ABECEDARIANS. A name given to the ZWICKAU PROPHETS [A.D. 1520], a section of the German Anabaptists, who claimed to have direct inspiration from God, and maintained that this inspiration was obstructed by human learning. They carried this theory to such a length as to declare that it was desirable never even to learn A B C, since all human learning is founded on the alphabet, and the knowledge of it thus opens the door to that which is an obstacle to Divine illumination. Nicholas Stork, a weaver of Zwickau, was the first to proclaim this principle, but it was afterwards supported by Carlstadt, once an ally of Luther, who, yielding to Stork's invectives against learning, shut up his books, resigned his degree of Doctor of Divinity, forsook all study of Holy Scripture, and looked for Divine truth at the mouths of those who, by all ordinary men, were accounted the most ignorant of mankind. The Abecedarian theory, in a more moderate form, has had much influence on some modern sects, especially the more ignorant sects of Methodists.

ABELARD. [SCHOOLMEN. NOMINALISTS.]

ABELIANS. [ABELONITES.]

ABELITES. [ABELONITES.]

ABELOITES. [ABELONITES.]

ABELONITES. An obscure African sect, deriving its name from Abel, the son of Adam. The exact date of its origin is unknown, but it became extinct during the reign of Theodosius the Younger [A.D. 408-450], for at the time when St. Augustine composed his book on Heresies [cap. 87], he alludes to it as having lingered on as late as his time in a village near Hippo, of which he was bishop [A.D. 395-430]. The members of this sect adopted the eccentric practice of marrying wives without procreating children, in supposed imitation of Abel, who was stated to have had a wife, but not to have known her; and in lieu of the consummation of marriage, and at the same time to enable them to perpetuate their sect, the husband and wife adopted two children of different sexes, who in their turn were to abstain from all intercourse, and on the death of their foster-parents to resort to the same plan of adoption. It is said that young persons were easily procured for that purpose from the superfluous families of the poor population in the neighbourhood. The conduct of the Abelonites was a mistaken attempt to carry out literally such texts as, "It remaineth that both they that have wives be as though they had none" [1 Cor. vii. 29]. But there does not seem any historical evidence for connecting them with the Gnostics generally, as Mosheim does, or with the Manichæans in particular, as does Herzog. [Aug. de Hæres. cap. 87; Prædestinati liber, cap. 87. Walch, Hist. Ketzereien, i. 607.]

ABENONITÆ. [ABELONITES.]

ABLAVIUS. The historian Nicephorus mentions a heretic of this name as having been Novatian, bishop of Nicæa about A.D. 430. He had been a pupil of the sophist Troilus, and became celebrated as one of the foremost orators of his day. He seems to have taught the Novatian heresy in its most extreme form, maintaining that Baptism is the only means by which remission of sins can be obtained; and that, consequently, penitence and mortification of the flesh are utterly useless. [Niceph. Hist. Eccl. xiv. 15. Socrat. Hist. Eccl. vii. 12.]

ABRAHAMITES. A branch of the PAULICIANS, so called from their founder Abraham, or Ibrahim, a native of Antioch, who lived in the end of the eighth and the beginning of the ninth century. They do not appear to have held any distinctive tenets, but were simply Antiochean Paulicians: and the heresy was soon suppressed in that city by the vigorous opposition of the patriarch Cyriacus.

ABRAHAMITES. A Bohemian sect of no importance, existing at the end of the last century in the town of Pardubitz and its neighbourhood. They professed to follow the religion of Abraham before he was circumcised, rejected all distinctively Christian doctrine, and only acknowledged the Decalogue and the Lord's Prayer as Holy Scriptures.

ABSTINENTES. A sect which arose in Gaul and Spain, at the close of the third century, during the reigns of Diocletian and Maximian, and in the pontificate of Marcellinus. Like the Eastern ENCRATITES, they held Gnostic views on the subject of marriage, which they denounced not as absolutely wrong, but as a thing to be avoided by those who sought sanctity. This was their deduction from such texts in Holy Scripture as "There be eunuchs which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of Heaven's sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it" [Matt. xix. 12], and "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord" [Heb. xii. 14]; and their argument ran thus: Christ must have preached some new virtue, or have performed some praiseworthy action not commanded in the Old Testament. Did He come to teach the fear of God? This is contained in the Law. Was it to condemn envy, covetousness, and the like? This was done in the Old Testament. He could not, therefore, have any other view but to preach continence to the world, practising Himself that chastity without which everlasting life could not be attained [Epiphan. adv. Hæres. lib. ii. tom. 2, p. 710]. They also condemned the use of meat, as having been created by the devil and not by God [Philaster, cap. 84]: to which later writers add that, while admitting the Godhead of the Father and the Son, they held the Holy Ghost to be merely a created Being. Led perhaps by the similarity of some of their views, Philaster connects the Abstinentes with the Gnostics and Manichæans, and Baronius [in Annal. ad ann. 288] identifies them with the HIERACITES.

ACACIANS. Three broad lines can be drawn among the various subdivisions into which Arianism branched about the middle of the fourth century. [1.] Semi-Arians, of whom Basil of Ancyra and George of Laodiceæ were the leaders. [2.] The Anomœans (ἀνόμοιοι), or Ultra-Arians, followers of Aëtius and his pupil Eunomius, Bishop of Cyzicum. [3.] Between these two extremes rose the Acacians, a third party, who would neither allow any approximation to the orthodox doctrine of the Homœousion, nor yet admit that the Second Person in the Trinity was a mere creature, on the level of all other created beings. They derived their name from Acacius, who succeeded Eusebius as Bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine [A.D. 338], a person possessed of many of the qualifications necessary for the leadership of a party. He was strong and active, a fluent speaker, and evinced his regard for learning by taking great pains to increase his predecessor's library [Tillemont, Mém. vol. xv. 458, edit. Brux. 1707]. At the same time he was extremely unscrupulous and fickle: at first a furious Arian under Constantius, who sheltered him from the decree of deposition passed by a majority of the Semi-Arian Council held at Sardica [A.D. 347], he became a Catholic under Jovian, and veered round to Arianism once more under Valens. He was prominently concerned in the banishment of Liberius and the substitution of the antipope Felix [A.D. 355-358], after whose expulsion a sentence of deposition was passed against him at Seleucia [A.D. 359], and repeated at the Council of Lampsacus [A.D. 365], which he only survived for about a twelvemonth.

The Acacians as a body partook of the chameleon character of their teacher, and the shifts were various by which they attempted to sustain their indeterminate position between the Semi- and the Ultra-Arians. Their end would be obtained at one time by an intellectual subterfuge, at another time by the abolition of the terms of technical theology.

In A.D. 363, on the ascent of the orthodox Jovian to the throne, they attended a synod held at Antioch under Meletius, and agreed to sign the Nicene Creed, with a mental reservation to the effect that the expression "consubstantial" or "co-essential" meant no more than begotten of the Father's essence, and therefore like Him in essence. Four years previously, at Seleucia in Isauria [A.D. 359], they had attempted to banish the term ὁμοία altogether, with its compounds ὁμοούσιον and ὁμοιούσιον, and asked to be allowed to adopt a formula of belief in God's only Son, without any further qualification as to His nature; rejecting "consustantial" as not found in Holy Scripture, and the phrase ἀνόμοιον τῷ Πατρί, as equally defenceless. On being further pressed, they allowed the Son to be like the Father, but seemed to prefer the absence of closer definition. But if the Son was like the Father, in what, asked the orthodox party, did the resemblance consist? Was it merely a resemblance in respect of will? or was it a resemblance of a still more unreal character, like that of a statue to the original, which involves no inherent element of identity? The answer of the Acacians to these questions must be discovered from the creed which was promulgated on that occasion, the precise terms of which have been preserved:

"We confess and believe in one God the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and earth, and of things visible and invisible.

"We believe also in our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of Him without any passion (ἀπαθὴς), before all ages, the God Word, God of God, Only-begotten, Light, Life, Truth, Wisdom, Virtue, by Whom all things were made which are in Heaven and earth, whether visible or invisible. We believe Him to have assumed flesh of the Blessed Virgin at the end of the world to put away sin, and that He was made man, that He suffered also for our sins, rose again, and having ascended into Heaven, is seated at the right hand of the Father, and shall come again with glory to judge the quick and dead.

"We believe also in one Holy Spirit, Whom our Saviour and Lord Jesus Christ called the Paraclete, and promised that He would send the same on His Apostles after His departure, Whom He both truly sent, and by Him doth sanctify the faithful in the Church, who are baptized in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. But whosoever preach anything beyond what is contained in this Creed the Catholic Church considers them as aliens." [Epiphan. Hæres. lxxiii.]

The following forty-three bishops subscribed to the above Creed:—Acacius, Bishop of Cæsarea, Basil of Ancyra, Mark of Arethusa, George of Alexandria, Pancratius, Hypatian, Uranius of Tyre, Eutychius of Eleutheropolis, Zoilus of Larissa in Syria, Seras of Paretonium in Libya, Paul of Emessa, Eustathius of Epiphania, Irenæus of Tripolis in Phœnicia, Eusebius of Seleucia in Syria, Eutychian of Patara in Lycoia, Eustathius of Pinara and Didyma, Basil of Caucica in Lydia, Peter of Hippus in Palestine, Stephen of Ptolemais in Libya, Eudoxius, Apollonius of Oxyrinchus, Theoctistus of Ostracine, Leontius of Lydia, Theodosius of Philadelphia, Phœbus of Polychalanda in Lydia, Magnus of Themisi in Phrygia, Evagrius of Mytilene, Cyron of Doliche, Augustus of Euphratesia, Pollux of the second province of Libya, Pancratius of Pelusium, Philicadus of Augustada in Phrygia, Serapion of Antipyrgum in Libya, Eusebius of Sebaste in Palestine, Heliodorus of Sezusa in Pentapolis, Ptolemy of Thmuis Augustoniæ, Angarus of Cyrus Euphrasia, Exeresius of Gerasa, Arabion of Adrai, Charisius of Azotus, Elissæus of Diocletianopolis, Germanus of Petræ, and Barochius of Arabia. [Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. i. 306. Tillemont, Mémoires, tom. vi. 304, Paris edit. Nicephorus, Eccles. Hist. lib. ix. Epiphanius, Hæres. lxxiii.]

ACCAOPHORI. A sect of heretics which used water instead of wine for the Holy Eucharist has this name given to it by Timotheus Presbyter, and he traces their origin to the followers of Tatian, or the Encratites. But he adds that they were also called Hydroparastatæ, and hence "Accaophori" is supposed to be merely a misreading for SACCAOPHORI. [Timoth. Presb. in ed. Combeftian. Auct. nov. bibl. Patr. Græco-Latin. ii. 451. Coteler. Mon. eccl. Græc. i. 776. Ittig, De Heresiarch. II. xii. 13.]

ACEPHALI [ἀ—κεφαλή]. I. The Monophysite Acephali. In the year A.D. 482, while the Monophysite and Monothelite controversies were raging, the Emperor Zeno issued his famous letter of attempted reconciliation entitled the HENOTICON. Peter Mongus, who had been the bitter opponent of, and had been excommunicated by Proterius, a former bishop of Alexandria [A.D. 457], was informed that he might be elevated to that see, then vacant by the expulsion of John Talaia, on the two conditions of admitting the Proterians to communion and subscribing the Henoticon. On Peter's assent to these conditions, most of the Catholics submitted to his jurisdiction; but the Ultra-Eutychians still clinging to their denial of the two natures in Christ, and still bitterly hostile to the Council of Chalcedon, withdrew themselves, and formed a sect which, either from having no one conspicuous leader, or from the absence of bishops to head the movement, was called the sect of the Acephali.

These Acephali broke up into the three sects of ANTHROPOMORPHITES, BARSANUPHISTS, and ESAIANISTS, but all remained separate from the body of the Monophysites for about three hundred years, though still retaining the distinctive name of the original sect. The Acephali were, however, gradually absorbed by the JACOBITES (as the Monophysites were called in later times), and ceased to exist as a separate sect at the beginning of the ninth century.

II. The Nestorian Acephali. The title of Acephali was also applied to those who would not adhere to John, Patriarch of Antioch, and Cyril, Patriarch of Alexandria, in the condemnation of Nestorius at the General Council of Ephesus [A.D. 431].

III. The followers of Severus the Monophysite, Bishop of Antioch, who added to the Trisagion the words "Who was crucified for us," and who was deprived of his see and retired to Alexandria [A.D. 518].

IV. All priests refusing allegiance to their diocesans, or suffragan bishops rebelling against their metropolitans.

[For further information about the Alexandrian Acephali, consult Pseudo-Jerome, de Hæres. 43; Isidore, 67; Honorius, 82; Leontius, Lib. de Sectis, art. v.; Gibbon's Rom. Empire, vi. 32. There is also a lengthy refutation of their doctrines by Rusticus Diaconus, contra Acephalos præfatio, incerto interprete.]

ACCEMITÆ [ἀ—κοιμώμεναι]. The name of "the Sleepless," or "Watchers," was given to an Eastern monastic order founded by Alexander, himself a Syrian monk, under the auspices of Gennadius, Patriarch of Constantinople [A.D. 428-430]. Baronius puts the date rather later, and ascribes their foundation to a person named Marcellus in the middle of the fifth century [Bar. Ann. 459, ex actis Marcelli apud Surium], but the earlier date is more generally received. The Acœmitæ did not, as their name would imply, literally abstain from all sleep, but divided themselves into three "watches," each carrying on their devotions for eight hours, so that an uninterrupted round of worship rose perpetually from their monastery. They became famous both for their special sanctity and, notwithstanding that a suspicion of heresy attached to their founder Alexander, for their rigid orthodoxy. In A.D. 484, when Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, was condemned by Felix in synod for holding communion with Peter Mongus, Bishop of Alexandria, the Acœmitæ sided with the Pope against their own bishop. This order afterwards obtained the name of Studites, from Studius, a rich Roman noble of consular dignity, who went to Constantinople during the episcopate of Gennadius, and erected a cloister especially for them [Niceph. Hist. Eccl. xv. 23]. In later days the Acœmitæ were believed to have inclined to Nestorianism.

ACTISTETES. A section of the JULIANISTS, who took their name from the Greek word by which a being is defined as uncreated [ἀκτιστος], in opposition to the CTISTOLATRÆ. The Actistetes maintained that after the Incarnation Christ ought not to be spoken of as a created Being, even in respect of His human nature; thereby contradicting the words of the Nicene Creed, "καὶ ἐνανθρωπήσαντα," "et Homo factus est," "and was made Man." This dogma was, in reality, a form of the elder heresy of the DOCETÆ, for since a Being wholly uncreated must be wholly God, hence the reality of our Lord's human nature was a doctrine as incompatible with the belief of one sect as it was with that of the other. [Dörner's Person of Christ, II. i. 131, Clark's transl.]

ACUANITES. The Manichees were so called in the time of Epiphanius, from their leader in it is uncertain whether this expression means that no two of them ever ate in common, or whether they only declined to break bread with those who did not belong to their own sect. St. Augustine informs us, that while holding the divinity of the First and Second Persons of the Trinity, they rejected that of the Holy Spirit [Aug. de Hæres. 71], on which, and other points, they engaged in a controversy with the bishops of Ephesus.

ADELPHIANS. One of the numerous names given to the different branches of the MESSALIANs or EUCHITES, which sprang up in the East during the fourth century, and all of which, in various ways, laid great stress on the necessity of incessant prayer to banish evil, and unite the soul to God. The Adelphians are so-called from their leader, Adelphius, a Galatian by birth, who is mentioned as being excluded from a synod held at Syda [c. A.D. 368] against the Messalians. They were eventually banished from Syria into Pamphylia, where they succeeded in making a limited number of converts. They [1] rejected the Eucharist and other ordinances; and [2] objecting to manual labour, indulged in long sleeps and visions, whence they shared with the Euchites the title of "Enthusiastæ;" [3] like the Lampetians, Marcianists, Choreutæ, and other branches of the Euchites, they treated Sunday as a fast-day, a practice condemned by many writers, and finally forbidden by the fifty-fifth canon of the council of Trullo [A.D. 692]. In a conference which took place between Flavianus, Bishop of Antioch, and Adelphius [A.D. 381], the latter allowed that he rejected baptism, and asserted that grace could only be obtained, and that demons could only be expelled, by incessant prayer. The scriptural authority for this was the text, "Men ought always to pray and not to faint" [Luke xviii. 1]. But according to the Adelphian theory, the efficacy of prayer depended solely on its length or intensity, not on the Being to Whom it was addressed; and the devotions of the Jew, the heretic, the infidel, and the sinner, were of equal avail. It was supposed that each man at his birth inherited, along with the human nature derived from Adam, the servitude of evil demons, and that after they had been driven out by incessant prayer, the Holy Spirit would come, signifying its presence in a visible and sensible fashion, freeing the body from all fear of illness, and the mind from all inclination to sin, so that there was no longer any need of fasting to keep the body in subjection, or of any doctrine to strengthen, or, as the Adelphians would say, to fetter the soul. A man once fully possessed by this Divine influence, not only imagined himself free from all ill, but could foresee future events, and obtain a clear vision of the Trinity.

ADESSENARIANS. A controversial designation (adopted by Prateolus, in his Elenchus Hæreticorum) for the Lutherans of the sixteenth century, who maintained that Christ is really and truly present (adesse) in the Holy Eucharist, but denied that His presence involved the transubstantiation of the elements in the sense of Roman theologians. The term was intended to include all who hold the Real Presence of Christ's Body and Blood, "in," "with," or "under the form of," the bread and the wine, but to exclude all who hold that the presence of Christ in the Eucharist is merely His figurative presence "in the heart" (or devotional thoughts) of the faithful receiver. [IMPANATORS.] But it is a mistake to suppose that there was ever an organized sect bearing the name of Adessenarians.

ADIAPHORISTS. A name given to Melanchthon and his party, on account of their maintaining that many customs and doctrines for and against which the stricter Lutherans contended were not worth contending about, being things that were in themselves indifferent (ἀδιάφορα).

The "Adiaphoristic controversy" originated in the year 1548, when Maurice, the Elector of Saxony, began his rule by calling an assembly of Lutheran divines together at Leipsic, to consider whether or not they should adopt the INTERIM which the Emperor Charles V. had imposed upon his subjects. Luther had now been dead for nearly two years, and Melanchthon had become the leading theologian of the Lutheran party in Germany. His great desire was for peace and the cessation of controversy; and thus, on the one hand, he wished to hold out a hand to the Calvinists by toning down Luther's dogmatism as regarded the doctrine of the Eucharist, while, on the other, he desired to draw nearer to the Church by treating as indifferent some doctrinal points which Luther had considered essential, and by a return to its ancient customs. At the Leipsic conference, it was decided that "in rebus medii generis, seu Adiaphoris" the Emperor might be obeyed and his "Interim" accepted: and the decision at which Melanchthon and his friends arrived is thus called "The Leipsic Interim." Among the Adiaphora they included the Eucharistic vestments, the elevation of the host and its accompanying ceremonies, the use of choral services and of intonation by the officiating clergyman, the use of Latin in Divine service, the observance of Saints' days, the use of Extreme Unction, the Primacy (as distinguished from the Supremacy) of the Pope, and lastly the doctrine of salvation by faith alone without good works. The Leipsic Interim of Melanchthon was thus only a modified form of that proposed by the Emperor at Augsburg, and the platform which it offered for reunion with the Church was hateful to the stricter Lutherans.

The "Anti-Adiaphorists" were led by Flacius Illyricus, a man who inherited no small portion of Luther's controversial fire and energy, and they thus acquired the name of "Flacians," as the Adiaphorists did that of "Philippists" from Melanchthon. Endless discussions were raised [1] as to the essential or non-essential character of the customs and doctrines above enumerated, and [2] as to the lawfulness of giving up or of adopting even any that were allowed to be non-essential for the sake of concession to the enemies of "the truth," that is of Lutheranism. These controversies lasted long after the Interim itself had fallen to the ground, to give rise to others not less bitter. [AMSDORFIANS. SYNERGISTS].

ADIMANTHUS is referred to by Nicephorus, the ecclesiastical historian, as one of the three principal followers of Manes. He lived about A.D. 270, and wrote a book to prove that the doctrines taught in the Gospels and Epistles were opposed to those of the ancient law and of the prophets, which was confuted by St. Augustine in his treatise Contra Adimantum, Manichæi discipulum. [Aug. Opp. ix. 153, ed. Bened.]

ADMONITIONISTS. A party of the Puritans was so called on account of an "Admonition to the Parliament," in twenty-three chapters, which was printed in the year 1572. This "Admonition" called for a reconstruction of the Church of England on the most extreme Puritan platform, and is characterized even by so moderate a writer as Soames as a "mass of encroaching intolerance, captiousness, inaccuracy, envy, and scurrility." It was composed principally by two London clergymen named Field and Wilcox, who were imprisoned for it as a libel. Whitgift wrote a reply to it, which was answered by Cartwright. The Admonitionists established a secret conventicle at Wandsworth, which was the first Presbyterian community set up in England. [Neale's Hist. Puritans, i. 285, ed. 1732. ADOPTIONISTS. This is the name of a sect which arose in Western Christendom towards the close of the eighth century, their distinctive theological tenet being that Jesus Christ, as far as His Manhood is concerned, was the Son of God the Father by adoption. Their doctrine has been very generally supposed to have been a revival in the West of the ancient error of the Bonosians, condemned at the Council of Capua [A.D. 389], or of Nestorianism condemned at the third Ecumenical Council of Ephesus [A.D. 431]. Such was the opinion of Pope Adrian, who described Elipandus as the successor of Nestorius in his circular letter to the orthodox bishops of Spain [A.D. 785], and the following passages from the Fathers have been quoted as containing an anticipatory condemnation of Adoptionism. St. Cyril of Jerusalem [A.D. 348-386] said that "Christ is the Son of God by nature, begotten of the Father, and not by adoption" [Catech. lect. xi.]. St. Ambrose [A.D. 374-396], that "we do not speak of an adopted son as a son by nature, but we do say that a son by nature is a true son" [de Incarnat. viii.]. St. Augustine [A.D. 395-430], that "we to whom God has given power to become His sons are not begotten of His nature and substance, as 'His Only-Begotten,' but are adopted by His love; the Apostle often using the word for no other purpose than to distinguish the Only-Begotten from the sons by adoption" [Aug. de Consens. Evang. ii. 3]. St. Hilary of Arles [A.D. 429-449], that "the Son of God is not a false God, or God by adoption, or God by metaphor (nec adoptivus nec connuncupatus), but true God"

[Hilar. de Trin. v. 5]; and the eleventh Council of Toledo [A.D. 675] clearly laid down the same doctrine: "This Son of God is His Son by nature, not by adoption." It is plain from these quotations that the idea of adoption underlay many errors on the subject of Christ's Person, from the earlier times up to the seventh century, and yet it has been the tendency of modern criticism to disconnect Adoptionism from them. The reason for this will be seen if we first consider in what sense the earlier heretics held adoption, and then contrast their teaching with the fully systematized dogma of the Adoptionists themselves. The Gnostics were in a certain sense Adoptionists. They universally held the Manhood of Christ to have been of transient and unessential significance, but invented different theories about the reason why the Æon Christ deigned to adopt it as His habitation. The Cerinthians imagined that, by reason of His wisdom, virtue and purity, the Man Jesus became worthy of such adoption and of the title Son of God. The Basilidians taught that, though not free from our common sinful nature, Jesus was arbitrarily selected by the eternal and divine decree to receive Christ, and that Christ coming into Him at the time of His baptism, purified Him and rendered Him a perfect organ for the purposes of the Divine revelation. The Valentinians went further, and argued that the pre-eminent degree of wisdom and virtue possessed by the Man Jesus presupposed a previous and God-bestowed endowment, and that therefore, by a supernatural birth, He was fitted for adoption as the receptacle of the Divine element in Christ. Bonosus of Sardica [A.D. 390] regarded Christ as a mere adopted man. Migetius, reviving Sabellianism in Spain in the eighth century, taught that the Divine Wisdom or Logos adopted the Person of Jesus for an incarnate manifestation, just as God the Father had assumed the form of David, and the Holy Ghost that of St. Paul. Nestorius denied the identity or unity of the Person of Christ, in Whom the two natures, the Divine and human, were united. He denied the truth that the Eternal Son of God was conceived and born. Mary was the mother of Christ, not the mother of God (Χριστοτόκος not Θεοτόκος); the two natures were to be distinctly separated, and he admitted only a junction by indwelling of the Deity, not a perfect union in one Person. It seemed to him that the real duality of the wills and natures could only be established at the price of a duality of personalities, a human subject being required for the human, as a Divine subject was for the Divine nature. He forgot that Divine mysteries are not to be explained or rejected on the ordinary principles of human reasoning. And whether or not the premisses of two essentially different natures and wills render the conclusion of the existence of two persons in one Christ logically unavoidable, at least such a conclusion was inconsistent with Holy Scripture, and would be necessarily rejected by the orthodox Church, whether presented to mankind in the form of Nestorianism in the fifth, or of Adoptionism in the eighth century. We are now brought to the difficult question as to whether there was any connection doctrinally or historically between the latter and any of the former, and, if so, in what that relationship consists.

Four views of the relation of Adoptionism to preceding heresy have been held by various theologians. [a] By contemporaries Adoptionism was regarded as identical with, and therefore merely a revival of, Nestorianism. [b] Others have regarded it as an unvanquished remainder, or as a lineal descendant, slightly altered and disfigured, of the ancient Eastern heresies. [c] More modern writers (e.g., Walchius in the last century) would regard it as differing rather verbally than essentially from the Catholic doctrine; or [d] as the first proof of awakening intellectual energy in a barbarian nation, by which the logical inconsistency of the orthodox teaching on the subject of the two natures in Christ was discovered, and by which an attempt was made to avoid it. None of these aspects are entirely just. The intellectual activity of Spain during preceding centuries, especially on theological questions, had been far too great to allow us to regard Adoptionism as the undisciplined exercise of a newly awakened interest in questions of Christian controversy. The labours of Adrian I., Charlemagne, Alcuin, and others, to suppress it, equally preclude us from believing that it was merely a superficial deviation from the truth, and that the whole contest which raged in Christian Europe at the close of the eighth and beginning of the ninth centuries, might have been solved by explanation of the grammatical terms employed. Again, an examination of the doctrines of Eliandus and Felix will present to us points which intrinsically disconnect them from those of Nestorius, and a glance at the preceding ecclesiastical contentions in Spain will shew us the gulf that historically separates the two, while they also negatively prepare the way for the distinctive features of Adoptionism.

In the first place, the contact of the Spanish Church with the Arianism of the Goths and the amalgamation which took place between the Spanish population and the Germanic tribes would naturally pave the way for disputes about the Manhood and Divinity of Christ. Secondly, the protracted contest with Priscillianism, with Sabellianism, with the Monophysites (condemned at the eleventh and fourteenth councils of Toledo), and with the Monothelites (condemned at the sixth General Council at Constantinople), would all equally tend to give prominence to the distinction of the two natures in the one Person of Christ. One of the primary objects of the Adoptionists was, legitimately enough, to insist on the real Humanity of our Lord; but their anxiety on this point led them to make use of arguments which implied a human person equally with a human nature, and so assimilated their doctrine to Nestorianism. Although, therefore, there was a sufficient superficial resemblance between these two to account for the Pope branding the Spanish bishops with the imputation of the older heresy, (especially if we make allowance for the difficulty of obtaining correct information, and for the acrimony which too often accompanies polemical theology,) we must accurately distinguish them, and on the following points:—

[a] The Adoptionists had no objection to the term Θεοτόκος as applied to the Blessed Virgin, which epithet had been expressly rejected by the Nestorians.

[b] While the Nestorians laid special stress on there being two Persons in Christ, the former protested against the doctrine of the duality of Persons, as was even allowed by their opponents [Paulinus, i. 48], and in their memorial to Charlemagne they acknowledged the unity of Persons in plain terms: but they seem to have meant by this the juxtaposition of two distinct personal Beings, in such a way that the Son of God should be recognised as the vehicle of all predicates, but not in so close a manner as to amount to the absorption or almost transubstantiation of the human personality into the Divine Person, as was taught by the orthodox party.¹

[c] They taught that Christ assumed humanity, while the Nestorians spoke of Christ owing His exaltation to His virtue.

The real error of the Adoptionists lay in dwelling too strongly on certain aspects of the truth. They appealed to the repeated decisions of the Church against Monophysitism and Monothelitism; and maintained that the principle of duality, which had already been recognised in the assertion of two natures and two wills in Christ, ought to be carried into the sphere of the personality. But here the Church stopped: she had hitherto been gradually unfolding the dualistic view, but the German councils unanimously refused to allow the principle to be pushed into a region where it would apparently lead them back to the long vanquished error of Nestorius. If the Adoptionists were right, in what sense was Jesus the Son of God? Felix answered that the Father, Who was a Spirit, could not produce the Humanity of Christ from Himself [lib. iii. cap. 7]; that Christ could not be the natural Son of God in the same sense in which He was the natural Son of David [lib. i. 12]; and that to press the unity of Persons (which he still claimed to believe in), so far as to call Him, both in His divine and human nature, strictly Son of God, was to confound the Creator and the creature, the Word and the flesh, Him Who assumed and that which is assumed; and that therefore Christ in His human nature is only "Nuncupative Deus" [lib. iii. 17]. In support of this argument, he appealed to such passages as "the Head of Christ is God" [1 Cor. xi. 3]; to Christ's own admission that He Himself did not know the hour of judgment [Mark xiii. 32]; that none was good save God only [Mark x. 18].

How, he asked, if the man assumed by the Son of God was really the Son of God, could such expressions have any meaning at all? This question is met by the rejoinder that difficult passages of Scripture must not be thus isolated, but interpreted by reference to the general teaching of the Bible. The texts alleged by Felix must receive an interpretation not inconsistent with other passages where Christ is plainly called the Son of God: "For God so loved the world, that He gave His only-begotten Son" [John iii. 16]; "God sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh" [Rom. viii. 3]; "He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all" [viii. 32]; "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law" [Gal. iv. 4]; "God sent His only-begotten Son into the world, that we might live through Him" [1 John iv. 9].

Those writers on Adoptionism who would reduce the point at issue to a mere question of words, have asked whether adoption and assumption may not mean the same thing; for it has always been considered orthodox to say that Christ assumed our human nature. The answer to which is, that Felix spoke not of an assumed human nature, but of an assumed man; and secondly, that he spoke of two births in our Lord's life—the assumption of the man at the moment of conception by the Blessed Virgin Mary, the adoption of that man at the time of His baptism, thus distinguishing between the two. "He Who is the second Adam received these two generations; for in so far as He is man, our Redeemer embraced and contains within Himself the first, which is according to the flesh, and the second, which is spiritual, and takes place by adoption; the first, which He took upon Himself, by being born of a virgin; the second, which he began at His baptism and continued by His resurrection from the dead."¹ The opponents of Adoptionism urged that this teaching involved two Persons in Christ; also, that if Christ, as to His humanity, was not the proper Son of God, His mediatorial position was endangered, and the distance between Him and Christians was increased. To refuse therefore to attribute a separate personality to the Son of Man was no more than an act of justice to the Son of God, and no interference with the reality of the humanity. To all of which Felix rejoined that the duality of Persons was no more or less involved in his teaching than it was, logically speaking, implied in the previous decisions in favour of the two natures and the two wills, and that to designate Christ, as to His humanity, the proper Son of God, was to destroy the condescension of the Incarnation, and to rob it of its chief attractiveness for Christians. His view, however, involved two distinct lines, that of the Son of Man and Son of God, running in a harmonious parallel together, and either each possessing a separate personality (which the Adoptionists denied) or else reducing the personality to a meaningless and unsubstantial abstraction, a mere formal link between two essentially uncoalescing natures. Such a unity of Person is very different from that taught in the older creeds, and defended on the analogy of the union of soul and body: "For as the reasonable soul and flesh is one man, so God and man is one Christ." Alcuin works out this analogy with great force. He asks, "If every man is the proper son of his father—if so, we are reminded that men are not sons of their fathers as to the soul, but only as to the flesh; and therefore, if it is not allowable to designate the entire Christ as the proper Son of God, by parity of reasoning, no man can be called the son of his father." Again, he asks, "Does a man adopt his own son, or a stranger?" The answer is obviously, "a stranger." At what time then was Christ in that position with reference to God? and when did God, out of affection or necessity, condescend to the act of adoption? The whole question, whether, notwithstanding the reality of His human nature, the Son of Man can be strictly called the proper Son of God, depends on the further question, whether that which properly pertains to a substance must always be of the same substance as that to which it pertains. This Alcuin answers in the negative, maintaining that something which is of a different substance from another thing may possess as its property this other thing, in such a manner that, for the sake of this real and substantial relationship between the two, the latter may become a predicate of the former, and that therefore the Son of Man may be properly called the Son of God, and the Son of God identified as to Person with the Son of Man.²

Having thus described the doctrines of the Adoptionists, and the principal arguments by which they were supported and refuted, we proceed to give some account of the history of the sect.

History of the Adoptionists.—The originators of the theory of adoption, and the leaders of the Adoptionist movement, were Elipandus, Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, Bishop of Urgel, in Catalonia, who both flourished towards the close of the eighth century. In the year 783, the Archbishop wrote to Felix to ask his opinion about the Sonship of Christ, and the latter in his answer said, that as to His divinity, Christ was by nature and truly the Son of God; but that as man He was the Son of God in name and by adoption. Unfortunately neither letters are extant, so that we have no power to refute on intrinsic evidence the conjecture made by some historians, that their object was, by lowering the human character of Christ, to pave the way for a union between Christians and Mohammedans.³

The new theory was vigorously propagated. While Felix disseminated it in Septimania, Elipandus was advocating it in letters to his diocese, and tried to win over, among others, Adosinda, widow of Silo, king of Galitia, who, after her husband's death, had taken the veil. She however remained firm in the Catholic faith, and induced the learned theologians of the day to remonstrate with him, among whom were Etherius, Bishop of Osma, and Beatus, Abbot of the monastery of Valliscava, both Asturians, the latter of whom was charged by Elipandus with gross immorality. The confutation of Adoptionism was continued by Paulinus of Aquileia, Benedictus of Anien, Agobard, Archbishop of Lyons, and Alcuin, friend and preceptor of Charlemagne, who both personally confuted Felix, and also composed seven books against him, four books against Elipandus, and various letters on the subject addressed to Charlemagne, Elipandus, the monks of Gothia (ad monachos Gothiæ), and the brothers of Lyons (ad fratres Lugdunenses). Pope Adrian I. also [A.D. 785] wrote a letter to the orthodox bishops in Spain, warning them against the new doctrines, which the following passage proves him to have considered akin to Nestorianism:—

“The melancholy news has reached us from your land, that certain bishops resident there, namely, Elipandus and Ascarius, with other confederates, do not hesitate to call the Son of God an adopted Son, a blasphemy which no previous heretics have dared to enounce, unless it be that perfidious Nestorius, who confessed the Son of God to be a mere man. Wherefore by no means let such deadly poison insinuate itself into your neighbourhoods, or defile your love.”¹

Still the doctrine went on spreading, until it became necessary to make it the subject of conciliar condemnation. This was first done at the small Council of Narbonne [A.D. 788 or 791], again at the Synod of Ratisbon in Germany [A.D. 792], where Charlemagne presided in person, and before whom Felix first defended, then abjured and anathematized his own error;² but being still suspected, he was sent to Rome under the charge of a certain Angilbertus, and there imprisoned, until he consented to swear before the Euchariston St. Peter's tomb that he renounced his former opinions as heretical. Upon this assurance he was allowed to return to his diocese in Spain; but before he had been there long, he retracted his recantation and disseminated his former errors, until in A.D. 794 Charlemagne desired Alcuin to undertake a formal refutation of the Adoptionists. Alcuin requested that the book of Felix and the whole subject might be submitted to the Pope, Paulinus of Aquileia, and other eminent bishops. This appears to have been done at the Council of Frankfort in the same year. Felix was once more condemned; and the orthodox doctrine was solemnly reasserted in these words, “That holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God, not an adopted and strange Son, but a true and proper” (non adoptivus sed verus, non alienus sed proprius).

This condemnation was repeated at Friuli [A.D. 796], at Rome under Pope Leo III. [A.D. 799], at Aix-la-Chapelle [A.D. 799]. At the latter council Felix argued for six days with Alcuin, was convinced, and once more retracted his heresy. But he was not again trusted to return to Urgel, but placed under the charge firstly of Leodrad, then of his successor Agobard, Archbishop of Lyons, where he died A.D. 818. Elipandus could have no rule of faith imposed upon him, because he lived under the Saracens in Spain, and he was suffered to remain till his death in undisturbed possession of his see.

History of Adoptionism after the death of Felix.—The tenets of the Adoptionists did not, however, become extinct on the death of Felix, for Œcumenius, in the following century, plainly ascribed adoption to Christ.

In the eleventh century this view was not supported by any name of note. In the twelfth century it has been ascribed to Euthymius Zigabenus, mainly in consequence of certain loose expressions discovered in his writings: to Tolmarus, abbot of a monastery in Franconia, as appears from his controversy with Adamus and Gerhohus, dean and superior of the monastery of Reichsberg.

During this and the following centuries the subject was constantly debated by the Schoolmen, and chiefly by the following:—Peter Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus, Durandus a S. Portiano, Johannes Major, Johannes de Barsolis, Richard Fitz-Ralph, Petrus Areclus, Jacobus Almainus, &c. They unanimously rejected the theory of adoption as taught by Felix and Elipandus, but some of them allowed the use of the term with certain modifications and explanations, which virtually reduced the whole discussion to a logomachy.³

In the seventeenth century, Georgius Calixtus, a theologian of the Academy of Helmstadt, brought out a book in which he attempted to prove that

“Atque suum scriptis defendere dogma libellis
Omni quo potuit studio curavit et arte.
Hinc ad catholici deductus principis aulam,
Idem regino nam tum hiemavit in urbe,
A multis ibi præsulibus synodoque frequenti
Est auditus et errorum docuisse nefandum

Pope Hadrian and the Council of Frankfort were wrong in their condemnation of the Adoptionists, whose view he defended on these among other grounds:—"That it ought to be allowed Divine adoption was more excellent than human adoption, and might be free from those conditions which human infirmity might render necessary in the latter; hence, that God by virtue of His infinite power might unite more closely to Himself than man could the Son Whom He wished to adopt."

He was opposed by Dorscheus, a theologian of Strasburg [A.D. 1649], Conradus Dannhaverus, and Adamus Quenstedius. A controversy on the same point, and about the same time, was carried on between Dannhaverus and Johannes Reinbothius, president of Schlesvig-Holstein, and the Adoptionist theory found its last advocate in Johannes Tobias Major, a theologian of the University of Jena [A.D. 1656].

The Socinian heresy, that Jesus Christ is mere man according to His substance, and that he began to exist no otherwise than by the birth he received of the Virgin Mary, together with the various modifications of this doctrine held by modern sects, are the descendants of Arianism and other early heresies, and must be in no way confused with Adoptionism.

[For a fuller treatment of this subject, see Walchius, Historia Adoptianorum, Gottingen, 1755, 8vo; Domin. Colonia, Histoire Littér. de la ville de Lyon, ii. 79; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. xx. p. 459; Commentar. in Thomam, by Gabriel Vasquez, p. 96, Ingolst. 1606, fol.]

ADRIANISTÆ. A sect is thus named by Theodoret as one of those which sprung from "the bitter root" of the Simonian heresy. But nothing further is known of their history, and both Valesius and Ittigius consider that "Adrianistæ" is a misreading for "Menandrianistæ." [Theod. Hær. fab. i. 1.]

ADRIANISTS. An obscure sect of Dutch Anabaptists, so named after Adrian Hamsted. Among other Anabaptist heresies they denied the miraculous conception of our Lord by the Virgin Mary. Hamsted was minister of the Dutch sectaries in London, and was deposed by Grindal, Bishop of London, in the beginning of the year 1561. A form of recantation, stating his heretical tenets, is printed in Strype's Annals of the Reformation, but it was not signed by Hamsted, who was excommunicated by Grindal, and went abroad [Strype's Ann. Ref. i. 176; Grindal's Works, 243]. He seems to have organized a small community in Holland, which was called after his name.

ADRMETIANS. The monks of Adrumetum, in the North African province of Byzacene, misinterpreted St. Augustine's anti-Pelagian doctrine, especially that contained in his 194th Epistle, into Antinomian conclusions respecting grace and predestination, and are thus sometimes considered as the first PREDESTINARIANS.

ÆLURUS. The surname, or rather "nickname," of a schismatical patriarch of Alexandria, Timotheus Ælurus, who for many years was the leader of the Monophysite party there and at Constantinople in the middle of the fifth century. [TIMOTHEANS.]

ÆSCHINES. [CATESCHINIANS.]

ÆTERNALES. This name was given by Danæus, in his edition of Augustine's treatise de Hæresibus, to a sect which is numbered as the sixty-seventh in that work, and as the eightieth in Philaster. It was their distinctive tenet that the world will remain for ever in its present condition, even after the second coming of our Lord. St. Augustine remarks that Philaster gives neither the name of the sect nor of its originator. The author of Prædestinatus mentions the same tenet as that of a sect which he names Satanniani, from one Satannius, but this name was sometimes given to the EUCHITES. [Prædest. Hæres. lxvii.]

ÆERIANS. An Arian and Presbyterian sect of the fourth century, formed about A.D. 360-370, by Aërius of Pontus, or Armenia Minor. Aërius and Eustathius were Arian monks and fellow-students. Both becoming candidates for the bishopric of Sebaste in Armenia Minor, Eustathius was preferred, and he ordained Aërius priest, placing him over the hospital of Pontus. But Aërius, dissatisfied, gave up his preferment, and set himself to traduce Eustathius, charging him with avarice and hoarding. He then affirmed himself to be Eustathius' equal, and asserted that there was no difference, by the Word of God, betwixt a priest and a bishop. He left the Church, and allured a great number of followers, who retreated into the wild fastnesses of the country and formed a sect. Aërius was alive when Epiphanius wrote, A.D. 374-6; but his sect does not appear to have spread wide or lasted long. The utmost which can be said from Augustine's notice of it is, that "we may be apt to think that he knew of some such people at the time of writing his book of Heresies in the year 428" [Lardner, Works, iv. 181; Epiph. Hær. lxxv.; Aug. Hær. liii.]. Philaster, however, states that there were many of them in Pamphylia.

Of the distinctive tenets of the Aërians, the foremost, the denial of the episcopal order, is heretical. Hooker writes [Eccles. Pol. VII. ix. 2], "Surely if heresy be an error falsely fathered upon Scriptures, but indeed repugnant to the truth of the Word of God, and by the consent of the universal church, in the councils, or in her contrary uniform practice throughout the whole world, declared to be such, and the opinion of Aërius in this point be a plain error of that nature, there is no remedy; but Aërius, so schismatically and stiffly maintaining it, must ever stand where Epiphanius and Augustine have placed him." [PRESBYTERIANISM.] As the forerunner of the Presbyterians, the case of Aërius is frequently quoted in modern times.

The Aërians also objected to pray for the dead, but we have not sufficient data to form a correct judgment as to the true character of Aërius' teaching on this point. Prayer for the dead may be refused from principles clearly heretical, as, e.g., from a denial of the communion of saints; or the refusal may proceed from a sense of an undue extension of the range and purpose of such prayer, from a sense of abuses connected with the practice, and of dangers thought to accompany it. It may be thus a measure of prudence, with or without sufficient grounds, but not involving heresy. [DICT. OF THEOL.] From Epiphanius' statements, Aërius appears to have been influenced by the thought that men might be tempted to neglect repentance and good works, in reliance on the prayers of the Church for them after their death, and to have been driven to the extreme of denying altogether the efficacy of such prayer, instead of ascertaining its true limits and purpose.

The third error of the Aërians was a schismatical breach of the discipline of the Church. It was pretended that set fasts were Jewish, and brought men under a yoke of servitude. Fasting was not rejected altogether, but Christian liberty was not to be abridged by the appointment of times. "They gloried," Epiphanius says, "in fasting on the Lord's Day;" and it is probable that the Christian liberty they claimed shewed itself, as it usually does, in wilful opposition to established order. Lardner's comment on this point is worth notice: "Not but that they would sometimes fast on the fourth day of the week as others do; however, they said, they did it not as bound thereto, but only of their free will, which last particular is sufficient to shew, that what Epiphanius says of their choosing to fast on the Lord's Day is a calumny, and an unrighteous aggravation of their principle" [Works, iv. p. 180]. It is difficult to see how this conclusion flows from the premisses.

Philaster [cap. 72] states the Aërians to have been Encratites. Augustine remarks that Epiphanius does not attribute to them any such abstinence. Epiphanius indeed states the direct contrary. But he states that Aërius advocated the renunciation of property [ἀποταξίαν κηρύσσει, Indic. III. vi.], and as the Apotactites were in general Encratites, Philaster was not unnaturally led into the error.

ÆTIANIS. A name of the ANOMÆAN sect of Arians which was given to them from Aëtius, the first promulgator of their distinctive tenets.

Aëtius was the son of a military officer settled at Antioch in Cælo-Syria, who died while Aëtius was still a youth, leaving his widow and her son in extreme poverty. After some time spent in servitude to the wife of a vine-dresser, Aëtius learned to work in metals, rising from the position of a travelling tinker to that of a goldsmith. Forsaking the latter trade, he learned some rudiments of medical practice under a quack doctor, and studied afterwards, in a more legitimate way, in the schools of medicine at Antioch, where he soon set up as a physician. About A.D. 331, the death of his mother set him free to follow an inclination for theological studies, to which he seems to have been attracted by some success in disputation in the medical schools, where his talents led to his being engaged as the paid advocate of certain theories not generally received by the profession. He was taken in hand by Paulinus, the second bishop of Antioch of that name, who was a follower of Arius; but the pupil outran the master so rapidly, that on the death of the bishop he was driven from Antioch, and had to resume his old trade as a goldsmith at Anazarbus. Here his powers of disputation attracted the notice, first of a professor of grammar, whose pupil he became, and afterwards of the Arian bishop of Anazarbus, whose name was Athanasius. From thence the restless Aëtius went to Tarsus, continuing his studies under a priest named Antonius; and when the latter was made bishop, the former returned to his native city, to carry them further under another priest named Leontius. For a short time he studied at Alexandria, but Leontius being made Bishop of Antioch, he returned thither, and was ordained deacon by him in the year 350. This ordination was not intended, however, to qualify Aëtius for the ordinary ministrations of the Church, but simply to place him in a better position for propagating his views; and the remonstrances of the laity of Antioch were so strong, that Leontius was compelled to retract what he had done, by deposing Aëtius from the diaconate, when the latter was again driven from Antioch.

In the year 358, Eudoxius became Bishop of Antioch, and Aëtius once more returned there, having meanwhile declined to accede to a proposition made to him at Alexandria, that he himself should be raised to the episcopal office. He had now a number of followers, and had acquired sufficient importance to lead the older Arians to oppose him before the Arian Emperor Constantius, who eventually banished him to Amblada in Pisidia. The apostate Julian, who was a personal friend of Aëtius, recalled him from exile, and he was made a bishop at Constantinople about A.D. 363. For the following four years he was driven from one place to another, being hated by the Arians for the logical precision with which he developed their heresy into its consequences, but his death, in the year 367, seems to have taken place at Constantinople.

The sect of Arians founded by Aëtius were more commonly known by the name of Eunomians, from his disciple Eunomius. But the principles of the heresy were very distinctly stated by Aëtius himself, in a treatise which has been preserved by Epiphanius [Epiph. Hæres. lxxvi. c. 11]. This work consists of a short preface and forty-seven theses or propositions, the general purport of which is, that the Second and Third Persons of the Holy Trinity are entirely different in substance and will (ἀνόμοιον) from the First Person, Who alone (he alleges) is possessed of the true quality of Deity, ἀγεννησία, or "ingenerate-ness." Eunomius endeavoured to formalize a system of Christian theology and morals on this distinctive principle, but the theories of Aëtius acquired for him the name of "the Godless" [ἄθεος], and his Antinomianism in theory and practice were too notorious to be contradicted. Several special misbeliefs are traced up to Aëtius and his immediate followers, but the truth is that he repudiated all mystery in religion, and made theology a mere matter of intellectual reasoning, without any real dependence on revelation. Such principles would naturally lead to the rejection of nearly every Christian doctrine as soon as it came under consideration. [Socrat. Hist. Eccl. ii. 35. Sozom. Hist. Eccl. iii. 15, iv. 12. AGAPEMONITES. [PRINCIPITES.]

AGAPETÆ, OR DILECTÆ. I. A sect which rose in Spain towards the close of the fourth century, during the reign of Theodosius, deriving its name from a certain Agape, who with her husband Elpidius were its reputed founders. They rejected the institution of marriage, and as a substitute allowed the most unrestrained intercourse and familiarity between both sexes, who, on the principle that "to the pure all things are pure" [Tit. i. 15], were allowed to share the same room and even the same couch. They also rejected the ordinance of fasting, indulging in festive and uproarious living, asking why they should "abstain from meats which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth" [1 Tim. iv. 3].

St. Jerome thus indignantly alludes to them in a letter addressed to Eustochium [Lib. de Custod. Virg.]: "It is a shame even to allude to the true facts. Whence did the pest of the Agapetæ creep into the Church? Whence is this new title of wives without marriage rites? Whence this new class of concubines? I will infer more. Whence these harlots cleaving to one man? They occupy the same house, a single chamber, often a single bed, and call us suspicious if we think anything of it. The brother deserts his virgin sister, the virgin despises her unmarried brother, and seeks a stranger, and since they pretend to be aiming at the same object, they ask for the spiritual consolation of each other, that they may enjoy the pleasures of the flesh."

In another place [Ad Ctesiphontem], S. Jerome, after enumerating Nicolas of Antioch led astray by the prostitute Helena, Marcion by a woman unnamed, Apelles by Philomena, Montanus by Prisca and Maximilla, mentions Agape as drawing Elpidius into heresy, and being by him the spiritual progenitor of Priscillian (successoremque suum Priscillianum habuit).

II. The title of Agapetæ is also applied more generally to those monks or clergy who, under pretence of pure love, cohabited with the virgins or widows of the Church. This custom, frequently condemned in the patristic writings, became a very common one. It was defended by the text, "Have we not power to lead about a sister?" &c. [1 Cor. ix. 5], which St. Jerome explains [Contra Jovin. lib. i. cap. 14] of sacred women who ministered to the Apostles of their substance. One of the charges laid against Paul of Samosata at his deposition by the Council of Antioch [A.D. 270], was that of adopting himself and allowing his clergy to adopt too great and scandalous intimacy with women who were not relations, and who were hence called συνεπισακτοί or "subintroductæ." The custom, however, appears to have been a persistent one, for it survived the condemnation of many councils, such as the first and second Councils of Carthage [A.D. 348-397, canons 3, 25]; the second Council of Arles [A.D. 451, can. 3]; Essone [A.D. 517, can. 20]; and was only finally abolished by the fourth Lateran Council under Innocent III. [A.D. 1215].

AGINENSES. [AGIONITES.]

AGIONITES. An obscure sect of ENCRATITES, condemned with the Eustathians and others of a similar character at the Council of Gangra, which was held at some time between A.D. 360 and A.D. 380. Perhaps the name was assumed by the Eustathians in some form based on the word ἄγιος, g. d. "Puritans."

AGNOËTÆ. A sect of the fourth century was sometimes called by this name on account of a peculiar opinion which they maintained respecting the Omniscience of God. They were a branch of the Eunomians, which struck off under the leadership of Theophronius [EUNOMIO-THEOPHRONIANS].

AGNOËTÆ [ἀγνοῦν]. A school of Alexandrian Monophysites, who, confusing the two Natures of our Lord, attributed to Him the human defect of imperfect knowledge. This opinion was developed by the Severianist and Julianist controversy which divided the Monophysites, about A.D. 520. Timothy having succeeded Dioscorus as Patriarch of Alexandria, endeavoured to effect a compromise between the Julianist Aphthartodocetæ and the Severianist Phthartolatæ or Corrupticolæ, privately leaning, however, to the latter as regarded his own opinions. An answer given by the Patriarch Timothy to a deacon named Themistius, led the latter to maintain the conclusion, that if the body of Christ was corruptible (subject, that is, not to the corruption of the grave, which the Severianists did not believe, but to the decay arising from the wear and tear of life), then He must also have been so far subject to the defects of human nature that His very knowledge of the present and the future was imperfect, and there were, therefore, some things of which He was ignorant. The Scriptural proof of this doctrine was rested on our Lord's question respecting the body of Lazarus, "Where have ye laid him?" [John xi. 34]; and on His saying respecting the day of judgment, "Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father" [Mark xiii. 32]. The patriarch himself repudiated this conclusion, but a school of theorists grew up under the leadership of Themistius, and from the adoption of this conclusion as their distinctive tenet became known as Agnoëtæ, or assertors of ignorance.

The heresy of this opinion lies in the fact that, starting in Eutychianism, it thus attributes ignorance to the Omniscient Word. Some of the Fathers used language which attributed growth of knowledge, and therefore a preceding defect of knowledge, to the human soul of Christ, but they did so while holding most emphatically the distinction between His Human and His Divine Natures [DICT. OF THEOL., IGNORANCE OF CHRIST]; such a distinction being as emphatically repudiated by the Agnoëtes.

The heresy was opposed by Eulogius of Alexandria in a treatise "Of the two Natures of Jesus Christ" [Bibl. Patr. Galland. xii. 300], and he went so far as to say that the Fathers had allowed the doctrine of a growth in Christ's knowledge by way of œconomy in dealing with the Arians. Afterwards the opponents of the Agnoëtians extended this idea of œconomy even to our Lord's own words, saying that He appeared not to know for the sake of His disciples.

The Agnoëtian heresy obtained a permanent footing as an opinion, but it does not appear that it led to the formation of any sect distinct from the general body of the Monophysites.

AGONICLITES [ἀ, γόνυ, κλίνω]. A fanatical sect of the seventh and eighth centuries, whose distinctive tenet was the condemnation of kneeling as the attitude of prayer. They are said also to have used dancing as a devotional custom. They were condemned by a synod of Jerusalem, A.D. 726.

AGONISTICI. The distinctive name of "Contenders" was given by the Donatists to the violent hands which roamed about Africa under the pretence of winning converts to that schism, but in reality gratifying their own desires for rapine, cruelty, and lust. They are said to have appeared first in A.D. 317 [Tillemont, vi. 96], and are more familiarly known by their other titles of Catrophites, Circuiti, Circumcellions, Corophites, and (at Rome) Montenses. [CIRCUMCELLIONS.]

AGYNIANS [ἀ, γυνή]. One of the many later offshoots of Manichæism, assigned to the latter part of the seventh century [A.D. 694]. Its adherents, as their name implies, held no intercourse with women, pretending that God was not the author of, and did not sanction, marriage.

AITKENITES. A party in the Church of England which owes its origin to Robert Aitken, who had been a Wesleyan preacher previous to his ordination, and subsequently to it became a High Churchman; being Vicar of Pendeen in Cornwall from 1849 until his death in July 1873. The distinctive feature of Aitkenism is indicated by these two circumstances, it being a combination of Methodist peculiarities with the ritual and the sacramental theology of the High Church school. The doctrines of sensible conversion and assurance of salvation are strongly maintained by the Aitkenites; and their belief in these doctrines leads them to supplement the services of the Church with prayer-meetings of an excited character, similar to those which were held by Wesley in the early days of his movement. The object of Mr. Aitken and his followers seems to have been the development of Wesley's original principles in the High Church direction which they were disposed to take in the first year or two of his preaching. There is, consequently, no likelihood of their following Wesley's example in originating a sect; and Aitkenism will probably find its place and level in the Church of England as a home mission movement, in the same way that a similar movement has done in France.

ALASCANS. A name given to the foreign Protestants in London during the reign of Edward VI. It was derived from John Lasco, or à Lasco, a Polish refugee of noble birth, who had adopted the negative theology of Zwingli during a residence at Zurich. For some years à Lasco was minister of a congregation at Embden in Friesland, but being invited to London by Cranmer, he lived with the Archbishop at Lambeth for six months, and was then made superintendent of the "foreign churches" (German, Belgian, French, and Italian) in London, the principal one being the church of the Austin Friars in Broad Street. A Lasco was a forward partizan of Puritanism, opposing the use of the surplice, kneeling at Communion, &c., and it is believed that he influenced the later opinions of Cranmer in the same direction as regards the doctrine of the Holy Eucharist. The German congregations were dispersed at the accession of Queen Mary, and some portions of them settled at Embden, under à Lasco, who, however, soon forsook them, and after a sojourn at Frankfort, returned to Poland, where he died in 1560. A full account of the Alaskan liturgy will be found in the British Magazine, vol. xv. 614, and xvi. 127. It is distinctly Zwinglian.

ALBANENSES. A small mediæval sect of the Cathari, which took its name from the city and diocese of Albi in Piedmont, then forming part of the archbishopric of Arles. They were a portion of that influx of heresy by which the mountainous districts of Italy, Switzerland, and France, were overrun in the twelfth century, the Manichæan character of which indicates an Eastern origin. The Albanenses maintained a phase of Manichæan dualism evidently derived from the Persian system, alleging that there are two co-eternal First Causes, the one being the God of light, God the Father of the orthodox creed, and the other the Prince of darkness, who was the maker of all material things. They held a theory that no living thing created by God was made to perish; a doctrine which led them to Antinomianism, and which also made it a sin in their eyes to take the life of any animal. The sect was subdivided into the adherents of Balazinansa, Bishop of Verona, and those of John de Lugio, Bishop of Bergamo. It seems to have been confined to Venetian Lombardy, the district in which it originated, but was also associated with the Albigenses. The two sects are often confounded with each other, and very probably they were actually amalgamated under the common name of ALBIGENSES. Reiner numbers them at about five hundred only. [Raynerus Sachonus, Summa de Catharis et Leonistis, in Martene's Thes. Anecd. v. 1761-8, and Gretser's Summary, entitled Reinerus contr. Waldens. in Bibl. Max. Lugd. xxv. 267, 269.]

ALBATI [WHITE BRETHREN.]

ALBIGENSES. Under this name are comprised the numerous varieties of Manichæan heretics who are found in Southern France and Northern Italy in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The name does not seem to be contemporaneous with the appearance of the heresy in Europe, not being found in the earlier synodical decrees against it; but these heretics are certainly so called in a work of Stephanus de Borbone written about A.D. 1225. It seems to have become the popular designation, about that date, of many differing sects whom the theologians of the age generically termed Manichæans; and it was probably derived, as will be shewn more at length presently, from one of the districts of Languedoc of which the city of Albi, anciently called Albica, where a council was held against them in A.D. 1176, was the principal town. [Gretser. Pref. in Luc. Tudens. adv. Alb. error., Bibl. Max. Lugd. xxv. 190, A.] The Albigenses were also called Gazari (a corruption from the name Cathari), Bulgarians, Publicians, and by an almost infinite number of other local names.

Like all the Manichæan bodies, the Albigenses are distinguished by a more or less complete dualistic creed, and by the identification of the persons of the Duality with spirit or good, and matter or evil; like most of those bodies, they condemned the Old Testament as the work of the evil being, denied the lawfulness of marriage, and divided all their members into two classes of superior and inferior holiness. Manichæan ideas had indeed found their way into Europe as early as the beginning of the eleventh century, but the sects had been weak in the number of adherents, doubtful and disunited in their creed and practices. They had been frequently, and still remained to a great extent, confounded with various sects of pure anti-sacerdotalists, like the followers of Waldo of Lyons [WALDENSES], and of mad communists like the worshippers of Eon. [EONIANS.] From Bulgaria, where Paulician Manichæism [PAULICIANS] had been established since the seventh century, the heretical ideas slowly permeated Europe. So general was this infiltration in the eleventh century, that there is hardly a western or northern country in which we do not find a disturbance traceable to this source. But the cold and phlegmatic temper of these regions was fatal to the oriental mysticism of Mani, upon which the new heresy was originally founded; while feudal and oligarchical institutions were ill-suited to the democratic spirit of the Paulicianism from which it was immediately derived. In England, Northern France, and Germany, the Manichæan revolt was easily subdued; but in Southern France, Provence, and Italy, the case was different. In these last named countries, Manichæism in its earlier stage seems, in a great measure, from different causes, to have escaped notice. In Southern France and Provence this was probably due to the more urgent character of the anti-sacerdotal revolt; in Italy, to the absorbing interest of the struggle between the Papal and the Imperial powers. Italy, too, was favourably situated for the dissemination of the heresy, in consequence of its proximity to Bosnia and the other provinces which bounded the home of Paulician Manichæism, and the increasing intercourse brought about by the Crusades materially assisted this dissemination. Here the last of the three great waves of Manichæan opinion, which in the third, the seventh, and the eleventh centuries respectively, threatened to desolate Christianity, beaten back from the rest of Europe, for the most part was poured. Here the heresy, elsewhere overpowered, was consolidated and developed, until, in the middle of the twelfth century, it burst out in that form to which the famous title of the "Albigensian" has been attached.

There were many circumstances—traditions, situation, climate—predisposing the South of France to admit the influence of a heresy like Manichæism. Septimania, which included Languedoc and Provence, and therefore the greater part of the Tolosan suzerainty, had, during four centuries of its early history, submitted without reluctance to the domination of Arian Goths or infidel Saracens. During the centuries immediately preceding the Manichæan revolt, the inhabitants had been accustomed to the demoralizing spectacle exhibited by the flourishing courts of the infidel princes of Spain. Sufficiently near to find polite intercourse with the Mohammedans agreeable, while they were too far removed to dread Mohammedan hostility, they had learnt to be tolerant when the rest of Europe was bigoted. Italy, and in particular Lombardy, was next to Toulouse in its forbearing temper. The Paulician Manichæism which had broken out first in Northern Europe in the neighbourhood of the emporia of the Eastern trade, at a very short interval had appeared in Italy, that province of the Western Empire nearest to the Bulgarian frontier. The outbreak, though, as has been mentioned, for the time successfully crushed in the North, in the South had the effect, not only of exciting many new leaders of heretical opinion, but of awaking the dormant Manichæism of central Italy. The connection between Italy and Provence was of long standing; and Languedoc, united, for a time at least, under the same lordship, was further connected by a community of participation in the Romanesque institutions and language. It was in the the independent cities of Italy that the dying institutions of Paganism had lingered longest; it was in such towns that Manichæism was earliest revived; and that this revival was a genuine rehabilitation of a dead heresy, is evidenced by the fact, that the old tenets which had been discarded by the Paulician heretics from the seventh to the tenth centuries, are found flourishing in Provence and Italy in the twelfth. But if Italy was foremost in the revival of Manichæism, it is with the suzerainty of Toulouse that its connexion was most famous and fatal. That suzerainty, which comprised almost the whole of the ancient province of Narbonnensis, with the south-eastern parts of Aquitania Prima, had been, at the commencement of the eleventh century, the scene of St. Bernard's most famous triumph over the anti-sacerdotalists, and the ground so broken received the seed of the new heresy with wonderful rapidity. Nor was the Church in these provinces capable of any considerable resistance, for the influence of their clergy was then at the lowest point that it has anywhere reached in the history of Christianity. A luxurious country, civilized beyond its age, almost wholly independent of the French king at Paris, (in the preceding century it had absolutely ignored his existence), Languedoc enjoyed an almost licentious freedom, at a time when the rest of Europe was held in the strongest grasp of an almost universal military despotism.

It was in this country, so predisposed by circumstance to receive the poison, that the streams of heretical opinion were appointed to meet. Southwards, from Trèves, Cologne, Besançon—westwards, from below the Pennine Alps—northwards, from Tuscany and the States of the Church—the flow of heretical opinion converged upon Toulouse. The most fruitful and important district of the Tolosan Count was the Albigeois, or that surrounding Albi, a town on a tributary of the Garonne, and the modern capital of the department of the Tarn; and it is from this territory that the name Albigenian, now so famous, has by a somewhat obscure process been derived.

The first mention of these Manichæan, or (as they are frequently called) Arian heretics of this district, is found in the records of the Council of Tours, which took place A.D. 1163. The fourth canon of that Council is entitled, “ut cuncti consortium Albigensium hæreticorum fugiant.” The canon itself then describes them, calling them however Cathari and Paterini, the names under which, until the middle of the next century, they are invariably known. It is worthy of remark, that the name “Albigensian” occurs only in one other record of the twelfth century, a letter, nominally, to his clergy, from Bishop Odo of Paris, dated A.D. 1190, but conceived in terms which smack of modern authorship. In A.D. 1165, a council was held at Lombers, near Albi, where the heretical opinions were condemned, but the name not unnaturally does not there occur. It is from this council that many learned authors, including Mosheim, are inclined to derive the distinctive title of Albigenses. A more probable hypothesis derives the name from the fact that the Albigeois was the chief seat of the heresy, a fact however which rests on insufficient evidence. The word Albigensian is certainly absent from the series of condemnations which extend from the middle of the twelfth to the middle of the thirteenth century. These, commencing with the Council of Tours in A.D. 1163, carry the chain of anathema through the councils presided over by Alexander III., Lucius II., and Innocent III.; but they contain no use of this word in other than a geographical sense. The third Lateran of Alexander III. is thus precise in its terms—“Quia in Gasconia Albigesia et partibus Tolosanis et aliis locis ita hæreticorum quos alii Catharos alii Paterinos alii Publicanos . . . appellant . . . invaluit damnata perversitas.” Of the names applied to the Albigensian sectaries, Publicani is a manifest corruption of Pauliciani, and had been in common use for a century. Of the other terms, “Cathari” or “Puritans,” was, in default of more differential nomenclature, employed to express all the anti-sacerdotal bodies, whether Manichæan or otherwise, who claimed peculiar sanctity, and “Paterini” (variously spelt Patareni and Patrini), sponsors or fatherlings, originally a term of reproach flung by the secular at the regular clergy, was well adapted to the Manichæan despisers of marriage. The details of the process, during which the name Albigeois acquired the sense in which it is subsequently, and has now for so many centuries, been applied, to the heretics of Languedoc and Provence, are not discoverable with certainty. The name was probably given to the war by the lay invaders, not to the heresy by the priestly invaders of Toulouse. It is a significant fact, that the first crusade against this development of modern Manichæism was directed against the inhabitants of Albi, whose feudal lord defended his vassals against the attack. Besides, when, a quarter of a century later, the great crusade of Innocent commenced, the large fertile district contiguous to the frontier of Guienne, within or adjacent to which lay Toulouse and the principal towns of the invaded district, would be likely to attract much attention from crusaders, mostly from Northern and Eastern France, aliens in blood, speech, and usage. Such men might readily borrow for the title of their crusade the name of one of the principal scenes of their operations with which they were familiar, and so in succeeding years it might come to pass, that the name thus given to the crusade might be transferred to the heresy which was its cause. This theory derives much support from the fact, that the earliest use of the word in the broader meaning refers it to the Albigensian crusade, and not to the Albigensian heresy. The word first began to be applied to the heresy (but not commonly) in the latter half of the thirteenth century, about which time a second council was held at Albi, under the patronage of the Dominican inquisition.

In the edict of the Council of Alexander III. (the third Lateran, A.D. 1179) is preserved the first authentic statement, though by an enemy, of this heresy. From it we learn, that the heretics (hereafter to be called Albigensians), besides their assertion of the dualistic principle, rejected the Lord's Supper; disowned the Old Testament, its law and its God; denied the resurrection of the body, salvation by faith, the efficacy of infant baptism (chiefly on Pelagian grounds); declared capital punishment, oaths, and marriage unlawful; forbade the use of churches, ritual, and the payment of tithes to the clergy, and taught that no female soul in a future state retained femininity. In the year prior to this council Raymond V., the reigning Count of Toulouse, had appealed to Alexander for pontifical assistance. A commission of five of the most distinguished prelates, with the sanction of the Kings of France and England, proceeded to the assistance of the count. In their report they describe the whole land as in the possession of the heretics. But the condemnation of papal and provincial councils was of little efficacy in Toulouse, nor was the persecution which Raymond set on foot more efficacious. A crusade, undertaken by Henry of Clairvaux against the Albigeois, was rendered wholly nugatory by the protection which the Viscount of Beziers and his great vassal the Count of Albi afforded to the heretics. In vain did Raymond, through the last twenty years of his reign, burn the bodies and confiscate the goods of the heretics; in vain were ecclesiastical censures poured out against these Cathari in successive and continuous imprecation. Florence, Brescia, Bergamo, Milan, in Italy; Montpellier, Carcassonne, Albi, Toulouse, in France; each continued to hold flourishing communities professing Albigensian opinions. Toulouse, with its great subordinate fiefs, including besides those that have been mentioned, Beziers, Foix, Queray, and Narbonne, was wholly given to the heretics. So completely had the country come into their possession, so fearless were they in the enjoyment of their freedom, that they possessed their own burial-grounds, and subsidized their own clergy.

They divided the sect into classes, under the title of Consolati, or Perfect, and Federati, or Auditors. The voluptuous Tolosan nobles (and most of the Tolosan nobles were voluptuous) had probably little religion of any kind; but the discipline of the federate or auditor, which sufficed the ambitious youth of Augustine, was not a severe or ascetic rule. The devout, on the other hand, found their account in the religious excitement of the new and daring opinions, and in an asceticism which surpassed the utmost severity of which the degraded priesthood of the country was capable, while the consolation in death administered by the "perfect," whose title to confidence lay only in his holy life, seemed to them to have more than all the value of priestly absolution. The vast increase in the numbers of the sect induced a more widely extended organization. Bishops, with two coadjutors, the one holding the title of eldest, the other of youngest son, administered to the accumulating need of the congregations. They are alleged to have possessed a complete system of churches, sixteen in number, representing the communities of France, Italy, and Bulgaria; and there is reason for believing that their ministers received ordination, or, at any rate, first appointment, from the more important stations in the Italian cities. The old Zoroastrian controversy of the first causes, which had divided Persia in the hour of the birth of Manichæism, again appeared, in this the hour of its dissolution, and the Bagnolensian and the Albanensian camps respectively sustained the cause of the single and double origin of existence. Albi itself, and the heretical Church of Provence, supported the theory of the single origin.

How deeply imbued with the heretical opinion was the whole country may be gathered from the fact, that in one assembly, held in the year 1204, four of the most noble Provençales, numbering among them Esclarmonde, the sister of the great Count of Foix, were publicly received into the heretical community. On their admission into the ranks of the Perfect, these ladies made solemn promise to touch no meat, eggs, or cheese, but to eat only vegetables and fish; neither to swear nor to lie; to abstain from all carnal intercourse, and to keep troth to their sect unto the death. Even Innocent admits their virtue, but, like Leo and Cyril, he held their practice of virtue but a wile of the devil to betray the orthodox. Within a few months of his accession, Innocent commenced proceedings. He wrote first to the Archbishop of Auch, then to all the great prelates and nobles of the country, urging them to exterminate the heresy, offering them for the use of their swords the blessings of the Church and the possessions of the heretics. This first appeal was wholly ineffectual: the nobles would not act against their vassals, and the clergy were powerless. The Pope sent legates, chosen from the monastic orders, first Reiner and Guy, subsequently Peter of Castelnau, Raoul, and Arnold of Cîteaux; these last the most bigoted Churchmen of that age of bigots. Eight years passed of ineffectual preaching, in the exaction of vain promises and idle protestations. The cities promised, and the nobles, but neither cities nor nobles would act against inoffensive citizens, against faithful vassals. The Pope called on the count himself to interfere. Raymond VI., who, heretic as he is alleged to have been, was certainly no Manichæan, (he had three wives alive at the commencement of the crusade), dallied with the papal mandate; the legates were exacting, and after a short struggle the inevitable end arrived, and he was excommunicated. The pretext was the murder of Peter of Castelnau, a crime of which the count was entirely innocent. The legates, who had by this time obtained some influence owing to the austerities which, by the advice of Dominic, they had sedulously practised, and thus gained the reputation of sanctity, obtained through the death of Peter the prestige of a martyrdom.

The Pope issued to the king and great nobles of Northern France a public call to vengeance, while his emissaries privately urged Raymond's vassals to revolt, the death of Peter becoming the signal for a general crusade. It is said that half a million of men were gathered for the enterprise. In vain the count performed the most abject penance, and surrendered seven of his principal castles into the hands of the Pope; in vain he offered to join, and in fact did join, the crusade against his faithful Albigensians. The invaders had for leaders four archbishops, twelve bishops of great sees, and countless abbots, and other dignitaries. The Duke of Burgundy, the Counts of Nevers and St. Pol, Simon Montfort, the Lord of Amaury in France and Leicester in England, supported the Churchmen. The crusaders' advance was irresistible. Beziers and Carcassonne were at once stormed, and the inhabitants indiscriminately massacred. In the first quarter of a year five hundred towns and fortresses fell or capitulated, and amongst them Albi. In their more merciful moments, the order was given by the crusading chiefs that those who recanted should be spared, and those who refused should be burned. Few availed themselves of the former alternative; most boldly confessed their faith, and accepted martyrdom with cheerfulness. The crusaders soon grew tired of leniency. At the great papal Council of Arles, Raymond was offered terms, so contrived as to make acceptance impossible. The strife was continued, marked with atrocities remarkable even for a religious war. "Slay all, God will know His own," was the saying of the legate Arnold before Beziers. At Lavaur, the lady paramount was thrown into a well and stones rolled upon her, eight hundred nobles were hanged on trees or hewn in pieces, four hundred of the "perfect" were burned in one pile; the rest, men, women and children, were massacred. The career of Simon de Montfort, the only crusading noble base enough to accept the price of blood, was one of unchequered success. In three campaigns he became a sovereign prince. The arms of Montfort were everywhere irresistible. Even the King of Arragon, the victor of Navas de Tolosa, was defeated and killed. The nobles of Toulouse were now struggling for existence. Raymond and his vassals were too weak to protect their subjects; they were fortunate if they survived themselves. The fourth Lateran of Innocent III. declared the formal spoliation of Raymond. It is alleged that the Pope was overborne by the cardinals and priests of Montfort's party, by the men who boasted themselves more papal than the Pope himself: at any rate it would seem that the Pope partially repented of his harshness, and offered the Venaissin to the young Raymond as a compensation for Toulouse. Meanwhile, Montfort was occupied with the consolidation of his dominion, and with the extirpation of the Albigenses. But a general insurrection of the whole people in favour of their old rulers compelled him again to take the field. The two counts landed, and were enthusiastically received. Shortly, the old count threw himself into Toulouse, which defied every effort of Montfort's arms, and before its gates the great crusader at length perished.

