized sect not to Swedenborg himself, but to a printer named Robert Hindmarsh, an enthusiastic student of his writings.

I. SWEDENBORG'S PERSONAL HISTORY. Emanuel Swedenborg [A.D. 1689-1772]—ennobled by Queen Ulrica Eleonora in 1719 as the Honourable Emanuel Swedenborg—was the son of Jesper Swedberg [A.D. 1653-1735], Lutheran titular Bishop of Skara in West Gothland and of the Swedish residents in London. In early life he shewed promise of great learning and literary power, and not only took his degree of Doctor of Philosophy at Upsal at the age of twenty-two, but also studied at Oxford, Paris, and Utrecht, and his great services as an amateur engineer to Charles XII. at the siege of Frederikshall, led, after the death of that king, to his being ennobled by his sister and successor. From 1716 until 1747 he held the office of Assessor to the Royal Metallic College, or Board of Mines, at Stockholm, but travelled much, and wrote many scientific works on mineralogy, practical astronomy, and other subjects; his travels being undertaken for the sake of improving the metallurgic resources of Sweden. He was the first to draw attention in modern times to the metrical, or decimal, system of coinage, weights, and measures; and in his Opera Philosophica et Mineralia, published in three folio volumes in 1734, he pioneered many discoveries in physical science. The bent of his mind towards metaphysics and theology was shewn by his publication in the same year of a work entitled "An Introduction to the Philosophy of the Infinite, and the Final Cause of Creation; treating also of the Mechanism of the operation between the Soul and the Body." Ten years later the final transition of his studies from physical science to theology was marked by his work De Cultu et Amore Dei.

It was soon after the publication of the last-named work, in 1745, that Swedenborg, then in his fifty-seventh year, began to believe himself the recipient of supernatural revelations; and from that time he gave up all secular studies and pursuits, devoting himself entirely to the elaboration of a new theology, which was to be the basis of a "New Church." Like Mrs. Lead and her followers [PHILADELPHIANS], Swedenborg became possessed with the idea that he conversed with angels, and with departed spirits.¹ The beginning of his experiences of this kind may be told in his own words. "Whatever of worldly honour and advantage may appear to be in the things before mentioned, I hold them but as matters of low estimation when compared to the honour of that holy office to which the Lord Himself hath called me, Who was graciously pleased to manifest Himself to me, His unworthy servant, in a personal appearance, in the year 1743, to open in me a sight of the spiritual world, and to enable me to converse with spirits and angels; and this privilege has continued with me to this day. From that time I began to print and publish various unknown 'Arcana,' which have been either seen by me or revealed to me, concerning heaven and hell, the state of men after death, the true worship of God, the spiritual sense of the Scriptures, and many other important truths tending to salvation and true wisdom" [Swedenborg's Letter to Hartley, 1769, True Christ. Rel. 851]. Through the gift thus bestowed on him he claimed to see the inhabitants of other continents without moving from his own place: "nay," he says, "I could be made present with the inhabitants of other planets in our system, and also with the inhabitants of planets that are in other worlds, and revolve about other suns. By virtue of such presence, not of place, I have conversed with apostles, departed popes, emperors, and kings; with the late reformers of the Church, Luther, Calvin, and Melancthon, and with others from distant countries" [Swedenborg's True Christ. Rel. 87]. The condition in which he was when he supposed himself to be thus in converse with other worlds is described by himself in the "Arcana" as being "a certain state, which is a sort of middle state between sleeping and waking; in which state spirits and angels are seen, heard, and touched;" and the people with whom he lodged in London asserted that not long before his death "he lay some weeks in a trance, without any sustenance, and came to himself again" [Hindmarsh's Rise and Progress, etc. 21].

But although professing to be in habitual intercourse with the unseen world, Swedenborg held little intercourse with his fellow-creatures in the visible world, and sought no other way of propagating his "Arcana" than by printing and publishing them, which he did at his own expense. "Wherever he resided he was a mere solitary, and almost inaccessible, though in his own country of a free and open behaviour" [Short Account of Swedenborg, 11]. It was while he was living such a recluse life in humble lodgings at 26 Great Bath Street, Cold-bath Fields, Clerkenwell, that he wrote his principal theological work, to which he gave the title of "Arcana Cœlestia; the Heavenly Mysteries contained in the Holy Scriptures, or Word of the Lord, unfolded in an exposition of Genesis and Exodus; together with a relation of Wonderful Things seen in the World of Spirits and in the Heaven of Angels." This was commenced in consequence of the "personal appearance" referred to above, a man appearing to him in a strong shining light, and saying, "I am the Lord, the Creator and Redeemer. I have chosen thee to explain to men the interior and spiritual senses of the sacred writings. I will dictate to thee what thou oughtest to write." The "Arcana" occupied Swedenborg's pen from 1749 until 1756, being written in Latin, and published from time to time in eight quarto volumes.¹ It was translated into English, with some of his other works, a few years after his death, by one of his followers named John Clowes [A.D. 1743-1831], who was for sixty-two years Rector of St. John's, Manchester. After the publication of the "Arcana" Swedenborg wrote many smaller works illustrating his peculiar ideas, and describing Heaven, Hell, the Intermediate State, the Last Judgment, the "Earths in our Solar System, and the Earths in the Starry Heavens," etc.; all of which he described as being "relations of Things heard and seen" by him. His last work, published in 1771, was entitled "The True Christian Religion; or the Universal Theology of the New Church foretold by the Lord in Daniel vii. 13, 14, and in the Revelation xxi. 1, 2."

Shortly after the completion of the last-named work, on Christmas Eve 1771, Swedenborg was struck with paralysis, losing his speech and the use of one side. Some weeks later he was still able to use his pen, and requested an interview with John Wesley in the following note, written in Latin, from his lodgings in Coldbath Fields in February 1772. "Sir, I have been informed in the world of spirits that you have a strong desire to converse with me. I shall be happy to see you if you will favour me with a visit. Your humble servant, Emanuel Swedenborg." Wesley's enthusiastic nature responded so far as to acknowledge that he had felt such a desire, though he had not mentioned it to any one, and he replied that he would visit the writer in a few months on his return to London. It is alleged, but on less trustworthy authority, that Swedenborg answered "he should go on the 29th of next month into the world of spirits never more to return;" March 29th, 1772, being actually the day of his death. His body was honourably buried by a Swedish merchant in the vault of the then Swedish Chapel in Princes Square, Ratcliffe Highway.

II. FORMATION OF THE SECT. Swedenborg had very few followers during his lifetime, those in England being only a physician named Messiter, a non-resident Rector of Winwick in Northamptonshire named Hartley, Dr. Hampe, tutor in the family of George II., and four or five Swedish residents in London. Nor did his verbose works attract much notice though much advertised. The latter began, however, to excite some interest in Manchester, about ten years after the death of Swedenborg, through the enthusiasm with which they were made known by Mr. Clowes, the clergyman before named as their translator, who set afoot a Society there in 1782 for printing and publishing his translations. About the same time Robert Hindmarsh [A.D. 1759-1835], a young Clerkenwell printer, and son of a Methodist preacher, became acquainted with them, and soon became a most zealous follower of "the greatest man living or dead," and an ardent disseminator of his theosophy. Hindmarsh originated a small society for the study of Swedenborg's works, the five members of which held their first meeting in St. Paul's Coffee-House, St. Paul's Churchyard, on December 5th, 1783. This shortly developed into "The Theosophical Society, instituted for the purpose of promoting the heavenly doctrines of the New Jerusalem, by translating, printing, and publishing the theological writings of the Honourable Emanuel Swedenborg," which held its meetings on Sundays and Thursdays at chambers in New Court, Middle Temple. In 1784 a similar Society was established in Philadelphia by a Miss Barclay and a printer named Francis Bailey, and as the London Society became the parent of all the Swedenborgian communities in England, so that at Philadelphia held a similar relation to the American Swedenborgians.

For some years the followers of Swedenborg were content with the literary meetings of the "Theosophical Society;" but in May 1787 some of them began to hold meetings for worship in each others' houses, and in July one of these, James Hindmarsh, Methodist preacher, and father to the printer, was appointed "to officiate in the room of a priest," administering "the Holy Supper," and baptizing four of their number. On January 27th, 1788, a chapel in Great East Cheap was opened for the use of the sect, and an "Order of worship for the New Church signified by the New Jerusalem in the Revelation" was adopted: the name of "The New Church" being now substituted for that of "The Theosophical Society." It was afterwards determined to establish a settled ministry, and it was arranged by drawing of lots that Robert Hindmarsh the printer should ordain his father James Hindmarsh and Samuel Smith, both of them being Methodist preachers who had seceded from Wesley's Society. In the year 1818 the Eleventh General Conference of the sect settled some doubts which had been raised as to the competency of Robert Hindmarsh to ordain others, seeing he had not himself been ordained, by determining unanimously "that Mr. Robert Hindmarsh was virtually ordained by the Divine Auspices of Heaven," a decision more convenient than logical. [Hindmarsh's Rise and Progress of the New Ch. 72, 310.] The Printing Society in Manchester soon followed the example of the Theosophical Society in London, establishing itself in a chapel in Peter Street in 1793. A "General Conference" was also organized after the example of the Methodists, and its first meeting was held on the 13th and four following days of April 1789. In 1815, "a trine or three-fold order" of the ministry was established, consisting of the ordinary ministers, ordaining ministers, and a "minister superintendent over and in behalf of the New Church at large."

III. SWEDENBORGIAN DOCTRINE. The Scriptures, as interpreted by the voluminous and verbose writings of Swedenborg, are taken generally as the standard of Swedenborgian doctrine. But a synopsis of their founder's opinions was made at the first organization of the sect in the form of forty-two Propositions taken from his works, and these propositions were embodied in thirty-two Resolutions, which were agreed to at the first Conference on April 16th, 1789.

These thirty-two "Resolutions" have again been condensed into twelve "Articles of Faith," which now form the Standard of Doctrine in the "New Church." The latter express the opinions of Swedenborg on some points in a much more vague form than they are found in his writings; and as the sect still professes to adhere to those writings as a final revelation, the modern "Articles of Faith" can be best understood when taken in connection with the more definite statements of the original "Propositions" taken from those works by its founders.

1. The first article states the doctrine of the Swedenborgians respecting the Trinity. "That Jehovah God, the Creator and Preserver of heaven and earth, is Love Itself, and Wisdom Itself, or Good Itself, and Truth Itself: That He is One both in Essence and in Person, in Whom, nevertheless, is the Divine Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which are the essential Divinity, the Divine Humanity, and the Divine Proceeding, answering to the soul, the body, and the operative energy in man: and that the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is that God." In the third of the Propositions Swedenborg's opinion is given on this point, and it is that a Trinity of Divine Persons existing from eternity, or before the creation of the world, when conceived in idea is a Trinity of Gods, which cannot be expelled by the oral confession of One God [True Christ. Rel. n. 172, 173]. But perhaps the clearest statement of the sect on this subject is that contained in the "Conference Deed" which is enrolled in Chancery, namely, "that our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is the only God of heaven and earth, and that in Him is the Divine Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit." Still further, the "Propositions," in summarizing Swedenborg's doctrine on this point, quote him as declaring that "all prayers directed to a Trinity of distinct Persons, and not to a Trinity conjoined in one Person, are henceforth not attended to, but are in heaven like ill-scented odours," and that "the Nicene and Athanasian doctrine concerning a Trinity have together given birth to a faith which hath entirely overturned the Christian Church" [True Christ. Rel. n. 108, 177].

2. The second article treats of the Incarnation in the following words:—"That Jehovah God Himself descended from heaven as Divine Truth, Which is the Word, and took upon Him Human Nature, for the purpose of removing from man the powers of hell, and restoring to order all things in the Spiritual World, and all things in the Church: That he removed from man the powers of hell, by combats against and victories over them, in which consisted the great work of Redemption: That by the same acts, which were His temptations, the last of which was the Passion of the Cross, he united, in His Humanity, Divine Truth to Divine Good, or Divine Wisdom to Divine Love, and so returned into His Divinity in which He was from eternity, together with and in His Glorified Humanity, whence He for ever keeps the infernal powers in subjection to Himself, and that all who believe in Him, with the understanding, from the heart, and live accordingly, will be saved."

In association with this statement must be taken those of the 4th, 5th, 29th, 30th, and 31st "Propositions," namely, "That to believe Redemption to have consisted in the Passion of the Cross, is a fundamental error of the Old Church," which has "perverted the whole Christian Church, so that nothing spiritual is left remaining in it;" and "that the doctrines universally taught in the Old Church, particularly respecting Three Divine Persons, the Atonement, Justification by Faith alone, the Resurrection of the material body, etc. etc., are highly dangerous to the rising generation;" that the Imputation of the Merit and Righteousness of Christ, which consist in Redemption, is a thing impossible, the only imputation being one "of good and evil, and at the same time of Faith; and that the Lord imputeth good to every man, and that Hell imputeth evil to every man," the Faith and Imputation of the New Church being altogether incompatible with those of the Old [True Christ. Rel. n. 132, 133, 108, 640, 643-649].

3. In connection with this doctrine of the Incarnation may be mentioned that of the 12th article respecting the Second Advent. It states "That now is the time of the Second Advent of the Lord, which is a coming, not in Person, but in the power and glory of His Holy Word; that it is attended, like His first coming, with the restoration to order of all things in the Spiritual World, where the wonderful Divine operation, commonly expected under the name of the Last Judgment, has in consequence been performed, and with the preparing of the way for a New Church on the earth,—the first Christian Church having spiritually come to its end or consummation through evils of life and errors of doctrine, as foretold by the Lord in the Gospels. And that this new or second Christian Church, which will be the crown of all Churches, and will stand for ever, is what was representatively seen by John, when he beheld the Holy City, New Jerusalem, descending from God out of Heaven, prepared as a Bride adorned for her husband." This embodies the "Propositions" 38-42, with the omission of the statements, still it must be remembered, maintained by the sect,

"That the Last Judgment was accomplished in the Spiritual World in the year 1757; and that the former heaven and the former earth, or the Old Church, are passed away, and that all things are become new; . . . that this Second Coming of the Lord is effected by means of His servant Emanuel Swedenborg, before whom He hath manifested Himself in person, and whom he hath filled with His Spirit to teach the doctrines of the New Church by the Word from Him" [Last Judgm. n. 45; True Christ. Rel. n. 115, 772, 779; Apoc. Rev. n. 886; Brief Expos. n. 95].

4. The most important subject of Swedenborgian belief next to the above is that respecting Holy Scripture, which is thus stated in the 3rd article: "That the Sacred Scripture, or Word of God, is Divine Truth Itself, containing a spiritual sense heretofore unknown, whence it is divinely inspired and holy in every syllable, as well as a literal sense, which is the basis of its spiritual sense, and in which Divine Truth is in its fulness, its sanctity, and its power, thus that it is accommodated to the apprehension both of angels and men: That the spiritual and natural senses are united by correspondences like soul and body, every natural expression and image answering to, and including, a spiritual and Divine idea; and thus that the Word is the medium of communication with heaven and of conjunction with the Lord."

This omits the statement of the 12th "Proposition," taken from Swedenborg's "Arcana Cœlestia," and other "revelations." This statement is "that the Books of the Word are all those which have the Internal Sense, which are as follow, viz. in the Old Testament, the five Books of Moses, called Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy; the Book of Joshua, the Book of Judges, the two Books of Samuel, the two Books of Kings, the Psalms of David, the Prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi; and in the New Testament, the four Evangelists, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, and the Revelation. And that the other Books, not having the Internal Sense, are not the Word" [Arcana Cœlest. n. 10325; New Jer. n. 266; White Horse, n. 16]. Thus ten books of the Old Testament, the Acts of the Apostles, and all the Epistles of St. Paul and the other Apostles, are set aside as no part of "the Word of the Lord."

The remaining articles of the Swedenborgian Confession may be passed over, since they deal more with theosophical views of Love, Wisdom, Repentance, Charity, Faith, Good Works, etc., than with important articles of faith; but it may be mentioned that Baptism and the Lord's Supper are considered as Sacraments of Divine Institution, to be permanently observed; the view of their efficacy being, however, the ordinary Zwinglian view taken by Dissenters.

IV. STATISTICS. The principles of Swedenborg have gained a more or less complete hold upon the minds of many persons who have yet declined to connect themselves with the sect founded by his disciple Hindmarsh. In Germany, where they were taken up by Öttinger and Jung Stilling during Swedenborg's lifetime, they are said by Hagenbach to have "spread over a great part of Germany" [Hagenbach's Hist. Doctr. sec. 277], but the disciples of the Swedish visionary do not seem to have formed any sect separate from the Lutheran body. In England also, a few clergymen and many laymen have been readers of Swedenborg's works, and have adopted much of his theosophy without separating from the Church. The sect of the "New Church," however, as distinct from these parti-coloured Swedenborgians, numbered 58 Societies in connection with Conference in England in the year 1871, seven of which were in London, numbering 752 members, and the rest mostly in Lancashire and Yorkshire. There were at that time 4098 registered members above 20 years of age, and they had 4224 children in their day schools. In Canada and the United States they numbered 80 Societies, and about 5000 members. They still continue to pay much attention to the publication of Swedenborg's works, having a "Swedenborg Society" for the purpose, which was established in 1810, and having recently gone to the trouble and expense of copying his MSS. by the photolithographic process.

SWEDISH PROTESTANTS. Lutheran principles began to be disseminated in Sweden at least as early as A.D. 1519, through the instrumentality of students returning from the University of Wittenberg, among whose names those of Olave and Laurence Peterson are the most noted, the former being promoted in after life to the chief pastorate at Stockholm, and the latter appointed to a professorship at Upsala. Their benefactor and the great champion of the movement was Gustavus Vasa, who first delivered the country from the tyranny of the Danish king Christian II., and then ascended the Swedish throne as an independent monarch, A.D. 1523. He pushed forward matters in the teeth of the bishops, many of whom were deposed on his accession, and afterwards executed for rebellion, and amid the indifference of the people, who were not awake to the abuses of the old religion, and did not care to see a papal exchanged for a royal supremacy. But Gustavus Vasa was felt to be essential to the kingdom's safety, and when at the Diet of Westeras he threatened to resign unless he carried his point on the subject of the Reformation of religion, all classes were inclined to acquiesce. About this time the Holy Scriptures were translated and disseminated in the Swedish language, through the labours of Olave Peterson and Laurence Anderson, and under regal protection. The most serious opposition to the king's ecclesiastical despotism broke out [A.D. 1537-1543] among the country clergy and the peasantry headed by one of their number named Nils Dacke. After it was suppressed, a second synod was held at Westeras, and the Reformation was finally and legally established in the form of high Lutheranism, retaining an episcopal order of one archbishop and thirteen bishops. No attempts were made to disturb this arrangement under Eric XIV. [A.D. 1560-1568], but symptoms of a desire for change marked the policy of his successor John III. [A.D. 1568-1592]. With a strong personal bias towards Catholicism, intensified by a marriage with a Polish and Catholic princess, he went so far as to open negotiations with the Papal court for reunion; several Jesuits, among them the distinguished Possevin, were sent into Sweden, whose eventual want of success was due probably not so much to their own want of tact as to the stubbornness of the Roman court in refusing to concede such points as communion in both kinds and the use of the liturgy in the vulgar tongue, and to the consequent lukewarmness and even opposition of the king, especially after the death of his consort Catharine [A.D. 1583]. A new service-book, compiled by royal authority [A.D. 1576], and containing a large element of mediæval ceremonial, was in use for some years, but was abolished on the king's death by the synod of Upsala [A.D. 1593], at which the Augsburg Confession in its integrity was formally adopted. Thenceforward, although Charles IX. [A.D. 1604-1611] and Gustavus Adolphus II. [A.D. 1611-1633] were disposed to favour Calvinism, and the accomplished Queen Christina [A.D. 1633-1654] joined the Catholic Church, Lutheranism remained the national religion of Sweden, dissent either in the direction of Rome or Geneva being forbidden by penal enactments until as late as the accession in A.D. 1860 of Charles XV. [Anjou's Hist. Reform. in Sweden, Mason's transl. New York, 1859.]

SWEET SINGERS, THE, were a small party of wild Scottish fanatics, chiefly women, who in 1681, following one John Gih, a master-mariner of Borrowstounness (from whom they were also called Gibbites), forsook all worldly business, and professed to devote themselves entirely to acts of devotion in fasting and prayer in the open fields. They were called the Sweet Singers from their habit of "wailing a portion" of the more mournful Psalms; but they nevertheless declared afterwards that they renounced the use of metrical Psalms as a human invention. They made also a general renunciation and denunciation of everything, of the translation of the Bible, of its division into chapters and verses, of the Longer and Shorter Catechisms, the Confession of Faith, the Covenant, all authority whatsoever throughout the world, the names of months and days (like the Quakers, to the more extravagant portion of whom they largely corresponded), the use of churches and churchyards, all sports and laughing, all customs in eating, drinking, wearing of clothes and sleeping, and everybody in general except themselves. They were committed to prison in Edinburgh in April 1681, but were released by the Privy Council in August, as being, apparently, too contemptible in their ravings for further notice. SWEET SINGERS. The English RANTERS of the seventeenth century are called Sweet Singers by some contemporary writers.

SWISS PROTESTANTS. The pioneer and founder of Protestantism in Switzerland was Huldreich Zuingli, born near Zurich in the same year as Luther [A.D. 1484]. He entered early into the priesthood at Glarus [A.D. 1506], was promoted thence to a preachiership in the collegiate church of Zurich [A.D. 1519], where, like the German Reformer, he scandalized the neighbourhood, and violated the vow of celibacy by marrying a widow, Anna Reinhardt [A.D. 1523]. About this time, in his sermons, by his writings, and in sixty-seven articles publicly maintained before the senate and people of Zurich, he began to disseminate the new opinions. In this course he was instigated and aided by the Ultra-Protestant Carlstadt, who after his differences with Luther and banishment from Germany had fled to Switzerland, and by John Hausschein, better known as Ecolampadius, who was working in the same direction at Basle. A public disputation was shortly held at Baden [A.D. 1526], Eck and Ecolampadius being the champions on either side, when three out of the twelve Swiss cantons declared themselves convinced by the latter. Their example spread. In three years' time the minority was converted into a majority, and the five remaining Catholic cantons appealed to Austria to put down the Reformers by force of arms. During the war which followed Zuingli fell on the battlefield of Cappel in the same year that Ecolampadius breathed his last at Basle [A.D. 1531]. But a deeply-seated religious movement is seldom extinguished by force. The Reformers' mantles fell on such men as Henry Bullinger, Oswald Myconius, William Farel, a Frenchman, who, after being banished from his native country settled at Basle, and the still more distinguished exile Calvin, who, before migrating to Geneva, settled in the same town, and in the society of Bucer, Capito and others published his "Institutio Christianæ Religionis" [A.D. 1534-6]. The subsequent history of the Reformation in Switzerland is intimately bound up with the history of Calvin, and will be found under the article CALVINISTS. [Lives of Calvin have been written by Henry, at Hamburg, 1835; by Audin, Paris, 1841; Dyer, London, 1850. See more generally the Ecclesiastical Histories of Mosheim and Gieseler, and Ranke's History of the Reformation.]

SYMMACHIANS. A sect of heretics of this name is mentioned by Philaster, and apparently as disciples of Patricius [PATRICIANS], the particular tenet which he attributes to them being disbelief in a future judgment, a disbelief accompanied by immoral living [Philast. Hær. lxiii.]. The Symmachians are not named in any other of the early works on heresies.

SYMMACHIANS. This name was sometimes given to the Nazarenes, probably from Symmachus the Ebionite, who is mentioned by Eusebius as the author of a Greek version of the Old Testament [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 17]. St. Ambrose speaks of the Symmachians as descended from the Pharisees [Ambros. prol. in Ep. ad Galat.]; and St. Augustine refers to them as still existing in his day [Aug. contr. Faust. Manich. xix. 4, 17; contr. Crescon. Donat. i. 31]. Eusebius accuses Symmachus of holding the heresy that Christ was the natural son of Joseph and Mary. Epiphanius, in his work on weights and measures, speaks of him as a Samaritan who became a Jewish proselyte in the reign of the Emperor Severus, near the close of the second century. [Epiph. de Mens. et Ponder. ii. 122, ed. 1622].

SYNCRETISTS. For the definition of "Syncretism," and other particulars respecting its original application, the reader is referred to the article in the Dictionary of Doctrinal and Historical Theology. It is sufficient to state here that it originated in the zeal with which the turbulent and quarrelsome inhabitants of Crete made common cause against external foes, and "syncretized;" from whence it was transferred as a general term to all who make common cause by keeping in abeyance their common differences. It was a term of some breadth; and being "mediæ significationis," it is used either in a good or bad sense; but it usually follows the analogy of theological "isms," and means fusion that involves a loss of principle. It was used in a better sense by D. Pareus of Heidelberg [A.D. 1615], when he exhorted all parties to make head "pio syncretismo" against the common enemy Antichrist. The term however was repudiated by the "Union" or "Eirenist" party; and Dreier of Königsberg [A.D. 1661] charged Pareus with having damaged a good and holy cause by first affixing to it a term of opprobrium.

It may be here noted that at a yet earlier date Windeck, a writer on the Catholic side, held out similar advice to Romanists: "Si saperent Catholici, et ipsis cara esset reipublicæ Christianæ salus, Syncretismum coerent" [Prognosticon futuri status Ecclesiæ, 1603].

Syncretism may be considered to be the earliest of those attempts that marked the onward growth of Protestantism to pass from the prescriptions of theology to unfettered religious thought. In its origin it professed to harmonize the Calvinistic and Lutheran views; to bring in also any points of agreement with Rome. Of these sections the Calvinistic or Reformed party were more ready to adopt the Syncretistic principle; the Lutherans deriving the word from συγκεκράννυμι, could only look upon it as an attempt to hybridize the faith. Some however laid less stress than the rest on the differential dogmata of the Reformation, and thought rather of the general principles of Christianity, and the necessity for union, than of party interests. These symbolized with George Calixtus, the originator of the Syncretistic movement, born A.D. 1586 in Schleswig.