Innocent had died in A.D. 1216, and though the new crusade preached by his successor, Honorius III., was headed by Louis of France, it accomplished nothing more than one massacre of Albigenses, that at Marmande. In A.D. 1222, the Count Raymond VI. died, and four years later another crusading army descended into Languedoc. But it was no longer a war directed against heretics, enemies of the Christian Church, but against inhabitants who refused to own the suzerainty of the French king. The year A.D. 1229 saw, in the Council of Toulouse and the Treaty of Paris, the destruction both of political independence and of religious liberty. By the council the laity were prohibited from possessing the Scriptures. By the treaty, Raymond VII. promised fealty to the king. He swore besides to render fealty to the Pope, to execute justice on all heretics, and to pay at first two, subsequently one mark for each heretic discovered in his dominions. At the Council of Toulouse a complete code of persecution was developed. In every village one clerical and three lay inquisitors were to be appointed; the property of those on whose lands heretics were found was to be forfeited; the harbourers of heretics were to be reduced to personal slavery; heretics who recanted were to be removed to Catholic cities, to wear two crosses of different colour on their dress, to abjure Albigensian tenets, and to make public confession of faith. The suspect were incapable of holding office, of practising medicine, or of nursing the sick. But even these decrees were considered of dangerous mildness, and were amplified and made more stringent by subsequent councils, which were levelled as well against the true Albigenses or Manichæans, as against the Leonistæ or Waldenses, many of whom had shared the sufferings of the crusade.

The punishments invented for suppressing the Albigensian heresy, and universally adopted by the Inquisition, are historically instructive. For those who recanted, penance and deprivation of all honourable means of life: for those whom they could not convict, perpetual imprisonment: for the guilty, death at the stake. Nor were the inquisitors backward in enforcing these penalties; as the holocaust of one hundred and eighty-three persons at Vertus, and numerous other massacres, abundantly testify. To Innocent and Honorius belong the credit of establishing, to Gregory is due the glory of having perpetuated, this Inquisition. By him it was handed over to the Dominican Friars, from whom, as possessing a corporate succession, the heritage could not pass away. Their cruelties in Toulouse at length provoked an insurrection; it was appeased by a temporary removal of the Inquisition, but with its return after four years the same cruelties returned, and the same revolt.

In this their last struggle the Albigensians fought with fury. They captured the castle of Avignonet, and hewed in pieces William Arnaut, the great inquisitor, with the four Dominicans and two Franciscans who formed the inquisitorial tribunal at that place. But these successes were of no long duration. Raymond was forced to submit to Saint Louis, and abandonment of the Albigensians was stipulated for in the act of submission. Within two years of that submission, that is A.D. 1244, Mont Segur, the last refuge of the Albigensians, a strong castle perched on the edge of a ravine in the Pyrenees, to which most of the perfect, with their bishop, had fled, was forced to surrender to the Archbishop of Narbonne, the Bishop of Albi, and the Seneschal of Carcassonne. All the heretics, with their bishop, and the noble Lady Esclarmonde, were burnt alive in a vast enclosure of stakes and straw. In the same year, the Emperor Frederick II., himself a freethinker, published an imperial decree for the punishment of the Albigensian heretics of the empire, under the style of "Cathari," "Paterini," "Albanenses," and "Bagnolenses." The persecution was devised with such political shrewdness and so well executed that the heresy was actually stamped out in Southern Europe. In fifteen years, at the beginning of the fourteenth century, the Tolosan Inquisition, at their various "sermones," or sessions, handed over to death by the civil power twenty-nine of the Albigenses, and punished, with various severity of imprisonment, nearly five hundred others. This activity, it must be borne in mind, was displayed between the years A.D. 1307-1323, sixty years after the heresy had been forcibly suppressed, and a whole century later than the death of Montfort. Slowly and in secret the last remnant of the Albigensian heresy was strangled by the strong hand of the Inquisition. A few escaped and joined themselves to the Waldenses, attracted more by the comparative security of their Piedmontese homes than from any community of religious opinion. Others, it is said, escaped to Bosnia and the provinces of the Danube, where, favoured more by their obscurity than by any intentional toleration of either eastern or western Rome, they preserved a harmless and precarious existence; until they were reconciled to the Church in the fifteenth century by the eloquence of the Cardinal Carvalho.

The story of the Albigensians (gross heretics as they undoubtedly were) is the shortest, brightest, and bloodiest in the annals of heresy. Their precocious refinement and civilization, their high moral tone (which their enemies scarcely deny), the unchristian heresy which they themselves are bold to admit, the bloody crusade which commenced and the bloodier persecution which consummated their ruin, present features of romantic interest absolutely without parallel. Nor was this course of events less swift than the events themselves are surprising. In the middle of the twelfth century, the Albigensian history commences; in A.D. 1244 the community had ceased to exist. By that date little that was Albigensian survived, unless it was a hatred of Roman bigotry which even the Inquisition failed to extirpate. It is noteworthy that the country of the Albigenses was also the country of the Camisards.

Literature.—The original records of the Albigensian heresy are unfortunately the work entirely of orthodox writers, and almost entirely of orthodox ecclesiastics. The most important of these contemporaneous authorities are collected in the Recueil des Historiens des Gaules et de la France [Bouquet, &c., Paris]. They consist of the history of Petrus Sarnensis, Peter of Vaux Cernay, who, in attendance on his uncle, the abbot of that place, was an approving eye-witness of the horrors of the crusade [Bouquet, tom. xix.]; that of Gulielmus de Podio Laurentii, William of Puy Laurens [Bouquet, tom. xix. xx.]; that of Reinerius, himself a Catharist or Albigensian, but who, being converted to orthodoxy, became an inquisitor [Bouquet, tom. xviii.]; and that of the anonymous author of the history of the Guerre des Albigeois [Bouquet, tom. xviii.]. To these are to be added the controversial treatises: Adversus Catharos et Waldenses, by Alanus de Insulis [Masson, Lyons], and by Moneta Cremonensis [Richinius, Rome]; and the poem written by a troubadour, under the nom de plume of William of Tudela, edited by M. Fauriel, Docu- ments Historiques inédits [Paris], and entitled La Guerre des Albigeois. This author, whose orthodoxy is unimpeachable, gives the history of the war from A.D. 1209 to 1219. At first he is furious against the heretics; but, as the work progresses, the cruelties practised by the crusaders have the effect of changing him from a staunch partizan into a bitter enemy of their opponents. Besides these more important works, the papal letters of Innocent III. and Acts of Councils are to be read passim. The Codex Tolosane inquisitionis, a record of the work of the Inquisition of Toulouse, from A.D. 1307-1323 [Limborch, Amsterdam], contains an authentic list of sentences of that tribunal during those fifteen years. Of modern works on this subject, the Histoire de Languedoc, by MM. Vich et Vaissette [Paris]; and Sismondi's History of the Crusade against the Albigenses [London], are the most important. Much information is contained in the ecclesiastical histories of Fleury, Mosheim, and Gieseler, though the two former are sometimes exceedingly partial in their views; as also in Milman's Latin Christianity. It is necessary to observe, that the account of the Albigenses given in Milner's Church History is wholly untrustworthy. The most valuable learning applied to the many difficulties with which their history abounds is to be found in the Histoire de la Poésie Provençale, by M. Fauriel [Paris], and in Maitland's Facts and Documents connected with the History of the Albigenses and Waldenses.

ALEXANDER. In both of St. Paul's Epistles to Timothy an Alexander is named as one of the worst opponents of his ministry. In the first he speaks of him in association with Hymenæus, as having made shipwreck of the faith, and as having put away the faith and a good conscience [1 Tim. i. 19, 20]. In the second he says "Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil" [2 Tim. iv. 14; cf. Acts xix. 33]. There is no reason to believe that two Alexanders are here named, and as the second Epistle to Timothy was written some years after the first, we are led to the conclusion that the opposition to St. Paul, and the "shipwreck" of "the faith," were of a persistent character. What was the nature of Alexander's heresy is not stated, but the combination of immorality and misbelief—the putting away of both faith and conscience—points to some form of Gnosticism. That it was heresy of a very antichristian kind is shewn by St. Paul's language in both places. [HYMENÆUS.]

ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL. The present article will be limited to the Catechetical School.

I. When our Lord bade His disciples baptize in His name, He also commanded that instruction should precede the initiatory rite. Excepting in such abnormal instances as the first converts on the day of Pentecost, and the Ethiopian eunuch, and the gaoler at Philippi, regular instruction was conveyed from the first before the administration of baptism. In the case of Jews bare admission that Jesus was the Christ might be sufficient; but heathen idolaters needed a longer and more elaborate course of instruction, and a necessity thus arose for a distinct order of catechists. At first, perhaps, the ordained and authorized teacher of each church discharged the duty in person; then, as its boundaries became extended, delegates, whether clerical or lay, were told off for the office; and even females were not considered ineligible to convey to converts of their own sex the first principles of the Christian faith. In remote districts, catechetical arrangements would be simple in the extreme; but the large centres of civilization demanded more care and method. St. Paul himself was the first catechist of the Corinthian Church [1 Cor. ix. 19-23; iii. 5, 6; 2 Cor. x. 16], to be succeeded in due course by others [1 Cor. xv. 11]. He instructed widely, but baptized few. Athens and Rome, doubtless, had their systematic exposition of the rule of faith before that rule was confessed in baptism; but the only Church with respect to such appointments to which we can speak with certainty is the Alexandrian.

II. St. Jerome refers the origin of this noted school to St. Mark: "Pantænus Stoicæ sectæ philosophus juxta quandam veterem in Alexandria consuetudinem, ubi a Marco Evangelista semper ecclesiastici fuere doctores, tantæ prudentiæ et eruditionis tam in Scripturis divinis, quam in seculari litteratura fuit" [Catal. 36]. This same Pantænus is named by Eusebius, who speaks of the school as of old standing: ἐξ ἀρχαίου ἔθους διδασκαλείου τῶν ἱερῶν λόγων παρ' αὐτοῖς συνεστῶτος, ὃ καὶ εἰς ἡμᾶς παρατείνεται [H. E. v. 10]; the origin of the Alexandrian Church being also referred by him to St. Mark [H. E. ii. 16].

The Evangelist would naturally provide for the succession of pure teaching in the Church of his foundation; and instruction for neophytes, at first simple in the extreme, deepened into those more severe lines of comparative scholarship, Christian and Pagan, which local peculiarities fostered; thus, milk for babes was gradually replaced by the strong meat for men. The earliest name connected with this school is that of Athenagoras, in the middle of the second century, mentioned by Philippus of Sidet in Pamphylia,¹ in a fragment published by Dodwell [Diss. in Iren. 490-514], as the first of a succession of learned teachers. But the writer's authority does not stand high for accuracy, and Eusebius fails to confirm the statement, although the way in which the historian mentions Pantænus at the close of the second century by no means implies that he had no predecessor in his office. Both Athenagoras and Pantænus were converts from the ranks of philosophy; and certainly no more useful class of instructors could be found in such a locality than learned converts: for no other men could have so complete a grasp of the various problems that have exercised the human intellect, or so demonstrate the weak points of every philosophical system, while they exhibited the spiritual simplicity of the Gospel of Christ as the power of God and the wisdom of God [1 Cor. i. 24] to every soul that believeth.

Respecting the position of Pantænus there can be no doubt, and from him the following succession may be traced down to the close of the fourth century; doubtful links in the succession being printed in italics:—

The head of this school had occasionally a coadjutor or assistant in the work of teaching, the various instances of which are tabulated above. The appointment of the principal teacher was vested in the bishop, as seen in the appointment of Origen by Demetrius [Eus. H. E. vi. 3; Hieron. Catal. 54]; and his subsequent deposition [Eus. H. E. vi. 26; Hieron. Ep. ad Paul. 29]; of Arius, who was appointed and also removed from the office by Achillas [A.D. 313]. Ἀχιλλᾶς . . . Ἀρειον . . . τοῦ ἐν Ἀλεξ-ανδρείᾳ διδασκαλείου προϊστῆσιν [Ararsius Papp. Synodic. i. 1494; Theodoret, H. E. i. 2]; and of Didymus, who received his appointment from Athanasius [Ruffin. H. E. ii. 7]. There appears to have been no endowment of any kind, but the teacher received an honorarium from those who were able to pay for their instruction; while poorer students were admitted gratis. In some instances, the teacher having private means, did his work for the pure love of souls, as was the case with Origen [Eus. H. E. vi. 3]; possibly also with Pierius, who "appetitor voluntariæ paupertatis fuit" [Hieron. Catal. 76]. Since the teachers of the Museum received a state stipend, it is quite possible that the catechetical school was placed on a similar footing after the conversion of Constantine [Cassiodorus, Præf. Inst. div. Scr.]. The place of instruction appears to have been no public building, but some apartment in the private dwelling of the teacher, or hired for the purpose. The school gradually decayed after the removal of Rhodon, the instructor of Philip, to Sida in Pamphylia, from whence the pupil took his name of Sidetes or Sidensis.

III. The spirit of the Museum determined the bearings of the Christian school at Alexandria, but it was chiefly by way of contrast. The Christian teacher could shew a definite creed; his religion, as a heaven-descended system, was capable of formal proof; its followers shewed a love for it that was strong as death, and they died in numbers of every age and of both sexes, rather than forswear that love. The heathen teacher, on the other hand, had none of these advantages. He had no creed; his philosophy was an intellectual system without warmth or definite colour; its highest excellence was the sense of duty that it inculcated. Its teachers may have felt some degree of enthusiasm for systems that they helped to create; but their hearers were bound together by no catholic bond of unity, and were ready at any time to modify the teaching of the schools, and eliminate or enlarge, as suited the particular syncretistic taste of the individual. Hence arose a continual clash of jealousy between the Christian and heathen schools of Alexandria. There was sufficient similarity in certain broad features of either system to enhance the bitterness of difference. The one could scarcely be understood without the other; but they eventually misunderstood each other. The Eclecticism of Philo gave a substratum of mystic thought to both of these schools. [MYSTICS. PLOTINUS. NEO-PLATONISM.] A Platonic realism was common to both that has run as a thread of gold through the speculative efforts of the human race from earliest ages. It is seen to pervade the Hindu system; it gave to Moses the "pattern," or heavenly counterpart of earthly things, in the Mount; and was received traditionally by Plato, rather than evolved by him from the germ. Human thought seems so completely tinged and instinct with the realistic idea, as to suggest its descent by an unbroken tradition, the perpetual voice of living witnesses, from the very cradle of the human race. Each of the two schools of Alexandria, Christian and heathen, taught it as an essential aspect of the truth; nor has the teaching ever died out again. The schools of the middle ages, and the philosophy of the Reformation period, were eminently based on Platonic realism, which has supplied also the proper elements from whence Kant and Fichte and Hegel have distilled over the more subtle spirit of their later philosophic creeds. At Alexandria both the heathen and the Christian teacher maintained that the attainment of truth should unite man in spirit and intellect with God; but their respective methods were in an inverse order. Philosophers held that it was for man to seek after God, εἰ ἄρα γε ψηλαφήσειαν αὐτόν [Acts xvii. 27]; the Christian teacher announced from the revealed Word that God sought man out, and drew him with cords of love to Himself, and to a sense of his high birth-right which had been lost to him in Adam, but found again in Christ. The truth declared that the Good Shepherd sought His erring sheep in the wilderness, it was heathen perversion to say that the animal instinct of the wanderer led it back to its owner. Man, said the Neo-Platonist, must ascend up to the Divine; but there must first be a descent of the Divine, argued the Christian teacher, before the human principle can be in any sense assimilated to it; flame touches flame, and is united into one body of glory, but it must first find a nature with which it can coalesce and harmonize. There were principles then in the old philosophy that were not wholly repugnant to Christianity, and in tanto they offered an important means of approach to the heathen mind, of which the Christian teacher at Alexandria diligently availed himself. Clement professedly aimed at embodying all the learning of the day in his Christian teaching; and the substance of his lectures was termed by him Σπρωμάρις—Miscellanies. "Quicquid habent homines nostri est farrago libelli."

IV. The methodical practice of class teaching based upon Scripture caused a wide induction of Scriptural fact, and nearly every book of Scripture is cited in the remains of teachers of this school that have come down to us, Clement of Alexandria and Origen being the principal sources. We may describe the Alexandrian canon from these fragmentary sources, as exactly as from the venerable Codex A. Origen supplies us with quotations and lengthened extracts from every book of the present canon; and he cites the Apocrypha as being of almost equal authority; the Book of Baruch, however, being assigned by him, as by Clement, to Jeremiah. Dionysius and Didymus make a similar use of the deuterocanonical writings, more especially of Ecclesiasticus and Wisdom; while Clement cites also the fourth book of Esdras. Gnostic contempt for the Old Testament perhaps caused the catechist to raise even doubtful books to the canonical level, where there was no antecedent objection to their contents. The canon of the New Testament is similarly confirmed. Of the four Gospels Origen declares that St. Matthew's first existed in a Hebrew form, and that a copy of it was found by Pantænus in India; both Origen and Clement term that of St. John the "Spiritual Gospel;" and they establish the authenticity of the Acts of the Apostles and Pauline Epistles, from whence Athenagoras also quotes. The Epistle to the Hebrews is assigned to St. Paul by Pantænus, Origen, Dionysius, and Didymus, while Clement adds that it was written by him in Hebrew and translated by St. Luke. The authenticity of the Catholic Epistles, 1 John, 1 Peter and Jude, is affirmed, without however denying the authority of the rest: Didymus alone declaring in one place that the second Epistle of St. Peter is interpolated and of no authority, while he makes use of it, as canonical, in his treatise de Trinitate. With respect to the Apocalypse, Dionysius was induced, by internal evidence, as he considered, to refer it to some other author than St. John, with whom his predecessors, including Clement and Origen, had always associated it. The labours of Origen on the Sacred Text, as shewn in his Hexapla, would have been in the highest degree valuable, if they had been guided by a sound critical judgment. As it is, the true text of the LXX. has only become worse confounded by the very means that were intended to secure it from error.

V. The hermeneutical principles of a catechetical school must always determine its value. Unfortunately for the Alexandrian School, its principal exponent Clement had learned from Athenagoras and Pantænus to consider the allegorical method of Philo to be the true key for unlocking the hidden sense of Scripture. But he was by no means a type of the rest. Origen, with whom he was associated, followed more closely the plain grammatical method of the ANTIOCHEAN SCHOOL, and limited the application of allegory by certain rules. Pierius followed in his steps, and Dionysius sought throughout the moral sense of Scripture. Peter and Didymus also were almost entirely free from the allegorizing tendency of Clement. The truer exegesis of the Antiochean School superseded the allegorizing interpretation copied from Philo.

There was nothing peculiar in the dogmatic or positive theology of this school, and space need not be occupied in describing that which was in truth the doctrine of the Church Catholic. The various heads are examined by Guerike in his valuable exercise on the Alexandrian Catechetical School, to which work the reader is referred. [Guerike, de Schola quæ Alexandriæ floruit, II. iii. DICT. OF THEOL. s. v.]

ALEXIANS. [LULLARDS].

ALMARIC. [AMALRICIANS].

ALOGI. This name was given by Epiphanius to those who denied St. John's doctrine concerning the Logos, and who consequently rejected St. John's writings.

The term was not intended to imply that there was a distinct organized sect so called; but was adopted to describe a heresy common to not a few sects, and important enough to bring all who held it into one class, theologically considered, although they were formed into several bodies. This is to be noticed because, while some writers of high authority, as Westcott [Introduction to Gospels, p. 240], speak of a sect called Alogi, Lardner [History of Heretics, chap. xxiii.] says that there was never any such heresy, that there was no sect or number of Christians who rejected St. John's Gospel and the Revelation, and ascribed both to Cerinthus, while they received the other books of the New Testament. The former writer did not intend to assert that all the Alogi were united into one separate body; the latter cannot be thought to assert that there did not exist the heresy of denying St. John's doctrine. Allowing then that there was, strictly speaking, no separate sect of Alogi, it remains for inquiry whether Lardner, who deals with the Alogi in a somewhat offhand manner, was justified in saying that there was no number of Christians who rejected St. John's Gospel. Philaster [Hæc. lx.] describes the heresy without using the name. Augustine [Hæc. xxx.] speaks of the name as in use: "Alogi sic vocantur . . . quia Deum Verbum recipere noluerunt, Johannis Evangelium respicientes." Similarly the author of Predestinatus and Isidore of Seville.

The two great facts which the Catholic Christian holds in this matter are the Divinity of the personal Word, and the Incarnation of that Word. "The Word was with God, and was God." "The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." The rejection of the former brings us to the Monarchians, who affirmed that there was no real distinction between the Father and the Son; the rejection of the second to those who separated the Word from the Christ. Thus Theodotus, who comes next in Epiphanius' catalogue, denied the Incarnation of the Word, asserting Jesus to have been a mere man who received Christ by the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Him in Jordan. Theodotus is said by Epiphanius to have been an offshoot from the Alogi. But the Arians, though they did not hold St. John's doctrine, yet would not be classed among the Alogi. For they did not altogether deny the Logos: they wished to establish that the Son was only the λόγος προφορικὸς, by which they assigned to Him a beginning; inasmuch as the thought must precede the sound which gives it utterance. Epiphanius appears to have confined his new term to those who altogether denied the Logos, and with this view to have made the rejection of St. John's Gospel the test of Alogian doctrine. The Arians did not reject the fourth Gospel; they tried to explain away the force of its words.

Fabricius states that the Ebionites, Cerinthians, Cerdonians, Theodotians, and Marcionites, rejected St. John's Gospel. Lardner remarks, "How groundless that supposition is must clearly appear from our accounts of Theodotus, Praxeas, and others of that principle." Now the Ebionites used St. Matthew's Gospel only [Iren. i. 26, iii. 11, 7; Euseb. H. E. iii. 27; Epiph. Hær. xxx. sec. 3]; the Cerinthians only St. Matthew [Epiph. Hær. xxviii. 5 and xxx. 3, 14; Philast. Hær. xxxvi.]; the Cerdonians only St. Luke, and that mutilated [Pseudo-Tert. xvi.]; the Theodotians rejected St. John's Gospel, if Epiphanius is to be credited, for he affiliates them to the Alogi, having defined the Alogi by that very rejection [Hær. liv.]; the Marcionites used only St. Luke [Iren. iii. 11, 6; Tert. Adv. Marc. iv. 5]. These authorities strengthen each other, particularly with regard to Cerdo and Marcion. In reply to them Lardner urges, with regard to the Ebionites, that St. John is quoted in the Clementine Homilies. To which we answer, that the practice of the writer of the Homilies cannot set aside the evidence of the tenets of the Ebionites in general. It follows only that in this respect the writer did not faithfully represent the school to which he belonged [Lardner, Credib. xxix. 5]. With regard to the Cerinthians it is said [Hist. of Her. iv. 6] that Philaster's evidence is not supported by others and needs not to be much minded, and that Epiphanius argues against Cerinthus from St. John's Gospel, which implies that Cerinthus respected it. Philaster is supported by Epiphanius, and Epiphanius, writing not in immediate controversy with Cerinthus, but for the benefit of the Church at large, quotes that which the Church received. That Marcion rejected St. John could not of course be denied. Lardner thinks that in this respect he went beyond Cerdo [Hist. of Her. ix. 4]. But the close resemblance of the doctrines of Cerdo and Marcion, with the teaching of Cerdo, that the God proclaimed by the law and the prophets was not the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, makes it far more probable that the evidence of Pseudo-Tertullian is correct [Iren. i. 27; Hippol. Ref. vii. 25; x. 15]. And if the appendix to the De Præscr. Hæret. is a translation of Hippolytus' early work, its authority is high. It being thus proved that there were certain sects which rejected St. John's Gospel, there is no reason to doubt Epiphanius' statement that Theodotus followed them in this as he did in the main feature of their doctrine. His argument from a passage in St. John was only an "argumentum ad hominem," drawn from a book which his opponents believed.

Epiphanius goes on to state that the Alogi attributed not only the Apocalypse, but St. John's writings generally, to Cerinthus. If this statement be accepted, it can only be said, that "some theory was necessary to account for the origin of the Gospel, and as one of the Apostle's writings had already been assigned to Cerinthus, this was placed in the same category, in spite of its doctrinal character" [Westcott, on the Canon, p. 308]. But it is far more likely that with Philaster we should limit the statement to the Apocalypse.

In the case of these sects, from the Cerinthians downwards, which rejected St. John's Gospel, that rejection was an almost necessary consequence of their doctrine, and was not much considered in and for itself. But when the rejection of the Gospel was used in opposition to other doctrines or practices, it became in itself more noticeable. It came forward into the front of controversy. This was the case when, in opposition to the pretensions of the Montanists, it was urged that the fourth Gospel was spurious. It was the consideration of this controversy that led Epiphanius to give a distinctive name to those who rejected the Gospel. After describing the Montanists and allied sects, he proceeds to the new heresy of the Alogi. That the Montanists were met by an assertion of the spuriousness of the fourth Gospel, is noticed by Irenæus [iii. 11, 9]. The passage has been variously interpreted, and is as follows: "Alii vero ut donum Spiritus frustrentur, quod in novissimis temporibus secundum placitum Patris effusum est in humanum genus, illam speciem non admittunt, quæ est secundum Johannis Evangelium, in qua Paracletum se misurum Dominus promisit; sed simul et Evangelium, et propheticum repellunt Spiritum. Infelices vere, qui pseudo-prophetæ quidem esse volunt, prophetiæ vero gratiam repellunt ab Ecclesia: similia patientes his, qui propter eos qui in hypocrisi veniunt, etiam a fratribus communicatione se abstinunt." Here the comparison made with those who abstain from true communion in order to avoid hypocritical communicants, shews that they who refused the grace of prophecy did so to avoid false prophets. Consequently we must adopt Gieseler's correction [Compend. i. p. 150], and read "qui pseudo-prophetas quidem esse volunt." They declare their opponents to be false prophets, and thrust away from the Church the grace of prophecy. The passage written when Irenæus was favourable, as Neander remarks, to the pretensions of Montanus, is to be referred to those afterwards called Alogi.

To interpret the passage of the Montanists has three difficulties. It accuses them of a purpose of frustrating the gifts of the Spirit, when they were claiming the fulness of those gifts; it makes them say that they wish to be false prophets (if the words are taken ironically, irony requires that we should say, "they wish forsooth to be true prophets"); and it entirely mars the pertinency of the closing comparison. That at the time Irenæus wrote [about A.D. 185] he should have regarded the Montanist pretensions favourably is nothing wonderful. Many did so; and at a later time the Bishop of Rome, probably Victor, was on the point of admitting the Montanists to his communion. [MONTANISTS.]

Turning to Epiphanius, we find a passage on the same subject [Hær. li. cap. 33]. He is speaking of those who rejected the Apocalypse, and who objected that there existed no church at Thyatira; and he meets them by arguing that the state of Thyatira is a fulfilment of St. John's prophecy: "Ἐνοικησάντων γὰρ τούτων ἐκείσε καὶ τῶν κατὰ Φρύγας [οἱ μὲν], δίκην λύκων ἀρπαξάντων τὰς διανοίας τῶν ἀκεραίων πιστῶν, μετήνεγκαν τὴν πᾶσαν πόλιν εἰς τὴν αὐτῶν αἵρεσιν, οἳ τε [οἱ δὲ] ἀρνούμενοι τὴν Ἀποκάλυψιν τοῦ λόγου τούτου εἰς ἀνατροπὴν κατ' ἐκείνου καιροῦ ἐστρατεύοντο." The words in brackets are corrections adopted by Gieseler. If we follow the uncorrected text, as it stands in Oehler's edition, it must be concluded that at Thyatira the Alogi and the Montanists joined forces. Nor is there any difficulty in supposing this; for Hippolytus, writing from thirty-five to forty years later than Irenæus, tells us that a branch of the Montanists adopted Noëtian tenets [Refut. viii. 12]. As Noëtians it would be natural to them to reject the fourth Gospel, and as Montanists, who claimed the Paraclete exclusively to themselves, it would suit them to reject the Gospel which expressly promises the Paraclete to the Apostles. The corrections adopted by Gieseler shew the parties, as before, in opposition. According to the text which the reader chooses, will probably be his conclusion, whether the Montanists of Thyatira were of the Noëtian branch or of the elder stock.

The use of the word ἀλογος in controversy with the Arians should be noticed. [See Athan. De Decret. Nic. Syn. sec. 16; Orat. i. Cont. Arian. sec. 19 and 24.] Upon the first of these passages Newman remarks, "This is a frequent argument in the controversy, viz. that to deprive the Father of His Son or substantial Word (λόγος) is as great a sacrilege as to deny His reason (λόγος), from which the Son receives His name." Thus [Orat. i. sec. 14] Athanasius says, "Imputing to God's Nature an absence of His Word (ἀλογίαν, or irrationality), they are most irreligious" [vid. sec. 19, fin. 24. Select Treatises, i. p. 25].

AMALRICIANS. A school of mediæval Pantheists, who followed the opinions of Amalric of Bena, or Amaury of Bené (so called from his native town in the diocese of Chartres), a theologian and dialectician of Paris, in the end of the twelfth and the beginning of the thirteenth century. Amalric attracted many to his lectures, in which he taught simple Pantheism, that "all things are one, that is God; that all matter proceeded originally from God, and will return to Him." From this platform he advanced to the denial of many doctrines of the Church, and among other strange opinions taught that the Father was incarnate in Abraham, the Son in the Blessed Virgin, and the Holy Ghost in ourselves [Martene, Thes. Anecd. iv. 163]. The opinions of Amalric were condemned by the University of Paris in the year 1204, and he was expelled from office. He appealed personally to Pope Innocent III., but in 1207 the sentence of the University was confirmed, and Amalric returned to Paris by order of the Pope, to recant his heresies. In 1209 Amalric died of grief, ten of his followers were burned as heretics by order of another council of Paris, and their leader's own remains were exhumed, burned, and the ashes scattered to the winds. The fourth Lateran Council [A.D. 1215] confirmed the sentence passed against his heresies. [PANTHEISM. DAVID OF DINANT.]

AMBROSIANS. The followers of a French Anabaptist named Ambrose, who about 1559 professed to have special Divine revelations far transcending Holy Scripture in value. They called themselves "Pneumatiques," or Spirituals.

AMMONIANS. This name has sometimes been used to designate the school of Ammonius Saccas, the founder of Neo-Platonism in the second century. [NEO-PLATONISTS. MYSTICS.]

AMSDORFIANS. The party of Nicolas Amsdorf in the "Majoristic controversy" [A.D. 1552-4], a bitter dispute between George Major, a Lutheran divine of Wittenberg, and Amsdorf, who was Lutheran bishop of Naumburg, respecting the efficacy of good works to salvation. Amsdorf was a strong supporter of Luther, and he is accused of going so far in adopting his leader's Solifidianism, as to have maintained that good works are a hindrance to salvation. The controversy was brought to a close by the "Formula of Concord" drawn up between the two parties at Bergen, A.D. 1577.

AMYRALDISTS. A school of Calvinists who followed the opinions of Moses Amyraut, a distinguished French Protestant Professor of Divinity at Saumur, from A.D. 1633 to A.D. 1664. Amyraut was a man of much learning, and full of an anxious desire to promote union among the Calvinists, and between the Calvinists and the Church. After the failure of an attempt made by order of Cardinal Richelieu to promote the latter, Amyraut turned his studies towards a reconciliation of the endless disputes about predestination and grace in his own sect. He maintained that God wishes the salvation of all men, that none are excluded from salvation by any Divine decree, that none can be saved except through belief in Christ; but that God gives all power to believe, and it is only through men's own default that they are not saved. Those who adopted these opinions were called "Hypothetical Universalists," and they spread very widely among the French and Swiss Protestants in, perhaps, a more developed form of Universalism than that actually taught by Amyraut. [Mosheim, Eccl. Hist. iii. 358, Stubbs' ed.]

ANABAPTISTS [ἀνά-βαπτίζειν]. This name was given at the Reformation to a body of extreme anti-sacerdotalists which came to the surface in the north-west of Germany, in Holland, and in Switzerland, contemporaneously with the movement headed by Luther in Germany, and by Zwingli in Switzerland. Some of them also emigrated from Holland to England about A.D. 1525, and formed the nucleus of a sect which gave the government of the country great trouble for many years afterwards.

It is not at all clear how re-baptism (an ancient heretical custom of the Novatians, the Donatists, and the Eunomians) came to be regarded as so distinctive a characteristic of these anti-sacerdotalists, that they should be called Anabaptists, or Re-baptizers, for they very commonly (if not universally) repudiated the doctrine of our Lord's Incarnation, and held other equally conspicuous heresies. But it is probable that their custom of re-baptism was enforced upon their adherents in a very strict and ostentatious manner, and that it thus formed the most notorious part of their system. They were, in reality, the Reformation descendants of those many mediæval anti-sacerdotalists who went by the names of ALBIGENSES, BOGOMILES, HENRICIANS, PETROBRUSIANS, &c.; and among all such sects there was a more or less developed antipathy to infant baptism [Hagenbach, Hist. of Doct. ii. 85, Clark's transl.], which was likely to lead eventually to Anabaptism. In the later part of the sixteenth century, in Germany, and in the following century in England, the more sober sects of the MENNONITES and the BAPTISTS originated among the Anabaptists of the two countries, and gradually superseded them.

The earliest historical notice of the Anabaptists as a sect is in association with certain religious and civil disturbances, originating with the "prophets of Zwickau," which began in the year 1521, and culminated in a fierce civil war. [ZWICKAU PROPHETS.] The leader of these "prophets" was Thomas Münzer, the Lutheran pastor of Zwickau, who had read the works of the mystic Tauler so exclusively, that the dreamy mysticism of the master had turned the disciple into a wild fanatic. Münzer was deposed from his post at Zwickau, and after a vain attempt to win support in Bohemia, betook himself to Altstadt in Thuringia, where he propagated his tenets for two years. Those tenets were: [1] that the true Word of God is not Holy Scripture, but an internal inspiration; [2] that the baptism of infants is unlawful; [3] that there must be a visible kingdom of Christ upon earth; and [4] that in the kingdom of Christ all must be equal, and must enjoy a community of goods. At Altstadt, Münzer established a league for the formation of this new theocracy, and summoning the nobles to co-operate with him, he threatened them with civil war if they refused to do so. He was not, at present, however, strong enough to carry out his threats, and being compelled to withdraw from Altstadt in 1524, he ventured upon a new settlement at Waldshut on the borders of Switzerland; Zwingli, Grebel, Stumpf, Hubmeyer, Hottinger, and others of the Zurich reformers, being already in correspondence with him. From Waldshut the principles of Münzer quickly spread through some of the Swiss cantons, especially those of Zurich and St. Gall; the fanaticism of his followers beginning to grow very extreme, one of them, named Thomas Schugger, for example, cutting off the head of his brother Leonard under the pretence that he was inspired to do so. Zwingli endeavoured to stem the tide of fanaticism by a work against Anabaptism, and Bullinger was equally zealous against the fanatics; but Hubmeyer, Grebel, and others of the early Swiss "Reformers" cast in their lot with them entirely; while the Unitarians, Hetzer and Denck, found natural allies among those who denied (as they seem to have done from the first) the Incarnation of our Lord.

At this crisis the long impending rebellion of the peasantry against the nobility broke out in Southern Germany, and in a short time spread through Swabia, Franconia, and Alsace. This rebellion, commonly known as "The Peasants' War," was provoked by the tyrannical and extortionate habits of the feudal nobility, and was so far mixed up with religion, that of twelve articles in which the peasants stated their grievances, the first was a claim to appoint and depose their own pastors, while the second was a demand for more equitable collection of tithes by the lay-appropriators who had taken possession of them. The peasants appealed to Luther, who partly recognised the justice of their complaints, but at the same time severely condemned their rebellion. To the opponents of the peasantry he wrote that the latter had incurred the guilt of dreadful sin of three kinds against God and man, for which they deserved death in body and soul many times over; for they had broken their allegiance, had plundered religious houses and castles, and had cloaked their doings with the Gospel. "Therefore, dear masters," he continues, "come hither to deliver, hither to the rescue; have pity on the poor folk, stab, smite, throttle, who can; and if you perish in the work it will be a blessed death, a better than which you will never accomplish" [Luther's Works, xvi. 91, Walch's ed. 1737-53].

But if the communism of these ill-used serfs had no charms for Luther, it soon found a supporter, and they a leader, in Münzer. Early in the year 1525 he returned to Thuringia, and re-established his parody of a theocracy in a more formidable shape than ever at Mühlhausen, a town which had been warned against him by Luther in a letter written so long previously as August 1524. Here he headed a fierce rebellion in the character of a prophet, signing himself "Münzer, with the sword of Gideon." His exhortations to the labouring classes were as savage as that of Luther to the nobles: "Let not your sword cool in blood," he wrote to the miners of Mansfeld, "On! on! on! while ye have the day; God goes before you" [Luther's Works, Walch's ed. xvi. 150]. In his subsequent confession under torture [ibid. 157], he said that "he had stirred up this rebellion in order to bring Christendom to an equality, and that the nobles and gentry who would not stand by the Gospel, and join his league when invited to do so in a brotherly manner, should be punished and put to death. The first principle of the league was to have all things common, and whatsoever duke, count, or lord would not consent to this, should be beheaded or hung." The rebellion was crushed at the battle of Frankenhausen, on May 15, 1525, by an army under the command of the Elector of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Duke of Brunswick; Münzer and his subordinate leaders, Pfeifer and others, being taken and afterwards executed, vast numbers of the people also being slain.

For a time the Anabaptists were suppressed as an organized body, though a vast number of persons still held the opinions of Münster, and were ready even to die for the maintenance of them when persecuted by their Lutheran opponents. The sect, however, gradually regained its strength, until the new theocracy was once more established at Münster in Westphalia nine years after the death of Münster. This final struggle of Anabaptist communism was headed by a tailor of Leyden named John Bockhold. Münster had become a stronghold of the sect under its Lutheran minister, Bernard Rothmann, and two of the burghers named Kreckting and Knipperdolling. These had become allies of John Matthei, originally a baker, but established at Haarlem as a bishop by Melchior Hoffmann, who had in some degree filled the place of Münster as leader of the sect. Bockhold, Matthei, and Gerard Kippenbroeck, a bookbinder of Amsterdam, organized an insurrection at Münster for the same purpose as that which Münster had in view, the formation of a theocratic kingdom. They soon gained possession of the city, and proposed to carry their plans still further by the destruction of Leyden. But before this could be effected Münster was besieged by the Count of Waldeck, its temporal lord and also its bishop, in a sortie against whose forces Matthei was slain. After the death of Matthei, the tailor Bockhold was crowned king of the "New Jerusalem," under the title of John of Leyden, the churches were destroyed, and for twelve months the city was a scene of fanatic lawlessness and revolting profligacy, carried on under the name of religion. Münster was taken on June 24th, 1535, and in the following January the dissolution of the new "Kingdom" was completed by the cruel torture and execution of its "King," whose body was for many years afterwards hung in chains as a warning to the citizens from the steeple of St. Lambert's Church.

Meanwhile, however, this primary idea of the Anabaptists had travelled to Amsterdam, Deventer, and Wesel, three towns which John of Leyden claimed as given him by God, and to which he had sent some of his fanatic partizans as apostles of sedition. The leader of these at Amsterdam was Van Geelen, who formed a conspiracy among his converts to take the city out of the hands of the magistrates, and establish the new kingdom there also. The insurrection which he raised was quickly suppressed, and its leaders put to death. A similar result followed in other parts of Holland, where like attempts were made, and thenceforth the continental Anabaptists ceased from their endeavours to establish their principles by violence and rebellion. In the year 1537, Menno became their leader and head, and they subsided into a peaceable, though still a fanatical sect [MENNONITES. DAVIDISTS], whose distinctive tenet was that of adult baptism. [Luther's Works, Walch's ed. vol. xvii. Zwingli's Elenchus contra Catabaptistas, 1527. Bullinger's Von dem universchampten, &c. Leeren der selbsgesandten Widertöuffern, 1531. Strobel's Leben Schriften und Lehren T. Münzers, 1795. Schlüsselfeld's Catalog. Hæreticorum, lib. xii. Seide-man's Munzer, 1842. Brandt's Hist. of Reformation, i. 2.]

In England the Anabaptists are not distinctly traceable before the year 1534, although much similarity is to be observed between their principles and those of sectarians spoken of by the bishops in 1529 as "certain apostates, friars, monks, lewd priests, bankrupt merchants, vagabonds, and lewd idle fellows of corrupt intent," who "have embraced the abominable and erroneous opinions lately sprung in Germany" [Froude's Hist. of Eng. i. 211]. In A.D. 1534, however, a royal proclamation was issued, in which it is said that many strangers are come into this realm, who, although they were baptized in their infancy, yet have, in contempt of the Holy Sacrament of Baptism, rebaptized themselves. They are ordered to depart out of the realm in twelve days, under pain of death [Wilkins' Concil. iii. 779]. But they were probably refugees from the Netherlands, and the prospect of death at home was even more imminent than it was in England. Certain it is that Cromwell has left a memorandum in his pocket-book, "First, touching the Anabaptists, and what the king will do with them" [Ellis' Orig. Lett. II. ii. 120]; and that nineteen men and six women (all immigrants from Holland), who were examined in St. Paul's on May 25th, 1535, and subsequently burned as heretics, two in Smithfield and the rest in several country towns, appear to be those referred to by him [Stow's Chron. p. 571].

Fresh immigrations of the sect must have taken place after this, for on October 1st, 1538, Archbishop Cranmer and others received a commission from the Crown to take stringent measures for their suppression [Wilkins' Concil. iii. 836]. The result was that a set of Injunctions were issued in the year 1539, restraining the importation of books, and condemning the opinions of the Anabaptists [ibid. 847]. A few months afterwards, also an Act of Parliament was passed [32 Hen. VIII. cap. 49], granting a general pardon to all the King's subjects, except those who said "that infants ought not to be baptized, and if they were baptized that they ought to be re-baptized when they came to lawful age," and some who hold other opinions, including those who say "that Christ took no bodily substance of our Blessed Lady." Some of the unfortunate people recanted, and bore faggots in token of their recantation; but others were burned like their predecessors [Stow's Chron. p. 579; Latimer's Sermons, i. 144, ed. 1824]. They seem, however, to have gone on increasing in numbers. On June 25th, 1549, Hooper writes from London to Bullinger: "The Anabaptists flock to the place, and give me much trouble with their opinions respecting the Incarnation of the Lord: for they deny altogether that Christ was born of the Virgin Mary according to the flesh" [Parker Soc. Orig. Lett. 65]. At a later date, June 29th, 1550, the same writer says that Kent and Essex are "troubled with the frenzy of the Anabaptists more than any other part of the kingdom."

[ibid. 87]. A year later Martin Micronius writes from London to Bullinger, that the same heretics "are now beginning to shake our churches with greater violence than ever, as they deny the Conception of Christ by the Virgin" [ibid. 574]: and, meanwhile, the Act of 1540 had been re-enacted against them by the Parliament of Edward VI. in 1549 [3 & 4 Edw. VI. ch. 24].

The Anabaptists are said by Bishop Jewel, in a letter to Peter Martyr, dated Nov. 6th, 1560, to have "sprung up like mushrooms in the darkness and unhappy night of the Marian times" [Jewel's Works, iv. 1240, Park. Soc. ed.]. In the same year Bishop Grindal received an anonymous letter, which he supposed to be written by Adrian Hamsted [ADRIANISTS], asking that they might have the free exercise of their religion; but their petition was not granted, and instead the Queen issued a proclamation, ordering all to depart the realm within twenty-one days. In April 1573, a letter was addressed to "the Dutch Church" in London by the Privy Council, rebuking them for sowing discord among English people, when they replied that they had only four English persons in their congregation, and that all four had come from abroad [Strype's Ann. Ref. iv. 520]. But on Easter Day 1575, a private conventicle of them was discovered near Aldersgate Bar, and twenty-seven were apprehended. "Of these, four recanted the following errors: [1] That Christ took not flesh of the substance of the Virgin; [2] that infants born of faithful parents ought to be re-baptized; [3] that no Christian man ought to be a magistrate; [4] that it is not lawful for a Christian man to take an oath. But others refusing to abjure, eleven of them (all Dutchmen) were condemned in the Consistory of St. Paul's to be burnt, nine of whom were banished, and two suffered the extremity of the fire in Smithfield, July 22nd, 1575, viz. John Wielmacker and Hendrick Ter Woort" [Neale's Hist. of Purit. i. 340, ed. 1732; Strype's Ann. Ref. iii. 564, ed. 1824]. These were the last Anabaptists who were executed for their heresy in England, one named Edward Wightman (who was condemned for Anabaptism among other errors shortly after Bartholomew Legate had been burned for Arianism in 1611) being imprisoned for life in Newgate as a more humane mode of punishment.

It seems almost certain that the Anabaptists, who were thus so severely dealt with in England, were part of the very dangerous German sect which had been founded by Münzer and Bockhold: and that, in the originally understood sense of the name, there were never many English Anabaptists. Their opposition to infant baptism, their practice of re-baptizing adults, were inherited by the Baptist sects, who have not unfrequently been called Anabaptists. But there is no essential historical connection between the earlier and the later sects, and though the designation "Baptists" is less distinctive than that of "Anabaptists," historical clearness favours its use. [BAPTISTS.]

ANDRONICIANS. A temporary name given to the ANGELITÆ, from Andronicus, bishop of the sect about A.D. 614.

ANGELIC BROTHERS. A Dutch community of theosophic Pietists founded by George Gichtel, who died at Amsterdam in the year 1710. They assumed their name from a belief that they had already attained the purity of that state in which the angels of God are, neither marrying nor giving in marriage. Gichtel left behind him a work entitled Theosophia Practica, which was published at Leyden in six volumes in 1722.

ANGELICI. A sect of this name is mentioned by Epiphanius, but he states that he knows nothing about them except the name, and can only conjecture that they were so called either because they believed the world to have been created by angels (as the Gnostics believed), or because they claimed to be so pure as to be already as the angels of God, or that they took their name from a country called Angelina which lay beyond Mesopotamia [Epiph. Hær. lx.]. St. Augustine names the sect on the authority of Epiphanius, adding, that they were worshippers of angels [Aug. Hær. xxxix.]. If there ever was a sect bearing this name it was probably obscure and local, or Epiphanius would have been able to say something more respecting it. But as Angelolatry was known even in the time of the Apostles [Col. ii. 18], and when forbidden by the 35th canon of the Council of Laodicea is spoken of as being carried on in private conventicles, there is much probability that the worshippers of angels were called Angelici.

ANGELICS. An Anabaptist sect in Silesia and Bohemia assumed this name about A.D. 1596. [Sianda, Lexic. Polem.]

ANGELITÆ. A name assumed by the Alexandrian Jacobites from the first church of their sect, erected A.D. 540, and called the Angelium. The ecclesiastical historian Nicephorus accuses them of holding tritheistic opinions [Niceph. Hist. Eccl. xviii. 49]; but it is probable that the name Angelitæ was given to other sects of the Monophysites including the TRITHEITES.

ANGLICANS. This designation has been given of late years to that section of the High Church school in the Church of England whose theology and ritual customs are principally formed on those of the seventeenth century divines. The school may be called that of Andrewes and Laud; and inherits some of that narrowness and want of sympathy by which the seventeenth century divines were characterized in their dealings with foreign churches and with dissenters at home.

ANGLO-CALVINISTS. A controversial designation applied to the Church of England in ignorance of its true principles by Romanist theologians. Thus Sianda writes: "Anglo-Calviniani a Puritanis, cæterisque Reformatis differunt, tum in disciplina, tum in dogmatibus; Episcopalem enim ordinem admittunt. . . . Christi trophæum, Crucem scilicet, non solum honorant, sed ejus signum Sacramentis, et in primis baptismo adhibent. . . . Anglo-Calviniani Episcopi suos habent Cancellarios, Archidiaconos, Decanos, Cathedralres Ecclesias, in quibus sunt Canonici, seu Præbendarii, qui Matutinas ac Vespertinas preces celebrant, ignota et hæc omnia cæteris Calvinistis. Liturgiam etiam suo ritu celebrant diebus sacris, et in eadem Litanias diebus Mercurii et Veneris recitant . . . et in functionibus suis obeundis superpelliceo utuntur," &c. [Sianda, Lexicon Polemicum, s. v. PURITANI]. The association of Calvin's name, authority, and doctrine, with the Church of England is wholly unjustifiable by the facts of history or by the formularies of the Church, but the "Low Church" school have done much to earn for themselves the name wrongly given to the Church of England by foreign writers.

ANGLO-CATHOLICS. A name sometimes assumed by members of the Church of England as a protection against their common classification with sectarians under the word "Protestant." It is intended as a designation that shall express the claim of English Churchmen to be regarded as members of the Catholic Church at large (whether in the Eastern or the Western world) subject to those distinctive marks which characterize them as an ecclesiastical tribe or family.

ANGLO-ROMANISTS. A modern appellation given to the English sect of ROMAN CATHOLICS.

"ANIMALES." A name of reproach used towards those who believed in the Resurrection of the Body by an early sect who had perverted the doctrine of Origen into a belief in a mere spiritual resuscitation. There was never any sect of the name.

ANNIHILATIONISTS. Those who believe that the wicked will, sooner or later after death, cease to exist altogether.

ANOMIANS. [ANTINOMIANS.]

ANOMŒANS. The principal sect of the Arians, which took its name from its distinctive dogma, that the Second Person in the Holy Trinity is essentially or substantially different [ἀνόμιος] from the First Person. This sect of heretics originated at Antioch about A.D. 350, forming a party headed first by Aëtius and subsequently by Eunomius his secretary, and being designated also after the names of these two leaders. [AËTIANS. EUNOMIANS.] They were not, however, in reality, a new sect so much as strict Arians of the old school who were developing the principle of their first leader in its logical form, in opposition to the SEMI-ARIANS, who dared not face the full argumentative consequences of the Arian dogma. Hence they were also called EXUCONTIANS, with reference to the original statement of Arius himself that there was a time when the Son of God had no existence, while the Father was acknowledged to have existed eternally.

After the Nicene Council [A.D. 325] the party of strict Arians rapidly contracted in numbers, and the Semi-Arians became the life of the movement which Arius had started. They were also the Court party, and upon the death of the Emperor Constantine in A.D. 337 were openly supported against the Catholics by his son and successor Constantius. They endeavoured, like all Court parties, to hush up all differences between the Arians and the Church by a middle course in which the extreme statements of their founder should be suppressed, and a broader line taken which might be hoped to comprehend large numbers of the orthodox as well as themselves. The Anomœan movement under Aëtius and Eunomius was an intellectual recoil against this theological compromise, but although it gave some trouble to the Semi-Arian leaders, it never attracted large numbers, the majority of the Arian sect still preferring the less definite, and so apparently more safe, line which had been struck out by Eusebius and his friends. The Anomœans were also a purely intellectual party, rejecting all mystery, feeling, and moral discipline, from religion, and professing to rest it solely on dogmatic reason—that is, on a kind of mechanical logic, a system which was not likely to secure followers among the multitude. Thus Eunomius denied that there was anything in Divine things which was beyond human understanding. "If," he wrote, "some men's minds are so obtuse that it is beyond their power to comprehend anything, either of that which lies before their feet, or of that which is above their heads, yet it would not follow from this that the knowledge of true Being is unattainable by all the rest of mankind. . . . The minds of those who believe on the Lord should . . . not stop even with the generation of the Son of God. They soar above this, in striving, out of an earnest desire for eternal life, to attain to the Highest" [Gregor. Nyssen. Orat. x. adv. Eunom.]. On this principle the Anomœan leaders professed to understand the exact nature of the Divine Essence, and the exact manner in which the Son of God originally came into existence.

This logical revival of normal Arianism was supported by the influence of Eudoxius, who was Bishop of Antioch when it first took shape in the hands of Aëtius, and afterwards of Constantino. Its principal opponent in the first instance was Basil of Ancyra in Galatia, a Semi-Arian bishop; but it was afterwards met by a more efficient antagonist, St. Gregory of Nyssa. The Semi-Arian party at Court endeavoured to suppress it on their usual policy of comprehension, and set forth at their partizan Synod of Sirmium [A.D. 357] a creed, or statement of faith, which the Eunomian party found no difficulty in subscribing. Basil of Ancyra, considering this as a preliminary to the triumph of the Anomœans, obtained a very distinct exposition and condemnation of their tenets at the Synod of Ancyra [A.D. 358]; and this having brought them prominently to the notice of the Emperor Constantius, he determined to convene a General Council for the purpose of setting all differences at rest. By the influence of the Court party under the leadership of Ursacius, bishop of Singidunum in Moesia, and Valens, bishop of Mursa in Pannonia, the projected council was broken up into two parts, the one composed of Eastern bishops and meeting at Seleucia in Syria, the other of Western bishops and meeting at Ariminum in Italy [A.D. 359]. At both these councils the Anomœans were ultimately overpowered and condemned by the Semi-Arian bishops. To the verdict of the Seleucian Council the Anomœans opposed that of a synod held by their ally Acacius at Antioch [A.D. 363]; but their principles received a final and decisive blow at the second Œcumenical Council held at Constantinople [A.D. 381], when they were condemned in the first canon, and by the seventh canon forbidden to be received into the Church except by orthodox Baptism. ANTHROPOMORPHITES. Those who hold that the Almighty has a material body of human shape.

This error must be carefully distinguished from an error held by some Fathers of the early Church, who, in order to maintain the true Being and Personality of God, thought themselves obliged to assert the existence of a Divine σῶμα or Corpus. They shrunk from a clear statement of the incorporeity of God, and therefore could not deny that the μορφὴ Θεοῦ [Phil. ii. 6] implies a shape or figure [see Cyril. Alex. adv. Anthrop.]. Tertullian translates it by "effigies;" but they abstained from describing its parts and shape, and struggled, in the use of contradictory terms, to declare the spirituality of the body, of the σῶμα ἁσώματος, without which they thought that the Deity would be reduced to an impersonal power.

The error of these Fathers must be noticed in the first place; for evidently it might be easily developed into the grosser error of Anthropomorphism, and there are indications that it did lead to this result.

Melito of Sardis, Tertullian, and Phœbadius have been charged with holding that God is not incorporeal. Of Tertullian's opinions we have full statements. He laid down the general axiom, "Omne quod est corpus est sui generis. Nihil est incorporale nisi quod non est" [Tertull. De Carne Chr. 11]. And accordingly he asked, "Quis enim negabit Deum corpus esse, etsi Deus spiritus est? Spiritus enim corpus sui generis in sua effigie?" [Tertull. adv. Prax. 7]. In the paragraph which contains this passage "corpus" is opposed to "vacua et inanis res," and "effigies" is the translation of μορφὴ in Phil. ii. 6. Again we read, "Et materia enim Deus, secundum formam divinitatis; innata scilicet, et infecta, et æterna" [Tertull. adv. Marc. i. 15]; where the words "secundum formam divinitatis" qualify the word "materia," and refer it to the very οὐσία of the Deity, declared in the former passage to be "spiritus." The extent of this qualification is shewn by the words, "Deum immutabilem et informabilem credi necesse est, ut æternum" [Tertull. adv. Prax. 27]. Accordingly Tertullian expressly rejects Anthropomorphism [Tertull. adv. Marc. ii. 5].

Augustine therefore [Aug. de Hæres. lxxxvi.]

declares that Tertullian was not held to be heretical for this opinion, and explains his meaning. "Potuit propterea putari corpus Deum dicere, quia non est nihil, non est inanitas, non est corporis vel animæ qualitas, sed ubique totus, et per locorum spatia nulla partitus, in sua tamen natura atque substantia immutabiliter permanet."

Gennadius classes Melito with Tertullian, and distinguishes the error he imputes to them from that of Anthropomorphism. He says that we are to hold in the Deity "nihil corporeum, ut Melito et Tertullianus: nihil corporaliter effigiatum, ut Anthropomorphus et Vadianus" [Gennad. de Eccl. Dogm. iv.]. Melito's book, Περὶ ἐνσώματου Θεοῦ, is stated by Origen to have been on this subject. Origen's words shew, as Routh observes, that those who held with Melito defended his opinion by the language of Scripture, which attributes bodily members to God, and speaks of God appearing in human form. In the absence of fuller information, the inference from these premisses appears to be, that Melito advanced the same opinion as Tertullian, that his followers were passing into Anthropomorphism, and that Origen, seeing the evil, opposed the original tenet and asserted the entire immateriality of the Divine nature. Phœbadius repeats Tertullian's words [Phœbad. cont. Arian. c. xx. in Gallandi Bibl. v. 255].

These Fathers then are by no means to be charged with Anthropomorphism; but it seems to be impossible to assert, however they extenuated their doctrine, that they held the substance or οὐσία of the Deity to be entirely "void of corporeal bulk and concretion." Whence then came this notion? It appears to have resulted from opposition to the Gnostic conception of the Supreme Being, to the notion of Bythus, one dwelling apart in the tranquillity of an unfathomable depth, the world being made and governed by inferior powers. This, whether avowedly or not, represented an impersonal power. In opposition to this the doctrine of a Personal God ruling the world was to be maintained. Now all the words which language can supply to denote the substance of God must be metaphorical, as spirit, which is aërial matter, or negative, as incorporeal, immaterial. The negative terms lent themselves more ready to the conception which was to be opposed; and the metaphorical terms were insisted on, and interpreted literally.¹ In the Clementine Homilies St. Peter (the ideal of orthodoxy according to the Essene-Ebionite school) is accused by Simon Magus (the impersonation of heresy), of maddening the mind by the terrible image of the shape of God. Simon Magus argues, if God has a form (μορφὴ) He must have a shape (σχήμα). St. Peter accepts the inference, but adds, His members are for beauty's sake, not for use. There is here in argument the very misapprehension of the term μορφὴ which appears in Tertullian's rendering it by "effigies;" and which appears again, without Tertullian's contradiction of the conclusion drawn from it, in Gennadius' description of Anthropomorphism, "corporaliter effigiatum." Melito's followers already named drew the same conclusion.¹ The more common source, however, of Anthropomorphism is, not the deprivation of the doctrine of learned and thoughtful men, but the grosser and material notions of the illiterate. The difficulty of forming the conception of a purely spiritual personality, the strong metaphorical language of the Hebrew Scriptures, the carrying on that language into Christianity, the reproduction of that language to the eye by pictures and images, inevitably occasion an Anthropomorphism in popular Christianity. It is better, doubtless, to have this conception of a personal God than to lose the sense of His Personality; but from time to time the conception, generally indistinct, is defined into a settled dogma. Such was the case with the followers of the Syrian monk Audæus. [AUDIANS.] Of Audæus himself little is known, but his followers, adopting a monastic life, fell into Anthropomorphism; and Epiphanius [Hær. lxx.] and Theodoret [Hist. Eccl. iv. 10] state that he was the first to interpret of outward form the image of God in which man is made. Recluses, brooding over Scripture imagery, their minds often in an unhealthy state, are peculiarly liable to such an error.² The author of Prædestinatus names Zenon, a Syrian bishop, as a chief opponent of the Audians. Other monks besides the Audian fell from the same cause into the like error. The recluses of Egypt were for the most part Anthropomorphites [Socr. H. E. vi. 7]. Socrates notices this under the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, when the Anthropomorphite controversy was mixed up with the Origenist controversy, and the discreditable proceedings of Theophilus of Alexandria afforded more matter for history. Origen was a warm defender of the incorporeity of the Divine Nature; and those who opposed him in matters more doubtful were led by the mere spirit of contradiction to oppose him in this point too, while Anti-Origenists were often accused without cause of Anthropomorphism. Such a charge was brought against Epiphanius by John of Jerusalem. In the year 399, Theophilus in a paschal epistle denounced Anthropomorphism. The monks who held that opinion rose against him; he pacified them, not without dissimulation; condemned Origen, and used the fanaticism of the monks and their hatred of Origen to further his own designs. Socrates states that the controversy might have been put to rest if Theophilus had not encouraged it, to revenge himself upon four monks known as the Long Brothers of Nitria. About the year 433 Cyril of Alexandria wrote against this heresy, still prevailing among the monks of Egypt.

After the fifth century, Anthropomorphism appears only among the ruder and more ignorant sections of the Church. The teaching of Origen and other Fathers of the Church destroyed the fundamental misconception by which Tertullian and Melito had given some occasion for the growth of the heresy among the more educated. Among the untaught, the use of pictures representing the Father Himself in human form has, no doubt, caused an undercurrent of Anthropomorphic opinion in the Church, which has from time to time come to the surface, or has been detected by the vigilance of bishops. The most prominent instance of this was in the tenth century, at Vicenza. Ratherius, bishop of Verona, A.D. 939, found his diocese in such ignorance that many of his priests could not say the creed, and many priests and people believed the pictures they were accustomed to see on the walls were true representations of the court of heaven, of the forms of angels, and of the Most High Himself. Ratherius was a reforming bishop, and there can be little doubt that what he discovered and combated at Vicenza passed unnoticed in many other dioceses [Ratherius' Sermons in D'Achery's Spicileg. ii. 294-98, ed. 1657]. Anthropomorphism is not professed in any part of Christendom, although probably popular Christianity is much tinged with it. It has taken refuge among the Mormons.

By the rulers of the Church Anthropomorphism, as a popular error, has been left to the correction of the clergy. It is a misinterpretation of the first article of the creed to be dealt with by instruction, and not requiring the anathemas of councils. It is impossible to form a true conception of spiritual substance; to hold the possibility of its existence is beyond many an untrained mind; faith, love, and obedience are compatible with an indistinct notion that God has an ethereal or luciform body; and there is danger of driving men into atheism if their error on this point be rudely handled.

In a more technically theological manner, Anthropomorphism is denied in the decision that the nature of God is simple. For they who attribute any materiality to God (and materiality is implied in the notion of figure and shape), must hold either that the very essence of Deity is material, or that the nature of God is compounded—that He is Mind residing in a corporeal vehicle. The former is the worst and most extended form of materialism, and its consequences most impious. The decision that the nature of God is simple denies the latter, and with it the possibility of Anthropomorphism. Accordingly Chrysostom sums up the argument in three pregnant words, ὁ γὰρ Θεὸς ἀπλὸς καὶ ἀσύνθετος καὶ ἀρχαίσιμος [De Incomp. D. Nat., Hom. iv.] The fourth Lateran Council determined that in God there is "Una essentia, substantia, seu natura simplex omnino." Whatever be the authority of the fourth Lateran Council, this is undoubtedly a Catholic conclusion. The form (μορφή) of God is His necessary attributes, which are logically distinguishable but not separable from His being; the image of God is His Word; the image of the Word is the true man,³ the mind which is in man, assimilated

ANTI-ADIAPHORISTS. The rigid Lutherans, as distinguished from the Melancthon or Interim party. [ADIAPHORISTS.]

ANTIBURGHERS. The title assumed by a body which separated from the Associate Synod, or Secession Kirk, in Scotland, in the year 1746, and which derived its name from its members objecting to the oath imposed upon burgesses in some corporate towns. The statement of their views, and of the cause of the separation, will be found under the head BURGHES, which was the title by which the other portion of the dissociated Associates was henceforward distinguished. Their number, at the time of the schism, consisted of twenty-three ministers and elders, as opposed to thirty-two on the other part. As if the ground of difference involved an article of the Christian faith, they immediately excluded from Church fellowship and communion all who would not at once adopt their view, and deposed and excommunicated all the "Burgher" ministers. The leader in their movement, Mr. Thomas Mair, minister at Orwell, however, a few years after, repented of the part he had taken, and was himself then ejected by his Antiburgher brethren "as an erroneous person, for maintaining that Christ, in some sense, died for all mankind" [Brown's Rise and Progress of the Secession]. At the time of the separation, the teachers of philosophy and divinity in the Associate Synod happened to espouse the Antiburgher view, and in consequence most of the students went along with them, which for a time gave a preponderance in number of ministers to their party. At the close of the last century, the influence of new political principles, derived from the revolutionary spirit of France, gave rise to a discussion on the power assigned to the civil magistrate, as to matters of religion, in the Presbyterian standards of doctrine; the old Covenanting views were regarded as too strict and intolerant, and as requiring modification to meet the spirit of the times, while the sanction given by them to the principle of Establishments was impugned by advocates of new Voluntaryism. After much discussion, a new "Testimony," or Declaration of Principles, was adopted in 1804, which relaxed the statements of the old "Testimony" on these points. But this change gave rise to a new separation. Dr. Thomas M'Crie (the well-known author of the Life of Knox, &c., who had at his own ordination claimed to sign the Standards with reservations, but had afterwards abandoned his youthful views), in company with three other ministers (Professor Archibald Bruce, author of Free Thoughts on the Toleration of Popery, James Aitken and James Hog), established in August 1806 the "Constitutional Associate Presbytery," so named as claiming to adhere "to the true constitution of the Reformed Church of Scotland." This body was also popularly called the "Old Light Antiburghers." It is remarkable that this obscure party of Scottish Dissenters were strenuous advocates for National Establishments, and a pamphlet written by Dr. M'Crie in vindication of their proceedings, is described as being still a very valuable argument on the Voluntary controversy.¹ On May 18th, 1827, they were united with a body which, with the wonderful power of infinite multiplication possessed by sects, had been formed in 1820 by persons dissatisfied with the union which then took place between the Burgher and New Light Antiburgher Synods [BURGHES], and which was called the "Associate Synod of Protesters;" the joint societies took the name of "Associate Synod of Original Seceders." They still number twenty-eight congregations, of which two are in Ireland; in 1838 they had thirty-six congregations. [J. Brown of Haddington, Historical Account of the Secession, 8th edit. 1802. ANTI-CALVINISTS. [ARMINIANS.]

ANTIDICOMARIANITES. The name given to some heretics who appeared in Arabia, Rome, and elsewhere, in the latter part of the fourth century. By St. Augustine they are called Antidicomaritæ, and they are spoken of also as Antimarites and Antimarians. The principle of the heresy is embodied in the word, "Opposers of Mary." They denied the perpetual virginity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, maintaining that she was the natural mother of those who are in the Gospels called the brethren of the Lord. The name was revived for a short period in the 15th century, in regard to the controversy of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin. "Aliam præterea Antimaritæ nostri (quos eo nomine nuncupamus, quod syncerissimæ puritati Beatæ Mariæ sint contrarii et oblectantes) rationem adducunt," &c. [Concilium Basiliense, A.D. 1431. Bail's Summa Conciliorum Omnium, Paris, 1675, i. 512.]

These views were developed from the teaching of Apollinaris; but he can hardly be said to have originated the sect. Epiphanius says that the heretics in question claimed Apollinaris as their founder, or at least one of his immediate followers [APOLLINARIANS], and he in part admits the claim, for this seems the meaning of the last word in the following passage: Φασι δὲ, ὡς ἂν ὡς μοι εἶρηται, ὅτι ἀπ' αὐτοῦ τοῦ πρεσβύτου Ἀπολλινάριον ἐξήχρηται ὁ λόγος, ἢ ἀπὸ τινων τῶν αὐτῷ μεμαθητευμένων· καὶ ἀμφιβάλλω [Epiph. Hær. lxxviii. 1]. The chief names that have come down to us as favouring the views of the Antidicomarianites, are Jovinian, Photinus, Bonosus, Helvidius. The different opponents of the heresy have in turn assigned different names for the originator of it, whence we see that it sprang up rather as a natural expansion of previous heresies than as a new one. Thus, in the above passage, Epiphanius, writing against the sect, κατὰ Ἀντιδικομαριανίτων, names Apollinaris as the founder. St. Augustine attributes the error, in the first instance, to Jovinian. St. Jerome, who refutes the error in his book against Helvidius, not only does not mention Jovinian, but in his works against Jovinian himself he does not allude to this heresy. St. Ambrose speaks of the error as unworthy of serious refutation, until it had found a patron among the order of bishops. "Fuerunt qui eam [Mariam] negarent virginem perseverasse. Hoc tantum sacrilegium silere jamdudum maluimus: sed quia causa vocavit in medium, ita ut ejus prolapsionis etiam Episcopus argueretur, indemnatum non putamus relinquendum" [De Institutione Virginis, v. 35]. The reference here is to Bonosus, a bishop of some important place in Macedonia [BONOSIANS]; but it is clear that St. Augustine did not connect this bishop with the heresy, for in speaking of Jovinian's views, he says that no bishop has anywhere been found to favour them. The Antidicomarianites may thus be said to be traceable from the antichristian Cerinthians, who asserted that Jesus Christ was the natural son of Joseph and Mary; through the intermediate heresy of Apollinaris, who denied that the Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, or had a reasonable soul. Dr. Mill says of Helvidius, Bonosus, and their followers, that they "had no precursors in their sentiment respecting the Virgin, but those much worse and thorough heretics who asserted Jesus to be the son of Joseph and Mary" [The Accounts of our Lord's Brethren in the New Testament, vindicated against some recent Mythical Interpreters: The Christian Advocate's publication for 1843].

The earliest appearance of the sect in any definite shape seems to have been in Arabia; it was against this that Epiphanius wrote [c. A.D. 367]. At Rome, a few years afterwards, Helvidius advanced these views in a book which was answered, after some hesitation, by St. Jerome. Still later was the case of Bonosus. He was accused of maintaining that the Blessed Virgin bore several children. A Council at Capua was held [A.D. 389] to condemn him. This council gave no decision, but referred the matter to the bishops of his own province, who assembled the next year at Thessalonica, under the presidency of Anysius, bishop of that see, and formally condemned him. They at the same time recognised the priests he had ordained. The third Council of Milan, held the same year [A.D. 390], under St. Ambrose, gave a similar decision against Jovinian. "Joviniani errores . . . de Maria Deipara, eam scilicet post partum Virginem esse desisse . . . aliaque dogmata damnantur." The followers of Bonosus and Photinus were condemned by Pope Gelasius [A.D. 492-496]. Audentius, a Spanish bishop of the same period, wrote against them. The term, ἀειπαρθένος, ever-Virgin, was authoritatively applied to the Blessed Virgin Mary at the General Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451]. The Lollards, in the fourteenth century, are said to have revived the opinion that the brethren of the Lord were sons of His mother; but there is no allusion to this tenet in the articles charged against Wickliffe at Blackfriars.

In the controversies of the sixteenth century, the English reformers were often called upon to defend their belief in the doctrine of the ἀειπαρθένια. Their opponents argued thus: "It is necessary to believe that Mary continued a virgin always. But this is not certain from Scriptures: therefore, some necessary things are known from some other source besides the Scripture" [Whitaker's Disputation, ed. Parker Soc. 539]. Of the divines who had occasion to answer these objections, Whitaker appears to be the only one who went so far as to treat it as an open question [ib.]. Bishop Latimer writes very strongly in favour of the doctrine [Sermon at Grimsthorpe, i. 105]. And Cranmer says that the minor of his opponents' syllogism, that the ἀειπαρθένια is not written in Scripture, is false; and quotes Cyprian and Chrysostom, besides the other Fathers named above as writing in its favour, as saying the doctrine is to be believed of necessity [Cranmer's Works, ii. 60, Parker Soc.]. The most exhaustive modern treatise on the question is that of Dr. Mill cited above. He gives [pp. 309-311] extracts from the principal divines of the English Church. He speaks, too, of the conciliar condemnation of the opponents of the doctrine as being mild, not severe; shewing the difference of importance between a necessary belief in the virginity of our Lord's mother at His birth and a pious belief in her virginity after, which, he says, is in exact agreement with the sentiments of our own divines. He refutes a chain of development of the doctrine which Strauss had conceived, and which was thus stated: [1] Opinion of contemporaries and authors of genealogies; Joseph and Mary married; Jesus Christ their offspring. [2] Writers of succeeding narratives held Joseph and Mary affianced; Joseph not the father of Christ, and, till His birth, without conjugal relations to Mary. [3] Later writers suppose that Joseph, ever afterwards, abstained from assumption of conjugal rights. [4] Epiphanius and others proceed to imagine Joseph a decrepit old man, more a guardian than a husband; his children those of a former marriage. [5] Virginity of our Lord's mother never destroyed, as held by Chrysostom and others. [6] View of Jerome, Mary and Joseph always virgin; our Lord's brethren his cousins. Dr. Mill demonstrates the inaccuracy of all this. Not one of these, except perhaps [4], which is apocryphal, and of no weight in the argument, was gradually evolved from the preceding: [1] was never held by Christians, save by one denounced heretical party: [2], [3], and [5] always existed in the minds of the more thoughtful from the first, and [6], was not an addition, but rather a condition by which the last two were held.

The main arguments brought forward by the Antidicomarianites, and the passages of Scripture on which they relied, together with the best received answers, are given in the Theological Dictionary. [HELVIDIANS. JOVINIANS. BONOSIANS. THEOL. DICT. art. PERPETUAL VIRGINITY.]

ANTINOMIANS. Those who profess to be Christians, but reject the moral law on some ground of perverted Christian principle. The opposition to the law implied in the term Antinomian is not the opposition of the simple transgressor of the law, but the opposition which justifies itself by alleging a supposed liberty or privilege.

Some of the warnings against Antinomianism in the New Testament speak of the evil as already existing, and that in no slight measure. St. Paul tells the Philippians [iii. 18] of those in other churches who professed apostolic doctrine, but would not follow apostolic example; whose god was their belly, whose glory was in their shame, who minded earthly things. To bring these within the definition of Antinomians, as distinguished from the simply disobedient, it is requisite to shew that they acted upon some ground of perverted Christian principle. And when we observe that St. Paul begins with a warning against Judaizers [iii. 1-3], proceeds to state that a Judaic trust in the law is carnalism, that he has renounced all that Judaism had to offer for the sake of the righteousness of faith, and then presses his own example of the mode in which such righteousness is to be attained, while many, he points out, are acting otherwise, it cannot be doubted that these were strictly Antinomians who perverted liberty from the law of Moses into immunity from the law of God. There were false teachers among the people, with high-sounding doctrine, promising liberty [2 Pet. ii. 1, 18, 19], deceiving them with vain words, as if God's wrath would not come upon them [Eph. v. 6]. Again, there were those who, with some variation in the form of their tenets, held the same error, and perverted St. Paul's doctrine by arguing that man may do evil that good may come, and sin that grace may abound [Rom. iii. 8, vi. 1]. The existence of Antinomian parties in the Church in apostolic times is thus clear. The Church was passing from the bondage of the law through the intermediate stage of Judaic Christianity into the liberty of Christ; and the wickedness of man would not allow even the wisdom of St. Paul to conduct the change without this accompanying evil.

But it appears that Antinomianism, pure and simple, can hardly be adopted as the basis of a sect. Its preachers would be too evidently preachers of unrighteousness to be tolerated. The perversion of Christian principle on which it rests is expressed, or rather perhaps veiled, in great swelling words of vanity; and in these is placed the ostensible foundation of a schism.

In the first place, the Antinomian principle connected itself, in the case of the Nicolaitanes, with that which was then familiar to the popular mind, the introduction of immorality into religious rites, and with the fanaticism which treated unhalloved works of the flesh as exponents of spiritual love. [NICOLAITANES.] But this party (it can hardly perhaps be properly called a sect) lasted but a short time, and was lost among the Gnostics.

Several sects of the latter were clearly Antinomian. Irenæus states that the Gnostics imagined three divisions of men, the material, the animal, and the spiritual. Of the material they took no notice: they considered the Christians to be the animal; and they themselves, who had perfect knowledge of God, were the spiritual. "Hence they pronounce that good moral conduct is necessary for us, because without it we cannot be saved: but they affirm, that they themselves will be unquestionably saved, not from moral conduct, but because they are by nature spiritual. For as the material is incapable of partaking of salvation, so, on the other hand, they think that the spiritual is incapable of receiving corruption, whatever moral conduct they may practise: for as gold, when deposited in mud, does not lose its beauty, but preserves its own nature, the mud not being able to injure the gold, so also they say of themselves, whatever may be the character of their material morality, that they cannot be injured by it, nor lose their spiritual substance. Hence the most perfect among them perform all forbidden things without any scruple" [Iren. adv. Hær. I. vi. 2, 3. See Burton, Bampton Lect. note 62, p. 443; and Articles in this Dict. on Gnostic Sects]. The thirty-second of the heresies named by St. Isidore is also that of the "Anomiani qui Latine sine lege dicuntur" [Isid. Hisp. de Hær. xxxii.].

Within the Church the Antinomian principle is traceable in the custom, which gave so much trouble, and caused so many conciliar decrees, that of entertaining spiritual sisters. The utmost which can be said for this custom is that there may have been cases in which there was no blame beyond that of unseemliness and giving offence. Few will doubt that in the vast majority of cases the intercourse was criminal. And those who indulged themselves in that intercourse, under a pretence of purity, must have sought to justify themselves in their own sight by some form of Antinomian delusion. The same custom passed into some sects in the Middle Ages, as into the Apostolici of the twelfth and of the thirteenth centuries. [APOSTOLICALS.]

The Circumcellions of the Donatist sect, although they broke every law of God and man with the cry, "For the honour of God," cannot properly be called Antinomians. They were fanatics (with a large admixture, however, of mere ruffians) who had persuaded themselves that God's cause was to be upheld by brutal violence. With these may be compared the lower sections of the English Puritans, whose brutality failed to equal the brutality of the Circumcellions, not from a difference of principle, but because they were not so much separated from the better men of the same party as the Circumcellions were from the better men of the Donatists, and because they were in some measure restrained by the rules of modern warfare. [Dict. of THEOL., PURITANISM.] But the Independents (or at least not a few of them) professed Antinomian principles, as will be mentioned presently.

The Anabaptists of Munster were fanatical Antinomians; Antinomians, inasmuch as they perverted to earthly and carnal pleasure the glories and privileges of the millennial kingdom; fanatics, in that they sought to establish that kingdom presently by force. [ANABAPTISTS.]

Among the Lutherans a preacher of Antinomianism appeared in John Agricola. In the year 1527, he maintained, in opposition to Melancthon's Formulary of Ecclesiastical Visitation, that the law of God was not to be used to bring men to repentance, and that the preaching of the law was no work for a gospel minister. In 1588 he declared, in opposition to George Major of Wittenburg, who taught the necessity of good works, that such teaching was no better than a doctrine of devils which deprived men altogether of Christ's gospel. During the intermediate time his teaching did not vary. In 1538, he took occasion from Luther's doctrine to "declaim against the law, maintaining that it was neither fit to be proposed to the people as a rule of manners, nor to be used in the Church as a means of instruction; and that the gospel alone was to be inculcated and explained both in the churches and in the schools of learning." Mosheim, his apologist, whose words we have used, confesses that the recantation he made when pressed by Luther was not sincere, and considers Agricola to be chargeable with vanity, presumption, and artifice. Luther's influence was sufficient to suppress the sect during his lifetime: after his death Agricola gained some proselytes.¹

The foreign Anabaptists who tried to settle in England were of the milder type, and free from Antinomianism. Thus no mention of this error occurs in the Recantation [A.D. 1575] of the Dutch Anabaptists discovered in London [Collier, Ecc. Hist. vi. p. 543, ed. 1852]. But the Independents fell into Antinomianism. They learnt it from John Cotton, who in New England had added this to his other errors, and taught it to Goodwin, Nye, and other leaders of the sect. Among their tenets were the following: That no sin must trouble any child of God, because trouble of conscience demonstrates a man subject to the covenant of works, but a stranger to the covenant of grace: that no Christian is bound to look upon the law as a rule of his conversation: that no Christian is to be pressed to any duty of holiness.² [INDEPENDENTS.] Besides

² See the curious tract "A Short Story of the Rise, Reign, and Ruin of the Antinomians, Familists and Libertines that infected the churches of New England," London, 1692. By T. Welde. Baxter writes of this party: "The Vanists (for I know not by what other name to make them known who were Sir Henry Vane's disciples) first sprung up under him in New England these a party of Antinomians appears to have been formed in the reign of Charles I. by John Eaton, curate of St. Catherine-Coleman, London, and, after secession from the Church, minister of Wickham-Market, Suffolk. He wrote The Discovery of a most dangerous Dead Faith, 1641; and The Honeycomb of Free Justification by Christ alone, 1642, and was imprisoned for his error. The object of this latter book was to shew that God does not, will not, nor cannot see any sin in any of His justified children; and his followers avowed the same tenets of Antinomianism as those received by the Independents. They were probably derived from the same source.³

For the theological connection of this heresy, with perversions of preceding doctrine, see the DICTIONARY OF THEOLOGY, articles JUSTIFICATION, SOLIFIDIANISM.

ANTIOCH, SCHOOL OF. In the first centuries of the Christian era, schools of philosophy established themselves at Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch; the Macedonians having imported into the two latter cities the philosophy with the language of Greece. In Antioch closer contact with the East caused the Peripatetic philosophy to prevail, which the oriental mind assimilated with greater ease; as at a later date the Moors of Spain gave to Europe its first readings in Aristotle.⁴ Neo-Platonism ruled paramount in the schools of Alexandria. Hence the theology of these two cities had each its distinctive cast; while the Alexandrian writers allegorized, the school of Antioch occupied itself upon the plain meaning of the text, and took a judicious course between a mystical interpretation on the one hand, and a servile adherence to the mere letter of Scripture on the other. The Syriac language also, with which this school stood in close contact for all the ordinary purposes of life, favoured a plain grammatical line of hermeneutics, and Syriac versions older than the Latin Vulgate gave a fresh raciness to the expositions of the Antioch school, that we look for in vain from the Alexandrian divines. Notwithstanding their diversity, a good understanding was always maintained between the two schools, until Alexandrian heterodoxy in the Nestorian and Monophysite period made it no longer possible. But the character of Antiochian philosophy was essentially sophistical; its principle was scepticism. In an evil hour the discussions of the philosophical schools were copied in the catechetical. The most sacred subjects were argued pro and con, and a tone of indifferentism was fostered that could scarcely fail to affect prejudicially positive theology. The two most grievous here-when he was governor there. But their notions were then raw and undigested. [Reference is made to Welde's Tract and to the thirty monsters which Mrs. Hutchinson the Antinomian teacher brought forth at one birth.] Mr. Cotton was too favourable to them. Sir Henry Vane being governor, and found to be the secret fautor and life of their cause, was fain to steal away by night and take shipping for England." [Life, by Sylvester, i. 74.]

sies that have devastated the Church may be traced back to the first germs of virus developed at Antioch. Gnosticism, there first brought to life by Simon Magus [Just. M. Apol. i. 26], was continued by his disciple Saturninus; and the many allusions to Gnostic tenets found scattered through the epistles of Ignatius shew how certainly the tares had taken root. Origen, upon the martyrdom of his father, was as a youth exposed to sore trial from unavoidable association with a Gnostic teacher from Antioch. Arianism also may be traced through Alexandria back to the same quarter. Afterwards of sporadic growth, it arose endemically at Antioch from the pernicious habit of discussing the deepest mysteries of faith as an intellectual discipline. Paul of Samosata, the Judaizing bishop of Antioch, was the precursor of Arius [Alex. Ep. ad Const.; Theod. H. E. i.]. Arianism was here the early offset of dialectical theology [Socr. H. E. i. 5], and Epiphanius for this reason has styled Aristotle Bishop of the Arians. Arius impugned the doctrine of the Eternal Filiation of the Word as Sabellian, and as the natural consequence of his error argued himself over to the opposite extreme. Both Arius and his predecessor Paul popularized their error, which otherwise might have died away in the echo of the schools, by setting it forth in hymns and songs for the many.

But there is a brighter side to this distinguished school of historical, grammatical, and critical exegesis, in which it always held a highly distinguished position [Conybeare, Bampton Lectures, iv.]. Theophilus, bishop of Antioch [A.D. 168], in his three books ad Autolycum shews the well-read Platonist; and according to St. Jerome [de Vir. ill.] he led the way as an expositor of Scripture in a Commentary on the Gospels. Serapion, bishop of the same see [A.D. 189], wrote against the Montanist heresy [Eus. H. E. v. 19] as the mouthpiece of a provincial council; and shewed his critical tact in rejecting the gospel falsely ascribed to St. Peter [Eus. H. E. vi. 12]. Julius Africanus of Nicopolis [i.e. Emmaus, A.D. 232], the friend of Origen, was the first Christian annalist, χρονογραφῶν πάντε σπουδάζματα συνέγραψε. Eusebius also has preserved [H. E. i. 7] part of his epistle to Aristides on the genealogies of our Lord given by St. Matthew and St. Luke. Fragments from the same venerable writer are found in Routh's Reliquiæ Sacræ [ii. 105, 114], and later oriental writers have ascribed to him commentaries on the Gospels [Asseman, Bibl. Or. 129, 158], which statement may possibly be confirmed by the Nitrian MSS. of the National Collection. Dorotheus, who was a presbyter of Antioch [A.D. 290, Eus. H. E. vii. 32], and Lucian, who suffered martyrdom in Nicomedia [A.D. 312], in the persecution under Diocletian [Eus. H. E. viii. 13, ix. 6], were zealous promoters of a rational system of Scripture interpretation. The recension of the LXX. translation by Lucian went by his name, and was extensively used in the Eastern churches from Antioch to Constantinople.¹ Hesychius prepared a similar recension for Alexandria, and a third was extracted from the Hexapla by Eusebius and Pamphilus. Hence the corruption of the LXX. by the confusion of these three recensions has become hopeless. Even Jerome did not fail to note it: "Totusque orbis hac inter se trifaria varietate compugnat" [adv. Ruff. ii. 27]. Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, makes Lucian to have been a follower of Paul of Samosata, and to have adopted his heretical notions [Theod. H. E. i. 3, 4]; but allowance must be made for the statement of a polemical writer, and some indulgence must also be shewn to the pupil who does not at once confirm the adverse opinion of a censorious world against the master. These two elements, perhaps, are principal factors in the heresy imputed to Lucian. If it had been a well-founded charge, Lucian would scarcely have been honoured as a martyr even by Eusebius, and certainly not by Athanasius, Jerome and Chrysostom, whose panegyric of Lucian is still extant. Meletius, the instructor of Chrysostom, Flavian, Diodorus of Tarsus, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Theodore of Mopsuestia, were all of this school. Chrysostom here delivered his homilies De Statuis, and through his commentaries the sound principle of Antiochian exegesis has become the property of the Church. Gieseler has enlarged the area represented by the school of Antioch so as to include Eusebius of Emesa, Apollinaris of Laodiceæ, and Ephraem of Edessa. They all felt the same kindly influences. [Newman's Arians. Neander, K. Gesch. iii. v. 3, end. Gieseler, K. Gesch. DICTIONARY OF THEOLOGY, s. v.]

ANTITACTICS. The name given by Clement of Alexandria to those who first broached the dualism which characterized the Gnostic heresies. Thus Clement says, "We call them 'Antitactics' or 'Opponents,' who say that God is indeed our Father, and the Father of all things, and that He made all things good; but that one of those beings whom He Himself had made sowing tares among the wheat originated evil, of which we being made partakers ourselves become adversaries of God" [Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 4]. This error of the Antitactics is confuted by St. Augustine in his City of God [Aug. De Civ. Dei, xii. 7], but he does not mention them by name. The Antitactics were probably a branch of the CARPOCRATIANS, and, like them, were accused of gross immoralities [Theod. Hær. Fab. i. 16].

ANTI-PÆDOBAPTISTS. The opponents of infant baptism. [BAPTISTS.]

ANTITRINITARIANS. This term is limited to those who deny the doctrine of the Holy Trinity by opposing to it the tenet of a God without distinction of Persons. Thus if a man, changing the distinction of the three inseparable Persons into a separation, were led to assert that there are three Gods, he would not be classed as an Antitrinitarian, although he does deny the presbyter, tantum in Scripturarum studio laboravit, ut usque nunc quedam exemplaria Scripturarum Lucianea nuncupentur. Feruntur ejus de fide libelli, et breves ad nonnullos epistolæ [Hieron. Catal. 77]. Constantinopolis usque ad Antiochiam Luciani Martyris exemplaria probat [adv. Ruff. ii.].

doctrine of the Trinity. The correlative term is Unitarian; an incorrect term, since there can be unity only where there is plurality, and the Unity of God requires the distinction of Persons in the Godhead.

The Antitrinitarian principle in early times expended itself in producing the Sabellian and Arian heresies with their several derived heresies. [MONARCHIANS.] Between the time of the disappearance of the Monarchian sects and the beginning of the sixteenth century there were several heresies regarding the Nature of the Godhead and the Three Divine Persons. But the former class, such as the heresies of Gilbert de la Porrée, and Joachim, abbot of Flora, which were met in the fourth Lateran Council [A.D. 1215], by the decision that the Nature of God is simple, do not touch the present subject. Again, the controversy in the ninth century between Hincmar and Gottschalk, regarding the words "Trina Deitas" appears to be accidental, and unconnected with the progress of thought in the Church at large. It is quite otherwise with the heresies attributed to Roscellin and Abelard. The scholastic controversies between the Nominalists and Realists appear to be the chief origin of the later Antitrinitarian sects. Roscellin was the first great Nominalist, the authoritative interpreter if not the author of the system. He was pressed by Anselm with the argument that his principles led inevitably to Tritheism or Monarchianism. "If the three Persons are one thing, and not three things, as distinct as three angels or three souls, though one in will and power, the Father and the Holy Ghost must have been incarnate with the Son." This heretical conclusion from the Nominalist philosophy was attributed to Roscellin by John the monk in a letter to Anselm, and used by Anselm (though he admits all the words may not be Roscellin's own) as the statement against which he wrote his "De Fide Trinitatis" [Gieseler, Compend. iii. p. 281]. The conclusion appeared to follow from Roscellin's premisses. "When Nominalism became theology, the Three Persons of the Trinity (this was the perpetual touchstone of all systems), if they were more than three words, were individuals, and Tritheism inevitable" [Milman, Lat. Christ. iv. 367, ed. 1867]. It appears that Roscellin was not able to convict Anselm of a fallacy in this argument, for he accepted the former alternative of the dilemma, and averred that the existence of three Gods might be asserted with truth, however harsh the mode of expression might be. Again, in the controversy between St. Bernard and the great leader of the Nominalists, Abelard, the popular outcry against Abelard was that he introduced three Gods. For Tritheism, it is often said, he was condemned. Yet he was distinctly accused of holding the old Monarchian principle, "that the names of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are improperly attributed to God, and that they only describe the plenitude of the Supreme Good." The Council of Soissons [A.D. 1121], puzzled perhaps by his dialectics, and unable to determine which of the two heresies resulting (as it was believed) from Nominalism he really held, took the safe course of condemning him for publishing his book without the Pope's authority; and instead of enjoining him to recant any one specified heresy, compelled him to make a profession, and to utter the comprehensive anathemas of the Athanasian Creed [Fleury, tom. xiv. lib. lxxviii. art. 61; Natal. Alexand. sæc. xii. diss. v. art. vii.]

The authority of Anselm, for a while, silenced the dispute among the Schoolmen, but it was again agitated with renewed vigour in the fourteenth century, and from that time ostensibly divided the schools into the two great parties of Nominalists and Realists. The Nominalists were the Rationalists of the pre-Reformation Church, and "scattered here and there the seeds of scepticism, of disbelief, and of speculative license." And if Nominalism was allowed by its professors (whether rightly or wrongly) to lead to the dilemma of Tritheism or Monarchianism, we have, in those who rejected the former, a party ready to deny the divinity of the Saviour as soon as the pressure of the papal yoke was abated. "Multitudes of freethinkers, who had hitherto been yielding a hollow and occasional compliance with the ritual institutions of the Church, began to ventilate their theories more publicly, and even went so far as to establish independent organizations with the hope of leavening the whole of Western Christendom" [Hardwick, Hist. of Reform. p. 271].

Antitrinitarianism then appears to be, not the genuine product of the Reformation, but the offspring of a school which had existed in the Church for centuries before the Reformation was dreamt of. And the process we may fairly conclude from Anselm's argument to have been a repetition of the process which formed Arianism out of Monarchianism. Adopting the Monarchian principle the rationalists were driven, through their horror of Patristianism, to deny the divinity of the Saviour.

Zanchius, himself an Italian, complained to Bullinger, when writing from Chiavenna, in which place he was minister, of the heterodoxy of his countrymen on these subjects; and used to say, "Hispania (the birthplace of Servetus) galinas peperit, Italia fovet ova, nos jam pipientes pullos audimus" [Hardwick, Hist. of Reform. p. 284]. It may be noticed too that Zanchius, in a letter to Jewel, speaks of his being opposed at Chiavenna by the enemies of discipline, with whom the followers of Servetus united their forces [Zurich Letters, ser. ii. p. 185]. This may give the true composition of the Antitrinitarian party in the sixteenth century, Italian rationalists and malcontents of the Reformation.

A preparation such as has been described appears to be sufficient to account for the simultaneous appearance in different parts of the Church of teachers of Antitrinitarianism, and for the rapid spread of their opinions. Of these teachers, acting independently, John Denk was one of the earliest. He was a rationalistic Anabaptist. He held the simple manhood of our Lord, denying altogether the Atonement, and proposing Jesus Christ simply as a pattern of holy life in which the effects of divine love were exhibited. His doctrines spread in two or three years in the Rhine district, Switzerland, Franconia, Suabia, and as far as Moravia. Servetus (through Calvin's interposition) is better known. He was a Spaniard, born A.D. 1509, of Villaneuva in Arragon. From Toulouse, where he was studying civil law, he went to Basle and Strasburg, and put himself in communication with the Reformers. In 1531 his book De Erroribus Trinitatis was printed, and in the next year also, at Hagenau, Dialogorum de Trinitate Libri Duo. These books raised a great tumult among the German divines, and, circulating in Italy, were much approved by many who had thoughts of leaving the Church of Rome. In 1553 (the year of his execution) he published at Vienne another book of Antitrinitarianism, Christianismi Restitutio. The circulation of Servetus' books in Italy leads us to the Italian movement regarding the point in question.

At the same moment that the spread of Protestantism agitated Germany, literary societies assuming a religious colour arose in Italy [see Ranke's History of the Popes, by S. Austin, i. 135]. Such a society met at Vicenza, in the government of Venice, in the year 1546, to discuss not only the discipline but the doctrine of the Church, and particularly the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. The Inquisition interfered. Three members of the society were seized, the rest fled. At Geneva they found already formed a congregation of Italian refugees, into which they introduced their heretical speculations. John Valentinus Gentilis, George Blandrata, John Paul Alciatus, Lælius Socinus, Matthew Gribaud, were the chief advocates of the Antitrinitarian doctrines.¹ Upon the spread of these doctrines the Italian Consistory drew up, in 1558, a statement of the orthodox doctrine of the Holy Trinity for subscription by their members. Authorities differ as to the number of those who subscribed, and afterwards broke their promise not to do anything directly or indirectly in opposition to the Formula. The event undoubtedly was that the heretical party was broken up. Gentilis,² after wandering in Dauphiné and Savoy and Moravia, was taken at Berne, and put to death, in 1566, for opposing the doctrine of the Trinity in violation of his oath. Lælius Socinus visited Poland, but would not remain there. He died in Zurich in 1562. Gribaud fled to Fargia, in the Canton of Berne, and died in prison. Blandrata and Alciatus retreated to Poland, where the history of Socinianism centres itself.

Into Poland Antitrinitarianism had already been introduced by Spiritus of Holland in the year 1546. Lælius Socinus had, at an earlier visit than that named above, converted to his opinions Francis Lismain, the chaplain of the Queen of Sigismund I.: and at a synod held at Sicemina in 1556, the doctrine of the Trinity was, for the first time, publicly opposed by Peter Gonezius. This party was much strengthened by the arrival, in 1558, of Blandrata and Alciatus. They were honourably received by the Protestants. Blandrata gained great influence, which Calvin's letters of warning could not overcome. There was a difference of opinion, however, even at this time (it widened afterwards), some of the party allowing the miraculous conception of our Lord, and that worship is due to Him, others denying both these points. This difference in some measure checked the spread of the heresy, nevertheless the dissensions between the orthodox and the heretics increased so much, that, in 1565, Gregory Paul, the minister of a Protestant Church in Cracow, petitioned the States assembled in council, to cause a conference to be held for full discussion of the subject. The result of the conference was, that the parties which had up to that time met together in synod separated, and the Antitrinitarians formed a separate society. Toleration was granted them by the States and the Emperor. Racow was built for them by Siemienius, Prince of Podolia, and became their chief settlement; but they had conventicles in all the towns and villages of the kingdom, particularly in Cracow, Pinczow, and Lublin. Among them there were not a few shades of opinion, but they gradually formed themselves into three parties, the followers of Lælius Socinus, and the factions of Budnæus and Farnovius. The Socinians held a miraculous conception of our Lord, in virtue of which, although His Divinity was denied, He is the Son of God, and worship is proportionally due to Him. These points were denied by Budnæus. His principles appeared impious to the main body of the Socinians, and in 1584 he was deposed from his ministerial functions, and publicly excommunicated with all his disciples. Farnovius was nearer to the Arian tenets, holding that Christ had been created by the Father before the world.

Council of Soissons was not well qualified to judge Abelard's doctrine: the divines of Berne were little qualified to judge Gentilis. If the history of Benedictus Aretius is to be trusted, they held that the Son is ἀνθρώπος, and mistook the subordination of the Son for inferiority of nature [A Short History of Valentinus Gentilis the Tritheist, translated, London 1696, pp. 131, 40-47. The translation of this history professes to have been made for the benefit of Dr. Sherlock.]

² The specific charge against Gentilis was this, "That after eight years' preparation to attack the doctrine of the Trinity he did begin openly to teach, that there were in the Trinity three distinct Spirits, differing from each other in numerical essence: amongst which (three Spirits) he acknowledges the Father only to be that infinite God which we ought to worship, which is plain blasphemy against the Son." Gentilis was accused, as Abelard was, of holding inconsistent propositions, one Monarchian, one Tritheistic. It was said that he affirmed, that the Father alone is that one only God set forth to us in the Holy Scriptures; and that there are in the Trinity Three Eternal Spirits, each of which is by Himself God. The

But this history belongs to the article SOCINIANS, which takes up the subject from the time of Faustus Socinus joining the Antitrinitarian body.

In the year 1563 Blandrata was invited to Transylvania by Prince John Sigismund. Supported by the favour of the prince, and of his prime minister Petrovitz, and after Sigismund's death by the favour of the Bathori, princes of Transylvania, he boldly and successfully propagated his heresy. In this he was assisted by Francis David, superintendent of the Reformed in Transylvania, whom he converted from Calvinism. But about the year 1574, David adopted the principles of Budnæus, and separated from Blandrata. In 1578 Blandrata invited Faustus Socinus to help him in opposing David. David, not yielding to argument, was summoned before the Diet, and condemned for blasphemy. He died a few months afterwards. In 1579 Socinus went into Poland, and united the Antitrinitarians.

In no other countries of the Continent was Antitrinitarianism established. The attempts made to form settlements in Hungary and Austria were defeated by the opposition both of Catholics and Protestants.

The subsequent History of the Continental Socinians and the history of the English sect are given in articles SOCINIANS, UNITARIANS.

ANTRIM, PRESBYTERY OF. A section of the Irish Presbyterians who separated from the main body in the year 1750, from a disinclination to subscribe to the Westminster Confession of Faith. They adopted the Arian or "New Light" principles, and, as far as the complex nomenclature and singular divergencies of the Presbyterians can be explained without Presbyterian verbosity, may be identified with the Scotch section known as the NEW LIGHT BURGHERS.

APELLEIANS. [APELLIANISTS.]

APELLIANISTS. A Gnostic sect which arose about the middle of the second century in the reign of Antoninus Pius, or Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, deriving its name from its founder Apelles. This heretic was originally a disciple of Marcion, but was expelled by the latter from the number of his followers, because he exchanged the rigid continence inculcated by his teaching for licentious indulgence, living with a mistress named Philumena, whose utterances he supposed to be dictated by a familiar spirit, and whom he regarded as an inspired prophetess. After his expulsion, he became the founder of a distinct sect, which, as might be expected from the laxity of conduct permitted, met with considerable success, and which was distinguished from its parent stock by the addition of the following new doctrines—

1. He rejected his master's belief in two co-eternal Gods, or active principles of good and evil, and substituted for it, as some assert, the doctrine of the eternity of matter; or, as is more probable, its creation by an inferior and hostile deity, who having been himself called into existence by God, was by Him permitted to create the world, and to be the author of all its evils [Aug. de Hær. c. 23].

2. He seems to have believed in the existence, sufferings, and death of Christ as the Son of God, only this Christ was not incarnate by the Holy Ghost in the womb of the Blessed Virgin as the Gospel teaches, nor was He a mere phantom, as Marcion taught, but He was supposed to have descended from heaven in a mysterious manner, and to have contracted a body composed of the four elements—earth, air, fire, and water, which were again dispersed abroad before the soul of Jesus ascended to heaven.

3. A necessary corollary from the last doctrine was a denial of the resurrection of the body, in which he coincided with Marcion and other Gnostic teachers.

4. He accused the prophets of the Old Dispensation of inconsistency, and as that could not be the result of Divine inspiration, he attributed it to the same spirit of evil which had created the world; he also wrote much against the Mosaic law,¹ spending a great deal of labour in its refutation, and ridiculing it along with the rest of the Bible in a conversation with a certain Rhodon, an Asiatic, which has been preserved by Nicephorus [Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. 28, 29].

5. Lastly, and with the greatest inconsistency, Apelles taught that every one would be saved by remaining firm in the belief which they had once embraced.

The Apelleians are mentioned by St. Cyprian [Ep. lxxiii. 4] along with the Marcionites and other sects as among those whose baptism was not to be considered valid. [Aug. de Hæres. xxiii. Niceph. Hist. Eccl. iv. 28. Philaster, xlvii. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 12. Tertull. adv. Marc. iv. 17; Præscr. Hær. xxx.]

APELLITES. [APELLIANISTS.]

APHTHARTODOCETÆ. One of the two families into which the Monophysites were divided. From the names of their leaders they were called, in Armenia and its neighbourhood, JULIANISTS; in Egypt, GAIANITÆ: the general name Aphthartodocetæ being descriptive of their doctrine.

As a consequence of the Monophysite tenet that from the union of the two natures in our Lord there resulted only one nature, the Aphthartodocetæ attributed to our Lord's Body as pertaining to that one nature ἀφθαρσία, incorruptibility—including in their term φθορά, not only sinful appetites, and the corruption which ordinarily follows death, but also all innocent physical needs and weaknesses and sufferings, πάθη ἀδιάβλητα. The human nature they considered to have been so essentially united with the Divine nature of the Logos as to have become merged or absorbed in it, and therefore to have become possessed of the inherent and indestructible life of the Logos.

It was held, however, that the actions and sufferings of our Lord, as told in the Gospels, were real, and not merely in appearance. The seeming contradiction between this and the foregoing statements was obviated by the distinction that those sufferings were voluntarily undergone by our Lord, in the way of an œconomy or dispensation of grace, for the salvation of man, and did not properly belong to the nature of that Body upon which they were inflicted.

The term Docetæ, which implies that our Lord's Body was only a phantasm, is not rightly used of the Aphthartodocetæ. They doubtless held that our Lord possessed a real and substantial body, made of a woman, although the attributes of humanity had been abolished by the union of the two natures. Yet it was truly said that they held our Lord's Body to be other than it appeared. It appeared to be a human body; but a body impassible and immutable in itself, neither acting nor feeling as men act and feel, is not a proper human body.

The difference of opinion between the Julianists and their opponents the Severians had long existed among the Monophysites, but did not break out into controversy until the deprived Monophysite bishops met at Alexandria about A.D. 520. The heresy of the Aphthartodocetæ then spread rapidly. Mention of its outbreak in the Homeritis in the year 549 is made in Assemani, Bibl. Orient. Clementino-Vatic. tom. iii. pars. ii. p. 455; where is also a reference to a strange story of the Julianists thinking to continue a succession of bishops by mortmain: "De Sacerdotio quod a Julianistis in urbe Epheso per mortui manum illegitime traditum fuit anno Christi 549."

Justinian, who had been an eager defender of the Council of Chalcedon, and a persecutor of Monophysitism, in his old age issued an edict [A.D. 563] in favour of Aphthartodocetism. But the doctrine failed to gain the approval of the Monophysite body. In the eighth or the ninth century they seem to have utterly disappeared from Syria, and in general from Asia, with the exception of Armenia, as also from Egypt. A portion of them, however, pushed their way into Ethiopia and Nubia, where they had a patriarch of their own. The Aphthartodocetæ were themselves divided into two parties, one party maintaining that after the Incarnation Christ ought not to be spoken of as a created being as regards His humanity, but that even as man He should be designated God and Creator, and must therefore have been a proper object of worship from the very beginning. These were called ἀκτιστηταί; their opponents κτιστολάτραι. [ACTISTETES. CTISTOLATRÆ. Leontius, De Sectis, in Gallandii Bibl. Patr. tom. xii. APOCARITES. One of the many sects which grew out of the Manichæan heresy. The Apocaries appeared for the first time in the reign of Tacitus and the pontificate of Eutychian [c. A.D. 275]. They adopted the greater portion of the Gnostic and Manichæan doctrines, especially holding as their distinctive tenet a belief that man's soul was eternal and uncreated, and of the same substance as God Himself, the only authority for which was the passage in Genesis: "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul" [Gen. ii. 7].

APOCRYPHANS. There were three classes of writings recognised in the early Church. [1.] Canonical, such as having received the imprimatur of authority, were included in the Canon of Holy Scripture, and were bound to be accepted and believed. [2.] Ecclesiastical, such writings as the Apology of Tertullian, or the History of Eusebius, which, having been composed by trustworthy persons, were generally considered deserving of credit, though not accepted as de fide. [3.] Apocryphal, spurious additions to the gospels and epistles, and lives of saints, which were utterly devoid of authority, and either contained false and ridiculous accounts of miracles, or were written to bolster up some new-fangled doctrine, and attributed for that purpose to names which would ensure acceptance.

The title "Apocryphans" did not denote any one sect in particular, but was applied to any such bodies as the Manichæans, Gnostics, Nicolaitanes, or Valentinians, who based their doctrines on apocryphal writings in their private possession. The Manichæans, for example, are said to have possessed a spurious life of St. Andrew the apostle; and Acts of St. John the evangelist, St. Peter, St. Paul, &c. were composed, which were replete with marvels, such as accounts of their conversation with various animals, and other trifles. [Philast. De Hæres. lxxxviii.]

APOLLINARIANS. There are three distinct heresies connected with the name of Apollinaris. They all relate to the Incarnation of our Lord, and may all be referred to one motive or principle, of which Apollinaris appears to have been the chief assertor. They are therefore often spoken of as several branches of the Apollinarist heresy. But when we distinguish them one from the other, that for which Apollinaris was condemned must specifically bear his name. At the same time, it is not to be denied, that in his later years he added to that specific heresy one of the other heresies.

The three heresies are these: the first holds that the Son of God acquired a body, called human, because it is in the form of man, by conversion of the substance of the Godhead into the substance of flesh; the second holds that in the Incarnation the two substances are confounded or blended; the third that our Lord assumed a human body of the Virgin, but did not assume a human soul, the Divine Nature supplying the place of the soul. This last is in two stages. In the earlier stage it was contended that nothing of the human soul was assumed by the Son of God; in the latter stage, that with the body He assumed the sensitive soul (ψυχή), but not the rational soul (νοῦς), and that the Logos took the place only of the rational soul.¹

All these agree in denying to our Lord a perfect humanity. In each case there is something of the human nature lacking. And the common motive and principle to which the three are referrible, is evident from Athanasius' Epist. ad Epictetum, and the two books, Contra Apollinarium. Those who advanced these tenets thought themselves obliged, in order to maintain the perfect sinlessness of our Lord, to deny His assumption of that which they regarded as the primal seat of sin in man. By some the body, by some the body and its sensitive soul, by some the mind or rational soul, was thought the seat of sin, and its assumption therefore denied. The ἐνανθρώπησις of our Lord was thought to be maintained by His assumption of the remainder of the human nature. In general, accordingly, the third heresy was not combined with the first, for that would deny the ἐνανθρώπησις altogether. There is evidence however which cannot be resisted that Apollinaris in the latter part of his life did so. By the Apollinarist heresy, however, is understood the third. Heretics of the second class have their accredited name, SYNUSIASTÆ, and they are ranked by Theodoret as an offshoot of the Apollinarists under the title "Polemians."

The third class is named by Philaster TROPITÆ. In the Apollinarist heresy, thus limited by the exclusion of these two sects, the sensitive soul, or part of the soul, is considered to be not merely distinguishable in our conceptions, but really independent of and separable from the rational soul. The ψυχή, that is, is thought to be both distinct and divisible from the νοῦς. And it is asserted that our Lord, becoming man, assumed of the nature of man only the former; the Divine Logos supplying, in the God-Man, the place of the latter [Theodoret, Dial. Inconfusus]. From this division of the sensitive from the rational soul, these heretics are called Dimceritæ, as holding a διμοιρία, or two-thirds of the human nature in the Person of our Lord, under which name Epiphanius describes them [Hæc. lxxvii.].

Apollinaris, of the Syrian Laodiceæ, son of a presbyter of the same name, a pupil of a Sophist Epiphanius, reader in the Church of Laodiceæ, was made bishop of Laodiceæ about A.D. 362. He had distinguished himself in controversy with the Arians, was a friend of Athanasius, and was known for his many theological works [see a list of them in Lardner, Credib. xcv.] Sozomen tells that the occasion of Apollinaris' falling into heresy was resentment against Georgius, bishop of Laodiceæ. Georgius separated him from communion on account of his intimacy with Athanasius; and brought up against him an earlier fault, his presence namely at some Bacchic rites, for which he had been dealt with by Theodotus, Georgius' predecessor [Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vi. 25]. But (not to speak of chronological difficulties) this deliberate adoption of heresy out of pique or revenge, in no case very probable, is, in the present case, improbable from the character of the man, and negatived by the fact that Apollinaris began by adopting a portion of the Arian creed. The heresy is to be attributed to the workings of a mind which had lost its way amidst the mazes of controversy, and was in some measure misled by erroneous metaphysical theories. Apollinaris held the Catholic doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and in his maintenance against the Arians of the divinity of the Son of God, and his desire to maintain the impeccability of Christ, he thought himself obliged to admit the Arian² tenet, that the Logos supplied in Christ the place of the human soul. To take the very nature of man was (it appeared to him) to take a body and soul of fallen humanity.³ This is worked out in Athanasius' argument. The Apollinarists are represented as stating that where there is a true and very man, there is sin, that Christ could not therefore be the complete man, that He used the organized body as an instrument, that the Word was in that body as a celestial soul in place of the inner man [Athan. Cont. Apoll. i. 2, 17; ii. 6, 8, 17].

It will be observed that Athanasius expressly attributes this doctrine to the Arians. He says that the Arians affirm the Saviour to have taken only the flesh of man, and impiously refer the sense of passion to the impassible Deity [ib. i. 15]. Augustine speaks as unhesitatingly: "Apollinaristæ . . . dicentes sicut Ariani Deum Christum carnem sine anima accepisse" [Hæc.

² On this Arian tenet see Pearson On the Creed, p. 160, note 1, ed. 1741. That this tenet was held by the Arians is little noticed, nor was it insisted on in the time of the original controversy. In heretics who accounted the Word no other than a superior created Spirit, the error was but little taken into consideration by the Church. [ARIANS.]

³ The misconception lies in the supposition that original sin is of the very substance of fallen man, whereas it is, on the other hand, not an essential property but a defect. The substantiality of evil in human nature, as now constituted, was held by Marcion and other Gnostics. Those who hold that human flesh, as such, is sinful, must, in order to avoid the impiety that our Lord assumed a sinful body, assert with the Docetæ the unreality of His body; or with the Synusistæ, that His body was of His eternal substance prepared in Heaven, and coming down from Heaven: a tenet adopted, it will be remembered, by Irving, who maintained that God prepared a body of fallen humanity for His Son. Those who hold that original sin is an essential property of the human soul, to avoid a corresponding impiety, must deny the assumption of the human soul, and make the Word itself take the place of that soul. This the Apollinarists did. See Mill, Sermons on the Temptation, notes I and K.

lv.]. In this first stage of Apollinarian heresy the human soul of Christ was altogether denied, and with this stage Athanasius deals. He speaks of the Apollinarians as σάρκα μόνην προσομολογούντες [ii. 17], as holding that the ψυχή, or νοερά φύσις is so essentially the seat of sin [ii. 8], that the Son cannot have assumed it; of the νοῦς ἐπουράνιος ἐν Χριστῷ being ἀντὶ τοῦ ἔσωθεν ἀνθρώπου τοῦ ἐν ἡμῖν [i. 17]. From this extreme position they were driven, and then adopted the Platonic distinction of νοῦς and ψυχή [Socr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 46], allowing that Christ assumed the latter but not the former. "Mentem, quam rationalis est anima hominis, defuisse animæ Christi, sed pro hac ipsum Verbum in eo fuisse dixerunt" [Augustine]. To this second stage belongs the narrative of Epiphanius regarding himself, Paulinus and Vitalis. Paulinus was the Bishop of Antioch, consecrated by Lucifer; Vitalis was a presbyter of Meletius, who joined Apollinaris, and was afterwards made bishop in the sect, from whom the Apollinarians were called Vitalians by the Antiochenes [Sozom. H. E. vi. 25.]. Epiphanius relates that in a conference with these two bishops, Paulinus produced a creed drawn up by Athanasius, which he had himself signed, that Vitalis, after much cavilling and many questions, avowed his belief that in Christ was the human ψυχή, not the human νοῦς; that Christ was perfect man, consisting of a human body and sensitive soul, and the divine nature—that divine nature being in the place of the rational soul [Epiph. Her. lxxvii. 21-25]. Nemesius writes in his opening paragraph that the metaphysical tenet was borrowed from Plotinus, and the heretical doctrine raised on its foundation.¹ Regarding the metaphysical tenet, it is sufficient to say that it has been rejected by the Church as inconsistent with Christian psychology. Its connection with heresy is evident in other cases as well as the present case. Gregory of Nyssa [Antirrheticus, sect. viii.] remarks what handles it affords to heresy.

The heresy, both in its earlier and later form, denies to the Mediator a complete manhood. Christ is no longer God and man, but God and imperfect man, if man at all. The soul is the man, not the outward shape. "Mens cujusque is est quisque." It is the living soul inbreathed from God, in virtue of which the creature, made of the dust of the earth, becomes man. In the first form of the Apollinarian heresy, it is necessary to assert that the Son of God, inhabiting a soulless body, becomes man. In which case, it follows directly, that all the sufferings of the Mediator were borne by the Son Himself as such, that the very nature of the Godhead suffered. In the second form, that which is confessedly the highest part of man is denied to the humanity of the Mediator; and all the sufferings of the Mediator which belong to that highest part are, in like manner as before, attributed to the Godhead. In neither case can it be said that the Son of God was made in all things like unto His brethren. In neither case can the highest part of man have fellowship with the sufferings of Christ, and consequently it is left incapable of salvation.²

Gregory of Nazianzum, in his letter to Nectarius, written about the year 387, states from Apollinaris' own writings, that Apollinaris taught that the Flesh of Christ was not assumed from without, but had appertained to the Son from the beginning. In the first Epistle to Cledonius, A.D. 382, he mentions the opinion that the Flesh of Christ had come down from heaven [sect. vi.], and the necessary deduction that the Body of Christ passed through His mother "tanquam per canalem" [sect. iv.]. This latter statement is repeated by other authorities, as by Pope Martin at the Lateran Council, A.D. 649 [act. iii.].³ This evidence cannot be set aside (as Basnage would do) by the assertion that Gregory must have been mistaken in the authorship of the writings he quotes; and we are constrained to believe that Apollinaris, after his condemnation by the Council, sank deeper than before into heresy, and advanced tenets which altogether destroy the Incarnation of our Lord.

Again, Gregory Nazianzen [Ep. i. ad. Cledon.] states that Apollinaris introduced a scale (as it were) of divinity, asserting the Holy Spirit to be great, the Son greater, the Father greatest. Theodoret repeats the statement, but says, also, that in some writings Apollinaris is orthodox. Considering which, and the testimonies there are to Apollinaris' orthodoxy concerning the Holy Trinity,⁴ it is reasonable to infer that the charge

² This, which is a legitimate deduction from the premises of Apollinaris, is stated by Theodoret [H. E. v. 3] to have been a part of his teaching. It is simply incredible that he admitted and taught it.

³ Gregory of Nyssa begins his Antirrheticus with the statement that Apollinaris assigned to the Son a certain incarnation, not a proper manifestation in the flesh, in words so doubtful as to leave it uncertain whether he intends to maintain the conversion of the Godhead into flesh, or the existence of a compound substance, lying between the two, neither God nor man, but partaking of the natures of both. With this statement may be compared the words of Apollinaris, quoted at the Lateran Council, A.D. 649: "Ὅργανον καὶ τὸ κινεῖν, μίαν πέφυκεν ἀποτελεῖν τὴν ἐνέργειαν." Ὡς δὲ μία ἡ ἐνέργεια, μία καὶ οὐσία, μία ἄρα οὐσία γέγονε τοῦ λόγου καὶ τῆς σαρκὸς [Harduin, Concil. ii. 892.]

is founded only on statements relating to a subordination of office.

The charge of Sabellianism¹ is sufficiently explained by the direct conclusion from the leading Apollinarian tenet, that the θεός of the Son suffered, from which it follows that the Godhead itself, the θεός of the Father, is possible.

The Synod of Alexandria, held A.D. 362, by Athanasius and other bishops, returning from banishment after the death of Constantius, declared ὅτι οὐ σῶμα ἀψυχόν, οὐδ' ἀναίσθητον, οὐδ' ἄνθρωπον εἶχεν ὁ Σωτήρ. This was before Apollinaris avowed his heresy, probably before he had adopted it. Epictetus' letter to Athanasius, and Athanasius' reply, mark the outbreak of Apollinarian heresy, and these were in A.D. 370. The heretical tenet condemned was held by the Arians: and perhaps we are justified in considering that its special condemnation, after so little notice had been taken of it during the Arian troubles, is an example of Athanasius' prescience. He may have foreseen that heresy would take that course.

Apollinaris was condemned in a Roman synod, A.D. 373.² There is in Theodoret [H. E. v. 10] an Epistle of Damasus to the Oriental bishops concerning this condemnation. Baronius considers it to have been written at the time of the council, Valesius some time after; but both agree as to the condemnation in the year 373. The epistle speaks in general terms of all who deny the perfect humanity of our Lord. It states that Apollinaris, as well as a follower of his, Timotheus, had been deposed.

Another synodical letter of Damasus [Theod. H. E. v. 11] belongs probably to the Roman synod, A.D. 382. It anathematizes what has been defined as the proper Apollinarian heresy.

The Council of Constantinople, in its synodical epistle, refers also to a condemnation of the heresy at Antioch in A.D. 378 or 379. But the decrees of these inferior synods need not be dwelt upon in the presence of the decisions of an Ecumenical council. At Constantinople, A.D. 381-2, a synodical epistle declared that the Fathers held the doctrine of an entire and perfect Incarnation: not the œconomy of an incarnation in which the body lacks either soul or mind. Canon I. anathematizes the Apollinarians, Canon VII. prescribes the mode of their reception on returning to the Church, namely, by the seal of unction, their baptism being allowed. Lastly, the Definition of Faith made at Chalcedon sets forth, ἓνα καὶ τὸν αὐτὸν Χριστὸν, Υἱὸν, Κύριον, μονογενῆ, ἐν δύο φύσεσιν ἀσυγχύτως, ἀτρέπτως, ἀδιαίρετως, ἀχωρίστως γνωριζόμενον.

It is sufficient to state that the Apollinarians were subjected to the full penalties of Theodosius' edicts against heresy. A summary of these edicts is in Gibbon's Decline and Fall, chap. xxvii. A letter of Ambrose and other Italian bishops to Theodosius, A.D. 381, mentions the Apollinarian heresy as proper to be added to those regarding which the Emperor had written to them [Harduin, Concil. i. 844].

It is stated by Epiphanius [Hær. lxxviii.] that the sect of Antidicomarianites sprung from Apollinaris or one of his school. The latter is the more probable opinion. "Epiphanius and Photius are not without reason suspected of mistake in charging, severally on the Apollinarians and Eunomians, a denial of St. Mary's perpetual virginity. We find St. Basil using this point as a mutually confessed one, while contending with the latter heretics for the consubstantiality of the Word; for to their allegation of the Apostle's words, πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, in Col. i. 15, as if they implied merely a precedence of primogeniture among angelic creatures, he opposes the term, πρωτότοκος, used of Christ's human generation in Matt. i. 25—though no other children certainly followed—as an illustration of a corresponding use of the word respecting the Divine and ineffable generation of the only-begotten Son." [Basil, lib. iv. adv. Eunom. tom. i. p. 414, ed. Par. 1839. Mill, On the Brethren of the Lord, p. 301. Regarding the Chiliasm of Apollinaris, Basil, Ep. cclxv. MILLENARIANS.]

APOSTLES, FALSE. [FALSE APOSTLES.]

APOSTOLICALS. This name was assumed in the twelfth century by a sect which formed itself in the neighbourhood of Cologne. Our information regarding them is from a letter of Evervinus, provost of the Præmonstratensian monastery of Steinfeld, near Cologne, printed in Mabillon, Veter. Analect. iii. 152, and St. Bernard, Serm. lxx. lxxi. in Cantica. Evervinus asked Bernard to reply to their errors in his commentary on the words, "Take us the foxes." The sect was one of the reforming sects of the middle ages, in which the desire of reformation was so largely mingled with fanaticism and error. Their rules of discipline were correct, except that they had the plague-mark of allowing spiritual sisters to those who professed celibacy. Celibacy they preferred to marriage, even if they did not condemn marriage. Infant baptism, invocation of the saints, prayers for the dead, they condemned. The intermediate state they denied along with the mediæval purgatory. To the private Christian they thought every meal was a Eucharist. They abstained from all flesh, St. Bernard says,

² The council condemned generally the errors which are more or less connected with the name of Apollinaris, viz. of those who say [1] that Mary is not θεοτόκος; [2] that the Body of Christ passed through His mother as through a channel; [3] that the Manhood was first formed and then the Divine Nature superimposed; [4] that there are two sons: one of God, one of Mary; [5] that the Divinity worked in Christ, as in a prophet, by grace; [6] that the Crucified is not to be adored; [7] that Christ was advanced to the Godhead as a reward of His virtue, or that He was God by adoption; [8] that Christ on His resurrection laid aside His Body; [9] that the Flesh of Christ descended from heaven; [10] that hope is to be placed in a Christ who is man without a human soul. [See Mansi, under the year 377, to which he assigns the council.]

upon Manichæan principles. Evervinus tells of two of the sect, in a popular tumult raised against them, going joyfully to the stake. It seems to be probable that they were merged in the sect of Waldenses, the principles of which were diffused even in the Rhenish provinces. [Nat. Alex. Hist. Ecc. vii. 83].

APOSTOLICALS. Another mediæval sect which took its name from the profession of its members to revive the apostolic life. It was founded by Gerard Sagarelli of Parma towards the end of the thirteenth century, and was chiefly confined to Lombardy and some districts of the Tyrol. Sagarelli required his followers to clothe themselves in white, after the manner of the Franciscans, to go bareheaded and unshorn, and to live in the strictest poverty, depending entirely on alms. His mendicant teachers were not permitted to marry, but were attended by women whom they called sisters, according to a well-known saying of St. Paul. The Apostolicals were determined foes to the Papacy in private, and predicted its immediate downfall; looking also for a fulfilment of the prophecies uttered by Joachim, abbot of Flora, respecting the rise of a new and pure Church from the ruins of that which had become so corrupt. Joachim's prophecies did, indeed, stimulate many to threaten the Papacy with a reformation by the sword, and thus those who trusted in them were, from the Papal point of view, a really dangerous class of fanatics. In addition to this danger the Apostolicals, like all the class of mediæval sects to which they belonged, were fanatic communists, of the type of the later Anabaptists, and were thus waging war, in no small degree, on society at large. They were thus opposed by the civil power as well as by the Church, and the latter made use of the Inquisition for their suppression. Sagarelli was burned to death at Parma, A.D. 1300; but a new leader of the sect sprung up in the person of Dolcino. This man (from whom the sect also acquired the name of "Dolcinists") was a native of Novara, a man of great energy and courage, and apparently of some military ability. He preached vehemently against the reigning pope, Boniface VIII., and predicted that both he and all his wicked allies would shortly be slain by Frederic of Arragon, who was to enter Rome as emperor; in which he seems to have been taking up one of the prophecies of Joachim. Dolcino gathered large forces together, and under his leadership the Apostolicals carried on a fierce war against the Papal troops for two years. The importance of the rebellious war thus carried on by them is shewn by a passage in the contemporary poem of Dante, where Mahomet bids the poet, on his return to the light,

"Now say to Fra Dolcino, then, to arm him,
Thou, who perhaps wilt shortly see the sun,
If soon he wish not here to follow me,
So with provisions, that no stress of snow
May give the victory to the Novarese,
Which otherwise to gain would not be easy."
[Dante's Inferno, xxviii. 55.]

After several battles Dolcino was, however, taken prisoner, and was executed with cruel tortures at Vercelli in the year 1307. With him was also executed his female companion Margaret. The sect still survived, but in a scattered form, some of its members being found both in Germany and in the south of France so late as the year 1402. One of them, named William, was also in that year burned to death at Lubeck. The Albati, or WHITE BRETHREN, were probably a portion of them revived under a fanatic leader in Italy, and there suppressed by Pope Boniface IX. The BEGHARDS were also allied with them. APOSTOLICI. [APOTACTICS.]

APOSTOOLIANS. A division of the Menonite WATERLANDERS, taking its name from Samuel Apostool, a Baptist preacher of Amsterdam in the year 1664. The Apostoolians arose in opposition to the GALENISTS, endeavouring to maintain strict communion, and opposing the Socinian tendencies of the latter. They are also enthusiastic Millenarians. These two divisions of the Waterlanders still exist in Holland.

APOTACTICS. Those who renounced all private property. The main body of the Apotactics were Encratites, who, in addition to the usual ascetic tenets of their sect, held that a renunciation of property is necessary to salvation. But there were some, as the Aërians, who advocated this renunciation without practising abstinence.

Epiphanius makes the Apotactics the same as the Apostolici; and calls them an ἀπόστασμα τῶν Τατιανοῦ δογματῶν [Epiph. Hær. xli. or lxi.]. Augustine also identifies them with the Apostolici, and mentions their likeness to the Encratites [Aug. Hær. xl.]. He charges them with heresy, as separating from the Church, and denying the salvation of those who did not follow their rule; but he adds that they were also said to hold certain other heresies. Epiphanius comments at length upon the permission in the Church of voluntary poverty and celibacy, and argues that the main error of the Apotactics lay in the attempt to enforce these as of necessity. Whether then they adopted the Gnosticism of the Tatianist or of the Severian Encratites, or whether they were merely in error in advocating an excessive and fanatical asceticism, is not certainly known. But, most probably, some out of all these classes held it to be a duty to renounce private property; and, from the mode of life which resulted, were formed into fraternities, in which the differences of opinion in matters of doctrine were waived. They called themselves Apostolici, holding their rule to have been the Apostles' rule. It may be that the Encratite Apotactics called themselves Angelici, because angels neither marry nor are given in marriage. In which case the party would be Angelici quoad marriage, Apostolici quoad property. Epiphanius confesses his ignorance of the leading tenet of the Angelici [Hær. xl. or lx.], and adds [Synopsis, lib. ii.] that there were none left in his day. [ENCRATITES.]

AQUARIANS. [HYDROPARASTATÆ.]

AQUILINUS. A Gnostic leader mentioned by Porphyry in his Life of Plotinus, ch. xvi., but of whom nothing is known.

AQUINAS. [SCHOOLMEN.]

ARABICI, OR ARABES. An obscure sect, whose founder is unknown, and which therefore some authors name from the country where it first saw light, and others by the designation "Thnetopsychitæ." It arose in Arabia early in the third century, during the reign of Severus and the pontificate of Zephyrinus, and terminated its existence, after a career of some forty years, about the middle of the same century, when a council of bishops was held [c. A.D. 250], at which Origen, who had returned to Arabia on purpose to be present, discoursed so learnedly, that the Arabici in a body confessed their error, and returned to the bosom of the Catholic Church. The error in question was a belief that the soul died with the body, though both would be recalled to life and reunited at the last day. It was thought that the uninterrupted life of the soul was inconsistent with the words applied to God by St. Paul, "Who only hath immortality" [1 Tim. vi. 16], an imaginary inconsistency caused by oblivion of the distinction between the essential immortality possessed by God alone per se, and the imparted immortality possessed by the soul of man as a gift from Him. [Niceph. Hist. Eccles. v. 23. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi. 37. Aug. De Hæres. lxxxiii. Prædest. Hær. lxxxiii.]

ARCHONTICS. A sect of heretics which arose in the second century, during the latter part of the reign of Antoninus Pius [A.D. 138-161], deriving their name either from those arch-spirits (ἄρχοντες) who figured in their peculiar cosmogony [Aug. De Hæres. cap. 20], or from an anchorite Archon, otherwise unknown, but said to have been their founder. Palestine was the original seat of this heresy, and to that country it was mainly confined, its principal opponent being Dioscorus, bishop of Crete; but some years later, in the reign of Constantius, it spread into Greater Armenia, and was conveyed thence to Lesser Armenia by Eutactus, for whom Epiphanius wittily suggests that Atactus would have been a more appropriate name. Eutactus had derived his views from a certain anchorite named Peter, an inhabitant of Cabarbaricha near Hebron, who had been convicted of heresy and banished to Arabia, but had managed to return, and to continue to preach and win over converts to his strange doctrines.

The Archontics agreed in many points with Simon Magus, Menander, Saturninus, and other Gnostic teachers. They are charged, like other sects, with indulging in gross and open immorality, and have the singular and unexplained custom attributed to them of washing the bodies of their dead in oil and water. Among the most prominent doctrines characteristic of this sect are the following: [1] In their cosmogonical works, entitled Symphonia Major and Minor, they asserted that there were seven worlds, each presided over by a subordinate angel or archon, who was the begetter and director of numerous ranks of spirits, and an eighth and a higher world governed by a brilliant parent power. The world in which we live was under the rule of an archon called Sabaoth, not the supreme power, but identified with the God of the Jews, and said to be the father of the devil. [2] They denied the inspiration of Holy Scripture, especially ridiculing the Old Testament, with the exception of a few texts which they could quote in favour of their own views; in opposition, for example, to the Biblical theory of the origin of woman, they held that she was the handiwork of the devil, and that all who married fulfilled the works of the devil. [3] They denied the resurrection of the body, according to Epiphanius [Epiph. Hær. xl. 8, and Aug. De Hæres. cap. 20], though this fact is doubted by Tertullian. [4] They rejected Baptism and the Holy Eucharist, asserting that the Sacraments were ordained by and administered in the name of the inferior archon Sabaoth, and not of the Supreme Creator. [5] Redemption was supposed to consist in a knowledge of the mysteries contained in their apocryphal books, the titles of some of which have been preserved, as Symphonia Major and Minor, Alienigenæ, Anabaticum Isaie. [A lengthy refutation of these points may be found in Epiphanius, adv. Hæres. lib. i. tom. iii. Hær. 40; see also Aug. De Hæres. cap. 20; Theodoret, Hæret. Fab. i. c. 11; Bingham, Antiq. 478, 761, 1199.]

AREVURDIÏ. [THONDRACIANS.]

ARIANS. The name given to the followers of a great and widespread heresy which began to make itself heard in the Church about the beginning of the fourth century. The heresy takes its name from Arius, its first open promulgator, who was a priest of the diocese of Alexandria.

1. The place of Arianism in the history of heresies. The first open irruption of Arianism into the Church is so startling a feature in the history of the time that the attention is drawn away from what preceded it, and, in part, gave rise to it. It had a distinct and well-marked place in the scale of heretical development. The Athanasian Creed guards against two opposite but consecutive forms of heresy in the words, "neither confounding the Persons nor dividing the substance." The first of these is Sabellianism. Throughout the second century the Church was engaged in expressing definitely and defending the doctrine of the Holy Trinity against a series of attacks from heresies, the effect of which was to "confound the Persons." The last and most important of these was Sabellianism, which taught that there was but one Divine Person, and that the Word and the Holy Spirit were only emanations or functions of the Deity, the one assumed for a brief time to work out the mystery of redemption, the other to infuse life into the Church. [SABELLIANS.] In arguing against this, and maintaining the distinction of the Divine Persons, there was a danger of falling into an opposite error, viz. that of using language which would imply Tritheism. Here, then, Arianism crept in. To avoid, as it seemed, the two opposite dangers of Sabellianism and Tritheism, it "divided the Substance," and so practically attacked the doctrine of the Trinity from the opposite side. But the battlefield of both these heresies was the same, namely, the central truth of Christianity, the Incarnation. If Sabellianism were true, the Incarnation became a mere accident of time. If Arianism were true, Jesus Christ was not God. Such was the conclusion to the avowal of which Arianism was driven in its later days by the necessities of argument, and thus its historical position is clear. In its earliest, least impure, and most subtle form, it sprang, so far as it was sincere, from a dread of Sabellianism, while its inevitable tendency was to a definite heresy, the open denial of the Divinity of our Lord.

II. The birth-place and causes of Arianism.—Though Arius was a priest of the Church of Alexandria, and there began openly to publish his opinions, yet the origin and method of his heresy may be clearly traced to Antioch. The Divinity of our Lord had already been attacked at Antioch by Paul of Samosata, who was deposed from the see about A.D. 270. [SAMOSATENTANS.] Connected with Paul, and to some extent involved in his condemnation, was Lucian, a presbyter, who afterwards suffered martyrdom, however, for the faith. Lucian was a learned and able teacher of philosophy and theology, and among his pupils were several who afterwards became Arian leaders, including, it is generally thought, Arius himself. Moreover, the arguments used in support of the heresy of Paul, and the general cast of arguments current in the schools of theology at Antioch, were of a rhetorical and dialectical kind. They were accordingly a fit preparation for one peculiar characteristic of Arian controversy, the arguing from things earthly to things heavenly, from the things of man to the things of God. One further element in the heresy may also be traced to Antioch. Arianism soon began to appeal to the immorality of the time, as may be seen from the use made by Arius of a metre associated with licentious poetry in the songs composed by him to spread his opinions among the multitude. Now Antioch was remarkable for a low tone of Christian life. Paul was himself accused of open offences against Christian morality; and, owing to the presence of a large colony of Jews, the Christian citizens caught the tone of their luxurious habits, and were therefore, so far, ready to fall into doubts as to that part of their creed which enforced the necessity of personal self-restraint, and at the same time was most hated by all followers of Judaism. And thus a number of causes combined to give scope and start to the heresy: [1] A dread of Sabellianism; [2] the secret influence of Judaism; [3] a low tone of Christian life; [4] a rhetorical and dialectical habit of mind, which tried to evade mystery and reduce it to the level of argument from merely human knowledge and experience. These were most prominent at Antioch, where the Divinity of our Lord had already been openly assailed, though they were to be found in other parts of the Church; and they were aided in their development by the influence of a large body of nominal Christians in all parts, who had become such not because they were attracted and subdued by its life-giving doctrines, but because the decay of heathenism had left them without a religion.

III. Arianism in the fourth century.—The early facts about Arius and his first open declaration of heresy are somewhat involved, but it seems clear that, having been ordained deacon by Peter of Alexandria, he was connected with the MELETIAN SCHISM, and on that account was excommunicated. Afterwards he regained his position, and we find him, under Achillas, in charge of one of the great city churches, Baucalis or Boucalis, and continuing to work in this position under the successor of Achillas, Alexander, for the first six years of his episcopate. He had a great reputation as a logician and a preacher, as well as for strictness of life. Theodoret says that he was greatly disappointed that Alexander, instead of himself, was appointed to succeed Achillas in the see of Alexandria, and that his heretical opinions took easy root in a mind which had long been prepared by discontent and envy [Theod. Hist. Eccl. i. 2]. But his name is first distinctly connected with heretical opinions about A.D. 319. Rumours came to the bishop that he was privately disturbing men's faith as to the Uncreate and Eternal Being of Jesus Christ. The first step taken was a private remonstrance, but nothing resulted from this. Arius gained more and more support, and openly attacked the Deity of our Lord. His line was to speak of Him as the Eldest and Highest of creatures, to call Him God in a certain sense, but with limitations. The grounds of this view were in the main three: [1] Argument from the idea of human sonship; [2] repugnance to Sabellianism; [3] a dread of dividing the Simple Essence by deriving the Son from the Father's very Being. Practically, the whole view can be put in two leading propositions: [1] Once the Son was not; and [2] the Son differs from other creatures in degree, not in kind.

Finding private remonstrance with Arius to be useless, Alexander was obliged to take more public and decided measures. First, he assembled a public conference of the clergy, in which he himself spoke at length on the mystery of the Holy Trinity. Arius was allowed full liberty of reply, and he attacked the doctrine laid down by Alexander as involving Sabellianism. Finding, by the end of A.D. 319, that all hopes of a peaceable arrangement were at an end, the bishop then prevailed on the majority of his presbyters and deacons to join with him in subscribing a pastoral letter, in which he exhorted the followers of Arius to renounce his heresy and submit to the Church. But the heresy circulated widely and quickly, and it became necessary to bring a proportionally larger extent of influence to bear upon it. "It had spread," writes Alexander, "through all Egypt, Libya, and the upper Thebais. Then we, being assembled with the bishops of Egypt and Libya, nearly one hundred in number, anathematized both them and their followers" [Athanas. Hist. Tr. § 3]. At this provincial council the Arian opinions, having been openly avowed and sifted, were condemned. Arius and his adherents, among whom were two bishops, Secundus and Theonas, six priests, and six deacons, were excommunicated and anathematized [Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 6].

Arius and his friends then withdrew to Palestine, and the next five years were occupied in arguments and remonstrances on both sides. Arius found shelter, first with Paulinus of Tyre and Eusebius of Cæsarea, then with Eusebius of Nicomedia. He wrote to Alexander in a calmer and more respectful tone, withdrawing some of his extreme statements. On the other hand, he sought to spread his views by poems written in a metre connected with immoral associations, and disseminated these among "sailors, millers, and travellers" [Athanas. contr. Arian. i. 10, 22]. Several prelates espoused his cause, among them Theodotus of Laodicea and Patrophilus of Scythopolis, and he was recognised by a synod of Bithynian bishops, which put forth a letter urging other prelates to take the same line. The amount of sympathy shown by Eusebius the historian is not certain, but he wrote a letter in which he said that Christ was "not very God" [Athanas. De Syn. 5, 17], and he joined with two other bishops, Paulinus and Patrophilus, in allowing Arius to hold services for his adherents, on condition that he should seek to be reconciled to Alexander [Sozom. Hist. Eccl. i. 15]. The whole aim of Arius, at this period of the heresy, was to treat the differences as unimportant, only made of moment by the harsh rigour of Alexander and the orthodox, but at the same time to spread the heretical opinions in every possible way.

Meanwhile the principles of the new heresy began to be a matter of fierce controversy at Alexandria, and the whole city became a battlefield for the opposing parties. The sacred subjects in dispute became the common talk, and were even taken up by the jesters in society and in public places of resort, while the bishop and faithful clergy became the mark for shameful accusations before the civil tribunals. Alexander, however, with the aid of Athanasius, at that time a deacon, worked on steadily against the heresy. He wrote letter after letter to various bishops. One of these, the Encyclic, has been preserved by Socrates, and was directed against the efforts made by Eusebius of Nicomedia to procure for Arius the favour of various bishops. In it Alexander argues against and denounces the heresy as unheard of and as contrary to Holy Scripture, enumerates those who had been deposed and anathematized for holding it, and exhorts his fellow-bishops not to receive the excommunicated persons, "for it befits us as Christians to keep aloof from those who think or speak against Christ" [Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 6].

About the same time he drew up a "Tome" or doctrinal formulary, which was signed by the bishops of Egypt, including Thebais, and by those of Libya, Pentapolis, Cappadocia, Lycia, Pamphylia, Proconsular Asia, and some of those in Syria. After this he wrote to his namesake Alexander of Byzantium [Theod. Hist. Eccl. i. 3] a most important letter, in which, after complaining of the intrigues on behalf of the Arians, he went at length into their heresy and argued against it, tracing its substantial origin to those who in former times had sought to lower the dignity of the Son of God. This was probably written A.D. 323. About the end of the same year Constantine interposed. He had just triumphed over Licinius, and had become master of the East, and, finding the whole Church distracted by the controversy, he addressed a letter to Alexander and Arius. In this he treated the question at issue as trivial and unimportant, and exhorted both sides to peace and unity [Euseb. De vitâ Const. ii. 63-71]. Hosius, bishop of Cordova, was sent with this letter to Alexandria, and there, about the end of the year A.D. 324, held a council, the only result of which, as regards Arianism, was to prove that the discussion caused by it could not be allayed by ordinary means. Hosius, accordingly, advised the Emperor to summon a general assembly of bishops from all parts of his Empire, and, in compliance with this advice, Constantine summoned a general council of the whole Church to be held at Nicæa in Bithynia in June of the year 325.

A few details as to this great council will make its important effect on the Arian heresy better understood. The number of bishops present is not exactly known, but there were certainly more than three hundred, and they were attended by a multitude of other ecclesiastics. "They," writes Eusebius, "who not in soul only, but in body, and country and place and nation, were far removed from one another, were brought together; and one city received all, as it were a great chaplet of priests, variegated with beauteous flowers. From all the churches, which filled all Europe, Africa and Asia, there were collected together the first-fruits of the ministers of God. And one house of prayer as it were enlarged by God contained within it at once Syrians and Cilicians, Phœnicians and Arabians, and those of Palestine; those moreover of Egypt, Thebais, Libya, and those who came from Mesopotamia. A Persian bishop too was present at the synod; nor was a Scythian (Goth) wanting to the choir. Pontus also, and Galatia and Pamphylia, Cappadocia and Asia and Phrygia, sent their representatives; the Thracians and Macedonians, Achæans and Epirots, and those who dwelt yet more exceedingly further; and from Spain itself the very celebrated (Hosius) one, sitting with many. And of the royal city (Rome) the Bishop was absent for age; but his presbyters being present filled his place" [Euseb. De vitâ Const. iii. 6. 7]. The number of Arianizing prelates has also been variously stated, but probably about twenty were more or less favourable to the heresy. Its president was either Hosius of Cordova, the bearer of the Emperor's letter to the Church of Alexandria, or Eustathius of Antioch, probably the former: and the place of meeting was first the great church of the city, and afterwards the palace. Two other minor particulars are worth noting, viz. that laymen skilled in dialectic were allowed to attend and take part in the discussions, and that Greek philosophers were also present to question [Sozom. Hist. Eccl. i. 18]. The different elements of the Council may be stated as follows: [1] The Athanasians; [2] the determined Arians; [3] the Arianizers or Eusebians; [4] a party composed of those who, on the whole, sympathized with the supporters of Alexander and Athanasius, but were not so much alive to the bearing of the points at issue. A detailed history of the method pursued in the council would belong rather to a history of councils than to one of heresies, and it may suffice here to give a brief summary.

The earlier discussions of the Council were private: Arius had an opportunity of declaring his belief and of disputing with Athanasius, who also engaged with the other chief Arian bishops, Eusebius of Nicomedia, Maris, and Theognis. But the subsequent and conclusive work of the council was to frame a creed which should state in express terms the Catholic doctrine, and guard most carefully against Arian versions. The Arians offered a formula, drawn up by Eusebius of Cæsarea, in which terms of honour were given to the Son of God, but which was so contrived as to obscure and evade the point at issue. As it has been said, "The plain question at issue was whether our Lord was God in as full a sense as the Father, though not to be viewed as separable from Him; or whether, as the sole alternative, He was a creature; i.e. whether He was literally of and in the One Indivisible Essence which we adore as God, ὁμοούσιος Θεῷ, or of a substance which had a beginning. The Arians said that He was a creature, the Catholics that He was very God; and all the subtleties of the most fertile ingenuity could not alter and could not hide this fundamental difference" [Newman's Arians, pp. 272, 273]. The Catholics, therefore, framed their creed, and the crucial point of it was the use of this word "Homousion." To the creed were added anathemas against the Arians, and it was offered to the bishops individually for subscription. By the mass of bishops it was received in its integrity: Eusebius of Cæsarea accepted it after hesitating as to the "Homousion" [Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 9]. Eusebius of Nicomedia and Theognis signed it without the anathemas. Other Arian prelates gave way for fear of penalties, and in the end only Secundus and Theonas stood out. They were condemned and excommunicated with Arius.

For a brief space after the Nicene Council the Church was comparatively at rest. The creed was received with joy by the orthodox; and Arius, with his followers, was under the weight of the Emperor's displeasure. In this interval of rest Alexander of Alexandria died, and Athanasius was chosen in his place. Towards the close of A.D. 328 troubles began again, and we enter upon a long and weary history of intrigues, persecutions, and violence, all intended to attack the faith which had been declared at Nicæa, and to commit the whole Church to one form or another of the heresy. The first step in this direction was to gain the favour of the Emperor. Arius and some of his companions, by means of court influence, some say through Constantia, the Emperor's sister, were allowed to present a fresh declaration of their belief. It was couched in moderate phraseology so as to avoid exciting suspicion. It called the Son of God, "God the Word, begotten of the Father before all ages," and was in fact intended to supplant the Nicene Creed by a politic omission which might seem to promote comprehension and peace rather than by opposition. Arius was recalled A.D. 330 [Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 14, 16; Sozom. Hist. Eccl. ii. 26, 27]. The next effort on the part of his adherents was to remove out of the way some of the more eminent of the orthodox bishops. Eustathius of Antioch was accused of heresy and other crimes, and, notwithstanding the worthlessness of the evidence (the falsity of which was afterwards confessed by the principal witness) was deposed by an Arian synod, and banished by Constantine [Theod. Hist. Eccl. i. 21; Eus. De vitâ Const. iii. 60]. Athanasius was made the object of a series of charges, which in the end led to his banishment. After having refused to attend the Eusebian Council of Cæsarea in A.D. 334 [Theod. Hist. Eccl. i. 28], he was arraigned before another Eusebian Council at Tyre in the following year. But all the accusations were refuted. Afterwards, a hostile body of inquirers was sent to gather evidence against him, and on their return he was condemned in his absence, he having in the meantime gone to Constantinople to intercede with the Emperor. At first the Emperor was induced to take his part and to condemn the violence of the so-called council, but his enemies then accused him of stopping the allowance of public corn made to the clergy, widows and virgins at Constantinople [Sozom. Hist. Eccl. ii. 28], and the Emperor banished him to Treves A.D. 336. In the same year Marcellus of Ancyra was accused of Sabellianism, and deposed by a synod at Constantinople; and Arius, having made another profession of faith before the Emperor, was ordered to be restored to communion in the same city. His sudden death the very evening before the day appointed is one of the most awful facts of the history.