Having studied at Helmstädt, in Brunswick, under Martini, Calixtus was early possessed with the idea that common ground might be found on which all might agree. Wanderings through Europe confirmed him in his notion; and having visited the principal headquarters of different religionists, Cologne, the "Trojan horse" of Romanism in Germany, France, Italy, Holland, and England, he then returned to Helmstädt, and held the chair of Divinity for forty-two years till his death, A.D. 1656. His public life therefore synchronized with the Thirty Years' War, which may reasonably be held to have influenced his tone of thought. Next to his friend Gerhard, he was the most eminent divine in Germany, a man of European reputation. He was of noble bearing, loyal and patriotic. His address, calm, firm, and dignified, was commanding, but at the same time genial and attractive. He devoted all the power that extensive erudition and theological accomplishments conferred to work out the idea of his life. His earnestness did not fail to secure for him the aid of able coadjutors, and a numerous body of warmly attached friends. His influence extended into Holstein, Denmark and Sweden; and his views were adopted in several schools of Northern Germany. His travelled experience convinced him that faith and love were to be found in all communions, and that there could be no better ground for all to meet upon. Religion, he said, is a matter of practice, not of dogma; consisting not of disputable propositions, but of life-giving verities. Laying a particular emphasis upon all that he considered to be sound in the Roman system, he attempted to soften down the points of difference between the Lutherans and the Reformed or Calvinistic sects, and to reconcile both with Tridentine doctrine. The bonds of union, as he held, were needlessly severed at the Reformation. His only antipathies were the more advanced notions of Roman theology and Jesuitism, chiefly on account of their thoroughgoing defence of papal infallibility. The yearning of Calixtus for Catholicity, his breadth of view and largeness of heart, were unintelligible to the men of his generation. Even heathenism, he said, was not destitute of its better points. These however were only an argument for the necessity of revelation. As might be expected, he was attacked on every side as a "Syncretist;" and the last twenty years of his life were spent in controversy with high Lutherans, who looked upon him as a renegade; and with Jesuits, who detected in what they called his neutralism the germ of a detestable atheism. Calixtus, like the Schoolmen, assigned to philosophy a co-ordinate position with theology, persuaded that the two being separate phases of truth could never really antagonize; and his aim was always to shew how the teaching of revealed truth was one with the induction of right reason. Philology and philosophy, he said, are the two wings of the spirit, without which none may soar into the higher regions of knowledge; and he first earned the merit of directing attention to the importance of ecclesiastical history as a study. Thucydides and Tacitus were his models, as gathering from carefully collected data the light of unity and scientific generalization. Mosheim, it should be noted, was of Helmstädt. As regards positive theology, he declared that the Christian's sufficient bond of unity was the Apostles' Creed, and the light thrown upon the exegesis of Scripture by the tradition of the first five centuries, down to the Council of Orange [A.D. 529]. Büscher, the Court Preacher at Hanover [A.D. 1640], at once denounced him as a "Cryptopapist."

The main points of Calixtan doctrine did not widely differ from the ordinary Lutheran views. Scripture had a plenary authority—it was sure and infallible; but Calixtus also maintained that there is an unwritten word in the rule of faith handed down from primitive antiquity; and in the voice of that antiquity, authoritatively speaking, in the first councils of the Church, while doctrine still maintained its purity. All later additions are either immaterial or erroneous. The Church contains the very flower of humanity, and is the depositary of all that is worthy of the name of wisdom; perpetuity is her privilege, and immunity from fundamental error; as the "pillar and ground of truth," she is infallible; yet has she lost much of her distinctive character, for human ignorance has confounded the boundary-lines of truth and error; but that very degeneracy has caused the purity of primitive doctrine, antecedent to that error and division, to be more conspicuously manifest. The most fatal error was the doctrine of Papal Infallibility introduced by the Jesuits; the Roman See has thereby forfeited its title to Catholicity. Primitive Christianity, and not Tridentine doctrine, was the object of his regard, though his opponents did not fail to confound this very manifest distinction. Evangelical doctrine he held to be a true reflexion of primitive truth; and the Divine authority of the Word was made manifest in its self-preservation from error during the first ages.

Calixtus denied the communication of Divine properties to the Human Nature ("Communicatio Idiomatum"), and in consequence rejected the notion of the ubiquity of Christ so prevalent in Germany; yet he maintained the verity of "oral manducation" in the Eucharist, though he was not always self-consistent. The Church, in his opinion, dates back from patriarchal times; and both before and after the day of Christ the self-same element of faith was requisite for salvation; yet he allows that the doctrine of the Holy Trinity was unknown to the holy men of old, and that firm belief in this doctrine is now absolutely necessary for salvation; but he could never assent to the position of his friend Cocceius, that the New Covenant confers advantages in the degree of future blessedness, to which those who died under the Old will never be admitted. His notion of symbolical union in the consent of antiquity also was not always self-consistent. At one while his appeal is restricted to the four first centuries; at another he takes in the Councils of Milevi and Orange.

With respect to the doctrine of grace, the opinions of Calixtus have in some points a Semi-Pelagian cast. Thus he affirmed free-will to be the god-like excellence of our nature, which was not so far lost by the Fall as to make personal sin a matter of necessary consequence; individually it is in our power to avoid sin, though collectively we have no power for good but by the interposition of supernatural grace, whereby man's original condition is restored; and a preternatural gift, the co-ordinate of pardon, ennobles his regenerate state. This gift was at first superadded in Adam; and so far he agreed with the Roman Church, which inherited the same notion through the Schools; whereas in Lutheran theology the Divine Image, or Original Righteousness, was the very nature in which Adam was created. He does not hesitate to ascribe absolute perfection to Adam before the Fall; whereby it was impossible for him to affirm that in Christ we gain more than we lost by the sin of our first parent, for nothing can be greater than absolute perfection. Good works for their own worth do not entitle to salvation, but they are an indispensable condition, the absence of which of necessity disqualifies. Mortal sins, wilfully committed, effectually darken the light of grace. Freedom with him is distinct from grace; and his theory of inspiration altogether harmonizes with this view. The Holy Spirit did not energize the whole soul and intellect of the inspired agent, but merely assisted the utterance of divine truth by vouchsafing freedom from error. In these notions there is sufficient divergence from Lutheran orthodoxy to shew their eclectic character.

The Northern schools which symbolized with the Helmstädt divines, such as Königsberg, Rinteln, Altdorf, Holstein, Denmark, Sweden, etc., did good service to theology by their encouragement of historical and exegetical divinity; all remaining true to the fundamental necessity for union. They were schools of theological learning rather than of spiritual religion; and for that reason took part with the orthodox Lutherans in the Pietist movement [A.D. 1670], that in the next generation wholly superseded Syncretism. The avowal of Calixtus that Romanism held those doctrines that are essentially necessary to salvation encouraged a return to Rome in the upper classes throughout Northern Germany—the school of Königsberg most of all favouring this Romeward direction. Calixtus scarcely realised to himself the possibility that the lode of precious ore, by a sudden fault, might become so buried beneath superincumbent strata as to become practically lost. Rome might give union, but not the union of pure truth. In the opposite direction Brunswick has ever retained the "broad church" character. Our own Latitudinarian divines, John Hale of Eton, Cudworth, Chillingworth, Tillotson, Burnet and Whiston, drank of the same fountain; though the only professed follower of Calixtus in the British Isles was the Scotch Independent Dury [Dureus, b. A.D. 1595 at Edinburgh, d. 1680 at Cassel], who devoted his whole life to the promotion of religious union among the Reformers of Germany. Being in England A.D. 1643, he was appointed one of the Westminster divines; and, as he himself says, gave active help in preparing the Confession and Catechism of Westminster. In 1654, he again visited the Continent, with commendatory letters from Cromwell, to promote sectarian union; though in more than one quarter he was recommended first to look at home to the state of religion in England. From the Restoration to his death [A.D. 1680] he resided at Cassel, and took part in the Cassel conference upon religious unity, A.D. 1661.

The external history of Syncretism dates from A.D. 1645, when Vladislaus VI., King of Poland, assembled a conference of Catholic and Protestant divines at Thorn on the Vistula, to consider the best method of restoring union, or at least some approach to agreement in religion.¹ Calixtus was sent thither by the Duke of Brunswick, and met his future determined opponents, Calovius of Dantzic, afterwards of Wittenberg, and Hülsemann of Wittenberg and Leipsic, the champions of orthodox Lutheranism. The conference led to no other result than the clear proof that Calixtus scarcely symbolized with Lutheranism. Eighty-eight propositions were laid to his charge by Calovius, which seemed to amalgamate the tenets of most opposite sects. But his principal offences seem to have been that he leaned too much to catholic doctrine; that he slighted the "Corpus Julium" and "Formula Concordiæ" of the Lutheran party, as exhibiting mere points of scholastic variance; that he affirmed the Apostles' Creed to be an all-sufficient bond of union; and the decrees of the four first General Councils to be the only authoritative interpretation of the mind of Scripture; and most of all, that he refused to condemn writings that good Lutherans had always regarded with pious horror. Though accused of "Cryptopapism," Calixtus had shewn repeatedly his variance with Roman dogma. So early as A.D. 1614, his treatise appeared "de Visibili Ecclesiastica Auctoritate," in refutation of the papal claim of infallibility; A.D. 1631, a monograph on the celibacy of the clergy was put forth; A.D. 1636, another on the denial of the cup to the laity; A.D. 1637, a thesis on the authority of Scripture; A.D. 1638, another on the Sacrifice of the Mass; A.D. 1639, the authority of Christian antiquity; and A.D. 1643, a treatise on Transubstantiation; while in the year preceding the conference at Thorn he published [A.D. 1644] his "Refutation of the Defence of Papal Infallibility by the divines of Mayence." The conference, though it settled nothing, gave rise to a bitter controversy between the rival schools of Helmstädt and Wittenberg, which had an intermittent existence till the death of Calovius, the Goliath of Lutheranism [A.D. 1686]. The divines of Jena, having Musæus as their head, stood alone in their advocacy of moderation. After the peace of Westphalia [A.D. 1648], the Evangelical sects, relieved from the common fear, had more leisure for internal feuds; and the novel tactics of Helmstädt divines exposed a broad front for attack.

The proceedings of the conference called forth from Calixtus a treatise on two of its subjects for discussion. [1] Whether the mystery of the Holy Trinity could be demonstrated from the Old Testament Scriptures alone. [2] Whether the Son of God appeared to the holy men of old in His hypostatic reality. Calovius at once replied by his "Prolegomena Institutionum Theologicarum;" A.D. 1650, Calixtus published his "Judicium de Controversiis Theologicis quæ inter Lutheranos et Reformatos agitantur, et de mutua partium fraternitate atque tolerantia propter consensum in fundamento;" and was met by Calovius in his "Digressio de Nova Theologia Helmstadio-Regiomontanorum Syncretistarum." Calovius never descended to scurrility or coarse personality; but his henchmen of the high Lutheran party were not so self-denying, and Sin-Christian [Sünde-Christ] and Semi-Christian [Semi-Christ] were alliterative names applied to the divines of Helmstädt. Dannhauer, in his "Mysterium Syncretismi detecti" [A.D. 1648], traced Syncretism in every ill-matched alliance from the beginning: such as Eve's yielding to the cunning of the serpent; the alliance of the sons of God with the daughters of men; the intercourse of the Israelites with the Egyptians; of Jews with the Chaldeans, and so on down to the latitudinarianism of Melancthon, Grotius, and Calixtus. He describes it as a pestilent error; without is peace [εἰρήνη], but within a Nemesis [ἐρινός]; hyæna-like, it attracts men by its human wailing to their destruction. Truth is to be found, he said, in Lutheran orthodoxy alone, which, like the eye, is intolerant of dirt. Calixtus was well able to hold his own in such a contest. The Saxon divines accused him of disloyalty to the Augsburg Confession. He replied that any man who could say this without offering proof was a wicked and flagitious calumniator and fabricator, and denounced him "für einen Erz- und Ehr-vergessenen verlogenen Diffamanten Calumnianten Ehrendieb und Bösewicht;" and A.D. 1651, he put forth a "Refutation in German of the calumnies [Verläumdungen] with which Jacob Weller has presumed to insult him." Soon after the conference at Thorn the divines of Electoral Saxony, claiming a kind of supremacy among Lutheran theologians, sent to Calixtus a solemn "admonition," which he received with the silence of contempt; and he provoked by his silence a whole flight of controversial missiles against himself and his friends. Unions also were formed by the orthodox party against the Helmstädt theologians. The famous "Consensus repetitus Fidei veræ Lutherane" [A.D. 1655], was the production of Calovius. In it he demanded the extrusion of the Syncretists as "rotten members" of the Church. The writer sought in vain to invest the document with the dignity of a "Liber Symbolicus;" but it fell flatly on the public, at a time when men had been thoroughly worn out with religious warfare in the pulpit and in the field, and satiated to repletion with symbolizings. The attempt therefore failed, and the failure was no light discouragement to the orthodox Lutheran party. Calovius, with characteristic tenacity¹ of purpose, seized every opportunity for giving authoritative weight to this "Consensus" during his whole life.

After the death of Calixtus [A.D. 1656], there was a five years' rest from controversy. Action was once more taken A.D. 1661, when William VI., Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, invited a conference of divines from the Reformed or Calvinistic University of Marburg and the Lutheran Syncretists of Rinteln in Schaumburg: the object being that "either party might gain a clear perception of their points of mutual agreement and divergence; that the exact bearing of controverted points, and their importance, whether touching the foundation of faith or not, might be ascertained; and that the discussion of these subjects should be conducted in the fear of God, so that if agreement upon every point could not be attained, at least brotherly love and mutual toleration might be established for the future." Accordingly, the conference, consisting of divines and state counsellors, met at Cassel. The subjects more particularly discussed were the Holy Eucharist, Predestination, the relation of the two Natures in Christ, and Baptism. The Lutheran divines allowed the "breaking" of bread,² and the substitution of a prayer against Satan and his power for the baptismal exorcism; and both parties allowed that there was between them a common and sufficient germ of agreement as regards all four subjects, and that any points of difference did not affect the foundations of faith, and could never justify reciprocal charges of heresy. A formula of agreement was accordingly drawn up and signed.

The example of Hesse was adopted by the Elector of Brandenburg, at whose summons conferences were held at Cologne and Berlin [A.D. 1662], for the purpose of effecting a "brotherly reconciliation" [Verträglichkeit] between the Lutheran and Reformed parties. Of the two the Cologne divines were the most pliant, but at Berlin Paul Gerhardt, with the Cassel example before his eyes, protested against the Syncretism into which the Reformed divines wished to betray them. The divines of Berlin also begged that their attendance might be dispensed with. But the conference took place all opposition notwithstanding, and continued its deliberations from September 1662 to May in the following year. The only result of much wrangling and jealousy was an electoral edict [September 16th, A.D. 1664], that both parties should refrain from giving bad names to their opponents, and from mutual charges of holding doctrines that were repudiated; moreover, that it should be left for evangelical parents to decide whether or not their children should be "exorcised" in baptism. A declaration also was prepared, which all spiritual persons were ordered to sign; but many refused, and were deprived; and among their number Paul Gerhardt, for his contumacy, was turned out of his professorship [A.D. 1666], though, on the pressing and repeated petition of the burghers of Berlin, he was fully restored in the next year.

In consequence of the agreement at Cassel, Calovius put forth a second Latin edition of the "Consensus repetitus Fidei," A.D. 1665; and in the next year a German translation. It was answered by the son of Calixtus, A.D. 1667, in a vindication of the father's orthodoxy from the misstatements of Calovius. This drew forth from Strauch, a young Wittenberg divine, a vindication of the Consensus from the "calumnies, falsehoods, and unjust censures" of the younger Calixtus, in which the grossest personalities were freely mixed with obscure hints, that compelled Calixtus to make an attested declaration before a notary that the allusions were most vile and false. The controversy was sinking hopelessly in the mire, when Conring, the leading theologian of Helmstädt, published his defence of that university under the title "Pietas Academiæ Juliæ programmata publico adversus improbas et iniquas calumnias cum aliorum quorundam, tum Ægidii Strauchii asserta." There is no Calixtine school he says; the idea was always repudiated by Calixtus; but he offered his opinions for what they were worth, as a free man to free men, and asserted a liberty that is of the very essence of the Christian Church. "Diris in Syncretistas nihil frequentius," but such a course is as unworthy as it is weak. The people know nothing of theological subtleties, neither can they judge for themselves whether or no Calixtine teaching harmonizes with confessions; questions that minister strife rather than edification: "Nec Deus nos ad beatam vitam per difficiles quaestiones vocat, in expedito et facili nobis est æternitas" [Hilary]. The Word of God, and not the Consensus of Calovius, is the standard whereby judgment must be formed of truth and error. In the meantime the temporal power should interpose its just authority, and curb the excess of license into which the controversy is degenerating; "non component hasce turbas qui excitaverunt." The University at once published this "Programma" in a free German translation, as the "Schutzrede der Julius Universität," and circulated it among the courts, consistories, and universities of Lutheran Germany. Duke Frederic William of Saxony, acting upon its appeal to the temporal power, forbade any further prosecution of the controversy [A.D. 1669].

Another five years of enforced peace followed. In 1675, the year in which Spener, the founder of the new religious revolution, Pietism, published his "Pia desideria," the irrepressible Calovius sounded the renewal of warfare, and expressed his determination "e diaboli excremento Calixtinas sordes exquirere." Another vindication of his father by F. U. Calixtus followed, and once more the polemical hurly-burly raged, until an inaugural mystery, full of the vilest scurrilities and personifications scarcely redeemed from blasphemy, enacted at Wittenberg, compelled the Elector of Saxony once more to interpose his authority by fining the printer of the drama and imprisoning its author. Æg. Strauch was condemned to a like punishment by the Elector of Brandenburg [A.D. 1675-1678]; and the interdiction upon continuing the controversy was renewed [A.D. 1677]. Calovius however still worked on under feigned names, and being in favour at Dresden, was not molested. A.D. 1682, he published, without name of author or printer, his "Historia Syncretistica;" A.D. 1684, his "Apodeixis articulorum Fidei;" and A.D. 1685, his "Synopsis Controversiarum cum Hæreticis modernis." In the same year he fell ill, and died February 21st, 1686, when the "Consensus repetitus" at length rested in peace. Thenceforth Syncretism ceased to apply to any particular party in the Lutheran community, but reverted to its original wider meaning of ill-assorted combination. Pietism rose as Syncretism set.

SYNERGISTS. A party among the German Lutherans of the sixteenth century, who were charged with holding Semi-Pelagian doctrine respecting the co-operation [συνεργῆσις] of man with God in the work of renovation. The original position taken up by Luther respecting justification by faith was, that it takes place entirely independent of the justified person's good works; "Non ille justus est qui multum operatur; sed qui sine opere multum credit in Christum," was one of the "Paradoxes" he offered to maintain against all comers at Heidelberg, on April 26th, 1518. This extreme doctrine he maintained in the treatise "De Servo Arbitrio," which he wrote in 1524 against Erasmus: but before his death he learned to approve of a modified form of the doctrine of free-will and good works, which was gradually brought out in Lutheran theology by Melancthon in the several editions of his "Loci Communes." Melancthon at last maintained that "God so draws and converts adults, that some agency of their wills accompanies His influences." This change in the views of Melancthon was followed up at a later date by John Pfeffinger, in a work entitled "De Libero Arbitrio," which he published in the year 1555. The idolaters of Luther assailed Pfeffinger with great violence, as corrupting the doctrine of one whom they practically considered as infallible as Ultramontanists consider the Pope, and the party rallying round Pfeffinger were at once stigmatized as Synergists, or those who maintained justification by works as well as faith.

In the "Synergistic Controversy" which thus arose, the principal leaders were Victorin Strigel, a pupil of Melancthon, and Matthias Flacius

Illyricus, the bitter opponent of the ADIAPHORISTS or Melancthon party. Flacius becoming Professor of Theology at Jena in the year 1557, carried on the controversy with such success that he succeeded in getting Strigel imprisoned for his opinions, and he was only released in 1562 by publishing a recantation of them. After this the Synergist controversy merged into the Majoristic, in which Amsdorf maintained the primitive Lutheran doctrine that works are a hindrance rather than otherwise to salvation, and Major adopted a moderate theory of the necessity of good works, similar to that which is held by English theologians. Like other endless controversies of the Lutherans, that of the Synergists is fully commemorated in Schlüsselburg's "Catalogus Hæreticorum," his fifth volume containing 719 pages "De secta Synergistarum."

SYNUSIASTÆ. Those who held that the Incarnation of our Lord was effected by a blending or commixture of the Divine substance with the substance of human flesh.

The name is taken from the statement of the doctrine, συννοσιῶσιν γεγενῆσθαι καὶ κρᾶσιν τῆς θεότητος καὶ τοῦ σώματος [Theod. Hæ. fab. iv. 3]. Theodoret calls this sect Polemians, one of the Apollinarist sects; and Apollinaris himself, in the latter part of his life, added to his distinguishing heresy regarding the soul of our Lord either this heresy or one closely akin to it. [APOLLINARISTS.] Polemian or Polemon was a disciple of Apollinaris. At the Lateran Council, A.D. 649, were quoted two extracts from Polemon's works, from which it appears that the Synusiastæ retained the heresy regarding the soul of our Lord, denying Him a human will, and asserting that He was to Himself a rational soul [Harduin, Concil. iii. 892]. The mode in which they were led to the adoption of their heresy appears to be this. At the outbreak of the controversies regarding the Incarnation, some asserted the conversion of the substance of the Godhead into the substance of flesh, others that the Divine Nature supplied in Christ the place of the human soul. Then an attempt was made to hold these two tenets together, the result of which was to deny an ἐνανθρώπησις altogether. To avoid this denial it was allowed that the flesh of man was assumed, but so blended with the Divine Substance as to eliminate that tendency to sin which it was alleged could not but be resident in human nature.

Diodorus of Tarsus and Theodotus of Antioch wrote against this heresy, for whom see Cave, Hist. Lit. The heresy appears to differ from that of Eutyches in asserting the blending to have been of the body alone and not of the whole human nature.

The Council of Chalcedon defined that the natures of perfect God and perfect man are united in the One Person of our Lord ἀσυγχύτως. The heresy of the Synusiastæ is dealt with by Theodoret in his Dialogue "Inconfusus."

TABORITES. A section of the CALIXTINES, which was so named from a great camp-meeting organized by them on a mountain near Prague ("Tabor" meaning "tent" in the Bohemian language), in the year 1419, for the purpose of receiving the Holy Communion in both kinds. They afterwards founded the city of Tabor on the same spot; and, uniting with the Bohemian Beghards, became a dangerous body of fanatics. Under the lead of Ziska, they assembled an insurgent force which marched upon Prague on July 30th, 1419, and committed sanguinary atrocities there on the plea of avenging insults which had been offered to the Calixtine custom of Communion.

The Taborites were in their principles very similar to the Scotch COVENANTERS of two centuries later date, opposing all the received doctrine and discipline of the Church on the ground that they could not find it in Holy Scripture, and supporting their principles in the most intolerant and cruel manner. Some of them allied themselves with the BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT, the extreme or Adamite section of the Beghards. After the death of King Wenceslaus, on August 16th, 1419, they began to destroy churches and monasteries, to persecute the clergy, and to appropriate ecclesiastical property, bidding defiance to all public authority on the ground that Christ was their King and was about shortly to establish His personal and visible reign among them. After the death of Ziska they broke up into two parties, the one under Procopius the elder, the other, calling themselves ORPHANS, under his son. They were eventually conquered and dispersed by the Calixtine George Podiebrad (afterwards King of Bohemia) in the year 1453, those who escaped the persecution being known subsequently as the BOHEMIAN BRETHREN. [Æneas Sylvius, Hist. Bohem., Ep. 130. Bezezyrna in Ludwig's Relig. MSS. vi. 142, 186.]

TANCHELMIANIS. A fanatical sect which arose in the Netherlands under the leadership of an uneducated impostor named Tanchelm or Tanquelin, early in the twelfth century. They were contemporary with the EONIANS of Brittany, and of a similar character.

Tanchelm began, about A.D. 1115, to proclaim himself to be the Son of God, and in the extravagance of his blasphemy caused churches to be erected in his honour. Abelard, who was his contemporary, says that this impostor first travelled to Rome in the garb of a monk, accompanied by a priest, and that returning to Utrecht, where there was then no bishop, he set up a religious community entirely separate from the Church, and although he was a layman, pretended even to celebrate mass and to communicate his followers. These latter were chiefly ignorant people on the sea-coast, especially women and children, and he was said to be living a most licentious life among the former. At last he set up the state of a king, surrounding himself with a body-guard of three thousand armed men, called himself by the Divine Name, pretended to espouse the Blessed Virgin, and perpetrated the grossest blasphemy of every kind. From Utrecht Tanchelm went to Antwerp; where, about the year 1125, he was slain by a priest. His followers were afterwards reclaimed by St. Norbert. [Abelard, Opp. p. 1066. Vie de S. Norbert, ii. 126. D'Argentine, Collect. judic. i. 11.]

TANQUELINIANS. [TANCHELMIANIS.]

TARCIANISTS. [TATIANISTS.]

TASCODRUNGITÆ. A sect of the Montanists which had its origin in Galatia, under a leader named Simon, and spread into Phrygia. The name is derived from a peculiar custom used by them in their worship of placing the finger beside the nose, τασκόσ signifying "a little stake," and δροῦγγος, the nose or nostrils, say Epiphanius and Timotheus Presbyter, in the dialect of Galatia. They repudiated all revelation, rejected the Creeds, and ridiculed the Sacraments.

There can be little doubt that the Tascodrungitæ are identical with the PASSALORYNCHITÆ, and that they were a sect of Montanist mystics, who made divine worship to consist chiefly in silent meditation, of which the gesture from which they took their name was a symbol. [Epiphanius, Hær. lxxvi. Timoth. Presb. in Combef. Hist. Monothelit. 450.] It is singular that a Latin writer of the century before Christ is quoted as writing "novam hæresim novo paxillo suspendisse" [Varro, ap. Non. 153, 9].

TATIANISTS. A Gnostic sect, chiefly distinguished by abstinence, on which account the name Encratite was appropriated by them, or at least by the more rigid of them. From Epiphanius it appears that such a distinction was adopted in his time. [ENCRAITITES.]

Tatian was born, as he himself states, "in the land of the Assyrians" [Tatian, Orat. ad Græcos, 42], but it is not known what particular region was intended by this vague statement. Clement of Alexandria and Theodoret call him a Syrian [Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 12; Theodor. Hær. fab. i. 20]. Epiphanius calls him a Mesopotamian [Indic. ad. I. iii.]. He was brought up in the Greek philosophy (Eusebius adds, that as a sophist he taught various branches of literature), and was converted to Christianity by reading the Holy Scriptures [Tatian, ad Græc. xxix.]. He then became a disciple of Justin Martyr. After Justin's death he fell into the Gnostic heresy about A.D. 150. The exact system which he adopted or excogitated is not known. It is only stated in general that his system of Æons and a subordinate Demiurge resembled—perhaps was borrowed from—that of Valentinus, while from Saturninus and Marcion he learnt his doctrine of heretical asceticism. It would be interesting to know the process by which the author of the Oratio ad Græcos, the disciple of Justin, the writer against heresy [Hieron. Epist. ad Magnum, Ep. 83], the defender of our Lord's Divinity [Caii Fragm. ap. Routh. Rel. Sac. ii. 129], became the Gnostic ascetic. It may be that the Greek philosophy in which he had been trained regained its power over his mind, and the question which presses alike on the Christian and the heathen, "Whence is evil?" led to the adoption of Gnostic principles, and these to the ascetic doctrines and practices: or it may be that the asceticism took the lead, and the Gnostic principles were adopted to supply a foundation and defence for its excess. But probably the two influences were blended. Changes such as Tatian's are not made according to the logic of a theory: an ascetic temperament, philosophical speculation, and the remaining influence of a heathen education, probably combined to effect the change in his mind.