The death of Constantine [A.D. 337] divided the power of the Empire between his three sons, Constantine, Constantius, and Constans. This change again gave the Church an interval of rest, and Athanasius was restored to his see in A.D. 338 [Socr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 3; Sozom. Hist. Eccl. iii. 2]. But again accusations were brought against him. He was accused of having resumed his see without the sanction of a council, and an excommunicated Arian, named Pistus, was set up as a rival bishop. Charges having been laid against him before Julius of Rome, his innocence was solemnly asserted by a letter from a council of the orthodox prelates of Egypt [Athan. Apol. 3-19]. But in A.D. 341 the Eusebians held a council at the time of the dedication of Constantine's church at Antioch, in which a canon was first passed, enacting that no bishop who should officiate after a canonical deposition should ever be restored or even heard, and this canon was made the ground for the condemnation of Athanasius. At the same council three creeds were framed, all of which came as near as was politic to the truth, but avoided the test word "Homocousion" [Athan. De Synod. 22-24]. Gregory of Cappadocia was made Bishop of Alexandria, and great outrages were inflicted both on the persons and churches of the orthodox at his installation. Athanasius, meanwhile, withdrew to Rome. Here he was favourably received, and defended by the bishop, Julius. His second exile lasted until the year 349, when he was recalled by Constantius. In this interval, the Council of Milan [A.D. 345] refused to accept a Semi-Arian Creed called the Macrostich [Socr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 19, 20; Sozom. Hist. Eccl. iii. 10], and the Council of Sardica [A.D. 347] once more affirmed the truth of Nicæa, while the Arian and Semi-Arian prelates, who had been summoned to meet Athanasius at Sardica, withdrew to Philippopolis, where they again condemned Athanasius, along with the Bishops of Rome, Cordova, Treves, and Sardica. This was succeeded by two years of open persecution and secret intrigue, but the restoration of Athanasius in A.D. 349 gave a triumph to the orthodox, and in that year a large number of bishops were in communion with him. The murder of Constans [A.D. 350] brought the West under the rule of Constantius, and a storm of trouble again fell upon the Church.

Arianism, at this date, had split up into many factions, one of which had pushed the heresy to its logical conclusion, and asserted that the Son was essentially unlike the Father [ANOMÆANS], while another had changed the old Eusebian or Semi-Arian formula "Homoiousion," "like in essence," to "Homoion," by which they professed to avoid the term "essence" altogether, and confine themselves to asserting the "likeness" of the Son to the Father. These are generally known as ACACIANS, from Acacius of Caesarea, the pupil of Eusebius. For party purposes both acted against the adherents of the Nicene faith, and for several years were able, with the aid of the imperial power, to inflict on them the gravest outrages. The dispute, hitherto, had been chiefly an Eastern one, but attempts were now made to Arianize the entire West. The Councils of Arles [A.D. 353] and of Milan [A.D. 355], the two Conferences of Sirmium [A.D. 356, 357] followed one another in rapid succession. Hilary of Poitiers was banished to Phrygia, Liberius the Pope to Thrace, and Hosius the aged bishop was imprisoned, while Alexandria became the scene of the greatest brutality and violence, Athanasius being compelled to find refuge from Arian fury among the monastic cells of Egypt.

Here he lived for five or six years, often having to fly from one place to another, and running great risks of capture, but finding time to compose epistles and orations against the Arians, and to watch with fatherly interest the trials of the Church [Athan. Hist. Arian., and Apol. de Eugd.]. Two events must be noted in this period. The first Conference of Sirmium produced an Homœan Creed, and Hosius, after having suffered a year's imprisonment as well as bodily punishment, was induced to sign it. He was then allowed to return to Spain, but two years after, on his deathbed, he retracted [Athan. Hist. Arian. xlv.; Socr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 81]. Liberius having endured two years' banishment, gave up Athanasius, and signed a Semi-Arian creed, though which creed is doubtful [Athan. Hist. Arian. xli.; Hilar. Fragm. vi. 6]. Thus by the year 357 Arianism seemed to be triumphant in the West.

About this time, in the East, St. Cyril of Jerusalem was deposed and exiled, while, at Antioch, the heretic Aëtius was patronized and put forward by the Bishop Eudoxius [AËTIAN]. On the other hand the Council of Ancyra [A.D. 358] condemned the "Homoion" and "Homoousion" alike, and insisted on the "Homoiousion." Eudoxius and Aëtius were both compelled to retire, and thus division broke up the Arian ranks. About the same time Hilary of Poitiers attempted to bring about an understanding with the triumphant SEMI-ARIANS of the East, urging them to accept the "Homoousion," and explaining its true sense. From this date to the death of Constantius [A.D. 361] there follow a succession of councils, and a succession of creeds, Semi-Arian, Homœan, or Anomœan in character. The most noteworthy of these is the Western Council of Ariminum [Athan. De Synod.; Sozom. Hist. Eccl. iv.], with which may be joined the Eastern Council of Seleucia [Socr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 39, 40] held at the same time [A.D. 359]. Of the former it has been said, that it had "a good beginning and a foul conclusion." What is known as the "Dated Creed," drawn up under the sanction of the Emperor, and Homœan in character, was rejected, and the faith of Nicæa was affirmed: but when the Council of Seleucia had held a fruitless discussion, and the delegates on both sides from Ariminum had met before the Emperor, the same Creed was sent back to the council by the Emperor, and, in the end, the bishops were persuaded to accept it, guarding it, as they thought, by anathemas against Arian opinions. It is to this time that St. Jerome refers in his well-known exclamation, "The whole world groaned and marvelled to find itself Arian" [Hieron. adv. Lucif. vii.].

The reign of Julian gave two years of comparative rest. The attempt of the Emperor to restore heathenism was combined at first with a cynical indifference for all those whom he termed "Galileans." Accordingly, Athanasius was able to return to Alexandria, where a council was held in A.D. 362. This council, by its orthodoxy and moderation, did much for the Church.

It explained differences of phraseology which had arisen among the orthodox, especially as to the word Hypostasis; it anticipated the possibility of new heresies as to our Lord's Incarnation (notably that of Apollinaris), and it adhered firmly, though with moderation, to the Nicene faith. The results of its wisdom were immediately felt, especially in the West. Italy, Illyricum, and Gaul all made profession of the old faith; many of the bishops who had been persuaded to sign the Creed of Ariminum now repudiating it [Hieron. adv. Lucif. xix.]. At a later date Athanasius was again compelled to fly for safety from the hatred of Julian. The short reign of Jovian for one year was the signal for his return, and brought general favour to the orthodox; but the rule of Valentinian and his brother Valens changed the aspect of the Church once more.

Under Valentinian the orthodoxy of the West gained strength. The Semi-Arians indeed were allowed to reassert their formula at Lampsacus in A.D. 365, but fifty-nine of their bishops conformed to the faith before Liberius in the following year, and two successive Western councils under Damasus, the successor of Liberius, denounced Arian opinions. On the other hand, Valens espoused the Arian side, and gave free scope to its extreme supporters.

The Epistles of St. Basil describe the sufferings of the Catholics in the East, when the edict of Valens [A.D. 367] had again let loose the tide of persecution. Athanasius was once more banished, but was shortly afterwards recalled [Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vi. 12; Socr. Hist. Eccl. iv. 13]. He died in the year 373, having devoted his whole life to the maintenance of the faith of Nicæa, and again Alexandria became the scene of shameless outrages.

From this date to that of the Council of Constantinople the controversy was less vehement. The heresy of Apollinaris, which began with a jealousy for our Lord's Divinity and ended practically in the denial of the true humanity [APOLLINARIANS], began to absorb attention, and was a source of constant anxiety to St. Basil. In A.D. 378, Valens put an end to Arian ascendancy and recalled the orthodox exiles. His death in the same year gave the whole empire to Gratian, who had succeeded his father in the empire of the West [A.D. 375], and an edict was put forth giving toleration, which included all the sects connected with the Arian dispute except the Anomæans. The mission of St. Gregory of Nazianzum to Constantinople, where, by his gentle perseverance, he won back to the faith, to a very large extent, the city which for forty years had been the stronghold of the heresy, and the open patronage of Theodosius and Gratian, bring us to the rapid fall of Arianism.

During the sixty years of its course, its success had been due in the main to two causes: [1] court influence and violence; [2] the negative character of its tenets. The former had now failed, and the latter had naturally resulted in divisions in its own ranks. No less than twenty creeds or formulas had been put forward by councils or by individuals; while, on the other side, the one Creed of Nicæa had been stedfastly maintained. This was now reaffirmed at the Council of Constantinople [A.D. 381], and the Church as a whole was once more free to teach the faith in its integrity. The heresy was proscribed by imperial edicts; and though, through the influence of Justina, the mother of Gratian, it gave trouble to St. Ambrose at Milan, yet newer heresies gradually took its place and absorbed the attention of the Church.

IV. Arianism among the Goths and barbarians.—The conversion of the Goths and other barbarians to Christianity, towards the end of the fourth century, was the work of Arian teachers, and introduced Arianism to a new field, of which it held possession for several centuries. Ulfilas, bishop of the Goths, had subscribed the Creed of Ariminum, and was therefore, to some extent, committed to Arianism, though possibly, like others who signed the same creed, he had done so without meaning to abandon the Catholic faith [Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vi. 37]. But at a later period, in the reign of Valens, he was sent to ask for help against the heathen Goths, and he took back to his people the Emperor's Arianism [Theod. Hist. Eccl. iv. 37]. Through these and other barbarian tribes, Ostrogoths, Visigoths and Vandals, Arianism once more came into contact with the faith in the various countries over-spread by them, viz. parts of Gaul, Spain and Africa. St. Chrysostom, during his episcopate at Constantinople [A.D. 398-407], had to deal with it among the Goths who were in that city, and tried to win over its adherents by having services in their language, and by ordaining clergy from among their own people. The Burgundians, who had become Christians about A.D. 413, received the heresy about the middle of the same century [Socr. Hist. Eccl. vii. 30], and the Suevi in Spain, at the time of their conquest by the Visigoths, a few years later. The end of the same century was the season of a fierce persecution of the Catholics of Africa, under the first two kings of the Vandals, Genseric and his son Hunneric. But by the downfall of the Vandals in Africa and of the Ostrogoths in Italy in the sixth century, Arianism was driven from both those countries, while the conquests of the Franks served to bring back some of the other nations to the Catholic faith. Thus the Burgundians became Catholic about A.D. 517, and Spain was also restored towards the end of the same century, after a brief outburst of persecution under the Gothic king Leovigild. The heresy lived amongst the Lombards for some forty years longer, but by the middle of the seventh century it was practically extinct.

V. Revival of Arianism at the time of the Reformation.—Among the many sects and heresies which accompanied the Reformation movement in the sixteenth century, a revived Arianism found a place.

Michael Servetus, a native of Spain, published a work in 1531, entitled De Trinitatis Erroribus, in which he openly attacked the doctrine of our Lord's Divinity. He had before this been at Basle with the Reformer Ecolampadius, who had tried to make him retract. For twenty years he continued teaching his heresy, travelling in various parts of Italy and France. He was at last brought before the municipal council of Geneva, and was burnt alive by its order in 1553. Other individual Reformers of less note revived the heresy in one form or another, among them Lewis Hetzer, an Anabaptist, beheaded at Constance in 1529, John Campanus at Wittenberg, and Valentine Gentilis of Naples, executed at Berne in 1566. The fear of persecution in Switzerland drove some of the heretical teachers into Poland, where the doctrine of the Holy Trinity was attacked in a literary club, presided over by an Italian named Lismanini [Hardwick's Ref. p. 285, sqq.]. This, with the other partial revivals of Arianism, or as would perhaps be more accurate, of Antitrinitarianism, at last found its logical result in the more lasting and widely-spread heresy of the SOCIANIANS.

VI. Arianism in England in the eighteenth century.—From A.D. 1690 to A.D. 1730 was a period of much controversy among certain divines of the English Church on the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. The works of Bishop Bull were called forth, in part, by those of a number of writers, Socinian or Arian in their opinions, whose names are almost forgotten. A few years later Dr. Sherlock, Dean of St. Paul's, and Dr. South, Canon of Christchurch, were involved in a controversy, in which each tried to explain the doctrine of the Holy Trinity in such a way as to satisfy human reason, and each in turn incurred the charge of heresy, Dr. Sherlock being accused of Tritheism and Dr. South of Sabellianism. Their method of disputation was essentially speculative and metaphysical. They professed to deal with the question as one of pure reasoning, and neglected almost entirely the arguments from Holy Scripture and the Fathers. Their language was not always reverent, and to some extent revived the recollection of Arian profanity. The consequence of this dispute among those who professed to maintain the Creed was the revival of Arian opposition to it, and Arian tracts were republished and largely disseminated. Many eminent persons took part in the controversy, among others Cudworth and Stillingfleet; and it is worth noticing that the former was accused of favouring the Arian view in his Intellectual System. But the most remarkable and the closest following of Arianism was that of Dr. Samuel Clarke and his friend Mr. William Whiston. The case of the latter was brought before Convocation in 1710, that of the former in 1714. Clarke had published, in 1712, a work entitled The Scripture Doctrine of the Holy Trinity. In this he disclaimed the notion of being an Antitrinitarian, and professed to prove his views directly from Holy Scripture, maintaining that "whenever the terms one and only God were used in Holy Scripture they invariably meant God the Father, to the exclusion of the other Persons of the Godhead."

From this and other arguments, especially the use of the terms "self-existent" and "unoriginated," he drew inferences derogating from the Divinity of our Lord, and maintained His subordination in nature. In this way he repeated the old attempt of the fourth century, to find a mean between the Catholic faith, that Jesus Christ is essentially God, and the extreme form of heresy which holds Him to be a creature. Many eminent writers opposed and answered Dr. Clarke's works, and some supported him. The fullest answers are those of Dr. Daniel Waterland, Master of Magdalene College, Cambridge. It is important to observe that this revival of Arianism was one which, for the most part, only had interest for the learned, and did not as in earlier times gain a hold over any large mass of the people.

ARIOMANITÆ. [ARIANS.]

ARMASITES. The followers of an Egyptian named Harmasius in the seventh century. They were among the last offshoots of the Monothelites. [Joann. Damasc. Opp. i. 528.]

ARMENIANS. Until the Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451] the Armenian Church appears to have been remarkably free from error, and in the immediately preceding period it had firmly withstood the progress of the Nestorian heresy. No bishops from Armenia were, however, able to attend the Council of Chalcedon; and when the report of that council was carried to Armenia, misrepresentations and ambiguity of expression prevented its rulers from understanding the truth as to Eutyches and his heresy. In the Armenian language there is only one word to express both Nature and Person, and hence the impression was conveyed, that in recognising two Natures in our Lord, the council had proclaimed two Persons. The Armenians, therefore, rejected the Council of Chalcedon, and were predisposed to favour Eutychianism. Being thus divided from the Eastern Church, the Armenians remained in an isolated position very unfavourable to the maintenance of orthodoxy; and they have always been infected with Monophysite error. They have a Confession of great antiquity, which they attribute to St. Gregory the Illuminator (their Apostle of the third century), in which occurs a clause respecting God the Word, "that He had one Person, one Form, and was united in one Nature," this clause—strangely enough—concluding a statement that He was incarnate of the Blessed Virgin Mary; and is undoubtedly, as far as its words go, a statement embracing the Monophysite heresy. Neale, however, in his "Dissertation on the Claims of the Armenian Church to Orthodoxy" [Neale's Hist. East. Ch. ii. 1078], expresses his belief that the theologians of the Armenian Church completely reconcile the sense in which the clause is understood with that of the Eastern Church at large; and that the accusation of Monophysitism brought against the Armenian Church on account of their peculiar "Confession" is not really more true than the accusation of Calvinism which has often been brought against the Church of England on account of expressions contained in the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion. But all attempts to reunite the Armenians with the Eastern Church have hitherto failed.

ARMINIANS. An Anti-Calvinist school of Protestants which derives its name from James Harmensen (Latinized into "Arminius"), a Calvinist minister at Amsterdam.

Arminius was a cutler's son, born at Oude-water in Holland in the year 1560. He studied at Leyden from A.D. 1575 to 1582, and afterwards for some time at Geneva under Beza. While he was still a very young man, he was obliged to leave Geneva through fear of persecution for his bold speculations in theology; and from thence he went to become a pupil of Gryneus at Basle. In 1588 he was appointed to a congregation at Amsterdam, where he was shortly put forward as champion of the SUPRALAPSARIANS in one of their endless controversies with the SUBLAPSARIANS about Predestination, Election, and Grace. His championship, however, resulted in his conversion to the opinions which he had been set to oppose, and abandoning the common Calvinistic belief in predestination and the Divine decrees, he came round to the side of those who believe that Christ died for all men, and not only for an elect few. He avowed this change of opinion in 1591, but still continued in his post until he was appointed Professor of Divinity at Leyden, which was in the year 1603. His lectures on the Epistle to the Romans soon raised a fierce and wide controversy: so fierce that the government of the State was obliged to interfere. A synodal conference was proposed between Arminius and his followers on the one side, and the strict Calvinists, led by Francis Gomar, the professorial colleague of Arminius, on the other. But the controversy preyed upon the health of Arminius, and before any steps were taken towards the convocation of the proposed synod he died, on October 19th, 1609.

After the death of Arminius, the two parties became even more virulently opposed to each other than they were before, and the theological question was also mixed up with a political one, the Arminians wishing for peace with Spain, and the Calvinists urging the Prince of Orange and the States-General to undertake a war. Prince Maurice was at first in favour of the Arminian party, while they had supporters at court in Barneveldt, Grotius, Hoogerbetz, and others; but the Stadtholder soon changed his mind, and became their most bitter opponent and persecutor.

When the Conference met at the Hague in the year 1610, the Arminian party presented a statement of their doctrine in the form of a "Remonstrance" in five articles, which are, in substance, as follows:

I. That God, before the foundation of the world, or from eternity, decreed to bestow eternal salvation on those whom He foresaw would keep their faith in Christ Jesus inviolate until death; and, on the other hand, to consign over to eternal punishments the unbelieving who resist the invitations of God to the end of their lives.

II. That Jesus Christ, by His death, made expiation for the sins of all and every one of mankind: yet that none but believers can become partakers of this Divine benefit.

III. That no one can, of himself, or by the powers of his free will, produce or generate faith in his own mind; but that it is necessary a man, who is by nature evil and incompetent (ineptus) both to think and to do good, should be born again, and renewed by God, for Christ's sake, through the Holy Spirit.

IV. That this Divine grace or energy, which heals the soul of man, commences, advances, and perfects all that can be called truly good in man: and therefore all good works are ascribable to no one except to God only, and to His grace: yet that this grace compels no man against his will, though it may be repelled by his perverse will.

V. That those who are united to Christ by faith, are furnished with strength abundantly to overcome the snares of the devil and the allurements of sin; but whether they can fall from this state of grace, and lose their faith or not, does not yet sufficiently appear, and must be ascertained by a careful examination of the Holy Scriptures.

These five articles of the "Remonstrance" became the watchword of the Arminian party, who were hence called "Remonstrants," the Calvinist or Gomarist party being "Counter-Remonstrants." The articles became known as "The Five Points," and the dispute between the two parties was dignified with the name of "The Quinquarticular Controversy."

The Hague Conference of 1610 failed to bring about any reconciliation of the two parties, as did also another held at Delft in the year 1613. Equally powerless was a conciliatory decree promulgated by the States-General in 1614, in which (under the influence of Grotius and Barneveldt) toleration was declared towards both parties, and further controversy forbidden. The Calvinists grew more and more confirmed in their bitterness towards the Arminian party, refused to obey this edict, in their usual persecuting spirit called for their suppression "by blood" if it could not be effected otherwise, and became so violent that the Arminian party raised a militia in self-defence. The Prince of Orange and the States-General at last determined to summon another and larger assembly of Protestant divines, the decision of which would be final.

The Synod of Dort, thus convened, met at Dort or Dordrecht on November 13, 1618, and continued to sit until the end of April 1619. It was composed entirely of Calvinist divines, comprising, besides those of Holland and Germany, some from the Presbyterians of Scotland, from Switzerland, and from England: the latter being Carlton, Bishop of Llandaff; Hall, afterwards Bishop of Norwich; Davenant, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury; and Ward, his successor in the Margaret Professorship of Theology. The English divines were sent by James I. from a politic desire to promote some sort of union, if possible, between the Continental Protestants and the Church of England; but it is hardly necessary to say that the decisions of the Synod of Dort never had any authority whatever in the Church of England. James I. was, indeed, responsible in some degree for the subsequent persecution of the Arminians, having written a tract against Vorstius, one of their leaders, in which he had declared that the latter ought to be burned as a heretic.

The Arminians appeared before the Synod of Dort, under the leadership of Simon Episcopius, one of the Leyden Professors of Theology, who began the proceedings by an attempt to confute the opinions of the Calvinists. [DORT, SYNOD OF.] The nature of the assembly was at once shewn by its refusal to hear Episcopius and his friends in any other way than as accused persons who were on their defence; and the Arminians, finding that their controversial opponents were assembled, not to confer with them, but to be their judges, declined to have anything further to do with the synod. They were, of course, condemned in their absence, the opinions of the Counter-Remonstrants being adopted and enforced in ninety-three cautions. It was also decided that the Arminian ministers, who numbered about three hundred, should be expelled from their offices and excommunicated. Some refused to submit to the decree of the synod, but fine, imprisonment, and exile were imposed upon all who resisted. The aged senator, Barneveldt, who had been their protector, was put to death, Grotius and Hoogerbetz were sentenced to imprisonment for life: while the bulk of the party escaped to France and England. After two years' imprisonment, Grotius succeeded in escaping by concealing himself in a linen chest, but he was an object of bitter hatred to the Dutch Calvinists all his life, and when, in 1631, he ventured to return for a few months to his native country, he was once more obliged to fly through danger of fresh persecution.

In the year 1634, however, an edict of toleration towards the Arminians was once more passed, and Episcopius returned to open a Remonstrant College in Amsterdam. Episcopius formalized the theories of Arminius, and extended them in the direction of Socinianism and Universalism. From that time the Arminians shewed a marked tendency towards Rationalism, and one after another of the doctrines held by orthodox theologians being eliminated from their system, their sect in the end has recognized Christianity as little more than a system of morality, in which every person may regulate his belief by his own conceptions of Holy Scripture. They have been growing fewer in Holland during the present century, and are not now to be found in any number except in Rotterdam.

ENGLISH ARMINIANS have never become a distinct sect. In the reign of Charles I. it was the fashion to brand with the name all who were opposed to the cruel and false dogma of the Calvinists respecting divine decrees to perdition, and the High Church party were thus called Arminians. After the Restoration, the name passed away from the High Church to the Latitudinarians; the Arminianism of England thus running parallel at this time to that of Holland, but never going further in the direction of Rationalism than the half-developed Universalism of the Tillotson school. When Wesley and Whitfield struck out divergent lines of theology, the original form of the dispute between Arminius and the Calvinists was revived, Wesley taking the Arminian side, and Whitfield becoming the founder of the Calvinistic Methodists. In still more recent times, the dreadful dogma of Calvinism respecting Predestination and Election has been held by comparatively few persons, at least in the Church of England, and the doctrine of Universal Redemption, for which Arminius chiefly contended, is not disputed by any theologians of importance. ARNOLDISTS. The supporters of a movement against the temporal power of the Papacy which was led by Arnold of Brescia, and which placed it in a position of much danger for about twenty years in the middle of the twelfth century [A.D. 1135-1155].

Arnold was a monk of Brescia or Brixia in the north of Italy, and a pupil of the vain and restless Abelard. About the year 1135 he began to indoctrinate the people of Lombardy with the always popular notion that it is wrong for the clergy to possess any property. This teaching coincided with a movement which the Lombard towns were making to establish themselves in a position of independence as free cities, and thus the people were excited to look upon the bishops and clergy as political enemies, whose wealth was a hindrance to the development of republican institutions. Arnold was condemned (in company with the PETROBUSIANS) at the second Lateran Council, under Pope Innocent II. [A.D. 1139], and although not excommunicated, was banished from Italy. He retired to France, seeking safety with his friend Abelard; but encountering the opposition of St. Bernard, and being in danger of imprisonment as an enemy of the Church, he fled to Zurich, where he lived for about five years. His principles had spread so widely that the Romans raised an insurrection in the year 1143 for the purpose of establishing a republic on the ancient model, and Arnold was summoned from Zurich to become the leader of the movement. Pope Lucius II. was killed on February 15th, 1145, while endeavouring to recover possession of the Capitol, and the rebellion was carried on by Arnold and his adherents through the reigns of the two succeeding Popes, Eugenius III. and Anastasius IV. The Englishman Hadrian IV. succeeded to the Papal throne at the end of the year 1154, and he at once brought the Romans to submit to his authority by placing the city under an interdict, the first which they had ever experienced. After ten years of violence and disorder the Arnoldist party was thus broken up, Arnold himself taking refuge in Campania. A few months afterwards the Emperor Frederic I., having suppressed the rebellious movement in Lombardy, caused Arnold to be delivered into the hands of the Pope, when he was immediately hanged as a traitor, his dead body being burned, and the ashes of it thrown into the Tiber [A.D. 1155]. Arnold was in close alliance with the anti-sacramental heretics of his day, and he himself was accused of unsoundness in respect to Infant Baptism and the Sacrament of the Altar: "Præter hæc, de sacramento altaris et baptismo parvulorum non sane dicitur sensisse." The opposition of St. Bernard points in the same direction, as do the terms in which he speaks of Arnold in his 195th Epistle, written A.D. 1140. There can be little doubt that he had originally imbibed a free-thinking tone of mind from Abelard, and that his republican notions made him sympathize at least with the Paulician heretics who at that time existed in considerable numbers in France and Italy. After his death the party of the Arnoldists was little heard of, but they regarded their leader as a saint and a martyr. [Luc. Tudens. in Bibl. Max. Lugd. xxv. 247; Otto Fris. de rebus gestis Frid. ii. 20, in Murator. xxi.]

ARRHABONARII. The name given by some Roman theologians to a small school of Polish Anti-Sacramentalists, who maintained that the Holy Eucharist conveys no present gift of grace, but the pledge or earnest (ἀρραβὼν) of a gift to be bestowed in Heaven. The opinion was first broached in the year 1543 by Stancarus, professor of Hebrew at Cracow. [STANCARISTS.]

ARSENIAN SCHISM. This name is given to the disturbance of communion between the Churches of Alexandria and Constantinople, which occurred through the deposition of the Constantinopolitan Patriarch Arsenius [A.D. 1265].

On the death of the Emperor Theodore Lascaris [A.D. 1258], Arsenius and Michael Palæologus became guardians of his son John Lascaris, then only eight years of age. Palæologus was shortly afterwards made successively despot and emperor by the army, and Arsenius consented to crown him on condition of his taking an oath to resign the empire to John Lascaris when the latter attained his majority. The new emperor, however, gradually shewed that he was determined not to redeem his pledge, and the patriarch, hopeless of persuading him to do so, ceased to fulfil the duties of his office, but would not give any formal acknowledgment that he had vacated it. Nicephorus, metropolitan of Ephesus, was then made patriarch, but died after holding office for a year. Shortly after his death Arsenius was restored by Palæologus, whom the patriarch crowned a second time on the occasion of the re-capture of Constantinople from the hands of the Romans [A.D. 1261]. At this second coronation the patriarch required no promise of abdication in favour of the young John Lascaris, who was soon after imprisoned and cruelly blinded by Palæologus. Upon hearing, however, of this cruelty Arsenius excommunicated Palæologus, and the latter determined to displace him from the patriarchal throne. A council of compliant bishops was called, who listened to the emperor's complaints and accusations, declared the deposition of Arsenius, and made Germanus of Adrianople patriarch of Constantinople in his place.

The Patriarch Nicolas of Alexandria regarded this as a schismatical act, and would hold no communion with Germanus; and although he died within a year of the deposition of Arsenius the Churches ceased to hold intercourse with each other during the reign of Michael Palæologus. On his death in A.D. 1283 a temporary reconciliation was effected, but fresh disputes arose out of the question of union between the Roman and Eastern Churches, and the two patriarchates were only reunited when the general persecution of Eastern Christians by the Mahometans in the beginning of the fourteenth century merged minor troubles in the greater one of an antichristian tyranny. [Neale's History of Church of Alexandria, ii. 311-321.]

ARTEMONITES. A sect holding Monarchian views on the subject of the Trinity, and called after its founder Artemon or Artemas, who began to broach his errors in the earlier part of the third century, during the reign of Septimius Severus. Exactly similar doctrines had been taught a few years previously by Theodotus, a currier of Byzantium, excommunicated by Victor [A.D. 192-201], with whom, in spite of the absence of any historical proof to that effect, Artemon is popularly classed. [THEODOTIANS.] The new sect met with considerable success, both as regards the number and distinction of those who joined it. Among them was a distinguished confessor named Natalius, who consented for a time to become their bishop; but on being warned of his error by a severe flagellation (attributed to angelic hands) during his sleep, withdrew, and was readmitted to the Church by Zephyrinus [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 28]. Monarchian views however lingered on for more than a century in the Christian Church, being revived by Paul, bishop of Samosata [A.D. 260-270], and afterwards by Photinus, condemned in a synod held A.D. 351.

Artemon, the inventor of this heresy, attempted to solve the mystery of the Trinity and Unity not by supposing, with Praxeas, that Father, Son, and Holy Ghost were three phases of one Divine Monad, but by denying the Divinity of the Second and Third Persons, and accounting for the superior character of Christ by asserting that after His birth, as mere man, a certain portion of the Divine Nature was imparted to him. [BERON.] He also asserted that this view was identical with that of the Roman Christians from the first foundation of their Church till the time of Zephyrinus; yet not only are there no facts on record which support such an assertion, but there are several, such as the excommunication of Theodotus by Victor [vide supra], which are directly incompatible with it. The Artemonites appealed largely to sources external to Christianity, to philosophy and geometry, in support of their peculiar tenets, and their method of proceeding is thus summed up by Eusebius:—

“They presume to alter the Holy Scriptures, to abandon the ancient rule of faith, and to form their opinions according to the subtle precepts of logic. The science of the Church is neglected for the study of geometry, and they lose sight of heaven while they are employed in measuring the earth. Euclid is perpetually in their hands. Aristotle and Theophrastus are the objects of their admiration, and they express an unusual reverence for the works of Galen. Their errors are derived from the abuse of the arts and sciences of the infidels, and they corrupt the simplicity of the Gospel by the refinements of human reason” [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 28].

More than a thousand years afterwards, John Crell, a German Unitarian divine [A.D. 1590-1633], the author of L. M. Artemonii Initium Evangelii Johannis, assumed the title of Artemonite to distinguish himself from the Socinians. [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 28. August. Hæres. xlv. Pseudo-Jerome, de Hæres. xlv. Stemmler, Diatribæ de sect. Artemonit. Schaffhausen, Hist. Artem. et Artemonit.]

ARTOTYRITÆ. A party of the later Phrygian Montanists which used cheese (τυρός) as well as bread (ἄρτος) in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist [Epiph. Hær. xlix.; August. Hær. xxviii]. The primitive offerings, they argued, were of the fruit of the flock as well as of the fruit of the ground, and cheese was their symbol of the former. It might be thought that this fruit of the flock was only presented at the altar, a practice forbidden in Apost. Canon. ii.; but Epiphanius' words can be interpreted only to mean that it was actually introduced into the greater oblation.

Ittigius [de Hæres. p. 257] finds a reference to this custom in the acts of Perpetua and Felicitas. Perpetua is said to have related that she saw in vision an old shepherd milking his flock. He welcomed her, and gave her a morsel of cheese, which she received with joined hands, and ate, while all the bystanders said, Amen. From this she inferred that she was to suffer martyrdom. The inference was drawn, according to Ittigius, from the custom of giving the Viaticum to martyrs, and from the use of cheese by the Artotyritæ. It is supposed therefore that Perpetua was of that sect. But there is a difficulty in the words “de caseo quod mulgebat.” Augustine's report of the vision is that a “buccella lactis,” a mouthful of milk, was given to Perpetua; and one is unwilling to think that Perpetua was of the fanatical sect of the Artotyritæ. Above all, the history of Montanism makes it unlikely that the Artotyritæ existed at Carthage so early as A.D. 202. For which reasons it appears to be more probable that the compiler of the Acts, who was certainly a Montanist, altered the vision to suit the practice of his own party. [See the Acts, with the notes of Holstein and Possinus, in Galland. Bibl. ii. pp. 175, 185.]

ASCITÆ. A fanatical offshoot of the Montanists towards the close of the second century, so called from their holding periodical religious revels, during which they danced on skin or leather bottles [ἀρκοί] and imagined themselves to be fulfilling the words of Holy Scripture, “Neither do men put new wine into old bottles; else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish: but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preserved” [Matt. ix. 17]. They are with great probability identified with the ASCODRUGITÆ.

ASCLEPIODOTIANS. So named from Asclepiodotus, a follower of Theodotus the leather-seller of Byzantium, who, like his master, taught that Christ was a mere man, and who, with his disciples, was excommunicated, c. A.D. 224, by Pope Urban. [THEODOTIANS.]

ASCODRUGITÆ. [ASCODRUGITÆ.] ASCODRUGITÆ. These fanatics appeared first in Galatia towards the close of the second century, in the reign of Commodus [A.D. 180-193]. They have been considered by some to be the same as the ASCITÆ, and by others to be identical with the PASSALORYNCHITES. All agree in connecting them with the followers of Montanus, whom they regarded as the Paraclete, and with whose spirit they imagined themselves to be filled when they danced around a richly-vested inflated wine-skin [ἀρκός] placed on an altar in their fanatical revels. They denied altogether the validity of the Sacraments, saying that grace could not be conferred through material means, and they made justification and sanctification equivalent terms for a knowledge of mysteries which they had borrowed from the Valentinians and Marcosians. The Constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian III. [A.D. 428], for suppressing heresy, names this sect [Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 65]. The tenth constitution of the same title names Tascodrogitæ, a confusion between the name of the present sect and that of the TASCODRUNGITÆ.

ASCODRUPITÆ. [ASCODRUTI.] ASCODRUTI, OR ASCODRUPITÆ. This name might be thought a corruption of the Montanist Ascodrogitæ, but Theodoret reckons the party so called among the Marcosian Gnostics, and describes their practice as the reverse of the Montanist practice. They rejected all outward signs in religion, and consequently renounced even the Sacraments. Perfect spiritual knowledge was their redemption [Theod. Hær. fab. i. 10]. Origen [Περὶ Εὐχῆς] mentions such as these, men who take away all that can be perceived by the senses, and use neither baptism nor Eucharist.

ASCOPHITES. A section of the ARCHONTICS, who are spoken of by Theodoret as having arisen about A.D. 173. They are alleged to have rejected the Old Testament Scriptures, to have denied the use of good works, and to have destroyed the sacred vessels in churches through hatred of the Holy Eucharist. [Theod. Hær. fab. i. 10.]

ASSOCIATE SYNOD. [BURGHERS. SECESSION.]

ASSOCIATE PRESBYTERY, CONSTITUTIONAL. [ANTIBURGHERS.]

ASSURITANS. One of the many small and obscure sects of Donatists. They rose in the reign of Constantius II. while Liberius was Pope [c. A.D. 358], and are mentioned by St. Augustine as having been condemned by the Council of Bagai or Vaga in Numidia [A.D. 394], which was attended by three hundred and ten Donatist bishops [contr. Epist. Parmen. lib. iii. sec. 29].

ASTATHIANS [ἀσθηται, called in Latin "Instabiles"]. This was a name given to the followers of a certain Sergius, who rose in Phrygia, beyond whose limits the sect never extended, in the earlier part of the ninth century, and who received the greater part of the Manichean errors. They met with some encouragement from the Emperor Nicephorus [A.D. 802-811], but were suppressed by his successor Michael Rhangabes [A.D. 811-813]. They have been at various times identified with the Antiganians, mentioned by Theophanes, and by some French writers [Père Goar, &c.], with the wandering bodies of "Bohemians" and "Egyptians" which appeared in France during the Middle Ages.

ASTROLOGERS. [MATHEMATICI.]

ATHEISTS. Those who deny the existence of God [ἀθεῖς]. Such denial is rarely, however, formulated into a statement of belief in the absolute non-existence of Deity, and Atheism in its strict sense can hardly be said to have existed except in the gross Materialism of some benighted savages. The dualism of spirit and matter is elsewhere universally acknowledged; and in that spirit there is always something more or less divine. Believers in a divine principle will sometimes apply the term to those who do not symbolize with the same religious idea as their own. Thus those who accept the teaching of revelation often look upon all without the pale of the Church as Atheists; whereas there is no Atheism in such a system as that which Plato taught, and thereby, directly or indirectly, leavened heathenism before and after the day of Christ. The heathen on the other hand denounced the Christian brotherhood as Atheists because they refused to burn incense on the altars of paganism. When heresy openly attacked the Church, its most virulent exponent, the Arian, was emphatically termed "Atheist," as denying the true divinity of Christ; also as being delivered over to Satan under the excommunication of the Church, and therefore cut off from the people of God. Similarly, the various forms of philosophic thought that substitute the deductions of human reason, with respect to the spiritual principle that is supreme, for the more plain and intelligible teaching of the Bible, are often classed under one wide category of Atheism. If we except Materialism, an outflow from the hylozoic principle of Epicurus, which may be traced back to Moschus [Cudworth, Int. Syst.], according to Strabo contemporary with the Trojan war; if we except also the wild ravings of Comte and his deification of Humanity as "le Grand Etre," which certainly reject all notion of a God; all else have believed in a spiritual principle greater and mightier than matter, often, however, antecedently coeternal with matter, and which, like matter, would never have an end.

I. That which was formally called "Atheism" is now seen to be "Pantheism," a term which in Cudworth may generally be substituted for the former. Yet Pantheism is virtually Atheism, for the notion of Personality gives a broad mark of distinction between Theism and Pantheistic Atheism. A divine principle that is impersonal clearly can have no sympathy with man in his trials and sorrows, and therefore can be no object of love and adoration. The life of man under such a system could in no sense be redeemed from Atheism. That Being alone is to be termed God who can hear prayer, and bind his creatures by wise laws, and reward or punish according to their obedience or rebellion. Pantheism therefore, practically, is nothing else than Atheism; it has no belief in a personal deity overruling the affairs of the world, as divine Providence, and therefore it is atheistic. Thus in modern days the great contest without the Church, though often aided on the side of Rationalism from within it, has not been between various forms of Atheism, but between Theism on the one side and Pantheism on the other. Theism believes in a spirit superior to matter, and so does Pantheism; but the spirit of Theism is self-conscious, and therefore personal and of individual existence, a nature per se, and upholding all things by an active control; while Pantheism believes in spirit that is of a higher nature than brute matter, but is a mere unconscious principle of life, impersonal, irrational as the brute matter that it quickens; receiving the law of its existence from necessity, and wholly bound by it; its highest manifestation being the intellect of an aggregate manhood. Between these two, but nearer to Pantheistic Atheism, lies Deism, which adopts the Stoic notion of a passive Deity, eternally removed from all concern about the lower world of its creation; and therefore in no respect an object for man's adoring regard. The Deism of Hobbes was essentially atheistic, as regards any moral control of the creature.

II. Atheism thus understood has its objective and its subjective sides; objectively it is engendered from without by theoretical and subtle reasonings, having for their object the uprooting of faith from every heart, and the setting up of the abomination of desolation in the temple of every soul. Such were those numerous publications that made their appearance in Paris about the middle of the last century, and gave expression to Atheism as the latent principle of Materialism. [Buckle, H. of Civil. in Engl.] Baron Holbach, about that time, a wealthy native of Heidesheim in the Palatinate [b. A.D. 1723, d. A.D. 1789], having established himself in a noble mansion at Paris, formed the nucleus of a clique of free-thinkers afterwards famous as the Encyclopédistes. They embodied the active principle of all the Materialism and Atheism which preceded, and in no slight degree prepared the way for, the old French Revolution of 1790. Such were Diderot, Duclos, Helvetius, Marmontel, Grimm, Laharpe, Condorcet, Raynal, and for a time at least Rousseau, d'Alembert, and Buffon. Numerous atheistical pamphlets and papers, with translations of English Deistical treatises, were issued by this fraternity, printed chiefly at the Baron's expense, and generally anonymously. He himself, however, was the author, as it was said, of nearly fifty pieces; for which services he was duly honoured with their honorary diploma by the Universities of Mannheim, Berlin, and St. Petersburg. The famous Système de la Nature, ou des lois du monde physique et moral, appeared [A.D. 1770] as a posthumous work of Mirabeau, Secretary of the Academy, but was composed in reality by Holbach, La Grange, or Grimm, or by a staff of writers, which was more probably the case. [Dict. of Doctr. and Hist. THEOLOGY, ATHEISM.] Its tone is that of a materialistic Atheism. There is nothing in existence, it declares, save matter and motion, existing as attraction and repulsion, physical and moral. The laws of motion are eternal and invariable. Man is altogether material. Thought and will are mere modifications of cerebral matter. Belief in God and of the soul's existence are fallacies arising from a mistaken distinction of matter and spirit. Man is no more free than he is immortal. Self-interest lies at the bottom of every human action, and of all laws and morals. Failing to account for the origin of matter and motion, there is a petitio principii throughout the book. Other atheistical productions were professedly written by Holbach—Le Christianisme dévoilé [1758], and his Histoire Critique de Jesus-Christ, which appeared soon after the Système de la Nature. He died in the first year of the Revolution [A.D. 1789].

The era of infidelity had now set in, and the march of Atheism became rapid and uninterrupted. Everything suggestive of religion in public and civil life was roughly torn away and replaced by the utterances of Atheism. The wayside crosses were demolished; the emblem of private devotion, the rosary, was interdicted; and under the new republican calendar the Lord's Day was abrogated, and the decades of each month were the only holidays. In the end religion, stripped of every accessory of honour, of every attribute of life, was formally proscribed as the foe of equality and liberty, and Atheism was openly proclaimed in the National Assembly. The Cathedral of Notre-Dame was desecrated by a solemn renunciation of the Christian religion, and by its re-dedication as the Temple of Reason [Nov. 10th, A.D. 1793]. A woman, the lowest of the low, was borne along the streets in a triumphal car, impersonating the Goddess of Reason, and enthroned upon the high altar of the cathedral, where hymns were sung and incense burned in her honour. As the crowning act of all this horrible wickedness, the Bible was burnt in public by the hangman. Thenceforth it was accepted as the creed of France, that there is no God and no Providence; and as a public avowal of the persuasion that there is no future life, an inscription was placed over the entrance of each cemetery, more dreadful than the "Lasciate ogni speranza" of Dante—"Death is an eternal sleep." "The reign of Atheism," let it never be forgotten, was the "reign of Terror." But the abyss of wretchedness was too horrible even for the red republic of 1793. Atheism could not be endured long by the human spirit; and on May 7th, A.D. 1794, Robespierre, dripping with the blood of his victims, constituted himself the priest of Deism; and induced the National Assembly to pass a resolution to the effect that for the future the existence of a Supreme Being should be asserted; that belief in the immortality of the soul should be re-established as an article of Gallican faith; and that a solemn festival in honour of the Supreme God should be holden. The reaction of society, even in this miserable degree, was a type of the reaction that has always given to the dying atheist the fearful anticipation of the worm that dieth not, the first scathing foretaste of the fire that never can be quenched. The cowardice of Shelley in the storm at sea, and his horror of conscience, only more dreadful in his last moments when actually struggling for the dear life: the dying bed of Voltaire, so dreadful that his nurse would never after tend a dying infidel; the curses before which his atheistic friends took flight; the shrieks of terror that his doctor could only compare with the agony of Orestes, "furiis agitur:" also the close of the infidel Paine's life, in alternate prayer to the God whom he had defied, and in its reaction of blasphemy, his utter desertion by God and man—these are the encouragements Atheism holds out to its disciples, and which may convince any reasonable intellect that it is the fool and the fool only who can "say in his heart there is no God."

III. Atheism, in its subjective phase, is seen in the historian of Atheism—Maréchal; who, from some misfortune perhaps of early association, accepted his no-creed as a Turk or a Jew accepts the religion under which he is born. An account of his Dictionnaire des Athées is given in the DICTIONARY OF DOCTRINAL AND HISTORICAL THEOLOGY, ATHEISM.

But there is a subjective Atheism lurking among all imperfectly instructed masses; an Atheism that crops up while men sleep, and occupies the soul by an approach so stealthy as to be imperceptible. It is of such that Job says, "They meet with darkness in the day-time, and grope in the noon-day as in the night" [Job v. 14], who living under the clear light of the Sun of Righteousness, deny the existence of God, because in their lives they have never known Him. For there is a moral as well as an intellectual Atheism; an obliquity of judgment in those who, without troubling themselves with speculative subtleties and sophistical arguments, are possessed with the evil heart of unbelief, and, without talking themselves into Atheism, act it. Faith and a good conscience are inseparable; the carnal heart is always more or less dark with unbelief. It may not be the prey of any active form of infidelity, which implies some exercise of the judgment and of reasoning, however wrong, but it is the blank Atheism of a heart living without God in the world. It results principally from negative conditions of the soul and conscience; commencing in early life with the neglect of positive discipline in the ways of religion and moral training; fostered by a spirit rendered gross by self-indulgence or by the continuous pursuit of gain; the cowardice of shrinking from self-sacrifices that are painful to flesh and blood; and lazily sinking without an effort in the "thick clay" of worldly vice and folly; such sluggishness has its natural issue in practical Atheism. The moral coward and the unbelieving, δειλοί καὶ ἄπιστοι, are in the same category of condemnation. Akin to these negative qualities, that effectually blind the soul to all consciousness of God's presence, is a disregard of truth, the natural growth of the self-corrupting heart; the strong delusion that, as God's judgment upon sin, compels it to believe a lie [2 Thess. ii. 11], and act the lie it believes.

But practical Atheism is not only of this negative character; its growth is also forced on by the plastic energy of evil, that is of the very essence of man's fallen nature. The will of Christ was wholly one with the will of the Father; that will is our high exemplar. The standard of right, which humanity at large by its sense, whatever may be its practice, shews to be true, is the manifestation of God's will to the collective soul of that humanity; the perverse will that starts aside from this general sense of humanity is altogether opposed to God's will; and as it is only by being brought under subjection to the will of God that man's will recovers its spontaneous action, so there is an irresistible logic in the life, and obedience to the divine will is a virtual acknowledgment, while disobedience is the denial, of God's being. The active tendency of the unregenerate will is atheistic. It is a perverse will; ἄπιστος καὶ διεστραμμένη [Matt. xvii. 17] are its coupled attributes. Whatever suits not its prejudices and presentiments it rejects; the sight of the eye and the hearing of the ear have a reality in them that overrules the inner teaching of the hidden sense of faith. The presence of God does not come home to the senses, and that presence is in practice denied. It is a proud, imperious will. Pride is the very essence of Satanic being; the heady height (ὑψωμα) "that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God" [2 Cor. x. 5]. Pride too is vile before man as being the outcropping of untruthfulness, of which it is only a phase. It fills a man with self-conceit, and is as a false varnish concealing internal defects with a specious assumption of superior wisdom. It is the soul of every atheistic paradox, and treats with scorn the homely teaching of an everyday faith. Pride knows no retreading of any path of error; but to whatever conclusion it may be led it is prepared to justify its issues. Where pride is the active principle of a man's unbelief, "there is more hope of a fool than of him;" more hope of him who has learned the parrot-talk of Atheism than of the heart which is darkened by a pride that can never confess its erring. "Ye say ye see, therefore your sin remaineth."

But there is no school of Atheism so sure of doing its work as a vicious life flowing from the various germs of evil above noticed; in works denying the existence of a moral Governor of the universe. "Infidelity," says Barrow, "hath a larger territory than we suppose; many infidels do lurk under the mask of a Christian profession. It is not the name of a Christian, nor the badges of our religion that make a Christian, more than a cowl doth make a monk, or the beard a philosopher. There may be a creed in the mouth where there is no faith in the heart, and a cross impressed on the forehead of an infidel. . . . Is he not an infidel who denieth God? such a renegade is every one that liveth profanely, as St. Paul teacheth us [Tit. i. 16]. And have we not many such renegades? If not, what meaneth that monstrous dissoluteness of life, that horrid profaneness of discourse, that strange neglect of God's service, or desolation of God's law? Where such luxury, such lewdness, such avarice, such uncharitableness, such universal carnality doth reign, can faith be there? Can a man believe there is a God and so affront Him? can he believe that Christ reigneth in heaven and so despise His laws? Can a man believe a judgment to come and so little regard his life? a heaven and so little seek it? a hell and so little shun it? Faith, therefore, is not so rife; infidelity is more common than we take it to be; every sin hath a spice of it, some sins smell rankly of it" [Serm. i. on the Creed]. It may reasonably be asked, were these words only suitable to cavalier consciences, and have they no vis viva at the present day? Such practical Atheism is a far more active agent in the dissemination of infidelity than the productions of all the infidel presses in the world.¹

IV. The present is scarcely the occasion for exhibiting the antidote of Atheism. This must chiefly be administered in the way of prevention: by taking care that the young are led to a knowledge of God and of His ways, by the training of a religious education, and by the force of religious example in the Christian home. If Atheism is precipitated in the social cauldron from the presence of incompatible elements with no affinity for each other; by the heartlessness of the rich, hatred and envy on the part of the poor, and selfishness everywhere; these elements must be subdued and eliminated, if the practical Atheism that they engender is to be killed down in the rising generation. Where there is no faith in humanity, there can be little faith in the Disposer of the various estates and conditions of men. If sin is the reproach of any nation, Atheism is pre-eminently so, for it is caused not merely by the viciousness of the individual intellect, but by the general tone of society that surrounds it, and has set in motion those discordant vibrations that in the end become the habitual jarring of the evil heart of unbelief. All have their work to do in the reparative process. Atheism must be rooted out from the great population-beds, "by pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, by the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left" [2 Cor. vi. 6, 7].

ATHINGANI [ἀ-θιγγάνω]. A title bestowed in the eighth century upon a sect of Paulicians which rose in Asia Minor in the reign of Constantine Pogonatus [A.D. 668-685]. They began to be so called in the days of the Empress Irene [A.D. 797-802], when they acquired the name of Attingians or "Separates," because they rejected image-worship, with the veneration of the cross and of relics, and cut themselves off from all connection with the hierarchy of the dominant party. They were also called Paulo-Johannites. Their distinctive practice, apart from other Paulician heretics, appears to have been that of baptizing with the words "I am the living water," instead of the Catholic formula.

ATHOCIANS. Heretics of the thirteenth century who rejected the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. [Cent. Magd., cent. xv. 5.]

ATTINGIANS. [ATHINGANI.]

AUDÆANS. [AUDIANS.]

AUDIANS. About the time of the Council of Nicæa, Audius (or Audæus) formed his sect.¹ He was a Syrian of Mesopotamia, an upright and zealous man, led into schism through the workings of intemperate zeal, and the assertion of self-will. He took upon himself the office of censor of Church morality, reproving to their face bishops and clergy whom he considered to be living covetously or luxuriously. He was beaten, and suffered other indignities. Unable to bear them he separated himself from the Church, and was irregularly consecrated bishop by a bishop who had joined his schism. His adherents adopted a monastic life both in town and country. In order to have specific points of difference from the Church they had left, they advanced in opposition to Church doctrine the heretical tenet of Anthropomorphism, and in opposition to Church practice, as established by the Council of Nicæa, the custom of Quartodecimanism. [ANTHROPOMORPHITES. QUARTODECIMANS.]

In addition to these, Theodoret charges the Audians with adopting from Manichæism the tenet that the Creator was not the Former of fire and darkness [Hist. Eccl. iv. 10; comp. Isa. xlv. 7]. But this doctrine was not avowed by them.

In his old age Audius was banished by Constantius to Scythia, where he converted many of the Goths, and established monasteries of strict and admirable rule. Here he remained till his death, the time of which is not known.

Many bishops carried on the sect in Mesopotamia, Uranius being their chief. There were also bishops of the sect among the Goths. A local persecution drove them from the country of the Goths, and in very much diminished numbers they collected in Chalcis in Syria and by the Euphrates. The sect disappeared by the end of the fifth century. [Epiph. Hær. lxx. Theod. Hist. Eccl. iv. 10. August. Hær. l., who calls them Vadiani, and states that some assert them to have been in Egypt in communion with the Catholic Church; Prædest. l., where Zenon, a Syrian bishop, is named as their chief opponent.]

AUGSBURG, CONFESSION OF. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

AUGUSTINIANS. The name by which the Jansenists were accustomed to designate themselves in the early days of their history. [JANSENISTS.]

AZYMITES. A designation used by controversialists of the Eastern Church for those who consecrate unleavened bread for the Holy Eucharist.

BAANITES. A name given to some local sect of the Paulicians in Armenia, from a leader named Baanes, a disciple and successor of Josephus Epaphroditus, about the year 810. [Petrus Sicul. Hist. Manich. Baronius, ad Ann. 810.]

BACON, ROGER. He was born at Ilchester, A.D. 1214, and became a Franciscan monk at Oxford, studying, probably, at Brasenose Hall. He afterwards went to Paris, the Athens of the age, where he graduated as doctor, and had Robert Gros-tête as fellow-student and friend. He is the connecting-link between the scholasticism of the Middle Ages and the philosophy of Europe in modern times. He endeavoured to recall the learned from their blind idolatry of Aristotle, then only known in faulty Latin translations of a corrupt text. If he had his own way, he said, he would burn every copy: "Si haberem potestatem super libros Aristotelis, ego facerem omnes cremari, quia tantum est temporis amissio studere in illis, et causa erroris multiplicati" [comp. Theol. i. 2]. But this refers only to those parts that subserved the dialectics of the Schools. For Aristotle, as Peripatetic philosopher, he had a profound veneration. Wherever he suspected the taint of error his hand was against every man, "nullum ordinem excludo," and, in consequence, every man's hand was against him. Even the "angelic" Thomas was "vir erroneus et famosus." The work that he prepared by command of Clement IV. and transmitted to him, was intended to suggest to his patron the necessity of reform, that the onward progress of Antichrist might be stayed.

Bacon was thoroughly convinced of the importance of geographical and ethnological science, and of an accurate knowledge of learned languages and grammar; while, with a knowledge of living languages, missionaries, he said, might be sent forth, who could declare to savages the marvellous works of God in their own tongue; the Greek Church might become one with the Roman through the fraternity of a common speech; and all mankind might be made one family by commerce and the amity of familiar intercourse. Even comparative philology was dimly present to his mind. These were notions that had never yet been heard in the Schools, where the language of the Vulgate and the mass was deemed to be all-sufficient. Philosophy as yet had grown only upon three stocks of the human family—the Hebrew, the

Mathematics he held to be the principal science, which had precedence of the rest, inasmuch as the spiritual and eternal is only to be learned by the bodily and finite. In this there is a touch of the sensualism of Locke and of the method of Comte. Ethics, he said, had never yet been taught in the Schools as it had been of old. The ethics of Aristotle, the treatises of Seneca, the noble and exalted moral teaching of Cicero, might well put to shame the far inferior wisdom of contemporary guides. Pagan men, without the light of grace and faith, had attained a height by the mere force of reason, that had as yet been inaccessible to Christian doctors. If the vitium originis of the Schools was a love for disputation and endless wrangling, it was to be cured by diverting the attention of the learned to sounder studies in the way of experimental philosophy. This was the queen of sciences, that investigates the truth for itself, and is not indebted to antecedent systems. Bacon lays down rules for the prosecution of such studies that can scarcely fail to have helped forward the "Advancement of learning" after four more centuries had passed away. Experience is the true handmaid of knowledge. Authority is valueless unless it gives its reasons, "non sapit nisi detur ejus ratio." Reasoning can only amount to demonstration when its results are verified by experience and practice. We see in such statements the same independence of spirit, and demand for clear intelligible reasoning, the same love of order and simplicity, which raised the name of Descartes to the highest rank, and enabled Lord Bacon to lay the foundation of modern philosophy. If Roger seems, however, to depreciate authority, he means not the authority which God has committed to his Church, or that which results from merit and worth, but that which is the assumption of blind prejudice, ambition, and ignorance. Of the authority due to the Fathers he says that they not only permit to us the correction of whatever is spoiled by human ignorance, but they themselves advance statements which afterwards they with humility retract. If they had lived to time present they would have improved and altered many things that are still allowed to exist.

Bacon boldly laid to the charge of Schoolmen a profound ignorance of sacred and profane antiquity, which prevented them from detecting the various fallacies of the day; and he accused them of moving in a vicious circle of abstractions, which made them utterly incapable of appreciating the real and the natural; hence that the spirit of the Schools, troubling itself so little about the works of nature and of God, was cramped and illiberal, captious and artificial, disputatious and pedantic. If Bacon did no good in his generation, and much harm to himself by these invectives, he at least prepared the minds of succeeding generations for the emancipation of the human spirit from scholastic trammels. Bacon seems scarcely to have troubled himself to ascertain the difference between realism and nominalism, but of the two he favoured the latter class of opinion, though without the precision of Roscellin or the greater subtlety of Abelard; but he was no partisan. In fact he was too correctly orthodox in his theology, too ardent a maintainer of the sovereign authority of the Pope, and too earnest an advocate of the supremacy of canon over civil law, to run in the same groove with the early advocates of nominalism. Like all his predecessors of the Schools he classed philosophy and theology together; they both formed one truth, and were both equally derived from the reasonable Word that was made flesh and dwelt among us. He ascribed the highest authority, over the Church and everything else, to the teaching of Holy Writ, and would have the laity also study it in the original languages. All wisdom, he said, is contained substantially in Scripture. Its development is canon law and philosophy. Nearly all the evil that abounds in the world arises from our ignorance of Scripture. His strictures upon the unsatisfactory condition of the Vulgate text caused Hugh de St. Caro to apply himself to its purification. If ever the holy men of old, or the wiser spirits among the heathen, by their teaching anticipated revealed truth, it was because the traditions of paradise had never quite died out: the torch transmitted from hand to hand had never been wholly obscured by the smoke of this world's folly.

Bacon's reform of the calendar, proposed by him in earnest terms to Pope Clement IV., was only realized three centuries later, A.D. 1582, under Gregory XIII. His knowledge of astronomy enabled him to detect the error of the Julian year, which was longer than the astronomical year by about eleven minutes; in 128 years this would amount to an entire day, which must then be subtracted. Similarly the equinoxes were observed to fall earlier by a day in every 124 years. The error had its use in chronology, for it gave the exact date for calculating the lapse of time since Ptolemy, who, A.D. 140, declared March 22nd to be the equinoctial day; but it was a reproach to astronomy, and a constant cause of error. The lunations were no less faulty; in 306 years the error of the calendar amounted to an entire day, and in 4266 years, the moon entering on her first quarter, would be marked in the calendar as at the full. Infidel philosophers, he said, Arabs and Jews, regard with amazement the stupidity of Christian astronomers, and the carelessness of Christian prelates, who order the Church feasts by so fluctuating a scale of error. In other respects also, Bacon shewed the faultiness of the Ptolemean theory, and threw out hints that were turned to account by Copernicus.

In optics, Bacon was the precursor of Newton; he himself profiting by the discoveries of Arab philosophers. Yet he first made known the delicate mechanism of the eye, and indicated the possible use of the retina. He showed that Aristotle was in error when he deemed the action of light to be instantaneous; the movement of which, however inconceivable might be its rapidity, is still appreciable [Opus Maj. 298, 300].

The light of the stars, he said, was not derived, but they shine by their own brilliancy. His theory of shooting stars and meteors made a near approach to modern notions, when he said that they were no true stars, but comparatively of small bulk, "corpora parvæ quantitatis;" that they traverse the earth's atmosphere, and ignite by the rapidity of their movement. The principles of perspective were not unknown to Bacon. The invention of telescopic and microscopic lenses is attributed to him, and when he presented his Opus Majus to Clement IV. by John of Paris, he sent at the same time a lens, with instructions for its use: "Johannes portavit crystallum sphericum ad experiendum, et instruxi eum in demonstratione et figuracione hujus rei occultæ" [Opus Tertium, c. 31].

He first indicated the refractive power of the air, and the rationale of the rainbow. It was in strict keeping with the spirit of his age, that his vast erudition and sagacious power of observation should be compromised by a belief in judicial astrology, and in the transmutation of metals by alchemy. The composition of gunpowder was among the secrets of his laboratory.

Bacon more than once launches startling anticipations of the possible discoveries of science. Mechanism, he says, will be invented, when nature shall have been compelled to reveal her secret laws, whereby the largest vessels will be propelled without rowers, and more rapidly under the guidance of a single man than with a full crew. Carriages will roll along with an inconceivable swiftness without a team. Machines will fly through the air, and in the midst the guide will sit who, by touching a spring, will cause huge wings to unfold themselves and generate a bird-like movement. A small implement, a few inches long and wide, will suffice to raise and lower enormous weights, and enable a man to lift himself and others from the lowest depths to the clouds, and to descend again at his will. Another implement will have such tractile force as to enable a single operator to draw a thousand persons along. One apparatus will be devised for walking at the bottom of the sea, another for swimming and floating on its surface without risk of sinking. Bridges will be thrown across rivers without piers or arches; and to such marvels of science there will be no apparent limit. [De Mirab. and Tr. de Mathemat. See also Saisset, Prec. et Disc. de Descartes, 38.]

Bacon had the credit with his contemporaries of having invented a burning mirror that could consume an entire army, and a brazen head which gave responses to his questionings upon the deep secrets of nature and futurity. How may a rampart be thrown round England? was a question propounded by Bacon and one of his experts. The oracle was silent, and they returned to their alembics. Presently it spoke, but attention was absorbed in their work, and the utterance was for ever lost. Saisset observes sarcastically, "Plus d'un bon Anglais de nos jours se prendra a regretter que la tête d'airain de frère Bacon n'ait pas été conservée; et qu'elle ne puisse pas dire son secret a l'oreille attentive de Lord Palmerston. Que d'alarmes et d'argent épargnés a l'amirauté Anglaise! Que de soucis de moins pour M. Gladstone!"

Bacon's depreciation of the scholastic system drew down upon him a bitter and life-long persecution. He was accused of dealing with familiar spirits in his observatory tower at Oxford.¹ He only studied his Moorish philosophers, it was said, and his followers of Mahomet, for the purposes of necromancy; he could be no true Christian who meddled with black arts; his astrology alone condemned him. The rulers of his convent at length sent him for trial to Paris, "propter quasdam novitates suspectas," where he was placed under rigid surveillance and harsh discipline that continued for ten years [A.D. 1257-67]. He gives a touching description of these trials in the introduction to his Opus Tertium, a work recently recovered by M. Cousin from an ancient MS. at Douai. His books and mathematical instruments were taken from him, and he was forbidden to write and, worse than all, to teach; for, like Seneca, his only ambition was "discere ut doceam." The mildest discipline, if he resented such treatment, was solitary confinement on a bread and water diet. Hope revived within him when Guy Foulques, who, as Papal legate in England, had heard of his fame, was made Pope, with the title of Clement IV. Bacon having been detected in writing to him was at first treated with greater severity; but afterwards released, when he returned to England. Unfortunately for him Clement died the next year, and was succeeded by Nicolas III., who owed his elevation to the influence of Jerome of Ascoli, general of the Franciscan order, a narrow-minded, inflexible bigot. Bacon's long imprisonment then followed, from A.D. 1278 to 1292. He died in A.D. 1294, having, in the last years of his life, composed a Summary of Theology.

Such was Roger Bacon, termed by his contemporaries "Doctor mirabilis," all persecution of the object of their wonder notwithstanding. And truly he was a wonderful character, whether we consider the extent of his varied knowledge, or his proud spirit of independence and heroic energy. He first indicated in its dawn the brilliant future that awaited scientific induction; daring nobly, and at the cost of personal safety, to stem the tide of prejudice that opposed the onward progress of the human spirit. He was content to be the victim of contemporary ignorance, if only he might be an associate of the wise in every age. [Baconi Opus Majus, ed. Jebb, Lond. A.D. 1733. BACULARII. A sect of the Anabaptists who considered it sinful to carry any other arms than a staff, alleging that the Scriptures altogether forbid the use of the sword to Christians.

BAIOLENSES. [BAGNOLENSES.]

BAIUS, or BAJUS. The Latinized name of a theologian of Louvain named Michael de Bay, whose theories respecting grace and predestination were the foundation of Jansenism.

Baius was born at Melin in the territory of Aeth in the year 1513, and having been educated at Louvain, became Professor of Theology there, A.D. 1551. He adopted an independent line of teaching instead of that ordinarily received from the Schoolmen, founding it especially on the Pauline Epistles as interpreted by St. Augustine. The pronounced Augustinianism of Baius excited opposition from the Franciscans, who brought his lectures to the notice of the Sorbonne. Eighteen propositions taken from them were condemned by that body in A.D. 1560, and were declared heretical, but Baius still continued in his office at Louvain. In 1563 he was sent as delegate to the Council of Trent, where he took a prominent part in the discussions which took place, and where he raised up fresh opponents, who, shortly after his return to Louvain, placed seventy-six propositions taken from his works before the Pope Pius V. These propositions were condemned by the Pope in the year 1567, but in the Bull of condemnation "Ex omnibus afflictionibus," the name of Baius was not mentioned. He therefore continued in his office of Divinity Professor, and even became Dean of St. Peter's at Louvain, and Chancellor of the University. But much opposition was raised against him by the Jesuits, and at the instigation of one of them, Francis Tolet, the Bull of Pius V. was confirmed in the year 1580 by Gregory XIII. Baius submitted to this condemnation, retracted his opinions that he might obtain absolution from Cardinal Granvella the Legate, and took no prominent part in theological controversy for the rest of his life, which lasted until A.D. 1589. He thus justified the character given of him even by his opponents, that of a humble-minded man who sought truth and the good of the Church rather than the spread of his own opinions: "Micheale Baio," said Tolet, "nihil doctius, nihil humilius."

The condemned propositions of Baius maintained the theory that man might have merited eternal life if he had continued in a state of innocence, continuing in that state even without the assistance of Divine Grace; that after the Fall all his works which are not done under the influence of Divine Grace are sinful works; that all works whatever are sinful unless done from pure love of God; that all men being born in sin it is impossible that penance by itself can offer satisfaction for sin, though it may do so when united with the satisfaction offered by our Lord. Some of these opinions were revived by Jansen and by the Quietists, and they were still taught at Louvain and Douai even after Baius had recanted. [JANSENISTS.]

BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY. In the year 1717 there met in literary contest the three great parties into which England was divided; the party which had transferred the allegiance of the nation to the foreign Prince William of Orange, and had attempted to reduce the Church of England to the platform of foreign Protestantism; the members of the Church who had submitted to William, but had defeated the attempt to alter the constitution of the Church; and the Nonjurors who had set up a rival episcopate.

Hoadly, Bishop of Bangor (from whom the controversy takes its name), Nathanael Marshall, William Law, all three well known in English Church history, may be named as representatives of the three disputing parties. The controversy was long and very voluminous. Deeply important as its topics were, and that for all times, so much of merely personal and temporary interest entered into their handling, that the writings of the disputants are now in general unreadable. Some tracts are still read by students, such as Kennett's on lay deprivations, and Law's on the priesthood and its powers, but it may be safely assumed that few living men have read, or would or could read, a connected series of the tracts. Fortunately there was published in 1719, and continued in 1720, a systematic Account of all the Considerable Pamphlets; and without adopting the criticisms and judgments of the writer, we may by the list he gives form a sufficient notion of the course the controversy took. Beginning with the main ecclesiastical point of the Nonjuring question, the validity or invalidity of lay deprivations of bishops, it widened to the general consideration of the nature of the Church of Christ, and of the constitution of the Church of Christ as established in this country, branching off on the one hand into the topics of the sacraments, Church ordinances, Church communion, and the priesthood; and on the other hand into the topics of religious sincerity, the sacramental test, the Test and Corporation Acts, and ecclesiastical authority; with episodes some purely personal, some of the rights and powers of Convocation, some of appeals to foreign Protestants.

The dispute began when the Government at the time of the Scotch rebellion seized many copies of Hickes' Collection of Papers, 1716, in which was claimed obedience to the deprived bishops, and consequently the Church of England under Tenison and Wake was charged with schism. The first stage then regarded the Nonjurors' pretensions. Bennett¹ attacked them. His answer was not thought satisfactory, and was therefore commented on, and a reply on other grounds made to the Nonjurors by Pierce² and others. Hoadly wrote anonymously. But the pamphlets most deserving attention are Bennett's Letters to the Bishop of Carlisle on the nomination and deprivation of English prelates. Sykes³ also took part. Then appeared Hoadly's Preservative against the Principles and Practices of the Nonjurors. Marshall,⁴ from the status of a conforming Churchman, disputed some of Hoadly's arguments, and answered the Nonjurors' charge of schism. Sykes appeared for Hoadly. Then came Hoadly's sermon, The Nature of the Kingdom of Christ. Before Convocation could act Snape⁵ replied, and amidst a cloud of anonymous pamphlets Hoadly rejoined. This second stage, "On the nature of Christ's kingdom," was carried on by Burnet and Whitby, Trapp⁶ defending Snape. An episode occurred upon Bennett's being charged with having advised Hoadly regarding his sermon [see Life of Bennett, p. 214]; and a second concerning the character of De la Pillonnière, a converted Jesuit living with Hoadly. Convocation moved, and a Committee of the Lower House represented that the tendency of the doctrines and positions contained in the Sermon and the Preservative was,—first, to subvert all government and discipline in the Church of Christ, and to reduce His kingdom to a state of anarchy and confusion; secondly, to impugn and impeach the regal supremacy in causes ecclesiastical and the authority of the legislature to enforce obedience in matters of religion by civil sanctions. Sherlock, Master of the Temple, having signed this report, was accused of inconsistency, and a side-quarrel ensued between him and Sykes. Moss¹ defended the report, Hoadly replied to the report, and the controversy raged in attack and defence of the Committee; the Prolocutor, Dean Stanhope, Cannon,² and Dawson³ being for the defence.

Meanwhile Law had answered Hoadly's fresh reply to Snape, the special point to which he addressed himself being Hoadly's assertion, "When you are secure of your integrity before God, this will lead you not to be afraid of the terrors of men, or the vain words of regular and uninterrupted successions, authoritative benediction, excommunications, nullity or validity of God's ordinances to the people, upon account of niceties and trifles, or any other the like dreams." Burnet defended Hoadly. Law's Three Letters are the most valuable of all the tracts. They were reprinted in 1812 in The Scholar Armed.

Sherlock turned the controversy in the Convocation branch to the particular point of the Test and Corporation Acts, the repeal of which Hoadly had urged. Sykes and Pierce stood up for Hoadly. This brought up the question of occasional conformity, and of course included the question of a sacramental test.

Some sharp skirmishing took place concerning a letter to a Zurich professor containing bitter invectives against Hoadly. It was said to have been written by Wake. Gordon, the author of the Independent Whig, is said to have written one of the seven pamphlets against the archbishop.

The foregoing is but a very brief statement of the heads of the controversy. It is sufficient, however, to shew its character and importance. The Nonjuring questions and the questions of the Test Acts are now only of historical interest. Of permanent interest is the main subject, the doctrine which, putting forward an alleged sincerity of good intention as all in all, would dissolve the Church as a society, and reduce all its ordinances to mere human inventions. It has so happened, said the Committee of Convocation, that this Right Reverend Bishop, in his extreme opposition to certain unwarrantable pretensions to extravagant degrees of Church power, . . . has not only condemned the abuse, but even denied the use and destroyed the being of those powers, without which the Church as a society cannot subsist, and by which our national constitution next under Christ is chiefly supported. The powers denied and destroyed were, it is notorious, not only powers of government, but also of the valid administration of the sacraments. BAPTISTS. A sect whose distinctive principle is that of administering baptism only to adult persons: baptizing them not to make them children of God, but as a sign that they have become so.

Infant baptism was repudiated by most of the mediæval Anti-Sacerdotalists and by the ANA-BAPTISTS of the Reformation age, from whom have sprung the MENNONITES or German Baptists of a later time. But the sect commonly known by the name of Baptists among English-speaking people is an offshoot of the BROWNISTS or early Independents, and was formed into a distinct community only in the reign of Charles I. Among the Brownists there were always some persons who objected to Infant Baptism, and looked upon it as invalid. These being generally identified with the foreign Anabaptists, were called by the same name, and it is probable that they were converts of the Dutch Anabaptists who emigrated to England in the time of Henry VIII. and in that of Queen Elizabeth. These Brownist Anabaptists, or "Enthusiasts" as they were often called [ENTHUSIASTS], endeavoured at a later date to ally themselves with the Mennonites of Holland, and parties of them emigrated to Amsterdam in the years 1606 and 1608. But for some reason which is not known, the attempt failed, the emigrants formed a separate community at Amsterdam, and not being able to obtain baptism from the Dutch, their leader, John Smith, first baptized himself [SE-BAPTISTS] and then his followers. But there is no historical connection between this English community at Amsterdam, and the later sect of Baptists, beyond the fact that both bodies rejected Infant Baptism, and were both composed of English Puritans.

The true origin of the English Baptists is narrated by one of their founders, William Kiffin, his account being thus printed by Crosby. "There was a congregation of Protestant Dissenters of the Independent persuasion in London, gathered in the year 1616, whereof Mr. Henry Jacob was the first pastor, and after him Mr. John Lathorp, who was their minister at this time. In this society several persons finding that the congregation kept not their first principles of separation, and being also convinced that Baptism was not to be administered to infants, but such only as professed faith in Christ, desired that they might be dismissed from that community, and allowed to form a distinct congregation in such order as was most agreeable to their own sentiments. The Church, considering that they were now grown very numerous, and so more than could in these times of persecution conveniently meet together, and believing also that these persons acted from a principle of conscience and not obstinacy, agreed to allow them the liberty they desired, and that they should be constituted a distinct church, which was performed the 12th of September 1633. And as they believed that baptism was not rightly administered to infants, so they looked upon the baptism they had received in that age as invalid: whereupon most or all of them received a new baptism. Their minister was Mr. John Spilsbury. What number they were is uncertain, because in the mentioning of the names of about twenty men and women it is added 'with divers others.' In the year 1638, Mr. William Kiffin" (the writer of this narrative), "Mr. Thomas Wilson, and others being of the same judgment, were, upon their request, dismissed to the said Mr. Spilsbury's congregation. In the year 1639, another congregation of Baptists was formed whose place of meeting was in Crutched Friars, the chief promoters of which were Mr. Green, Mr. Paul Hobson, and Captain Spencer" [Crosby's Hist. of Eng. Baptists, i. 148]. The same writer also records that the "new baptism" of these early Baptists was effected by communication with the Dutch Menonites. One of their number, Mr. Richard Blunt, being acquainted with the Dutch language, was sent over to Holland, where he was baptized by John Batte; and on his return he baptized Mr. Samuel Blacklock, the two then baptizing others to the number of fifty-three [ibid. i. 101].