Tatian's followers had their system of Æons and principalities, and maintained that the Creator was but a subordinate deity, interpreting the command "Let there be light" as a prayer to the Supreme Being [Clem. Alex. Fragm. 'Εκ τῶν προφητ. iv. p. 44, ed. Klotz]. The law also they ascribed to an inferior Deity [Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 12]. They asserted that Christ had an apparent, not a real body [Hieron. Comm. in Ep. ad Galat.]. Clement of Alexandria refers them to the school of Valentinus, as did Irenæus [Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 13].¹ In this chapter Clement connects Tatian also with Casian, the chief of the sect of the Docetæ. [DOCETÆ.]

This Gnosticism presupposes the tenet that matter is the source of evil: and the condemnation of marriage, the abstinence from flesh and wine, which were the theory or the practice of several sects of Gnostics, were insisted on so strongly by the Tatianists, that Encratite and Tatianist have become all but synonymous.² [ENCRATITES.] Marriage was declared to be nothing else than corruption and fornication; a sowing to the flesh, from which is reaped corruption. All sexual intercourse being impure, it is defilement to eat that which is so procreated. Wine was condemned as the manufacture of the Devil. Even in the Eucharist water only was used. [HYDROPARASTATÆ.]

Tatian's followers denied the salvation of Adam. This blasphemy, Irenæus states, was first introduced by Tatian. Irenæus treats it as involving by direct consequence the damnation of all men. "They who disallow Adam's salvation shut themselves out from life for ever, in that they do not believe that the sheep which had perished has been found. For if it has not been found, the whole human race is still held in a state of perdition" [Iren. Hær. iii. 23]. The statement then which has been made with something of a sneer, that "what especially shocked the piety and charity of the Catholics, was Tatian's affirming the damnation of Adam, a blasphemy which drew upon him especial odium," is not well expressed. Whether erroneously or not, Irenæus held Adam to be the type or federal head of all mankind, and that to deny his salvation was tantamount to an assertion of the utter failure of Christ's work of redemption. The sheep which was lost was the human race as existing in Adam.

Of Tatian's Harmony of the Gospels, the "Dia Tessaron," Theodoret's account is most to be trusted. Eusebius, it appears, had not seen the work. Theodoret says: "Tatian composed a gospel which is called Dia Tessaron, leaving out the genealogies, and everything that shews the Lord to have been born of the seed of David according to the flesh: which has been used not only by those of his sect, but also by them who follow the apostolic doctrine; they not perceiving the fraud of the composition, but simply using it as a compendious book. I have met with above two hundred of these books, which were in esteem in our churches; all which I took away, and laid aside, and placed in their room the Gospels of the four Evangelists."³

Eusebius says that Tatian dared to alter some words of the Apostle (i.e. St. Paul), as pretending to correct the composition and order of his style. Jerome says [Proem. in Comm. ad Tit.] that Tatian rejected some of St. Paul's Epistles. [SEVERIANS.]

Musanus [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 21, 28], Clement of Alexandria, Apollinaris of Hierapolis, and Origen, wrote against the Tatianists and Severians [Theod. Hær. fab. i. 21]; but their works are lost.

TAULER. [FRIENDS OF GOD.]

TERMINISTS. [NOMINALISTS.]

TERMINISTS. Those who believe that a "terminus gratiæ" has been predestined in the life of every person which ends the time during which he can repent of sin and find pardon with God. The opinion was maintained by Reichenberg, a Professor of Theology at Leipsic at the end of the seventeenth century, and was controverted by the learned Ittig, the writer of a work on the heresiarchs of the first two centuries, noticed in the article HERESIOLOGISTS. Terminism is a modified form of the extreme Calvinistic theory respecting the eternal decree of some to salvation and some to damnation, and is contrary to all orthodox opinions respecting the mercy of God.

TERTIARI. The lay brethren, or "third order" of the Franciscans, who joined the "Fratres de paupere vitâ" in the contest of the "Spirituals" against the lax Franciscans, and who were afterwards included with them under the general name of FRATICELLI.

TERTULLIANISTS. A small sect formed in Carthage by those who followed the great Tertullian [A.D. 150-220] in adopting opinions infected with those of the MONTANISTS, and who also called themselves "Spirituals" to distinguish themselves as persons of stricter life than the lax among the orthodox, whom they called PSYCHICS, or "carnal" men.

Several of Tertullian's treatises shew that he set himself against all relaxation of strict and stern Christian life. A question arose about the propriety of unmarried women appearing in public without wearing the veils which are worn by women in the East, and while many were disposed to let custom rule the point, Tertullian wrote a treatise "De Virginibus Velandis," in which he takes the stricter line, from whence a distinction soon sprung up between the "virgins of men" and the "virgins of God." Another question arose respecting second marriages, and he wrote his treatise "De Monogamia," in which he utterly condemns a second marriage after the decease of the first wife or husband, and also advocates a life of continence even for those who are married, on the ground that marriage was permitted to Christians only as a concession granted to human infirmity. A third question arose as to the wearing of chaplets or crowns by Christian soldiers, according to the custom of Roman armies, on the Emperor's festival, and Tertullian wrote his treatise "De Corona," in which he condemned the practice as idolatrous.

Combined with this ascetic strictness, Tertullian held an opinion that the continual Presence of the Holy Spirit in the Church of Christ would guide the latter into the development of a more austere system of morals before the approach of the Last Day, which he supposed, in common with most of the early Christians, to be near at hand. Thus, writing of marriage as a concession to infirmity, he says, "Whether we look to the grounds on which the permission was granted, or to the preference given to a state of celibacy (in the words of St. Paul, 'It is good for a man not to touch a woman'), the evident tendency of the Apostle's reasoning is to do away with the permission to marry. This being so, why may not the same Spirit, coming after the days of the Apostles at the appropriate time (there being, according to the Preacher, a time for all things), for the purpose of leading Christians into the truth, why may not the same Spirit, I say, have imposed a final and complete restraint upon the flesh, and called men away from marriage not indirectly, but openly? And this the more since St. Paul's argument, that 'the time is short,' is much more forcible now than an hundred and sixty years have elapsed since he wrote his Epistle" [Tertull. De Monogam.]. When therefore Montanus declared that the Paraclete promised by Christ had now come into the world to carry the Christian dispensation on to its perfection, his teaching found a ready response from Tertullian, as is evident from the continuation of the preceding passage: "The Paraclete introduces no new doctrine; He now definitively enjoins that of which He before gave warning; He now requires that for which He has hitherto been content to wait."

For a time the sympathy of Tertullian with the Montanists was so strong that he was accounted one of that sect, but there is no good ground for supposing that he ever acknowledged the alleged claim of Montanus to be the Paraclete in person. Under the influence of Proculus, one of the Montanist leaders, and of the tolerance which was shewn at Rome towards Praxeas, the originator of Patripassianism, against whom he had written [Hieron. Catal. Script. Eccl.], Tertullian undertook "the defence of the Paraclete," but this was a defence of the developing dispensation of the Holy Spirit, not of the alleged claims of Montanus. And although Tertullian separated himself nominally from the "Psychics," but practically from the Church, he soon established a community which was at least as distinct from that of the Montanists as from the Church of Carthage [Prædest. Hær. lxxxvi.]. These "Tertullianists" were probably orthodox as to the faith in general, but maintaining a schismatical position on account of their dislike to what they considered the worldliness of the Church. St. Augustine speaks tenderly of them, and says, that the very few who remained in his time had returned to the communion of the Church, and had given up their basilica to the Catholics [Aug. Hær. lxxxvi.]. There is no reason to think that they adopted the peculiar opinions of Tertullian himself, such as that of the transmigration of wicked souls into the bodies of demons.

TESSARESCÆDECATITÆ. [QUARTODECIMANS.]

TETRADITES. [QUARTODECIMANS.]

TETRATHEITÆ. [DAMIANISTS.]

TEXERANTS. A local name given to the ALBIGENSES in those districts of Southern France, where the members of that widespread sect were mostly found among the weavers,—“ab usu texendi.” [Ekbert, adv. Cathar. in Bibl. Max. Lugd. xxiii. 601.]

THEBUTHIS or THEBUTES. Eusebius quotes from Hegesippus the statement that Thebuthis made a beginning secretly to corrupt the Church of Jerusalem, because Simon the son of Cleophas was appointed to be bishop of the Christians in that city instead of himself. Nothing further is known of him or his sect. [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 22.]

THEISTS. A name used instead of “Deists” by some writers in the latter half of the seventeenth century [Evelyn’s Hist. Relig. i. 282]. In modern language the name is used to designate those who believe in the existence of God, (as distinguished from Atheists,) and in the moral supremacy of conscience, but do not pledge themselves to any doctrines of Christian theology as to the Divine Attributes, or the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. [DICT. OF THEOL., THEISM.]

THEMISTIANS. [AGNOËTÆ.]

THEOCATAGNOSTÆ. A name used by St. John of Damascus, apparently as a general term for heretics who held unorthodox opinions about God, and therefore “thought evil” [κατάγνοστis] respecting Him. [Joan. Damasc. de Her.]

THEODOSIANS. The Alexandrian section of the sect of the PHTHARTOLATRÆ.

THEODOSIANS. [FEODOSIANS.]

THEODOTIANS. There were two heretics of the name of Theodotus, distinguished as the Tanner and the Banker; the latter a disciple of the former. Theodotus the Tanner was of Byzantium, and was a man of much learning, but, having in a time of persecution denied the faith, he retreated to Rome [about A.D. 192], and there tried to palliate his apostasy by saying that he had not denied God but man. He persisted in his assertion that Christ was a mere man, and was excommunicated by Victor [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 28; Epiph. Her. liv.; Theod. Hæc. fab. ii. 5].

Eusebius gives extracts from a book entitled “The Little Labyrinth,”¹ written against Artemon, from which it appears that there was at least an attempt to organize a distinct schismatical sect of Theodotians. Theodotus the Banker, with an associate Asclepiodotus, persuaded one Natalis, a confessor, to be bishop of the heretical party; but it is not clear whether Natalis was already a bishop, or whether the Theodotians hoped to procure his consecration. Natalis repented, and was readmitted to Catholic communion by Zephyrinus.

In another extract there occurs this difficulty, that Theodotus is said to have been the author of this God-denying heresy. Ittigius contents himself with simply saying that Caius was in error [Ittig. de Hæres. p. 261]. Several different explanations may be seen in Burton’s Bampton Lectures, note 100. Is it not sufficient to say that Caius, and after him Eusebius, were thinking only of those who held correctly the first article of the Creed, and did not bring into comparison with Theodotus either the Gnostics, who entertained so different a belief regarding the nature of the Deity, or the Ebionites, who were more of Jews than Christians. Thus Theodoret states that Theodotus held the same opinions as Artemon, and that Artemon agreed with the Catholics as to the God of the universe, believing Him to be the Creator of all things. Of such, Theodotus was the first Psilanthropist. [ARTEMONITES.] This explanation is confirmed by the statement of Hippolytus, which will be given presently. While asserting our Lord to be a mere man, Theodotus allowed that He was born of a Virgin. “Doctrinam enim introduxit qua Christum hominem tantummodo diceret, Deum autem illum negaret, ex Spiritu quidem Sancto natum et Virgine, sed hominem solitarium atque nudum, nulla alia præ ceteris nisi sola justitiæ auctoritate” [Pseudo-Tert. cap. xxiii.]. So too Theodoret. But Epiphanius writes that the Theodotians held Christ to be a mere man, and begotten of the seed of man. The testimony of Hippolytus is decisive on this point.

Hippolytus states that Theodotus introduced a novel heresy, being orthodox as to the creation of the world by God, but drawing his notions of Christ from the school of the Gnostics and of Cerinthus and Ebion; that he held Jesus to have been a mere man, born of a Virgin, according to the counsel of the Father; to have become pre-eminent in piety, and to have received Christ at His baptism in Jordan, before which time therefore miraculous powers were not exhibited by Him. Some of the followers of Theodotus, it is added, think that Jesus never became God, even at the descent of the Spirit; while others maintain that He became God after the resurrection from the dead [Refut. vii. 23].

At the end of the works of Clement of Alexandria are two large extracts purporting to be from the writings of Theodotus. Of these, Burton [Bampton Lect. note 100] remarks that it is difficult to subscribe to the notion, though supported by Cave, Ittigius, and Fabricius, that they were written by Theodotus. The silence of Hippolytus as to any such opinions (and it will be remembered that the “Refutation of all Heresies” was written after the death of Callistus, A.D. 222, while Theodotus went to Rome about A.D. 192) affords a stronger presumption against these extracts than does the character of the doctrines maintained in them. And as it is, on the other hand, by no means clear that we have Clement’s testimony to their genuineness—“Utrum vero ab ipso Clemente consarcinata hæc fuerint, an ab alio quodam, parum liquet,” says Cave—it is not safe to ascribe them to Theodotus. A summary of the tenets advanced in them may be seen in Cave's Historia Literaria under the article "Theodotus."

The author of the "Little Labyrinth" charges the leaders of the Theodotians or Artemonites with interpolating, adding to, and taking from, the Holy Scriptures. Theodotus, Asclepiades, Hermophilus, Apollonides, did so (Theodoret states) each in his own way. The corruption of the Scriptures by heretics is named by Clement, who, having quoted Matt. v. 10, introduces variations of the text with the words ἡ ὡς τινες τῶν μετατιθέντων τὰ εὐαγγέλια [Clem. Alex. Strom. IV. vi. 41. See also Kaye on Clement, p. 288].

Artemon was the better known leader of this sect. [ARTEMONITES.] Epiphanius supposes that the Melchisedechians were an offshoot from the Theodotians [Hær. lv.]; and Hippolytus and Theodoret state that they had their beginning from Theodotus the Banker. [MELCHISEDECIANS.]

THEOPASCHITES. A sect of the Monophysites who maintained that Christ having only one Nature, and that the Divine, it was therefore the Divine Nature which suffered [Θεός, πάσχειν] at the Crucifixion. This opinion is mentioned by Philaster [Hær. xcii.] and Augustine [Hær. lxxiii.], but was first maintained in its extreme form by Peter Fullo, the Monophysite Patriarch of Antioch, who is alleged to have altered the Trisagion to the form "Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, Thou Who for our sakes wast crucified, have mercy upon us." The formula was accepted however by many of the orthodox as merely stating that one of the Persons of the Blessed Trinity suffered for us men and for our salvation. The Emperor Justinian issued an edict directing its use, and its rejection was condemned by the tenth anathema of the fifth General Council [A.D. 553], the second Council of Constantinople [Mansi, Concil. viii. 765, ix. 384]. But Theopassianism itself was condemned in a council held at Rome A.D. 862, which decreed that the Godhead of Christ could not suffer, and that He "passionem crucis tantummodo secundum carnem sustinuisse" [ibid. xv. 658]. There is an orthodox modification of the opinion, to the effect that the Divine Nature of Christ and His Human Nature each partake of the operation of the other, and hence that in a certain sense the sufferings of Christ's Body and Soul were communicated to His Divinity. [DICT. OF THEOL., THEANDRIC OPERATION.]

THEOPASSIANS. [THEOPASCHITES.]

THEOPATHETICS. [THEOPASCHITES.]

THEOPHILANTHROPISTS. This name was assumed by a party of French Deists during the Reign of Terror, to indicate their adherence to a natural or Theistic religion and worship which was intended to supersede Christianity, and whose characteristics were to be love of God and love of man.

The first attempt at establishing a Theistic worship of this kind was made in England by an Unitarian preacher of Liverpool named David Williams, a friend of Franklin, in conjunction with whom he arranged a plan for the propagation of Deism, the fruit of which was his "Liturgy on the universal principles of Religion and Morality," published in the year 1776. With this Liturgy, Williams set up a meeting-house in Margaret Street, Cavendish Square, where he officiated under the title of a Priest of Nature. In this attempt he was supported and encouraged by Voltaire, and his friend Frederick the Great, King of Prussia; and through the former the scheme of Williams became known in France.

The idea of a Theistic worship thus imported into France was taken up in a sentimental form by a number of those who desired to build up some form of religion on the ruins of Christianity. D'Aubermenil established a system of so-called worship, in which the Deity was to be symbolized by a perpetual fire, before which oblations of fruit, salt and oil were to be made. In the temple of this religion there was to be daily worship, every ninth day was to be a day of rest, and there were to be occasional festivals, celebrated with dancing. D'Aubermenil gave the name of "Theoandrophiles" to his disciples, but this was changed to "Theophilanthropes" when some of the latter determined to establish his system in a modified form.

The new sect was headed by La Réveillère Lepaux, one of the Directory, who opened a blind school as a place of worship for it, but afterwards obtained a decree of the Directory, giving the sect a right to the use of the churches as national buildings. They thus obtained the use of twenty churches in Paris, in which they set up their worship. A basket of fruit or flowers, according to the season, was placed upon the altar, over which was inscribed the creed of Robespierre, "We believe in God and the immortality of the soul," and on each side of it some sentences containing statements of abstract morality. The ritual consisted of some colourless prayers, and hymns selected from the writings of French poets—Milton's Paradise Lost and Thomson's Seasons were the "use" of Margaret Street—there being a pause in one part of the service, during which the worshippers were to meditate in silence on their faults since their last attendance at the service. Moral lectures also formed a part of the system. They had four special festivals in honour of Socrates, St. Vincent de Paul, Jean Jacques Rousseau, and Washington.

As religious feeling began to revive, the Theophilanthropists began to decline. They and their sentimental trumpery were turned out of the churches: the revolutionary Government forbade them on October 4th, 1801, to use even the three churches which were left in their hands; and when their petition for holding their services elsewhere was refused, the Theophilanthropist religion soon died of inanition, despised by the infidel party as well as by those who still remained Christians. An attempt to revive it after the Revolution of 1830 utterly failed. [Grégoire's Histoire des Sectes Religieuses.]

THEOPHRONIANS. [EUNOMIO-THEOPHRONIANS.]

THEOPHYLACTIANS. A name given to the orthodox Christians of Alexandria by the Jacobites in the seventh century. [Neale's Hist. East. Ch., Patriarch. Alex. ii. 87.]

THEOPONITÆ. [THEOPASCHITES.]

THEOSEBITES. A sect noticed by St. Cyril of Alexandria, under the name of θεοσεβίται, and also known by the Latin equivalent "Deicolæ." They are said by St. Cyril to have spread in Palestine and Phœnicia during the first half of the fifth century, and appear to have been similar to, if not identical with, the HYPsISTARIANS. The Theosebites exalted the sun, moon, and stars, into objects of worship, and yet acknowledged one Supreme Deity over all; their religion thus appearing to have been an adulteration of Christianity with Magianism [Cyr. Alex. de Adorat. in Spir. et Verit. iii.].

Probably the Hypsistarians and Theosebites, and other sects of similar principles, are to be traced to the Therapeutæ and Essenes, who, as sketched by Philo [de Vitâ contempl.], worshipped τὸ ὅν or, Ὑψίστος, kept the Jewish sabbath, and were as particular as the Jews in their rules about food [Ullmann's Greg. Nazianz. App. ii.]. Such sects kept up a partial belief in Christ, but were at the same time strict Unitarians: and while under Jewish influences they assumed a Judaizing character, they were of a Magian or other character when they came under other local influences.

THEOSOPHISTS. The generic application of all those mystics who allege that by an internal and supernatural illumination they are admitted to a knowledge of the mystery of being: first, on the side of nature; secondly, on that of religion. The title of Fire-philosophers has also been accorded to these persons, and properly; for, according to their own account, they are enabled, by a miraculous intuition of the properties of the so-called element of fire, to provide a solution, not only for every difficulty of physics, but also for every doubtful problem in the spiritual world.

Preposterous as these claims are, many traces of similar arrogant pretensions are to be found in the history of philosophy from the time of Empedocles to the present day; but the movement with which modern sectarian history is concerned dates no further back than the sixteenth century. Of this system, now specifically entitled Theosophical, Paracelsus is the founder, Robert Fludd and the Rosicrucians the supporters, and Jacob Böhm the great prophet and apostle. Many affiliated forms of mysticism have indeed appeared since the rise of the Theosophists, but they have either been schooled into something like a separate system, by the attraction of the real ability of their founder (as was the case with the SWEDENBORGIANS), or in default of such an influence have sunk or risen into a simple religious Quietism. Generally however such bodies have differential peculiarities of their own, and invariably a separate collective title and history.

No uniformity of principle, nor even, to speak strictly, any community of method, can be attributed to the Theosophists, for in each period of their grotesque existence they listened submissively to the voice of their leaders, which rarely echoed that of reason. Thus each generation received some fresh instalment of incoherent dreaming, and recorded it as the final contribution of the Divine Intelligence. Further, as an appropriate foundation was needed upon which to erect this structure of folly, the Theosophists claimed to derive their technical language and leading ideas from the ancient secrets of the Cabbala. These they alleged to have been handed down by oral tradition through the long centuries of the Middle Age, and to have reached them uninjured with its entire complement of magic and astrology.

Of their two great pretensions, miraculous knowledge of physics and special spiritual illumination, the former made the Theosophists famous, and the latter still continues to keep them remarkable; even at the present day, while the former is hopelessly discredited by general experience, there are still found persons who do not reject the latter. This shifting of opinions among the taught has been, of course, accompanied by a change of front (rendered necessary by the progress of civilization) by the teacher, who, as the absurdity of Theosophic science became gradually exposed, has been glad to retire from the comparatively open field of scientific knowledge to the more inaccessible district of religious speculation. Thus we find that the father of Theosophy lays claim to the gift of universal healing, while the Theosophists of to-day pretend only to spiritual illumination; though the latter, in the desire to support their failing claims to a revelation of nature, distort, with the bad faith common to religious enthusiasts, the vague verbiage of their sacred authors into meanings the most alien from their natural interpretation.

The pretensions of Paracelsus, a Swiss physician [A.D. 1493-1541], who numbered Erasmus and Frobenius among his patients, undoubtedly gave the greatest if not the first impulse to Theosophy. He was a man of capacity, and practically the discoverer of the medicinal properties of opium and mercury. From his inordinate appetite for admiration, he became dissatisfied with the really great result of his art, and laid claim to the discovery of the "elixir vitæ," a piece of hypocrisy which his early death considerably discredited. A man of prodigious vanity, he was glad to adopt the hyperbolic language of alchemy to magnify his discoveries, and partly perhaps to confuse his opponents, accustomed to the simple dialectic of the Aristotelian philosophy. It is impossible to say how far he deceived himself, but he certainly succeeded in deceiving many others, notably Robert Fludd, an English physician [A.D. 1574-1637], a man of family and of liberal education. After the death of Paracelsus, his followers and pupils, (who, it should be noted, were principally chemists, and only secondarily prophets), under the mythical name of Rosicrucians, attracted much notice in the sixteenth century, and their system in that unsettled epoch easily secured numerous adherents. [ROsICRUCIANS.] Fludd himself was thus drawn into the circle of unreason, and became a zealous admirer of Theosophy and an ardent advocate of the Rosicrucian cause. In his steps followed Böhm or Böhmen [A.D. 1575-1624], the greatest of the Theosophists. This man, a shoemaker at Görlitz, in Holland, who shared the general discontent felt by the Lutherans with their religion, was so affected by the eloquence of Fludd, that he became a complete convert to the creed of Theosophy, and in addition set up a most strange mystical system of his own. He was a man of vast imagination and an elaborate constructive power, and finding pleasure in the dreams of incomprehensible mystery suggested by his favourite author, encouraged this form of intellectual self-indulgence to such an extent that he at last firmly believed that the incoherent visions of his distempered fancy were the actual communications of the Deity. His story is, that on three occasions, each succeeding a trance of seven days' duration, he became the recipient of a special revelation. His first vision was of God; his second of the world of nature and the essential properties of all things; his third of causality, creation, and the Divine Nature. Twelve years afterwards he gave to the world the results of this illumination in a series of publications of great number and obscurity. The elements of his teaching can be most easily collected from his Aurora, although it is alleged that at the date of its composition he was only "partly illuminated." A short extract will suffice to shew the nature of the most important doctrines of Theosophy. "God," it is alleged, "is the unity in relation to His creatures, an eternal nothing; He has neither foundation, nor commencement, nor place, and possesses nothing but Himself. He is the will of that which has no ground in Himself, He is a unity. He does not stand in need of any room or space; from eternity to eternity He begets Himself in Himself. In God all creatures are only one creature, an eternal unity as it were, the one eternal good; but the eternal unity could not become manifest if there were no differences; therefore it has manifested itself in such a way, that it has introduced a plurality and distinctions in its own will and in attributes, but the attributes in desires, and the desires in beings. The creation is nothing but a manifestation of the Almighty; it is all that which He is in His eternal generation, but not in His omnipotence and power. The Being of beings is only one Being, but in His generation He separates Himself into light and darkness, joy and sorrow, good and evil, love and hatred, fire and light, and out of these two eternal beginnings arises the third beginning, viz. the creation for His own delight and according to His eternal desire." When to this is added that light is grace, and that grace, and indeed all spiritual things, operate by the laws of light and physical things, sufficient indication of what Theosophy means is given, sufficient to justify Mosheim's description of Böhm as a man "who discovered by means of fire a theology more obscure than the "numbers" of Pythagoras or the "characters" of Heraclitus." [BEHMEN.]

To Böhm succeeded many writers, all more or less influenced by his prodigious imagination. Such are Knorr, Mercurius, Sperber, Freher, Böhm's commentator, Kuhlman, (the martyr of Theosophy, who was burnt in Russia in 1689,) and the younger Helmont. This last named author oscillates between a comparative sanity, induced by his admiration for the Cartesian philosophy, and a more than Theosophical madness due to the fascination of the mystic Madame Bourignon. In one of his saner passages, he gives the clue to the possibility of Theosophy in these words: "The essence of the human mind is thought capable and desirous of light; to satisfy this desire we need the illumination of faith, disclaiming the fictions of the human reason."

Böhm and his followers have been accused of grievous heresy by their Lutheran opponents, not always justly; specially of Manichæism by Gerrard Antagnossus, and of Atheism by Müller. The latter charge is certainly fanciful, but it is hard to read their statements about the great darkness among the stars, caused by the presence of the Devil, without thinking of the mythology (though not the leading tenets) of Mani. Of Pantheism, too, they can scarcely be acquitted, for they certainly allege that "the whole Divine Trinity presented as form is the universe," which is in fact only a truncated aspect of the idealism of Spinoza. Nevertheless, unsound as are some of their religious opinions, it cannot be denied that the Theosophist morality has been irreproachable. It is thus that, while Denmark, Germany, France, and England have all contributed their quota to swell the ranks of these innocent fanatics, the history of Theosophy in these countries presents no scene of violence or persecution.

In England, Theosophy has been particularly fortunate, not only in the early advocacy of Robert Fludd, but in the more recent conversion of William Law [A.D. 1686-1761], a divine of eminence in the English Church, known as the author of "A Serious Call to a Devout Life," and for his influence over the mind of John Wesley. In his declining years Law adopted the opinions of Böhm, and became himself the translator of his works. Judged by the work of Walton (the full title of which is given below), the mantle of the prophet of Görlitz is not likely to be without a zealous proprietor at the present time, nor do his followers seem inclined to abate any of his pretensions. In the work just alluded to it is alleged that "Sir I. Newton ploughed with Böhmen's heifer," "for he did but reduce to a mathematical form the central principles of nature revealed in Böhmen, and by the aid of the experience and observation bequeathed by antecedent philosophers."¹ The author goes on to remark that the observations will apply to the science of physiognomy introduced by Lavater and perfected as phrenology by Gall and Spurzheim, and "to all that is sound in the philosophy of Berkeley;"

finally, it is alleged to be true of the Homœopathy of Hahnemann!