From this time the sect spread with some rapidity, but there is no evidence to shew whether all the congregations of Baptists which are soon after found existing originated from that of which the preceding account is given, or whether they were sporadic offshoots from the fermenting bodies of Puritans which had now become so numerous, and which even in the height of their prosperous times were in a constant state of disintegration. Baxter writes, in an early page of his Autobiography, that he made acquaintance with the "Anabaptists" first at Gloucester, where about a dozen young men having conceived opinions against Infant Baptism had been rebaptized [Baxter's Life and Times, pt. i. p. 41]. He was afterwards involved in a controversy with a congregation of the sect which had been formed in a similar manner at Bewdley, within a short distance of the town of Kidderminster, of which he was vicar during the time of the Puritan ascendancy. In 1646, there were said to be forty-six of their congregations in and about London. About the same time also the sect was being developed in the North American colonies by an emigrant priest of the Church of England, named Roger Williams, whose political importance has given him a chapter in American history somewhat similar to that occupied by William Penn [Baneroff's Hist. Unit. States, i. 277-321, ed. 1852].

In 1643, the various congregations of the sect had become sufficiently organized into one body to enable them to hold a representative assembly in London, and at this a "Confession of Faith" was drawn up which was reprinted in 1644 and 1646, and lasted the sect as its standard of doctrine for seventeen years. Large numbers of them enlisted in the Parliamentary army, and the help thus given to the revolutionary party won for the sect a declaration of the Lords and Commons in their favour. This was promulgated in March 1647, in which it was said that "the name of Anabaptism hath indeed contracted much odium by reason of the extravagant principles and practices of some of that name in Germany, tending to the disturbance of the government and peace of all states; which opinions and practice we abhor and detest; but for their opinion against the baptism of infants, it is only a difference about a circumstance of time in the administration of an ordinance wherein, in former ages as well as this, learned men have differed both in opinion and practice. And though we could wish that all men would satisfy themselves and join with us in our judgment and practice in this point; yet herein we hold it fit that men should be convinced by the Word of God, with great gentleness and reason, and not beaten out of it with force and violence." Shortly after this edict of Parliamentary toleration, however, another was issued of a totally different character under Presbyterian influence. This was an ordinance of the Lords and Commons passed on May 2nd, 1648, which declared: "Whosoever shall say that the baptism of infants is unlawful, or that such baptism is void, and that such persons ought to be baptized again, and in pursuance thereof shall baptize any person formerly baptized, or shall say the Church government of Presbytery is antichristian or unlawful, shall, upon conviction by the oath of two witnesses, or by his own confession, be ordered to renounce his said error in the public congregation of the parish where the offence was committed; and in case of refusal, he shall be committed to prison till he find sureties that he shall not publish or maintain the said error any more" [Neale's Hist. of Purit. iii. 375]. They shared, however, in the general moderation with which all religions except the Church were treated by Cromwell, and many of his supporters belonging to the sect, it attained considerable political influence during the time of the Great Rebellion. There were also not a few of them licensed to officiate in the churches from which the clergy had been ejected, and 35 of these were among the 800 (commonly spoken of as 2000) who refused to conform to the customs of the Church at its Restoration, and were hence obliged to give place to the old clergy whom they had ousted, or to others ordained according to the custom of the Church [Stoughton's Eccles. Hist. ii. 242, n. NONCONFORMISTS].

Shortly before the Restoration, a division of the sect had taken place into the General and the Particular Baptists, and this division has been maintained ever since.

GENERAL BAPTISTS, or "Arminian Baptists," are so called because they hold the Arminian doctrine of redemption, instead of the Calvinistic, believing that Christ died to save all men, and not only an elect few. They published a "Confession of Faith," composed of twenty-five articles, in the year 1660, which was reprinted with many more subscriptions in 1691. This marks the time of their separation from the body of the sect, the third and fourth articles setting forth the doctrine of general redemption, the eighth and ninth that of election [Murray's Hist. of Relig. iv. 214, 216,

ed. 1764]. At the Restoration, the General Baptists claimed to be 20,000 in number; but shortly afterwards a large body of them are said to have become followers of BIDDLE the Unitarian. In the following century this portion of the Baptist sect became so largely imbued with Unitarian principles, that they gradually split up into two bodies, those who seceded in 1770 taking the name of the "New Connection of General Baptists," and adopting as their standpoint the original Arminian tenets of the body from which they seceded. The elder fragment of that body, still known as "General Baptists," is now wholly Unitarian. The "New Connection" is believed to number about 200 congregations, and the Unitarian Baptists about 100; but some of these are composed of very few members, lingering on chiefly through the circumstance that their chapels are endowed.

PARTICULAR BAPTISTS represent the original Baptist sect as it first seceded from that of the Brownist or Independents in 1633. They continue to hold the Calvinistic doctrine of "particular redemption," and hence since the secession of the Arminian portion of the sect have distinguished themselves from them by the prefix indicating that dogma. They are again subdivided into two sections on the question of free or strict communion, the "free communionists" admitting to the Lord's Supper those who have been baptized only in infancy, as well as those who have been baptized as adults; while the "strict" or "close communionists" only admit those who have been baptized as adults. These two classes do not, however, form separate sects, congregations of both being admitted into the "Baptist union" (a society for co-operation founded in 1812), as indeed also are those of the New Connection General Baptists. The Particular Baptists are mostly intended when Baptists without any other designation are named.

The Baptists are one of "the three denominations" to which a sort of constitutional recognition has been accorded in the right to present corporate addresses to the Crown (the other two being the Independents and the Presbyterians), and are a numerous and rather influential body among English dissenters. In the whole of Great Britain and Ireland they number about 2,600 places of worship, each having on an average 90 members, 100 Sunday scholars, and being also attended by persons not actually members of the sect but allied with it. The whole number of actual members of the sect amounted in 1871 to 233,675, being fewer by 4000 than in 1870 [Bapt. Handbook, 1872, p. 25]. In the English Colonies there are about 60,000 members, the majority of whom are negroes in the West Indies. In the United States they number 1,400,000.

Within the last fifty years the Baptists have made some vigorous endeavours to provide a more respectable education for their ministers than is common among dissenters. They have as many as ten colleges in England, Wales, and Scotland; and in these about 240 young men receive an elementary education in the learned languages, and a more elaborate training in Calvinistic theology. They have also two Missionary Societies, which together expend about £40,000 annually in India, China, and the West Indies. [Crosby's Hist. Eng. Bapt. Ivimey's Hist. Eng. Bapt. Evans' *Hist. BARBELIOTES. Among the multitude of Gnostics, says Irenæus, who had sprung up "like mushrooms growing out of the ground," there was a sect in Iberia which called themselves after the name of Barbelos, an Æon of the Gnostic mythology, who was the special object of their veneration [Iren. adv. Hæres. xxix.]. This Barbelos, or Barbelo, is mentioned in connection with the Nicolaitanes by Philaster [Hæres. xxxiii.], Augustine [Hæres. vi.], and Epiphanius [Hæres. xxv. 2], and it is supposed that the name is made up of two Hebrew words, בר בעלה [Bar Belah], "the son of the Lady," or else from בר בעל [Bar Bel], "the son of the Lord." This Barbelo they affirmed to be the offspring of the Father, and of a Mother whom some named Jaldabaoth, and others Sabaoth. From Barbelo sprang Light, and Light being anointed by the Father became Christ. Immortality, Truth, Grace, Will, Understanding, and Prudence, were all personified, as also Lust, Envy, Emulation, and other vices; the personality of Christ and of the Holy Spirit being thus practically allegorized away. Their system was mixed up with obscure ideas which shew that licentious practices were familiar to them, and that they were probably adopted in their mysteries, as seems to have been the case with the Nicolaitanes. Hence they acquired the name of Borborians, from βόρβορος, filth or mud: Theodoret expressly giving this play upon their original name as the application of it, βαρβηλωταί ἡγοῦν βορβοριανοί [Theodor. de Hæres. fab. i. 13], and a similar explanation being given by Nicetas Choniatus [Nicet. Thesaur. orthod. fid. iv. 2]. Philaster states that the Borbeliotes, in common with other licentious heretics of their class, denied that there was any future judgment.

The names Borbelitæ and Borboriani are given to the Gnostics in general by some writers, as by Epiphanius.

BARDESANIANS. A sect founded by Bardesanes, a Syrian of Edessa in Mesopotamia, a man of great learning. He flourished in the latter part of the second century, being born, according to the Edessan Chronicle [a work of the sixth century: Lardner, ed. Oxf. ii. 319], in the year 154. He was by some supposed to be the tutor of Clemens Alexandrinus, but this is not established. From a noble answer of his to Apollonius, a friend of one of the Emperors Antoninus, that he was ready to encounter death or any suffering the prince might inflict, rather than deny his faith, to which he was being urged, he has been reckoned a confessor [Epiph. Hæres. lvi.]. He is said by Eusebius to have been an excellent Syriac scholar, and most keen in disputation [Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 30]. Attracted to the oriental philosophy, he relapsed, as Epiphanius says, like a goodly ship, laden with costly bales, shipwrecked in sight of harbour. The great problem of the day, the existence of evil in the world, he endeavoured to solve by supposing two co-equal supreme principles, one good, one evil. He adopted, more or less, the fanciful ideas of some of the Eastern Gnostics, and partly held with their opinion of the successive generation of æons. [BASILIDIANS.] No doubt, also, he denied the resurrection of the body; and believed that the body with which the Saviour was clothed was a celestial and unsubstantial one only. Hence he would not admit that Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, but said the flesh with which He seemed to be endued was from Heaven direct. The original man, created by God, had a refined body adapted to his unfallen nature. After the Fall, God united his soul to a grosser and more material body. There is no question that his moral system was unimpeachable. Towards the end of his life he renounced, but, as it seems, not wholly, these errors. Porphyry speaks of a Bardesanes of Babylon as alive in A.D. 218; he is said then to have been held in high respect. Lardner has given many reasons for identifying him with Bardesanes of Edessa, which, though perhaps not conclusive, are certainly most reasonable. While still sound in the faith (so Eusebius and Jerome: but Epiphanius makes him a Valentinian from the first) he wrote numerous works, many of which he produced [Euseb. loc cit.] against Marcion and others. These were translated by his disciples into Greek, being originally written in Syriac. Epiphanius seems therefore in error when he makes Bardesanes skilled in Greek as well as Syriac. His chief work was De Fato, written against an astrologer Abidas. This was dedicated to Antoninus; not, it seems most likely, the emperor, but one of the more conspicuous among his own adherents. Eusebius has preserved a very considerable fragment of this [Euseb. Præp. Evang. vi. 10]. He wrote also a great number of hymns, as did his son Harmonius. They were used in churches; and doubtless their continued use in Syria helped to retain a belief in some of his distinctive opinions, which would account for the existence of a sect of Bardesanians for nearly two centuries after his death. His followers, however, were never numerous, nor actively opposed to Catholic teaching. The use of his hymns was discontinued in the fourth century, and after that time we hear no more of the Bardesanians. The fragment above mentioned as given by Eusebius, is also found, word for word, in the Clementine Recognitions [Clem. Recog. ix. 19, &c.]. From this Cave infers that Bardesanes was the author of these Recognitions, but does not affirm it as an established fact. Assuming also the identity of the Babylonian and Syrian Bardesanes, we have two other fragments preserved by Porphyry and cited by Cave. [Tillemont, Mém. ii. 316. Fabric. Biblioth. Gr. ii. 599. Mosheim, de reb. ante Const. II. 60.]

BARLAAMITES. The adherents of Barlaam, abbot of St. Saviour's at Constantinople, in his controversy with the HESYCHASTS or Quietist mystics of the East. Barlaam was a man of much learning, belonging to the order of St. Basil, and in his early life a strong controversialist on the side of the Eastern Church against the Latins. In A.D. 1337 he brought a complaint against the Hesychast monks of Mount Athos, whom he had been directed to visit and inspect, and whose strange practice he regarded as mere fanaticism. The charges brought by him were tried before a council in A.D. 1341, when the monks, with Palamas (afterwards archbishop of Thessalonica) for their advocate, were acquitted. Barlaam was at the same time condemned by the influence of the Quietists, and immediately leaving Constantinople he joined the Latin Church, in which he eventually became Bishop of Gierace in Calabria, his native country.

The dogma which had become the subject of controversy—viz. that God dwells in an eternal light, distinct from His Being, and this was the light seen in the Mount of Transfiguration—was again opposed by ACINDYNUS, a friend of Barlaam. Several other councils were held on the subject, and the Barlaamites, as the opponents of the Quietists were now called, were finally silenced by one held at Constantinople in A.D. 1351, in which they were severely censured. [Fabricius, Biblioth. Græc. v. 247, 454.]

BARSANIANS. One of the small and obscure sects into which the Acephali broke up in the latter half of the fifth century. St. John of Damascus says that they derived their name from Barsanaps, a propagator of the Theodosian and Gaianite heresy [Damasc. de Hæres. iii.]. They are identical with the SEMIDALITES.

BARSANUPHITES. A sect of the Acephali, like the preceding, and having for their leader a pretender of the name of Barsanuphius, who falsely claimed to have received consecration as a bishop. They separated off from the Acephali at the end of the fifth century, and were reunited to the Jacobite communion at the end of the ninth century [Neale's Patriarch. of Alexandria, ii. 22, 137]. Barsanuphius is not to be confounded with the monk of that name mentioned in the ecclesiastical history of Evagrius, iv. 33.

BARSUMAS. The chief founder and leader of the Nestorians in Chaldæa, Persia, Assyria, and the adjoining countries. He was ejected from the school of Edessa, but became bishop of Nisibis [A.D. 435—437]. He persuaded the Persian sovereign Perozes to expel the orthodox from their sees and churches, and to substitute Nestorians in their place. He also founded the school of Nisibis, from which Nestorian missionaries carried the heresy in the following century to Egypt, Syria, Arabia, India, Tartary, and China.

BARSUMAS. A Syrian archimandrite who took the side of Eutyches at the Latrocinium or so-called second Council of Ephesus. He and his monks so kicked and otherwise maltreated Flavian that he died within a few days from the effects of their violence. When the acts of the false council were annulled by the Council of Chalcedon Barsumas was driven from it by the general voice of those assembled as being the murderer of the holy Flavian, and afterwards convicted of heresy as a follower of Eutyches. He died about A.D. 460. [Fleury, Hist. Eccl. xxvii. 41, xxviii. 18.]

BARULI. A sect of the Albanenses belonging to the twelfth century. Their distinguishing errors are said to have been, That Christ did not become truly incarnate, but assumed a celestial kind of body; that souls were all created before the creation of the world, and all fell into sin together after the creation. [Sianda, Lexic. Polem. s. v.]

BASILIDIANS. So called from their founder Basilides. He was of Alexandria, and the earliest of the Egyptian Gnostics; flourishing early in the second century. Cave places him A.D. 112; some make him later, and he was certainly alive in the reign of the Emperor Hadrian [A.D. 117-138]. If not actually a contemporary of the Apostles he lived at the same time as their disciples, for between the death of the Apostle John and the beginning of Hadrian's reign twenty years only elapsed. It is likely that the more fantastic forms of heresy, which developed rapidly after St. John's death, were in process of formation much earlier, but kept back during his lifetime. Basilides had dwelt some time in Syria before settling in Egypt. Jerome [de Vir. illustr. xxi.] says that he abode, moratus est, in Alexandria at the time [A.D. 135] that Cochebas persecuted the Christians. Some read mortuus est in this passage; but Clemens Alexandrinus, who knew Basilides personally, and on whom it seems we may certainly rely for this point, says that he lived into the reign of the elder Antoninus. His death may therefore be approximately assigned to A.D. 139.

He was a disciple of Menander at the same period as Saturninus. He claimed to derive his doctrine from St. Matthias, and from one Glaucias whom he made the intimate disciple (interpres) of St. Peter. This Glaucias is unknown to history, except as claimed by Basilides; and Waterland [v. 123, Oxf. ed.] seems to suggest that he is altogether imaginary. The chief features in his system, which was a compound of the Pythagorean philosophy, oriental tradition, and Christian revelation, were these: First, he held there was a great First Cause, one Supreme God, to whom he gave the name Abraxas. This name he associated with the number 365, which was made up (according to the Greek system of numeration) by adding together the numbers represented by the letters of which it is composed. The correspondence of this number with that made by the word Mithras, the sun-god of the Persians, is some evidence that Basilides had been in Persia as well as Egypt, as is stated in the dispute between Archelaus and Manes [Routh's Reliq.

Sacr. iv. 275]. This correspondence is thus shewn:

This name is evidently of Coptic origin, and means the Sacred Word; or perhaps more strictly "Hallowed be The Name" [King's Gnostics, 36]. Mr. King has pointed out an instance where the Egyptian word "Abrak," for kneeling down to worship, is actually retained in the Hebrew text of the Scriptures at Gen. xli. 43. From Abraxas, the First Cause, Basilides taught that Understanding (voûs, mens) was created; from the Understanding came the Word (λόγος, verbum), and so on by successive generations were produced Providence, Power, Wisdom, Righteousness, Peace. From these in turn proceeded the higher order of angels, principalities, and powers; from these came again the lower order of angels. The different orders of angels each made a separate heaven, 365 in all. Over them all Abraxas presided. By the lowest order of angels the world was created; of this order was the God of the Jews, the God of the law and the prophets, whom Basilides thus made an angel only. Other angels of this order protected and took charge of other nations, and thus the interests of the angels became conflicting, and all in time became corrupt; and the God Supreme sent down from heaven His Son (voûs), Who joined Himself to the man Jesus, and taught corrupt man the heavenly knowledge they had allowed themselves to lose. The God of the Jews had no power against the Christ, but He had against Jesus, and His people by His instigation put Jesus to death. [Massuet's Dissertationes in Irenæum. Clemens Alex. Strom. vi. Tertull. De Præscrip. xlv. Hippol. Refut. Hær. vii. 8-15. Aug. Hær. iv. Epiph. Hær. xxiv.]

The main problem which the philosophers of the second century set themselves to solve was the existence of evil in the world. Since many of them maintained the essential evil of matter, it followed that they frequently denied the Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the body. This was the case with the Basilidians. Basilides denied that salvation was promised to the bodies of men. His followers in the next century much exaggerated his original teaching, if we may judge from the much stronger terms used against them by Tertullian than had been used by Clemens Alexandrinus, who was not only a contemporary but an inhabitant of the same city as Basilides. They recognised, says Tertullian, a half-resurrection. "Being ashamed perhaps to confess Christ crucified," says Waterland [v. 190, Oxf. ed.], the ancient visionaries, among whom he reckons the Basilidians, "contrived any wild supposition imaginable to evade it." Their refusal to accept the doctrine of the Resurrection obliged them to explain away the Resurrection of Christ. They accordingly said that Christ did not suffer on the cross, that He was a phantom or appearance only without substance of our flesh, that Simon of Cyrene was crucified in His stead, and that therefore no Christian ought to profess faith in the crucified One, lest he should be found adoring Simon. This fantastic theory was an aftergrowth, and formed no part of the teaching of the founder of the sect, who certainly held the reality of the body of the man Christ Jesus. This belief in an apparent suffering Christ satisfied the impugnors of the Resurrection doctrine, amongst whom no doubt was Basilides himself. And this belief of utter destruction of the body at death led him to another position strongly antagonistic to the prevailing feelings of Christians; for he vigorously depreciated the glories of martyrdom. The mere denial of a resurrection of the flesh would tend to do this. The hope of rising again into a perfect man supported many martyrs through their sufferings. But Basilides went further than this, and endeavoured to frame a scheme to account for these sufferings. He adopted in the first place a metempsychosis, or transmigration theory, saying that the faithful disciples were afflicted with torments because of sins committed in some previous stage of their existence. One of his arguments was from the known sufferings of infants; believing in the destruction of the body at death, he could not explain this except by saying that they had sinned elsewhere. He held consequently that the sufferings of confessors and martyrs were kinds of punishment, and inflicted necessarily: "metum et laborem in martyre esse necessaria, atque hominem ad agendum semper impelli." Suffering and fear came on men like rust on iron. He relied for this part of the argument on the Scripture, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." Clemens Alexandrinus, in his answer, maintains that the argument about punitive sufferings is worthless from the simple consideration that it was always in the power of Christians to suffer or not. A compliance with the orders of the heathen always exempted them from suffering. In a fragment of Basilides, preserved by Origen in his commentary on Rom. vii. 9 [lib. v. Comment. sec. v.], this passage is cited as an authority for his belief in the metempsychosis, or, as Origen calls it μετενσωμάτωσις, "Dixit enim Apostolus, quia ego vivebam sine lege aliquando: hoc est, antequam in istud corpus venirem, in eam speciem corporis vixi, quæ sub lege non esset, pecudis scilicet, vel avis." He even said men had two souls, "helluina," "rationalis," one which we share with the brute creation, and one which is our excellence above it.

His opinions upon faith and the knowledge of God are involved in much obscurity, and, in the absence of any extant work of his, can only be conjectured. But he seems to have held that faith and knowledge were co-ordinate, that faith should be greater or less in any man according to his natural powers, πίστιν ἅμα καὶ ἐκλογὴν οἰκείαν εἶναι καθ' ἑκάστων διάστημα. [Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. 3].

In this he would differ from other forms of Gnosticism, in which they were usually made antagonistic. Faith, according to him, was an assent of the soul to some proposition not apprehended by the senses, because not present; and was peculiar to some men by nature; he held that it was inborn in them, and was not the result of instruction, or conviction, or any exercise of judgment; and that such men became like God by nature. The elect were therefore strangers in the world, sojourners, supra-mundane by nature. All sins would not be forgiven, but those only committed in ignorance; and therefore the doctrine of the atonement had no place in his system. All sins must be expiated in the sinner's own person, and in process of this expiation the soul passed through various bodies.

The theory he held on the baptism of Christ was not peculiar to his system, but was common to many. The descent of the Holy Spirit was the indwelling of an æon, or heavenly power, which left Him before His death. His disciples retained a great veneration for this event, though they, as in many other things, greatly obscured the original teaching. They were very particular in the celebration of the anniversary, spending the whole night previous in religious exercises. The impurity of morals attributed by the later writers to Basilides is another instance of the corruption of his followers being laid to his charge. There is little doubt that he taught and practised purity of life; but yet there were many features in his moral system which would seem to encourage the unprincipled among his followers to continue in sin. The opinion for instance on election would be perverted by some into a license; let us "continue in sin that grace may abound." And even Clemens, at the earliest period of the heresy, tells us that some did use this argument, and looked forward to salvation, although deliberately sinning, as being elect by the dignity of their nature. Epiphanius is much more severe in his charge of impurity [Epiph. Hær. xxiv. 3].

Irenæus mentions magic in connection with Basilides, "Utuntur autem et hi magia, et imaginibus, et incantationibus, et invocationibus, et reliqua universa periergia" [Contra Hær. i. 24]. Epiphanius makes the same charge; οὐ μὴν δὲ ἀλλὰ καὶ μαγανικαῖς μηχαναῖς προσανέχων οὐκ ἐπαύσατο, καὶ περιεργαῖς ὁ ἀπατέων. Beausobre, and after him Lardner, who lose no opportunity of trying to exculpate heretics, altogether deny that there is any evidence of this profession of magic. They say it is only the ignorant charge of men who understood no science against learned students of mathematics and physics. The question of the gems known as the Abraxas gems is slightly discussed by Mosheim [i. 197, where references are given], and more fully examined by Lardner, who pronounces them purely heathen and destitute of all Christian character [viii. 371, &c.]. But this question has been investigated anew by Mr. King [The Gnostics and their Remains, 1864], whose authority on such a point will be admitted by all. He considers it satisfactorily established that the form engraved on these gems was the invention of Basilides himself and intended to be used as a talisman; it was the reduction of his system to a visible representation. Several passages are quoted [p. 81] which seem explicable only on the supposition that the "Pantheus upon our gems was actually intended to symbolize the deity styled Abraxas." Jerome mentions several other sacred names used by Basilides [Ep. 75], Armagil, Leusiboras, Barbelon, Balsamus, "ceteraque magis portenta quam nomina." The first two of these names appear not to occur elsewhere; the last two, meaning respectively Son of God and Lord of Heaven, were names under which the Deity was worshipped by the Iberians. [BARBELIOTES.]

In the prologue to Jerome's Commentary on St. Matthew mention is made of some spurious gospels, and amongst them one by Basilides. This is probably the same with the twenty-four books of commentaries mentioned by Eusebius [Hist. Eccl. iv. 7.] A fragment from the thirteenth book of these commentaries is quoted by Irenæus, and another by Clemens from the twenty-third book. The one cited by Origen has been given above. [All may be seen in Migne's Patrolog. Ser. Græca. viii. 1263]. A reply to this was written by Agrippa Castor, but this also has perished [Hieron. de Viris illustr. 21]. Clemens speaks of a well-known book of Basilides called Prophetia Chamî. Barcobas and Barcoph were also names of prophets to whom Basilides appealed. He rejected the authority of the Old Testament, and certain portions of the New Testament, as the Epistles to the Hebrews, Titus and Timothy, which he said were not St. Paul's.

The heresy did not survive very long, and there is but scanty allusion to it in later writers. The most important authors against it are referred to above. Jerome [Ep. 75, written c. A.D. 400] mentions them as having recently shewn considerable activity throughout Spain, "spurcissima per Hispanias Basilidis hæresi sæviante, et instar pestis et morbi, totas infra Pyrenæum et Oceanum vastante provincias."

The fullest and most exhaustive of the replies extant is to be found in Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. iv. 12.

BASLE, CONFESSION OF. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

BASMOTHEANS. This name is found in the Apostolic Constitutions [vi. 6]: "Even the Jewish nation had wicked heresies: for there were . . . the Basmotheans, who deny Providence, and say that the world is made by spontaneous motion, and take away the immortality of the soul." There can be little doubt that "Basmotheans" is a corruption of "Masbotheans." [MASBOTHEANS.]

BASSUS. In some MSS. of Philaster a heretic appears whose name is written C. Bassus, but as the COLORBASIANs are not elsewhere named by him, and Bassus is not named by any other heresiologist, no doubt C. Bassus is a corrupt reading for Colorbasus. [Philast. De Hær. xliii.]

BEGHARDS. The German name for a very widely spread sect of mediæval heretics who were closely allied in their origin with the Italian FRATICELLI and the BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT.

The name "Beghard" was originally an honourable designation for those who devoted themselves to a life of prayer; and thus as "Beguienes" were "praying women," Beghards were "praying men." Both are derived from the old German word "beggen" or "beggeren," which signifies to beg earnestly or heartily; and were thus analogous to such designations as "Pietists," "Evangelicals," &c. But from being associated with prayer the name was corrupted by the subsequent habits of the sect into a mere association with mendicancy, and the Beghards were popularly so called because they were pertinacious "beggars" in the common English sense of the word.

Female societies of Beguienes appear to have been formed in many towns in the Netherlands towards the end of the twelfth century; and it is supposed that they arose out of the disproportion between the sexes caused by the number of men slain in the Crusades. In the following century many of these communities of Beguienes were formed in Germany and France, and Matthew Paris says that the number of Beguienes at Cologne in the year 1250 was one thousand, while elsewhere in Germany an "innumerable multitude" of them had sprung up [Matth. Par. p. 805]. Similar communities of men, associating together for prayer and labour, began to be formed early in the same century, the first on record being one at Louvain, which was founded A.D. 1220. About the same time they are found also in France under the name of Boni Pueri (Bons Garçons) or Boni Valeti (Bons Valets) [Gramaye, Antiq. Brabant. pp. 31, 36, 175]. In this early development of the Beghard communities they were mostly affiliated to the Dominicans or Franciscans as brethren of the third or Lay Order, or Tertiaries; and this devotional stage of their history is still represented on the feminine side by the Beguienes of Belgium.

But the Beghards had adopted vagrant habits, and giving up all labour they professed to keep the strict Franciscan vow of poverty by living on the labour of others. Thus they wandered about through towns and villages with the constant cry "Brot durch Gott" ("Bread for the sake of God"), and as their numbers increased the importunity and "professional" character of their begging increased also. They obtained all their converts from among the ignorant labouring classes, many of them being also of that never-failing character which leads to the ready acceptance of any excuse for idleness and wandering. Thus mechanics and field labourers left their work to become Beghards, and religion became a thin cloak for mendicancy.

An alliance very quickly sprung up between the Beghards and the FRATICELLI; and it was not long before the incorporation of many of the BRETHREN AND SISTERS OF THE FREE SPIRIT with their body infected them with heresy. The Council of Mayence [A.D. 1259] directed the clergy to read admonitions to them on three successive Sundays or festivals, and to forbid their assembling in caverns and other secret places for preaching [Mansi, Concil. xxiii. 998]. From the absence of any notice of heresy in this canon it may be doubted whether it had as yet developed itself among them. But charges of licentiousness were brought against them very early, and from the number of women among them the Germans called them "Sisterers" (schwestriones) with an evident ironical meaning.

The headquarters of the sect were at Cologne, but they spread along the banks of the Rhine and overran both France and the Netherlands as well. In the year 1306 a decree against them was issued by a council held at Cologne, another in 1310 by a council held at Trèves, a third at Strasburg A.D. 1317, and a few years later Pope John XXII. published a Bull against them [A.D. 1330], in which they are declared to be persons who have wandered away from the Catholic faith, despising the sacraments and sowing other errors abundantly. Meanwhile the Inquisition had been let loose upon them, and many were burned as heretics. One of the first to suffer was a leader named Walter, who was executed in 1322, three were burned at Constance in 1339, another leader named Berthold at Speyer in 1356, and several at Strasburg in 1366. Under these persecutions the Beghards decreased in number, but traces of them are found in the fifteenth century, and down to the time of Luther.

There can be no doubt that the Beghards were largely infected with the Antinomianism and licentiousness of the Brethren of the Free Spirit. "Their professed object," says Ullmann, "was to restore the pure primal state, the divine life of freedom, innocence, and nature. The idea they formed of that state was that man being in and of himself one with God, requires only to act in the consciousness of this unity, and to follow unrestrained the divinely implanted impulses and inclinations of his nature in order to be good and godly; that prior to the fall he possessed such a consciousness to the full, but that it had been disturbed by that event; that the law had introduced differences among mankind, who originally stood upon a level, but that these ought now to be done away, and the Paradise state of unity and equality restored. To bring this about in defiance of the imposing power of the Church, the only way open to them was by secret societies and clandestine meetings. Accordingly they constructed for themselves remote and often subterranean habitations, which they called Paradises, and where by night, and especially on the nights of festivals, persons of both sexes used to assemble. On such occasions one of their "apostles" came forward, and taking off his clothes, and exemplifying in his own person the state of innocence, delivered a discourse upon the free intercourse of the sexes, which the law of marriage, contrary to nature, had supplanted. The sequel, if we may credit the reports, was of a kind which forbids description"¹ [Ullmann's Reformers before the Reformation]. These reports were those of eye-witnesses, and Mosheim considers that there is no reason to doubt their truth [Mosheim, de Beghardis et Beguinabus].

BEGUINE. The French form of the name BEGHARD.

BEGUINIL. One of the names given to the FRATICELLI in the Bull of Pope John XXII. [A.D. 1317] ordering their suppression.

BEGUTTE. The Dutch form of the name BEGHARD.

BEHMEN, BÖEHME, or more properly BÖHM, JACOB, a German mystic who gained many followers on the Continent and in England, was born, in 1575, in Allseidenberg, a village near Görlitz in Upper Lusatia. In his childhood he tended cattle, and remained to his tenth year without instruction. At twelve years he was apprenticed to a shoemaker in Görlitz. It happened one day, when he was left alone in the shop, that a stranger in mean apparel, but of grave and reverend countenance, entered and bought a pair of shoes, then going out of the shop a little way, stood still, and called with a loud voice, "Jacob, Jacob, come forth!" The boy obeyed, and the stranger, taking him by the hand, and fixing his bright and piercing eyes on him, said, "Jacob, thou art little, but shalt be great, and become another man, such an one as the world shall wonder at; therefore be pious, fear God, and reverence His word. Read diligently the Scriptures, wherein thou hast comfort and instruction, for thou must endure much poverty and suffer persecution; but be courageous, and persevere, for God loves and is gracious unto thee." After this mysterious visit the boy grew more and more serious and visionary, and at one time "was for seven days surrounded with a divine light, and stood in the highest contemplation, and in the kingdom of joys." At nineteen he married, and in 1604 became a master shoemaker in Görlitz.

Years passed, four sons were born to Behmen, and he was still only known as a pious and harmless mechanic. Meantime his visionary faculty grew greater. On one occasion he fell into a trance while gazing on the dazzling light of the sun's rays broken upon a tin vessel. Afterwards, walking in the fields, he had a new faculty opened in him to discern the virtues of plants. He began to write, but only for his private satisfaction, with no design of publishing his visions to the world. A book called Aurora, thus written by him, was lent to a friend, who made a copy of it, and this fell into the hands of Richter the primate of Görlitz, by whom the author was denounced from the pulpit, and summoned to appear before the senate. He was ordered to write no more, and obeyed the order for seven years. But in 1616, at the age of forty-two, he ventured to publish Aurora, or the Morning Redness, and during the remaining seven years of his life poured forth about thirty other publications. One of the most important of his works is, Description of the Three Principles of the Divine Being. From writing in his native language at a time when Latin was generally used, he got the name of the Teutonic philosopher. He wrote at a steady rate, without haste and without correction. All that he produced was welcomed by a constantly growing circle of admirers and disciples. Richter now again bestirred himself against him, and the magistrates recommended him to leave the city for the sake of peace, which he did. Thereafter he was summoned before the Elector of Saxony, who appointed six Doctors of Divinity to examine him. His gentle demeanour and answers won the good opinion both of the Elector and the examiners, and he was charitably dismissed. He returned to Görlitz, where he died in 1624. On his deathbed, he asked his son Tobias whether he did not hear sweet music; and when his son answered that he heard nothing, bade him open the door, that the sound might enter. He foretold the moment of his departure three hours before it came, and when it was at hand, bade his son turn him, and expired.

Behmen was a small thin man, with a low forehead, but with full temples and bright blue eyes. His voice was weak and sweet, his character gentle and retiring. His writings utter in their own way the deepest philosophical conceptions, and are the work of an entirely spiritual mind. Their phraseology is drawn from the Scriptures, with a large admixture of the terms of the mystical chemistry then in use. They consist of speculations on the Deity and the origin of things, delivered in the form of Divine revelations. The Deity is to be contemplated first in His own existence as "the eternal one, the silent nothing, the temperamentum." The Divine Unity is itself a Trinity. Nature, or creature, proceeds therefrom, and is called "contrariety." But the proceeding of creature from God is at the same time the ingoing of God into creature; "the silent nothing becomes something by entering into duality." The power of seeing duality in things is spiritual-mindedness.

The life of Behmen was written by his admirer Abraham von Frankenberg, who died in 1652. The first collection of his writings was made in Holland by Betke in 1673; a more complete one in 1682 by Gichtel [10 vols. Amsterdam], from whom the followers of Behmen have received the name of Gichtelians, a sect valued for their virtuous, silent, and benevolent life. Another edition appeared in Amsterdam in 1730, under the title Theosophia revelata, in two volumes; more complete in six volumes. The latest edition is by Schiebler, Leipsic, 1831-40. Besides Germany and Holland, Behmen was acknowledged in France by Pierre Poiret as a man of deep spiritual insight, and in England he gained a devoted adherent in the divine and physician John Pordage, who wrote a commentary on his works, and declared himself convinced by a special revelation of the truth of his doctrines. Jane Lead, a female enthusiast, founded a sect called the PHILADELPHIANS, for the study of his writings in 1697, in which she was joined by Pordage and his celebrated disciple Thomas Bromley. An English translation of Behmen was published in 1764 by William Law, the author of the Serious Call. On the authority of Law, we learn that Sir Isaac Newton was a diligent student of Behmen, a large number of extracts from whose works was found in the handwriting of Newton amongst his papers [Brewster's Newton, ii. p. 371].

The interest in Behmen was revived by the great speculative movement in Germany about the beginning of this century. The end of the philosophy of Fichte, of Schelling, of Hegel, was the cognition of the absolute, or unconditioned; terms which denote the same principle which was the root of the mystical contemplations of Behmen. This identity was acknowledged by Hegel, who saw in the "silent nothing," or principle of negativity which was the origin of things of Behmen, a forecast of his own celebrated division of philosophy into the science of the idea existing in and for itself, of the idea representing itself in nature, and of the idea returning into itself. Hence Hegel placed Behmen at the head of modern philosophy. [For a favourable early account of Behmen and his doctrines see Arnoldi Hist. Ecclesiastica de Hæretica. For a modern German account see Die Lehre des Deutschen Philosophen Jacob Böhm, Wuller, Stuttgart, 1836, and Tennemann's Manual of Phil. A life by an unknown author was also published at Dresden, 1802. BERENGARIANS. [BERENGARIUS.]

BERENGARIUS. The leader of a too small school of divines belonging to the eleventh century who opposed the ultra-Roman definition of the Real Presence, which had originated with PASCHASIVS RADBERTUS [A.D. 831-865], and was formally promulgated as the doctrine of the Western Church by the Fourth Council of Lateran [A.D. 1215].

In the earlier part of his life, Berengarius, or Bérenger, was at the head of the school attached to the cathedral of Tours, of which he was also canon. But when he was about forty-two years of age [A.D. 1040] he became Archdeacon of Angers, shortly after which time he first comes into notice in connection with the Eucharistic controversy. As a schoolmaster he had shewn an independence and originality of mind which had brought upon him some degree of censure as being fond of novelties, especially of a novel pronunciation of Latin which he wished to introduce. But his intellectual boldness was shewn soon after he went to Angers by his opposition to the Eucharistic theories of Radbertus, which had now become received as authoritative by many theologians. Berengarius had studied the work of RATRAMNUS, written against this view of the Eucharist, but was said to go much further from the received opinion, and to maintain that the consecrated elements are only symbols—"figuram quendam et similitudinem"—of the Body and Blood of Christ. A remonstrance against this teaching was written to him [A.D. 1045] by an old friend and schoolfellow, Adelmann, then Archdeacon of Liège, and afterwards [A.D. 1048] Bishop of Brescia. This warning was repeated two years afterwards with affectionate earnestness, the second letter being still extant [Adelmann, De Veritate Corp. et Sang. Dom., Brunswick, 1770]. Berengarius having by this time got into public controversy with Hugo, bishop of Langres, on the subject, wrote a letter to Lanfranc (then Abbot of Bec, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury), stating his views and endeavouring to secure Lanfranc's support for them. The abbot being then at Rome, the letter of Berengarius did not reach him until its contents were known to others, and the consequence was that it was laid before a council which was sitting at the time [A.D. 1050] as containing heresy. The council convicted its author, without waiting to know whether he had any explanation or defence to offer, and the sentence was confirmed at Vercelli in the September following. At this latter council Berengarius wished to be present that he might make his defence, but being then in the Abbey of Tours he was prevented from attending by Henry I., King of France, who considered that he would run into danger by carrying out his wish [Mansi, Concil. xix. 757, 773].

Four years after this condemnation a Legatine council was held at Tours, when Hildebrand was present as the Papal representative [A.D. 1054]. At this council Berengarius declared his belief that "Panis atque vinum altaris post consecrationem sunt Christi Corpus et Sanguis," and Hildebrand being satisfied with this declaration, did not permit him to carry the explanation of his opinions into detail, but released him from the sentence of heresy which had been passed upon him.

Subsequently Berengarius was summoned to Rome, where he appeared in the year 1059. There was a popular clamour against him as a heretic, and a demand that he should suffer death as such. Either in fear of death, or for some other unknown reason, he was then persuaded by Cardinal Humbert to sign a form of recantation, in which he acknowledged Transubstantiation in its most extreme form. His words, as given by Lanfranc, declare, "Panem et vinum . . . Verum Corpus et Sanguinem Domini nostri Jesu Christi esse, et sensualiter non solum sacramento, sed in veritate, manibus sacerdotum tractari, frangi, et fidelium dentibus atteri" [Lanfr. Opp. p. 232].

On his return to France Berengarius took up his former line, notwithstanding this recantation, and engaged in a controversy with Lanfranc which lasted for many years, and during the course of which the former was occasionally in danger from the populace, who by this time had become blindly violent in defence of the doctrine of Transubstantiation. Hildebrand became Pope as Gregory VII. in the year 1073; but although he had protected Berengarius hitherto, he was not able to withstand the demand of the Cardinals that he should again be called to account. Once more, therefore, the mover of this controversy was summoned to Rome, and once more, in a council which was held in February 1079, he signed a recantation, in which the doctrine which he had so long opposed was stated in as extreme a form as before [Mansi, Concil. xx. 543].

Berengarius left Rome on this occasion with a Papal certificate of his orthodoxy, and all who should presume to call him a heretic were by this document anathematized [D'Achery, Spicileg. iii. 413]. But he was also commanded to abstain from all controversy on the subject of the Eucharist, or from teaching any one except as a means of reclaiming those whom he had led into error. He lived for several years longer, much mortified and humiliated by his recantation, and not really altering the opinions which he had so long held. His death took place A.D. 1088 in the island of St. Cosmas near Tours, where he had latterly lived in great retirement under the protection of the Bishop of Tours. Berengarius never formed a sect, but many afterwards perverted his opinions into a denial of the Real Presence, and these were named Berengarians. [Lanfranc, De Eucharist. Berengar. de Sac. Cæna. Ebrard's Doctr. and Hist. of the Lord's Supper, Frankfort, 1845.]

BERON. A Valentinian heretic mentioned by Hippolytus, and not otherwise known. Hippolytus writes respecting him that he and some others had forsaken the delusion of Valentinus only to fall into deeper errors. The special heresy of Beron appears to have been that against which the clause of the Athanasian Hymn, "One, not by conversion of the Godhead into flesh, but by taking of the manhood into God," was levelled. He held that at the Incarnation the Divine Nature of the Second Person in the Blessed Trinity became circumscribed or limited so as to be compatible with the Human Nature to which it was united, God the Son thus becoming self-emptyed, acquiring an idia περιγραφή, and ceasing to be "Immensus Filius." A fragment of Hippolytus remains in which he controverts this error of Beron, and some others founded upon it, saying, "What the Divine Nature was before the Incarnation that it was afterwards: in Its Essence infinite, incomprehensible, impassible, incomparable, unchangeable, inconvertible, abiding in its own natural essence, and working according to its own nature" [Hippol. contra Beronem et Helicem, in Fabric. Bibl. Græc. i. 225. ARTEMONITES].

BERTRAM. [RATRAMNUS.]

BERYLLUS was bishop of Bostra in Arabia about A.D. 230. He was a man of learning and piety, but falling into heresy, a synod was held at Bostra to judge his case. Origen, who attended the synod, held private conferences with Beryllus, which were followed by a public disputation. The result was that Beryllus was convinced of his error and returned to the Catholic faith. This synod is frequently assigned to the year 247 or 249. From the order of events in Eusebius it appears to have been before the death of Gordian, A.D. 244, and is dated by Cave A.D. 243.

Beryllus asserted that our Lord, before His Incarnation, did not exist in the distinction of His own Person; and that He was Divine because there dwelt in Him not the proper Divinity of the Son, but the Divinity of the Father.¹ The first proposition needs no comment. The second has been somewhat variously interpreted. Mosheim [Eccl. Hist. cent. III. cap. v. sec. 14] says that the opinion, when considered with attention, amounts to this: that Christ did not exist before Mary, but that a Spirit issuing from God Himself, and therefore superior to all human souls, as being a portion of the Divine nature, was united to Him at the time of His birth. This appears to be an explaining away the "Paternal Divinity" which was asserted to have dwelt in Christ, and to suppose that Beryllus held, perhaps by anticipation, the later Sabellian doctrine. The words of Eusebius can be satisfied only by the earlier Sabellian or Patripassian doctrine; and accordingly Bishop Bull [Jud. Eccl. Cathol. iii. 4; Def. Fid. Nic. iv. 3, 17] classes Beryllus with Praxeas, Noëtus, and Sabellius.² Against this it may be said that Origen, in the passage quoted by all commentators [Frag. ex Comm. in Ep. ad Titum], has distinguished between the doctrine of Beryllus and of the Patripassians. The passage is as follows: "Sed et eos, qui hominem dicunt Dominum Jesum præcognitum et prædestinatum, qui ante adventum carnalem substantialiter et proprie non existerit, sed quod homo natus Patris solam in se habuerit deitatem, ne illos quidem sine periculo est ecclesiæ numero sociari: sicut et illos, qui superstitiose magis quam religiose, uti ne videantur duos deos dicere, neque rursum negare Salvatoris deitatem, unam eandemque subsistentiam Patris ac Filii asseverant, i. e. duo quidem nomina secundum diversitatem causarum recipientem, unam tamen ὑπόστασιν subsistere, i. e. unam personam duobus nominibus subjacentem, qui latine Patripassiani appellantur." The only difference between the two classes, the former of them being that to which Beryllus belonged, was that the Patripassians retained the names of Father and Son to be used as the varying action of the One and same Person required. Beryllus seemed to have disdained this affectation of retaining the names while all distinction of Person was denied.

Socrates [Hist. Eccl. iii. 7], in error, makes Beryllus to have been bishop of Philadelphia.

² Gennadius [cap. iii.] mentions Beryllus together with Artemon and Marcellus. Pseudo-Hieronymus [cap. 36] mentions the denial of the pre-existence of Christ as common to Beryllus and Photinus.

He says, in a somewhat marked manner, that the synod of Bostra, in its letter to Beryllus, asserted that Christ, when made flesh, assumed not only the flesh but also the soul of man. But we are not entitled to infer from this that Beryllus combined Patripassian and Apollinarian doctrine. The acts of the synod of Bostra, the disputation of Origen and Beryllus, and Beryllus' letters to Origen thanking him for saving him from heresy, are unhappily lost.

BESOCHI. [BIZOCHI.]

BEZPOPOFTSCHINS. That division of Russian dissenters which does not retain the office of "pope" or priest, except in such a form as that of the Presbyterian or Independent ministry. The Bezpopoftschins have been divided into fifteen or twenty sects, the principal of which are the DUCHOBORTZI, the PHILOPOFTSCHINS, and the POMERANE; but all the smaller and fanatical sects have sprung from them.

BEZSLOVESTNI. A name signifying "the dumb," given to a not very numerous Russian sect of the eighteenth century, whose members after conversion became perpetually speechless. Very little is known of their tenets. In order to extract some information, a governor general of Siberia, named Pestal, in the reign of Catharine II. [A.D. 1762-1796], employed the cruellest forms of torture, pouring hot sealing-wax on their flesh, and tickling the soles of their feet with feathers, but without avail.

BIANCHI. [ALBATI.]

BICHINI. [BIZOCHI.]

BICORNI. A term colloquially signifying "idiots" among the Italians, and used contemptuously as a name for the BEGHARDS by some mediæval writers.

BIZOCHI. A name for the FRATICELLI, found in the Bull of Pope John XXII. condemning that community [A.D. 1317]. By some it is derived from "Bizzoco," or in French "Besace," on account of the wallet which they carried to hold the provisions which they begged from door to door: by others from "bigio," which indicated the grey colour of their garments.

BLASTUS. A Quartodeciman of this name is mentioned by the author of the book against heresies which formerly went by the name of Tertullian: and on the ground of his teaching that the Christian passover should be kept on the day fixed by the Jewish Law, he is declared to have been desirous of introducing Judaism. [Pseudo-Tertull. xxii.] He is doubtless the same person as the Roman Blastus named by Eusebius as being nearly involved in the fall of Florinus, who became a Valentinian [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 15]. There is no evidence that Blastus ever actually became a Gnostic, but Eusebius records that an Epistle on Schism was written to him by Irenæus, as well as one on the Monarchy of God to Florinus [ibid. v. 20]. For the particulars of his association with the QUARTODECIMANS, the reader is referred to the article under that title. [Theod. Hæret. fab. i. 23.]

BOCASOTI. [BIZOCHI.]

BOGOMILES, or (as it is corruptly written) BOGARMITE, was the name assumed by a sect of heretics, who appeared in the twelfth century in the Bulgarian city of Philippopolis. They appear to have separated off from the Paulicians, the Manichæan heretics who were predominant in the Danubian provinces from the ninth to the thirteenth century.

The founder of the Bogomiles was an heretical monk named Basil, who directed his followers to use and glory in the dissonant name of Bogomile, an appellation compounded of two Slavic roots, "Bog" signifying God, and "mil" His mercy. They were better known to the orthodox Greek world under the title of "Phundaites," or "wearers of the girdle," from the habit which poverty or the commands of Basil forced them to adopt. We also meet with them in contemporary literature under the name of Massilians; it is presumable, from some fancied resemblance in doctrine to the earlier Semi-Pelagian heretics of that name.

This sect was drawn from the dregs of the population, and made poverty and ignorance chief and necessary tenets. By this rule, all learned persons were excluded from their body, yet they took upon themselves the revision of the Scripture Canon. Their Bible consisted of seven books: the Psalms, the Prophets, each of the four Gospels, the Acts, with the Epistles and the Apocalypse. Like other Paulicians, they adopted an allegorical interpretation of Scripture, taught the innate evilness of matter, and its eternal hostility to spirit. Pursuing the same line of reasoning, they denied all mysterious efficacy to the sacraments, and rejected altogether the baptism of water. They supported their belief in a Docetic or fantastic Christ, by a reference to the distinctive quality of His baptism, as opposed to that administered by John. The creation of the world they conceived to be due to a wicked Demiurge, and attributed the murder of Abel to the jealousy of Cain, whose birth they referred to a union between Eve and Satanael (the eldest son of Jehovah), while they assigned to Adam the paternity of Abel.

These rude and ignorant heretics, who seem to have equally misconceived both Christianity and Manichæism, might have remained unmolested in their obscurity, but for the missionary zeal of Alexius Comnenus. That emperor, whose piety or policy induced him to undertake the conversion of the Paulicians, was made acquainted, during his mission work, with the existence of the unhappy Bogomiles. Dibelatius, one of their chiefs or apostles (for, like Mani himself, Basil emulated the organization of primitive Christianity) disclosed the name of their leader to the emperor. Impelled by a desire to effect the more complete extermination of the heresy, Alexius invited the leader of it, Basil, to a banquet, at which, in the guise of a disciple, he extracted from him a full confession of his guilt. At the close of the entertainment, Basil was seized by the officers of the emperor, and by his orders kept in close confinement until the return of the court to Constantinople. There the contumacious heresiarch was publicly burned: the scene of his execution being the open space before the gates of St. Sophia. By command of the emperor, as we are informed by his daughter Anna Comnena, a monk of the Eastern Church, Euthymius Zygabenus by name, composed a full account and refutation of the Bogomilian errors, which is still to be read in his work, entitled the Δογματικὴ Πανοπλία. The total dispersion of the sect ensued upon the death of their founder.

In A.D. 1140, a Constantinopolitan council formally anathematized the heresy of the followers of Basil; but three years later, two bishops of Cappadocia, Clement and Leontinus, were condemned for holding these opinions. It may, however, be reasonably supposed, that these perverts, whose dioceses were situated in the original seat from which Paulician Manichæism (the parent of the Bogomilian heresy) had emigrated into Europe, were only primitive Paulicians, whose tenets, being discovered to resemble (though with material differences) those of their Bulgarian brothers, were fitted, in default of a more exact nomenclature, with the title of Bogomiles. The last mention of the heresy is the condemnation of a monk named Niphonion about the middle of the twelfth century.

[All that is known about this obscure and illiterate body has been collected in the work by Joh. Christ. Wolf, Historia Bogomilorum, Dissert. iii., Wittenberg, 1712.]

BOHEMIA, CONFESSION OF. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

BOHEMIAN BRETHREN. This name was given to a semi-religious, semi-political party which sprung up in Bohemia, early in the fifteenth century. They directed their efforts to preserve the religious independence of their country from the exorbitant claims of the Pope, and their constitutional freedom against the pretensions of the princes of the house of Austria.

The Bohemians were a branch of the Slavonic race. They were originally called Czechs, and occupied the country of the Teutonic Boii, in the middle of the sixth century, having subdued the original inhabitants. They were converted to Christianity by the labours of Methodius, a Greek priest of Thessalonica, towards the end of the ninth century. The Eastern Church, therefore, may justly claim them as her own sons, and for a long time they knew no other form of Christianity. But Latin tendencies gradually prevailed in spite of strong opposition. In 968 they were brought under the Papal supremacy, and in the following century Latin was made the language of their Liturgy in direct opposition to the Slavonic vernacular. Shortly afterwards the celibacy of the clergy was forced upon them, and the cup was withdrawn from the laity. But these changes, brought about by external power, excited a strong feeling of discontent, which received further increase in consequence of the close connection of the country with England, arising from the marriage between our own Richard II. and Anne, sister of King

Wenceslaus of Bohemia. Through this Wickliffe's writings were diffused in the latter country. These causes, coupled with the Papal schism that was then raging, gave rise to a party, of which the celebrated Huss was the chief ornament, Catholic so far as doctrine was concerned, yet national and therefore anti-papal in spirit. For a time, under the mild but somewhat weak rule of Wenceslaus, the public peace was maintained, notwithstanding the execution of Huss, which excited and alarmed the whole country, and gave strength to the extreme men, who now began to appear as the Taborites, or Hussites proper. But the death of the king kindled the flame of a religious war, of all such wars the most bloodily waged on both sides. The natural successor of Wenceslaus was his brother Sigismund, the emperor who had weakly given up Huss to death at Constance, and although the crown was elective, he at once took measures to assert what he considered his just rights. For a time the nation was united against him as one man, and the war which followed, first under the leadership of John Ziska, and afterwards under that of Procopius, was one of the most remarkable, as a national uprising against a powerful foreign foe, that history has recorded. [HUSSITES.]

But what the whole power of the Empire and of the Papacy combined could not effect was soon brought about by internal dissension. There were two chief parties among the Bohemians. The larger, which comprised almost all the clergy and the greater part of the nobles, was Catholic, but anti-papal. Not a single heresy could be laid to their charge. They were of the old national party, and had never willingly submitted to the claims of the Pope, which they now openly abjured as antichristian. They also claimed the restoration of the cup to the laity, and the subjection of the spirituality to the temporal power in all things temporal. They were usually styled Calixtines or Utraquists, and had but little in common with the Taborite followers of Ziska, who had departed as much from the principles of Huss as the modern Wesleyans have from those of Wesley.

When Sigismund found that he could not subdue the Bohemians by force of arms, he made use of this distinction to divide his opponents, and subdue them in detail. He invited them to send deputies to the Council of Basle, where they might state their grievances, and if possible effect an accommodation. This proposal was scornfully rejected by the Taborites, and eagerly accepted by the Catholic or Calixtine party. These latter made the following four demands of the Council: [1] That the Communion should be in both kinds; [2] that the secular power should have dominion over the persons of criminous clerks; [3] that there should be perfect liberty of preaching to all ecclesiastics; [4] that the clergy should not be allowed to hold civil offices. After fierce discussion the first of these was granted, and for a time a hollow truce existed between the national Bohemian party and Rome. Sigismund had gained his object, and shortly afterwards the more extreme Taborites were utterly crushed as a political party, Sigismund was acknowledged as king, peace was restored to the country, and the Bohemians were allowed to continue members of a national, Catholic, and yet anti-papal Church. This was in 1435.

But the Papal court could not rest permanently content with anything short of absolute submission, and this well-known fact, coupled with small annoyances and petty persecutions, kept alive the suspicions and jealousies of the Bohemians, so that in 1450 they sent an embassy to the Patriarch of Constantinople, desiring to be readmitted into communion, on the ground that they had originally derived their Christianity from the East. But though the embassy was well received, the advance of the Turks and other changes prevented anything from coming out of it. Political troubles followed in Bohemia, which led to the loss of the ancient constitutional rights of the people against their sovereigns. The differences between the Romanizing and the national parties became the more marked, so that as the former were favoured by the rulers, the latter found some difficulty in preserving the succession. At one time, in 1482, an Italian wandering bishop, Augustine Lucian, appeared most opportunely for them, when the archbishopric of Prague was purposely kept vacant by the authorities who favoured Rome. Shortly after they sought for and received ordination from the Armenians. The consequence was that the country was kept in a state of religious ferment by the contests between the two parties, until King Ladislaus, in a Diet held at Kuttenberg in 1485, caused a religious truce for thirty-three years to be concluded. Each party agreed to refrain from annoying the other; freedom of preaching was allowed, and the compacts of Basle were reaffirmed against the Papal opposition.

The following century saw a great change in the Bohemians. The Lutherans of Germany crowded into their country, and joined the national party of the Bohemians, obtaining shelter and toleration under their name, and infecting the Bohemian Church with their peculiarities. So matters continued until 1556, when the Jesuits were introduced. The public education was placed in their hands, and they were commissioned to use all efforts of influence and persuasion to bring the people back into unity with the See of Rome, but at the same time, to quiet apprehension, the privileges of the national party were confirmed. In 1609, Rudolph, after various efforts to enforce uniformity, was compelled to grant the Bohemian charter, allowing complete toleration to the three parties, the Romans, the Bohemians, and the Protestants (Lutherans and Calvinists), and exhorting them all to live in peace with each other. To each of them was allowed full liberty to build churches, to found schools, and to hold their own ecclesiastical courts. But the peace did not continue for long. Lutheranism began to infect the national party more and more, owing to the influx from Germany, while on the other hand Rudolph's successor, Ferdinand, in his own hereditary dominions of Styria (the crown of Bohemia was elective), had distinguished himself by a zealous persecution of the Protestants. Suspicion united the old Bohemians and the later foreign bodies against him, and a civil war followed, stained by the usual atrocities on both sides. It proved the commencement of the Thirty Years' War. The insurgents elected Frederick Count Palatine to be their king, but he was a rigid Calvinist, and commenced his reign with the destruction of altars, crucifixes, and monumental tombs in Prague, whereby he alienated the old Bohemian party, which had never (at least as a body) abandoned either Catholic ritual or Catholic doctrine. Moreover, he was not fitted by firmness of character to be the leader in any great movement, and his first defeat on the White Mountains near Prague, in November 1620, destroying his hopes, he fled from the kingdom; taking with him the crown jewels, but leaving his unfortunate Bohemian followers a prey to the vengeance of the merciless Ferdinand.

This was the last effort of the Bohemians to maintain their religious liberties by force of arms. Henceforth they submitted to the power of the house of Austria, to which they have ever since been attached. The Jesuits whom Frederick had banished were restored; Roman Catholicism was made the established religion of the country, and every effort was made to bring back the natives to the communion of Rome. To the legitimate means of conversion used by the Jesuits were added others of a more questionable character. The government put forth all its strength to crush those who were regarded as political opponents. Persecutions, the quartering of soldiers upon the disaffected, and the uprooting of families, did their work. Moreover, Protestantism pure and simple had never found great favour in the eyes of the people, and with the political decay of the national party, the peculiar religious fire of the nation was quenched. An immense majority of the people is now Roman Catholic. There are a few Lutherans and Calvinists among them, chiefly of German extraction; a remnant also of the Hussites still lingers on under the name of Bohemian Brethren [HUSSITES], but the national, Catholic, and anti-papal party has long been extinct. BOLINGBROKE. A sceptical nobleman of the last century [A.D. 1672-1751] who promoted among the higher classes that flippant infidelity for which they were so conspicuous during the reigns of Queen Anne and the first two Hanoverian Kings, and which he himself had learned in Paris. Bolingbroke may be said to have originated in England that supercilious and superficial style of infidelity which looks upon religion as an useful institution for women, children, and the lower classes, and which is worth the support of a government as a means of preserving order and the rights of property. BONI PUERI. [BEGHARDS.]

BONI VALETI. [BEGHARDS.]

BONOSIANS [BONOSIANI or BONOSIACI]. A sect formed in Macedonia at the end of the fourth century by Bonosus, Bishop of Sardica. Bonosus held that Jesus Christ is the Son of God by adoption only [Pseud.-Hier. xlii.; Isid. Hisp. liii.]. This identifies his doctrine with that of Photinus; an identification made by the second Council of Arles, can. xvi. and xvii. Gennadius also states, that Audentius, a Spanish bishop, wrote against the Photinians, "who are now called Bonosiaci" [de Vir. Ill. cap. 14; quoted by Lardner, Cred. cap. lxxxix. q. v.]. How soon Bonosus and his followers reached this stage of complete Photinianism is not known. There appears to have been an intermediate stage, during which the party was gradually drifting into the open denial of the pre-existence of Christ. For in no other way can we reconcile the high authorities of the Council of Arles and Gregory the Great, which are seemingly in direct contradiction. The council [II. Arles. can. xvii.] says it is manifest that the Bonosians baptize in the name of the Trinity, and orders, therefore, converts from them to be received with chrism and imposition of hands. Gregory says as unhesitatingly that they do not baptize in that name [Decret. Collect. pars. iii. dist. iv. can. Hi vero hæretici]. It is easy to conclude (and it agrees with the natural course of heresy) that the council refers to the early practice of the sect, and Gregory to the later practice. In the year 389 or 390, Bonosus was condemned by Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, and Anysius, Bishop of Thessalonica, and others, as delegates of the Synod of Capua, for teaching that the Blessed Virgin, after our Lord's birth, bore children to Joseph. The two bishops wrote to Ambrose inquiring his opinion. Ambrose replied that the case was referred to them by the synod, and that it was not his place to give a judicial opinion,—"Vicem enim Synodi recepistis," "Vos enim totius Synodi vice decernitis, nos quasi ex Synodi auctoritate judicare non convenit." But privately he approves their sentence. He names no other charge against Bonosus than that relating to the Blessed Virgin [Ambrose. Epist. i. v. ed. 1616]. It seems then that after his condemnation on this point Bonosus fell by degrees into Photinianism. [ANTIDICOMARIANITES.] The sentence was of suspension from his episcopal functions, but Bonosus continued to ordain those who applied to him.

The Decretal Epistles of Innocent I. make mention of Bonosus more than once. The larger number of the epistles are no doubt forgeries; it is doubtful whether any are genuine. Still they were early forgeries, for Dionysius Exiguus accepted them, and they may be taken as evidence of facts where the object of the forger did not call for misrepresentation. In the present case his object would be not to misrepresent the facts, but to ascribe the conduct held towards Bonosus to the principle of obedience to the See of Rome. The letter to Laurentius, Bishop of Senia in Dalmatia, directs that the Defensors of the Church drive away the Bonosians, who deny Christ to have been born of the Substance of the Father before the world. That to Martianus, bishop of Naissus in Dacia, directs that they who were ordained by Bonosus before his condemnation be continued in the clergy. That to the bishops and deacons of Macedonia warns that the reception of some ordained by Bonosus which has been already allowed is not to be made a precedent, and states that many who despaired of obtaining orders in the Church procured ordination from Bonosus with the view of returning to the Church, and the hope of being received as of the clergy. [Johnson, Vade Mecum, ii. 301.] How long the sect existed is not known.

BONS HOMMES. [PERFECTI.]

BORBELITES. [BARBELIOTES.]

BORBORIANS. [BARBELIOTES.]

BORRELISTS. A sect of the Mennonites or Dutch Baptists which originated with Adam Borrel, a man of good station and learning, in the latter half of the seventeenth century. Their distinction from the Mennonite body at large was that they professed an austere life and rejected all external ordinances of Divine worship, being thus analogous to the English Quakers. [Stoupp, Traité de la Religion des Hollandais.]

BOUGRES. [BULGARIANS.]

BOURIGNONISTS. A sect of French Quietists of the seventeenth century, followers of Antoinette Bourignon de la Porte, a lady of Flanders, who was born at Lisle in the year 1616, and died at Franeker in Friesland in the year 1680. Madame Bourignon imagined that she had received a direct inspiration from God to restore the Christian religion, which she alleged to have been lost in the midst of the controversies which it had raised. Setting her face against all churches and sects, she devoted herself to the task of forming a new community of which she should be the living instructress; her qualification for that office being based on a claim that the true spiritual meaning of Holy Scripture had been specially revealed to her. Full of enthusiasm, she also possessed great conversational powers, and these qualities gained her many converts even among persons of high education. She was also a most industrious author, her collected writings filling nineteen volumes; but these, and probably her conversation also, were largely borrowed from the mystical theology of an earlier date. The leading point of her system was that common to the Pietistic mystics, that religion consists in emotion and conscious feeling, not in knowledge and practice.

The most distinguished of the Bourignonists were a Jansenist priest of the Oratory of Mechlin, named Bartholomew de Cordt, and Peter Poiret, a Calvinistic minister of considerable learning. The latter was an energetic coadjutor of Madame Bourignon, and after her death became the leader of her sect, his exposition of its principles being printed in 1713, in six volumes, entitled The Divine Economy, or an universal system of the works and purposes of God, written originally in French.

The Bourignonists spread from Holland to Germany, France, Switzerland and England, and at the end of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth century held a position not unlike to that of the Swedenborgians in later times. Some still kept up their connection with the churches or sects to which they had previously belonged; others separated themselves from all Christian societies and followed a life of private contemplation, studying the works of the Quietists and Pietists in general, but looking to those of their founder as the great source of spiritual knowledge.

BOURNEANS. This name has been given to the disciples of a Birmingham preacher named Bourne, who maintained the most extreme form of the doctrine of annihilation, which places the final punishment of impenitent sinners not in suffering but in the total extinction of their existence.

BRACHITÆ. A sect of the Manichæans, which Prateolus assigns to the end of the third century, but of which nothing is known. [Prateol. Hæres. xxxiii.]

BRAHMINS. The religion of Brahminism is professed by about 150,000,000 people in the peninsula of India. It derives its name from the title of the chief caste of its votaries, from which alone the priests are taken; but it is also known as Hindooism, or the Hindoo religion. Brahminism is the oldest of the religions that have sprung from the Aryan family of mankind. The religion of Zoroaster, or Magianism, is an offshoot from it. Buddhism was a schism and an antagonism. It is derived from and professes to be based on sacred writings in the Sanscrit language, the oldest of which are of extreme antiquity. In its present form it differs widely from the primitive religion, owing to successive corruptions, arising partly from the development of religious thought, partly, as it appears, from unknown foreign accretions, partly from impositions devised for the purpose of maintaining and extending the power of the Brahmins or priestly caste.

I. The primitive form of the Hindoo religion is known to us only from the sacred books, or Vedas, written in the Sanscrit language. These are four in number—the Rig-Veda, the Yagur-Veda, the Sama-Veda, and the Atharva-Veda. Collectively, they are known as the Veda, from the same root as ōḍa, meaning originally knowledge. Of these the Rig-Veda, or Veda of Praise, is by far the most ancient and important, and alone deserves the name of Veda, being the basis of the other three, which are liturgical books for the use of the different orders of priests and ministers who take part in the sacrifices. Each Veda consists of two portions, the Sanhita or Mantras, which are hymns to the gods, and the Brahmanas and Sutas, commentaries in prose. There is a further class of works called Aranakas and Upanishads, which may be regarded as an appendix to the Brahmanas. These commentaries are all of much later date than the hymns, the Brahmanas with their appendix preceding the Sutas, as is evident from their style and contents. The Rig-Veda Sanhita—which is alone the true record of the primitive faith—consists of ten books, containing 1028 (or excluding 11 generally held to be spurious 1017) hymns by many different authors, addressed to various deities. The latest of these hymns date from at least B.C. 1200; the earliest are placed by some authorities as high as B.C. 2000, by others at about B.C. 1500. Though all our MSS. are modern, yet the evidence, internal and external, for an extremely early date is incontrovertible. [For a brief summary see Max-Müller's Chips from a German Workshop, i. 10-17; also the same writer's History of Ancient Sanscrit Literature.] The Veda is held to be absolutely the work of the Deity, no mortal having composed a single line of it, and to have been revealed to mankind through the agency of "Rishis"—persons raised above the level of ordinary humanity, who were therefore preserved from error in the reception and tradition of truth. The Rishis, who were in fact the authors, are said by the Brahmins to have "seen" the respective portions they transmitted. There is nothing, however, in the Veda itself to countenance this theory, which is found in some other religions [MAHOMETANISM], and may be regarded simply as an expression of dependence on the Divine Being.

The religion of the Rig-Veda is apparently a gross polytheism—derived from the deification so natural to the childhood of the human race—of the powers and aspects of nature. Some of the deities mentioned are plainly of this character. Agni, the fire; Surya, the sun; the Maruts, storms. * Others appear as proper names, having so far lost the natural aspect which was once theirs. Varuna [Οὐρανός], the heavens; Mitra, the sun-light; Indra, the firmament. The most prominent deities are Indra and Agni, to whom nearly half the hymns are addressed. There is no recognition of the Hindoo Triad of later times—Brahma, Vishnu, Siva,—and no mention at all is made of other deities which are now most popular. But this polytheism is of a very peculiar character. There is an entire absence of any consciousness of that limitation of the powers of the respective gods which seems the necessary consequence of a plurality of deities. By the worshipper for the time being each god is looked on as absolute and supreme; while the others, for the moment, pass out of sight. To almost all in different hymns are these attributes assigned; no one god being ever regarded as superior or inferior to any other. In a few passages the different gods are regarded as but different names and powers of one supreme deity. While the hymns contain much that is literally childish—the product of the infancy of religion,—mean, tedious, commonplace, there is little that is positively bad. Degrading passions and acts are ascribed to the gods; the conception of them is in many respects low and unworthy. A low level is also assigned on the whole to human nature; the wants expressed are mostly of an earthly, material nature. But there is also much that is true and sublime. The gods are generally spoken of as immortal, and of expressions that seem to imply the contrary, as in speaking of the birth of certain gods, it may be seen that a physical phenomenon is the foundation,—the rising of the sun, the beginning of the day or year. The gods, as a rule, dwell in heaven, but some of them at times are present with men, draw near to the sacrifices, and listen to the praises of their worshippers. It is often said that the heavens and earth were created by certain gods, but occasionally ignorance is confessed of the beginning of the universe. A consciousness, somewhat vague indeed, of sin and moral evil is expressed, and there are frequent prayers for forgiveness. The gods are represented as rewarding good and punishing evil, and yet as forgiving, as just yet merciful. But their anger is chiefly represented as excited by some failure of service or offering to themselves, rather than by moral evil. There is no sign of a belief in metempsychosis, but in its place a belief in actual personal immortality, with, seemingly, rewards and punishments for the good and evil. There is no mention of either idols or temples; but there is in the later hymns a manifest tendency to the worship of symbols, even of the objects of sacrifice, as the horse, the symbol of and offering to the sun, the soma plant, of the moon, and the post to which the sacrificial victim was tied. There is no trace of the existence of caste, nor of suttee or widow-burning, which was a later introduction supported by corrupting a text of the Rig-Veda. The worship was offered only in each man's house, in a chamber set apart for the purpose. It was of a very simple character, consisting of prayers, chiefly for material benefits, riches, prosperity, good crops, success over enemies and in the chase, and great spoils, and the like; of praises, and of offerings. In the earlier hymns these consist only of clarified butter poured on the fire, of cakes, parched grain, and other simple viands, and of the intoxicating juice of the soma plant. In the later period we read of animal sacrifices, especially of the horse. II. The transitional form of Brahminism from this simple elemental religion to the later system is especially seen in the works called Brahmanas and Upanishads. The former are a development on the ceremonial side. They contain legends and allegories which have their germ in the Veda, derived in many cases from divine epithets personified, sometimes from absolute misunderstanding of expressions. On these legends is based a most complex and artificial ceremonial. The Upanishads, on the other hand, contain a development from the philosophical and theological side, explaining the nature of the Supreme Being, his relation to the human soul, the process of creation, &c. The Upanishads are the basis of the enlightened and philosophical faith, and of the different systems of Hindoo philosophy, and are the only portions of the sacred literature that are much read and studied at the present day. This transition period is often called the epic period, its chief illustration being derived from the great Sanscrit epics,—the Maha Bharata and the Ramayana. The ritual and ceremonial is systematized in the so-called Institutes of Manu, still the great text-book of Brahminism, and held to be of supreme authority, though not a revelation in the same sense as the Veda. This work contains materials of various dates, but was compiled at latest three or four centuries B.C. While professing to be based on the Veda, it contains elements entirely alien to that religion, which have been plausibly supposed to come from a foreign source [see Wheeler, History of India, vol. ii.].

The religion taught in the Institutes of Manu is mainly the worship of Brahma, an emanation from and the creative energy of Brahma, the supreme spirit of the universe. Other inferior deities are mentioned, mostly identical with those of the Veda. The germs of the doctrine of the Triad are found, and their development may be seen in the epic poems. But the main point is the ritual and ceremonial, which are of the most complicated, precise, and burdensome character, embracing almost every act and moment of life. The caste system is found in all its rigour. The danger of offending the gods by imperfect service is set forth very vividly, and hence the necessity of constantly consulting the Brahmins, who were alone held to be acquainted with the details. The doctrine of metempsychosis is also set forth in its most developed form.

III. Modern Brahminism. Against this system of priestly domination Buddhism was an uprising, and for a time it obtained the supremacy. But a reaction came in favour of Brahminism, which succeeded in expelling Buddhism from India altogether, and entered upon a fresh development, especially in regard to the objects of worship. This forms the third and last period of Brahminism. The sources of this development are the works called Puranas and, in a less degree, the Tantras. The Puranas are eighteen in number, of various dates, from the eighth to the sixteenth century A.D., but incorporating older materials. They all begin with a cosmogony, and contain also theogonies, philosophical speculations, instructions in ritual, fragments of history, and countless legends. Their religion may be described as sectarian in character, supporting the doctrines of various sects, and so they do not form a consistent whole, though they are all accepted as incontrovertible authority. Hence arise various inconsistencies, anomalies, and contradictions.