[Literature. The Works of J. Böhm, translated and edited by William Law, give the best detailed information; while the best general account of early Theosophism will be found in Brucker, Hist. Philosoph. Very full information as to Theosophical authors and their meaning is to be found in Christopher Walton's Notes and Materials for an adequate Biography of William Law, comprising an elucidation of the scope and contents of Jacob Böhmen and his great Commentator Dionysius Freher, with a Notice of the Mythical Divinity and a most curious and solid Science of all ages of the World; also an indication of the time for the induction of the intellectual heathen Nations to the Christian Faith. For the supposed relation of Böhm's philosophy to that of Schelling and the school of purely philosophic mysticism, the works of Erdmann and D. F. Strauss must be consulted.]

THERAPEUTÆ. The Egyptian branch of the Jewish sect of Essenes, distinguished from the Essenes of Syria and Palestine by a hermit instead of a monastic life, and by a less admixture of Eastern philosophy in their doctrine. The sect is described by Philo in his treatise "De Vita Contemplativa."

Eusebius' notion that the Therapeutæ, or "Devotees," were Jewish Christians is generally abandoned, as being inconsistent with a right understanding of Philo's description of them as disciples of Moses, as a sect of long standing, with a Jewish not a Judæo-Christian observance of the Sabbath.

It has been disputed whether the Therapeutæ were Essenes. Valesius, e.g., denied this in opposition to Scaliger [Note on Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. ii. 17]. Valesius urges the differences between the two, such as the community of goods of the Essenes, the private property of the Therapeutæ, and the different estimation in which women were held. But these do not touch the principle of Essenism, which was the common priesthood of all members of the society, and the consequent rejection of the separate priesthood of the Levites. [ESSENES.] That this principle was held by the Therapeutæ appears from Philo's description of the celebration of their great festivals, in which the meal of bread, salt, and hyssop was taken, as among the Essenes, with solemn prayer and in priestly garments; and the hymns used are called ὑμνοὶ παραβώμιοι [Ritschl, Entstehung der Altth. Kirche, p. 184, note 1]. In consequence of their different appreciation of women, it would be nearer the truth to call them the purer branch of the Essene sect.

Philo describes the Therapeutæ, and their devout women, Therapeutides, as drawn to a life of solitary devotion by heavenly love, and under an enthusiastic impulse to attain the desired state of contemplation; relinquishing their goods to their own relations; seeking solitude in lone country habitations, each with his separate cottage, which had in it an oratory; spending the day in the study and contemplation of divine things; coming together on the seventh day in assemblies, in which discourses were made on the allegorical and mystical meaning of the Scriptures; their synagogues having separate enclosures for men and women; every seventh Sabbath being a high festival, with its sacred meal taken as a religious service, the men on one side of the hall, the women on the other side, the juniors of the society ministering, but in the garb of freemen, the afternoon spent in discourse on divine things, and in singing hymns, now alternately, now in chorus, and this exercise prolonged after supper throughout the night.

The female devotees were mostly aged, and such only as had been virgins from their youth. The Therapeutic estimate of marriage we are not told, but the recognition of female devotees implies a very different estimation of woman from that entertained by the Palestinian Essenes. Neither is there in Philo's mention of the prayers made at sunrise and sunset an intimation of the worship of the sun. It appears rather that the Therapeutæ borrowed their customs from the country in which they were settled, adapting them to the principle of Essenism. Some classes of the Egyptian priesthood had always used like customs. And the same religious feeling, which thus tended to form the sect of Therapeutæ afterwards gave birth, among Egyptian Christians, to monks and nuns. [Sharpe's History of Egypt, ii. 92.]

THNETOPSYCHITÆ. A name given by St. John of Damascus and Nicetas to the Arabian heretics, who for want of any other designation—itaque nos hæreticos, quoniam nullum eorum ponit auctorem, Arabicos possumus nuncupare—were called ARABICI. [Joann. Damasc. Hær. xc. Nicet. Thesaur. Orthod. iv. 40.]

In the history of Paul the Deacon, written in the eighth century, they are called Charurgitæ. [Paul. Diac. Hist. xix.]

THOMISTS. [SCHOOLMEN.]

THONDRACIANS. An Armenian sect which was formed in the province of Ararat by a fusion of Parseeism and Paulicianism about A.D. 840. Sembat, a Paulician, was brought into contact with a Persian physician and astronomer named Medschûsic, whose influence led him to attempt a combination of the Zoroastrian and the Christian systems. He established himself at Thondrac, from which place the name of his sect was taken, its original designation being assumed from the Armenian sect of the Pseudo-Christian Parsees known as Arevurdis or Sun-Children. The Thondracians often revived and became important, although often almost suppressed; and in A.D. 1002 were joined by the Armenian bishop Jacob, the head of the province, under whom they made great progress. He was eventually condemned as a heretic by the Armenian Church, and having escaped from the prison in which he had been confined, came to a violent death at the hands of those who attempted to retake him. [Chamchean's Geschichte von Armenien, ii. 884.]

THREE CHAPTERS. [TRIA CAPITULA.]

THREE DENOMINATIONS. This name was given to the Independents, the Baptists, and the Presbyterians at the time when these three sects represented the great body of English Dissenters. They were the Dissenters recognised by the Act of Toleration [1 Will. & Mary, c. 18], and had the privilege granted to them of presenting corporate addresses to the Sovereign.

TIMOTHEANS. A section of the Alexandrian Monophysites, so named from Timotheus Ælurus, a bitter opponent of the canons of Chalcedon. During the patriarchate of Proterius, Timothy established schismatical assemblies in Alexandria, having persuaded a few bishops and monks to join him in his secession from the communion of the patriarch, and he acquired the peculiar name of "the Cat" on account of the stealthy manner in which he gained access to the monks by climbing to the windows of their cells at night, that he might persuade them to give up their allegiance to their bishop. On the death of the Emperor Marcian, he succeeded in obtaining consecration from two heretical and exiled bishops, and Proterius was murdered by the partizans of the usurping patriarch on Good Friday, A.D. 457. Timothy Ælurus maintained his usurped position for three years, when he was banished to the ancient Cherson near Sebastopol, and Timothy Salofaciolus appointed in his stead. After the death of the Emperor Leo, the departure of Zeno from Constantinople, and the accession of Basiliscus, the latter was persuaded by his Eutychian Empress Zenobia to recall the banished usurper, when he again took possession of the patriarchal throne of Alexandria with triumph, after fifteen years' absence, in A.D. 470, his entry into the city of Constantinople on the way being made a profane parody of our Lord's entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday [Evagr. Hist. Eccl. iii. 6]. Zeno returned to his throne in the following year, and issued a decree of banishment against Ælurus, but the execution of this was anticipated by the death of the usurping patriarch.

The opinions of Timotheus and his party went the full length of extreme Eutychianism. In some fragments of a work of his which still exist [Maii Novu Collect. vii. 35, 277, 304, 305] he is found saying that the Nature of Christ is one only, that is Divine; that in the first starting-point of conception by His Mother, He had one substance with human nature, but that He was not born of the Blessed Virgin in the ordinary way of birth, or her virginity could not have been preserved. This form of Eutychianism thus repudiated the reality of Christ's human nature, and was practically identical with the opinion of the Docetæ.

TOLAND, JOHN. This deistical writer [A.D. 1669-1722] was originally an Irish Roman Catholic, but passing through Presbyterianism at Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Leyden, he became a voluminous writer against Christianity. In the year 1696 he published a work entitled "Christianity not Mysterious, or a Treatise shewing that there is nothing in the Gospel contrary to Reason or above it, and that no Christian doctrine can be properly called a Mystery." This book was presented by the Grand Jury of Middlesex, and Toland withdrew to Ireland; but the Parliament of his native country ordering that he should be prosecuted by the Attorney-General, and his book burned by the common hangman, he returned to a safer residence in London. The political line which he subsequently took brought him into favour with the Whig partizans of the House of Hanover, and the rest of his life was one of much prosperity. In 1698 he printed his "Amyntor," in which he gives a catalogue of more than eighty apocryphal Gospels, and other similar books, with the view of discrediting the Canon of Scripture, pretending that the books of the latter were not publicly known at any earlier date than the others. In 1718 he published a work which he called "Nazarenus, or Jewish, Gentile, and Mahometan Christianity;" and in 1720 "Tetradymus," a book of the same eclectic character. Toland's infidelity was much moulded by his acquaintance with Leibnitz, and by the writings of Spinoza. [SCPTICS.]

TRACTARIANS. [HIGH CHURCHMEN.]

TRADUCIANS. Those who believe that the soul is, like the bodily part of human nature, handed down from parent to child in a germinal form by natural generation. The opinion is first found in Tertullian, and is opposed by that of the CREATIONISTS.

TRASKITES. The early name of the Sabatarian Puritans, the sect owing its origin to John Trask, a native of Somersetshire, who, after being a schoolmaster there up to thirty-four years of age, became a preacher in London about the year 1617. Fuller says that he was refused ordination by the Bishop of Bath and Wells as altogether insufficient, but that "afterwards he got Orders, and then began to vent his opinions." It is said of him that "he preached repentance so earnestly that he caused many of his auditors to weep, yea, to roar in that manner, that inhabitants of several places of the city were disquieted many times in the night season by his converts. And himself gave them an example, for both in city and fields he prayed so loud as if he would have pierced the heavens." This peculiarity is noticed also by Fuller, who says: "I have heard him preach a sermon, . . . and when his auditors have forgotten the matter they will remember the loudness of his stentorian voice: which indeed had more strength than anything else he delivered." He enjoined severe asceticism upon his followers, inducing them to fast three days at a time, alleging that the third day's fast would bring them into the condition of justified saints, according to the promise, "After two days He will revive us; in the third day He will raise us up, and we shall live in His sight" [Hos. vi. 1]. They were also to sell all that they possessed to give to the poor, and to spend their days in sighing, "to eat their bread with quaking, and to drink their water with trembling:" being thus an early form of the sect afterwards called "Quakers."

Among other precepts strictly enforced by Trask, was that of doing everything by the law of Scripture. A young man named Hamlet Jackson took him so literally at his word as to believe that the Word of God prescribed what he should eat and what he should drink, alleging proofs for his opinion from the Levitical law. In arguing with him, Trask was himself converted to his opinion, and began at once to teach it to his followers. Thus he established among them a number of ceremonial customs respecting dress and domestic life; and required them to observe Sunday with the same strictness that the Jews observed the Sabbath. On this point again Jackson (who afterwards became a Jewish proselyte at Amsterdam) persuaded him that the proper day to keep in this manner was Saturday, and that Sunday need not be regarded. Strict Sabbatarianism was thus introduced among the Traskites, and afterwards became the distinctive feature of the sect.

On April 1st, 1634, the Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes wrote to all Justices of the Peace, Mayors, etc., enjoining them to take measures for the suppression of "Brownists, Anabaptists, Arians, Traskists, Familists, and some other sorts" of separatists, novelists, and sectaries. It was probably at this time that Trask and his wife (who was a schoolmistress, and refused to teach on Saturday) were brought before the Star-Chamber, where his Judaizing opinions and practices were refuted in a long and learned speech by Bishop Andrews. Trask was put in the pillory, and is said afterwards to have recanted his errors, but Mrs. Trask was imprisoned for as many as fifteen or sixteen years: "her sex," says Fuller, "as pliable to receive as tenacious to retain, had weakness enough to embrace an error, and obstinacy too much to forsake it" [Fuller's Ch. Hist. x. 61]. Of Trask himself it is recorded that he became an Antinomian before his death, and that when he died "at one of his friend's houses, he was by his followers laid in a grave contrary to the manner that other men lie; but before he was covered the master of the house where he died caused him to be taken up and laid in the ordinary way." His widow directed that her body should be buried in an open field, which was done, but this was a not uncommon practice with the extreme Puritans [Pagitt's Heresiography, pp. 163-222, ed. 1662]. The sect of Traskites began to be called Seventh-day men at the end of the century, as is noticed in Chamberlain's "Present State of England for 1702," p. 258.

TRIA CAPITULA. This title is connected with one of those Imperial attempts to bring about the rennion of sects with the Church by means of secular edicts, of which the "Henoticon," "Ecthesis," and "Type," are other conspicuous examples.

The Emperor Justinian having, in the year 542, been shocked by some of the writings of Origen, published an edict, in which nine of the chief Origenist errors were set forth and condemned, Origen himself, though long since dead, being also anathematized. Among the many Origenists of the time was Theodore, the Monophysite Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, who, upon the publication of this edict, devised a plan by which to avenge the memory of Origen, and to strengthen the position of the Monophysites. Having interest at the Imperial Court, he succeeded in persuading the Emperor that the Acephali might be restored to the Church and reconciled to the decrees of Chalcedon, if the writings under three "heads" or "chapters" which he named were condemned, and so ceased to become stumbling-blocks to them by seeming to support the Nestorian heresy. These were [1] the Epistle of Theodoret against the twelve Anathemas of St. Cyril, [2] the Epistle of Ibas of Edessa to Maris, and [3] the works of Theodore of Mopsuestia. As all these writings had carried weight with the Council of Chalcedon, the condemnation of them by Justinian would be, to a certain extent, a repudiation of that council, and so a recognition of the Monophysites condemned by it. Justinian was attracted by the plausible suggestion of reconciling the Acephali to the Church, and, without seeing these consequences, published the Edict of the Three Chapters [A.D. 544], giving a profession of his own faith, and anathematizing the three works above named.

The Emperor's Edict was subscribed by the four Eastern patriarchs; and some bishops who refused to subscribe it were deposed. After some time and much hesitation it was also assented to by Vigilius, Bishop of Rome, a saving clause being added by him, that in doing so he did not condemn the Council of Chalcedon. This assent Vigilius afterwards retracted when he had been excommunicated by a council held at Carthage, and eventually [A.D. 550] he declared the Eastern bishops to be separated from the communion of Rome. The condemnation of the Three Chapters, with a similar reservation respecting the Council of Chalcedon, was however confirmed by the fifth General Council [A.D. 553], the second Council of Constantinople. [Mansi, Concil. ix. 61, 181, 487. Natal. Alex. v. 502.]

TRIFORMIANS. [TRISCILIDÆ.]

TRIPHYSITES. Those divines who, at the fourteenth and fifteenth Councils of Toledo [A.D. 684, 688], carried their opposition to the Monophysites and Monothelites to such an extreme that they declared a belief not only in Christ's distinct Divine and Human natures, but also in a third nature resulting from the union of the two.

TRISACRAMENTARIANS. A controversial name given to those reformers who maintained that there are three Sacraments necessary to salvation, namely, Baptism, the Lord's Supper, and Absolution. This opinion was held by some Lutherans at Leipsic, and was authoritatively set forth as the doctrine of the Church of England in the "Institution of a Christian-Man," which was published in the year 1536.

TRISCILIDÆ. A sect of Sabellian heretics mentioned by Philaster [Hær. xciii.], Augustine [Hær. lxxiv.], and Prædestinatus [Hær. lxxiv.], as maintaining the opinion that the Divine Nature is composed of three parts, one of which is named the Father, the second part the Son, and the third the Holy Ghost; and that the union of these three parts constitutes the Holy Trinity.

In condemning this heresy Philaster uses expressions very similar to some in the Athanasian hymn, "Ergo est vera persona Patris quæ misit Filium, et est vera persona Filii quæ advenit de Patre, et est vera persona Spiritus quæ a Filio et Patre missa est. Trium itaque harum personarum una est veritas, majestas et substantiæ æqualitas et divinitas sempiterna. Qualis est enim immensa et inenarranda Patris persona talis est et Filii, talis est et Sancti Spiritus, ut in distinctione nominum ac trium personarum non sit aliqua naturæ diversitas" [Philaster, Hær. xciii.].

TRITHEISTS. A sect, or more properly speaking, a school of sectarians, which arose among the Monophysites in the sixth century, and whose distinctive dogma was that, instead of there being an Unity of Persons in the Trinity, each Person has a distinct and separate Essence or Substance, though all three Substances are similar to each other.

St. Cyril of Jerusalem attributes the origin of Tritheism in its broadest form to Marcion [Cyr. Hier. Catech. xvi.], and St. Hilary associates it with the heresy of Photinus [Hilar. de Synod. xxii. 56]. Theodoret also mentions it as one of the tenets of the PERATÆ [Theod. Hær. fab. i.]. But although St. Augustine several times uses expressions guarding against the idea that each separate Person is a separate Deity, he does not refer to it as an opinion which had gained any degree of prominence in his time, but rather as one into which there was a danger of falling by recoil from the opposite error of Sabellianism.

The Tritheists of the sixth century did not, however, hold the opinion in its broad form, and would have shrunk from any such statement as that there are three Gods. In their controversies with the orthodox, the Monophysites had learned to study Aristotle and to apply his reasonings respecting human nature to that for which they were not suited, the mystery of the Divine Nature. The first who was thus led on to a philosophical theory of Tritheism is said to have been Ascunages, a learned Monophysite professor at Constantinople, who was banished for his heresy by the Emperor Justinian [Greg. Abulphar. in Asseman. Bibl. Orient. Vatic. i. 328]. His opinions were caught up by one of his Alexandrian pupils, who afterwards received the name of Philoponus from his great industry. [PHILOPONISTS.] With him was associated for many years a Bishop of Tarsus named Conon, who afterwards separated from him on a subtle question respecting the resurrection of the body [CONONISTS], and another named Eugenius.

The error of Philoponus and other Tritheists arose from the Monophysite error itself. To support the latter opinion against the Catholics they maintained that "nature" [φύσις] and "person" [ὑπόστασις] are identical terms, and that each person or nature was possessed of a distinct individuality [αὐτοτελῶς]. Thus, they argued, it could not be truly said there are two natures in Christ, for to say so would be to say that there are two Persons, and therefore two Christs. From this the transition to philosophical Tritheism is inevitable; since, if Personality involves separate Individuality, it involves the consequence that each Person of the Godhead must be distinct from each other Person, and the three Hypostases, being each Divine, cannot be called One God. Such were the opinions maintained by Philoponus and his adherents, and it is clear that they are justly called Tritheists [Philopon. Δαιτηγής, in Joann. Damasc. de Hæres. lxxxiii.; Niceph. Hist. Eccl. xviii. 45; Leont. Byzant. de Sectis, v. ad. fin.].

The Tritheism of the sixth century was revived by Roscellin in the eleventh, and his Nominalistic opinion that the Name God is the abstract idea of a genus containing the three Persons called the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, was opposed by St. Anselm in his treatise "De fide Trinitatis et de Incarnatione Verbi contra blasphemias Rucelini." It was also condemned by the Council of Soissons [A.D. 1092], before whom Roscellin was obliged to declare his recantation.

In the year 1691 the heresy was again revived by Dr. William Sherlock, the father of Bishop Sherlock, and Dean of St. Paul's, in a work entitled "A Vindication of the Doctrine of the Holy and Ever-Blessed Trinity." This was opposed by Dr. South, and a long controversy ensued between the two Divines. In 1695 a sermon was preached before the University of Oxford, in which the preacher maintained the theory of Dr. Sherlock, that "There are three infinite distinct minds and substances in the Trinity," and that "the Three Persons in the Trinity are three distinct infinite minds or spirits, and three individual substances." These propositions were condemned by the authorities of the University as "false, impious, and heretical," and the decree of the heads of houses was made as public as possible. The controversy which followed was of so serious a character that an Order in Council for its suppression was issued on February 3rd, 1695. In this Order, it is directed: "[1] That no preacher whatsoever, in his Sermon or Lecture, do presume to deliver any other doctrine concerning the Blessed Trinity than that which is contained in the Holy Scriptures, and is agreeable to the three Creeds and the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion; [2] That in the explication of this doctrine they carefully avoid all new terms, and confine themselves to such ways of expression as have been commonly used in the Church; [3] That care be taken in this matter especially to observe the fifty-third Canon of this Church, which forbids public opposition between preachers, and that above all things they abstain from bitter invectives and scurrilous language against all persons whatsoever; [4] That the foregoing directions be also observed by those who write anything concerning the said doctrine." At the same time measures were taken to suppress the publication of Antitrinitarian books, which seem to have flowed from the press abundantly in the course of the controversy. [Cardwell's Docum. Ann. ii. 339.]

In the last century the speculations of Hutchinson led him to adopt a theory respecting the personality in the Divine Essence which he based upon the analogy and correlation of fire, light, and air [HUTCHINSONIANS], and which was very nearly similar in its logical consequences to that of the older Tritheists.

TROPICI. Those who explain away, by figurative interpretations, texts of Scripture which Catholic faith and tradition require to be otherwise interpreted. Athanasius gives the name Tropici to the Pneumatomachi in so marked a manner that it has narrowly escaped becoming a proper name of that sect [Athanas. ad Serap. i. 2, 10, 21]. For example, they argued that in 1 Tim. v. 21, the name of the Holy Spirit would naturally follow the Names of Father and Son, that the term "elect angels," tropically taken, includes the Holy Spirit, the inference being that the Holy Spirit is a created angel. The word Tropici has been used again by Catholic writers to describe those who err regarding the Holy Sacraments, and explain as mere figure the words of our Lord in John iii. 5, Matt. xxvi. 26. It is not our province to enter into the subject of the interpretation of Scripture, and it is sufficient therefore to observe that figurative interpretations are a common resource of heretics, who reject or undervalue the office of the Church as the guardian of truth and interpreter of Scripture, and consequently make light of the tradition and consensus of Catholic doctors. "Ita semper hæretici, aut nudas et simplices voces conjecturis quo volunt rapiunt; aut rursus conditionales et rationales, simplicitatis conditione dissolvunt" [Tertull. adv. Marc. iv. 19].

TROPITÆ. Heretics who held that our Lord acquired a body of flesh by conversion of the substance of the Godhead into the substance of flesh: an opinion which arose in the latter time of the Arian controversy among those who, maintaining the true divinity of the Son of God, and rightly desiring to maintain His sinlessness, were perplexed by the erroneous assumption that the human body, as such, is and cannot but be the seat of sin. To avoid the impiety of attributing a sinful body to our Lord, they devised the tenet that the body of Christ is consubstantial with His divinity, which passes into the somewhat more definite proposition that the substance of the Word is converted into the substance of flesh, and that the flesh being in the form of man is thus called human.

This heresy was first dealt with by Athanasius in his Epistle to Epictetus, A.D. 370. Troubles had been caused in Achaia by men who denied the perfect manhood of Christ. Epictetus, Bishop of Corinth, requested Athanasius to answer them, and the answer is directed against the present heresy. Epiphanius, who quotes the letter at full length, introduces it by stating that Apollinaris of Laodiceæ was at the head of those who denied the true Incarnation of Christ, and that among them there was a great variety of opinions. He distinguishes those who held the consubstantiality of the Divine nature and of the flesh of our Lord from those who denied His assumption of a human soul, clearly implying that the two heresies were not at first held concurrently by the same party. Apollinaris was the main assertor of the general proposition that the Son of God did not assume that which in man is the seat of sin, and varied applications of this proposition were made by his followers. Athanasius deals with one of them without naming Apollinaris. [APOLLINARIANS.] Athanasius states his subject thus: Ποῖος αὐτοῦ ἐξερεύσατο, ὁμοούσιον εἰπεῖν τὸ ἐκ Μαρίας σῶμα τῇ τοῦ λόγου θεότητι; ἢ ὅτι ὁ λόγος εἰς σάρκα καὶ ὁστᾶ καὶ τρίχας καὶ ὅλον σῶμα μεταβέβηται, καὶ ἡλλάγη τῆς ἰδίας φύσεως; He shews that this tenet makes the very nature of the Godhead passible, since it asserts the body which suffered to be consubstantial with the divinity: that it introduces a fourth Person into the Trinity, and makes the whole Godhead consubstantial with a body stated to be human: that it declares the Son to take on Him not the seed of Abraham, but His own Divine Nature: that it annuls the office and prerogative of Mary. [Epiph. Hær. lxxvii.]

In the two books "Contra Apollinarium" Athanasius distinguishes the several heresies [i. 2, ii. 18], and regarding the present heresy dwells on the immutability of the Uncreated Essence. A belief in the possibility of the conversion of the Godhead into flesh almost necessarily presupposes the reception of the Cabbalistic doctrine that all matter is an emanation from God. And Athanasius remarks, as if leading us to the source of the present heresy, that Valentinus fancied the flesh to be a part of Deity, and so concluded that the Passion was common to the whole Trinity [ibid. ii. 3]. This brings us to Tertullian's tract "De Carne Christi," which was written to defend the reality of Christ's Body against Marcion, Apelles, Basilides, and Valentinus. Of these, the opinion of Valentinus alone concerns the present question. He held that Christ's flesh was of a spiritual substance or nature. "Licuit et Valentino ex privilegio hæretico, carnem Christi spiritalem comminisci" [Tertull. de Carne Chr. xv.]. This general assertion the Tropitæ defined in the highest possible sense. Athanasius, as we have seen, represents them as using the word ὁμοούσιος of the two substances. "Tropitæ sunt qui dicunt conversum verbum in carnem," is Philaster's definition [Philast. Hær. lxx.]. The conception of consubstantiality is necessary for the conception of the conversion. Fabricius remarks that the heresy is confuted by Tertullian. Athanasius and Tertullian give the two branches of the argument in opposition, the former shewing the absurdities of the statement, the latter proving the true human nature of the Body of Christ. The Council of Chalcedon determined that the two Natures in Christ are united ἀτρέπτως.

TUMBLERS. [TUNKERS.]

TUNKERS. A sect of American Baptists, originally founded by some German emigrants early in the eighteenth century. They take their name from the German word "Tunken," to dip, and hence "Tunkers," or as sometimes erroneously spelt "Dunkers," simply means "Dippers," or those who baptize by immersion: but it is alleged that the sect originated in Germany about 1708, independently of the Mennonites, although both were comprehended in the name "Die Täufer." The Tunkers are also called "Tumblers," a piece of American slang signifying the gesture made by the baptized as they kneel in the water and dip their heads in the act of baptism. But the name which they assume for themselves is that of "Brethren."

The Tunkers of America were an offshoot of a Baptist community at Schwartzenu, on the bank of the river Eder, in Germany, some members of which emigrated to America under the leadership of Conrad Peysel and others about the year 1719. Peysel afterwards separated from the rest and formed a peculiar settlement at "Ephrata," in Lancaster county, about fifty miles from Philadelphia. Here he and his companions built a town in the form of a triangle, having a large orchard in the midst, and being surrounded by a belt of mulberry and apple trees. There they dwelt in wooden houses of three storeys height, which were each a kind of monastery. They dressed very much in the style of monks and nuns, men and women lived under different roofs, used a vegetable diet, and practised considerable mortification. Marriage was not forbidden among them: but when couples were married they were required to remove from Ephrata. Settlements were thus formed by the emigration of married Tunkers to other parts of the United States, and they are now found to the number of eight thousand or nine thousand in Virginia, New England, Maryland, Ohio, and Indiana, as well as in Pennsylvania.

The Tunkers still maintain some of their original character, but they have now an organized ministry of unpaid "bishops," "teachers" and "deacons," whereas formerly their religious services were conducted on the principle of the Quakers. They dress in a similar way to the Quakers, and like them refuse to take oaths or to engage in military or naval service. As a rule they hold their religious meetings in private houses, but meeting-houses are beginning to appear among them. Among their religious observances are "Love-feasts" similar to those held by the Methodists: and they also, as do the older Mennonites or FLEMINGS, maintain the custom of the Lavipedium, or ceremonial washing of one another's feet; a custom generally observed on Maundy Thursday in mediæval times in all monastic communities, and by English sovereigns until the Revolution. The Tunkers also anoint their sick with oil as a means of recovery, and generally discard the assistance of medical men and the use of medicine. Some among them are also Sabbatarians in the strict sense, observing the Sabbath or Saturday as their day of rest instead of Sunday or the Lord's Day.

The Tunkers, like the Quakers, represent those early and rigid sectarians of the Sub-Reformation period who in England acquired the name of Puritans. But unlike the warlike Puritans and the pugnacious Quakers, the Tunkers have always kept strictly aloof from war and politics, and have retained a name which was given to them at first, that of "The Harmless People."

TURLUPINS. The French name for the BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT. The origin of the word is unknown: though it is thought to be connected with wolfish or predatory habits. The Turlupins appear to have had their principal seat in the Isle of France, where they were exterminated A.D. 1372. [Mosheim, de Beghard. p. 413.]

TURNERITES. [SOUTHCOTTIANS.]

TYPE. An edict promulgated by the Emperor Constans [A.D. 648] under the title of the Formula of the Faith [τύπος τῆς πίστεως], with the intention of quieting the Monothelite controversy, and especially of setting aside the Imperial Edict called the ECTHESIS, in which the Monothelite heresy had been dogmatically maintained. The text of this document will be found in Harduin's Concilia, iii. 823. It did not contain any statement of doctrine, but simply forbade all discussion on the Monothelite dogma of one will in Christ on the one hand, or on the orthodox doctrine of two wills on the other. The publication of the Type was, however, considered as an attempt to suppress the defence of Catholic doctrine, and it was condemned with the Ecthesis by one hundred and six bishops in the Lateran Council [A.D. 649]. For thus causing the condemnation of an Imperial Edict the Bishop of Rome, Martin I., was arrested, and exiled by the Emperor Constans to the island of Maxia, where he died shortly afterwards. [MONOTHELITES.]

U

UBIQUITARIANS. A school of Protestant Divines, who promulgated the opinion that the Body of Christ is everywhere by reason of its union with His Divine Nature; and that thus it is present in the Holy Eucharist. This opinion had been entertained by some of Luther's Protestant coadjutors, although he himself indignantly repudiated it. It originated with Brentzen, a canon of Wittenberg, about A.D. 1525 [de Personali Unione, etc., Brentii Opp. viii. 831]; but it was not embodied in any public document until the "Formula of Concord" was drawn up at Bergen in A.D. 1577, when it became recognised as a doctrine of the Lutheran Confession. The doctrine again became a subject of controversy early in the seventeenth century between the Divines of Tübingen and Giessen, the former supporting the Ubiquitarian theory, and the latter opposing it with great energy. The controversy was carried on by many publications on either side, and drew out more minute and speculative definitions than have been drawn out by that on Transubstantiation. The Ubiquitarians are strong opponents of the Calvinistic and Zwinglian theories of the Holy Eucharist, and their dogma is in fact a revulsion from them. [Cramer, Enchirid. controvers. Ubiquit. 1613. Dorner's Person of Christ, II. ii. 280, sqq. 422.]

UCKEWALLISTS. One of the sects into which the Old Flemings, or Strict Anabaptist followers of Menno, divided. They took their name from Uke Walles, a Frieslander, who, although a very illiterate man, gathered a party around him, intent upon keeping up the severe discipline of the original Mennonites. In the year 1637 he also began, in conjunction with a companion named John Lens, to propagate a doctrine of Universalism, grounded on the dogma that even Judas might hope for salvation. He was excommunicated by the Mennonites of Gröningen, and banished from the city by its magistrates, but settled down in East Friesland. His peculiar opinion respecting Judas does not seem to have been adopted by his followers, and after his death they ceased to retain his name as a badge of separation, and have not since been distinguished from the body of the Old Flemings.

ULSTER, REMONSTRANT SYNOD OF. An Unitarian secession from the Presbyterian body in Ulster, which under the leadership of seventeen ministers formed itself into a separate community in the year 1830.

ULSTER, SYNOD OF. The chief body of Presbyterians in the North of Ireland. [PRESBYTERIANS.]

ULTRAMONTANISTS. Those who recognise the Papal claim of supremacy over every part of the Church of Christ, as well as over every sovereign within its boundaries: and also that of the Pope's personal Infallibility.

Ultramontanism dates from Gregory VII. [Hildebrand, A.D. 1073-85], who propounded the following claims: "Quod solus Papa possit uti imperialibus insigniis;—quod solius Papæ pedes omnes principes deosculentur;—quod illi liceat Imperatores deponere;—quod a fidelitate iniquorum subjectos potest absolvere." These views are principally maintained in the Italian peninsula, but it is the tone generally adopted by English Seceders. It is not held that the Pope is nothing without the Church; but that the Church is nothing without the Pope. Without revelation there is no religion; without a Church revelation has no meaning; without a Pope the Church has no existence [Carové]. The free action of national churches is wholly superseded by such pretensions. The theory has apparently grown up from the feudal relations of the Papacy as a temporal power. Though it took its rise under Hildebrand, it did not attain its full development till the fifteenth century [Fleury, Hist. Eccl. xciii. 15]. But an assertion of authority so incompatible with Catholic liberty has naturally aroused opposition on this side of the Alps, in the Gallican and German Churches, and in the Swiss cantons. Works written in defence of national liberties and ecclesiastical independence have usually obtained a place in the Index Expurgatorius: and the Ultramontane tone of the present day is far in advance of the Romanist writers of the Reformation period.

Bellarmino's statements are important as regards Papal Infallibility. He sets forth the opinion of Divines in four several propositions: [1] That "the Roman Pontiff ruling any point, even in an Œcumenical Council, may be guilty of heresy and of teaching others heresy; which has de facto happened." This he says is flatly heretical; [2] That "the Roman Pontiff may be heretical and teach heresy, if he rule anything apart from synodical assistance, and this has nappened de facto." He quotes various writers who maintain that infallibility of judgment in matters of faith is vested not in the Pope, but only in the Church or in a General Council. This opinion, he says, strictly speaking, is not heretical, because many who hold this opinion are still tolerated in the Church. [3] That "the Pope cannot in any way be heretical, nor teach heresy publicly, even though he rule any point on his own responsibility alone:" this opinion he states to be probable though not certain. [4] That "whether the Pope can be heretical or no, he can rule nothing heretical, as a point to be believed by the whole Church;" which is the common opinion of nearly all Catholics, as Thomas Aq. Sec. Sec. qu. 1, art. 10, Cajetan, Eckius, Melchior Canus, etc. This fourth opinion "certissima est et asserenda" [de Rom. Pont. iv. 2]. Jeremy Taylor argues from the date of the authorities, chiefly Gallican doctors, cited under [2], that for more than a thousand years from the foundation of the Church it knew nothing of Papal infallibility. Bellarmine limits his view to the fourth opinion, expressed in the thesis: "The Pope, when he teaches the whole Church, can in no case err in matters pertaining to the faith." This is proved, he says, from the prayer of our Lord for St. Peter, that his "faith fail not" [Luke xxii. 31, 32]; though it is explained in three several ways: as by Gallican divines of the entire Church, or of St. Peter as representative of the whole Church; and accordingly it was vouchsafed to the Church that its faith should never fail. To this he objects, that the words of our Lord are applicable, according to their grammatical construction, to St. Peter alone; and whereas it is said "Satan hath desired to sift you" [plur. uôs], the prayer is restricted personally to St. Peter, "I have prayed for thee." He disposes also of a second opinion that the Saviour alluded only to the grace of perseverance; and settles down on a third, viz. that our Lord, as Mediator, obtained for Peter two privileges: [1] That he might "never" fall from the faith, however tempted of Satan, which is somewhat more than the grace of perseverance, and involves unbroken continuity of steadfastness, as well as final persistence; and [2] that he, as Pontiff, might never teach anything contrary to the faith; or in other words, that none of his successors in the see should teach anything contrary to the faith. The first privilege, he says, may have pertained to the Apostle alone, and not have descended to successors; the second certainly did so descend.

Bellarmino, as the mouthpiece of that which is now termed Ultramontanism, makes infallibility in matters of doctrine the personal attribute of the Pope. According to the Gallican view, it is the consent of the Church that is the "vis viva" of the Pope's decision, while he himself is its mouthpiece; and embodies every promise that had ever been made to the Church in its collective capacity. Even Bellarmine, however, contemplates cases in which it may be lawful for temporal princes to offer both active and passive resistance to illegal and violent acts on the part of the Pope: "Itaque sicut licet resistere Pontifici invadenti corpus, ita licet resistere invadenti animas vel turbanti Rem publicam, et multo magis si Ecclesiam destruere videretur. Licet, inquam, ei resistere, non faciendo quod jubet, et impediendo ne exsequatur voluntatem suam . . . vide de hac re Cajetanum Tr. de Auct. Papæ et Concilii 27, et Johannem de Turrecremata ii. 106" [de Rom. Pont. ii. 29, 30].

Among modern assertors of the Ultramontane theory the most strenuous are English Romanists, especially neophytes; among Continental writers are Bishop Ziegler, Das Katholische Glaubensprincip; Carové, Die alleinseigmachende Kirche; also Der Papst im Verhältniss zum Katholicismus; and the Abbé Lamennais, who strenuously asserted the independence of the Church in its relations with the State in his journal l'Avenir.

But the work that has done more than any other to give a scientific character and a lasting influence to Ultramontanism is Möhler's Symbolik, which first appeared A.D. 1832, and has since spread throughout Europe and America in rapidly recurring editions. Of all the theologians of the Roman Communion Möhler was the best versed in Protestant literature; and none was more competent than he to attack the principles of philosophical Protestantism as developed in the school of Schleiermacher. He casts the apple of discord among the rival sects of Protestantism by exhibiting to the light, like Bossuet, but with infinitely greater skill, the variations of Protestantism; and he shews so clearly the superiority of Catholic over Protestant principle as to make the reader wonder how the latter could for a moment stand in presence of the former. Absolute truth, as he makes it appear, is on the one side, unmitigated error on the other. This book first sounded the advance to the Ultramontane party, which for some time rolled on without a serious discouragement or a check.

Thus, when Pius IX. succeeded to the Papal throne, A.D. 1846, just three centuries after the assembly of the Council of Trent, the way had been prepared for the onward march of spiritual pretension. The "cultus" due to the Virgin seemed to occupy the new Pope's whole attention; and before the first year of his pontificate was over, the Jesuit Perrone dedicated to him a treatise on the question, whether the Immaculate Conception were not a doctrine that might be formally confirmed to the Church by a dogmatic decree. A.D. 1849, a Papal brief was circulated throughout the Churches of the Roman Communion, to feel the pulse as it were, to ascertain how the Church stood affected towards a final and authoritative decision of the question. Appearances being propitious, a number of bishops favourable to the promulgation of the dogma were assembled to advise with the Pope, not as to the truth of the dogma, which was a foregone conclusion, but whether or not the proper time had come for action. The new dogma was pronounced by them infallible [A.D. 1854], and all present solemnly did homage to the Holy See thus fortified by a dogma the first germ of which was laid in the darker ages of the Church. The assembly consisted of 53 cardinals, 43 archbishops, and 100 bishops. It may be noted that this was the individual act of the Pope, per se; there was no synodal authority, and the bishops present had been picked out for their known opinions. Yet the decree was accepted by the Church at large with a jubilant enthusiasm; medals were struck and festivals organized in commemoration of the act.

The history of the next high venture of Ultramontaniam, the promulgation [A.D. 1870] of the dogma of Papal Infallibility, with its antecedent stormy discussions and subsequent remonstrances, is still to be written. It is sufficient to say that it has aroused serious opposition. Hefele, Bishop of Rothenberg, the most learned prelate of the Roman Communion, the heroic Dupanloup, Bishop of Orleans, and the accomplished divine, Professor Dollinger, are in the front rank of the opposition. [OLD CATHOLICS.]

UMBILICANISM. [HESYCHASTS.]

UNIATES. Eastern Christians in external communion with the See of Rome; some being seceders from the orthodox Eastern Churches, and others from the Nestorian and Jacobite communities.

The efforts which had been made at the Councils of Lyons [A.D. 1274] and Florence [A.D. 1439] to restore external communion between Eastern and Western Christendom were renewed by the Jesuits after the Council of Trent on the border-land which divides the two, and where fusion seemed most practicable, in the then great kingdom of Poland. Sigismund III. was a Roman Catholic, elected to the crown of Poland as the grandson of Sigismund I., but carrying with him to Poland the results of an education in Western Europe, being the son of John III. of Sweden and of Catharine, daughter of Sigismund I. He became King of Poland in A.D. 1587 at the age of twenty-one, when he was impressible enough to be a zealous agent of the Jesuits Possevin and Scarga who accompanied him to his new country. Under their advice he at once began to take measures for reconciling the Polish Church to Rome, and won over some of the bishops to their plans. In the year 1590 these plans were sufficiently matured to be brought before the clergy and the influential nobility. The Archbishop of Kieff, therefore, at the king's request, summoned a synod of his clergy at Brest, in Lithuania, to whom he represented the necessity of a union with Rome, and the advantages which would thereby accrue to their country and to their Church; and, indeed, it was certainly not only more flattering to the self-love of the clergy, but even more congenial to the feelings of the more intelligent of them, to depend upon the head of the Western Church, who was surrounded by all the prestige that wealth and power can give, and whose authority, supported by men of the most eminent talents and learning, was acknowledged by powerful and civilized nations, than on the patriarch of Constantinople, the slave of an infidel sovereign, by whose appointment he held his dignity, and presiding over a church degraded by gross ignorance and superstition. The project found much favour with the clergy, but met with a strong opposition from the laity, and could not at that time be carried into effect. The king, still persevering in his intentions, bestowed all the patronage at his disposal on the Romanizing clergy, and discouraged the national party by every means in his power. The two Jesuits also worked towards the same end, and succeeded in winning over to the king's side so many of the bishops, that it was considered safe to summon another synod. It met at the same place as before on December 2nd, 1594, and the two Jesuits were permitted to take part in its deliberations. After some discussion the archbishop and several bishops were persuaded to give their assent to the scheme of union which had been proposed at the Council of Florence, thus recognising the "Filioque" or double procession of the Nicene Creed, and acknowledging the supremacy of the Pope. They stood out, however, for retaining the use of the vernacular Slavonic in the celebration of Divine service, and for the ritual as well as the discipline of the Eastern Church. Two bishops were sent to announce this event at Rome, where they were received with great distinction by Pope Clement VIII. After their return to Poland the king, in 1596, ordered the convocation of a synod for the publication and introduction of the union. It assembled again at Brest; and the Archbishop of Kieff, as well as the other prelates who had subscribed to that union, made a solemn proclamation of this act, addressed thanks to the Almighty for having brought back the stray sheep into the pale of his Church. They also excommunicated all those who opposed the union. The opposite party, including many of the clergy and the principal men among the nobility, with Constantine Ostrogski, Palatine of Kieff, at their head, met this by a public protest, in which they repudiated the acts of the Uniates, and declared their unaltered attachment to the ancient Church of their country and to the Patriarch of Constantinople, whom they acknowledged for their ecclesiastical head.

Sigismund followed up this reconciliation of Lithuania to Rome by depriving the opposite party of their churches and convents, and by forbidding, under severe penalties, the propagation of Greek doctrines throughout his dominions; and he became sanguine of extending the union with Rome till it comprehended the whole of the Eastern Church. The rest of his reign was so occupied with disastrous wars that he was unable to carry his designs any further. But the Uniates still maintained their ground, and thus the Church of Little Russia was divided into two communions, each retaining the rites and doctrines of Eastern Christendom, but the one acknowledging for its patriarchal head the Patriarch of Constantinople, the other the Bishop of Rome. This division of the Church continued in full force until the partition of Poland in the year 1772. At that time between two and three millions of the Uniates gave up their allegiance to Rome and returned to full communion with the Orthodox Eastern Churches. In 1839 two millions more were reconciled. But there are still about 300,000 in Russia and 3,000,000 in Austria. [Krasinski's Reform. in Poland; Mouravieff's Hist. of the Church of Russia; Neale's Patriarchate of Alexandria.] The other Eastern communities in union with the Roman See are not sufficiently important to be noticed in any detail. They are chiefly among the Nestorians of Syria, the Bulgarians, and the Christians of St. Thomas at Malabar.

UNIONITÆ. [SABELLIANS.]

UNITARIANS. The term Unitarian may be used of all who, while denying the distinction of Persons in the Godhead, affirm that they only hold in its true sense the Monarchia, the Unity of God. The course of Unitarianism, therefore, in this comprehensive sense, may be traced in the present work in the articles MONARCHIANS, ANTITRINITARIANS, SOCINIANS, ending with the present article. Modern Unitarians, the school of Priestley, who are principally of England and America, are the successors rather than the lineal descendants of the Socinians. The separate congregations of Socinians in England, which were never numerous, died out by the end of the seventeenth century; the Unitarian sect was formed out of the Arianism floating in the Church and in dissent. This Arianism sprung from the Dutch Remonstrant theology, which was largely studied in England. [ARMINIANISM.] Historically, Arminianism has led to Arianism, and thence to Socinianism and Unitarianism. "A Socinian tincture is known to have infected the party with which Episcopius was connected; which in Gerard Vorstius, almost at the commencement, broke out in offensive manifestations; and which brought some of its leading men (for example Grotius, Le Clerc, Wetstein) into such dangerous proximity to the Racovian school on several important points, that they were ever incurring the suspicion of actually belonging to it. Certainly Episcopius, in adopting his position," that the divine filiation of Christ is not de fide, "took the ground which was first formally propounded by the Racovian divines, and which afterwards received its most elaborate defence from the pen of an avowed Socinian, Dr. Zwicker of Dantzic."¹ The working of this theology soon shewed itself. In the year 1691 appeared Dr. Bury's "Naked Gospel." The book was publicly burnt and the writer expelled the University of Oxford.

In 1708 Whiston published his Essay upon the Apostolical Constitutions, to prove that the Eusebian, or commonly called Arian, doctrine, was the doctrine of the primitive Church. This had been the object of Bury's treatise, and of other treatises by followers of Zwicker, against whom Bull had, in 1703, written his "Primitiva Traditio." From this time Whiston lost no opportunity of propagating his opinions, but controversy collected itself chiefly around the writings of a man of far higher powers—an antagonist "dignus quocum contendat Achilles"—Samuel Clarke. In 1712 Clarke published his "Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity." A controversy immediately ensued between him and Wells, Nelson, Gastrell and others. Whitby wrote on Clarke's side, and replied also to Bull. Convocation then interposed, and the controversy became extremely voluminous, the most noticeable writers on Clarke's side being Whitby and Emlyn, against him Welchman, Nelson, Bennett, and Waterland.² On the Antitrinitarian side some of the disputants held Arian, some Socinian principles.³ The controversy was renewed with greater warmth when the Bishop of London in 1718 forbade the Arian alteration of the Doxology which had been introduced at St. James's, Westminster [compare Sozom. H. E. iii. 20; Theod. H. E. ii. 24].

No less voluminous was the controversy among the dissenters. It began with the resolution of the ministers of Devonshire and Cornwall to impose a test concerning our Lord's Divinity. This was done to detect the opinions of Pierce and Hallett of Exeter, who were said to be Arians.⁴ Pierce was ejected in 1719. The matter was laid before the whole body of dissenting ministers which met at Salter's Hall, and it was carried by four votes that there should not be a particular declaration of faith in the Holy Trinity, in the advices under consideration for Exeter. Appeal was made in print to Hoadly, ² An Account of the considerable Books and Pamphlets in the controversy concerning the Trinity was published in 1720.

³ The Representation of the State of Religion, adopted unanimously by a Committee of both Houses of Convocation but rejected by the Upper House, states: "Adversaries arose who scattered the poison of Arian and Socinian heresies through all parts of this kingdom. The doctrine of a Trinity of Persons in the Unity of the Godhead was then denied and scoffed at; the satisfaction made for the sins of mankind by the precious blood of Christ was renounced and exploded; the ancient creeds of the Church were represented as unwarrantable impositions. . . . A religious assembly was set up where divine worship was publicly performed in a way agreeable to the principles of the Unitarians, and weekly sermons were preached in defence of them." This assembly was understood to be Emlyn's, held after his return from Ireland [see a tract, The Nation vindicated from the Aspersions, etc., part ii. p. 12]. The representation drawn up by the Upper House contained a paragraph almost identical with the former of the two quoted, but had no mention of Emlyn's lecture. These representations are of considerable interest in the Church history of the time. They were published by Bowyer, London, 1711—the former of them, with an amendment of the Lower House about the "damnable doctrine of resistance" (which is not in Atterbury's draft), in History of Parliament and Convocation, 1711, by W. P.

and his authority quoted to shew that framing and imposing of creeds was mere Popery. Several other dissenting preachers were dismissed by their congregations about the same time [Calamy's Life, ii. 403; Chandler's Hist. of Persecution, p. 352]. Blackburne's Inquiry into the right of establishing systematic confessions of faith and doctrine [The Confessional, 1766], and the public movement of the Feathers Tavern petition [A.D. 1772] were an attempt to allow Arianism and Socinianism in the Church. Blackburne was certainly an Antitrinitarian, though of what particular form it is difficult to say [Confessional, 2nd ed. p. 359; Ridley's Third Letter, p. 32]. His conscience, however, was not one to do him harm, and he retained his preferment in the Church.¹ But some clergy were more honest. Lindsey resigned Catterick in 1773, and opened a conventicle in Essex Street, London. Jebb gave up his preferment and turned physician. Disney resigned Swinderby in 1782, and became Lindsey's colleague in Essex Street. Several other clergy left the Church about the same time, and celebrated Unitarian worship after Dr. Clarke's Reformed Liturgy in their private houses [Hist. View, pp. 498, 515, 542, 556]. From the gathering of this congregation in Essex Street is to be dated Unitarianism in England. Its leading men, who did for Unitarianism what Faustus Socinus did for Socinianism, were Priestley and Belsham. Priestley, whose parents were orthodox dissenters, became an Arian, a Socinian, and lastly a Unitarian. Belsham also was of a dissenting family. He appears to have stepped at once from Calvinism to Unitarianism. Priestley was but a sciolist in history and criticism. Belsham was at least more cautious in his statement of doctrines; but the Improved Version of the New Testament, published in 1808, was easily shewn by Nares, Rennell and Laurence to be full of mistakes and falsifications. Belsham's Calm Inquiry, published in 1811, is the ablest work of modern Unitarianism, and may be taken as a standard of Unitarian doctrine.

Unitarians reject, out of the Socinian creed, the miraculous Conception of our Lord, His personal Ascension into Heaven after His Baptism to be instructed in His office, and His worship. The atonement of Christ's death they utterly deny; Christ died, they say, simply as a martyr to the truth. Jesus and His Apostles were supernaturally instructed for their office, that is, to reveal and prove the doctrine of eternal life. The inspiration of the Scriptures is denied. They allow that Christ was raised from the dead; and that He is, in some undefined sense, appointed to judge the world, but with no other power than can properly be assigned to a human being. In short, their religion is a religion of ethics, without a sense of the "sinfulness of sin," and without a Saviour.

It is the boast of the Unitarians that they have no standards of faith or tests of orthodoxy, which means only that they have no faith to maintain. The latitude of the earlier sect in the application of their fundamental principle, the unity of God, is illustrated by the extraordinary fact, brought to notice by Leslie, denied by Priestley, but verified by Horsley, that in the reign of Charles II. formal proposals of mutual recognition and friendly counsel were made by some Socinians to the ambassador of the Emperor of Morocco, on the ground that both held substantially the same belief. The Mahometan was more honest than the Unitarian, and refused to fraternize. Horsley found the original Epistle in the Lambeth Library [Horsley, Tracts in Controversy with Priestley, 1812, App. p. 589, and the references there given]. This sect, as has been shewn, was formed out of the Arians who had been engendered in the Church and in dissent. Their places of worship were principally Presbyterian chapels, foundations of the Nonconformists and later Puritans. [PRESBYTERIANS.] [See Manchester Socinian Controversy, App. i.] In the census of 1851 returns were received from 229 congregations in England and Wales. The Unitarian Calendar for 1871 gives about 380 congregations and mission stations. The same authority states that in America there are 335 societies, with 306 ministers: in Transylvania 106 congregations, with 50,000 members.

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. A

sect of Germans formed in America by William Otterbein, an emigrant of the Reformed Lutheran sect, in the year 1755. Being appointed as pastor of a congregation at Lancaster in Pennsylvania, Otterbein was impressed with a desire to unite the members of different sects in one body, the terms of communion with which should be of a less severe doctrinal kind than those customary among Lutheran and Calvinist sects, and based more upon personal convictions of religion. Several congregations of this broad kind were established in the states of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia—the Lutherans, the Reformed Lutherans, the Mennonites contributing members from their respective bodies, and a few Methodists also joining them; and conferences of their ministers were held at Baltimore in the year 1789. In the following year Otterbein and a coadjutor named Martin Beehm were appointed "superintendents," an office intended to be equivalent to that of bishops. It was agreed at first that a wide liberty as to doctrines and rites should be allowed, but before long it was found necessary to restrict this freedom, and at a conference held at Mount Pleasant, Pennsylvania, in the year 1815, a "confession" was drawn up according to the usual custom of Protestant sects. The subsequent form into which the sect settled was very similar to that of the Moravians, and when the use of the German language was discontinued in their chapels the number of their members increased considerably. In the year 1871 they were said to number 82,000.

UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH. An union of the Lutherans and the "Reformed" (or Calvinists), forming the largest of the three branches into which the Protestants of Germany are divided.