The existence of a supreme being is indeed still set forth, from whom all other beings—the deities, men, the world—derive their existence; from whose substance they are, and whom, in fact, they in some sense constitute. But this monotheism or pantheism is practically obscured by the direction of devotion to a multitude of deities, said to be 330,000,000 in number. This number, however, includes spirits and demons of various kinds. The gods universally acknowledged are seventeen in number, the great Triad (Trimurti) Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, the creating, preserving, and destroying principles, with the corresponding female divinities, being the most important. The other deities are mostly powers of nature, including many of those mentioned in the Veda,—Indra, Varuna, Agni, &c. Besides these, veneration is paid to the planets, to many sacred rivers, to a host of local gods. Of the three great gods, Brahma, though once supreme, is but little worshipped now, having only one temple in all India. Vishnu and Siva have attracted almost all the veneration. Vishnu is mainly worshipped under the form of avatars, or incarnations—manifestations on earth in various forms, animal and human—ten in number, of which one is yet to come. The most revered of these are Krishna and Rama. Siva, the principle of destruction, is also looked on as the principle of renewal, and hence is worshipped under the form of the lingam, identical with the ancient phallus [see Herod. ii. 48, 49]. In his honour frequent and bloody sacrifices are offered, and his votaries inflict horrible and protracted tortures on themselves. His consort Devi is also much worshipped, especially with great sacrifices. It is said that 100 goats per month, besides other animals, are offered at her temple near Calcutta. Most of the other deities have no separate temples, but have their especial images, votaries, and festivals. Each god is regarded as having a separate heaven, to which its most assiduous worshippers are borne after death, where they are attended by good spirits; and also a separate hell for the wicked. Besides the deities whose worship is spread more or less over the country, each village has its own local gods, which are sometimes the spirits of men who have in any way distinguished themselves while living, sometimes incarnations or avatars of the more famous gods. There is a universal belief in the existence of good and evil spirits pervading the universe, with power to bless or to harm. The legends respecting the gods are of the most extravagant character. The three gods of the Triad are supposed to be equal in power, and yet quarrel and fight, and wound each other. There is no regular system of subordination of the gods, either to these three or to one another. The images have in most cases a monstrous character, with many heads, arms, or bodies. In the legends extraordinary power is ascribed to asceticism; even the deities are sometimes represented as subdued by it, and this although the ascetic may be a wicked man. The popular religion extols the efficacy of faith, i.e. reliance and entire dependence on and submission to some one deity. While morality and purity of life are inculcated, it is taught that neither they nor any religious forms avail without this faith, which also compensates for all deficiencies in them.

The religious sects which devote themselves exclusively to the cultus of one deity are exceedingly numerous. They may be divided into three chief classes—Vaishnavas, worshippers of Vishnu;

Saivas, of Siva; Saktas, of one of the female associates of the gods of the Triad. Each of these classes contains numerous subordinate sects. There are also small sects worshipping some one of the inferior gods. The members of the different sects are distinguished by painted marks on their foreheads. Many of them have monastic orders attached to them, both for males and females, in which distinctions of caste are comparatively disregarded. The sects also have appointed heads, who have very great influence and power; and there are mystic ceremonies of admission, differing in each case.

Such is the form which Brahminism assumes at this day among the masses. But such vulgar polytheism could not commend itself to the keen intellect and philosophizing spirit of the educated Hindoos. With them religion is based upon philosophy, a monotheism derived from pantheism. The learned Brahmins earnestly disclaim polytheism—such as that, for instance, of the ancient Greeks or Romans. They teach that there is but one God, manifesting himself primarily in his several functions as creator, preserver, and destroyer, under the several forms of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; they profess also that they look on images simply as aids to the mind in meditation on and prayer to the one supreme deity. The system of religious philosophy that is regarded as most orthodox teaches that the only truly existing being is the deity; all other forms are, as to their material properties, mere illusions as to their spiritual attributes; transient sparks, scintillations, emanations of his glory. The deity, existing in unapproachable, solitary supremacy, longed for offspring; from this desire has sprung every existing thing, by a series of emanations—first Brahmā the creator, and from him gods, men, demons, beasts, the earth. All these comprising the whole universe, in so far as they have true existence, are consubstantial with the deity, who is the basis underlying all the forms which they assume. In fact, the deity is the world undeveloped; the world is the deity in his development. The supreme deity, also called Brahma, is yet a pure abstraction, self-centred, and absorbed in self-contemplation, the end and cause of all things. Beings and matter owe their existence simply to the impulse of his will. The various forms that matter assumes are all pure illusions, possessing but a semblance of reality. This semblance of reality is due to Mâyā, which, originally a personification of the longing for offspring felt by the deity, became a synonym for delusion and unreality. The world and all that is in it passes through three stages, growth, perfection, and decay: this latter was deified as Siva, who is opposed to Brahmā, the creative power of the supreme Brahma; while Vishnu is the power that, by preserving all things, limits the dominion of Siva. A remarkable feature of Brahminism is that of “cycles of existence,” a feature which is almost peculiar to it. It is held that at the end of a cycle of prodigious length, the universe ceases to exist, the Triad and all the inferior gods pass out of being, and the

First Cause alone exists in his primeval singleness. But, after a long course of ages, he again puts forth his power, through which the whole creation, divine and human, comes into existence again. This process is being continually repeated. The soul of man is regarded as part of the divine spirit, taken out of his substance and of his nature, but, whereas he is unlimited, the soul is limited. This limitation was one result of the wish of the supreme for offspring. Souls were originally possessed of freedom and happiness; but through envy and ambition they fell, and thereby separated themselves still further from the divine essence. Then this world came into being as a place of trial, and souls were attached to bodies. Souls may animate all species of organic life, from the highest to the lowest, and rise by a succession of births through different bodies up to the human. Then their trial begins, which is to determine their future existence. Almost all acts are regarded as either merits or demerits, and the individual soul is rewarded or punished according to the balance of them. The rewards consist either of a superior lot in future existences, or of a removal to one of the heavens of bliss belonging to one or other of the deities, where the soul remains till it has been sufficiently rewarded. The punishments consist either of misery or degradation in future existences, or of suffering in one of the hells of the deities, till the balance of evil is expiated. In each case, after ages of enjoyment or misery, the stages of existence begin anew. Even the worst of men, after a purification by intense sufferings, may rise through the scale of being again and attain to bliss. The supreme point of bliss is to escape from the evil of a limited and separate existence by being absorbed or incorporated into the essence of the deity, or supreme soul from which the soul sprung, and of which it is a part. This is to be obtained either by works, by faith, or by knowledge. Works consist of devotion to the deities, sacrifices and offerings, prayers and praises, and a careful performance of the prescribed ceremonial of life and action. Knowledge is attained through one of the various systems of philosophy. The ceremonial is that prescribed in the laws of Manu, being most precise and exact. Five “sacraments” are prescribed for the daily use of the “twice-born man”—the superior castes: [1] The reading of the Vedas; [2] the offering of cakes to departed ancestors; [3] the pouring of clarified butter on the fire as a sacrifice to the fire, or to the powers of nature generally; [4] the offering of rice to the spirits; [5] the exercise of hospitality. All these, especially the first, are surrounded by many complicated ceremonies. There are also other observances, such as the three suppressions of the breath in honour of Brahma, the use of the mystic word “aum,” and of the Gayatri, a text of the Veda used as a prayer. Besides these distinctly religious acts, the law prescribes how to eat, drink, clothe one’s self, bathe, cut hair and nails, and even how to relieve nature, and assigns special rights and duties to each caste, and each subdivision of a caste. But in practice these injunctions are very generally disregarded; and either by abbreviation, or by the doctrine of faith mentioned above: for instance, the devotions of the Brahmins, which, if performed fully, would take four hours, are contracted into half an hour, while the men of the lower castes simply repeat the name of their patron god as they bathe. The pursuit of philosophy again is regarded as of equal excellence with the life of religion, and as equally capable of leading to unity with the supreme spirit. There are six different systems of philosophy, all more or less pantheistic, identifying the deity and the universe, the universal supreme spirit and the individual soul; and all with the same end, to escape further existence in the world of sin and evil through absorption into the deity. But the systems differ in the means prescribed, in some simply knowledge, in others meditation, accompanied and purified by asceticism. For the most part the gods of the Hindoo pantheon are ignored, especially in the Sankhya system of Kapila, supposed by some to be the source of Buddhism.

It remains to sketch briefly the system of caste, through which Brahminism has obtained such power. The original division was simply into four—the Brahmins or priests, the Kshatryas or warriors (including kings), the Vaisyas or merchants, tradesman, &c., and the Sudras. The three former are called twice-born, and were regarded as being on a very different level from the fourth. There is no trace of such a division in the Rig-Veda, but indications are found of a class below the people for whom the Veda was given. These afterwards became the Sudras, and were probably the earlier population whom the Aryan race conquered. In the Brahmanas the beginnings of the system are seen; while in the Institutes of Manu it exists in full force. The means by which the distinction was established seem to have been nearly as follows. The Kshatryas, who originally offered the sacrifices and performed the religious ceremonies for themselves, devolved these duties upon the Brahmins, who, by making them more difficult by additions and the like, gradually monopolized them, and began to attempt a general control of life and habits. Then came a struggle for supremacy between the Brahmins and Kshatryas, in which the latter were vanquished, and, according to legend, ultimately destroyed. The Rajpoots, however, and some others, contend that the Kshatryas still exist with them. From the struggle arose the distinction between the Brahmins, the Kshatryas, and the great bulk of the people—the trading, working, and mercantile class. The Institutes of Manu contain an attempt to map out the adult life of every man of the three twice-born castes to his burial, into four distinct phases; so as to bring every part of life under the intimate control of religion—that is to say, of the Brahmin caste, the authorized expounders and teachers of it. The first period is that of the student of the sacred books. During this time, which was begun at various ages—earlier for the Brahmins than for the other castes—the student, under the guidance of some distinguished Brahmin, to whom he was bound to pay almost servile devotion, learned all the religious observances, and the means of subduing and quenching all desires for material things. The second period was that of the married man and householder, performing his various duties to the gods, the state and his fellows. The third period was that of the hermit, during which the twice-born man learned to mortify his passions and desires altogether, and by means of ascetic practices to obtain the power of abstracting his thoughts from all material things, and fixing them only on the deity. The fourth period, that of the devotee, followed when this latter power was obtained, by the entire subjugation and eradication of the passions, and was spent simply in contemplation. This system is still followed among the Brahmins, who declare that both the other castes of the twice-born have died out, themselves alone remaining. Below the Brahmins now exist a great number of subdivisions, embracing different trades and occupations. These have apparently arisen from trade guilds, which, established to preserve the respectability and privileges of their respective trades, have gradually been transmuted into hereditary societies. The attribution of a sacred character to the castes is a mere imposition of the Brahmins to support their power; and the exclusiveness of the system—through contact with the English—seems to be dying out.

The weakness of Brahminism consists: [1] In the horrible theory of transmigration, which leads men to embrace other religions to be free from it; [2] in the exclusiveness of the caste system, and the isolation it produces among individuals who are thus led to apostatize; [3] in the contending claims of religion and philosophy, of faith, works, and knowledge, from which arises a low standard of morality, and of religious obligations. BRAHMOO SOMAJ, or BRAHMO SAMAJ. A Hindoo sect of Monothists originated in recent times by the contact of Brahminism with anti-sacerdotal forms of Christianity. The name is derived from the Sanscrit words Brahmā, the Creator, or Supreme Cause of the Universe, and Samāja, an assembly; and thus signifies "the Church of the One God."

The religion of India appears at the present day to be in a state of transition; and those who know the country expect the occurrence of some important change. Three such changes have been considered possible: [1] either the restoration of a decaying Brahminism, with its 330,000,000 gods, and superstitions of such an extravagant character as those of the Yogi devotees, and the orgies of such sects as the Maharajahs; or [2] the conversion of the whole population to Christianity; or [3] the rise of an indigenous and more enlightened faith on the ruins of the dead Hindooism. Such a faith is believed by its supporters to be provided by the Brahmoo Somaj, which is therefore sometimes called "the Reformed National Church of India."

Its founder was Ramohun Roy (Rama Mohuna Raya), who was born of Brahmin parents in the district of Bordouan [c. A.D. 1774]. His object was not to found a new religion, but to revive the pure monotheism of the primitive Hindoo faith, as prescribed in the Vedas, and as opposed to the idolatrous teaching of the later Hindoo books; an object which eventually caused a schism in the Brahmoo Somaj, and was abandoned by the more advanced school, who discovered that the Vedas, on which they professed to base their faith, taught, amid much that was true, such doctrines as nature-worship, transmigration of souls, with many grotesque rites and ceremonies. Ramohun Roy received a good education, acquiring while still young a knowledge of Arabic, Persian, and Sanscrit, to which he afterwards added Hebrew, Greek, and English. He shewed early signs of dislike for the gross forms of religion by which he was surrounded, and during a visit to Thibet in his fifteenth year excited the animosity of its inhabitants by ridiculing the worship of the Llama. The early death of his father [A.D. 1804] and of his two brothers left him in the possession of a large property, and free to express those sentiments which regard for paternal authority prevented his previously publishing to the world. His first book was written in Persian with an Arabic preface, and was entitled Against the Idolatry of all Religions. The public hostility which it provoked, and the numerous enemies arising in his own caste and kinsfolk, led him to move to Calcutta [A.D. 1814], where, four years later, he first gathered a few intelligent Hindoos around him in regular monotheistic worship [A.D. 1818]; from which time may be dated the commencement of the Brahmoo Somaj as an organized community. His next important works were An Essay on the Vedas, with a collection of extracts of pure, simple, and moral passages, and an abridged translation of the Vedant;¹ and The Precepts of Jesus, a Guide to peace and happiness, in Sanscrit and Bengalee [A.D. 1820]. The latter work shewed a careful acquaintance with Christianity, and involved him for many years in controversy with members of various Christian bodies, as well as with his Hindoo antagonists. In A.D. 1831 he came to England, with the title of Rajah, to negotiate an increase of the East India Company's allowance to the King of Delhi. After landing at Liverpool he proceeded to London, where he was courteously received, being assigned a place among the ambassadors at the coronation of William IV., and finding a welcome among several dissenting bodies, more especially the Unitarians. About this time he successfully opposed an appeal made by the Hindoos to the King in Council against an enactment of the East India Council abolishing the suttee. In September [A.D. 1833] he went to Stapleton Lodge near Bristol, at which house he died rather suddenly of fever.

The small community which Ramohun Roy had established at Calcutta continued to exist for about a quarter of a century after his death, without much life or propagandist energy, supported by his bequests, and those of Dwarkanauth Tagore, which enabled them to retain a place of worship called the Brahmoo Somaj of Jorsauko, and to chronicle their proceedings in a monthly magazine entitled the Tattwabodhini Putrika. The next aggressive step was the opening of a Sunday school at Calcutta [A.D. 1859] under Debendro Nath Tagore, at that time president of the Brahmoo Somaj, for the purpose of giving young men a regular course of instruction in Brahmic theology and ethics. In the next year [A.D. 1860] they made a convert of Keshub (Kesava) Chunder Sen, grandson of Ram Kamal Sen, a man of distinction of the Vaida or physician caste. He was at this time twenty-three years of age, and being left an orphan had been educated in an English school, and had graduated in the college at Calcutta. Enthusiastic in the cause of the reform of religion he issued (with the assistance of Hurro Lall Roy, a talented Brahmin) various tracts, and, at the cost of an open breach with the older members of the sect [c. A.D. 1864], rejected the doctrine of the infallibility of the Vedas, which had been taught by its founder, and which seemed the connecting link between his teaching and that of the old Hindoo religion.

Chunder Sen visited England [A.D. 1870], and was welcomed at a soiree in Hanover Square Rooms on April 12th, by a miscellaneous collection of ministers and laity of ten various denominations, several persons of distinction being also present, including Lord Lawrence, the Dean of Westminster, Louis Blanc, &c. During the five months which he spent in this country he preached in different dissenting chapels, chiefly Unitarian, Congregational, or Baptist, and spoke at public meetings in London, and in most of the large provincial towns, including Bath, Birmingham, Bristol, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Leeds, Leicester, Liverpool, Manchester, and Nottingham. The Queen granted him a personal interview at Osborne, August 13th. He preached a farewell sermon in the Unitarian chapel at Islington, September 4th, was again entertained at a soiree at the Hanover Square Rooms, September 12th, by invitation of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and sailed for India from Southampton, September 17th, 1870.

General character of the Brahmoo Somaj. The religion of this new sect, which its founders hope will develope into the national Church of India, may be described as a pure or "pectoral" theism, entirely evolved out of man's own consciousness, and not based on any external support of revelation or tradition. Hence the importance attached to the study of mental philosophy and psychology, which have not only a subjective utility, as the best means of affording intellectual and moral exercise to the mind, but also an objective value as the means of attaining the truths of theology and ethics [Lectures and Tracts, p. 197]. Faith is defined as a direct vision; it is no dogma of books nor tradition of venerable antiquity; it relies upon no evidence, and will have no mediation; it neither borrows an idea of God from metaphysics, nor a narrative of God from history; it bows its neck to no logical or historical deity [p. 256]. Prayer is not a matter which can be argued out by any appeal to books or to deductions of logic [p. 236]. Of the three component elements of worship—adoration, gratitude, and prayer—the latter is by far the most important, provided that its nature is rightly understood, and that instead of being debased into petitions for rain, and for pleasant breezes, and for outward prosperity, it is confined to its proper objects, spiritual knowledge, spiritual power, and spiritual holiness [p. 241, English Visit, p. 75]. "Prayer makes the weak powerful, the timid heroic, the corrupt righteous, and the ignorant wise. Prayer lifts the soul above all that is earthly, shadowy, and mean, and ushers it into the very presence of the All-Holy" [Fraser's Mag. August 1866]. Thus purified and spiritualized the Brahmoo Somaj is to form a golden mean between mysticism and scepticism, between the superstition of Brahmins and the materialism of Buddhists; it is to be an eclectic religion, rejecting the dross while extracting what is good out of the profound devotion of Hindooism, and the heroic enthusiasm of Mahometanism and the moral precepts of Christianity. It will uphold the absolute infinity and unity of the Divine Creator, and will suffer no created thing to usurp His sovereignty. It will worship Him alone, and thoroughly set its face against every form of creature-worship. But while admitting the unity of the divinity, the future Church will recognize a trinity of divine manifestations. God manifests Himself to us through external nature, through the inner spirit, and through moral greatness impersonated in man. Here, therefore, the idolater, the pantheist, and the prophet worshipper will find what they severally want. Their delusions, errors, and aims will certainly be destroyed; but the genuine aspirations of their nature, all their normal cravings for spiritual aids, will be duly satisfied; and, instead of a hundred hostile churches, there will be upreared in the fulness of time one vast cathedral, where all mankind will worship with one heart the Supreme Creator [Lectures, pp. 145, 147]. This homage will be extremely simple, for there will be no teacher, no priest, no rites or ceremonies, and no books, if we except a very small manual of occasional prayers drawn up by Chunder Sen. In short, this new religion will resemble the theistic society recently established by Mr. Voysey in London, or the

Its attitude towards Christianity. This is not so much one of hostility as of patronizing condescension. "Every Christian sect," says Chunder Sen, "has tried to realize the kingdom of God, but has failed, and has succeeded, after all, in representing one side only of Christianity. . . . I should be a traitor to the universal Church of Theism to which I belong, if my heart and soul were not capacious enough to take in the whole length and breadth of the Christian Church. Come unto me, brothers and sisters of England and France, Germany and Switzerland, and Italy and all Europe; come unto me, brothers and sisters of America," &c. [Eng. Visit, pp. 253, 254]. In the earlier days of the Brahmoo Somaj, many persons imagined that its members would not accept the name of Christians, or undergo the rite of baptism, simply because of the social persecution which such a step would involve at the hands of their relations and the members of their caste. This charge may have had some foundation in those days, but the present leader of the sect makes the unambiguous declaration, "I never put myself forward as a Christian, and I never will" [p. 322]. Though the Brahmoo Somaj is thus not to be described by the epithet "Christian," it is decidedly Unitarian in form and tendency. "I tell you candidly," said Chunder Sen, addressing a Unitarian audience, "that I have felt quite at home in all Unitarian assemblies private and public" [p. 309]. Many years before, A.D. 1824, Ramohun Roy, writing to Dr. Ware, had made a similar assertion. "To the enlightened members of Hindostan the ideas of a Triune God, of a Man-God, of the appearance of God in the bodily shape of a dove, or of the blood of God shed for the payment of a debt, seem entirely heathenish and absurd, and consequently their sincere conversion to Trinitarian Christianity must be morally impossible. But they would not scruple to embrace, or at least to encourage, the Unitarian system of Christianity, were it inculcated on them in an intelligible manner" [Correspondence with Rev. H. Ware, London, C. Fox, 1825, p. 135]. There are plentiful acknowledgments in various places of Jesus Christ, as (if not the greatest and truest, yet) a great and true benefactor of mankind, and worthy of being classed with Vyasa in the honour and esteem demanded at the hands of humanity. There seems to be much fascination for the Indian mind in the idea of His Asiatic descent, and His birth on the boundary line between Europe and Asia: but when He is honoured above others, as the Incarnation of Deity, we are to understand the superiority accorded to be one of degree only. The Christian Scriptures, like the Hindoo Vedas, contain a superstitious element along with much that is admirable. "Had not experience too clearly proved that some of the metaphorical expressions, when taken singly, and without attention to their contexts, may be made the foundation of doctrines quite at variance with (what I conceive to be) the tenor of the rest of the Scriptures, I should have had no hesitation in submitting indiscriminately the whole of the doctrines of the New Testament to my countrymen ; as I should have felt no apprehension that even the most ignorant of them, if left to the guidance of their own unprejudiced views of the matter, could misconceive the clear and distinct assertions they everywhere contain of the unity of God and subordinate nature of His messenger Jesus Christ" [Ramohun Roy's second appeal to the Christian public in defence of the Precepts of Jesus, p. 167].

Special reforms aimed at by the Brahmoo Somaj. However far this new Indian sect is thus seen to differ on fundamental points of doctrine from the teaching of the Catholic Church, it is nevertheless engaged in a crusade against abuses, and in a promotion of practical reforms, which win the sympathy of every civilized man. But they do not involve, as they appear to do on first sight, any approximation to Christianity, so much as a return to the purer system and teaching of the older Hindoo religion and sacred writings.

First, it aims at the abolition of idolatry and restoration of a pure monotheism. "Not only," says Chunder Sen, in one of his appeals to young India, "must you not worship idols yourselves, but you must discountenance it in others, and hunt it out of the country ; for the sake of your souls, and of the souls of millions of your countrymen, you must acknowledge only one Supreme and true God, our Maker, Preserver, and Moral Governor." This is in accordance with the teaching of the older Hindoo writings, as will be evident from the following passage in the Vedas : "They called him Indra, Mitra, Varuna, and Agni. That which is one the wise call by divers names ;" and from the later books of the Upanishads, "Let us endeavour to know the Ruler of the universe, who is God of gods, Deity of deities, Lord of lords, above all, who manifests Himself and is worthy of all reverence" [English Visit, p. 492].

Secondly, it seeks the abolition of caste, as the bulwark of Hindoo idolatry, the safeguard of the Brahminical priesthood, and, on wider grounds, as an audacious and sacrilegious violation of God's law of human brotherhood, and of the doctrine of the equality of all souls in His sight. For the future, a Kshatrya is not to look down on a Vaisya, and even a high class Brahmin, if so inclined, is to accept as wife a low class Sudra. Caste, which was originally a system of social distinctions, or a division of society into trades and professions, became in later times fortified by religious sanctions, which were unknown to the earlier Hindoo writings [English Visit, p. 494].

Thirdly, it desires the reform of the zenana, or amelioration of the condition of the women of India, by the promotion of female education, the establishment of girls' schools, and the alteration of the rule by which woman is treated as a menial in the household, a cipher in society, and a victim to a life-long seclusion ; by the alteration of the custom of early marriage, which has been proved to be physically, intellectually, and morally pernicious ; by the abolition of the law of compulsory widowhood, a burden more intolerable on account of the practice of polygamy. A man not unfrequently dies, leaving fifty women doomed to perpetual widowhood, and ready in their social solitude to become victims to all the mortifications which the Brahminical priesthood has invented for persons in their condition.

Its present strength as to numbers and position. As there is no initiatory rite or formal admission into the Brahmoo Somaj it is not easy to obtain precise information on this head. The following report of its position was furnished to its representative council some years ago.

There are fifty-four Brahmoo Somajes in India, of which fifty are in Bengal, two in the North-western provinces, one in the Punjab, and one in Madras, the latter bearing the name of the Veda Somajum. Five of the Somajes are in Calcutta, the oldest of them being in its thirty-sixth year. Twenty-five new ones have been added in the last ten years. Eight of these churches have established religious schools for instruction in the tenets of Brahminism. For secular education, there is the Calcutta College, established and instituted by the leading members of the Calcutta Somaj. There are also boys' and girls' schools in connection with ten provincial Somajes. All these are under the direct management of the members of the local Somajes, and are mostly assisted by Government grants. There are seven periodicals regularly maintained by the body ; the monthly "Tattwabodhini Putrika" at Calcutta, and two others of the same name published in Urdu and Telegu, at Bareilly and Madras ; four other magazines in native tongues ; two newspapers in English, the Mirror and the National Paper ; and two more native newspapers in Dacca [Indian Mirror, Jan. 1, 1866].

In the course of lectures delivered in Scotland [A.D. 1870], Chunder Sen estimated its number of adherents at about six thousand, almost exclusively men, and the number of places of worship at about sixty.

Its future prospects. The more sanguine adherents of the Brahmoo Somaj, buoyed up by its past development, and seeing the scant success which has attended the attempts to introduce Christianity among the natives of India, predict for it the position of the Hindoo Church of the future, looking forward to the time when a grand national organization shall have been effected among the one hundred and eighty millions of the population, and when, all distinctions of religion and caste being destroyed, "the Church of the one supreme Lord" will be established throughout the length and breadth of the country [English Visit, p. 123].

BRETHREN. [TUNKERS.]

BRETHREN, CHRISTIAN. [CHRISTIAN BRETHREN.]

BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE. [FRIENDS OF GOD.]

BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT. A later name for the sect of the ORTLIBENSES and AMALRICIANS. The name was assumed from the words of St. Paul, "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death. . . . For as many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God" [Rom. viii. 2, 14]. The liberty thus claimed was, first, freedom from outward ordinances, and, secondly, freedom from the guilt of sin. They were simply Antinomians of the most extreme form.

The teachers of the sect wandered about from place to place in imitation of the Apostles, and that sacred name was given to them by their followers. They brought over to their opinions many of the Waldenses and most of the Beghards; and their fanatical lawlessness led to the revival of the Inquisition in Germany in the fourteenth century. After the end of the thirteenth century they seem to have been identified with the BEGHARDS, and in later times were represented by the FAMILISTS.

BRETHREN, PLYMOUTH. [PLYMOUTH BRETHREN.]

BROAD CHURCHMEN. A modern school of Latitudinarians, composed of those clergy and laity of the Church of England who dissent from the principles developed during the revival of exact theological learning. The designation "Broad" has been assumed as expressive of the comprehensiveness which the theology of this school offers to men of various opinions; but it is scarcely a fitting designation, as well defined opinions of a positive kind are not included. The most distinctive characteristic of the Broad Church School is, in reality, its rejection of traditional beliefs, and the substitution in their place of what has been aptly called a "Negative Theology," in which much is doubted and rejected, and very little believed.

This school of thought is generally traced back to Dr. Arnold, Master of Rugby School from 1828 until his death in 1842. But he was only one of a band of intellectual men who floated on the stream of reaction from the High Church movement; and he did no more to originate the reaction than was done by Hare, Whately, or Maurice. Its real origin is to be traced to the instinctive opposition raised in the minds of forcible thinkers whose occupations had led them in other directions than that of theological study, to the positive conclusions at which other forcible thinkers were arriving, who made theological study the special object of their lives. Whately and Arnold were obviously representative men of the one class, Newman and Pusey of the other.

The sporadic elements of this school were aggregated into a party by the "Hampden Controversy." When Hampden was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, on the nomination of Lord Melbourne in 1836, the searching critical power of Newman, then Fellow of Oriel, was brought to bear upon the Bampton Lectures on the scholastic theology which the new Professor had delivered four years previously. Newman's pamphlet, "Elucidations of the Bampton Lectures," stimulated a growing discontent with the appointment, and the Convocation of the University passed a vote of censure upon their author; a vote in which Dr. Hampden was, perhaps, condemned by some as a nominee of the Whig party. In 1848 he was appointed to the Bishopric of Hereford. The controversy was revived with great bitterness, and an unsuccessful attempt was made to prevent his consecration. From that time Dr. Hampden was never again heard of in the theological world; and it is difficult to understand how it was that his lectures—which have long been relegated to the usual Bampton Lecture shelf at the top of the library, and contained nothing remarkably unorthodox—should ever have raised so great a storm of controversy as they did.

A work much more expressive of Broad Church principles was published in the year 1853, namely, a volume of Theological Essays, by Mr. Maurice, Professor of Theology in King's College, London, a man of much higher intellectual mark than Dr. Hampden. In these the doctrines of the Holy Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement, Inspiration, and Eternal Punishment, among others, were dealt with in language remarkable for its beauty, and for its inconsistency with the opinions of orthodox Churchmen. They were at once accepted by Broad Churchmen as a statement of their opinions, and have continued ever since to influence them. The Council of King's College, on October 28th, 1853, declared the opinions expressed, the doubts indicated in the Essays, with the subsequent correspondence respecting future punishments and the final issue of the day of judgment, to be of dangerous tendency, and likely to unsettle the minds of the theological students; and further decided that Mr. Maurice's continuance as Professor would be seriously detrimental to the interests of the College. Notwithstanding this dismissal, Mr. Maurice afterwards held office as a Professor at Cambridge, and subsequently became a London incumbent; and no writer did more to mould the opinions of the Broad Church School.

The greatest literary success of the school was however a composite work of third-rate merit,—but now historical,—entitled Essays and Reviews, which was published in February 1860. It was an octavo volume of 434 pages, containing seven articles on theological questions of the day by as many writers (who were said to have written quite independently of each other), and edited by Professor Jowett. The book was not at all remarkable for originality, but was strikingly so for the boldness with which it revived old sceptical theories, and the skill with which they were clothed in decent language, such as would alone secure their reception in the present day. Although far below Maurice's Essays in talent, the Essays and Reviews volume obtained an enormous circulation, and affected the opinions of so many superficial thinkers that it will be proper to state shortly what is the nature of its contents.

The first Essay is by Dr. Temple, at that time Master of Rugby School, but subsequently Bishop of Exeter. It is entitled "The Education of the World," and is substantially a plagiarism of Lessing's Essay on the same subject. The object of it may be stated to be to prove that the world has gone through several stages of religious education, and has now reached a higher development of religious knowledge than it has reached before. A parallel is drawn between the history of the individual man and that of the world, there being in each the three stages of childhood, youth and manhood. The Old Testament ages were the time of the world's childhood, when it was subject to positive laws and restrictions upon its freedom. The New Testament age was the world's youth, when external discipline was supplanted by example in the Person of Christ. This has been followed by the world's manhood, in which conscience is supreme, and the only limitation of freedom is that which it imposes.

The second Essay is by Dr. Rowland Williams, Vice-Principal of Lampeter, a Welsh College in which young men are educated for Holy Orders. He tries to prove that the ordinary ways of understanding the Bible are a mistake, and that now we have arrived at such a highly educated stage of the world's history, we ought not to be content with the interpretations to which our forefathers bowed down. The prophets did not predict events, but wrote down past or current history. It was not an angel or supernatural being that slew the first-born, but the "Bedouin host." The fifty-third chapter of Isaiah describes the sufferings of Jeremiah, not those of the Messiah, &c. &c.

The third Essay had for its author Mr. Baden Powell, Savilian Professor of Geometry at Oxford, and is written to prove the unreasonableness of believing that God ever worked miracles, or that He created the world. The world made itself somehow or other in the course of millions of years, and miracles are "nature" improperly described by ignorant people. Such being the case, what greater mistake could there be than to suppose that creation is an evidence that there is a Divine Being, or that miracles are evidence of the Divine Being having commissioned those who work them, as, e.g., Moses before Pharaoh, or St. Peter and St. John at Jerusalem?

The fourth Essay is by the Rev. H. B. Wilson, Vicar of Great Staughton, and is an evidence of the way in which people sometimes argue against an opponent so vehemently that they end by converting themselves to that opponent's side. The author of this Essay was one of the leaders in a very intemperate attack on the writers in the Tracts for the Times for a supposed claim made by them to interpret the Thirty-nine Articles in a "non-natural sense." Mr. Wilson afterwards came to think that this inestimable privilege is the birthright of every enlightened Churchman, and that it is the height of intellectual subtlety to make anything out of anything, according to opinions and circumstances, at least in the interpretation of the Holy Bible or the Prayer Book. His own examples of this kind of interpretation are among the most dreadful things in the book. He considers many of the "traits in the Scriptural Person of Jesus" to belong to an ideal rather than an historical person; e.g., the Temptation did not really happen, but is an imaginary scene put into the Gospels to complete the picture. The Annunciation "may be of ideal origin" also, the writer says, and much more to the same purpose.

The fifth Essay was written by Mr. C. Goodwin, a layman. This author deals with what is called Scripture cosmogony, and the manner in which he does so is sufficiently explained by saying that he considers the Book of Genesis to have been written by some Hebrew man of science, who invented a theoretical account of creation, but living in a time when he had no geological discoveries to guide him, simply wrote down what proves to be full of mistakes.

The sixth is by the Rev. Mark Pattison, at the time of writing Fellow, and afterwards Rector, of Lincoln College, Oxford. It is on "the Tendencies of Religious Thought in England from 1688 to 1750." Although a very dry and uninteresting history of the subject, it is not nearly so much opposed to Christian interests and Christian principles as the others; and while many would have differed from the author's views, few would have attached much significance to his Essay if it had not appeared in such objectionable company.

The last Essay is on the "Interpretation of Scripture," by Mr. Jowett, then Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford, and subsequently Master of Balliol College. It is a sort of adaptation of the Bible to the theories contained in the previous Essays; and its chief object appears to be to lower the authority of Holy Scripture by showing that very little of it was inspired in any ordinary sense of inspiration.

The agitation raised by the publication of Essays and Reviews was greater than any that had taken place during the progress of the theological revival. High Churchmen and Low Churchmen combined in censuring the work: the bishops were all opposed to its teaching; 9,000 of the clergy signed a protest against it; and the Convocations of Canterbury and York passed a synodical condemnation upon "the pernicious doctrines and heretical tendencies of the book" in July 1864. This synodical judgment was suspended for some time on account of ecclesiastical suits which were being prosecuted against Dr. Williams by Bishop Hamilton of Salisbury, and against Mr. Wilson by Mr. Fendall. These two writers were both condemned by the Court of Arches, each being suspended from his benefice for a year by the sentence of Dr. Lushington on December 15th, 1862. This judgment was reversed on appeal to the Queen in Council, on February 8th, 1864, the Judicial Committee fencing their judgment by adding to it this paragraph: "We desire to repeat that the meagre and disjointed extracts which have been allowed to remain in the reformed Articles" of the suit "are alone the subject of our judgment. On the design and general tendency of the book called Essays and Reviews, and on the effect or aim of the whole Essay of Dr. Williams, or the whole Essay of Mr. Wilson, we neither can nor do pronounce any opinion. On the short extracts before us, our judgment is that the charges are not proved" [Brodrick and Fremantle, Eccl. Cases, p. 289]. This significant intimation that the book was placed before the court in a way which made its thorough judicial criticism impossible did not, however, damp the satisfaction of the Broad Church party, the judgment being considered as a triumphant vindication of the theological laxness which its members advocate and practise.

It was probably under the encouragement of this supposed victory that Dr. Colenso, Bishop of Natal in South-eastern Africa, published his speculations on the Pentateuch, by means of which he endeavoured to make the high-road of Biblical interpretation so very broad that the most arrogant sceptic would find no difficulty in walking along it. The purpose of this work was to minimize to the utmost the authority of the Pentateuch, and with it of all Holy Scripture; the first principle of the author being indicated by the words, "There is not the slightest reason to suppose that the first writer of the story in the Pentateuch ever professed to be recording infallible truth, or even actual historical truth. He wrote certainly a narrative. But what indications are there that he published it at large, even to the people of his own time, as a record of matter of fact, veracious history?" On the appearance of this volume—which looked very learned to unlearned people—Colenso was at once elevated to the post of choragus by the bulk of the Broad Churchmen. On the other hand, all the bishops of England, except Thirlwall, Bishop of St. David's, and all those of Ireland, except the less distinguished Fitzgerald of Killaloe, and Griffin of Limerick, wrote an united letter to the Bishop of Natal requesting him to resign his see. On his positive refusal, he was tried before a provincial synod at Cape Town, on charges of denying the Atonement, of believing in the justification of those who have no knowledge of the Saviour, of denying the inspiration of Holy Scripture, the Divinity of our Lord, and everlasting punishments, and of depraving and impugning the Book of Common Prayer. Having been found guilty of these charges, he was formally deposed from the see of Natal on November 27th, 1863. This deposition was subsequently declared null and void by the Queen in Council on the ground that the Metropolitan of Cape Town had not authority over the Bishop of Natal. But on January 7th, 1866, a solemn sentence of excommunication was published against him by the Bishop of Cape Town in the Cathedral of Pieter-Maritzburg, and subsequently a new Bishop was consecrated to take charge of the Colony.

From that time Bishop Colenso was little heard of as a leader of the Broad Church party, but his works are said to be extensively used by the Buddhists as a controversial authority against Christianity.

The opinions of a better informed posterity respecting the theological productions of the Broad Church school will probably be in accordance with that expressed by the learned Hengstenberg. "The authors of the Essays," he wrote, "have been trained in a German school. It is only the echo of German infidelity which we hear from the midst of the English Church. They appear to us as parrots, with only this distinction, common among parrots, that they imitate more or less perfectly. The treatise of Temple is in its scientific value about equal to an essay written by the pupils of the middle classes of our colleges. . . . The Essay of Goodwin on the Mosaic cosmogony displays the naïve assurance of one who receives the modern critical science from the second or tenth hand. The editor" (Hengstenberg) "asked the now deceased Andreas Wagner, a distinguished professor of natural sciences at the University of Munich, to subject this treatise to an examination from the standpoint of natural science. The offer was accepted, and the book given to him. But after some time it was returned with the remark, that he must take back his promise, as the book was beneath all criticism. . . . All these Essays tend toward atheism. Their subordinate value is seen in the inability of their authors to recognise their goal clearly, and in their want of courage to declare this knowledge. Only Baden Powell forms in this respect an exception. He uses several expressions, in which the grinning spectre makes his appearance almost undisguisedly. He speaks not only sneeringly of the idea of a positive external revelation, which has hitherto formed the basis of all systems of the Christian faith; he even raises himself against the 'Architect of the world,' whom the old English freethinkers and freemasons had not dared to attack" [Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, Vorwort, 1862].

The theological tendency of the Broad Church school in general is to drift through the channel of Unitarianism into Theism. Its Christology is restricted almost entirely to the human aspect of Christ's earthly life and ministrations; and so little of its Divine aspect, of Christ's Pre-existence, or of His present work, is recognised, that belief in His Deity has no real place in the personal creed of many Broad Churchmen; and all they have to say about our Lord is "Ecce Homo." The practical religion of the school is based on philosophical views of morals, in which self-control, rather than grace, is considered as the power by which holy living is to be accomplished, "manliness" rather than "godliness" being set up as the true ideal of Christian life.

But successive controversies have developed out of the original Broad Church party an extreme school, whose theology is of a much more positive character. This school is of a distinctly rationalist type, carrying Broad Church views about inspiration to the length of practical disbelief in Scripture; Broad Church views about our Lord to the length of Unitarianism; Broad Church views about everlasting punishment to Universalism; and Broad Church views about the priesthood and the Sacraments to an utter denial of their reality. Such is the natural terminus of the original school, and such must be the logical outcome of its opinions when they are taken up by men who are not satisfied to rest in negations and generalities.

BROWNISTS. [INDEPENDENTS.]

BRUGGLENIAN. A small sect of fanatics so called from the Swiss canton of Brugglen. In a village within that canton two brothers named Christian and Jerome Rohler blasphemously pretended [A.D. 1746] to be the two witnesses of the Book of Revelation; and the former of the two promised his followers that on a certain day he would ascend to Heaven and carry them with him. The Rohlers were both of them executed in the year 1753, and the fanaticism soon afterwards died out among their followers.

BRYANITES. [METHODISTS, BRYANITE.]

BUCHANITES. An insignificant sect which existed in Scotland for a few years at the close of the last century, and which bore, in its later development, some correspondence to the subsequent sect of Southcottians in England. Its foundress was Mrs. Buchan, the wife of a workman in a delf manufactory at Glasgow, and previously a domestic servant. She was originally an Episcopalian, but on her marriage about 1760 joined the sect to which her husband belonged, that of the Burgher Secession. About 1780 she began, probably under the influence of some religious excitement which deranged her mind, to teach that the millennium was close at hand, that no one of those who became her followers would die, but would be caught up to meet the Lord, and that while all the wicked would be at once struck dead for a thousand years, the believers in this immediate coming would, with their Lord, possess the earth for that period. She soon numbered among her followers a Relief Minister named Hugh Whyte of Irvine, a writer to the signet, a merchant, and various other persons. These forthwith, regarding the world as close to its end, forsook their worldly occupations, renounced marriage and attention to the duties of married life, and lived together in a society numbering forty-six members, with a common stock and purse, and occupied in the sole work of watching for the Great Appearing. Being assaulted by a mob at Irvine in April 1784, they moved to a farmhouse near Thornhill in Dumfriesshire. Here, in December of the same year, they were again attacked by a mob, for which thirteen of the assailants were fined in the Sheriff-court at Dumfries. In 1786 a number of Mrs. Buchan's followers returned to their homes at Irvine, relating the tricks and impositions which she had practised, and which were supposed to have for their aim the exhausting the patience and fidelity of her disciples so as to secure for herself the undivided possession of the goods which they contributed to the common stock. One of her latest pretended revelations was, that in order to be fit to ascend to Christ a previous fast of forty days and nights was requisite. This was immediately attempted by some, who would soon have died had they not been surreptitiously supported with spirits and water. She died in June 1791, and on her death-bed communicated to the few who remained with her (among whom was still Mr. Whyte) that she was none other than the Blessed Virgin, and the Woman spoken of in the Revelation as clothed with the sun; that she had been on the earth ever since the days of our Lord; that she should not now die, but only sleep for a while, and then awake and lead them to the New Jerusalem. Her infatuated followers in consequence would not bury her, but when compelled by the process of decay to place her body in a coffin, fixed it in a corner of a barn, until the neighbours procured an order from a justice of the peace for her interment. It is said that Mr. Whyte then went to America. [Scots Magazine, 1784, pp. 589, 590; 1785; p. 148, 1786; pp. 461, 462. Ann. Reg. 1791, Chron. pp. 26, 27. Train's Buchanites from first to last, Edinb. 1846.]

BUDDHISTS. The believers in a faith originated in India about 2500 years ago by Siddhartha, better known as Sakya-mouni, or by the title of Buddha (the enlightened) which he afterwards assumed, and from which his religion is named. Buddhism, though it has now disappeared from India, is professed by 455,000,000, being 31·2 per cent. of the human race, in Cashmere, Nepaul, Thibet, Tartary, Mongolia, China, Japan, Siam, Burmah, and Ceylon [Max-Müller, Chips from a German Workshop, i. 214; J. B. Saint-Hilaire, Le Bouddha et sa Religion, introd. ii.].

Buddhism was on one side the result of a protest against the religious and social despotism of Brahminism, which had wound itself round every act and moment of life. On another side it was an attempt to escape from the terrible theories involved in the doctrine of metempsychosis. Though many of the metaphysical doctrines of Buddhism may be found among the philosophers of Brahminism, yet, in practical bearing and social relations, the two religions are entirely at variance with each other.

The founder of Buddhism was born at Kapilavastu, the capital of a kingdom of the same name in Central India, at the foot of the mountains of Nepaul, to the north of the present Oude. The date of his birth is variously given by M. Saint-Hilaire and other writers at B.C. 622 [Le Bouddha, introd. ii.], and by Professor Max-Müller about seventy years later [Chips, i. 205]. His father, the king of the country, was of the family of the Sakyas and the clan of the Gautamas; hence the son was called afterwards Sakya-mouni—the solitary of the Sakyas. He is also known as Gautama, from the name of his clan, but his original name seems to have been Siddhartha [Saint-Hilaire, 3], though it is doubtful whether this name, like that of Buddha, was not adopted by him in later life [Chips, i.

218]. He was, as the son of a king, of the Kshatrya or warrior caste. From boyhood he was noted for his talents and beauty, and also for his melancholy temper and love of solitary meditation on the problems of life and death amid the shadows of the forests. He married early, in compliance with his father's wishes, who vainly desired thus to drive away his melancholy. The sight, on various occasions, of a man overwhelmed by the miseries and infirmities of age, of one dying of fever and overcome by the fear of death, of a funeral attended by the lamenting relatives of the deceased, set him on thinking how to escape from the miseries and the fear of old age, disease and death. An encounter with a mendicant or devotee—one who, renouncing all pleasures and desires, lived a life of austerity, without passion or envy, supported only by alms, and seeking only to obtain self-conquest—determined Buddha to retire from the world. He left his father's palace by night in secret, and became the pupil, first of one, then of a second, of the most famous of the Brahmin teachers; but from them he learned no means of deliverance for man. He then, with five companions, retired for six years into solitude, subjecting himself to the most frightful penances. At the end of this time he became convinced that the austerities availed no more than the doctrines of Brahminism in producing peace of mind, and deliverance from the fears with which he was troubled. He gave up his exercises and set himself to elaborate his own system. After long meditations and ecstatic visions, he imagined that he had at last arrived at the true knowledge which discloses the cause, and so removes the fear, of all the changes inherent in life. From this time he adopted the title of Buddha (the enlightened). For a while he hesitated whether he should communicate his knowledge to the world; but compassion for the sufferings of man prevailed. He went to Benares, the sacred city of the Brahmins, where he preached and lectured with great success. He afterwards travelled over many parts of India, making converts wherever he went. Several of the kings, including his father, and all his relations, embraced his doctrines; but he was vehemently opposed and persecuted by the Brahmins, over whom however he was victorious in every discussion. At last, having reached the age of seventy, or, according to some accounts, of eighty years, he died while sitting under a tree in a forest near the city of Kusinagara, B.C. 543 [Saint-Hilaire], or 477 [Max Müller]. His funeral rites were celebrated with great solemnity, amid thousands of his followers. After his body was burned, his remains were divided into eight portions, to be preserved as relics in different parts of the country.

The story of the life of Buddha was handed down by tradition, and, as we now possess it, was committed to writing about the first century B.C. A vast mass of childish legend and fiction had grown up around his history. [For some account of these, see Saint-Hilaire, Le Bouddha, pt. i. chap. ii. pp. 48-78; Spence Hardy, A Manual of Buddhism, sec. 7.] Though many of the details are doubtful, the general outline of his life may be accepted. He left no writings, but his discourses were collected by his disciples from tradition, and now form a portion of the Buddhist sacred writings.

It is necessary to notice a theory concerning Buddha propounded by the late Professor Wilson, in his Essay on Buddha and Buddhism, and adopted in part by Mr. Maurice [Lectures on the Religions of the World]. Professor Wilson, gathering up the different dates assigned to him, the mythical character attaching to several parts of the story, the mass of miraculous legend that had grown up about him, and various geographical difficulties, considers it doubtful whether such a person as Buddha ever existed. But many of the difficulties of the history have now been solved; and this theory is not accepted by the most recent students of Buddhism. [For a refutation of it, see Max Müller, Chips, i. 217, 218.]

The most striking feature in the history of Buddhism is its spirit of proselytism, in which it has been surpassed by no religion except Christianity. This spirit arose from the feeling of sympathy and brotherhood between all men, from the prince to the outcast, which it taught. The only means adopted for its propagation was persuasion. It speedily made way in India, and about the end of the fourth century B.C. was established in that country by King Asoka or Piyadasi, many of whose edicts are preserved in rock inscriptions. In this king's reign missionaries were first sent to some of the countries beyond India; and, at one of the great councils of Buddhism, about B.C. 246, a regular plan of missions was developed by teaching, preaching, and publishing translations of the sacred books. Cashmere was the first country converted; the Himalayan countries and Thibet soon followed; while in the south Ceylon became almost wholly Buddhist. From Ceylon it spread to Siam and Burmah. The first mention of a Buddhist mission in China is about B.C. 217, where Buddhism flourished greatly, and in A.D. 65 was admitted as a state religion by the Emperor Ming-ti. It was alternately persecuted and favoured, but a great impulse was given to its extension about the fifth century A.D. Streams of pilgrims came into India from China, and carried back with them sacred pictures, books, and relics; and at the same time it spread largely in other countries, Mongolia, and Central Asia especially. In the next century, however, it received a formidable blow from the great uprising of Brahminist feeling in India, by which it was utterly expelled from that country, and never recovered the slightest footing there. For this loss it gained compensation by extensive conversions in China and Central and Eastern Asia, and has never had since that time to lament any serious permanent losses, unless indeed it has suffered in any way by the rise of the curious creed of the Chinese rebels.

The tenets of Buddhism are contained in the canonical sacred writings, which were originally composed in Sanscrit, but have been translated into the languages of Thibet, Ceylon, China, Mongolia, Japan, and Burmah. These were entirely unknown to Europeans until 1824, when they were discovered in Nepaul, in the original Sanscrit, by Mr. B. H. Hodgson, Political Resident in that state. They comprised sixty volumes. Shortly after, Alexander Csoma, of Körös in Transylvania, having acquired, in spite of great difficulties, a knowledge of Thibetan, gave himself up to the study of the Buddhist literature in that language, which consists of about 330 folio volumes, mostly translations from the Sanscrit works discovered by Mr. Hodgson. M. Csoma published an analysis of this immense bible in the Asiatic Researches, vol. xx. About the same period the existence of a Mongolian version, made from the Thibetan, of the Buddhist canon was made known by M. J. L. Schmidt of St. Petersburg, who published some extracts in 1829. A further great discovery was made in Ceylon by the Hon. G. Turnour of a version of the Buddhist canon, and also some historical works in Pali, the ancient sacred language of Ceylon. China, Japan, Burmah, and Siam also possess Buddhist literatures, the two former derived from the Sanscrit, the two latter, of which little is known, from the Pali.

The Buddhist canon was settled at three great councils, held in different parts of India, the last in B.C. 308. It is called the Tripitaki, or three baskets, being divided into three parts, the Sutras or discourses of Buddha, the Vinaya, containing all that has reference to morality, and the Abhidharma, which treats of metaphysical questions. The first two contain each five separate works, the last seven.

Buddhism is not a religion as Judaism, Christianity, Mahometanism are religions. It contains not a trace of the idea of God from first to last; it acknowledges man as the only being in the universe. Neither is it simply a philosophy, in the ordinary sense of the term, a theory of knowing and being. But it contains elements of both. Obstinate refusing to recognise aught else but man, it confounds man with nature, in the midst of which he lives, while it still preaches earnestly the laws of virtue. It is the practical element that has had such a great force with the multitudes. To the people at large Buddhism was a moral and religious reform. Its metaphysical speculations could have been followed by very few among its votaries; but the sight of a prince throwing away all his splendour, living as a beggar a life of the utmost privation, and withal of the utmost purity and virtue, proclaiming a deliverance from the religious and social despotism of the Brahmins, opening the way of happiness, not to one class or caste but to the veriest outcasts, this it was that caused its rapid spread. Hence it is that the social and moral code of Buddhism is far more important than its metaphysical theories, though in the Buddhist system they are closely connected with each other. That moral code is, taken by itself, one of the purest in the world. It forbids even such vices as pride, uncharitableness, hypocrisy; and enjoins such virtues as forgiveness of injuries, contentment, humility, patience.

The basis of the morals of Buddha is the Four Great Verities: [1] Pain and sorrow exist; [2] the cause of these is our affections and passions and our sins; [3] pain and sorrow can cease by Nirvana; [4] points out the way to Nirvana, the means of deliverance. This way to Nirvana consists of eight parts: [1] Right faith, or orthodoxy; [2] right judgment, dispersing all uncertainty and doubt; [3] right language, or the study of perfect and unswerving truthfulness; [4] right purpose, or the choice of an upright purpose in all words and deeds; [5] right practice, or the pursuit of a religious life; [6] right obedience, or the following all the precepts of the Buddhist law; [7] right memory; [8] right meditation.

These Four Verities alone comprise the earliest teaching of Buddha; he taught them indeed to the last, but with important additions in his latter years. The Four Verities are followed by a body of moral precepts. The first are the Five Great Commandments binding upon all, namely, not to kill, not to steal, not to commit adultery, not to lie, not to get drunk. Next come five precepts, of less importance, binding on professed disciples, namely, to abstain from unseasonable meals, from public spectacles (music, dancing, singing), from expensive dresses and personal ornaments and perfumes, from having a large or soft bed, and from receiving gold or silver. For those who embrace a religious life, twelve observances of the severest character are prescribed: [1] To wear only clothes made of rags cast away by others; [2] to wear only three garments, made by their own hands from these rags; [3] to wear over these rags only a yellow cloak; [4] to live only on the alms they have collected; [5] to eat only one meal daily; [6] to take no food after noon; [7] to live in forests and solitary places, entering towns only to obtain alms; [8] the only shelter is to be the shadow of trees; [9] to rest only sitting at the foot of a tree; [10] to sleep there, without lying down, but resting against the tree; [11] when once settled not to move the sitting-carpet about; [12] to meditate at night among the tombs in the cemeteries on the vanity of all things. The title given to those who follow these last precepts is Sramana, "victors over self." On ordinary persons, who could not attain such a height of virtue, were enjoined the Six Ordinary Virtues, almsgiving or charity, purity, patience, courage, contemplation, and knowledge. These virtues are inculcated in their very fullest extent. An instance of Buddha's charity is given for imitation. He saw one day a tigress starved and unable to feed her cubs, whereon he offered his body to be devoured by them. Among a number of minor precepts are included the government of the tongue, in its widest sense, humility, modesty, love for and dutifulness to parents and relations. One of the most remarkable of Buddha's institutions is that of public confession, before the whole congregation, of faults and sins.

What then is the end to be obtained by a life of such self-sacrificing charity and humility? That stated in the third and fourth of the Four Verities, namely, Nirvana. To ascertain what Nirvana is, we must go on to consider the meta-physical side of Buddhism.

The idea of God is utterly banished from Buddhism. Not even is there the notion of a Universal Spirit common to so many Eastern religions. The universe is a mere fleeting illusion without any reality. The only being that can lay claim to any real existence is the thinking subject, or man, for and to whom the universe seems to exist. Even his own ideas are thus but illusions, the effect of ignorance. Existence then is for man but sorrow, misery and trouble. But existence is not confined to human life nor closed by death. Before this human life man has gone through a multitude of states of existence of all kinds; and he may pass through a countless number hereafter, not merely animate, but also inanimate, and in fact through all forms of every kind. The transformations are regulated by the conduct of beings in their different states; virtue is rewarded, vice punished. There is no means whatever of escaping the consequences of deeds as long as existence continues; man is ever re-appearing, under some form or other, in this scene of misery, sorrow, and illusion. The great end of man then is to escape from existence by extirpating its cause. This cause of existence is "attachment"—an inclination towards something, which arises from desire. Desire must be preceded by perception, perception by contact; and this contact implies the existence of the senses. As the senses can only perceive what has form and name, that is, what is distinct, distinction is the real cause of all the effects which end in existence, birth and pain. This distinction is itself the result of conceptions or ideas; these ideas are mere illusions, the effects of ignorance. Ignorance therefore is the primary cause of all seeming existence. To know that ignorance as the root of all evil is identical with destroying it, and with it all the effects which flow from it. This can be done only by attaining to Nirvana, or extinction, that is in fact utter annihilation. As it is misery to be, not to be must be felicity. True wisdom consists in the desire for Nirvana. Nirvana is the reward and the end of the life of painful virtue described above. The means of entering into that state is by contemplation or ecstasy. This contemplation has four stages. In the first there is no desire but for Nirvana, there is a sense of freedom from sin, a knowledge of the nature of things. But the devotee still has a sense of pleasure in his own condition; the subject can reason, can distinguish, and choose between what conduces to the final state and what draws from it. In the second stage the use of these powers ceases, and nothing remains but the desire for Nirvana, and the satisfaction arising from the consciousness of growing perfection. In the third stage that satisfaction is extinguished, pure indifference succeeds, but there remains still some self-consciousness, and some amount of physical pleasure. In the fourth stage these last remnants vanish; memory is gone, all pleasure and pain have departed, nothing remains but absolute apathy. This is incomplete Nirvana, as near to that state as this life can attain, and a pledge of the future and perfect Nirvana. In attaining this state the votary acquires also omniscience and magic power. But there is a yet higher state to be attained by passing through the four regions of the formless world—the infinity of space, the infinity of intelligence, the region of nothing, and lastly, a region where not even the idea of nothing is left, not even the idea of the absence of ideas; where there is complete rest, undisturbed by nothing, or what is not nothing. This alone is perfect Nirvana. He who had attained the incomplete Nirvana, the only one possible in this life, was called a Buddha, and was greatly revered, especially after his death, that is when he had attained to perfect Nirvana. He who was striving after this state, but had not yet attained it, was a Bodhisatva, and was also revered, but in a less degree.¹

In consequence of the atheistic character of Buddhism, it admits of no idea of sacrifice, mediation, satisfaction, or propitiation. The worship is very simple, consisting simply of prayers and the offering of flowers, perfumes, &c., before the images and relics of Buddha. Reverence also is paid to his footmarks, and other traces of his presence, and especially to any spot where it is recorded that any remarkable occurrence happened to him. The statues of Buddha are very numerous, and generally of great size; to some of them miraculous powers of motion have been ascribed. Reverence is also paid to the statues of distinguished Buddhists, the Buddhas and Bodhisatvas. Different sects and individuals select certain of these to whom they pay special regard. The ministers, called Bonzes, are simply confraternities of mendicants, who act as patterns of the sternest self-renunciation, or else simply as teachers and preachers. They usually live in communities often containing thousands of persons, under rules strikingly resembling those of some of the mediæval monastic bodies. Many of them employ themselves in study of the sacred books, and in making translations of them; others in teaching young men and boys, the novices of the convents. In some countries there are also convents of women.

Such a system would naturally, in its pure atheistic philosophy, have but little hold upon the mass of unintelligent men. In the dreary blank of Nirvana it held out no hope worth striving for. It gave no comfort from the protection of higher and more mighty beings. Hence it suffered corruptions and changes in nearly every country where it was adopted, and in consequence became divided into numerous sects. In Nepal it lost its atheistic character entirely. Buddhism there has adopted the belief in one supreme, self-existent intelligence, Adi-Buddha, who projects from his own essence five Buddhas, intelligences of the first order, who in turn produce five of the second order, called Bodhisatvas. These inferior divinities are regarded as agents in the hands of the Supreme Deity, and as links which unite him with the lower orders of beings. Probably these features are connected with the previous religion of the country, which was superseded by Buddhism: for it is one peculiarity of this religion, and apparently also a cause of its rapid progress, that it easily allied itself with and adopted parts of those religions with which it came in contact. Thus even in India, its birth-place, it became in some points assimilated with Brahminism.¹ In China it allows the worship of ancestors, and of good and evil spirits. In Thibet, the poorer classes, with the sanction of the Lamas, make offerings to the genii of the rivers, woods, hills, &c.

In China, the only genuine Buddhists are the monks and mendicants. These alone have a common confession of faith, submit to initiatory rites, and form a separate corporation. The great mass of the worshippers of Fo, the Chinese corruption of Buddha, are rather tolerated than approved by the authorities of the sect. They are only expected to acknowledge the general superiority of their religion, to abstain from gross vice, to reverence the sacred writings, relics, statues, &c., and the various Buddhas and Bodhisatvas, and to contribute to the support of the monks, ascetics, devotees, &c. Those who fulfil only these conditions attain a higher sphere of being in the next life, but do not become enlightened. The only worship is paid to the Buddhas, who are popularly regarded as deified, and hence is really man-worship. Temples are very numerous, and filled with images, among which are always three of colossal size, representing Buddhas, to whom different spheres are allotted—one, ruling the world of intellect; a second, the author of joy and happiness in the family circle, who is also deputed to govern the whole earth; and the third and most important, the source of grace, mercy and deliverance. Under the charge of this last is a paradise, of which the most glowing descriptions are given, but totally free from the grossness of those in the Koran. Admission to this paradise is obtained solely by faith and trust in the third of this triad of Buddhas.

The remarkable features of the Buddhism of Thibet are the hierarchy of Lamas, the doctrine of the incarnations of Buddha, the severity of its discipline, the fervour of its moral tone, and the remarkable correspondence of its ritual and life with that of the mediæval Christian Church. The Lamas are very numerous, one at least of each family being devoted to the priesthood. There are also many large communities of nuns; and, owing to the numbers of those who adopt the religious life, they are allowed to work. The supreme, temporal, and spiritual, head of the country is the Grand Lama, who, by a gradual development, has come to be looked on as an incarnation of Buddha, who is ever being born again into the world for the guidance and help of man.² It has been suggested that, as this system was not elaborated till the thirteenth century A.D., the ritual correspondences, which are certainly very striking, are due to the influence of Christian missions. [See Hardwick, Christ and other Masters, ii. app. ii. pp. 214-219.]

It remains briefly to state the strength and weakness of Buddhism as a religion. One of its most important points is its practical character. Its end is the salvation of mankind, or rather of the universe. As a means of attaining this, it preaches the most exalted virtue, and holds up for imitation ideals—the founder and his chief followers—of the loftiest character. It propagates itself only by persuasion, it exhibits the most unbounded charity and toleration. On the other hand, the atheistic and nihilistic character of Buddhism takes from it all the power it might have gained for man's good. There is no hope of future life; no means of expiation for sin; no sanction to its precepts to inspire awe; no beneficent Creator to love; all is dark and drear and gloomy. Hence the many corruptions it has undergone, such as the elevation of Buddha to a god, and the lowering Nirvana into a paradise of pleasures. Hence also the weak hold it has over so many of its professors, so that even the professed religious are often utterly selfish, immoral and contemptible.

BUDNÆANS. One of the parties into which the Antitrinitarians of Poland and Transylvania were divided shortly after their separation from the Reformed Churches in the year 1565, until Faustus Socinus succeeded in uniting them in one heresy. The Budnæans denied the miraculous conception of our Lord, and consequently refused that degree of worship which the Socinians held to be due to Him. Simon Budnæus, their leader, was deposed in 1584 from the ministry, and excommunicated with all his followers. It is said that he afterwards recanted, and was re-admitted into the sect, which had then become Socinian.

BULGARIANS. A name given to the mediæval Catharists, or Albigenes. It is found in the Chronicon Autissiodorensē, written in the year 1211, and also in Matthew Paris; and is elsewhere found in the form "Bulgri," "Bogri," and in the French forms "Boulgares," "Boulgres," and "Bougres." The name suggests a migration from Bulgaria, the chief seat of the Bogomiles, and a great home of the Paulicians.

BURGHERS. In the year 1746 a discussion arose in the Associate Secession Synod in Scotland respecting the lawfulness of the religious clause of the oath administered to the burgesses of Edinburgh, Perth, Stirling, and Glasgow. The clause was as follows:—"I profess and allow with all my heart the true religion presently professed within this realm, and authorized by the laws thereof; I shall abide at and defend the same to my life's end, renouncing the Roman religion called Papistry." It was maintained by some that for seceders from the Established Kirk to make this declaration was to place themselves at once in a false position; that the oath must be taken in the sense of its imposers; that having forsaken the Kirk on account of the abuses of patronage and the license given to teaching held to be contrary to the Westminster Confession and the other Presbyterian standards, they could not then call the form of religion which was authorized by the laws the true religion, nor declare that they would defend it. It was answered on the other hand by some, amongst whom were the Erskines, that the oath itself spoke only of the true religion professed in Scotland, and not of the faulty human manner of professing and settling it; that it spoke indeed of the religion authorized by the laws, but not of that as authorized, which would have carried a different meaning; that in their various testimonies they had solemnly approved the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the Church of Scotland, and had declared their adherence to their former ordination vows, which pledged them to their maintenance; that their quarrel had been only with the corruptions in Church and State, and not with the true religion professed and authorized in the realm. The defenders of the clause offered for the sake of peace to consent to an act of synod declaring it inexpedient for Seceders to swear the oath in the present circumstances, viz. the circumstances of controversy as to its precise meaning. Their opponents however would consent to nothing which did not declare the oath to be sinful and inconsistent with their testimony and engagement, and in a meeting of synod on April 9th, 1746, they carried a decision accordingly. Agreement with this decision was then made by the victorious party—now called ANTIBURGHERS—a term of communion. They rejected, deposed and excommunicated their Burgher brethren (as the maintainers of the oath were now called), and in the following year two distinct bodies were constituted.

When Brown of Haddington wrote his Historical Account of the Secession, the congregations belonging to the two bodies numbered about 200; they both professed entire agreement with the Presbyterian standards, and were at one on all the articles of faith; but the Antiburghers still professed that their own religion was different from that of the Establishment, because they regarded the constitution of the latter, as authorized by the laws of the realm since the Revolution, as Erastian and founded on the will of the civil magistrate, and consequently still retained their hostility to the Burghers. In both bodies the rise of "free thought" tended to modify the earlier views. Among the Burghers the "rights of conscience," the "right of private judgment and private opinion," began to be put forward, and the power assigned in the standard documents to the civil magistrate for the maintenance of true religion was disputed as incompatible with these rights and with the duty of toleration. The principle of establishments (hitherto warmly maintained) was impugned, and a change was made which limited the assent given at ordination to the old Act and Testimony of the Seceders, to an approval only of its "scope and design," while subsequently, in 1797, a preamble to the Confession of Faith was adopted which disclaimed approbation of any principle therein supposed to favour compulsory measures in religion, and left the nature and kind of the obligation imposed by the Covenants an entirely open question. On September 5th, 1799, an attempt to remove the Preamble was defeated in synod by 91 to 28, and thereupon the Burgher body immediately split into two parties, called respectively (as in the case at the same time of the divided Antiburghers) the Old-Light and the New-Light. On October 2nd the Old-Light minority constituted themselves into a separate Presbytery, and as their number of ministers in settled charges gradually increased to fifteen, they established a Synod in September 1805, under the old name of The Associate Synod. In 1820 the New-Light Burghers united with the New-Light Antiburghers, and took the name of the United Secession, a body which is now represented, since its further union in 1847 with the RELIEF SECESSION, by the United Presbyterian Synod. The Old-Light Burghers retained their separate existence until 1839, when, in consequence of an act which passed the General Assembly on May 25th, by which their ministers and congregations were admitted to full and equal fellowship, they returned to the Established Kirk.

CACANGELICI. The word κακαγγελία as opposed to εὐαγγέλιον, in association with the idea that "the children of the wicked one" [Matt. xiii. 38], and the "angels" of the devil [Matt. xxv. 41; Rev. xii. 9], are heretical and apostate men [Iren. adv. Hær. iv. 41], appears to have suggested this name as that of heretics in general. The designation is not used by Epiphanius or Augustine, as might have been expected, as a play upon the sect of the ANGELICI, and was probably never used of any particular sect, but merely as a polemical term. Thus it is applied to the Lutherans and Calvinists by Hosius, Præteolus, and in Sianda's Lexicon Polemicum.

CADOLAITEÆ. A name given to the adherents of the Anti-Pope Honorius III. [A.D. 1061], his name being Cadolaus. [Baronius, Annal. ad ann. 1061.]

CAIANITES. [GAIANITEÆ.]

CAINITES. A strange sect of heretics mentioned by Irenæus and all later heresiologists of the patristic ages. Irenæus speaks of them rather as a school among the followers of Valentinus than as a distinct sect, but Tertullian incidentally mentions a distinct "Cainite heresy" in his treatise on Baptism [Tertull. de Bapt. i.], and is usually supposed to refer to them when he writes "Sunt et nunc alii Nicolaitæ; Caiiana hæresis dicitur," in the authentic work on heresies which bears his name [Tertull. de Præscript. Hær. xxxiii.], though the reading is disputed. [GAIANA.] Later writers always class them as a separate sect.

The account of the Cainites given by Irenæus is very brief. He says they "declare that Cain derived his being from the Superior Power" of the Valentinian theory, "together with Esau, Korah, and the Sodomites. All such persons they acknowledge as being of their kindred. For this reason, they add, that they have been assailed by the Demiurge, yet none of them had suffered injury, for Sophia always carried off from them to herself that which was hers. They say that Judas the traitor had diligently studied the truth, and that it was because his knowledge of it was in advance of that possessed by all others that he brought about the mystery of the betrayal." He also states that the Cainites possessed an apocryphal gospel which they called the "Gospel of Judas" [Iren. adv. Hær. xxxi.]. Tertullian speaks of "a viper of the Cainite heresy" who had led away a great number of persons in the locality where he was writing, and who had made it her chief aim to oppose the ministration of baptism. For this reason he wrote his treatise on that sacrament [Tertull. de Bapt. i.], but he gives no further indication of the doctrines professed by the Cainites.

The account given of them by Epiphanius does not appear to be founded on any further acquaintance with the heresy than that which might be derived from Irenæus [Epiph. Hær. xxxviii.], and Origen declares that the Cainites were not Christians at all, and that Celsus had classed them as such in ignorance [Orig. contr. Cels. iii. 13]; though it is evident that he himself knew little or nothing about them. But the account of them given by Epiphanius shews that whether they were still existing or not as a separate sect in his time, he believed them to have held some form of those dualistic theories of good and evil which characterized all the Gnostic sects. For, according to him, Cain was regarded by the Cainites as the offspring of Eve by a superior power, and Abel as her offspring by an inferior power. Thus, it is probable, that the philosophy, such as it was, of the sect, set forth the struggle of good and evil under a rationalistic version of the murder of Abel, the two brothers being represented in exactly the opposite light to that in which they are shewn in Holy Scripture [Pseudo-Tertull. adv. Hær. iii.].

It is observable that both St. John and St. Jude bring the name of Cain into their epistles in a way that is consistent with the idea that they were protesting against some misbelief associated with it. St. John declares that Cain was a murderer as being of "that wicked one," not a spiritual seed of the holy Eve [1 John iii. 12]; while St. Jude expressly pronounces a "woe" against some who had gone in "the way of Cain," associating their error with that of Balaam, with the gainsaying of Korah, and with the wickedness of Sodom and Gomorrah [Jude 11-19]. The epistle of St. Jude is expressly written against certain persons "who separate themselves," and there is an unmistakeable likeness between his denunciation of them and the description given of the Cainites by Irenæus.

Probably these heretics were one of those many early sects of Asia Minor which were so adulterated, first with the dualism, and secondly with the licentious theories and practices of Oriental heathenism, that what Christian elements of belief had been originally current among them became all but obliterated in the course of a few years. Such were the SETHITES, the OPHITES, and the NICOLAITANES, with all three of which sects the Cainites are vaguely associated by ancient writers. Their relationship to the Gnostic family of heresies in general is shewn by the statement of Epiphanius respecting their apocryphal book the "Ascension of St. Paul" (Ἀναβατικὸν Παύλου). "They find their pretext for this in what the Apostle says of his having ascended to the third heaven, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter [2 Cor. xii. 2, 4]. These, as they say, are the unspeakable words." Like the Gnostic sects in general they evidently professed to have some special revelation respecting their religion which had not been communicated to other Christians, and their practical antichristianism is very evident.

CAJANISTS. [GAIANITES.]

CALIXTINES. A section of the Hussites who resisted the withdrawal of the cup from the laity of Bohemia in the fifteenth century, and received their name from the "calix," the Latin word for the Eucharistic chalice. They were called also "Utraquists," from the words sub utraque specie.

Huss himself had been willing to conform to the custom of administering the Blessed Sacrament in the form of the bread only, as he held the theory of "concomitance," which makes the virtue of the Presence of Christ to be contained in its integrity in either element. But his follower Jacobellus de Misa refused to administer it except in both kinds, and so general had the opposite custom become, that he is spoken of by the Moravian Apology of 1538 as "Primus omnium communionem utriusque speciei in Bohemia praticare cepit" [Apolog. veræ Doctrin. in Lydiæ Waldensia, ii. 292, Dort, 1617]. The revival of the ancient practice formed one element in the most bitter and violent contest between the ruling powers in Church and State and the Hussites after the Council of Constance [A.D. 1415] and the execution of Huss and Jerome of Prague. The University of Prague pronounced in favour of the Communion in both kinds, and the Hussites immediately banded together under Nicolas of Hussinecz and John Zisca for armed defence of their practice. Among their number there was a large party of fanatics, who were chiefly the adherents of Zisca, and these acted with great violence and committed inexcusable cruelties in their attack upon Prague [A.D. 1419]. This violence led to a separation of the more moderate Calixtines from the party of Zisca, the former retaining the original name, and the latter being called TABORITES, from Mount Tabor in Bohemia, where they had first gathered their forces together to a Communion in which the cup was administered to a vast multitude.

From this time the Calixtines began to draw

towards the dominant party in the Church. In the year 1421 they made, at Prague, a statement of their wishes which is contained in four articles, as follows:—[1] that the Word of God should be preached freely and without impediment throughout the kingdom of Bohemia. [2] That the Sacrament of the Divine Eucharist should be freely administered in both kinds, that is, under the species of bread and of wine, to all Christians not disqualified by mortal sin, according to the command and institution of the Saviour. [3] That any clergyman engaged in the pursuit of secular power, or of wealth and temporal goods, contrary to the precept of Christ, to the prejudice of his office, and to the injury of the State, should be forbidden such pursuits and made to live according to the Evangelical rule and Apostolic life which Christ lived with His Apostles. [4] That all mortal sins, and particularly public ones, should be properly punished by those to whom the duty of suppressing them belong, and by reason of the law of God. The war still went on for some years with the Taborites, but when the Council of Basle met [A.D. 1433] these four "Articles of Prague" were made the basis of a compact, which was ratified at Iglau. The principal article, that respecting administration of the Holy Sacrament in both kinds, was so far modified and restricted that the priests in Bohemia and Moravia were to be permitted to administer it in that manner; but to those only who, being come to years of discretion, devoutly and reverently desired it; and who heartily acknowledged that either species was by itself "integer et totus Christus."

This compact was assailed over and over again by the Romanizing party, and their attempts were in some degree justified by the violence of the Taborites, with whom the Calixtines had once been so closely allied. Before the time of the Reformation arrived, a large number of them had been gradually reconciled to the Roman usage, while others had coalesced with the Taborites, and become the ancestors of the Moravian Brethren, or "Unitas Fratrum." CALIXTUS. [SYNCRETISTS.]

CALLISTIANS. This name is given to the partizans of Callixtus, bishop of Rome [A.D. 218-223], by Hippolytus, who accuses him of compounding a new heresy from the heresies of Noëtus and Theodotus. The substance of the opinions attributed to him is that which was afterwards called Patripassianism. But the account given of Callixtus by Hippolytus (who was bishop of a suburban see, and resided in Rome) is so mingled with personal invective and bitterness, that there can be little doubt it is exaggerated [Hippol. Refut. Hær. ix. 2-7]. Callixtus has always been reckoned among the martyrs of the early Roman Church, and the abuse heaped on his memory by his contemporary has the air of being suggested by rivalry and disappointment.

CALVINISTIC METHODISTS. [METHODISTS.]

CALVINISTS. That large body of Protestants in various sects who profess to follow the opinions of Calvin, especially as regards the ministry, the sacraments, and divine grace. During the reign of Queen Elizabeth these opinions were also widely diffused in the Church of England, and when, at a later time, large numbers of the Puritans became dissenters, there still remained many Calvinists among the Low Church party, down even to the present day.

The founder of this school of Protestants, John Cauvin, Chauvin, or in a Latinized form, Calvinus, was the son of a notary at Noyon in Picardy [A.D. 1509-1564], and being intended for holy orders received the tonsure at seven years of age from the bishop to whom his father was secretary. Such were the abuses of the times that he was nominated to a chaplaincy in the cathedral of his native town when he was only twelve years of age, to the benefice of Marteville when he was eighteen, and a little later to that of Pont l'Eveque; the last of which he sold in 1534, when his connection with the Huguenots made it impossible for him to hold the sinecure much longer. While Calvin held these benefices he was receiving his education successively at the High School of Paris, and the Universities of Orleans and Bourges, and became distinguished at each for his industry and learning. At Orleans he studied civil law with such success that he was occasionally appointed to supply the place of absent professors, and on leaving Orleans for Bourges the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Law was conferred upon him. At Bourges Calvin continued his studies under Alciati, the first lawyer of the age, but he also turned his attention to theology under the tuition of Melchior Wolmar, one of the reforming party, Professor of Greek and the tutor of Beza. On the death of his father he returned to Paris, where he shortly published a Commentary on Seneca's de Clementia, being then twenty-three years of age. At this time Calvin became known as one of the Huguenot party, and he escaped danger only through the protection of the Queen of Navarre, sister to Francis I. But in 1534 he left his native country altogether, settling first at Basle, and afterwards, when he was twenty-eight years of age [A.D. 1536], at Geneva. Before leaving France he printed a treatise entitled Psychopannychia, against the heresy of the soul's unconsciousness between death and the resurrection. But within a few months afterwards [A.D. 1534-5] he published, first in French and then in Latin, a far more important work, his Institutes of the Christian Religion, which he expanded into a much larger form in a subsequent edition [A.D. 1559], as the exponent of his theological system.

At the time when Calvin first came into notice, Geneva was a hotbed of immorality; and the profligacy of the laity having extended to the bishop and some of the clergy [Ruchat, Hist. de la Reform. de Suisse, ii. 277], the Church had lost all influence. Opposition between clergy and laity was the necessary consequence, and this was stimulated by the visit of an impetuous French Huguenot and doctrinaire named Farel, whose agitation led to tumult and bloodshed which ended in the withdrawal of the bishop from Geneva to Gex in Savoy [A.D. 1534], in the see being then declared vacant by the municipal council, and in the usurpation of the bishop's authority by Farel. It was during the time of Farel's supremacy that Calvin visited Geneva on his way from Italy to Germany, where he was about to take up his residence. Being introduced by a friend to the then chief man of the city the two proved to be such kindred spirits that Calvin was earnestly entreated to support Farel in his project of reformation, and threatened with the vengeance of God if he refused to do so. These persuasions and threats prevailed with Calvin, and he settled down at Geneva as a coadjutor of Farel, and as one of the chief "pastors" of the city [A.D. 1536]. The newly-fledged republicans were at first highly delighted with a divine whose principles were decidedly opposed to Episcopacy, and therefore to the authority which they had recently rejected. But when Calvin attempted a crusade against the wickedness by which he was surrounded they at once revolted, banishing both him and Farel from the city [A.D. 1538].

For three years afterwards Calvin acted as Professor of Theology at Strasburg, and was also pastor to the French congregation. But a fresh turn of affairs at Geneva led to his recall, and he returned there on September 13th, 1541. Thenceforward until his death, twenty-three years later, he was the ruler of Geneva in as absolute a sense as its former bishops had been, and often exercised his authority in the most tyrannical manner. At the same time he never slackened in literary industry, and by this means acquired an influence which extended far beyond Geneva even in his lifetime, and which made him only second, if second, to Luther, as a leader of thought among Protestants after his death.

It was as a leader of thought that Calvin became the founder of a great party, his politico-religious rule at Geneva being dependent chiefly on his personal influence, and, although copied by his followers in Scotland, for a short time (during the supremacy of the Presbyterians) in England, and in New England, never being definitely associated with his name. [PRESBYTERIANS.] Some of his works had become known in England as early as 1542, when there appear in a list of prohibited books, The Lytell Tretyse in Frensche of ye Soper of the Lorde made by Callwyn, and The Works every one of Callwyn [Brit. Mag. xxxvi. 395; Burnet's Hist. Reform. iv. 519, Pocock's ed.]. A few years later Cranmer projected a general union of foreign Protestants with the Church of England, and Calvin among others was invited to a conference at Lambeth [Jenkyne's Cranmer's Remains, i. 330, 346]. He did not accept the invitation, but wrote many letters to the Protector Somerset, to Edward VI. (by Cranmer's advice),¹ and to Cranmer himself, condemning the Reformation of the Church of England as incomplete, and urging them to carry it further towards the Presbyterian pattern of Geneva [State Pap. v. 9, Edward VI.]; and it appears to have been in some degree through his influence over Somerset, Bucer, Peter Martyr, and John A'Lasco, that the alterations of 1551 were made in the Book of Common Prayer. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth he sent her his Commentary on Isaiah, but the Queen declined to accept the volume in such Tudor language as brought from its author a remonstrance addressed to Sir William Cecil [Zurich Letters, II. 34].

Calvin's influence in England and Scotland was, however, greatly extended by the return of those who had fled from the Marian persecution, and had lived during the greater part of Mary's reign at Frankfort, Zurich and Geneva. John Knox (who had lived in London as Chaplain to Edward VI. from 1549 to 1554) was pastor of a congregation in Geneva from 1556 until 1559, and returned thoroughly impregnated with the spirit and principles of the Genevese leader. Goodman, Bishop Pilkington, Dean Whittingham, Whitaker, and some others, accompanied Knox, and were thus brought under the direct influence of Calvin; while many others, such as Fox the Martyrologist, Bishop Jewel, and Bishop Parkhurst, though not in personal intercourse with him, had their opinions very decidedly moulded by his during their residence abroad. The extraordinary extension of Calvin's influence before the end of the sixteenth century is thus mentioned by Hooker in 1594: "Of what account the Master of the Sentences was in the Church of Rome, the same and more amongst the preachers of Reformed Churches Calvin had purchased; so that the perfectest divines were judged they which were skilfullest in Calvin's writings. His books were almost the very canon to judge both doctrine and discipline by. French churches, both under others abroad and at home in their own country, all cast according to that mould which Calvin made. The Church of Scotland, in erecting the fabric of their Reformation, took the selfsame pattern" [Hooker's Eccles. Polit. pref. ii. 8]. "Do we not daily see," he elsewhere says, "that men are accused of heresy for holding that which the Fathers held, and that they never are clear if they find not somewhat in Calvin to justify themselves?" Archbishop Whitgift himself was strongly imbued with this deference to the Genevan Reformer's authority, and in the original draft of the Lambeth Articles (approved by him but repudiated by the Church) certain expressions were said to be "ad mentem Calvini," though the words were eventually altered to "ad mentem Augustini" [Hardw. on XXXIX. Art. app.]. In the following century Bishop Sanderson wrote: "When I began to set myself to the study of Divinity as my proper business, Calvin's Institutions were recommended to me, as they were generally to all young scholars in those times, as the best and perfectest system of Divinity, and the fittest to be laid as the groundwork in the study of this profession."

The earlier followers of Calvin were principally bent on the substitution of his Presbyterian system for that of Episcopacy; but in the beginning of the seventeenth century Arminius brought into special prominence certain features of Calvinist theology which he opposed as inconsistent with the love of God and the free-will of man. [ARMINIANS.] The condemnation of Arminius by the Synod of Dort gave additional authority to the doctrines which he had controverted [DORT, SYNOD OF]; and since that time the Calvinists have maintained the doctrines of election, predestination, and irresistible grace as the distinguishing points of their system; many of them being as tenacious for Episcopacy as others are for Presbyterianism. According to these doctrines God has decreed from eternity the salvation of some men, who are called the "elect," and the everlasting perdition of others. Both the elect and non-elect come into the world in a state of total depravity and alienation from God, and can, of themselves, do nothing but sin. His grace, however, seizes hold of the elect, and, by an irresistible power works out their salvation, bringing them into such a condition that their final perseverance in holiness is certain, and they cannot finally fall or be lost. Thus the elect are saved without any will or work of their own. On the other hand, the non-elect or reprobate can by no means whatever attain to salvation, and must be eternally lost, not because they have made themselves worthy of perdition by their sins, but because God has so decreed in excluding them from the number of the elect. "We assert," says Calvin, "that by an eternal and unchangeable decree God hath determined whom He shall one day permit to have a share in eternal felicity, and whom He shall doom to destruction. In respect of the elect the decree is founded in His unmerited mercy, without any regard to human worthiness; but those whom He delivers up to damnation are, by a just and irreprehensible judgment, excluded from all access to eternal life" [Calvin, Inst. III. ii. 11]. From the doctrine of "Election" follows that of "Particular Redemption," i.e. that Christ died only for the elect and not for all men. A full statement of these dreadful opinions may be found in the Confession of Faith set forth by the Westminster Assembly of Divines [A.D. 1643], which is still the authoritative Confession of the Kirk of Scotland, and is recognised as more or less authoritative by all Calvinistic sects. Great controversies have arisen among Calvinists respecting the Divine decrees, and they are divided into two parties, the one holding that those imagined decrees were positively issued, and thus "absolute;" the other that they were only God's foresight of the Fall. Whitfield also separated from Wesley on account of the determined opposition which the latter offered to the Calvinism of the former. In the present day the number rising generation. Where there is no faith in humanity, there can be little faith in the Disposer of the various estates and conditions of men. If sin is the reproach of any nation, Atheism is pre-eminently so, for it is caused not merely by the viciousness of the individual intellect, but by the general tone of society that surrounds it, and has set in motion those discordant vibrations that in the end become the habitual jarring of the evil heart of unbelief. All have their work to do in the reparative process. Atheism must be rooted out from the great population-beds, "by pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, by the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left" [2 Cor. vi. 6, 7].

ATHINGANI [ἀ—θηγγάνω]. A title bestowed in the eighth century upon a sect of Paulicians which rose in Asia Minor in the reign of Constantine Pogonatus [A.D. 668-685]. They began to be so called in the days of the Empress Irene [A.D. 797-802], when they acquired the name of Attingians or "Separates," because they rejected image-worship, with the veneration of the cross and of relics, and cut themselves off from all connection with the hierarchy of the dominant party. They were also called Paul-Johannites. Their distinctive practice, apart from other Paulician heretics, appears to have been that of baptizing with the words "I am the living water," instead of the Catholic formula.

ATHOCIANS. Heretics of the thirteenth century who rejected the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. [Cent. Magd., cent. xv. 5.]

ATTINGIANS. [ATHINGANI.]

AUDÆANS. [AUDIANS.]

AUDIANS. About the time of the Council of Nicæa, Audius (or Audæus) formed his sect.¹ He was a Syrian of Mesopotamia, an upright and zealous man, led into schism through the workings of intemperate zeal, and the assertion of self-will. He took upon himself the office of censor of Church morality, reproving to their face bishops and clergy whom he considered to be living covetously or luxuriously. He was beaten, and suffered other indignities. Unable to bear them he separated himself from the Church, and was irregularly consecrated bishop by a bishop who had joined his schism. His adherents adopted a monastic life both in town and country. In order to have specific points of difference from the Church they had left, they advanced in opposition to Church doctrine the heretical tenet of Anthropomorphism, and in opposition to Church practice, as established by the Council of Nicæa, the custom of Quartodecimanism. [ANTHROPOMORPHITES. QUARTODECIMANS.]

In addition to these, Theodoret charges the Audians with adopting from Manichæism the tenet that the Creator was not the Former of fire and darkness [Hist. Eccl. iv. 10; comp. Isa. xlv. 7]. But this doctrine was not avowed by them.

In his old age Audius was banished by Constantius to Scythia, where he converted many of the Goths, and established monasteries of strict and admirable rule. Here he remained till his death, the time of which is not known.

Many bishops carried on the sect in Mesopotamia, Uranius being their chief. There were also bishops of the sect among the Goths. A local persecution drove them from the country of the Goths, and in very much diminished numbers they collected in Chalcis in Syria and by the Euphrates. The sect disappeared by the end of the fifth century. [Epiph. Hær. lxx. Theod. Hist. Eccl. iv. 10. August. Hær. l., who calls them Vadiani, and states that some assert them to have been in Egypt in communion with the Catholic Church; Prædest. l., where Zenon, a Syrian bishop, is named as their chief opponent.]

AUGSBURG, CONFESSION OF. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

AUGUSTINIANS. The name by which the Jansenists were accustomed to designate themselves in the early days of their history. [JANSENISTS.]

AZYMITES. A designation used by controversialists of the Eastern Church for those who consecrate unleavened bread for the Holy Eucharist.

BAANITES. A name given to some local sect of the Paulicians in Armenia, from a leader named Baanes, a disciple and successor of Josephus Epaphroditus, about the year 810. [Petrus Sicul. Hist. Manich. Baronius, ad Ann. 810.]

BACON, ROGER. He was born at Ilchester, A.D. 1214, and became a Franciscan monk at Oxford, studying, probably, at Brasenose Hall. He afterwards went to Paris, the Athens of the age, where he graduated as doctor, and had Robert Gros-tête as fellow-student and friend. He is the connecting-link between the scholasticism of the Middle Ages and the philosophy of Europe in modern times. He endeavoured to recall the learned from their blind idolatry of Aristotle, then only known in faulty Latin translations of a corrupt text. If he had his own way, he said, he would burn every copy: "Si haberem potestatem super libros Aristotelis, ego facerem omnes cremari, quia tantum est temporis amissio studere in illis, et causa erroris multiplicati" [comp. Theol. i. 2]. But this refers only to those parts that subserved the dialectics of the Schools. For Aristotle, as Peripatetic philosopher, he had a profound veneration. Wherever he suspected the taint of error his hand was against every man, "nullum ordinem excludo," and, in consequence, every man's hand was against him. Even the "angelic" Thomas was "vir erroneus et famosus." The work that he prepared by command of Clement IV. and transmitted to him, was intended to suggest to his patron the necessity of reform, that the onward progress of Antichrist might be stayed.

Bacon was thoroughly convinced of the importance of geographical and ethnological science, and of an accurate knowledge of learned languages and grammar; while, with a knowledge of living languages, missionaries, he said, might be sent forth, who could declare to savages the marvellous works of God in their own tongue; the Greek Church might become one with the Roman through the fraternity of a common speech; and all mankind might be made one family by commerce and the amity of familiar intercourse. Even comparative philology was dimly present to his mind. These were notions that had never yet been heard in the Schools, where the language of the Vulgate and the mass was deemed to be all-sufficient. Philosophy as yet had grown only upon three stocks of the human family—the Hebrew, the

Mathematics he held to be the principal science, which had precedence of the rest, inasmuch as the spiritual and eternal is only to be learned by the bodily and finite. In this there is a touch of the sensualism of Locke and of the method of Comte. Ethics, he said, had never yet been taught in the Schools as it had been of old. The ethics of Aristotle, the treatises of Seneca, the noble and exalted moral teaching of Cicero, might well put to shame the far inferior wisdom of contemporary guides. Pagan men, without the light of grace and faith, had attained a height by the mere force of reason, that had as yet been inaccessible to Christian doctors. If the vitium originis of the Schools was a love for disputation and endless wrangling, it was to be cured by diverting the attention of the learned to sounder studies in the way of experimental philosophy. This was the queen of sciences, that investigates the truth for itself, and is not indebted to antecedent systems. Bacon lays down rules for the prosecution of such studies that can scarcely fail to have helped forward the "Advancement of learning" after four more centuries had passed away. Experience is the true handmaid of knowledge. Authority is valueless unless it gives its reasons, "non sapit nisi detur ejus ratio." Reasoning can only amount to demonstration when its results are verified by experience and practice. We see in such statements the same independence of spirit, and demand for clear intelligible reasoning, the same love of order and simplicity, which raised the name of Descartes to the highest rank, and enabled Lord Bacon to lay the foundation of modern philosophy. If Roger seems, however, to depreciate authority, he means not the authority which God has committed to his Church, or that which results from merit and worth, but that which is the assumption of blind prejudice, ambition, and ignorance. Of the authority due to the Fathers he says that they not only permit to us the correction of whatever is spoiled by human ignorance, but they themselves advance statements which afterwards they with humility retract. If they had lived to time present they would have improved and altered many things that are still allowed to exist.

Bacon boldly laid to the charge of Schoolmen a profound ignorance of sacred and profane antiquity, which prevented them from detecting the various fallacies of the day; and he accused them of moving in a vicious circle of abstractions, which made them utterly incapable of appreciating the real and the natural; hence that the spirit of the Schools, troubling itself so little about the works of nature and of God, was cramped and illiberal, captious and artificial, disputatious and pedantic. If Bacon did no good in his generation, and much harm to himself by these invectives, he at least prepared the minds of succeeding generations for the emancipation of the human spirit from scholastic trammels. Bacon seems scarcely to have troubled himself to ascertain the difference between realism and nominalism, but of the two he favoured the latter class of opinion, though without the precision of Roscellin or the greater subtlety of Abelard; but he was no partisan. In fact he was too correctly orthodox in his theology, too ardent a maintainer of the sovereign authority of the Pope, and too earnest an advocate of the supremacy of canon over civil law, to run in the same groove with the early advocates of nominalism. Like all his predecessors of the Schools he classed philosophy and theology together; they both formed one truth, and were both equally derived from the reasonable Word that was made flesh and dwelt among us. He ascribed the highest authority, over the Church and everything else, to the teaching of Holy Writ, and would have the laity also study it in the original languages. All wisdom, he said, is contained substantially in Scripture. Its development is canon law and philosophy. Nearly all the evil that abounds in the world arises from our ignorance of Scripture. His strictures upon the unsatisfactory condition of the Vulgate text caused Hugh de St. Caro to apply himself to its purification. If ever the holy men of old, or the wiser spirits among the heathen, by their teaching anticipated revealed truth, it was because the traditions of paradise had never quite died out: the torch transmitted from hand to hand had never been wholly obscured by the smoke of this world's folly.

Bacon's reform of the calendar, proposed by him in earnest terms to Pope Clement IV., was only realized three centuries later, A.D. 1582, under Gregory XIII. His knowledge of astronomy enabled him to detect the error of the Julian year, which was longer than the astronomical year by about eleven minutes; in 128 years this would amount to an entire day, which must then be subtracted. Similarly the equinoxes were observed to fall earlier by a day in every 124 years. The error had its use in chronology, for it gave the exact date for calculating the lapse of time since Ptolemy, who, A.D. 140, declared March 22nd to be the equinoctial day; but it was a reproach to astronomy, and a constant cause of error. The lunations were no less faulty; in 306 years the error of the calendar amounted to an entire day, and in 4266 years, the moon entering on her first quarter, would be marked in the calendar as at the full. Infidel philosophers, he said, Arabs and Jews, regard with amazement the stupidity of Christian astronomers, and the carelessness of Christian prelates, who order the Church feasts by so fluctuating a scale of error. In other respects also, Bacon shewed the faultiness of the Ptolemean theory, and threw out hints that were turned to account by Copernicus.

In optics, Bacon was the precursor of Newton; he himself profiting by the discoveries of Arab philosophers. Yet he first made known the delicate mechanism of the eye, and indicated the possible use of the retina. He showed that Aristotle was in error when he deemed the action of light to be instantaneous; the movement of which, however inconceivable might be its rapidity, is still appreciable [Opus Maj. 298, 300].

The light of the stars, he said, was not derived, but they shine by their own brilliancy. His theory of shooting stars and meteors made a near approach to modern notions, when he said that they were no true stars, but comparatively of small bulk, "corpora parvæ quantitatis," that they traverse the earth's atmosphere, and ignite by the rapidity of their movement. The principles of perspective were not unknown to Bacon. The invention of telescopic and microscopic lenses is attributed to him, and when he presented his Opus Majus to Clement IV. by John of Paris, he sent at the same time a lens, with instructions for its use: "Johannes portavit crystallum sphericum ad experiendum, et instruxi eum in demonstratione et figuracione hujus rei occultæ" [Opus Tertium, c. 31].

He first indicated the refractive power of the air, and the rationale of the rainbow. It was in strict keeping with the spirit of his age, that his vast erudition and sagacious power of observation should be compromised by a belief in judicial astrology, and in the transmutation of metals by alchemy. The composition of gunpowder was among the secrets of his laboratory.

Bacon more than once launches startling anticipations of the possible discoveries of science. Mechanism, he says, will be invented, when nature shall have been compelled to reveal her secret laws, whereby the largest vessels will be propelled without rowers, and more rapidly under the guidance of a single man than with a full crew. Carriages will roll along with an inconceivable swiftness without a team. Machines will fly through the air, and in the midst the guide will sit who, by touching a spring, will cause huge wings to unfold themselves and generate a bird-like movement. A small implement, a few inches long and wide, will suffice to raise and lower enormous weights, and enable a man to lift himself and others from the lowest depths to the clouds, and to descend again at his will. Another implement will have such tractile force as to enable a single operator to draw a thousand persons along. One apparatus will be devised for walking at the bottom of the sea, another for swimming and floating on its surface without risk of sinking. Bridges will be thrown across rivers without piers or arches; and to such marvels of science there will be no apparent limit. [De Mirab. et Tr. de Mathemat. See also Saisset, Prec. et Disc. de Descartes, 38.]

Bacon had the credit with his contemporaries of having invented a burning mirror that could consume an entire army, and a brazen head which gave responses to his questionings upon the deep secrets of nature and futurity. How may a rampart be thrown round England? was a question propounded by Bacon and one of his experts. The oracle was silent, and they returned to their alembics. Presently it spoke, but attention was absorbed in their work, and the utterance was for ever lost. Saisset observes sarcastically, "Plus d'un bon Anglais de nos jours se prendra à regretter que la tête d'airain de frère Bacon n'ait pas été conservée; et qu'elle ne puisse pas dire son secret à l'oreille attentive de Lord Palmerston. Que d'alarmes et d'argent épargnés à l'amirauté Anglaise! Que de soucis de moins pour M. Gladstone!"

Bacon's depreciation of the scholastic system drew down upon him a bitter and life-long persecution. He was accused of dealing with familiar spirits in his observatory tower at Oxford.¹ He only studied his Moorish philosophers, it was said, and his followers of Mahomet, for the purposes of necromancy; he could be no true Christian who meddled with black arts; his astrology alone condemned him. The rulers of his convent at length sent him for trial to Paris, "propter quasdam novitates suspectas," where he was placed under rigid surveillance and harsh discipline that continued for ten years [A.D. 1257-67]. He gives a touching description of these trials in the introduction to his Opus Tertium, a work recently recovered by M. Cousin from an ancient MS. at Douai. His books and mathematical instruments were taken from him, and he was forbidden to write and, worse than all, to teach; for, like Seneca, his only ambition was "discere ut doceam." The mildest discipline, if he resented such treatment, was solitary confinement on a bread and water diet. Hope revived within him when Guy Foulques, who, as Papal legate in England, had heard of his fame, was made Pope, with the title of Clement IV. Bacon having been detected in writing to him was at first treated with greater severity; but afterwards released, when he returned to England. Unfortunately for him Clement died the next year, and was succeeded by Nicolas III., who owed his elevation to the influence of Jerome of Ascoli, general of the Franciscan order, a narrow-minded, inflexible bigot. Bacon's long imprisonment then followed, from A.D. 1278 to 1292. He died in A.D. 1294, having, in the last years of his life, composed a Summary of Theology.

Such was Roger Bacon, termed by his contemporaries "Doctor mirabilis," all persecution of the object of their wonder notwithstanding. And truly he was a wonderful character, whether we consider the extent of his varied knowledge, or his proud spirit of independence and heroic energy. He first indicated in its dawn the brilliant future that awaited scientific induction; daring nobly, and at the cost of personal safety, to stem the tide of prejudice that opposed the onward progress of the human spirit. He was content to be the victim of contemporary ignorance, if only he might be an associate of the wise in every age. [Baconi Opus Majus, ed. Jebb, Lond. A.D. 1733. BACULARII. A sect of the Anabaptists who considered it sinful to carry any other arms than a staff, alleging that the Scriptures altogether forbid the use of the sword to Christians.

BAIOLENSES. [BAGNOLENSES.]

BAIUS, or BAJUS. The Latinized name of a theologian of Louvain named Michael de Bay, whose theories respecting grace and predestination were the foundation of Jansenism.

Baius was born at Melin in the territory of Aeth in the year 1513, and having been educated at Louvain, became Professor of Theology there, A.D. 1551. He adopted an independent line of teaching instead of that ordinarily received from the Schoolmen, founding it especially on the Pauline Epistles as interpreted by St. Augustine. The pronounced Augustinianism of Baius excited opposition from the Franciscans, who brought his lectures to the notice of the Sorbonne. Eighteen propositions taken from them were condemned by that body in A.D. 1560, and were declared heretical, but Baius still continued in his office at Louvain. In 1563 he was sent as delegate to the Council of Trent, where he took a prominent part in the discussions which took place, and where he raised up fresh opponents, who, shortly after his return to Louvain, placed seventy-six propositions taken from his works before the Pope Pius V. These propositions were condemned by the Pope in the year 1567, but in the Bull of condemnation "Ex omnibus afflictionibus," the name of Baius was not mentioned. He therefore continued in his office of Divinity Professor, and even became Dean of St. Peter's at Louvain, and Chancellor of the University. But much opposition was raised against him by the Jesuits, and at the instigation of one of them, Francis Tolet, the Bull of Pius V. was confirmed in the year 1580 by Gregory XIII. Baius submitted to this condemnation, retracted his opinions that he might obtain absolution from Cardinal Granvella the Legate, and took no prominent part in theological controversy for the rest of his life, which lasted until A.D. 1589. He thus justified the character given of him even by his opponents, that of a humble-minded man who sought truth and the good of the Church rather than the spread of his own opinions: "Michaele Baio," said Tolet, "nihil doctius, nihil humilius."

The condemned propositions of Baius maintained the theory that man might have merited eternal life if he had continued in a state of innocence, continuing in that state even without the assistance of Divine Grace; that after the Fall all his works which are not done under the influence of Divine Grace are sinful works; that all works whatever are sinful unless done from pure love of God; that all men being born in sin it is impossible that penance by itself can offer satisfaction for sin, though it may do so when united with the satisfaction offered by our Lord. Some of these opinions were revived by Jansen and by the Quietists, and they were still taught at Louvain and Douai even after Baius had recanted. [JANSENISTS.]

BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY. In the year 1717 there met in literary contest the three great parties into which England was divided; the party which had transferred the allegiance of the nation to the foreign Prince William of Orange, and had attempted to reduce the Church of England to the platform of foreign Protestantism; the members of the Church who had submitted to William, but had defeated the attempt to alter the constitution of the Church; and the Nonjurors who had set up a rival episcopate.

Hoadly, Bishop of Bangor (from whom the controversy takes its name), Nathanael Marshall, William Law, all three well known in English Church history, may be named as representatives of the three disputing parties. The controversy was long and very voluminous. Deeply important as its topics were, and that for all times, so much of merely personal and temporary interest entered into their handling, that the writings of the disputants are now in general unreadable. Some tracts are still read by students, such as Kennett's on lay deprivations, and Law's on the priesthood and its powers, but it may be safely assumed that few living men have read, or would or could read, a connected series of the tracts. Fortunately there was published in 1719, and continued in 1720, a systematic Account of all the Considerable Pamphlets; and without adopting the criticisms and judgments of the writer, we may by the list he gives form a sufficient notion of the course the controversy took. Beginning with the main ecclesiastical point of the Nonjuring question, the validity or invalidity of lay deprivations of bishops, it widened to the general consideration of the nature of the Church of Christ, and of the constitution of the Church of Christ as established in this country, branching off on the one hand into the topics of the sacraments, Church ordinances, Church communion, and the priesthood; and on the other hand into the topics of religious sincerity, the sacramental test, the Test and Corporation Acts, and ecclesiastical authority; with episodes some purely personal, some of the rights and powers of Convocation, some of appeals to foreign Protestants.

The dispute began when the Government at the time of the Scotch rebellion seized many copies of Hickes' Collection of Papers, 1716, in which was claimed obedience to the deprived bishops, and consequently the Church of England under Tenison and Wake was charged with schism. The first stage then regarded the Nonjurors' pretensions. Bennett¹ attacked them. His answer was not thought satisfactory, and was therefore commented on, and a reply on other grounds made to the Nonjurors by Pierce² and others. Hoadly wrote anonymously. But the pamphlets most deserving attention are Bennett's Letters to the Bishop of Carlisle on the nomination and deprivation of English prelates. Sykes³ also took part. Then appeared Hoadly's Preservative against the Principles and Practices of the Nonjurors. Marshall,⁴ from the status of a conforming Churchman, disputed some of Hoadly's arguments, and answered the Nonjurors' charge of schism. Sykes appeared for Hoadly. Then came Hoadly's sermon, The Nature of the Kingdom of Christ. Before Convocation could act Snape⁵ replied, and amidst a cloud of anonymous pamphlets Hoadly rejoined. This second stage, "On the nature of Christ's kingdom," was carried on by Burnet and Whitby, Trapp⁶ defending Snape. An episode occurred upon Bennett's being charged with having advised Hoadly regarding his sermon [see Life of Bennett, p. 214]; and a second concerning the character of De la Pillonnière, a converted Jesuit living with Hoadly. Convocation moved, and a Committee of the Lower House represented that the tendency of the doctrines and positions contained in the Sermon and the Preservative was,—first, to subvert all government and discipline in the Church of Christ, and to reduce His kingdom to a state of anarchy and confusion; secondly, to impugn and impeach the regal supremacy in causes ecclesiastical and the authority of the legislature to enforce obedience in matters of religion by civil sanctions. Sherlock, Master of the Temple, having signed this report, was accused of inconsistency, and a side-quarrel ensued between him and Sykes. Moss¹ defended the report, Hoadly replied to the report, and the controversy raged in attack and defence of the Committee; the Prolocutor, Dean Stanhope, Cannon,² and Dawson³ being for the defence.

Meanwhile Law had answered Hoadly's fresh reply to Snape, the special point to which he addressed himself being Hoadly's assertion, "When you are secure of your integrity before God, this will lead you not to be afraid of the terrors of men, or the vain words of regular and uninterrupted successions, authoritative benediction, excommunications, nullity or validity of God's ordinances to the people, upon account of niceties and trifles, or any other the like dreams." Burnet defended Hoadly. Law's Three Letters are the most valuable of all the tracts. They were reprinted in 1812 in The Scholar Armed.

Sherlock turned the controversy in the Convocation branch to the particular point of the Test and Corporation Acts, the repeal of which Hoadly had urged. Sykes and Pierce stood up for Hoadly. This brought up the question of occasional conformity, and of course included the question of a sacramental test.

Some sharp skirmishing took place concerning a letter to a Zurich professor containing bitter invectives against Hoadly. It was said to have been written by Wake. Gordon, the author of the Independent Whig, is said to have written one of the seven pamphlets against the archbishop.

The foregoing is but a very brief statement of the heads of the controversy. It is sufficient, however, to shew its character and importance. The Nonjuring questions and the questions of the Test Acts are now only of historical interest. Of permanent interest is the main subject, the doctrine which, putting forward an alleged sincerity of good intention as all in all, would dissolve the Church as a society, and reduce all its ordinances to mere human inventions. It has so happened, said the Committee of Convocation, that this Right Reverend Bishop, in his extreme opposition to certain unwarrantable pretensions to extravagant degrees of Church power, . . . has not only condemned the abuse, but even denied the use and destroyed the being of those powers, without which the Church as a society cannot subsist, and by which our national constitution next under Christ is chiefly supported. The powers denied and destroyed were, it is notorious, not only powers of government, but also of the valid administration of the sacraments. BAPTISTS. A sect whose distinctive principle is that of administering baptism only to adult persons: baptizing them not to make them children of God, but as a sign that they have become so.

Infant baptism was repudiated by most of the mediæval Anti-Sacerdotalists and by the ANA-BAPTISTS of the Reformation age, from whom have sprung the MENNONITES or German Baptists of a later time. But the sect commonly known by the name of Baptists among English-speaking people is an offshoot of the BROWNISTS or early Independents, and was formed into a distinct community only in the reign of Charles I. Among the Brownists there were always some persons who objected to Infant Baptism, and looked upon it as invalid. These being generally identified with the foreign Anabaptists, were called by the same name, and it is probable that they were converts of the Dutch Anabaptists who emigrated to England in the time of Henry VIII. and in that of Queen Elizabeth. These Brownist Anabaptists, or "Enthusiasts" as they were often called [ENTHUSIASTS], endeavoured at a later date to ally themselves with the Mennonites of Holland, and parties of them emigrated to Amsterdam in the years 1606 and 1608. But for some reason which is not known, the attempt failed, the emigrants formed a separate community at Amsterdam, and not being able to obtain baptism from the Dutch, their leader, John Smith, first baptized himself [SE-BAPTISTS] and then his followers. But there is no historical connection between this English community at Amsterdam, and the later sect of Baptists, beyond the fact that both bodies rejected Infant Baptism, and were both composed of English Puritans.

The true origin of the English Baptists is narrated by one of their founders, William Kiffin, his account being thus printed by Crosby. "There was a congregation of Protestant Dissenters of the Independent persuasion in London, gathered in the year 1616, whereof Mr. Henry Jacob was the first pastor, and after him Mr. John Lathorp, who was their minister at this time. In this society several persons finding that the congregation kept not their first principles of separation, and being also convinced that Baptism was not to be administered to infants, but such only as professed faith in Christ, desired that they might be dismissed from that community, and allowed to form a distinct congregation in such order as was most agreeable to their own sentiments. The Church, considering that they were now grown very numerous, and so more than could in these times of persecution conveniently meet together, and believing also that these persons acted from a principle of conscience and not obstinacy, agreed to allow them the liberty they desired, and that they should be constituted a distinct church, which was performed the 12th of September 1633. And as they believed that baptism was not rightly administered to infants, so they looked upon the baptism they had received in that age as invalid: whereupon most or all of them received a new baptism. Their minister was Mr. John Spilsbury. What number they were is uncertain, because in the mentioning of the names of about twenty men and women it is added 'with divers others.' In the year 1638, Mr. William Kiffin" (the writer of this narrative), "Mr. Thomas Wilson, and others being of the same judgment, were, upon their request, dismissed to the said Mr. Spilsbury's congregation. In the year 1639, another congregation of Baptists was formed whose place of meeting was in Crutched Friars, the chief promoters of which were Mr. Green, Mr. Paul Hobson, and Captain Spencer" [Crosby's Hist. of Eng. Baptists, i. 148]. The same writer also records that the "new baptism" of these early Baptists was effected by communication with the Dutch Menonites. One of their number, Mr. Richard Blunt, being acquainted with the Dutch language, was sent over to Holland, where he was baptized by John Batte; and on his return he baptized Mr. Samuel Blacklock, the two then baptizing others to the number of fifty-three [ibid. i. 101].

From this time the sect spread with some rapidity, but there is no evidence to shew whether all the congregations of Baptists which are soon after found existing originated from that of which the preceding account is given, or whether they were sporadic offshoots from the fermenting bodies of Puritans which had now become so numerous, and which even in the height of their prosperous times were in a constant state of disintegration. Baxter writes, in an early page of his Autobiography, that he made acquaintance with the "Anabaptists" first at Gloucester, where about a dozen young men having conceived opinions against Infant Baptism had been rebaptized [Baxter's Life and Times, pt. i. p. 41]. He was afterwards involved in a controversy with a congregation of the sect which had been formed in a similar manner at Bewdley, within a short distance of the town of Kidderminster, of which he was vicar during the time of the Puritan ascendancy. In 1646, there were said to be forty-six of their congregations in and about London. About the same time also the sect was being developed in the North American colonies by an emigrant priest of the Church of England, named Roger Williams, whose political importance has given him a chapter in American history somewhat similar to that occupied by William Penn [Bancroft's Hist. Unit. States, i. 277-321, ed. 1852].

In 1643, the various congregations of the sect had become sufficiently organized into one body to enable them to hold a representative assembly in London, and at this a "Confession of Faith" was drawn up which was reprinted in 1644 and 1646, and lasted the sect as its standard of doctrine for seventeen years. Large numbers of them enlisted in the Parliamentary army, and the help thus given to the revolutionary party won for the sect a declaration of the Lords and Commons in their favour. This was promulgated in March 1647, in which it was said that "the name of Anabaptism hath indeed contracted much odium by reason of the extravagant principles and practices of some of that name in Germany, tending to the disturbance of the government and peace of all states; which opinions and practice we abhor and detest; but for their opinion against the baptism of infants, it is only a difference about a circumstance of time in the administration of an ordinance wherein, in former ages as well as this, learned men have differed both in opinion and practice. And though we could wish that all men would satisfy themselves and join with us in our judgment and practice in this point; yet herein we hold it fit that men should be convinced by the Word of God, with great gentleness and reason, and not beaten out of it with force and violence." Shortly after this edict of Parliamentary toleration, however, another was issued of a totally different character under Presbyterian influence. This was an ordinance of the Lords and Commons passed on May 2nd, 1648, which declared: "Whosoever shall say that the baptism of infants is unlawful, or that such baptism is void, and that such persons ought to be baptized again, and in pursuance thereof shall baptize any person formerly baptized, or shall say the Church government of Presbytery is antichristian or unlawful, shall, upon conviction by the oath of two witnesses, or by his own confession, be ordered to renounce his said error in the public congregation of the parish where the offence was committed; and in case of refusal, he shall be committed to prison till he find sureties that he shall not publish or maintain the said error any more" [Neale's Hist. of Purit. iii. 375]. They shared, however, in the general moderation with which all religions except the Church were treated by Cromwell, and many of his supporters belonging to the sect, it attained considerable political influence during the time of the Great Rebellion. There were also not a few of them licensed to officiate in the churches from which the clergy had been ejected, and 35 of these were among the 800 (commonly spoken of as 2000) who refused to conform to the customs of the Church at its Restoration, and were hence obliged to give place to the old clergy whom they had ousted, or to others ordained according to the custom of the Church [Stoughton's Eccl. Hist. ii. 242, n. NONCONFORMISTS].

Shortly before the Restoration, a division of the sect had taken place into the General and the Particular Baptists, and this division has been maintained ever since.

GENERAL BAPTISTS, or "Arminian Baptists," are so called because they hold the Arminian doctrine of redemption, instead of the Calvinistic, believing that Christ died to save all men, and not only an elect few. They published a "Confession of Faith," composed of twenty-five articles, in the year 1660, which was reprinted with many more subscriptions in 1691. This marks the time of their separation from the body of the sect, the third and fourth articles setting forth the doctrine of general redemption, the eighth and ninth that of election [Murray's Hist. of Relig. iv. 214, 216,

ed. 1764]. At the Restoration, the General Baptists claimed to be 20,000 in number; but shortly afterwards a large body of them are said to have become followers of BIDDLE the Unitarian. In the following century this portion of the Baptist sect became so largely imbued with Unitarian principles, that they gradually split up into two bodies, those who seceded in 1770 taking the name of the "New Connection of General Baptists," and adopting as their standpoint the original Arminian tenets of the body from which they seceded. The elder fragment of that body, still known as "General Baptists," is now wholly Unitarian. The "New Connection" is believed to number about 200 congregations, and the Unitarian Baptists about 100; but some of these are composed of very few members, lingering on chiefly through the circumstance that their chapels are endowed.

PARTICULAR BAPTISTS represent the original Baptist sect as it first seceded from that of the Brownist or Independents in 1633. They continue to hold the Calvinistic doctrine of "particular redemption," and hence since the secession of the Arminian portion of the sect have distinguished themselves from them by the prefix indicating that dogma. They are again subdivided into two sections on the question of free or strict communion, the "free communionists" admitting to the Lord's Supper those who have been baptized only in infancy, as well as those who have been baptized as adults; while the "strict" or "close communionists" only admit those who have been baptized as adults. These two classes do not, however, form separate sects, congregations of both being admitted into the "Baptist union" (a society for co-operation founded in 1812), as indeed also are those of the New Connection General Baptists. The Particular Baptists are mostly intended when Baptists without any other designation are named.

The Baptists are one of "the three denominations" to which a sort of constitutional recognition has been accorded in the right to present corporate addresses to the Crown (the other two being the Independents and the Presbyterians), and are a numerous and rather influential body among English dissenters. In the whole of Great Britain and Ireland they number about 2,600 places of worship, each having on an average 90 members, 100 Sunday scholars, and being also attended by persons not actually members of the sect but allied with it. The whole number of actual members of the sect amounted in 1871 to 233,675, being fewer by 4000 than in 1870 [Bapt. Handbook, 1872, p. 25]. In the English Colonies there are about 60,000 members, the majority of whom are negroes in the West Indies. In the United States they number 1,400,000.

Within the last fifty years the Baptists have made some vigorous endeavours to provide a more respectable education for their ministers than is common among dissenters. They have as many as ten colleges in England, Wales, and Scotland; and in these about 240 young men receive an elementary education in the learned languages, and a more elaborate training in Calvinistic theology. They have also two Missionary Societies, which together expend about £40,000 annually in India, China, and the West Indies. [Crosby's Hist. Eng. Bapt. Ivimey's Hist. Eng. Bapt. Evans' *Hist. BARBELIOTES. Among the multitude of Gnostics, says Irenæus, who had sprung up "like mushrooms growing out of the ground," there was a sect in Iberia which called themselves after the name of Barbelos, an Æon of the Gnostic mythology, who was the special object of their veneration [Iren. adv. Hæres. xxix.]. This Barbelos, or Barbelo, is mentioned in connection with the Nicolaitanes by Philaster [Hæres. xxxiii.], Augustine [Hæres. vi.], and Epiphanius [Hæres. xxv. 2], and it is supposed that the name is made up of two Hebrew words, בר בעלה [Bar Belah], "the son of the Lady," or else from בר בעל [Bar Bel], "the son of the Lord." This Barbelo they affirmed to be the offspring of the Father, and of a Mother whom some named Jaldabaoth, and others Sabaoth. From Barbelo sprang Light, and Light being anointed by the Father became Christ. Immortality, Truth, Grace, Will, Understanding, and Prudence, were all personified, as also Lust, Envy, Emulation, and other vices; the personality of Christ and of the Holy Spirit being thus practically allegorized away. Their system was mixed up with obscure ideas which shew that licentious practices were familiar to them, and that they were probably adopted in their mysteries, as seems to have been the case with the Nicolaitanes. Hence they acquired the name of Borborians, from βόρβορος, filth or mud: Theodoret expressly giving this play upon their original name as the application of it, Βαρβηλῶται ἡγοῦντο Βορβοριανοί [Theodor. de Hæres. fab. i. 13], and a similar explanation being given by Nicetas Choniatus [Niket. Thesaur. orthod. fid. iv. 2]. Philaster states that the Borbeliotes, in common with other licentious heretics of their class, denied that there was any future judgment.

The names Borbelitæ and Borboriani are given to the Gnostics in general by some writers, as by Epiphanius.

BARDESANIANS. A sect founded by Bardesanes, a Syrian of Edessa in Mesopotamia, a man of great learning. He flourished in the latter part of the second century, being born, according to the Edessan Chronicle [a work of the sixth century: Lardner, ed. Oxf. ii. 319], in the year 154. He was by some supposed to be the tutor of Clemens Alexandrinus, but this is not established. From a noble answer of his to Apollonius, a friend of one of the Emperors Antoninus, that he was ready to encounter death or any suffering the prince might inflict, rather than deny his faith, to which he was being urged, he has been reckoned a confessor [Epiphan. Hæres. lvi.]. He is said by Eusebius to have been an excellent Syriac scholar, and most keen in disputation [Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 30]. Attracted to the oriental philosophy, he relapsed, as Epiphanius says, like a goodly ship, laden with costly bales, shipwrecked in sight of harbour. The great problem of the day, the existence of evil in the world, he endeavoured to solve by supposing two co-equal supreme principles, one good, one evil. He adopted, more or less, the fanciful ideas of some of the Eastern Gnostics, and partly held with their opinion of the successive generation of æons. [BASILIDIANS.] No doubt, also, he denied the resurrection of the body; and believed that the body with which the Saviour was clothed was a celestial and unsubstantial one only. Hence he would not admit that Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, but said the flesh with which He seemed to be endued was from Heaven direct. The original man, created by God, had a refined body adapted to his unfallen nature. After the Fall, God united his soul to a grosser and more material body. There is no question that his moral system was unimpeachable. Towards the end of his life he renounced, but, as it seems, not wholly, these errors. Porphyry speaks of a Bardesanes of Babylon as alive in A.D. 218; he is said then to have been held in high respect. Lardner has given many reasons for identifying him with Bardesanes of Edessa, which, though perhaps not conclusive, are certainly most reasonable. While still sound in the faith (so Eusebius and Jerome: but Epiphanius makes him a Valentinian from the first) he wrote numerous works, many of which he produced [Euseb. loc cit.] against Marcion and others. These were translated by his disciples into Greek, being originally written in Syriac. Epiphanius seems therefore in error when he makes Bardesanes skilled in Greek as well as Syriac. His chief work was De Fato, written against an astrologer Abidas. This was dedicated to Antoninus; not, it seems most likely, the emperor, but one of the more conspicuous among his own adherents. Eusebius has preserved a very considerable fragment of this [Euseb. Præp. Evang. vi. 10]. He wrote also a great number of hymns, as did his son Harmonius. They were used in churches; and doubtless their continued use in Syria helped to retain a belief in some of his distinctive opinions, which would account for the existence of a sect of Bardesianians for nearly two centuries after his death. His followers, however, were never numerous, nor actively opposed to Catholic teaching. The use of his hymns was discontinued in the fourth century, and after that time we hear no more of the Bardesianians. The fragment above mentioned as given by Eusebius, is also found, word for word, in the Clementine Recognitions [Clem. Recog. ix. 19, &c.]. From this Cave infers that Bardesanes was the author of these Recognitions, but does not affirm it as an established fact. Assuming also the identity of the Babylonian and Syrian Bardesanes, we have two other fragments preserved by Porphyry and cited by Cave. [Tillemont, Mém. ii. 316. Fabric. Biblioth. Gr. ii. 599. Mosheim, de reb. ante Const. II. 60.]

BARLAAMITES. The adherents of Barlaam, abbot of St. Saviour's at Constantinople, in his controversy with the HESYCHASTS or Quietist mystics of the East. Barlaam was a man of much learning, belonging to the order of St. Basil, and in his early life a strong controversialist on the side of the Eastern Church against the Latins. In A.D. 1337 he brought a complaint against the Hesychast monks of Mount Athos, whom he had been directed to visit and inspect, and whose strange practice he regarded as mere fanaticism. The charges brought by him were tried before a council in A.D. 1341, when the monks, with Palamas (afterwards archbishop of Thessalonica) for their advocate, were acquitted. Barlaam was at the same time condemned by the influence of the Quietists, and immediately leaving Constantinople he joined the Latin Church, in which he eventually became Bishop of Gieræce in Calabria, his native country.

The dogma which had become the subject of controversy—viz. that God dwells in an eternal light, distinct from His Being, and this was the light seen in the Mount of Transfiguration—was again opposed by ACINDYNUS, a friend of Barlaam. Several other councils were held on the subject, and the Barlaamites, as the opponents of the Quietists were now called, were finally silenced by one held at Constantinople in A.D. 1351, in which they were severely censured. [Fabricius, Biblioth. Græc. v. 247, 454.]

BARSANIANS. One of the small and obscure sects into which the Acephali broke up in the latter half of the fifth century. St. John of Damascus says that they derived their name from Barsanius, a propagator of the Theodosian and Gaianite heresy [Damasc. de Hæres. iii.]. They are identical with the SEMIDALITES.

BARSANUPHITES. A sect of the Acephali, like the preceding, and having for their leader a pretender of the name of Barsanuphius, who falsely claimed to have received consecration as a bishop. They separated off from the Acephali at the end of the fifth century, and were reunited to the Jacobite communion at the end of the ninth century [Neale's Patriarch. of Alexandria, ii. 22, 137]. Barsanuphius is not to be confounded with the monk of that name mentioned in the ecclesiastical history of Evagrius, iv. 33.

BARSUMAS. The chief founder and leader of the Nestorians in Chaldæa, Persia, Assyria, and the adjoining countries. He was ejected from the school of Edessa, but became bishop of Nisibis [A.D. 435—437]. He persuaded the Persian sovereign Perozes to expel the orthodox from their seats and churches, and to substitute Nestorians in their place. He also founded the school of Nisibis, from which Nestorian missionaries carried the heresy in the following century to Egypt, Syria, Arabia, India, Tartary, and China.

BARSUMAS. A Syrian archimandrite who

BARULI. A sect of the Albanenses belonging to the twelfth century. Their distinguishing errors are said to have been, That Christ did not become truly incarnate, but assumed a celestial kind of body; that souls were all created before the creation of the world, and all fell into sin together after the creation. [Sianda, Lexic. Polem. s. v.]

BASILIDIANS. So called from their founder Basilides. He was of Alexandria, and the earliest of the Egyptian Gnostics; flourishing early in the second century. Cave places him A.D. 112; some make him later, and he was certainly alive in the reign of the Emperor Hadrian [A.D. 117-138]. If not actually a contemporary of the Apostles he lived at the same time as their disciples, for between the death of the Apostle John and the beginning of Hadrian's reign twenty years only elapsed. It is likely that the more fantastic forms of heresy, which developed rapidly after St. John's death, were in process of formation much earlier, but kept back during his lifetime. Basilides had dwelt some time in Syria before settling in Egypt. Jerome [de Vir. illustr. xxi.] says that he abode, moratus est, in Alexandria at the time [A.D. 135] that Cochebas persecuted the Christians. Some read mortuus est in this passage; but Clemens Alexandrinus, who knew Basilides personally, and on whom it seems we may certainly rely for this point, says that he lived into the reign of the elder Antoninus. His death may therefore be approximately assigned to A.D. 139.

He was a disciple of Menander at the same period as Saturninus. He claimed to derive his doctrine from St. Matthias, and from one Glaucias whom he made the intimate disciple (interpres) of St. Peter. This Glaucias is unknown to history, except as claimed by Basilides; and Waterland [v. 123, Oxf. ed.] seems to suggest that he is altogether imaginary. The chief features in his system, which was a compound of the Pythagorean philosophy, oriental tradition, and Christian revelation, were these: First, he held there was a great First Cause, one Supreme God, to whom he gave the name Abraxas. This name he associated with the number 365, which was made up (according to the Greek system of numeration) by adding together the numbers represented by the letters of which it is composed. The correspondence of this number with that made by the word Mithras, the sun-god of the Persians, is some evidence that Basilides had been in Persia as well as Egypt, as is stated in the dispute between Archelaus and Manes [Routh's Relig.

Sacr. iv. 275]. This correspondence is thus shewn:

α	1	α	1	μ	40	μ	40
β	2	β	2	ι	10	ι	5
ρ	100	ρ	100	θ	8	θ	10
α	1	ρ	1	ρ	100	θ	9
ξ	60	σ	200	α	7	ρ	100
α	1	α	1	ς	200	α	1
ς	200	ξ	60			ς	200
	365		365		365		365

This name is evidently of Coptic origin, and means the Sacred Word; or perhaps more strictly "Hallowed be The Name" [King's Gnostics, 36]. Mr. King has pointed out an instance where the Egyptian word "Abrak," for kneeling down to worship, is actually retained in the Hebrew text of the Scriptures at Gen. xli. 43. From Abraxas, the First Cause, Basilides taught that Understanding (voûs, mens) was created; from the Understanding came the Word (λόγος, verbum), and so on by successive generations were produced Providence, Power, Wisdom, Righteousness, Peace. From these in turn proceeded the higher order of angels, principalities, and powers; from these came again the lower order of angels. The different orders of angels each made a separate heaven, 365 in all. Over them all Abraxas presided. By the lowest order of angels the world was created; of this order was the God of the Jews, the God of the law and the prophets, whom Basilides thus made an angel only. Other angels of this order protected and took charge of other nations, and thus the interests of the angels became conflicting, and all in time became corrupt; and the God Supreme sent down from heaven His Son (voûs), Who joined Himself to the man Jesus, and taught corrupt man the heavenly knowledge they had allowed themselves to lose. The God of the Jews had no power against the Christ, but He had against Jesus, and His people by His instigation put Jesus to death. [Massuet's Dissertationes in Ireneum. Clemens Alex. Strom. vi. Tertull. De Præscrip. xvi. Hippol. Refut. Hær. vii. 8-15. Aug. Hær. iv. Epiph. Hær. xxiv.]

The main problem which the philosophers of the second century set themselves to solve was the existence of evil in the world. Since many of them maintained the essential evil of matter, it followed that they frequently denied the Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the body. This was the case with the Basilidians. Basilides denied that salvation was promised to the bodies of men. His followers in the next century much exaggerated his original teaching, if we may judge from the much stronger terms used against them by Tertullian than had been used by Clemens Alexandrinus, who was not only a contemporary but an inhabitant of the same city as Basilides. They recognised, says Tertullian, a half-resurrection. "Being ashamed perhaps to confess Christ crucified," says Waterland [v. 190, Oxf. ed.], the ancient visionaries, among whom he reckons the Basilidians, "contrived any wild supposition imaginable to evade it." Their refusal to accept the doctrine of the Resurrection obliged them to explain away the Resurrection of Christ. They accordingly said that Christ did not suffer on the cross, that He was a phantom or appearance only without substance of our flesh, that Simon of Cyrene was crucified in His stead, and that therefore no Christian ought to profess faith in the crucified One, lest he should be found adoring Simon. This fantastic theory was an aftergrowth, and formed no part of the teaching of the founder of the sect, who certainly held the reality of the body of the man Christ Jesus. This belief in an apparent suffering Christ satisfied the impugners of the Resurrection doctrine, amongst whom no doubt was Basilides himself. And this belief of utter destruction of the body at death led him to another position strongly antagonistic to the prevailing feelings of Christians; for he vigorously depreciated the glories of martyrdom. The mere denial of a resurrection of the flesh would tend to do this. The hope of rising again into a perfect man supported many martyrs through their sufferings. But Basilides went further than this, and endeavoured to frame a scheme to account for these sufferings. He adopted in the first place a metempsychosis, or transmigration theory, saying that the faithful disciples were afflicted with torments because of sins committed in some previous stage of their existence. One of his arguments was from the known sufferings of infants; believing in the destruction of the body at death, he could not explain this except by saying that they had sinned elsewhere. He held consequently that the sufferings of confessors and martyrs were kinds of punishment, and inflicted necessarily: "metum et laborem in martyre esse necessaria, atque hominem ad agendum semper impelli." Suffering and fear came on men like rust on iron. He relied for this part of the argument on the Scripture, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." Clemens Alexandrinus, in his answer, maintains that the argument about punitive sufferings is worthless from the simple consideration that it was always in the power of Christians to suffer or not. A compliance with the orders of the heathen always exempted them from suffering. In a fragment of Basilides, preserved by Origen in his commentary on Rom. vii. 9 [lib. v. Comment. sec. v.], this passage is cited as an authority for his belief in the metempsychosis, or, as Origen calls it μετεμψωμάτωσις, "Dixit enim Apostolus, quia ego vivebam sine lege aliquando: hoc est, antequam in istud corpus venirem, in eam speciem corporis vixi, quæ sub lege non esset, pecudis scilicet, vel avis." He even said men had two souls, "belluina," "rationalis," one which we share with the brute creation, and one which is our excellence above it.

His opinions upon faith and the knowledge of God are involved in much obscurity, and, in the absence of any extant work of his, can only be conjectured. But he seems to have held that faith and knowledge were co-ordinate, that faith should be greater or less in any man according to his natural powers, πίστιν ἅμα καὶ ἐκλογὴν οὐκείαν εἶναι καὶ ἑκάστων διάστημα. [Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. 3].

In this he would differ from other forms of Gnosticism, in which they were usually made antagonistic. Faith, according to him, was an assent of the soul to some proposition not apprehended by the senses, because not present; and was peculiar to some men by nature; he held that it was inborn in them, and was not the result of instruction, or conviction, or any exercise of judgment; and that such men became like God by nature. The elect were therefore strangers in the world, so-journers, supra-mundane by nature. All sins would not be forgiven, but those only committed in ignorance; and therefore the doctrine of the atonement had no place in his system. All sins must be expiated in the sinner's own person, and in process of this expiation the soul passed through various bodies.

The theory he held on the baptism of Christ was not peculiar to his system, but was common to many. The descent of the Holy Spirit was the indwelling of an æon, or heavenly power, which left Him before His death. His disciples retained a great veneration for this event, though they, as in many other things, greatly obscured the original teaching. They were very particular in the celebration of the anniversary, spending the whole night previous in religious exercises. The impurity of morals attributed by the later writers to Basilides is another instance of the corruption of his followers being laid to his charge. There is little doubt that he taught and practised purity of life; but yet there were many features in his moral system which would seem to encourage the unprincipled among his followers to continue in sin. The opinion for instance on election would be perverted by some into a license; let us "continue in sin that grace may abound." And even Clemens, at the earliest period of the heresy, tells us that some did use this argument, and looked forward to salvation, although deliberately sinning, as being elect by the dignity of their nature. Epiphanius is much more severe in his charge of impurity [Epiph. Her. xxiv. 3].

Irenæus mentions magic in connection with Basilides, "Utuntur autem et hi magia, et imaginibus, et incantationibus, et invocationibus, et reliqua universa periergia" [Contra Her. i. 24]. Epiphanius makes the same charge; οὐ μὴν δὲ ἀλλὰ καὶ μαγανικαῖς μηχαναῖς προσανέχων οὐκ ἐπαύσατο, καὶ περιεργίαις ὁ ἀπάτευν. Beausobre, and after him Lardner, who lose no opportunity of trying to exculpate heretics, altogether deny that there is any evidence of this profession of magic. They say it is only the ignorant charge of men who understood no science against learned students of mathematics and physics. The question of the gems known as the Abraxas gems is slightly discussed by Mosheim [i. 197, where references are given], and more fully examined by Lardner, who pronounces them purely heathen and destitute of all Christian character [viii. 371, &c.]. But this question has been investigated anew by Mr. King [The Gnostics and their Remains, 1864], whose authority on such a point will be admitted by all. He considers it satisfactorily established that the form engraved on these gems was the invention of Basilides himself and intended to be used as a talisman; it was the reduction of his system to a visible representation. Several passages are quoted [p. 81] which seem explicable only on the supposition that the "Pantheus upon our gems was actually intended to symbolize the deity styled Abraxas." Jerome mentions several other sacred names used by Basilides [Ep. 75], Armagil, Leusiboras, Barbelon, Balsamus, "ceteraque magis portenta quam nomina." The first two of these names appear not to occur elsewhere; the last two, meaning respectively Son of God and Lord of Heaven, were names under which the Deity was worshipped by the Iberians. [BARBELIOTES.]

In the prologue to Jerome's Commentary on St. Matthew mention is made of some spurious gospels, and amongst them one by Basilides. This is probably the same with the twenty-four books of commentaries mentioned by Eusebius [Hist. Eccl. iv. 7.] A fragment from the thirteenth book of these commentaries is quoted by Irenæus, and another by Clemens from the twenty-third book. The one cited by Origen has been given above. [All may be seen in Migne's Patrolog. Ser. Græca. viii. 1263]. A reply to this was written by Agrippa Castor, but this also has perished [Hieron. de Viris illustr. 21]. Clemens speaks of a well-known book of Basilides called Prophetia Chami. Barcobas and Barcoph were also names of prophets to whom Basilides appealed. He rejected the authority of the Old Testament, and certain portions of the New Testament, as the Epistles to the Hebrews, Titus and Timothy, which he said were not St. Paul's.

The heresy did not survive very long, and there is but scanty allusion to it in later writers. The most important authors against it are referred to above. Jerome [Ep. 75, written c. A.D. 400] mentions them as having recently shewn considerable activity throughout Spain, "spurcissima per Hispanias Basilidis hæresi sæviante, et instar pestis et morbi, totas infra Pyrenæum et Oceanum vastante provincias."

The fullest and most exhaustive of the replies extant is to be found in Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. iv. 12.

BASLE, CONFESSION OF. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

BASMOOTHEANS. This name is found in the Apostolic Constitutions [vi. 6]: "Even the Jewish nation had wicked heresies: for there were . . . the Basmotheans, who deny Providence, and say that the world is made by spontaneous motion, and take away the immortality of the soul." There can be little doubt that "Basmotheans" is a corruption of "Masbotheans." [MASBOTHEANS.]

BASSUS. In some MSS. of Philaster a heretic appears whose name is written C. Bassus, but as the COLORBASIANs are not elsewhere named by him, and Bassus is not named by any other heresiologist, no doubt C. Bassus is a corrupt reading for Colorbasus. [Philast. De Hæc. xliii.]

BEGHARDS. The German name for a very widely spread sect of mediæval heretics who were closely allied in their origin with the Italian FRATICELLI and the BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT.

The name "Beghard" was originally an honourable designation for those who devoted themselves to a life of prayer; and thus as "Beguienes" were "praying women," Beghards were "praying men." Both are derived from the old German word "beggen" or "beggeren," which signifies to beg earnestly or heartily; and were thus analogous to such designations as "Pietists," "Evangelicals," &c. But from being associated with prayer the name was corrupted by the subsequent habits of the sect into a mere association with mendicancy, and the Beghards were popularly so called because they were pertinacious "beggars" in the common English sense of the word.

Female societies of Beguienes appear to have been formed in many towns in the Netherlands towards the end of the twelfth century; and it is supposed that they arose out of the disproportion between the sexes caused by the number of men slain in the Crusades. In the following century many of these communities of Beguienes were formed in Germany and France, and Matthew Paris says that the number of Beguienes at Cologne in the year 1250 was one thousand, while elsewhere in Germany an "innumerable multitude" of them had sprung up [Matth. Par. p. 805]. Similar communities of men, associating together for prayer and labour, began to be formed early in the same century, the first on record being one at Louvain, which was founded A.D. 1220. About the same time they are found also in France under the name of Boni Pueri (Bons Garçons) or Boni Valeti (Bons Valets) [Gramaye, Antiq. Brabant. pp. 31, 36, 175]. In this early development of the Beghard communities they were mostly affiliated to the Dominicans or Franciscans as brethren of the third or Lay Order, or Tertiaries; and this devotional stage of their history is still represented on the feminine side by the Beguienes of Belgium.

But the Beghards had adopted vagrant habits, and giving up all labour they professed to keep the strict Franciscan vow of poverty by living on the labour of others. Thus they wandered about through towns and villages with the constant cry "Brot durch Gott" ("Bread for the sake of God"), and as their numbers increased the importunity and "professional" character of their begging increased also. They obtained all their converts from among the ignorant labouring classes, many of them being also of that never-failing character which leads to the ready acceptance of any excuse for idleness and wandering. Thus mechanics and field labourers left their work to become Beghards, and religion became a thin cloak for mendicancy.

An alliance very quickly sprung up between the Beghards and the FRATICELLI; and it was not long before the incorporation of many of the BRETHREN AND SISTERS OF THE FREE SPIRIT with their body infected them with heresy. The Council of Mayence [A.D. 1259] directed the clergy to read admonitions to them on three successive Sundays or festivals, and to forbid their assembling in caverns and other secret places for preaching [Mansi, Concil. xxiii. 998]. From the absence of any notice of heresy in this canon it may be doubted whether it had as yet developed itself among them. But charges of licentiousness were brought against them very early, and from the number of women among them the Germans called them "Sisterers" (schwestriones) with an evident ironical meaning.

The headquarters of the sect were at Cologne, but they spread along the banks of the Rhine and overran both France and the Netherlands as well. In the year 1306 a decree against them was issued by a council held at Cologne, another in 1310 by a council held at Trèves, a third at Strasburg A.D. 1317, and a few years later Pope John XXII. published a Bull against them [A.D. 1330], in which they are declared to be persons who have wandered away from the Catholic faith, despising the sacraments and sowing other errors abundantly. Meanwhile the Inquisition had been let loose upon them, and many were burned as heretics. One of the first to suffer was a leader named Walter, who was executed in 1322, three were burned at Constance in 1339, another leader named Berthold at Speyer in 1356, and several at Strasburg in 1366. Under these persecutions the Beghards decreased in number, but traces of them are found in the fifteenth century, and down to the time of Luther.

There can be no doubt that the Beghards were largely infected with the Antinomianism and licentiousness of the Brethren of the Free Spirit. "Their professed object," says Ullmann, "was to restore the pure primal state, the divine life of freedom, innocence, and nature. The idea they formed of that state was that man being in and of himself one with God, requires only to act in the consciousness of this unity, and to follow unrestrained the divinely implanted impulses and inclinations of his nature in order to be good and godly; that prior to the fall he possessed such a consciousness to the full, but that it had been disturbed by that event; that the law had introduced differences among mankind, who originally stood upon a level, but that these ought now to be done away, and the Paradise state of unity and equality restored. To bring this about in defiance of the imposing power of the Church, the only way open to them was by secret societies and clandestine meetings. Accordingly they constructed for themselves remote and often subterraneous habitations, which they called Paradises, and where by night, and especially on the nights of festivals, persons of both sexes used to assemble. On such occasions one of their "apostles" came forward, and taking off his clothes, and exemplifying in his own person the state of innocence, delivered a discourse upon the free intercourse of the sexes, which the law of marriage, contrary to nature, had supplanted. The sequel, if we may credit the reports, was of a kind which forbids description"¹ [Ullmann's Reformers before the Reformation]. These reports were those of eye-witnesses, and Mosheim considers that there is no reason to doubt their truth [Mosheim, de Beghardis et Beguinabus].

BEGUINE. The French form of the name BEGHARD.

BEGUINIL. One of the names given to the FRATICELLI in the Bull of Pope John XXII. [A.D. 1317] ordering their suppression.

BEGUTTE. The Dutch form of the name BEGHARD.

BEHMEN, BÖEHME, or more properly BÖHM, JACOB, a German mystic who gained many followers on the Continent and in England, was born, in 1575, in Allseidenberg, a village near Görlitz in Upper Lusatia. In his childhood he tended cattle, and remained to his tenth year without instruction. At twelve years he was apprenticed to a shoemaker in Görlitz. It happened one day, when he was left alone in the shop, that a stranger in mean apparel, but of grave and reverend countenance, entered and bought a pair of shoes, then going out of the shop a little way, stood still, and called with a loud voice, "Jacob, Jacob, come forth!" The boy obeyed, and the stranger, taking him by the hand, and fixing his bright and piercing eyes on him, said, "Jacob, thou art little, but shalt be great, and become another man, such an one as the world shall wonder at; therefore be pious, fear God, and reverence His word. Read diligently the Scriptures, wherein thou hast comfort and instruction, for thou must endure much poverty and suffer persecution; but be courageous, and persevere, for God loves and is gracious unto thee." After this mysterious visit the boy grew more and more serious and visionary, and at one time "was for seven days surrounded with a divine light, and stood in the highest contemplation, and in the kingdom of joys." At nineteen he married, and in 1604 became a master shoemaker in Görlitz.

Years passed, four sons were born to Behmen, and he was still only known as a pious and harmless mechanic. Meantime his visionary faculty grew greater. On one occasion he fell into a trance while gazing on the dazzling light of the sun's rays broken upon a tin vessel. Afterwards, walking in the fields, he had a new faculty opened in him to discern the virtues of plants. He began to write, but only for his private satisfaction, with no design of publishing his visions to the world. A book called Aurora, thus written by him, was lent to a friend, who made a copy of it, and this fell into the hands of Richter the primate of Görlitz, by whom the author was denounced from the pulpit, and summoned to appear before the senate. He was ordered to write no more, and obeyed the order for seven years. But in 1616, at the age of forty-two, he ventured to publish Aurora, or the Morning Redness, and during the remaining seven years of his life poured forth about thirty other publications. One of the most important of his works is, Description of the Three Principles of the Divine Being. From writing in his native language at a time when Latin was generally used, he got the name of the Teutonic philosopher. He wrote at a steady rate, without haste and without correction. All that he produced was welcomed by a constantly growing circle of admirers and disciples. Richter now again bestirred himself against him, and the magistrates recommended him to leave the city for the sake of peace, which he did. Thereafter he was summoned before the Elector of Saxony, who appointed six Doctors of Divinity to examine him. His gentle demeanour and answers won the good opinion both of the Elector and the examiners, and he was charitably dismissed. He returned to Görlitz, where he died in 1624. On his deathbed, he asked his son Tobias whether he did not hear sweet music; and when his son answered that he heard nothing, bade him open the door, that the sound might enter. He foretold the moment of his departure three hours before it came, and when it was at hand, bade his son turn him, and expired.

Behmen

Behmen was a small thin man, with a low forehead, but with full temples and bright blue eyes. His voice was weak and sweet, his character gentle and retiring. His writings utter in their own way the deepest philosophical conceptions, and are the work of an entirely spiritual mind. Their phraseology is drawn from the Scriptures, with a large admixture of the terms of the mystical chemistry then in use. They consist of speculations on the Deity and the origin of things, delivered in the form of Divine revelations. The Deity is to be contemplated first in His own existence as "the eternal one, the silent nothing, the temperamentum." The Divine Unity is itself a Trinity. Nature, or creature, proceeds therefrom, and is called "contrariety." But the proceeding of creature from God is at the same time the ingoing of God into creature; "the silent nothing becomes something by entering into duality." The power of seeing duality in things is spiritual-mindedness.

The life of Behmen was written by his admirer Abraham von Frankenberg, who died in 1652. The first collection of his writings was made in Holland by Betke in 1673; a more complete one in 1682 by Gichtel [10 vols. Amsterdam], from whom the followers of Behmen have received the name of Gichtelians, a sect valued for their virtuous, silent, and benevolent life. Another edition appeared in Amsterdam in 1730, under the title Theosophia revelata, in two volumes; more complete in six volumes. The latest edition is by Schiebler, Leipsic, 1831-40. Besides Germany and Holland, Behmen was acknowledged in France by Pierre Poiret as a man of deep spiritual insight, and in England he gained a devoted adherent in the divine and physician John Pordage, who wrote a commentary on his works, and declared himself convinced by a special revelation of the truth of his doctrines. Jane Lead, a female enthusiast, founded a sect called the PHILADELPHIANS, for the study of his writings in 1697, in which she was joined by Pordage and his celebrated disciple Thomas Bromley. An English translation of Behmen was published in 1764 by William Law, the author of the Serious Call. On the authority of Law, we learn that Sir Isaac Newton was a diligent student of Behmen, a large number of extracts from whose works was found in the handwriting of Newton amongst his papers [Brewster's Newton, ii. p. 371].

The interest in Behmen was revived by the great speculative movement in Germany about the beginning of this century. The end of the philosophy of Fichte, of Schelling, of Hegel, was the cognition of the absolute, or unconditioned; terms which denote the same principle which was the root of the mystical contemplations of Behmen. This identity was acknowledged by Hegel, who saw in the "silent nothing," or principle of negativity which was the origin of things of Behmen, a forecast of his own celebrated division of philosophy into the science of the idea existing in and for itself, of the idea representing itself in nature, and of the idea returning into itself. Hence Hegel placed Behmen at the head of modern philosophy. [For a favourable early account of Behmen and his doctrines see Arnoldi Hist. Ecclesiastica de Hæretica. For a modern German account see Die Lehre des Deutschen Philosophen Jacob Böhm, Wuller, Stuttgart, 1836, and Tennemann's Manual of Phil. A life by an unknown author was also published at Dresden, 1802. BERENGARIANS. [BERENGARIUS.]

BERENGARIUS. The leader of a too small school of divines belonging to the eleventh century who opposed the ultra-Roman definition of the Real Presence, which had originated with PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS [A.D. 831-865], and was formally promulgated as the doctrine of the Western Church by the Fourth Council of Lateran [A.D. 1215].