A voluntary Union of the two communities was established in some parts of South Prussia about the beginning of the nineteenth century, and in the year 1805 it had extended to many congregations, especially at Cologne, Würzburg, and Munich. In 1810, King Frederick William took up the subject of union warmly, and issued an exhortation, which had the effect of promoting it greatly in Nassau and some other places. After his visit to England with the other allied Sovereigns in 1814, he drew up, chiefly with his own hands, a Liturgy, which was adopted in the Royal Chapel, and authorized for use elsewhere.¹ This step was followed by a royal proclamation, dated September 27th, 1817, in which the King declared his wish that the Lutherans and the Reformed throughout his dominions should be united in one community, and expressing his intention to set the example by taking part in an united celebration of the Holy Communion in the Royal Chapel at Potsdam on October 31st, the occasion of the Tercentenary of the Reformation. A few days afterwards, on October 1st, 1817, a synod assembled at Breslau, and subsequently one assembled at Berlin, readily adopted the proclamation, as did most of the ministers and laity throughout Prussia; the basis of the union being understood to be entirely governmental and ritual, all questions of doctrine being left as they had stood before. On the day mentioned by the King, October 31st, 1817, the people and ministers very generally followed his example, and thus the popular assent was given to the movement. Not long afterwards it was ordered that the distinctive names "Lutheran" and "Reformed" should be disused in all official documents, and the United Evangelical Church alone recognised as the national religion.

Notwithstanding a strong opposition from the Lutheran party, which was led by Harms, a pastor of Kiel (who published ninety-four "Theses" against the Union in imitation of Luther), the United Evangelical Church soon spread beyond the boundaries of Prussia. It was adopted in Nassau, Hanover and Bavaria in 1818, in Baden in 1821, in Hesse Cassel in 1822, and in Württemberg in 1827; but some of the States where Lutheranism was predominant declined to admit the change, nor did it extend either to Lutheran Austria on the one hand or to Calvinistic Switzerland on the other. Although, moreover, there was a nominal union in most parts of Prussia, the revised Service Book which the King set forth in 1821 was rejected by many congregations, and uniformity was far from being established even within the bounds of the united body.

On June 25th, 1830, at the celebration of the Tercentenary of the Augsburg Confession, the King directed that the Service Book (which had recently undergone a fresh revision) should be used in all churches; but a number of the Lutheran clergy refused to adopt it and were suspended, some of them, and some even of the laity, being treated with great severity, and imprisoned as criminals. The persecution of the Lutheran party was at length carried so far that the King proclaimed all Lutheran worship to be forbidden by the laws, and refused any toleration whatever to those who still adhered to the old communion, the greatest severities being shewn in Silesia and in the Grand Duchy of Posen, where the predominating influence was strongly opposed to the new Church.

This persecution of the "Old Lutherans" was kept up until the death of Frederick William. He was succeeded by his pietistic son of the same name in 1840, and while a milder policy was introduced at once, in 1845 the Old Lutherans were allowed to organize themselves into a separate community, recognised and tolerated by the State, but not receiving any part of the funds appropriated to the support of public religion. UNITED FREE CHURCH METHODISTS.
[METHODISTS.]

UNITED ORIGINAL SECEDERS. This small body is the legitimate representative in Scotland of the first Secession Synod, which was formed in 1733, and was constituted in 1840 by the union of the remnants (with the exception of two congregations) of the two parties of BURGHERS and ANTIBURGHERS, which had not been absorbed into the Kirk of Scotland on the one hand, or into the United Secession (now the UNITED PRESBYTERIANS) on the other. Many of the congregations were however at that time in a very weak condition, and appear soon to have ceased to exist, so that while in 1839 there were forty-one Burgher and thirty-five Seceding congregations in Scotland, and seven Burgher congregations in Ireland, there were in 1844 only thirty-nine of the united congregations remaining in Scotland, and three in the sister kingdom; and in 1852, out of thirty-six congregations then remaining fifteen were united to the Free Church. At the present time there appear to be twenty-seven congregations in existence, and the preliminaries have been arranged for union with a small body in Ireland holding identical views, and entitled the Associate Secession Synod, which consists of eleven congregations.

The Original Seceders have continued consistently to maintain the views upon which the Secession was at its origin based. They strongly vindicate the duty and necessity of national religion, and are therefore in favour of national establishments in opposition to the United Presbyterians and other advocates of the Voluntary system. They are consequently also opposed to schemes for reunion among all Presbyterians, as these would involve an allowance of Voluntaryism in making the principle of Establishment an open question. But their Establishment must be one which is based upon the Solemn League and Covenant, which were declared to be binding at the union of the two bodies in 1840, and in 1866 were solemnly renewed by the Synod. They are Calvinists of the strictest type, holding the doctrine of a limited Atonement, that Christ suffered only for the elect. They are opposed to the use of hymns and instrumental music in public worship. The Original Secession Magazine, a periodical which appears once in two months, is the authorized record of the views and proceedings of the Synod. [Orig. Secession Magazine. Oliver and Boyd's Edinb. Almanac.]

UNITED PRESBYTERIANS. A body composed of two sects of Scottish Dissenters, the Secession or Associate Synod, and the Relief Synod, which were amalgamated under this name in the year 1847. The history of these sects will be found under the heads of ANTIBURGHERS, BURGHERS, RELIEF, and SECESSION. The united body is now very powerful in numbers, and is actively opposed to the principle of Church Establishments. In 1870 the congregations in connection with it were reckoned as follows in a report presented to the Synod in 1871:—Scotland, 502, with 161,791 members; Northumberland, Durham, Cumberland, and Lancashire, 89, with 15,614 members; London, 16, with 2,247 members. The total income for all purposes amounted to £284,611, 6s. 10d. In 1871 the increase was, in congregations, one; in income, over £12,000. In Ireland there are about ten congregations, forming one presbytery.

The United Presbyterians carry on missions in Spain, in the East and West Indies, and in Africa, together with medical missions to China and amongst the Jews. A history of these, by Dr. John M'Kerrow (who has also written a history of the Secession Kirk), was published in 1867.

The genealogical descent of the existing body may be best exhibited by the following pedigree, which shews the many shoots which in the course of little more than a century were thrown off from the original sectarian parent-stock.

UNITED SOCIETY OF BELIEVERS.
[SHAKERS.]
UNIVERSAL FRIENDS. [WILKINSONIANS.]
UNIVERSAL RESTORATIONISTS. [RE-STORATIONISTS.]

UNIVERSALISTS. Those who believe in the ultimate salvation of all mankind, the wicked as well as the good.

This opinion was held in ancient times by the ORIGINISTS, and has no doubt been held as a private opinion by many persons in more recent times; but the first attempt to consolidate a sect of which this should be the leading tenet was made in London by an Unitarian preacher named James Rely, about the middle of the last century. Although modern Unitarians are generally Universalists, however, the latter have never formed a separate sect of any importance in England. Rely was succeeded [A.D. 1781] by an American preacher named Elhanan Winchester, who had been a Calvinistic Baptist, but the congregation in London was soon broken up. Other small congregations were formed here and there, and two existed in Liverpool and Plymouth at the time when the religious census was taken in the year 1851.

In America, on the other hand, the Universalists have formed a large sect quite distinct from the Unitarians. The American sect originated with an English Methodist preacher named John Murray, who gave up his connection with Wesley in the year 1770, and emigrated to America for the purpose of gaining proselytes to the Universalist opinions which he had learned from Rely. Finding a soil in which the seeds of heresy readily germinated, he travelled about the States for some years, but finally settled down at Gloucester, Massachusetts, where he organized a congregation in the year 1779. Six years later, in 1785, the numbers of the sect and of their congregations had multiplied sufficiently for them to hold a convention at Boston, under the name of the "Independent Christian Universalists." Since that time the sect has gone on growing, and notwithstanding several divisions its numbers still increase. In 1840 the RESTORATIONISTS separated off from the original body and formed a distinct sect on what was regarded the original principle of Universalism, that there is a future state of punishment for the wicked, but that it is of limited duration, and that after enduring it they will eventually be restored to happiness. A portion of the remaining body sympathized with the Restorationists in their opinions, but did not leave the original sect, forming a party within it under the name of "Impartialists." But the opinion has largely gained ground among the elder body, that there is no punishment for sin except that which follows from the consequences of sin in the present life. Originally, no doubt, Universalism was a reaction from Calvinism, and many persons still take refuge from the latter by going to the opposite extreme in the former. But in its later American, and in its English Unitarian form, the dogma has assumed a very different character, the denial of future punishment going far to destroy the belief in moral responsibility, and leading through Antinomianism to Deism.

The American Universalists in 1847 numbered 716 congregations; in 1862 they numbered about 1000 congregations. They have eight academies and three colleges, and they make large use of the press, having no fewer than seventeen periodical publications. [Whittemore's Hist. of Universalism, Boston, 1860. URBANENSES. One of the numerous small sects of Donatists in Numidia. They are mentioned by St. Augustine. [Aug. contr. Crescon. iv. 70.]

USAGERS AND COLLEGERS. Names given to two parties existing in the Church of Scotland in the reigns of George I. and George II. Upon the gradual removal by death of the bishops who were ejected from their sees upon the Revolution, others were consecrated, not to occupy their places as diocesan bishops, but in order to preserve the Apostolic succession until such time as, it was fondly hoped, the Church, as well as the King, might have her own again. On the death of Bishop Rose of Edinburgh in 1720, he being the last of the old diocesan prelates, it was proposed that the Church should in future be governed by a College of Bishops in common. This proposal was supported by Lockhart of Carnwath and others of the political lay supporters in Scotland of the cause of the Chevalier, from the idea that if these bishops without sees were created at will and in any number by the exiled Prince, without any distinct work or jurisdiction, they might be used mainly as powerful instruments in promoting his interests. On the other hand, the clergy were chiefly desirous of maintaining the diocesan system, and with this view Bishop Fullerton was at once elected by the clergy of Edinburgh to succeed Bishop Rose, and Falconer was elected to St. Andrews. Hence immediately arose some political difference between the two parties; the favourers of the College system would have made the bishops the mere nominees and creatures of an expatriated Roman Catholic prince, while the maintainers of diocesan Episcopacy urged that, under the actual circumstances of the country, the bishops ought to be independently elected by the clergy of the several dioceses. But a further cause of division was added. Bishops Campbell and Gadderar, of the diocesan party, in consequence of their intimacy with the Nonjuring Bishops Hirkles and Collier, during a continued residence in England, were led to favour the adoption in Scotland of the Usages at the Holy Communion, which had been revived in England, these Usages being—[1] The mixing water with the wine; [2] Commemorating the faithful departed; [3] The Invocation in the Prayer of Consecration; [4] Oblation before administration. [NONJURORS.] Gadderar being subsequently chosen Bishop of Aberdeen, the Usages became identified with the party opposed to the College system; and consecrations of bishops at large were consequently multiplied by the Collegers, in obedience to instructions from abroad, in order to crush the diocesan Usagers. In 1724, however, an agreement was entered into between Gadderar and the College majority, by which the former, in order to avoid being suspended by his brethren, consented not to insist upon the adoption of the Usages in his diocese, and to conform to the practice of the Church except with regard to the mixing water with the wine; to the retention of which latter usage the other bishops had no objection, providing it was done only when demanded, and with privacy and prudence. Lockhart says, that at the meeting at which this arrangement was made there was little reasoning, the one side indulging only in invectives and reflections against Gadderar, whilst he, on the other side, was as obstinate as a mule. The strife with regard to the government of the Church, however, still went on, but by degrees the clergy of the various dioceses proceeded to elect their own overseers, until at length, in 1732, the College party, finding themselves gradually outnumbered and defeated, entered into a concordat which finally terminated the struggle. By the terms of this deed it was agreed that the peace of the Church should not any more be disturbed by the adoption of the Usages; that no one should be consecrated without the consent of the majority of the bishops; that the presbyters of a diocese should not elect without a mandate from the Primus, and that the Primus should simply be a president. The dioceses were then allotted to the respective existing bishops, with a provision that no bishop should claim jurisdiction beyond the bounds of his own district.

Though the Usages were thus formally given up, they were subsequently, with the exception of the first, incorporated in the Scottish Form for the Holy Communion when it was finally revised in 1765, and at that time occasioned no revival of the controversy. But in 1849 the dispute came up again, with much of the former bitterness, upon the publication by Bishop Torry (then nearly a nonagenarian) of an edition of the Scottish Prayer-Book for the use of his own diocese of St. Andrews. In this the aged bishop sought to perpetuate various practices which had been customary in the last century, and which lingered in some places by an unwritten tradition; amongst other things he allowed the mixing water with the wine and reservation for the sick, and enjoined the signing with the cross at confirmation. The book was condemned by the rest of the bishops (Bishop Forbes of Brechin dissenting) at a synod held at Aberdeen in April 1850, but Bishop Torry refused to acknowledge the sentence or recall the book, regarding this step of his colleagues as an unwarrantable interference with his authority as a diocesan bishop, and as an attempt to revive the old system of collegiate government. He was however plainly wrong in issuing his own private edition of the Prayer-Book, with novel rubrics, under the authoritative title of "The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments [etc.], according to the use of the Church of Scotland." [Skinner's Ecc. Hist. of Scotland. Lawson's Hist. of the Scottish Episc. Church. Grub's Ecc. Hist. of Scotland. J. M. Neale's Life of Bp. Torry.]

UTRAQUISTS. A controversial name given to those who maintain that the Holy Eucharist should be received sub utraque specie by the laity. But the name is specially applied to the CALIXTINES, a section of the followers of Huss, in the fifteenth century. The term is used by Gieseler in his Compendium of Ecclesiastical History, and in Sianda's Lexicon Polemicum.

VALDIANI. [AUDIANS.]

VALENTINIANS. A sect of early Gnostics, taking their origin from Valentinus, about the middle of the second century. They are spoken of by Tertullian, writing about A.D. 200, as being a very numerous sect, and he attributes the popularity of their heresy to the fables with which their theology abounded, and to the air of mystery which was thrown around it [Tertull. adv. Valent. i.].

Valentinus was a contemporary of Justin Martyr, flourishing, says Tertullian, in the reign of Antoninus Pius [A.D. 138-161]. As Justin Martyr mentions the sect of the Valentiniens in his Dialogue with Trypho [ch. xxxv.], which was written about A.D. 158, it is probable that it had been in existence for some years at least before that date. He does not name Valentinus, however, with Simon, Menander and Marcion, whom he twice mentions in his First Apology [ch. xxvi. lvi.], which was written about twenty years earlier, and hence it may be supposed that the heresy had not then originated. Tertullian says that Valentinus was a man of ability and eloquence, but that being offended at the promotion of another person who had been a confessor to a bishopric which he had himself expected, he left the Church in disgust, and formed a system, not indeed entirely new, but founded in some measure upon opinions previously current [Tertull. adv. Valent. iv.; de Præscr. Hæret. xxix. xxx.]. From this statement it would appear that his followers were from the first a sect outside of the Church, and not a party holding their opinions within it and afterwards separating from it. From later writers it is known that Valentinus went from Alexandria (of which city he was apparently a priest) to Rome, about A.D. 140, that he was there excommunicated, and that he died in Cyprus about A.D. 160 [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 11, Chron. s. a. 2155]. He is said to have written many hymns, and a work entitled the "Secret Doctrine of Theudas, a disciple of Paul," with whom he is supposed to have been acquainted [Clem. Alex. Strom. vii.], but fragments only of his writings are preserved.

The system of philosophical theology which Valentinus developed seems to the modern reader full of the grossest absurdities, even when the utmost allowance is made for the fact that we learn it chiefly from Irenæus, Hippolytus, Tertullian,¹ and Clement of Alexandria, and not from his own writings. Disentangling it as much as possible from these, and from the affectations of mystery with which it is dressed up, the following seems to be a fair statement of it as given by these writers, the one a contemporary of Valentinus, and the others of his immediate disciples.

An unoriginated, invisible, eternal, and incomprehensible, Absolute Being, dwells in height ineffable, living in a state of profound tranquillity. This Supreme Existence, Αἰὼν τέλειος, Προαρχή, Ἀρχή, he represented to be of a dual nature, as the Gods were in all the more ancient mythologies, being on the one hand an Abyss or Profundity of Self-existence, to which he gave the name Βυθός, and on the other an Eternal silent consciousness to which he gave the name of Ἐννοια, Χάρις, or more commonly Σιγή. The Duad or dual being thus imagined was further treated in the Valentinian system as partly a personal unity and partly as two persons, Bythus or Absolute Being originating all phenomenal existence in solitary brooding, while yet Sige becomes the mother of all things by conjunction with him. From this first duad three other duads of Æons emanated. Μονογενής was the only-begotten, Νοῦς or Ἀρχή [cf. John i. 1], the Mind, First Principle, and Image of the Supreme Bythus; but here again, accompanying Νοῦς was Ἀλήθεια, Mind and Truth thus making the second duad. From these again emanated the Word and the Life, Λόγος and Ζωή, a third duad. And from this third duad there proceeded Ἀνθρωπος and Ἐκκλησία, the fourth. These four duads made up the Ogdoad, which is by some writers especially associated with the names of Heracleon and Ptolemy, disciples of Valentinus, and which is also carried back to an earlier date by others, and considered as the invention of Simon Magus. [SIMONIANS. Greg. Naz. Orat. xxv. 8. Pearson's Vindic. Ignatian. ii. 6.] But in the system of Valentinus the Ogdoad formed only the higher portion of a Πλήρωμα of thirty Æons, ten of which proceeded in a descending scale from Logos and Zoe, and twelve others from Anthropos and Ecclesia.

Confused and strange as this system seems, there are indications that it was an orderly one, however fanciful and heretical, in the mind of its originators ; and something of this order may perhaps be discovered by arranging it in a tabular form, shewing the genealogy of the several Æons. It will be observed that the apposition of masculine and feminine names is always maintained.

The Pleroma of heavenly beings thus emanating from Bythus, the First Cause, formed a kingdom of Light and an abode of Deity : the production of lower beings, and of the material world in the region of darkness outside of this kingdom of Light, being provided for by a supplementary system originating in Sophia, the last of the Divine Emanations. This latter is set forth as follows.

The full knowledge of the First Cause was imparted only to Nous, whose desire to communicate it to the rest of the Æons was counteracted by the interposition of Sige. But a desire ever pervaded them to attain to the knowledge of their Father, and in Sophia this attained to such self-willed strivings after an approach to the unoriginated and incomprehensible Abyss of Light, that a new existence emanated from her, having no part in the Pleroma, to which also the name of Ἀχαμώθ [supposed to be from חכמה Wisdom] was given, as an abortive image of the true wisdom. This new being, Achamoth, carried the germ of life to matter, which already existed co-eternally with Bythus in the region of darkness, and thus formed the Δημιουργός, by whom the visible universe was immediately created, including mankind, of whom the Demiurge became the God. In the universe thus created there are three kinds of existences, the spiritual, which is the highest and has an affinity to the Pleroma, the animal or psychical, which occupies an intermediate grade, and the material, which is lowest and which has no affinity with the Pleroma. Corresponding to these three grades were three types of men, those of material or carnal nature [ψυχὴ ὑλική], represented by Cain ; those of animal nature [ψυχὴ θεία], represented by Abel ; and those of spiritual nature [σπέρμα πνευματικόν], represented by Seth : the first being destined to perdition, the last to salvation, but the final condition of the intermediate class depending upon the exercise of the free will with which they are endowed, and which enables them to choose a place among the carnal on the one hand, or the spiritual on the other. On this threefold division was grounded the ethical system out of which arose that Antinomian profligacy which is attributed by most early writers to the Gnostics ; for while the animal man was required to work out his salvation if he was to gain it, they in whom was the "spiritual seed" were already sure of salvation, and so might live as they pleased without danger of perdition.

The Christian doctrine of salvation by Christ and the Holy Spirit was also incorporated into this strange system. The Second and Third Persons of the Holy Trinity are clearly associated in some way with the Æons Nous and Aletheia ; and it seems as if the following duad of Æons, Logos and Zoc, represented the operative phase of their Divine existence. The Body of Jesus was specially created by the Demiurge (in a nature similar to but not identical with ordinary human bodies) as the means by which the salvation of mankind was to be effected. This body was placed in the Blessed Virgin, but did not partake of her substance, and issued forth from her as it had been placed within her. At the Baptism in Jordan, Christ, proceeding from the Logos, descended upon Jesus in the form of a dove, and remained with Him until the Crucifixion. But when the Saviour was about to suffer, the Logos returned to the Pleroma, and only the material nature, Jesus again separated from the Christ, suffered and died.

To complete this system Valentinus added also a theory of Eschatology. When the age of man's probation is completed, those in whom was the spiritual seed will be received into the Pleroma; those in whom was the animal seed, and who have worked out their salvation, will be received into a middle region where the Demiurge will reign over them; while those in whom was only the base material seed will be annihilated. At this final consummation Achamoth will be received into the Pleroma to form a new Duad in association with Christ.

To what extent this singular system was an original invention it is impossible to say. Irenæus gives some curious evidence of an association between the ideas of Valentinus and his followers, and those contained in a popular comedy named the "Theogony," which was written by Antiphanes, the author of 280 comedies, who flourished in the fourth century before Christ [B.C. 404-330]. "Much more like the truth," says Irenæus, "and more pleasing, is the account which Antiphanes, one of the ancient comic poets, gives in his 'Theogony' as to the origin of all things. For he speaks of Chaos as being produced from Night and Silence; relates that then Love sprang from Chaos and Night; from this again, Light; and that from this, in his opinion, were derived all the rest of the first generation of the gods. After these he next introduces a second generation of gods and the creation of the world; then he narrates the formation of mankind by the second order of the gods. These heretics, adopting this fable as their own, have ranged their opinions round it as if by a sort of natural process, changing only the names of the things referred to, and setting forth the very same beginning of the generation of all things and their production. In place of Night and Silence they substitute Bythus and Sige; instead of Chaos they put Nous; and for Love (by whom, says the comic poet, all other things were set in order) they have brought forward the Word. For the primary and greatest gods they have formed their Æons; and in place of the secondary gods they tell us of that creation by their mother, which is outside of the Pleroma, calling it the second Ogdoad. They proclaim to us, like the writer referred to, that from this Ogdoad came the creation of the world and the formation of man, maintaining that they alone are acquainted with these ineffable and unknown mysteries. Those things which are everywhere acted in the theatres by comedians with the clearest voices they transfer to their own system, teaching them undoubtedly through means of the same arguments, and merely changing the names." [Iren. adv. Hær. ii. 14.]

The coincidence between the Theogony ridiculed in this comedy, and that of Valentinus, is too striking to allow of its being thought altogether accidental; but the true explanation probably is that both were taken from some ancient system, and a confirmation of this explanation is afforded by the fact that in the Theogony of Hesiod there are thirty gods as there are thirty Æons in the system of Valentinus. On the other hand, Burton has accumulated much evidence in his "Inquiry into the Heresies of the Apostolic Age," to support the opinion that the "Æons" of the Gnostics were personifications of the "Ideas" of Plato; and it is now known that Hippolytus, who was contemporary with the early Valentinians, deduced their system from Pythagoras and Plato [Hippol. Refut. Hær. xxix. xxxii.]. The truth seems to be that Valentinus was one of the first to attempt the formation of a syncretistic theosophy by amalgamating Judaism and Christianity with the philosophy and the theogonies of the ancient Greek and Oriental worlds. In the following age the Neo-Platonists made a similar attempt, excluding to a great extent the Oriental element, and admitting more of the classical.

VALESIAN. A sect, or perhaps a community of ascetics, of this name is mentioned by Epiphanius, and after him by other early heresiologists, but scarcely anything is known respecting them. They are said to have had for their founder Valens of Bacatha Metrocomia, an episcopal city not yet identified, but which Epiphanius and Nicetas speak of as being in "Arabia beyond Jordan." They are spoken of by Epiphanius as holding some Gnostic opinions, St. John of Damascus charges them with being profligate Antinomians, and Nicetas classes them with ARCHONICS and SETHIANS. The principal definite fact that is recorded about them is that they practised self-mutilation, and enforced the practice on all their adherents. [Epiph. Hæres. lviii. Aug. Hæres. xxvii. Joann. Damasc. de Hæres. lviii. Nicet. Chon. Thesaur. Orthod. iv. 30.]

VANISTS. This name was given by Baxter to the Antinomians of New England, but whether Sir Henry Vane, who was Governor of the colony when they sprung up there, was really associated with them may be doubted. [See page 34, note 2.]

VARISUUS. Ittigius [de Hæresiarch. iii. 1, App. xii.] quotes an anonymous commentator on St. Matthew, who names Varisuus with Cleobius [CLEOBIANS] among the early heretics. Burton expresses his opinion that the true reading is that of the Benedictine edition, "Barjesu," and that the person intended is Elymas the sorcerer, who is so called in Acts xiii. 6. [Burton's Bampton Lect. 495.]

VAUDOIS. [WALDENSES.]

VENUSTIANI. [PATERNIANI.]

VERSCHOORISTS. A Dutch sect which takes its name from James Verschoor of Flushing, who lived in the latter half of the seventeenth century. His tenets are described by Mosheim as being an absurd and impious system of religion made up of a mixture in which the principles of Spinoza and Cocceius predominated. His followers are also called Hebrews because of the attention which they all give, men and women alike, to the Hebrew language [Mosheim, Eccl. Hist. iii. 390, Stubbs' ed.]. They were akin to the HATTEMISTS; and, like them, Antinomian in their principles.

VICTORINUS. This name is mentioned as that of one who upheld and assisted the heresy of Praxeas, by the author of the work against all Heresies appended to Tertullian's de Præscriptione Hæreticorum. Nothing whatever is known about him, but Fabricius and Oehler [Corp. Hæresiol. Phil. cap. xlix. p. 102] conjecture that it must be Victor, Bishop of Rome when Praxeas was there, to whose name the last two syllables of his successor Zephyrinus' name have been added by a careless scribe.

W

WAKEMANITES. A very small party of deluded fanatics existing at New Haven in Connecticut in 1855, who regarded an aged and apparently insane woman named Rhoda Wakeman as a divinely commissioned prophetess who had been raised from the dead, in accordance with her own prediction. Their only claim to notice arises from the unusual extreme to which their credulity led them. At the bidding of the prophetess, not only were some of her followers willing to become the murderers of one of their companions named Justus Matthews, a small farmer whom she charged with being possessed by an evil spirit, for the removal of which exorcisms had been vainly used, but the wretched man himself submitted willingly to be murdered, as the only means of quenching the evil spirit within him, which would otherwise destroy the prophetess. The extinction of the fanatic sect followed, of course, upon the commission of this crime.

WALDENSES. Of the various religious bodies that rose up in the twelfth century against the dominant power of the clergy, the Waldenses are the most celebrated, not only on account of the purity of their moral character, and their freedom from wild Manichæan error, but because their descendants, the Vaudois, still linger in the valleys of the Western Alps. Their descendants, for such the Vaudois probably are; but still the fact has been disputed, and endless questions have been raised and fiercely debated about the connection between the Vaudois of Piedmont and the ancient Waldenses of Southern France, about the origin of the name, and indeed its meaning also, and about the antiquity of the sectaries to which it is applied.

They claim for themselves a high antiquity. It has even been maintained that their Church was founded by the Apostle St. Paul, and that they alone have preserved primitive faith and discipline through the corruptions of the Dark and Middle Ages up to the present time. Another account of their origin is, that when Constantine established and endowed the Church under Sylvester, Bishop of Rome, the inhabitants of these valleys, headed by one Leon, from whom they were called Leonistæ, rejected the unholy alliance, and kept themselves aloof from the rest of the Latin communion, remaining unknown in their obscure valleys and mountain passes, until attention was drawn to them in the twelfth century by the spread of heresy in France and Northern Italy. They have moreover been associated with Claudius, Bishop of Turin, who took the side of the Iconoclasts in the time of Charlemagne. But there is no historical evidence of any such association, and his opposition to images was the one point that Claudius had in common with the Waldenses; a point in which he did not stand alone, being supported by Charlemagne himself, and by the Church of his day and empire, assembled in the Council of Frankfort, A.D. 794. In truth these conjectures are only the vain attempts of a sectarian body to trace their origin to the Apostles. As Maitland has observed, even those who reject the Apostolic Succession are always very glad to connect themselves in some way with the Apostles. The first really authentic account of the Waldenses dates from the middle of the twelfth century, and all the contemporary writers trace their origin to Peter Waldo, or Valdo, the merchant of Lyons. There may, possibly, have been some such sects in the Piedmont valleys before him, but these received at any rate a powerful impetus from him, and no one who has any acquaintance with the rites and doctrines of the primitive Church will now maintain that the Waldenses truly represent that Church. The separation from Sylvester, if it had taken place, could not have escaped the notice of some contemporary author. This is the opinion of the best modern authorities, Milman, Hallam, Maitland, Mosheim, and Gieseler.

The name has been rendered Vallenses, that is "inhabitants of the valleys." Ebrardus suggests that they were so called because they sojourned in a vale of tears: but the letter "d," which appears alike in the Latin form Waldenses and in the modern Vaudois, points to some other derivation. In the Provençal language "val" was a valley, which in oblique cases assumed the form "vau," plural "vaux," where it would be impossible for the "d" to get in. As a matter of fact there was a tribe of Vallenses in the Graian Alps, but they were called by the French Les Vallais. The name of Vaudois or Waldenses must have been derived either from Waldo, or possibly, as in the case of the Pays de Vaud in Switzerland, from the forest or woodland character of their country. We meet with "pagus Waldensis" in the tenth century, meaning forest or woodland district [see Todd, Books of the Vauds, App.]. All the contemporary or nearly contemporary writers speak of Waldo as their actual founder, and the author of their name. Even Reinerius, who calls them "diuturnior" than the other sects of the day, qualifies his words immediately after by tracing them to Waldo. Beza was the first to derive the name from the "vallées" in which they reside.

Peter Valdo, or Waldo, was a merchant of Lyons. It has been thought that he was called Valdo because he was born in Valdum in the marquisate of Lyons, or again from the district of Walden, but probably Waldo was his real surname. It was common enough in those days, as Maitland has shewn. He mentions [Facts and Documents] nine different persons who were so called, and they of course are only specimens, and compares it to the English name Wood. Waldo had led for some time an ordinary secular life, when the sudden death of a companion at a meeting for devotion made a powerful impression upon him, and induced him to consecrate himself to the cause of religion. He gave up his large property to the relief of the poor, chose the life of poverty, and spent his time in instructing others. This was about 1160. He hired a poor scholar to translate into the vernacular some of the books of Scripture and approved sentences from the Fathers, and as his followers increased he sent chosen disciples out, two and two, to preach in the neighbourhood, to the great indignation of the archbishop and clergy of Lyons. They were to go in poverty after the example of the Apostles, and to work with their own hands for their subsistence. They called themselves the "Humbled," but were ordinarily known as the "Poor Men of Lyons;" the "Sabatati," from the large wooden shoes or sabots that they wore; and the "Insabatati," i.e. "marked on the sabots," because they had the sign of the Cross on their shoes.

Hitherto lay preaching had been unheard of in the Latin Church, and the opposition raised by their practice was in consequence considerable. But two of them appeared at Rome in 1179, and petitioned that they might be allowed to preach. Alexander III. received them in the Lateran Council. He approved of their poverty, but condemned them for their interference with the duties of the clergy. When they further pressed for permission they were coldly referred to their own clergy, the last men who would be likely to yield it to them. Had the Pope acted otherwise Waldo might have anticipated St. Francis, and founded an order of preaching friars within the Church. The Archbishop of Lyons now formally prohibited their preaching, but Waldo replied that they ought to obey God rather than man, and continued to act as before. Hitherto there had been no real distinction either of doctrine or of practice between his followers and the Church. The only charge against them was that they, being laymen, persisted in preaching, and yet the Pope had not formally prohibited them, although he had shewn marked disapprobation of the practice. Under the following Pope, Lucius III., a pontiff, it may be observed, of no mark, they were, in 1183, anathematized together with the other heretics of Southern France. This widened the breach, and they continued to preach with vigour and earnestness, so that their confraternity was widely spread through France and Lombardy. They were by the admission of their opponents pure in life, and free from the stain of formal heresy, and thus they won over many who were dissatisfied with the existing state of corruption in high places, and yet shrank from the Manichæan heresy that infected the Albigenses. Hence they speedily became numerous, and proved a cause of great peril to the Church, and that for three reasons, as Reinerius, a Dominican Inquisitor who had much to do with them, remarks: [1] Because they were of earlier origin than the other sects, that is, according to their own account, as they traced themselves to Sylvester's time. In his next sentence he qualifies his expression, "diuturnior," by giving his own opinion. [2] Because they were more widely extended. [3] Because while other sects filled their hearers with horror by their foul blasphemies, the Leonists, men of Lyons, had a great show of piety, so as to live uprightly in the sight of all; having also a right faith in all the things of God and the articles of the Creed, though they only reviled the Church of Rome and the clergy [Reiner. contra Wald. iv. in Gretzer, tom. xii.].

Their separation from the Church, and continued study of Holy Scripture by the light of their own private judgment, soon led them to oppose many of the prevailing doctrines and practices. The errors ascribed to them range themselves under three heads, those against Rome and the clergy, those against the sacraments and the saints, and those against ecclesiastical customs.

I. [a] They threw off the authority of the Pope and the bishops generally. Those of Italy indeed allowed that Rome was a true but corrupt Church; those of France, Ultramontane, maintained that she had apostatized, and was Babylon and the harlot, that they themselves were the only true Church, that the Pope was the head of error, the prelates were the Scribes, and the monks the Pharisees.

[b] They asserted the right of laymen, and even women to preach; for this last they quoted the example of Anna and Titus ii. 3, 4.

[c] They declared the consecration and absolution of bad priests to be invalid, in other words, that the unworthiness of the ministering priest renders the sacraments of none effect.

[d] That absolution by a good layman was effective, and therefore confession might be made to any one.

[e] They refused to pay tithes, protested against religious endowments and the temporal power of the clergy.

II. [a] They abolished much of the prevailing ritual in Baptism. Some declared that infant baptism was unprofitable, but this does not seem to have been universally held.

[b] With regard to the Eucharist they maintained a kind of subjective Presence, as it would now be called, that the Transubstantiation takes place, not in the hand of the priest, but in the mouth of the believer. They rejected the canon of the Mass, and denied any oblation in it.

[d] They objected to the forbidden degrees, probably only the more remote, of which Rome made such a profit by means of dispensations; also they objected to compulsory celibacy of the clergy.

[e] They depreciated Unction.

[f] They asserted that the Apostles were the only saints who ought to be had in honour, and declared against any invocation of them.

III. [a] They opposed as useless all alms, masses, fasts, and prayers for the faithful departed.

[b] They denied purgatory, and maintained that the disembodied spirits go at once to heaven or hell. Some however held a doctrine of the Intermediate State.

[c] They called the plain song of the Church a "clamor infernalis," and rejected the canonical hours as times for prayer.

[d] They opposed the use of crosses, images, and ornaments in churches, the ceremonies of Candlemas and Palm Sunday, all benedictions, dedications, etc., in fact all traditions and ecclesiastical customs not expressly contained in Scripture.

[e] They denied the "mystical sense" of Scripture; called pilgrimages useless; some of them refused to worship in churches, preferring the use of bedrooms and stables (for this they quoted Matt. vi. 5, 6; Acts vii. 48, 49); they also objected to ecclesiastical burials: for this putting forward Matt. xxiii. 29.

Moreover they denied the lawfulness of capital punishment, of oaths, of bearing arms in self-defence (very different from their modern descendants the Vaudois); also of lawsuits, for they interpreted the Sermon on the Mount according to the strict letter.

They were governed, at first at least, by bishops—of their own appointment, whom they styled "majorales"—by presbyters and deacons, giving for a reason that all three had been instituted by Christ; but they required that they should be, like the Apostles, poor uneducated men, who should support themselves by the work of their own hands.

Their laity were divided into the Perfect and Imperfect. The first gave up all property and fasted strictly; the second lived like men in general, in society, only without luxury. Their rules concerning property were of course soon relaxed; in fact, no society could continue them for any length of time. They are favourably distinguished for high moral character from the other sects of the day, such as the Albigenses, Paulicians, etc. This appears in their celebrated work, the "Noble Lesson," a poem in rhyming verse written in the Provençal dialect. It contains a biblical history, both of the Old and New Testaments, interspersed with pure moral precepts. It ends with an attack upon the errors of the Papacy, persecutions, masses and prayers for the dead, simony, and Papal absolution. A question has been raised concerning its date. That of A.D. 1100 appears in it, which is evidently used vaguely, and might apply to any year in that century, but it is now supposed that there is a mistake in the MSS. One in the Library of Cambridge University bears suspicious marks of an erasure, and when closely examined gives A.D. 1400 instead of A.D. 1100.

As they took all pains to spread their opinions as much as possible, they everywhere both gained converts and provoked persecution. Southern France and Piedmont were their headquarters, but they spread on the one side through Arragon, while on the other they appeared at Milan.

Nothing certain is known of the after life of Waldo himself. It has been said that he fled from Lyons, and found refuge in the eastern valleys of the Cottian Alps, where he either won over for the first time, or confirmed in their faith, those inhabitants whose descendants still represent his communion. Others deny that he ever was there, and maintain that he died in Bohemia. The date of his death is uncertain.

The various persecutions to which his followers in different places were exposed only served to spread their opinions the more widely, and that not among the poor or middle classes only; for we read that in the year 1207 the wife and one sister of the Count de Foix had joined them. There were many of them in Metz, in Milan, and in Arragon, where they drew forth an edict from Alphonso II. in 1194, threatening confiscation of goods, and the penalties of treason to any who should listen to their preaching, receive them into their houses, or even supply them with food.

Between A.D. 1307 and 1323, out of 607 sentences to various punishments passed by the Inquisition in France upon heretics, 92 were upon Waldensians. They gradually declined in that country, so that at the present time only a remnant is left on the western slopes of the Alps in Dauphiné. They extended themselves into Lower Germany, especially Brandenburg, Pomerania, and Mecklenburg, where many were burnt. There they paved the way for the Reformation, and in after times were mingled with the Protestants of those parts. At one time we read that they supplied the Bohemian remnant of the Taborites, who had separated from the Church and settled in Herrnhut in Lusatia, with a bishop, or at least a so-called bishop, for it does not appear that they ever had the succession.

But it was in Italy, under their modernized name of the Vaudois, that they made themselves most celebrated by their constancy, their fierce resistance in arms to persecution, and their continuance as a distinct body up to the present day. Possibly there may have been some sectaries in those valleys before Waldo commenced his career of preaching. Certainly he or some of his earlier followers, if they did not found the community of the Vaudois, greatly extended it. They were a poor ignorant people, inhabiting each side of the Cottian Alps. Those on the western slopes were the subjects of France, and although they were at times cruelly handled by the local powers, seem not to have fared so badly upon the whole as their brethren of the east, who were subjected to the Dukes of Savoy. They occupied the district between Mount Viso and Mount Genevre, a tract consisting of secluded valleys and of towering crags upon which the persecuted often found shelter from their pursuers. It was perhaps fortunate for the Vaudois that they were under two different governments, and usually the French kings were too much engaged with other more important matters to notice these distant mountaineers, so that they were left to the efforts of the local authorities. But the Dukes of Savoy were ever ready to assail those on the eastern side. Ordinarily whenever those on one side were attacked they were able to find refuge with their brethren on the other; but sometimes an attack was made on both sides at once, and then their case was pitiable indeed. Flight to the mountains was their only safeguard. It is said that they have had to go through no fewer than thirty-seven persecutions at the hands of their Dukes [Gilly], in which neither age nor sex was spared. The object may have been in part political. The Dukes of Savoy obtained possession of the country only about Waldo's time. It had previously enjoyed considerable independence under the Counts of Lucerne and the Marquis of Saluzzo, on which account the inhabitants were always pleading for their ancient rights, and unlike the Christian martyrs of early times, resisted by force of arms the attempts made upon their faith. The French Vaudois, on the other hand, offered no resistance to their persecutors, but whenever flight was impossible, opposed patience and long-suffering to violence. They were in a more poverty-stricken condition than their Italian brethren, their country being more cold, barren, and inaccessible to foreign influences. They were under the pastoral charge of the Archbishop of Embrun; and the records of the diocese contain statements of their persecution, and of the expense which it entailed. Thus in the accounts for A.D. 1335 there is inserted, "Item for persecuting the Vaudois, eight sols and thirty deniers of gold." The people of one valley, the Val Louise, were entirely exterminated in 1438 by a body of troops that had suffered a severe defeat from the Italian Vaudois, and in their retreat thus avenged themselves. Their places were filled with Catholics from the neighbourhood some years later by Louis XII., who was himself no persecutor, although he allowed the local authorities of Embrun to do what they pleased. Again the mountains saved the rest.

The Edict of Nantes afforded the Vaudois a long respite, which they turned to account by building churches and worshipping openly; but its revocation was followed by the destruction of their churches and the suppression of their worship wherever it was possible; and they continued in a low ignorant state, with but few pastors, until recent times, when religious toleration enabled them to lift up their heads; and the labours of Felix Neff, although they were cut short by a premature death, formed the commencement of a better state of things. The country is now divided into regular districts, each of which has its pastor, its house of residence, and its place of worship.

The history of the Italian Vaudois is far more complicated. It comprehends a series of invasions from without, gallant defences followed by the shameful defeat and retreat of the assailants, and varied by individual persecution. It would be impossible to give a connected account of the whole in a brief article like the present. A few of the more important points may be touched upon, which will serve to shew the stubbornness with which these mountaineers held to their religious opinions, and further illustrate the fact, if it needs illustration, that persecution only serves to confirm men the more in that which they hold to be the truth.

For a time they were allowed to remain unmolested owing to the obscurity of their position, and the Bulls which were continually fulminated against them in conjunction with other heretics passed over their heads. But the establishment of the Inquisition at Turin brought the danger nearer to them. Numbers of individuals suffered, but no attempt was made upon the people as a whole. They were accused by Pope John XXII. in 1332 of having murdered William, the rector of the parish church of Engravia, in the diocese of Turin, because he had celebrated Mass in an open place in the town, and in 1403, St. Vincent of Ferrers penetrated into their district, and made an unsuccessful attempt to effect their conversion.

At length a crusade in 1477 was preached against the Vaudois by Innocent VIII. Plenary indulgences were granted to all who should join in it, with liberty to appropriate whatever property of the heretics they might seize. Eighteen thousand regular troops and six thousand volunteers were poured into the country to plunder and lay waste, but their progress was checked by Philip VII., Duke of Savoy, who interfered in behalf of his subjects, and for once protected them.

In 1556 they sent a confession of faith to the Reformers of Germany, containing the following articles:—

[1] They expressed their belief in the Old and New Testaments and in the Apostles' Creed.

[2] They acknowledged the Holy Sacraments instituted by Christ, according to the true meaning of their institution.

[3] They received the Creeds sanctioned by the first four General Councils, and also that of St. Athanasius.¹

[4] They admitted the Ten Commandments as a rule of life.

[5] They professed submission to the superiors placed over them by God. [See Gilly, Second Visit to the Vaudois.]

Two years later an edict was published against the Vaudois by Emanuel Philibert, and an invasion was made under the command of the Count de la Trinité. They defended themselves as usual in the mountain passes, having placed their women and children in caves formed as places of refuge. The Count failed to force Angrogna, from which he was retiring when he suffered a severe defeat in the Pra du Tour. In consequence partly of this defeat, and partly of the intercessions of his Duchess, the Duke was at last persuaded in 1560 to conclude a peace.

It was now that the Protestants of Germany for the first time contributed to the relief of the Vaudois, and by their representations at the Court of Turin checked persecution for a considerable period. Consequently, in 1655, the Vaudois identified themselves with the Protestant bodies, and accepted the Confession of Augsburg.

At this time another attempt was made against them, and the Marquis de Pianesse advanced up the same valley of Angrogna at the head of fifteen thousand men, and having been twice repulsed, proposed terms of peace, stipulating, however, that a regiment of infantry and two companies of cavalry should be quartered upon them for a short time. The unsuspecting Vaudois consented, and dispersed to their various homes. Then the soldiers were let loose upon them, and a horrible massacre followed, in which neither age nor sex was spared. The remnant forced their way up to the tops of the mountains, whence they carried on a guerilla warfare. It was now that Cromwell interfered on their behalf, and induced Cardinal Mazarin to make a joint and threatening remonstrance, before which the Duke was compelled to give way, and peace was restored. The losses of the Vaudois were made up by contributions from the States that sympathized with them. In England about £40,000 were collected, of which half was transmitted to them at once, and the remainder was retained to afford a fund the interest of which was to be placed at their disposal, but this fund was lost to them through subsequent political events.

After this the Vaudois enjoyed peace until 1685, when Louis XIV. and the Duke of Savoy, Amadeus II., made a united effort to crush them. The first attack was unsuccessful; the French were beaten at St. Germain, and had to retire to Pignerol, while the Italians met with the same fate at Angrogna. But persevering efforts succeeded; the Vaudois were forced at length to surrender. Numbers were thrown into dungeons, where they perished either from disease or at the hands of the executioner; and the remainder, about three thousand, were banished the country for ever. Their lands were occupied, partly by Italians, and partly by a body of Irishmen, who had met with the same fate in their own country at the hands of Cromwell. The exiled Vaudois found a hearty welcome in Switzerland, Holland, Brandenburg, and the Palatinate; but their love of home continued strong, and although lands had been offered them in the above-mentioned countries, they were further unsettled by the ravaging of the Palatinate, where many of them had taken refuge in 1689. Accordingly, about eight hundred of them under the command of Henri Arnaud, a pastor, effected what they called the "Glorious Return." They forced their way through foreign lands and across opposing mountains to their old home, where they entrenched themselves for the winter. In the following year war was resumed, and acts of atrocious cruelty stained both parties. The Vaudois were specially relentless against the new inhabitants who had succeeded them in their old homes, in the fight no quarter was given, and no mercy was shewn afterwards, as they could not keep their prisoners. At length a quarrel between Louis and Amadeus induced the latter to grant peace to the Vaudois, and to confirm them in their recovered possessions. Since that time no serious effort has been made against them, but a course of petty persecution and vexatious restriction was adopted, which continued in force until very lately.

They enjoyed a brief space of greater prosperity under Napoleon I., who swept away the restrictions, and granted them aid to maintain their pastors out of the public funds; but this was withdrawn after his fall, and the old state of things was restored.

They were then strictly confined to their own territory, a small district of mountain-country near the sources of the Po, between the Clusone and the Pelice. This, as population increased, became less adequate for their support, and hence they became poorer, but no one was allowed to purchase or inherit lands beyond their own limits. It was also enacted that no books should be printed for them in Piedmont, and at that time there was a high duty upon imported books. It does not appear however that this went beyond the ordinary censorship of that age, which provided for the suppression of heretical and immoral books by the government.

None of the Vaudois were at this time allowed to practise law or physic beyond their own territories, and even at home they were restricted to the ranks of apothecaries and attorneys, in theory at least, for as far as practice goes probably they did whatever necessity demanded of them. All the civil and military offices were closed to them. They were compelled to abstain from all work on the numerous festivals of the Church. Difficulties were thrown in the way of their building houses for their pastors and repairing their places of worship. They were refused admission into any of the established hospitals unless they should consent to renounce their own communion.

All these restrictions are now abolished, and they enjoy complete toleration. Their material condition also has been much improved owing to the exertions of Dr. Gilly and other Englishmen who have taken up their cause. Thus an hospital has been founded for them; houses have been built for their pastors, whose salaries also have been increased. Schools have been built in many places, and a college founded at La Tour.

But the Vaudois have at the same time given up many of their old peculiarities and approximated more to the ordinary type of foreign Protestants, except only that they are free from the Socinianism of the Swiss and the Rationalism of the German and French Protestants, and they never shewed any great inclination towards the errors of Calvin. They are no longer under the rule of even nominal bishops; but are now governed by a synod composed of the pastor and one layman from each parish, presided over by the moderator, a successor of their ancient bishops. The synod, as vacancies arise in the parish, elects the pastors from two or more candidates nominated by the parish. The Liturgy of Geneva is used, having superseded an older one of their own, but it is the unreformed liturgy, the one in use at Geneva before the spread of Socinianism found expression in the public worship. Their pastors are ordained by the laying on of hands of the moderator, but lately the ordinations of Geneva and Lausanne have been considered valid.

Their offices comprise services for Communion, Baptism, and Marriage. They have no Burial Service. Their ordinary public service does not differ greatly from that of the neighbouring Protestants. It comprises prayer without response, psalmody, reading of the Scriptures, and preaching. The Communion, when Dr. Gilly visited them, was administered at four seasons of the year, but if the attendance was large the administration was continued on the following Sunday.

They may now therefore be looked upon as one of the ordinary Protestant and Presbyterian bodies, interesting indeed on account of their antiquity, the persecutions that they have often had to endure from their Dukes, and the patriotic resistance which they opposed to them.

WALLOON PROTESTANTS. A branch of the French Calvinists imported into the Netherlands at the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. They differ from the general body of Dutch Calvinists only in the use of the French language and the Geneva Catechism, and are gradually dying out as a separate body.

WATERLANDERS. The less rigid ["die Groben"] portion of the Mennonite sect, so called because the majority of them belonged to a district named Waterland in the north of Holland. They are almost exactly similar in their habits and principles to the English Baptists, and do not adopt the old Puritan stiffness and discipline of the FLEMINGS, or "Fine" Mennonites ["die Feinen"]. The Waterlanders have also sometimes been named Johannites, from Hans de Rys, one of their leaders in the sixteenth century. [MENNONITES.]

WESTMINSTER CONFESSION. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

WHITE BRETHREN. A body of enthusiasts which appeared in Italy about the beginning of the fourteenth century, and were so called from being all clad in white linen robes reaching to their feet, with hoods of the same material that left only their eyes exposed. They were originally collected together, by a priest whose name is not known, among the villages on the southern side of the Alps. Some writers say that this priest was a Scotchman, others that he came from France, but little is known of him except that he placed himself at the head of a very large multitude of the White Brethren, whom he had organized, and led them down to the Italian plains under the pretence that he was the prophet Elias by whom the Second Advent is to be heralded. Bearing a cross at their head, he bade them follow him in a crusade against the Turks for the purpose of regaining the Holy Land, and so great was his influence that not only the peasantry, but some priests and even cardinals are said to have enrolled themselves among his army of "penitents," as the White Brethren called themselves. In troops numbering ten, twenty and forty thousand, the enthusiasts marched from city to city in the same manner as the early Beghards had done, singing hymns and making loud prayers: and wherever they went multitudes were ready to give them alms and to join in their pilgrimage. They had thus advanced, with growing numbers, as far as Viterbo, when they were met by a body of the Papal troops, which had been ordered to march against them by Boniface IX. under the impression that their leader intended to dethrone him and seize upon the Popedom. The pilgrims were dispersed by the troops, and their leader being taken, was carried to Rome, where, about the year 1403, he was burned as a heretic.

There is so much similarity between the history of the White Brethren and that of the fanatical multitude which was led by Sagarelli and Dolcino a century earlier, that it seems probable that some of the latter [APOSTOLICALS] had continued the existence of their sect among the retired villages of the Alps, and that a leader like Dolcino had again risen among them to revive their enthusiasm. [Theodoric de Niem. in Muratori annal. Mediol. ii. 16; Poggius, Hist. Florent. iii. 122.]

WHITEFIELD. [HUNTINGDON CONNEXION. METHODISTS, CALVINISTIC.]

WHITE QUAKERS. [QUAKERS.]

WICKLIFFITES. [LOLLARDS.]

WILBURITES. A section of the American Quakers which has struck off from the main body since the separation of the Hicksites, on the ground that Quakers were giving up their original principles. Their original leader was John Wilbur, and they maintain the strictest traditions of the sect.

WILHELMIAN. The followers of a fanatic woman named Wilhelmina, who died at Milan in the year 1281. She professed to be the daughter of Constantia, the Queen of Primislaus, King of Bohemia, but was first heard of in the neighbourhood of Milan. According to her blasphemous pretensions her birth had been announced to her mother by the angel Raphael, in the same manner as that of our Lord was announced to the Virgin Mary by the angel Gabriel. The prophecies of the Abbot Joachim were at this time deluding many enthusiastic minds [JOACHIMITES], and the interpretation which Wilhelmina gave to his theory respecting an age of the Holy Spirit was that the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity had become incarnate in her person for the purpose of working out the salvation of Jews, Saracens, and false Christians, as that of true Christians had been wrought by Christ. She deluded a large number of followers into the expectation, first, of her repeating in her own person the sufferings of Christ, and secondly, of her resurrection and return to them after her death. When that death occurred, without any remarkable circumstances, they still paid her the highest veneration, and built her a magnificent tomb. Her most notorious followers were a man named Andrew and a nun named Mafreda. The latter she appointed to be her vicegerent, a female pope to represent her as the Roman Pontiffs represent St. Peter. Some years after the death of Wilhelmina some of her fanatic followers were discovered by the Inquisition, and burned as heretics. The tomb of the impostor herself was destroyed, her dead body treated in the same manner as her living followers, and about the year 1300 the sect became extinct. [Muratori; Antiq. Ital. Med. Æv. v. 91.]

WILEMITÆ. A name sometimes given to the BOHEMIAN BRETHREN. Thus Camerarius writes: "... in oppidis autem Bohemicis cum aliis tum Wilemii et Boleslaviæ frequentior fuit istiusmodi cætus, unde et Wilemitæ et Boleslavienses Fratres sunt nominati." [Camerarius, Hist. narr. de Fratr. etc. 9.]

WILKINSONIANS. A sect of the Brownists, followers of a preacher named Wilkinson, "whose disciples in a short time grew so strong in the spirit that they stoutly affirmed that they were Apostles, as Peter and Paul, and the rest; and therefore they deny communion with all others that will not give them that title." [Pagitt's Heresiography, p. 87, ed. 1662.]

WILKINSONIANS. An obscure sect of American fanatics, followers of an impostor named Jemima Wilkinson, who formed a settlement which she called the "New Jerusalem" between Geneva Lake and Crooked Lake, in Yates County, New York, at the close of the last century. This woman was originally a Quakeress, being born at Rhode Island in the year 1753, and living until 1819. When she was about twenty-five years old, she collected a few followers around her, to whom she gave the name of "Universal Friends," her special claims being that she had been raised from the dead—having been for some time in a trance—that she could work miracles, that she could prophesy, and that she had attained perfection. In developing the latter claim, Jemima Wilkinson anticipated the English fanatic Prince [PRINCETES], pretending to be a Divine Person by whom the Millennium was to be established, appointing two "witnesses," and living with her proselytes in a luxurious house. On one occasion she declared her intention of walking across Seneca Lake; but when all the preparations were made she inquired of her followers whether they had faith to believe in her power of doing so, and on their replying in the affirmative, declared that it was not, under the circumstances, necessary for her to perform the miracle.

WJETKAERS. An insignificant branch of Russian dissenters, who during a time of persecution [c. A.D. 1730] took refuge in the islands of Wjetka, in a small river between Russia and Poland, whence their name. Here they formed a separate community and built two monasteries, from which fifty years later some of them migrated to Poland and built a church and convent at Tschernoboltz. They originally separated from the POPOFSCHINS, the chief distinction of Tschernoboltzi or Wjetkaers being that they refuse to take oaths, and will not offer prayer for the Emperor.

WROEITES. [CHRISTIAN ISRAELITES.]

XABATATI. The Latin name used by Mediæval writers for the SABOTIERS. [Ebrard. contr. Valdens. in Bibl. Max. Lugd. xxiv. 1572.]

XENAIANS. A Monophysite sect which held a middle line between the APHTHARTODOCETÆ and the PHTHARTOLATRÆ, maintaining that Christ truly became man, with the same capacities for suffering and the same human sensations as men in general, but that He did so of His own free will and choice, and not by the physical necessity of His human nature. This opinion originated with Xenaïas of Tahal in Persia [A.D. 488-518], who, after vigorously opposing the Nestorianism which was spreading in that country, was made Bishop of Mabug, or Hierapolis, by Peter Mongus, the Monophysite Patriarch of Alexandria. On becoming bishop, the name of Xenaïas was changed to Philoxenus, and this latter name is associated with the Syriac version of the New Testament known as the Philoxenian version, and which was made by a priest named Polycarp under his direction. The Xenaian party was strongly opposed, in common with the other Monophysites, by Flavian, the patriarch who succeeded Peter the Fuller. [Asseman. Biblioth. Orient. ii. 22.]

YEDINOVERTZI. A name signifying "Co-religionists," which was given to some members of the Russian sect of the STAROVERTZI in the reign of the Emperor Alexander [A.D. 1801-1825], when strong hopes were entertained of regaining them to the orthodox communion. They assume for themselves the name of Blagoslovenni, or "The Blessed."

YEZEDEES, or YEZIDIS. An ancient sect of unknown origin forming a tribe with a distinct nationality in the neighbourhood of Mosul. This obscure race appears to be a relic of the ancient Chaldaeans; and it is not improbable that their religion is formed from an early acquaintance with Christianity in an imperfect or a Gnostic form, being first grafted on the Chaldaean superstitions and then adulterated by contact with Mahometanism. They profess to take their name from Azad, the ancient name for God in the Yezedee dialect. "We are Yezedees," they say, "that is, worshippers of God."

The creed and devotional system of the sect is still but obscurely known, though some information was obtained upon the subject by Layard during the progress of his researches at Nineveh, and by Badger during his mission to the Nestorians. They believe in One Supreme God, respecting Whom they observe great reserve and mystery. They also believe Satan to be the chief of the angelic host, suffering punishment indeed at present for disobedience and rebellion, but still all-powerful, and eventually to be restored to his original position. Hence they hold the theory attributed to the sect called SATANIANS (being perhaps those who were intended to be designated by that name), namely, that the Evil One is to be propitiated both on account of his present power to do harm and also of his future power to do good. This leads them to curious superstitions, which have made it to be believed that they are devil-worshippers. "They cannot bear to speak of Satan," says Niebuhr, "nor even to hear his name mentioned. When the Yesidiens come to Mosul, they are not apprehended by the magistrate, although known, but the people often endeavour to trick them; for when these poor Yesidiens come to sell their eggs or butter, the purchasers contrive first to get their articles into their possession, and then begin uttering a thousand foolish expressions against Satan with a view to lower their price; upon which the Yesidiens are content to leave their goods at a loss rather than be the witnesses of such contemptuous language about the Devil" [Niebuhr's Voyage en Arabie, ii. 279]. Layard also mentions how nearly he had lost the goodwill of the heads of the tribe by suddenly beginning the word "Sheitan" in speaking of a mischievous boy who was placing his own life in danger.

But the creed of the Yezedees is by no means contained in these two tenets alone. They believe in the existence of seven archangels, originally next in order to Satan, and these they know by the ancient Jewish names as Gabriel, Michael, Raphael, Azrael, Dedrael, Azraphel, and Shem-keel. They also believe Christ to have been an angelic being, assigning to Him, perhaps, a similar position to that occupied by Him in the Gnostic systems, one parallel and opposed to that of Satan. A similar Gnostic association is shewn by the way in which they recognise the Incarnation: for while they confess that Christ took the form of man on earth, and ascended again to Heaven, and that He will come again to establish a new kingdom, they do not acknowledge that He died upon the cross. The further corruption of their imperfect Christianity by Mahometanism, is shewn by their expectation that at Christ's Second Advent He will be accompanied by Imaum Melidi. While, also, they receive the Old Testament with reverence and faith, they place the New Testament and the Koran on an equal footing as sacred books not to be rejected.

The Yezedees are strict in requiring all their children to be baptized within seven days of their birth, but with what kind of rite is not known. They also allow circumcision to be used, but it is supposed that this custom is only a concession to the Mahometans, for the sake of warding off the danger of persecution. They keep a fast of forty days in spring, which seems to be the Christian Lent and not the Mahometan Ramâdan. They likewise adopt the Christian rule of monogamy and divorce, the latter being only permitted in cases of adultery, and the divorced wife not being allowed to marry again. Their ministry consists of four orders, [1] Pirs or Saints, who are supposed by them to have the power of working miracles, and probably represent Apostles; [2] Sheikhs, of whom one is the head of the tribe, and who are probably representatives of the episcopal order; [3] Cawals, who are their ordinary priesthood; and [4] Fakirs, who are practically deacons, engaged in the inferior ministrations of their services. All these belong to one family, and the ordinary rule is that they shall not marry beyond the bounds of that family.

Some insight into the devotional customs of the Yezeedees was obtained by an East Indian chaplain named George Percy Badger, who, with his wife and sister, lived for several months in their neighbourhood. Their principal temple or church is named Sheikh Adi, and is situated in the hills about twenty miles north of Mosul and Nineveh. This consists of an oblong building divided into three principal parts, which bear much resemblance to the narthex or porch, the nave, and the chancel of an Eastern church. The two latter are divided into two aisles by a central arcade, and there is a third enclosed aisle on the north of the nave. There is a lavatory of running water in the porch, and another, fed by the same stream, in the nave, but there does not appear to be any altar, unless the tomb or shrine of Sheikh Adi (which was supposed by Mr. Badger to be a name of the Deity) is used as such, this shrine being in the northern aisle or enclosed chapel. The Christians of the neighbourhood believe that the temple of Sheikh Adi was originally a church, and dedicated in the name of Mar Addai or Thaddæus, one of the seventy evangelists, whose name is revered as the apostle of the district around.

Their worship of the Supreme God consists of two kinds, direct and indirect. The former is confined to a few hymns, which are handed down traditionally among the Cawals, and which are chanted at their principal festivals to the sound of flutes and tambourines. Of these festivals the two most important ones in the year are pilgrimages to Sheikh Adi, where they celebrate their religious rites with great rejoicing and festivity. Their "indirect worship" of the Deity is a kind of adoration of the sun, which consists of the ceremony of kissing its rays upon the ground as soon as they touch their feet in the early morning. They also hold fire and light in great reverence, will never spit into a fire, and often bathe their hands in a flame, passing them over their faces afterwards, as Christians do with the smoke of incense. Fountains and springs are also held sacred by them, and often have lamps burning by them at night as a mark of reverence. They appear to have no liturgy, and to use prayer very little, if at all, thus presenting a great contrast both to the Eastern Christians and to the Mahometans.

On New Year's Day the Yezeedees keep a festival which is believed to be one held in propitiation of Satan. No authentic information has been obtained as to the religious observances which are used on this occasion, but they are closely associated with some mysterious sacred image to which they give the name (at least when speaking of it to strangers) of Melek Taoos, or King Peacock. After much importunity and several decided refusals, Mrs. Badger was shewn a lamp with a bird surmounting two seven-wicked burners, which she was told was the Melek Taoos: but although this was believed by her, it seems very probable, from the readiness with which she was at last permitted to examine it, that this was some kind of ritual lamp exhibited to her to prevent further importunity by satisfying her curiosity. The mystery of their special symbol must be regarded as still unknown.

In the last century Father Besson, a Jesuit missionary in Mesopotamia, sent some of his staff to the Yezeedees to attempt their conversion; but the missionaries "returned after having shaken off the dust from their feet," convinced that they adored the author of all evil [Lettres Éclatantes et Curieuses, i. 135, iii. 462]. Mr. Badger's opinion of them was that they are ignorant to a proverb, and entertain the strongest prejudices against learning of every kind, that they are neither communicative nor frank respecting their own religion, and that they are perfectly indifferent about any communication which may be made to them respecting the doctrines of Christianity. [Layard's Nineveh and its Remains, i. 269. Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, 92. Badger's Nestorians and their Ritual, i. 105-134.]

ZABIANS. [MAGIANS.]

ZACCHÆANS. A local name for the Gnostics, mentioned by Epiphanius, but without adding where they were so called. [Epiphan. Hæres. xxvi. 3.]

ZANZALIANS. [JACOBITES.]

ZELANTES. [SPIRITUALS.]

ZELOTÆ. A name given to a sect of the Essenes, on account of their zeal in making converts. For their cruelty in killing those who refused to be circumcised, they were also called Sicarii, or Assassins. [Hippol. Refut. Hær. ix. 21.]

ZINZENDORF. The chief founder of the Herrnhuters, or MORAVIANS.

ZOARITES. An obscure sect of American Lutherans, settled in Tuscarawas.

ZOHARITES. A modern Jewish sect, so called from the Cabbalistic book Zohar, which they hold in great veneration. They hold a form of doctrine which bears some resemblance to Christianity, acknowledging a Trinity of Persons in the Godhead under the Name Elohim, considering the creation of Adam to have been an Incarnation of the Divine Nature, and looking for a future similar Incarnation in the person of a Messiah who will be the Saviour of Gentiles as well as Jews. The Zoharites may be considered as representing a phase of Judaism not uncommon in Christian ages, which rebels against a system that is manifestly effete, and yet declines to accept the true statement of that central fact of Christianity which has made it so.

ZOROASTRIANS. [PARSEES.]

ZWESTRIONES. [SCHWESTRIONES. LULARDS.]

ZWICKAU PROPHETS. Fanatic followers of Luther [A.D. 1521], who believed themselves to be the subjects of immediate inspiration. The leaders of the party were Nicholas Stork, a weaver of Zwickau, Mark Thomas, of the same trade and place, Mark Stübner, who had been a student at Wittenberg, and Thomas Münzer, Lutheran pastor of Zwickau, and subsequently the rebel chief of the Anabaptist rebellion. These fanatics rejected the Bible, considered human learning as a hindrance to religion [ABECEDARIANS], and predicted the overthrow of the existing governments to make way for the millennial reign of the Saints, that is of themselves. Stork declared that the angel Gabriel had appeared to him in a vision, saying to him, "Thou shalt sit on my throne;" and in anticipation of the new kingdom the prophets chose from the number of their followers twelve apostles and seventy evangelists. The labouring classes and the tradespeople eagerly fell in with the profane delusion; but when open sedition began to make itself known, the magistrates drove the leaders out of Zwickau and its neighbourhood. The name then merged in that of ANABAPTISTS.

ZWINGLIANS. A name given to the early Swiss Protestants from their leader Zwingli. It is also used as a controversial designation for those who hold Zwingli's extreme view respecting the mere memorial character of the Eucharist.

Ulrich Zwingli [A.D. 1484-1531] was the son of a yeoman at Wildhaus, in the Alpine valley of the Toggenburg, and was educated at Basle, Berne, and Vienna, in the former of which towns he afterwards became master of the school of St. Martin. In 1507 he was ordained priest, and continued for ten years to be parish priest of Glarus, in the diocese of Constance; but was engaged in 1512 and 1515 as an officer among the Papal troops which were contending against France, being present at the fatal battle of Marignano in the latter year, when the Swiss were fighting as mercenaries on both sides. In 1519 he was appointed chaplain (Accolitus Capellanus) to Pope Leo. X. and a preacher in the Cathedral of Zurich. There, in the early months of 1519, he was stirred up to oppose some of the corruptions of the day by the sale of indulgences, against which he preached with all his power. This led to his being accused of Lutheranism, and he was attacked both by the monks and secular canons of Zurich. Being thus brought into controversy with the other clergy of the city, and ultimately with the Bishop of Constance, Zwingli resigned a pension which he had for many years received from the Pope, and entered the lists as a Reformer, not resting until he had alienated the Canton of Zurich and a large part of Switzerland entirely from the See of Rome.

Zwingli had procured the civil abolition of clerical celibacy in 1522, and in 1524 he himself married. During the following years he held much bitter controversy with Luther on the subject of the Eucharist, the climax of their quarrel being reached at the well-known Conference of Marburg in 1529. In 1531 a war broke out between the Protestant and the Catholic Cantons of Switzerland, and Zwingli's unpriestly thirst for battle again leading him to the field, he was killed at Cappel on October 9th of that year.

The theology of Zwingli may be called that of the "extreme left" among the various schools into which the Continental Reformers were divided, and is of interest as having influenced the Puritans considerably, until Zwingli was overshadowed by Calvin in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. It may be viewed chiefly with reference to the doctrine of the Priesthood and the Sacraments.

Zwingli's innovations respecting the ministerial office began, as did those of Luther, with the principle that every one, in virtue of the priesthood common to all Christians, is at liberty to preach, preaching being the chief function of the ministry; but the irregularities of the Anabaptists compelled him to have recourse to some form of mission from the Church. In the Archeteles, A.D. 1522, the former principle is announced thus: "Non unus aut alterius de Scripturæ locis pronunciare sed omnium qui Christo credunt" [Zwingli's Works, i. p. 143]. In the Ecclesiastes, A.D. 1525, he lays down the necessity of a call to the ministry [ibid. ii. 52], notices three modes of election named in Scripture [ibid. 53, b.], and states it to be fitting that the election rest with the body of the faithful advised by learned men [ibid. 54]. All notion of priesthood or holy orders he rejected. "Ordo sacer, quem perhibent animæ characterem quendam, velut ungue, infligere, humanum figmentum est. Functio est, non dignitas, episcopatus, hoc est, verbi ministerium. Qui ergo administrat verbum, Episcopus est" [de Vera et Falsa Rel. ii. 217, b.]. The Basle Confession places the election in the ministers and church deputies, and mentions imposition of hands: "Quæ cum vera Dei electio sit, ecclesiæ suffragio, et manuum sacerdotis impositione, recte comprobatur" [Syll. Con. p. 106]. The Helvetic Confession decrees that ministers be called by an ecclesiastical and lawful election, either by the church or the deputies of the church [ibid. 68]: it adheres strictly to the Zwinglian principle that all ministers have one and the same power and function [ibid. 71]; but it deserts Zwingli in assigning them some power of governing [ibid. 71], and in vesting in them the power of excommunication [ibid. 73]. The Liturgy has nothing whatever in place of an Ordinal.

With perfect consistency, Zwingli held the exercise of the Keys to be nothing more than the general preaching of the Gospel. He writes, "Claves sunt pascere; pascere vero est evangelium adferre, cui qui crediderit salvus est, solutus est; qui non crediderit, condemnatus est, ligatus est" [de Ver. et F. Relig. ii. 196, b.]. His magisterial excommunication was only an external not a spiritual sentence [ibid. ii. p. 232]. The Helvetic Confession gives the same account of the power of the Keys, and the excommunication which it restores to the ministers still belongs therefore only to the "forum externum," not to the "forum conscientiæ."

When we turn to the doctrine of the Sacraments, we find that the current notion of Zwingli's teaching does not do him justice. It is too favourable. It does not recognise the entire bareness and coldness of the signs to which he reduces the Sacraments, but attributes to his teaching something of the warmth which Calvin threw around them. Sacraments are mere signs of initiation, or of pledging of continuance: they confer no grace; they minister no faith; they do not free the conscience; they are not even pledges of grace. Every spiritual efficacy which has been rightly or wrongly attributed to them is denied. "Sunt ergo sacramenta signa vel ceremoniæ, pæce tamen omnium dicam, sive neotericorum, sive veterum, quibus se homo Ecclesiæ probat aut candidatum aut militem esse Christi: redduntque Ecclesiæ totam potius certiorum de tua fide quam te" [ii. 198, b.]. Baptism does not make sons of God, but those who are already sons of God receive a token of sonship [ii. 477]. It does not take away sin [p. 121, b.]. The baptism of Christ and His Apostles was the same as the baptism of John [p. 68]. In the same way the Holy Eucharist is spoken of. It will be sufficient to quote one passage: "Hoc est, idest significat, Corpus Meum. Quod perinde est, ac si quæ matrona conjugis sui annulum ab hoc ipsi relictum monstrans, En conjux hic meus est, dicat" [ii. p. 293].

But articles of faith are weak compared with liturgical forms, and we must turn to the Zurich forms. The form of Baptism given in Zwingli's works [ii. 98] has a prayer for the infant that God would give him the light of faith, that he may be incorporated into Christ, buried with Him, etc. This refers all to a faith to be given to the child as he grows up to a capacity of faith. The form has not a word, either in prayer or in declaration, of remission of sins or of regeneration. The Liturgia Tigurina has the same prayer, and reads the same gospel from St. Mark. It adds the Creed, recited to the sureties as the belief in which the child is to be brought up, and the minister addresses the sureties: "We will bring unto the Saviour this child as far as it lieth in our power; that is, through Baptism we will receive him into His Church, and give him the earnest of the covenant and of the people of God." The words "earnest of the covenant" will bear a catholic meaning, but with Zwinglian teaching that meaning could not be given them.

The form of administration of the Holy Communion in the "Liturgy" is the same as that in Zwingli's Works, ii. 563, b. One difference in a rubric will be noticed presently. It will be sufficient to notice in this form how carefully the recital of the words of institution is divested of the significance which it bears in a true Liturgy. These words are not embodied in a prayer, but recited as a lesson to the public. The reception commences before the words are uttered:—

"Antistes. Hear now with devotion and faith, etc. Jesus, on the night, etc., brake it—the Antistes, thus speaking, taketh the bread out of the plate, breaketh it, and eateth a morsel of it, and the rest he giveth to the first archdeacon, who reacheth the same to the other ministers standing about the Table—and said, etc., gave it to them saying—then the Antistes taketh a cup, and having drunk some of it, he reacheth it, etc.—Drink ye all of it, etc.”

In short, the whole service is adapted to the doctrine of sacraments which has been stated. The difference found in one rubric is this. Zwingli describes the opening sermon, “Prædicatur satis longo sermone beneficium Dei quod nobis per filium suum impendit, et trahitur populus ad ejus rei cognitionem et gratiarum actionem.” The “Liturgy” directs the preacher to shew “how the Flesh and Blood of the Son of Man are verily eaten and drunk to everlasting life—how the Lord hath established this testament and ordinance to receive His heavenly gifts,” etc. That is, the teaching of Bullinger or Calvin found its way into the rubric, and was ordered for the sermon, but did not penetrate the form itself. We may probably conclude that the amendment was only in the leaders.

After this review, we may define Zwinglianism to be that system which turns the Church into a spiritual republic, without a priesthood and without sacraments.

It was this Swiss theology as modified by Bullinger that found advocates in England. Hooper, who left England for Zurich A.D. 1539, on the passing of the Six Articles Act, was a faithful follower of Bullinger. Peter Martyr, à Lasco, Dryander, Ochino, were on the same side, and with them acted most of the party of Marian exiles, who had been received with much hospitality at Zurich. Bullinger's works had a wide circulation in England, and the Decades were recommended to unlicensed curates under the degree of M.A. by the Canterbury Convocation of 1586.

It is worth while, in the last place, to notice the name which Luther gives the Zwinglians. He calls them “Suermeri,” fanatics. Luther's calling of names is often only railing, but in this case a sound and true principle is involved in the name. It might seem that fanaticism was the last thing to be attributed to a cold meagre teaching of a bare sign and untrue figure; and the doctors of this school boast that they give a plain, intelligible account of the sacrament, free from mysticism. Their account is no doubt plain and intelligible, for they reduce the sacrament to a mere piece of “memoria technica,” and divest it of all mystery. It follows that the only emotion which can be connected with such a bare sign is the purely human emotion which naturally arises when men act together in numbers. This is the very principle of the kind of fanaticism (Schwärmerei) which Luther attributed to them. It is in our nature that an emotion is intensified when we find it shared by others, and this principle enters into all acts of public worship. When there is an innate power in the ordinance celebrated the working of the principle is healthy and good. When there is no such innate power the working of the principle is fanaticism. A Zwinglian or Hoadleian commemoration, not having the inherent life of a Sacrament, depends upon merely human emotion for any warmth or power it may appear to possess.

DICTIONARY OF DOCTRINAL AND HISTORICAL THEOLOGY

BY VARIOUS WRITERS.

EDITED BY THE

REV. JOHN HENRY BLUNT, M.A., F.S.A.

EDITOR OF "THE ANNOTATED BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER."

One Volume, Imperial 8vo, 42s., or half-bound in Morocco, 52s. 6d.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Taken as a whole the articles are the work of practised writers, and well informed and solid theologians. . . . We know no book of its size and bulk which supplies the information here given at all; far less which supplies it in an arrangement so accessible, with a completeness of information so thorough, and with an ability in the treatment of profound subjects so great. Dr. Hook's most useful volume is a work of high calibre, but it is the work of a single mind. We have here a wider range of thought, from a greater variety of sides. We have here also the work of men who evidently know what they write about, and are somewhat more profound (to say the least), than the writers of the current Dictionaries of Sects and Heresies."—GUARDIAN.

"Mere antiquarianism, however interesting, has little place in it. But for all practical purposes its historical articles are excellent. They are of course, and of necessity, a good deal condensed, yet they are wonderfully complete; see for example such articles as 'Atheism,' 'Cabala,' 'Calvinism,' 'Canonization,' 'Convocations,' 'Evangelical,' 'Fathers,' 'Infant Baptism,' &c. &c. But the strength of the book lies in the theology proper, and herein more particularly in what one may call the metaphysical side of doctrine:—see the articles on 'Conceptualism,' 'Doubt,' 'Dualism,' 'Election,' 'Eternity,' 'Everlasting Punishment,' 'Fatalism,' and the like. We mention these as characteristic of the book. At the same time other more practical matters are fully dealt with. There are excellent and elaborate papers on such words as 'Eucharist,' 'Confession,' 'Blood,' 'Cross,' 'Anti-christ,' to say nothing of the host of minor matters on which it is most convenient to be able to turn to a book which gives you at a glance the pith of a whole library in a column or a page. Thus it will be obvious that it takes a very much wider range than any undertaking of the same kind in our language; and that to those of our clergy who have not the fortune to spend in books, and would not have the leisure to use them if they possessed them, it will be the most serviceable and reliable substitute for a large library we can think of. And in many cases, while keeping strictly within its province as a Dictionary, it contrives to be marvellously suggestive of thought and reflections, which a serious-minded man will take with him and ponder over for his own elaboration and future use. As an example of this we may refer to the whole article on Doubt. It is treated of under the successive heads of:—(1) its nature; (2) its origin; (3) the history of the principal periods of Doubt; (4) the consciousness—or actual experience of Doubt, and how to deal with its different phases and kinds; (5) the relations of Doubt to action and to belief. To explain a little we will here quote a paragraph or two, which may not be unacceptable to our readers. . . . The variety of the references given in the course of this article, and at its conclusion, show how carefully the writer has thought out and studied his subject in its various manifestations in many various minds, and illustrate very forcibly how much reading goes to a very small amount of space in anything worth the name of 'Dictionary of Theology.' We trust most sincerely that the book may be largely used. For a present to a clergyman on his ordination, or from a parishioner to his pastor, it would be most appropriate. It may indeed be called 'a box of tools for a working clergyman.'"—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"Seldom has an English work of equal magnitude been so permeated with Catholic instincts, and at the same time seldom has a work on theology been kept so free from the drift of rhetorical incrusation. Of course it is not meant that all these remarks apply in their full extent to every article. In a great Dictionary there are compositions, as in a great house there are vessels, of various kinds. Some of these at a future day may be replaced by others more substantial in their build, more proportionate in their outline, and more elaborate in their detail. But admitting all this, the whole remains a home to which the student will constantly recur, sure to find spacious chambers, substantial furniture, and (which is most important) no stinted light."—CHURCH REVIEW.

"The second and final instalment of Mr. Blunt's useful Dictionary, itself but a part of a more comprehensive plan, is now before the public, and fully sustains the mainly favourable impression created by the appearance of the first part. Within the sphere it has marked out for itself, no equally useful book of reference exists in English for the elucidation of theological problems. . . . Entries which display much care, research, and judgment in compilation, and which will make the task of the parish priest who is brought face to face with any of the practical questions which they involve far easier than has been hitherto. The very fact that the utterances are here and there somewhat more guarded and hesitating than quite accords with our judgment, is a gain in so far as it protects the work from the charge of inculcating extreme views, and will thus secure its admission in many places where moderation is accounted the crowning grace."—CHURCH TIMES.

"The writers who are at work on it are scholars and theologians, and earnest defenders of the Christian faith. They evidently hold fast the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and have the religious instruction of the rising ministry at heart. Moreover, their scheme is a noble one; it does credit not only to their learning and zeal, but also to their tact and discretion."—LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"Infinitely the best book of the kind in the language; and, if not the best conceivable, it is perhaps the best we are ever likely to see within its compass as to size and scope. Accurate and succinct in statement, it may safely be trusted as a handbook as regards facts, while in our judgment, this second part still maintains the character we gave the first, namely, of showing most ability in its way of treating the more abstract and metaphysical side of theological questions. The liturgical articles also in this part deserve especial mention. The book is sure to make its own way by sheer force of usefulness."—LITERARY CHURCHMAN.

"It is not open to doubt that this work, of which the second and concluding part has just been issued, is in every sense a valuable and important one. Mr. Blunt's Dictionary is a most acceptable addition to English theological literature. Its general style is terse and vigorous. Whilst its pages are free from wordiness, there is none of that undue condensation which, under the plea of judicious brevity, veils a mere empty jotting down of familiar statements (and mis-statements), at second or, it may be, third hand from existing works. Dean Hook's well-known Dictionary makes the nearest approach to the one now before us, but Mr. Blunt's is decidedly the better of the two."—ENGLISH CHURCHMAN.

"It will be found of admirable service to all students of theology, as advancing and maintaining the Church's views on all subjects as fall within the range of fair argument and inquiry. It is not often that a work of so comprehensive and so profound a nature is marked to the very end by so many signs of wide and careful research, sound criticism, and well-founded and well-expressed belief."—STANDARD.