In the earlier part of his life, Berengarius, or Bérenger, was at the head of the school attached to the cathedral of Tours, of which he was also canon. But when he was about forty-two years of age [A.D. 1040] he became Archdeacon of Angers, shortly after which time he first comes into notice in connection with the Eucharistic controversy. As a schoolmaster he had shewn an independence and originality of mind which had brought upon him some degree of censure as being fond of novelties, especially of a novel pronunciation of Latin which he wished to introduce. But his intellectual boldness was shewn soon after he went to Angers by his opposition to the Eucharistic theories of Radbertus, which had now become received as authoritative by many theologians. Berengarius had studied the work of RATRAMNUS, written against this view of the Eucharist, but was said to go much further from the received opinion, and to maintain that the consecrated elements are only symbols—"figuram quamdam et similitudinem"—of the Body and Blood of Christ. A remonstrance against this teaching was written to him [A.D. 1045] by an old friend and schoolfellow, Adelmann, then Archdeacon of Liège, and afterwards [A.D. 1048] Bishop of Brescia. This warning was repeated two years afterwards with affectionate earnestness, the second letter being still extant [Adelmann, De Veritate Corp. et Sang. Dom., Brunswick, 1770]. Berengarius having by this time got into public controversy with Hugo, bishop of Langres, on the subject, wrote a letter to Lanfranc (then Abbot of Bec, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury), stating his views and endeavouring to secure Lanfranc's support for them. The abbot being then at Rome, the letter of Berengarius did not reach him until its contents were known to others, and the consequence was that it was laid before a council which was sitting at the time [A.D. 1050] as containing heresy. The council convicted its author, without waiting to know whether he had any explanation or defence to offer, and the sentence was confirmed at Vercelli in the September following. At this latter council Berengarius wished to be present that he might make his defence, but being then in the Abbey of Tours he was prevented from attending by Henry I., King of France, who considered that he would run into danger by carrying out his wish [Mansi, Concil. xix. 757, 773].

Four years after this condemnation a Legatine council was held at Tours, when Hildebrand was present as the Papal representative [A.D. 1054]. At this council Berengarius declared his belief that "Panis atque vinum altaris post consecrationem sunt Christi Corpus et Sanguis," and Hildebrand being satisfied with this declaration, did not permit him to carry the explanation of his opinions into detail, but released him from the sentence of heresy which had been passed upon him.

Subsequently Berengarius was summoned to Rome, where he appeared in the year 1059. There was a popular clamour against him as a heretic, and a demand that he should suffer death as such. Either in fear of death, or for some other unknown reason, he was then persuaded by Cardinal Humbert to sign a form of recantation, in which he acknowledged Transubstantiation in its most extreme form. His words, as given by Lanfranc, declare, "Panem et vinum . . . Verum Corpus et Sanguinem Domini nostri Jesu Christi esse, et sensualiter non solum sacramento, sed in veritate, manibus sacerdotum tractari, frangi, et fidelium dentibus atteri" [Lanfr. Opp. p. 232].

On his return to France Berengarius took up his former line, notwithstanding this recantation, and engaged in a controversy with Lanfranc which lasted for many years, and during the course of which the former was occasionally in danger from the populace, who by this time had become blindly violent in defence of the doctrine of Transubstantiation. Hildebrand became Pope as Gregory VII. in the year 1073; but although he had protected Berengarius hitherto, he was not able to withstand the demand of the Cardinals that he should again be called to account. Once more, therefore, the mover of this controversy was summoned to Rome, and once more, in a council which was held in February 1079, he signed a recantation, in which the doctrine which he had so long opposed was stated in as extreme a form as before [Mansi, Concil. xx. 543].

Berengarius left Rome on this occasion with a Papal certificate of his orthodoxy, and all who should presume to call him a heretic were by this document anathematized [D'Achery, Spicileg. iii. 413]. But he was also commanded to abstain from all controversy on the subject of the Eucharist, or from teaching any one except as a means of reclaiming those whom he had led into error. He lived for several years longer, much mortified and humiliated by his recantation, and not really altering the opinions which he had so long held. His death took place A.D. 1088 in the island of St. Cosmas near Tours, where he had latterly lived in great retirement under the protection of the Bishop of Tours. Berengarius never formed a sect, but many afterwards perverted his opinions into a denial of the Real Presence, and these were named Berengarians. [Lanfranc, De Eucharist. Berengar. de Sacr. Cœna. Ehrard's Doctr. and Hist. of the Lord's Supper, Frankfurt, 1845.]

BERON. A Valentinian heretic mentioned by Hippolytus, and not otherwise known. Hippolytus writes respecting him that he and some others had forsaken the delusion of Valentinus only to fall into deeper errors. The special heresy of Beron appears to have been that against which the clause of the Athanasian Hymn, "One, not by conversion of the Godhead into flesh, but by taking of the manhood into God," was levelled. He held that at the Incarnation the Divine Nature of the Second Person in the Blessed Trinity became circumscribed or limited so as to be compatible with the Human Nature to which it was united, God the Son thus becoming self-emptyed, acquiring an ἰδίᾳ περιγραφή, and ceasing to be "Immensus Filius." A fragment of Hippolytus remains in which he controverts this error of Beron, and some others founded upon it, saying, "What the Divine Nature was before the Incarnation that it was afterwards: in Its Essence infinite, incomprehensible, impassible, incomparable, unchangeable, inconvertible, abiding in its own natural essence, and working according to its own nature" [Hippol. contra Beronem et Helicem, in Fabric. Bibl. Græc. i. 225. ARTEMONITES].

BERTRAM. [RATRAMNUS.]

BERYLLUS was bishop of Bostra in Arabia about A.D. 230. He was a man of learning and piety, but falling into heresy, a synod was held at Bostra to judge his case. Origen, who attended the synod, held private conferences with Beryllus, which were followed by a public disputation. The result was that Beryllus was convinced of his error and returned to the Catholic faith. This synod is frequently assigned to the year 247 or 249. From the order of events in Eusebius it appears to have been before the death of Gordian, A.D. 244, and is dated by Cave A.D. 243.

Beryllus asserted that our Lord, before His Incarnation, did not exist in the distinction of His own Person; and that He was Divine because there dwelt in Him not the proper Divinity of the Son, but the Divinity of the Father.¹ The first proposition needs no comment. The second has been somewhat variously interpreted. Mosheim [Eccl. Hist. cent. III. cap. v. sec. 14] says that the opinion, when considered with attention, amounts to this: that Christ did not exist before Mary, but that a Spirit issuing from God Himself, and therefore superior to all human souls, as being a portion of the Divine nature, was united to Him at the time of His birth. This appears to be an explaining away the "Paternal Divinity" which was asserted to have dwelt in Christ, and to suppose that Beryllus held, perhaps by anticipation, the later Sabellian doctrine. The words of Eusebius can be satisfied only by the earlier Sabellian or Patripassian doctrine; and accordingly Bishop Bull [Jud. Eccl. Cathol. iii. 4; Def. Fid. Nic. iv. 3, 17] classes Beryllus with Praxeas, Noëtus, and Sabellius.² Against this it may be said that Origen, in the passage quoted by all commentators [Frag. ex Comm. in Ep. ad Titum], has distinguished between the doctrine of Beryllus and of the Patripassians. The passage is as follows: "Sed et eos, qui hominem dicunt Dominum Jesum præcognitum et prædestinatum, qui ante adventum carnalem substantialiter et proprie non extiterit, sed quod homo natus Patris solam in se habuerit deitatem, ne illos quidem sine periculo est ecclesiæ numero sociari: sicut et illos, qui superstitione magis quam religiose, uti ne videantur duos deos dicere, neque rursum negare Salvatoris deitatem, unam eandemque subsistentiam Patris ac Filii asseverant, i. e. duo quidem nomina secundum diversitatem causarum recipientem, unam tamen ὑπόστασιν subsistere, i. e. unam personam duobus nominibus subjacentem, qui latine Patripassiani appellantur." The only difference between the two classes, the former of them being that to which Beryllus belonged, was that the Patripassians retained the names of Father and Son to be used as the varying action of the One and same Person required. Beryllus seemed to have disdained this affectation of retaining the names while all distinction of Person was denied.

Socrates [Hist. Eccl. iii. 7], in error, makes Beryllus to have been bishop of Philadelphia.

² Gennadius [cap. iii.] mentions Beryllus together with Artemon and Marcellus. Pseudo-Hieronymus [cap. 36] mentions the denial of the pre-existence of Christ as common to Beryllus and Photinus.

He says, in a somewhat marked manner, that the synod of Bostra, in its letter to Beryllus, asserted that Christ, when made flesh, assumed not only the flesh but also the soul of man. But we are not entitled to infer from this that Beryllus combined Patripassian and Apollinarian doctrine. The acts of the synod of Bostra, the disputation of Origen and Beryllus, and Beryllus' letters to Origen thanking him for saving him from heresy, are unhappily lost.

BESOCHI. [BIZOCHI.]

BEZPOPOFTSCHINS. That division of Russian dissenters which does not retain the office of "pope" or priest, except in such a form as that of the Presbyterian or Independent ministry. The Bezpopoftschins have been divided into fifteen or twenty sects, the principal of which are the DUCHOBORTZI, the PHILIPOFTSCHINS, and the POMERANE; but all the smaller and fanatical sects have sprung from them.

BEZSLOVESTNI. A name signifying "the dumb," given to a not very numerous Russian sect of the eighteenth century, whose members after conversion became perpetually speechless. Very little is known of their tenets. In order to extract some information, a governor general of Siberia, named Pestal, in the reign of Catharine II. [A.D. 1762-1796], employed the cruellest forms of torture, pouring hot sealing-wax on their flesh, and tickling the soles of their feet with feathers, but without avail.

BIANCHI. [ALBATI.]

BICHINI. [BIZOCHI.]

BICORNI. A term colloquially signifying "idiots" among the Italians, and used contemptuously as a name for the BEGHARDS by some mediæval writers.

BIZOCHI. A name for the FRATICELLI, found in the Bull of Pope John XXII. condemning that community [A.D. 1317]. By some it is derived from "Bizzoco," or in French "Besace," on account of the wallet which they carried to hold the provisions which they begged from door to door: by others from "bigio," which indicated the grey colour of their garments.

BLASTUS. A Quartodeciman of this name is mentioned by the author of the book against heresies which formerly went by the name of Tertullian: and on the ground of his teaching that the Christian passover should be kept on the day fixed by the Jewish Law, he is declared to have been desirous of introducing Judaism. [Pseudo-Tertull. xxii.] He is doubtless the same person as the Roman Blastus named by Eusebius as being nearly involved in the fall of Florinus, who became a Valentinian [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 15]. There is no evidence that Blastus ever actually became a Gnostic, but Eusebius records that an Epistle on Schism was written to him by Irenæus, as well as one on the Monarchy of God to Florinus [ibid. v. 20]. For the particulars of his association with the QUARTODECIMANS, the reader is referred to the article under that title. [Theod. Hæret. fab. i. 23.]

BOCASOTI. [BIZOCHI.]

BOGOMILES, (or as it is corruptly written) BOGARMITE, was the name assumed by a sect of heretics, who appeared in the twelfth century in the Bulgarian city of Philippopolis. They appear to have separated off from the Paulicians, the Manichaean heretics who were predominant in the Danubian provinces from the ninth to the thirteenth century.

The founder of the Bogomiles was an heretical monk named Basil, who directed his followers to use and glory in the dissonant name of Bogomile, an appellation compounded of two Slavonic roots, "Bog" signifying God, and "mil" His mercy. They were better known to the orthodox Greek world under the title of "Phundaïtes," or "wearers of the girdle," from the habit which poverty or the commands of Basil forced them to adopt. We also meet with them in contemporary literature under the name of Massilians; it is presumable, from some fancied resemblance in doctrine to the earlier Semi-Pelagian heretics of that name.

This sect was drawn from the dregs of the population, and made poverty and ignorance chief and necessary tenets. By this rule, all learned persons were excluded from their body, yet they took upon themselves the revision of the Scripture Canon. Their Bible consisted of seven books: the Psalms, the Prophets, each of the four Gospels, the Acts, with the Epistles and the Apocalypse. Like other Paulicians, they adopted an allegorical interpretation of Scripture, taught the innate evilness of matter, and its eternal hostility to spirit. Pursuing the same line of reasoning, they denied all mysterious efficacy to the sacraments, and rejected altogether the baptism of water. They supported their belief in a Docetic or fantastic Christ, by a reference to the distinctive quality of His baptism, as opposed to that administered by John. The creation of the world they conceived to be due to a wicked Demiurge, and attributed the murder of Abel to the jealousy of Cain, whose birth they referred to a union between Eve and Satanael (the eldest son of Jehovah), while they assigned to Adam the paternity of Abel.

These rude and ignorant heretics, who seem to have equally misconceived both Christianity and Manichæism, might have remained unmolested in their obscurity, but for the missionary zeal of Alexius Comnenus. That emperor, whose piety or policy induced him to undertake the conversion of the Paulicians, was made acquainted, during his mission work, with the existence of the unhappy Bogomiles. Dibelatius, one of their chiefs or apostles (for, like Mani himself, Basil emulated the organization of primitive Christianity) disclosed the name of their leader to the emperor. Impelled by a desire to effect the more complete extermination of the heresy, Alexius invited the leader of it, Basil, to a banquet, at which, in the guise of a disciple, he extracted from him a full confession of his guilt. At the close of the entertainment, Basil was seized by the officers of the emperor, and by his orders kept in close confinement until the return of the court to Constantinople. There the contumacious heresiarch was publicly burned: the scene of his execution being the open space before the gates of St. Sophia. By command of the emperor, as we are informed by his daughter Anna Comnena, a monk of the Eastern Church, Euthymius Zygarbenus by name, composed a full account and refutation of the Bogomilian errors, which is still to be read in his work, entitled the Δογματικὴ Πανοπλία. The total dispersion of the sect ensued upon the death of their founder.

In A.D. 1140, a Constantinopolitan council formally anathematized the heresy of the followers of Basil; but three years later, two bishops of Cappadocia, Clement and Leontinus, were condemned for holding these opinions. It may, however, be reasonably supposed, that these perverts, whose dioceses were situated in the original seat from which Paulician Manichæism (the parent of the Bogomilian heresy) had emigrated into Europe, were only primitive Paulicians, whose tenets, being discovered to resemble (though with material differences) those of their Bulgarian brothers, were fitted, in default of a more exact nomenclature, with the title of Bogomiles. The last mention of the heresy is the condemnation of a monk named Niphorian about the middle of the twelfth century.

[All that is known about this obscure and illiterate body has been collected in the work by Joh. Christ. Wolf, Historia Bogomilorum, Dissert. iii., Wittenberg, 1712.]

BOHEMIA, CONFESSION OF. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

BOHEMIAN BRETHREN. This name was given to a semi-religious, semi-political party which sprung up in Bohemia, early in the fifteenth century. They directed their efforts to preserve the religious independence of their country from the exorbitant claims of the Pope, and their constitutional freedom against the pretensions of the princes of the house of Austria.

The Bohemians were a branch of the Slavonic race. They were originally called Czechs, and occupied the country of the Teutonic Boii, in the middle of the sixth century, having subdued the original inhabitants. They were converted to Christianity by the labours of Methodius, a Greek priest of Thessalonica, towards the end of the ninth century. The Eastern Church, therefore, may justly claim them as her own sons, and for a long time they knew no other form of Christianity. But Latin tendencies gradually prevailed in spite of strong opposition. In 968 they were brought under the Papal supremacy, and in the following century Latin was made the language of their Liturgy in direct opposition to the Slavonic vernacular. Shortly afterwards the celibacy of the clergy was forced upon them, and the cup was withdrawn from the laity. But these changes, brought about by external power, excited a strong feeling of discontent, which received further increase in consequence of the close connection of the country with England, arising from the marriage between our own Richard II. and Anne, sister of King

Wenceslaus of Bohemia. Through this Wickliffe's writings were diffused in the latter country. These causes, coupled with the Papal schism that was then raging, gave rise to a party, of which the celebrated Huss was the chief ornament, Catholic so far as doctrine was concerned, yet national and therefore anti-papal in spirit. For a time, under the mild but somewhat weak rule of Wenceslaus, the public peace was maintained, notwithstanding the execution of Huss, which excited and alarmed the whole country, and gave strength to the extreme men, who now began to appear as the Taborites, or Hussites proper. But the death of the king kindled the flame of a religious war, of all such wars the most bloodily waged on both sides. The natural successor of Wenceslaus was his brother Sigismund, the emperor who had weakly given up Huss to death at Constance, and although the crown was elective, he at once took measures to assert what he considered his just rights. For a time the nation was united against him as one man, and the war which followed, first under the leadership of John Ziska, and afterwards under that of Procopius, was one of the most remarkable, as a national uprising against a powerful foreign foe, that history has recorded. [HUSSITES.]

But what the whole power of the Empire and of the Papacy combined could not effect was soon brought about by internal dissension. There were two chief parties among the Bohemians. The larger, which comprised almost all the clergy and the greater part of the nobles, was Catholic, but anti-papal. Not a single heresy could be laid to their charge. They were of the old national party, and had never willingly submitted to the claims of the Pope, which they now openly abjured as antichristian. They also claimed the restoration of the cup to the laity, and the subjection of the spirituality to the temporal power in all things temporal. They were usually styled Calixtines or Utraquists, and had but little in common with the Taborite followers of Ziska, who had departed as much from the principles of Huss as the modern Wesleyans have from those of Wesley.

When Sigismund found that he could not subdue the Bohemians by force of arms, he made use of this distinction to divide his opponents, and subdue them in detail. He invited them to send deputies to the Council of Basle, where they might state their grievances, and if possible effect an accommodation. This proposal was scornfully rejected by the Taborites, and eagerly accepted by the Catholic or Calixtine party. These latter made the following four demands of the Council: [1] That the Communion should be in both kinds; [2] that the secular power should have dominion over the persons of criminal clerks; [3] that there should be perfect liberty of preaching to all ecclesiastics; [4] that the clergy should not be allowed to hold civil offices. After fierce discussion the first of these was granted, and for a time a hollow truce existed between the national Bohemian party and Rome. Sigismund had gained his object, and shortly afterwards the more extreme Taborites were utterly crushed as a political party, Sigismund was acknowledged as king, peace was restored to the country, and the Bohemians were allowed to continue members of a national, Catholic, and yet anti-papal Church. This was in 1435.

But the Papal court could not rest permanently content with anything short of absolute submission, and this well-known fact, coupled with small annoyances and petty persecutions, kept alive the suspicions and jealousies of the Bohemians, so that in 1450 they sent an embassy to the Patriarch of Constantinople, desiring to be readmitted into communion, on the ground that they had originally derived their Christianity from the East. But though the embassy was well received, the advance of the Turks and other changes prevented anything from coming out of it. Political troubles followed in Bohemia, which led to the loss of the ancient constitutional rights of the people against their sovereigns. The differences between the Romanizing and the national parties became the more marked, so that as the former were favoured by the rulers, the latter found some difficulty in preserving the succession. At one time, in 1482, an Italian wandering bishop, Augustine Lucian, appeared most opportunely for them, when the archbishopric of Prague was purposely kept vacant by the authorities who favoured Rome. Shortly after they sought for and received ordination from the Armenians. The consequence was that the country was kept in a state of religious ferment by the contests between the two parties, until King Ladislaus, in a Diet held at Kuttenberg in 1485, caused a religious truce for thirty-three years to be concluded. Each party agreed to refrain from annoying the other; freedom of preaching was allowed, and the compacts of Basle were reaffirmed against the Papal opposition.

The following century saw a great change in the Bohemians. The Lutherans of Germany crowded into their country, and joined the national party of the Bohemians, obtaining shelter and toleration under their name, and infecting the Bohemian Church with their peculiarities. So matters continued until 1556, when the Jesuits were introduced. The public education was placed in their hands, and they were commissioned to use all efforts of influence and persuasion to bring the people back into unity with the See of Rome, but at the same time, to quiet apprehension, the privileges of the national party were confirmed. In 1609, Rudolph, after various efforts to enforce uniformity, was compelled to grant the Bohemian charter, allowing complete toleration to the three parties, the Romans, the Bohemians, and the Protestants (Lutherans and Calvinists), and exhorting them all to live in peace with each other. To each of them was allowed full liberty to build churches, to found schools, and to hold their own ecclesiastical courts. But the peace did not continue for long. Lutheranism began to infect the national party more and more, owing to the influx from Germany, while on the other hand Rudolph's successor, Ferdinand, in his own hereditary dominions of Styria (the crown of Bohemia was elective), had distinguished himself by a zealous persecution of the Protestants. Suspicion united the old Bohemians and the later foreign bodies against him, and a civil war followed, stained by the usual atrocities on both sides. It proved the commencement of the Thirty Years' War. The insurgents elected Frederick Count Palatine to be their king, but he was a rigid Calvinist, and commenced his reign with the destruction of altars, crucifixes, and monumental tombs in Prague, whereby he alienated the old Bohemian party, which had never (at least as a body) abandoned either Catholic ritual or Catholic doctrine. Moreover, he was not fitted by firmness of character to be the leader in any great movement, and his first defeat on the White Mountains near Prague, in November 1620, destroying his hopes, he fled from the kingdom; taking with him the crown jewels, but leaving his unfortunate Bohemian followers a prey to the vengeance of the merciless Ferdinand.

This was the last effort of the Bohemians to maintain their religious liberties by force of arms. Henceforth they submitted to the power of the house of Austria, to which they have ever since been attached. The Jesuits whom Frederick had banished were restored; Roman Catholicism was made the established religion of the country, and every effort was made to bring back the natives to the communion of Rome. To the legitimate means of conversion used by the Jesuits were added others of a more questionable character. The government put forth all its strength to crush those who were regarded as political opponents. Persecutions, the quartering of soldiers upon the disaffected, and the uprooting of families, did their work. Moreover, Protestantism pure and simple had never found great favour in the eyes of the people, and with the political decay of the national party, the peculiar religious fire of the nation was quenched. An immense majority of the people is now Roman Catholic. There are a few Lutherans and Calvinists among them, chiefly of German extraction; a remnant also of the Hussites still lingers on under the name of Bohemian Brethren [HUSSITES], but the national, Catholic, and anti-papal party has long been extinct. BOLINGBROKE. A sceptical nobleman of the last century [A.D. 1672-1751] who promoted among the higher classes that flippant infidelity for which they were so conspicuous during the reigns of Queen Anne and the first two Hanoverian Kings, and which he himself had learned in Paris. Bolingbroke may be said to have originated in England that supercilious and superficial style of infidelity which looks upon religion as an useful institution for women, children, and the lower classes, and which is worth the support of a government as a means of preserving order and the rights of property. BONI HOMINES. [PERFECTI.]

BONI PUERI. [BEGHARDS.]

BONI VALETI. [BEGHARDS.]

BONOSIANS [BONOSIANI or BONOSIACI]. A sect formed in Macedonia at the end of the fourth century by Bonosus, Bishop of Sardica. Bonosus held that Jesus Christ is the Son of God by adoption only [Pseud.-Hier. xlii.; Isid. Hisp. liii.]. This identifies his doctrine with that of Photinus; an identification made by the second Council of Arles, can. xvi. and xvii. Gennadius also states, that Audentius, a Spanish bishop, wrote against the Photinians, "who are now called Bonosiaci" [de Vir. Ill. cap. 14; quoted by Lardner, Cred. cap. lxxxix. q. v.]. How soon Bonosus and his followers reached this stage of complete Photinianism is not known. There appears to have been an intermediate stage, during which the party was gradually drifting into the open denial of the pre-existence of Christ. For in no other way can we reconcile the high authorities of the Council of Arles and Gregory the Great, which are seemingly in direct contradiction. The council [II. Arel. can. xvii.] says it is manifest that the Bonosians baptize in the name of the Trinity, and orders, therefore, converts from them to be received with chrism and imposition of hands. Gregory says as unhesitatingly that they do not baptize in that name [Decret. Collect. pars. iii. dist. iv. can. Hi vero hæretici]. It is easy to conclude (and it agrees with the natural course of heresy) that the council refers to the early practice of the sect, and Gregory to the later practice. In the year 389 or 390, Bonosus was condemned by Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, and Anysius, Bishop of Thessalonica, and others, as delegates of the Synod of Capua, for teaching that the Blessed Virgin, after our Lord's birth, bore children to Joseph. The two bishops wrote to Ambrose inquiring his opinion. Ambrose replied that the case was referred to them by the synod, and that it was not his place to give a judicial opinion,—"Vicem enim Synodi recepistis," "Vos enim totius Synodi vice decernitis, nos quasi ex Synodi auctoritate judicare non convenit." But privately he approves their sentence. He names no other charge against Bonosus than that relating to the Blessed Virgin [Ambrose. Epist. i. v. ed. 1616]. It seems then that after his condemnation on this point Bonosus fell by degrees into Photinianism. [ANTIDICOMARIANITES.] The sentence was of suspension from his episcopal functions, but Bonosus continued to ordain those who applied to him.

The Decretal Epistles of Innocent I. make mention of Bonosus more than once. The larger number of the epistles are no doubt forgeries; it is doubtful whether any are genuine. Still they were early forgeries, for Dionysius Exiguus accepted them, and they may be taken as evidence of facts where the object of the forger did not call for misrepresentation. In the present case his object would be not to misrepresent the facts, but to ascribe the conduct held towards Bonosus to the principle of obedience to the See of Rome. The letter to Laurentius, Bishop of Senia in Dalmatia, directs that the Defensors of the Church drive away the Bonosians, who deny Christ to have been born of the Substance of the Father before the world. That to Martianus, bishop of Naissus in Dacia, directs that they who were ordained by Bonosus before his condemnation be continued in the clergy. That to the bishops and deacons of Macedonia warns that the reception of some ordained by Bonosus which has been already allowed is not to be made a precedent, and states that many who despaired of obtaining orders in the Church procured ordination from Bonosus with the view of returning to the Church, and the hope of being received as of the clergy. [Johnson, Vade Mecum, ii. 301.] How long the sect existed is not known.

BONS HOMMES. [PERFECTI.]

BORBELITES. [BARBELIOTES.]

BORBORIANS. [BARBELIOTES.]

BORRELISTS. A sect of the Mennonites or Dutch Baptists which originated with Adam Borrel, a man of good station and learning, in the latter half of the seventeenth century. Their distinction from the Mennonite body at large was that they professed an austere life and rejected all external ordinances of Divine worship, being thus analogous to the English Quakers. [Stoupp, Traité de la Religion des Hollandais.]

BOUGRES. [BULGARIANS.]

BOURIGNONISTS. A sect of French Quietists of the seventeenth century, followers of Antoinette Bourignon de la Porte, a lady of Flanders, who was born at Lisle in the year 1616, and died at Franeker in Friesland in the year 1680. Madame Bourignon imagined that she had received a direct inspiration from God to restore the Christian religion, which she alleged to have been lost in the midst of the controversies which it had raised. Setting her face against all churches and sects, she devoted herself to the task of forming a new community of which she should be the living instructress; her qualification for that office being based on a claim that the true spiritual meaning of Holy Scripture had been specially revealed to her. Full of enthusiasm, she also possessed great conversational powers, and these qualities gained her many converts even among persons of high education. She was also a most industrious author, her collected writings filling nineteen volumes; but these, and probably her conversation also, were largely borrowed from the mystical theology of an earlier date. The leading point of her system was that common to the Pietistic mystics, that religion consists in emotion and conscious feeling, not in knowledge and practice.

The most distinguished of the Bourignonists were a Jansenist priest of the Oratory of Mechlin, named Bartholomew de Cordt, and Peter Poiret, a Calvinistic minister of considerable learning. The latter was an energetic coadjutor of Madame Bourignon, and after her death became the leader of her sect, his exposition of its principles being printed in 1713, in six volumes, entitled The Divine Economy, or an universal system of the works and purposes of God, written originally in French.

The Bourignonists spread from Holland to Germany, France, Switzerland and England, and at the end of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth century held a position not unlike to that of the Swedenborgians in later times. Some still kept up their connection with the churches or sects to which they had previously belonged; others separated themselves from all Christian societies and followed a life of private contemplation, studying the works of the Quietists and Pietists in general, but looking to those of their founder as the great source of spiritual knowledge.

BOURNEANS. This name has been given to the disciples of a Birmingham preacher named Bourne, who maintained the most extreme form of the doctrine of annihilation, which places the final punishment of impenitent sinners not in suffering but in the total extinction of their existence.

BRACHITÆ. A sect of the Manichæans, which Prateolus assigns to the end of the third century, but of which nothing is known. [Prateol. Hæres. xxxiii.]

BRAHMINS. The religion of Brahminism is professed by about 150,000,000 people in the peninsula of India. It derives its name from the title of the chief caste of its votaries, from which alone the priests are taken; but it is also known as Hindooism, or the Hindoo religion. Brahminism is the oldest of the religions that have sprung from the Aryan family of mankind. The religion of Zoroaster, or Magianism, is an offshoot from it. Buddhism was a schism and an antagonism. It is derived from and professes to be based on sacred writings in the Sanscrit language, the oldest of which are of extreme antiquity. In its present form it differs widely from the primitive religion, owing to successive corruptions, arising partly from the development of religious thought, partly, as it appears, from unknown foreign accretions, partly from impositions devised for the purpose of maintaining and extending the power of the Brahmins or priestly caste.

I. The primitive form of the Hindoo religion is known to us only from the sacred books, or Vedas, written in the Sanscrit language. These are four in number—the Rig-Veda, the Yagur-Veda, the Sama-Veda, and the Atharva-Veda. Collectively, they are known as the Veda, from the same root as vidā, meaning originally knowledge. Of these the Rig-Veda, or Veda of Praise, is by far the most ancient and important, and alone deserves the name of Veda, being the basis of the other three, which are liturgical books for the use of the different orders of priests and ministers who take part in the sacrifices. Each Veda consists of two portions, the Sanhita or Mantras, which are hymns to the gods, and the Brahmanas and Sutas, commentaries in prose. There is a further class of works called Aranakas and Upanishads, which may be regarded as an appendix to the Brahmanas. These commentaries are all of much later date than the hymns, the Brahmanas with their appendix preceding the Sutas, as is evident from their style and contents. The Rig-Veda Sanhita—which is alone the true record of the primitive faith—consists of ten books, containing 1028 (or excluding 11 generally held to be spurious 1017) hymns by many different authors, addressed to various deities. The latest of these hymns date from at least B.C. 1200; the earliest are placed by some authorities as high as B.C. 2000, by others at about B.C. 1500. Though all our MSS. are modern, yet the evidence, internal and external, for an extremely early date is incontrovertible. [For a brief summary see Max-Müller's Chips from a German Workshop, i. 10-17; also the same writer's History of Ancient Sanscrit Literature.] The Veda is held to be absolutely the work of the Deity, no mortal having composed a single line of it, and to have been revealed to mankind through the agency of "Rishis"—persons raised above the level of ordinary humanity, who were therefore preserved from error in the reception and tradition of truth. The Rishis, who were in fact the authors, are said by the Brahmins to have "seen" the respective portions they transmitted. There is nothing, however, in the Veda itself to countenance this theory, which is found in some other religions [MAHOMETANISM], and may be regarded simply as an expression of dependence on the Divine Being.

The religion of the Rig-Veda is apparently a gross polytheism—derived from the deification so natural to the childhood of the human race—of the powers and aspects of nature. Some of the deities mentioned are plainly of this character. Agni, the fire; Surya, the sun; the Maruts, storms. * Others appear as proper names, having so far lost the natural aspect which was once theirs. Varuna [Οὐρανός], the heavens; Mitra, the sun-light; Indra, the firmament. The most prominent deities are Indra and Agni, to whom nearly half the hymns are addressed. There is no recognition of the Hindoo Triad of later times—Brahma, Vishnu, Siva,—and no mention at all is made of other deities which are now most popular. But this polytheism is of a very peculiar character. There is an entire absence of any consciousness of that limitation of the powers of the respective gods which seems the necessary consequence of a plurality of deities. By the worshipper for the time being each god is looked on as absolute and supreme; while the others, for the moment, pass out of sight. To almost all in different hymns are these attributes assigned; no one god being ever regarded as superior or inferior to any other. In a few passages the different gods are regarded as but different names and powers of one supreme deity. While the hymns contain much that is literally childish—the product of the infancy of religion,—mean, tedious, commonplace, there is little that is positively bad. Degrading passions and acts are ascribed to the gods; the conception of them is in many respects low and unworthy. A low level is also assigned on the whole to human nature; the wants expressed are mostly of an earthly, material nature. But there is also much that is true and sublime. The gods are generally spoken of as immortal, and of expressions that seem to imply the contrary, as in speaking of the birth of certain gods, it may be seen that a physical phenomenon is the foundation,—the rising of the sun, the beginning of the day or year. The gods, as a rule, dwell in heaven, but some of them at times are present with men, draw near to the sacrifices, and listen to the praises of their worshippers. It is often said that the heavens and earth were created by certain gods, but occasionally ignorance is confessed of the beginning of the universe. A consciousness, somewhat vague indeed, of sin and moral evil is expressed, and there are frequent prayers for forgiveness. The gods are represented as rewarding good and punishing evil, and yet as forgiving, as just yet merciful. But their anger is chiefly represented as excited by some failure of service or offering to themselves, rather than by moral evil. There is no sign of a belief in metempsychosis, but in its place a belief in actual personal immortality, with, seemingly, rewards and punishments for the good and evil. There is no mention of either idols or temples; but there is in the later hymns a manifest tendency to the worship of symbols, even of the objects of sacrifice, as the horse, the symbol of and offering to the sun, the soma plant, of the moon, and the post to which the sacrificial victim was tied. There is no trace of the existence of caste, nor of suttee or widow-burning, which was a later introduction supported by corrupting a text of the Rig-Veda. The worship was offered only in each man's house, in a chamber set apart for the purpose. It was of a very simple character, consisting of prayers, chiefly for material benefits, riches, prosperity, good crops, success over enemies and in the chase, and great spoils, and the like; of praises, and of offerings. In the earlier hymns these consist only of clarified butter poured on the fire, of cakes, parched grain, and other simple viands, and of the intoxicating juice of the soma plant. In the later period we read of animal sacrifices, especially of the horse. [See for further details, Max-Müller, History of Ancient Sanscrit Literature, and Chips from a German Workshop, vol. i.; Mrs. Manning, Ancient and Mediæval India; Elphinstone, Hist. of India, 5th ed., edited by E. B. Cowell, bk. i. chap. iv. and app. i. and vii.; J. T. Wheeler, Hist. of India, vol. i. pt. i.; H. H. Wilson, Essays and Lectures; Colebrooke, Miscellaneous Essays.]

II. The transitional form of Brahminism from this simple elemental religion to the later system is especially seen in the works called Brahmanas and Upanishads. The former are a development on the ceremonial side. They contain legends and allegories which have their germ in the Veda, derived in many cases from divine epithets personified, sometimes from absolute misunderstanding of expressions. On these legends is based a most complex and artificial ceremonial. The Upanishads, on the other hand, contain a development from the philosophical and theological side, explaining the nature of the Supreme Being, his relation to the human soul, the process of creation, &c. The Upanishads are the basis of the enlightened and philosophical faith, and of the different systems of Hindoo philosophy, and are the only portions of the sacred literature that are much read and studied at the present day. This transition period is often called the epic period, its chief illustration being derived from the great Sanscrit epics,—the Maha Bharata and the Ramayana. The ritual and ceremonial is systematized in the so-called Institutes of Manu, still the great text-book of Brahminism, and held to be of supreme authority, though not a revelation in the same sense as the Veda. This work contains materials of various dates, but was compiled at latest three or four centuries B.C. While professing to be based on the Veda, it contains elements entirely alien to that religion, which have been plausibly supposed to come from a foreign source [see Wheeler, History of India, vol. ii.].

The religion taught in the Institutes of Manu is mainly the worship of Brahma, an emanation from and the creative energy of Brahma, the supreme spirit of the universe. Other inferior deities are mentioned, mostly identical with those of the Veda. The germs of the doctrine of the Triad are found, and their development may be seen in the epic poems. But the main point is the ritual and ceremonial, which are of the most complicated, precise, and burdensome character, embracing almost every act and moment of life. The caste system is found in all its rigour. The danger of offending the gods by imperfect service is set forth very vividly, and hence the necessity of constantly consulting the Brahmins, who were alone held to be acquainted with the details. The doctrine of metempsychosis is also set forth in its most developed form.

III. Modern Brahminism. Against this system of priestly domination Buddhism was an uprising, and for a time it obtained the supremacy. But a reaction came in favour of Brahminism, which succeeded in expelling Buddhism from India altogether, and entered upon a fresh development, especially in regard to the objects of worship. This forms the third and last period of Brahminism. The sources of this development are the works called Puranas and, in a less degree, the Tantras. The Puranas are eighteen in number, of various dates, from the eighth to the sixteenth century A.D., but incorporating older materials. They all begin with a cosmogony, and contain also theogonies, philosophical speculations, instructions in ritual, fragments of history, and countless legends. Their religion may be described as sectarian in character, supporting the doctrines of various sects, and so they do not form a consistent whole, though they are all accepted as incontrovertible authority. Hence arise various inconsistencies, anomalies, and contradictions.

The existence of a supreme being is indeed still set forth, from whom all other beings—the deities, men, the world—derive their existence; from whose substance they are, and whom, in fact, they in some sense constitute. But this monotheism or pantheism is practically obscured by the direction of devotion to a multitude of deities, said to be 330,000,000 in number. This number, however, includes spirits and demons of various kinds. The gods universally acknowledged are seventeen in number, the great Triad (Trimurti) Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, the creating, preserving, and destroying principles, with the corresponding female divinities, being the most important. The other deities are mostly powers of nature, including many of those mentioned in the Veda,—Indra, Varuna, Agni, &c. Besides these, veneration is paid to the planets, to many sacred rivers, to a host of local gods. Of the three great gods, Brahma, though once supreme, is but little worshipped now, having only one temple in all India. Vishnu and Siva have attracted almost all the veneration. Vishnu is mainly worshipped under the form of avatars, or incarnations—manifestations on earth in various forms, animal and human—ten in number, of which one is yet to come. The most revered of these are Krishna and Rama. Siva, the principle of destruction, is also looked on as the principle of renewal, and hence is worshipped under the form of the lingam, identical with the ancient phallus [see Herod. ii. 48, 49]. In his honour frequent and bloody sacrifices are offered, and his votaries inflict horrible and protracted tortures on themselves. His consort Devi is also much worshipped, especially with great sacrifices. It is said that 100 goats per month, besides other animals, are offered at her temple near Calcutta. Most of the other deities have no separate temples, but have their especial images, votaries, and festivals. Each god is regarded as having a separate heaven, to which its most assiduous worshippers are borne after death, where they are attended by good spirits; and also a separate hell for the wicked. Besides the deities whose worship is spread more or less over the country, each village has its own local gods, which are sometimes the spirits of men who have in any way distinguished themselves while living, sometimes incarnations or avatars of the more famous gods. There is a universal belief in the existence of good and evil spirits pervading the universe, with power to bless or to harm. The legends respecting the gods are of the most extravagant character. The three gods of the Triad are supposed to be equal in power, and yet quarrel and fight, and wound each other. There is no regular system of subordination of the gods, either to these three or to one another. The images have in most cases a monstrous character, with many heads, arms, or bodies. In the legends extraordinary power is ascribed to asceticism; even the deities are sometimes represented as subdued by it, and this although the ascetic may be a wicked man. The popular religion extols the efficacy of faith, i.e. reliance and entire dependence on and submission to some one deity. While morality and purity of life are inculcated, it is taught that neither they nor any religious forms avail without this faith, which also compensates for all deficiencies in them.

The religious sects which devote themselves exclusively to the cultus of one deity are exceedingly numerous. They may be divided into three chief classes—Vaishnavas, worshippers of Vishnu;

Saivas, of Siva; Saktas, of one of the female associates of the gods of the Triad. Each of these classes contains numerous subordinate sects. There are also small sects worshipping some one of the inferior gods. The members of the different sects are distinguished by painted marks on their foreheads. Many of them have monastic orders attached to them, both for males and females, in which distinctions of caste are comparatively disregarded. The sects also have appointed heads, who have very great influence and power; and there are mystic ceremonies of admission, differing in each case.

Such is the form which Brahminism assumes at this day among the masses. But such vulgar polytheism could not commend itself to the keen intellect and philosophizing spirit of the educated Hindoos. With them religion is based upon philosophy, a monotheism derived from pantheism. The learned Brahmins earnestly disclaim polytheism—such as that, for instance, of the ancient Greeks or Romans. They teach that there is but one God, manifesting himself primarily in his several functions as creator, preserver, and destroyer, under the several forms of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; they profess also that they look on images simply as aids to the mind in meditation on and prayer to the one supreme deity. The system of religious philosophy that is regarded as most orthodox teaches that the only truly existing being is the deity; all other forms are, as to their material properties, mere illusions as to their spiritual attributes; transient sparks, scintillations, emanations of his glory. The deity, existing in unapproachable, solitary supremacy, longed for offspring; from this desire has sprung every existing thing, by a series of emanations—first Brahmā the creator, and from him gods, men, demons, beasts, the earth. All these comprising the whole universe, in so far as they have true existence, are consubstantial with the deity, who is the basis underlying all the forms which they assume. In fact, the deity is the world undeveloped; the world is the deity in his development. The supreme deity, also called Brahma, is yet a pure abstraction, self-centred, and absorbed in self-contemplation, the end and cause of all things. Beings and matter owe their existence simply to the impulse of his will. The various forms that matter assumes are all pure illusions, possessing but a semblance of reality. This semblance of reality is due to Máyá, which, originally a personification of the longing for offspring felt by the deity, became a synonym for delusion and unreality. The world and all that is in it passes through three stages, growth, perfection, and decay: this latter was deified as Siva, who is opposed to Brahmā, the creative power of the supreme Brahma; while Vishnu is the power that, by preserving all things, limits the dominion of Siva. A remarkable feature of Brahminism is that of “cycles of existence,” a feature which is almost peculiar to it. It is held that at the end of a cycle of prodigious length, the universe ceases to exist, the Triad and all the inferior gods pass out of being, and the

First Cause alone exists in his primeval singleness. But, after a long course of ages, he again puts forth his power, through which the whole creation, divine and human, comes into existence again. This process is being continually repeated. The soul of man is regarded as part of the divine spirit, taken out of his substance and of his nature, but, whereas he is unlimited, the soul is limited. This limitation was one result of the wish of the supreme for offspring. Souls were originally possessed of freedom and happiness; but through envy and ambition they fell, and thereby separated themselves still further from the divine essence. Then this world came into being as a place of trial, and souls were attached to bodies. Souls may animate all species of organic life, from the highest to the lowest, and rise by a succession of births through different bodies up to the human. Then their trial begins, which is to determine their future existence. Almost all acts are regarded as either merits or demerits, and the individual soul is rewarded or punished according to the balance of them. The rewards consist either of a superior lot in future existences, or of a removal to one of the heavens of bliss belonging to one or other of the deities, where the soul remains till it has been sufficiently rewarded. The punishments consist either of misery or degradation in future existences, or of suffering in one of the hells of the deities, till the balance of evil is expiated. In each case, after ages of enjoyment or misery, the stages of existence begin anew. Even the worst of men, after a purification by intense sufferings, may rise through the scale of being again and attain to bliss. The supreme point of bliss is to escape from the evil of a limited and separate existence by being absorbed or incorporated into the essence of the deity, or supreme soul from which the soul sprung, and of which it is a part. This is to be obtained either by works, by faith, or by knowledge. Works consist of devotion to the deities, sacrifices and offerings, prayers and praises, and a careful performance of the prescribed ceremonial of life and action. Knowledge is attained through one of the various systems of philosophy. The ceremonial is that prescribed in the laws of Mann, being most precise and exact. Five “sacraments” are prescribed for the daily use of the “twice-born man”—the superior castes: [1] The reading of the Vedas; [2] the offering of cakes to departed ancestors; [3] the pouring of clarified butter on the fire as a sacrifice to the fire, or to the powers of nature generally; [4] the offering of rice to the spirits; [5] the exercise of hospitality. All these, especially the first, are surrounded by many complicated ceremonies. There are also other observances, such as the three suppressions of the breath in honour of Brahma, the use of the mystic word “aum,” and of the Gayatri, a text of the Veda used as a prayer. Besides these distinctly religious acts, the law prescribes how to eat, drink, clothe one's self, bathe, cut hair and nails, and even how to relieve nature, and assigns special rights and duties to each caste, and each subdivision of a caste. But in practice these injunctions are very generally disregarded; and either by abbreviation, or by the doctrine of faith mentioned above: for instance, the devotions of the Brahmins, which, if performed fully, would take four hours, are contracted into half an hour, while the men of the lower castes simply repeat the name of their patron god as they bathe. The pursuit of philosophy again is regarded as of equal excellence with the life of religion, and as equally capable of leading to unity with the supreme spirit. There are six different systems of philosophy, all more or less pantheistic, identifying the deity and the universe, the universal supreme spirit and the individual soul; and all with the same end, to escape further existence in the world of sin and evil through absorption into the deity. But the systems differ in the means prescribed, in some simply knowledge, in others meditation, accompanied and purified by asceticism. For the most part the gods of the Hindoo pantheon are ignored, especially in the Sankhya system of Kapila, supposed by some to be the source of Buddhism.

It remains to sketch briefly the system of caste, through which Brahminism has obtained such power. The original division was simply into four—the Brahmins or priests, the Kshatryas or warriors (including kings), the Vaisyas or merchants, tradesman, &c., and the Sudras. The three former are called twice-born, and were regarded as being on a very different level from the fourth. There is no trace of such a division in the Rig-Veda, but indications are found of a class below the people for whom the Veda was given. These afterwards became the Sudras, and were probably the earlier population whom the Aryan race conquered. In the Brahmanas the beginnings of the system are seen; while in the Institutes of Manu it exists in full force. The means by which the distinction was established seem to have been nearly as follows. The Kshatryas, who originally offered the sacrifices and performed the religious ceremonies for themselves, devolved these duties upon the Brahmins, who, by making them more difficult by additions and the like, gradually monopolized them, and began to attempt a general control of life and habits. Then came a struggle for supremacy between the Brahmins and Kshatryas, in which the latter were vanquished, and, according to legend, ultimately destroyed. The Rajpoots, however, and some others, contend that the Kshatryas still exist with them. From the struggle arose the distinction between the Brahmins, the Kshatryas, and the great bulk of the people—the trading, working, and mercantile class. The Institutes of Manu contain an attempt to map out the adult life of every man of the three twice-born castes to his burial, into four distinct phases; so as to bring every part of life under the intimate control of religion—that is to say, of the Brahmin caste, the authorized expounders and teachers of it. The first period is that of the student of the sacred books. During this time, which was begun at various ages—earlier for the Brahmins than for the other castes—the student, under the guidance of some distinguished Brahmin, to whom he was bound to pay almost servile devotion, learned all the religious observances, and the means of subduing and quenching all desires for material things. The second period was that of the married man and householder, performing his various duties to the gods, the state and his fellows. The third period was that of the hermit, during which the twice-born man learned to mortify his passions and desires altogether, and by means of ascetic practices to obtain the power of abstracting his thoughts from all material things, and fixing them only on the deity. The fourth period, that of the devotee, followed when this latter power was obtained, by the entire subjugation and eradication of the passions, and was spent simply in contemplation. This system is still followed among the Brahmins, who declare that both the other castes of the twice-born have died out, themselves alone remaining. Below the Brahmins now exist a great number of subdivisions, embracing different trades and occupations. These have apparently arisen from trade guilds, which, established to preserve the respectability and privileges of their respective trades, have gradually been transmuted into hereditary societies. The attribution of a sacred character to the castes is a mere imposition of the Brahmins to support their power; and the exclusiveness of the system—through contact with the English—seems to be dying out.

The weakness of Brahminism consists: [1] In the horrible theory of transmigration, which leads men to embrace other religions to be free from it; [2] in the exclusiveness of the caste system, and the isolation it produces among individuals who are thus led to apostatize; [3] in the contending claims of religion and philosophy, of faith, works, and knowledge, from which arises a low standard of morality, and of religious obligations. BRAHMOO SOMAJ, or BRAHMO SAMAJ. A Hindoo sect of Monotheists originated in recent times by the contact of Brahminism with anti-sacerdotal forms of Christianity. The name is derived from the Sanscrit words Brahmā, the Creator, or Supreme Cause of the Universe, and Samāja, an assembly; and thus signifies "the Church of the One God."

The religion of India appears at the present day to be in a state of transition; and those who know the country expect the occurrence of some important change. Three such changes have been considered possible: [1] either the restoration of a decaying Brahminism, with its 330,000,000 gods, and superstitions of such an extravagant character as those of the Yogi devotees, and the orgies of such sects as the Maharajahs; or [2] the conversion of the whole population to Christianity; or [3] the rise of an indigenous and more enlightened faith on the ruins of the dead Hindooism. Such a faith is believed by its supporters to be provided by the Brahmoo Somaj, which is therefore sometimes called "the Reformed National Church of India."

Its founder was Ramohun Roy (Rama Mohuna Raya), who was born of Brahmin parents in the district of Bordouan [c. A.D. 1774]. His object was not to found a new religion, but to revive the pure monotheism of the primitive Hindoo faith, as prescribed in the Vedas, and as opposed to the idolatrous teaching of the later Hindoo books; an object which eventually caused a schism in the Brahmoo Somaj, and was abandoned by the more advanced school, who discovered that the Vedas, on which they professed to base their faith, taught, amid much that was true, such doctrines as nature-worship, transmigration of souls, with many grotesque rites and ceremonies. Ramohun Roy received a good education, acquiring while still young a knowledge of Arabic, Persian, and Sanscrit, to which he afterwards added Hebrew, Greek, and English. He shewed early signs of dislike for the gross forms of religion by which he was surrounded, and during a visit to Thibet in his fifteenth year excited the animosity of its inhabitants by ridiculing the worship of the Llama. The early death of his father [A.D. 1804] and of his two brothers left him in the possession of a large property, and free to express those sentiments which regard for paternal authority prevented his previously publishing to the world. His first book was written in Persian with an Arabic preface, and was entitled Against the Idolatry of all Religions. The public hostility which it provoked, and the numerous enemies arising in his own caste and kinsfolk, led him to move to Calcutta [A.D. 1814], where, four years later, he first gathered a few intelligent Hindoos around him in regular monotheistic worship [A.D. 1818]; from which time may be dated the commencement of the Brahmoo Somaj as an organized community. His next important works were An Essay on the Vedas, with a collection of extracts of pure, simple, and moral passages, and an abridged translation of the Vedant;¹ and The Precepts of Jesus, a Guide to peace and happiness, in Sanscrit and Bengalee [A.D. 1820]. The latter work shewed a careful acquaintance with Christianity, and involved him for many years in controversy with members of various Christian bodies, as well as with his Hindoo antagonists. In A.D. 1831 he came to England, with the title of Rajah, to negotiate an increase of the East India Company's allowance to the King of Delhi. After landing at Liverpool he proceeded to London, where he was courteously received, being assigned a place among the ambassadors at the coronation of William IV., and finding a welcome among several dissenting bodies, more especially the Unitarians. About this time he successfully opposed an appeal made by the Hindoos to the King in Council against an enactment of the East India Council abolishing the suttee. In September [A.D. 1833] he went to Stapleton Lodge near Bristol, at which house he died rather suddenly of fever.

The small community which Ramohun Roy had established at Calcutta continued to exist for about a quarter of a century after his death, without much life or propagandist energy, supported by his bequests, and those of Dwarkanauth Tagore, which enabled them to retain a place of worship called the Brahmoo Somaj of Jorsauko, and to chronicle their proceedings in a monthly magazine entitled the Tattwabodhini Putrika. The next aggressive step was the opening of a Sunday school at Calcutta [A.D. 1859] under Debendro Nath Tagore, at that time president of the Brahmoo Somaj, for the purpose of giving young men a regular course of instruction in Brahmic theology and ethics. In the next year [A.D. 1860] they made a convert of Keshub (Kesava) Chunder Sen, grandson of Ram Kamal Sen, a man of distinction of the Vaida or physician caste. He was at this time twenty-three years of age, and being left an orphan had been educated in an English school, and had graduated in the college at Calcutta. Enthusiastic in the cause of the reform of religion he issued (with the assistance of Hurro Lall Roy, a talented Brahmin) various tracts, and, at the cost of an open breach with the older members of the sect [c. A.D. 1864], rejected the doctrine of the infallibility of the Vedas, which had been taught by its founder, and which seemed the connecting link between his teaching and that of the old Hindoo religion.

Chunder Sen visited England [A.D. 1870], and was welcomed at a soiree in Hanover Square Rooms on April 12th, by a miscellaneous collection of ministers and laity of ten various denominations, several persons of distinction being also present, including Lord Lawrence, the Dean of Westminster, Louis Blanc, &c. During the five months which he spent in this country he preached in different dissenting chapels, chiefly Unitarian, Congregational, or Baptist, and spoke at public meetings in London, and in most of the large provincial towns, including Bath, Birmingham, Bristol, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Leeds, Leicester, Liverpool, Manchester, and Nottingham. The Queen granted him a personal interview at Osborne, August 13th. He preached a farewell sermon in the Unitarian chapel at Islington, September 4th, was again entertained at a soiree at the Hanover Square Rooms, September 12th, by invitation of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and sailed for India from Southampton, September 17th, 1870.

General character of the Brahmoo Somaj. The religion of this new sect, which its founders hope will develope into the national Church of India, may be described as a pure or "pectoral" theism, entirely evolved out of man's own consciousness, and not based on any external support of revelation or tradition. Hence the importance attached to the study of mental philosophy and psychology, which have not only a subjective utility, as the best means of affording intellectual and moral exercise to the mind, but also an objective value as the means of attaining the truths of theology and ethics [Lectures and Tracts, p. 197]. Faith is defined as a direct vision; it is no dogma of books nor tradition of venerable antiquity; it relies upon no evidence, and will have no mediation; it neither borrows an idea of God from metaphysics, nor a narrative of God from history; it bows its neck to no logical or historical deity [p. 256]. Prayer is not a matter which can be argued out by any appeal to books or to deductions of logic [p. 236]. Of the three component elements of worship—adoration, gratitude, and prayer—the latter is by far the most important, provided that its nature is rightly understood, and that instead of being debased into petitions for rain, and for pleasant breezes, and for outward prosperity, it is confined to its proper objects, spiritual knowledge, spiritual power, and spiritual holiness [p. 241, English Visit, p. 75]. "Prayer makes the weak powerful, the timid heroic, the corrupt righteous, and the ignorant wise. Prayer lifts the soul above all that is earthly, shadowy, and mean, and ushers it into the very presence of the All-Holy" [Fraser's Mag. August 1866]. Thus purified and spiritualized the Brahmoo Somaj is to form a golden mean between mysticism and scepticism, between the superstition of Brahmins and the materialism of Buddhists; it is to be an eclectic religion, rejecting the dross while extracting what is good out of the profound devotion of Hindooism, and the heroic enthusiasm of Mahometanism and the moral precepts of Christianity. It will uphold the absolute infinity and unity of the Divine Creator, and will suffer no created thing to usurp His sovereignty. It will worship Him alone, and thoroughly set its face against every form of creature-worship. But while admitting the unity of the divinity, the future Church will recognize a trinity of divine manifestations. God manifests Himself to us through external nature, through the inner spirit, and through moral greatness impersonated in man. Here, therefore, the idolater, the pantheist, and the prophet worshipper will find what they severally want. Their delusions, errors, and aims will certainly be destroyed; but the genuine aspirations of their nature, all their normal cravings for spiritual aids, will be duly satisfied; and, instead of a hundred hostile churches, there will be upreared in the fulness of time one vast cathedral, where all mankind will worship with one heart the Supreme Creator [Lectures, pp. 145, 147]. This homage will be extremely simple, for there will be no teacher, no priest, no rites or ceremonies, and no books, if we except a very small manual of occasional prayers drawn up by Chunder Sen. In short, this new religion will resemble the theistic society recently established by Mr. Voysey in London, or the

Its attitude towards Christianity. This is not so much one of hostility as of patronizing condescension. "Every Christian sect," says Chunder Sen, "has tried to realize the kingdom of God, but has failed, and has succeeded, after all, in representing one side only of Christianity. . . . I should be a traitor to the universal Church of Theism to which I belong, if my heart and soul were not capacious enough to take in the whole length and breadth of the Christian Church. Come unto me, brothers and sisters of England and France, Germany and Switzerland, and Italy and all Europe; come unto me, brothers and sisters of America," &c. [Eng. Visit, pp. 253, 254]. In the earlier days of the Brahmoo Somaj, many persons imagined that its members would not accept the name of Christians, or undergo the rite of baptism, simply because of the social persecution which such a step would involve at the hands of their relations and the members of their caste. This charge may have had some foundation in those days, but the present leader of the sect makes the unambiguous declaration, "I never put myself forward as a Christian, and I never will" [p. 322]. Though the Brahmoo Somaj is thus not to be described by the epithet "Christian," it is decidedly Unitarian in form and tendency. "I tell you candidly," said Chunder Sen, addressing a Unitarian audience, "that I have felt quite at home in all Unitarian assemblies private and public" [p. 309]. Many years before, A.D. 1824, Ramohun Roy, writing to Dr. Ware, had made a similar assertion. "To the enlightened members of Hindostan the ideas of a Triune God, of a Man-God, of the appearance of God in the bodily shape of a dove, or of the blood of God shed for the payment of a debt, seem entirely heathenish and absurd, and consequently their sincere conversion to Trinitarian Christianity must be morally impossible. But they would not scruple to embrace, or at least to encourage, the Unitarian system of Christianity, were it inculcated on them in an intelligible manner" [Correspondence with Rev. H. Ware, London, C. Fox, 1825, p. 135]. There are plentiful acknowledgments in various places of Jesus Christ, as (if not the greatest and truest, yet) a great and true benefactor of mankind, and worthy of being classed with Vyasa in the honour and esteem demanded at the hands of humanity. There seems to be much fascination for the Indian mind in the idea of His Asiatic descent, and His birth on the boundary line between Europe and Asia: but when He is honoured above others, as the Incarnation of Deity, we are to understand the superiority accorded to be one of degree only. The Christian Scriptures, like the Hindoo Vedas, contain a superstitious element along with much that is admirable. "Had not experience too clearly proved that some of the metaphorical expressions, when taken singly, and without attention to their contexts, may be made the foundation of doctrines quite at variance with (what I conceive to be) the tenor of the rest of the Scriptures, I should have had no hesitation in submitting indiscriminately the whole of the doctrines of the New Testament to my countrymen; as I should have felt no apprehension that even the most ignorant of them, if left to the guidance of their own unprejudiced views of the matter, could misconceive the clear and distinct assertions they everywhere contain of the unity of God and subordinate nature of His messenger Jesus Christ" [Ramohun Roy's second appeal to the Christian public in defence of the Precepts of Jesus, p. 167].

Special reforms aimed at by the Brahmoo Somaj. However far this new Indian sect is thus seen to differ on fundamental points of doctrine from the teaching of the Catholic Church, it is nevertheless engaged in a crusade against abuses, and in a promotion of practical reforms, which win the sympathy of every civilized man. But they do not involve, as they appear to do on first sight, any approximation to Christianity, so much as a return to the purer system and teaching of the older Hindoo religion and sacred writings.

First, it aims at the abolition of idolatry and restoration of a pure monotheism. "Not only," says Chunder Sen, in one of his appeals to young India, "must you not worship idols yourselves, but you must discountenance it in others, and hunt it out of the country; for the sake of your souls, and of the souls of millions of your countrymen, you must acknowledge only one Supreme and true God, our Maker, Preserver, and Moral Governor." This is in accordance with the teaching of the older Hindoo writings, as will be evident from the following passage in the Vedas: "They called him Indra, Mitra, Varuna, and Agni. That which is one the wise call by divers names;" and from the later books of the Upanishads, "Let us endeavour to know the Ruler of the universe, who is God of gods, Deity of deities, Lord of lords, above all, who manifests Himself and is worthy of all reverence" [English Visit, p. 492].

Secondly, it seeks the abolition of caste, as the bulwark of Hindoo idolatry, the safeguard of the Brahminical priesthood, and, on wider grounds, as an audacious and sacrilegious violation of God's law of human brotherhood, and of the doctrine of the equality of all souls in His sight. For the future, a Kshatrya is not to look down on a Vaisya, and even a high class Brahmin, if so inclined, is to accept as wife a low class Sudra. Caste, which was originally a system of social distinctions, or a division of society into trades and professions, became in later times fortified by religious sanctions, which were unknown to the earlier Hindoo writings [English Visit, p. 494].

Thirdly, it desires the reform of the zenana, or amelioration of the condition of the women of India, by the promotion of female education, the establishment of girls' schools, and the alteration of the rule by which woman is treated as a menial in the household, a cipher in society, and a victim to a life-long seclusion; by the alteration of the custom of early marriage, which has been proved to be physically, intellectually, and morally pernicious; by the abolition of the law of compulsory widowhood, a burden more intolerable on account of the practice of polygamy. A man not unfrequently dies, leaving fifty women doomed to perpetual widowhood, and ready in their social solitude to become victims to all the mortifications which the Brahminical priesthood has invented for persons in their condition.

Its present strength as to numbers and position. As there is no initiatory rite or formal admission into the Brahmoo Somaj it is not easy to obtain precise information on this head. The following report of its position was furnished to its representative council some years ago.

There are fifty-four Brahmoo Somajes in India, of which fifty are in Bengal, two in the North-western provinces, one in the Punjab, and one in Madras, the latter bearing the name of the Veda Somajum. Five of the Somajes are in Calcutta, the oldest of them being in its thirty-sixth year. Twenty-five new ones have been added in the last ten years. Eight of these churches have established religious schools for instruction in the tenets of Brahminism. For secular education, there is the Calcutta College, established and instituted by the leading members of the Calcutta Somaj. There are also boys' and girls' schools in connection with ten provincial Somajes. All these are under the direct management of the members of the local Somajes, and are mostly assisted by Government grants. There are seven periodicals regularly maintained by the body; the monthly "Tattwabodhini Putrika" at Calcutta, and two others of the same name published in Urdoo and Telegu, at Bareilly and Madras; four other magazines in native tongues; two newspapers in English, the Mirror and the National Paper; and two more native newspapers in Dacca [Indian Mirror, Jan. 1, 1866].

In the course of lectures delivered in Scotland [A.D. 1870], Chunder Sen estimated its number of adherents at about six thousand, almost exclusively men, and the number of places of worship at about sixty.

Its future prospects. The more sanguine adherents of the Brahmoo Somaj, buoyed up by its past development, and seeing the scant success which has attended the attempts to introduce Christianity among the natives of India, predict for it the position of the Hindoo Church of the future, looking forward to the time when a grand national organization shall have been effected among the one hundred and eighty millions of the population, and when, all distinctions of religion and caste being destroyed, "the Church of the one supreme Lord" will be established throughout the length and breadth of the country [English Visit, p. 123].

BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT. A later name for the sect of the ORTLIBENSES and AMALRICIANS. The name was assumed from the words of St. Paul, "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death. . . . For as many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God" [Rom. viii. 2, 14]. The liberty thus claimed was, first, freedom from outward ordinances, and, secondly, freedom from the guilt of sin. They were simply Antinomians of the most extreme form.

The teachers of the sect wandered about from place to place in imitation of the Apostles, and that sacred name was given to them by their followers. They brought over to their opinions many of the Waldenses and most of the Beghards; and their fanatical lawlessness led to the revival of the Inquisition in Germany in the fourteenth century. After the end of the thirteenth century they seem to have been identified with the BEGHARDS, and in later times were represented by the FAMILISTS.

BRETHREN, PLYMOUTH. [PLYMOUTH BRETHREN.]

BROAD CHURCHMEN. A modern school of Latitudinarians, composed of those clergy and laity of the Church of England who dissent from the principles developed during the revival of exact theological learning. The designation "Broad" has been assumed as expressive of the comprehensiveness which the theology of this school offers to men of various opinions; but it is scarcely a fitting designation, as well defined opinions of a positive kind are not included. The most distinctive characteristic of the Broad Church School is, in reality, its rejection of traditional beliefs, and the substitution in their place of what has been aptly called a "Negative Theology," in which much is doubted and rejected, and very little believed.

This school of thought is generally traced back to Dr. Arnold, Master of Rugby School from 1828 until his death in 1842. But he was only one of a band of intellectual men who floated on the stream of reaction from the High Church movement; and he did no more to originate the reaction than was done by Hare, Whately, or Maurice. Its real origin is to be traced to the instinctive opposition raised in the minds of forcible thinkers whose occupations had led them in other directions than that of theological study, to the positive conclusions at which other forcible thinkers were arriving, who made theological study the special object of their lives. Whately and Arnold were obviously representative men of the one class, Newman and Pusey of the other.

The sporadic elements of this school were aggregated into a party by the "Hampden Controversy." When Hampden was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, on the nomination of Lord Melbourne in 1836, the searching critical power of Newman, then Fellow of Oriel, was brought to bear upon the Bampton Lectures on the scholastic theology which the new Professor had delivered four years previously. Newman's pamphlet, "Elucidations of the Bampton Lectures," stimulated a growing discontent with the appointment, and the Convocation of the University passed a vote of censure upon their author; a vote in which Dr. Hampden was, perhaps, condemned by some as a nominee of the Whig party. In 1848 he was appointed to the Bishopric of Hereford. The controversy was revived with great bitterness, and an unsuccessful attempt was made to prevent his consecration. From that time Dr. Hampden was never again heard of in the theological world; and it is difficult to understand how it was that his lectures—which have long been relegated to the usual Bampton Lecture shelf at the top of the library, and contained nothing remarkably unorthodox—should ever have raised so great a storm of controversy as they did.

A work much more expressive of Broad Church principles was published in the year 1853, namely, a volume of Theological Essays, by Mr. Maurice, Professor of Theology in King's College, London, a man of much higher intellectual mark than Dr. Hampden. In these the doctrines of the Holy Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement, Inspiration, and Eternal Punishment, among others, were dealt with in language remarkable for its beauty, and for its inconsistency with the opinions of orthodox Churchmen. They were at once accepted by Broad Churchmen as a statement of their opinions, and have continued ever since to influence them. The Council of King's College, on October 28th, 1853, declared the opinions expressed, the doubts indicated in the Essays, with the subsequent correspondence respecting future punishments and the final issue of the day of judgment, to be of dangerous tendency, and likely to unsettle the minds of the theological students; and further decided that Mr. Maurice's continuance as Professor would be seriously detrimental to the interests of the College. Notwithstanding this dismissal, Mr. Maurice afterwards held office as a Professor at Cambridge, and subsequently became a London incumbent; and no writer did more to mould the opinions of the Broad Church School.

The greatest literary success of the school was however a composite work of third-rate merit,—but now historical,—entitled Essays and Reviews, which was published in February 1860. It was an octavo volume of 434 pages, containing seven articles on theological questions of the day by as many writers (who were said to have written quite independently of each other), and edited by Professor Jowett. The book was not at all remarkable for originality, but was strikingly so for the boldness with which it revived old sceptical theories, and the skill with which they were clothed in decent language, such as would alone secure their reception in the present day. Although far below Maurice's Essays in talent, the Essays and Reviews volume obtained an enormous circulation, and affected the opinions of so many superficial thinkers that it will be proper to state shortly what is the nature of its contents.

The first Essay is by Dr. Temple, at that time Master of Rugby School, but subsequently Bishop of Exeter. It is entitled "The Education of the World," and is substantially a plagiarism of Lessing's Essay on the same subject. The object of it may be stated to be to prove that the world has gone through several stages of religious education, and has now reached a higher development of religious knowledge than it has reached before. A parallel is drawn between the history of the individual man and that of the world, there being in each the three stages of childhood, youth and manhood. The Old Testament ages were the time of the world's childhood, when it was subject to positive laws and restrictions upon its freedom. The New Testament age was the world's youth, when external discipline was supplanted by example in the Person of Christ. This has been followed by the world's manhood, in which conscience is supreme, and the only limitation of freedom is that which it imposes.

The second Essay is by Dr. Rowland Williams, Vice-Principal of Lampeter, a Welsh College in which young men are educated for Holy Orders. He tries to prove that the ordinary ways of understanding the Bible are a mistake, and that now we have arrived at such a highly educated stage of the world's history, we ought not to be content with the interpretations to which our forefathers bowed down. The prophets did not predict events, but wrote down past or current history. It was not an angel or supernatural being that slew the first-born, but the "Bedouin host." The fifty-third chapter of Isaiah describes the sufferings of Jeremiah, not those of the Messiah, &c. &c.

The third Essay had for its author Mr. Baden Powell, Savilian Professor of Geometry at Oxford, and is written to prove the unreasonableness of believing that God ever worked miracles, or that He created the world. The world made itself somehow or other in the course of millions of years, and miracles are "nature" improperly described by ignorant people. Such being the case, what greater mistake could there be than to suppose that creation is an evidence that there is a Divine Being, or that miracles are evidence of the Divine Being having commissioned those who work them, as, e.g., Moses before Pharaoh, or St. Peter and St. John at Jerusalem?

The fourth Essay is by the Rev. H. B. Wilson, Vicar of Great Staughton, and is an evidence of the way in which people sometimes argue against an opponent so vehemently that they end by converting themselves to that opponent's side. The author of this Essay was one of the leaders in a very intemperate attack on the writers in the Tracts for the Times for a supposed claim made by them to interpret the Thirty-nine Articles in a "non-natural sense." Mr. Wilson afterwards came to think that this inestimable privilege is the birthright of every enlightened Churchman, and that it is the height of intellectual subtlety to make anything out of anything, according to opinions and circumstances, at least in the interpretation of the Holy Bible or the Prayer Book. His own examples of this kind of interpretation are among the most dreadful things in the book. He considers many of the "traits in the Scriptural Person of Jesus" to belong to an ideal rather than an historical person; e.g., the Temptation did not really happen, but is an imaginary scene put into the Gospels to complete the picture. The Annunciation "may be of ideal origin" also, the writer says, and much more to the same purpose.

The fifth Essay was written by Mr. C. Goodwin, a layman. This author deals with what is called Scripture cosmogony, and the manner in which he does so is sufficiently explained by saying that he considers the Book of Genesis to have been written by some Hebrew man of science, who invented a theoretical account of creation, but living in a time when he had no geological discoveries to guide him, simply wrote down what proves to be full of mistakes.

The sixth is by the Rev. Mark Pattison, at the time of writing Fellow, and afterwards Rector, of Lincoln College, Oxford. It is on "the Tendencies of Religious Thought in England from 1688 to 1750." Although a very dry and uninteresting history of the subject, it is not nearly so much opposed to Christian interests and Christian principles as the others; and while many would have differed from the author's views, few would have attached much significance to his Essay if it had not appeared in such objectionable company.

The last Essay is on the "Interpretation of Scripture," by Mr. Jowett, then Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford, and subsequently Master of Balliol College. It is a sort of adaptation of the Bible to the theories contained in the previous Essays; and its chief object appears to be to lower the authority of Holy Scripture by showing that very little of it was inspired in any ordinary sense of inspiration.

The agitation raised by the publication of Essays and Reviews was greater than any that had taken place during the progress of the theological revival. High Churchmen and Low Churchmen combined in censuring the work: the bishops were all opposed to its teaching; 9,000 of the clergy signed a protest against it; and the Convocations of Canterbury and York passed a synodical condemnation upon "the pernicious doctrines and heretical tendencies of the book" in July 1864. This synodical judgment was suspended for some time on account of ecclesiastical suits which were being prosecuted against Dr. Williams by Bishop Hamilton of Salisbury, and against Mr. Wilson by Mr. Fendall. These two writers were both condemned by the Court of Arches, each being suspended from his benefice for a year by the sentence of Dr. Lushington on December 15th, 1862. This judgment was reversed on appeal to the Queen in Council, on February 8th, 1864, the Judicial Committee fencing their judgment by adding to it this paragraph: "We desire to repeat that the meagre and disjointed extracts which have been allowed to remain in the reformed Articles" of the suit "are alone the subject of our judgment. On the design and general tendency of the book called Essays and Reviews, and on the effect or aim of the whole Essay of Dr. Williams, or the whole Essay of Mr. Wilson, we neither can nor do pronounce any opinion. On the short extracts before us, our judgment is that the charges are not proved" [Brodrick and Fremantle, Eccl. Cases, p. 289]. This significant intimation that the book was placed before the court in a way which made its thorough judicial criticism impossible did not, however, damp the satisfaction of the Broad Church party, the judgment being considered as a triumphant vindication of the theological laxness which its members advocate and practise.

It was probably under the encouragement of this supposed victory that Dr. Colenso, Bishop of Natal in South-eastern Africa, published his speculations on the Pentateuch, by means of which he endeavoured to make the high-road of Biblical interpretation so very broad that the most arrogant sceptic would find no difficulty in walking along it. The purpose of this work was to minimize to the utmost the authority of the Pentateuch, and with it of all Holy Scripture; the first principle of the author being indicated by the words, "There is not the slightest reason to suppose that the first writer of the story in the Pentateuch ever professed to be recording infallible truth, or even actual historical truth. He wrote certainly a narrative. But what indications are there that he published it at large, even to the people of his own time, as a record of matter of fact, veracious history?" On the appearance of this volume—which looked very learned to unlearned people—Colenso was at once elevated to the post of choragus by the bulk of the Broad Churchmen. On the other hand, all the bishops of England, except Thirlwall, Bishop of St. David's, and all those of Ireland, except the less distinguished Fitzgerald of Killaloe, and Griffin of Limerick, wrote an united letter to the Bishop of Natal requesting him to resign his see. On his positive refusal, he was tried before a provincial synod at Cape Town, on charges of denying the Atonement, of believing in the justification of those who have no knowledge of the Saviour, of denying the inspiration of Holy Scripture, the Divinity of our Lord, and everlasting punishments, and of depraving and impugning the Book of Common Prayer. Having been found guilty of these charges, he was formally deposed from the see of Natal on November 27th, 1863. This deposition was subsequently declared null and void by the Queen in Council on the ground that the Metropolitan of Cape Town had not authority over the Bishop of Natal. But on January 7th, 1866, a solemn sentence of excommunication was published against him by the Bishop of Cape Town in the Cathedral of Pieter-Maritzburg, and subsequently a new Bishop was consecrated to take charge of the Colony.

From that time Bishop Colenso was little heard of as a leader of the Broad Church party, but his works are said to be extensively used by the Buddhists as a controversial authority against Christianity.

The opinions of a better informed posterity respecting the theological productions of the Broad Church school will probably be in accordance with that expressed by the learned Hengstenberg. "The authors of the Essays," he wrote, "have been trained in a German school. It is only the echo of German infidelity which we hear from the midst of the English Church. They appear to us as parrots, with only this distinction, common among parrots, that they imitate more or less perfectly. The treatise of Temple is in its scientific value about equal to an essay written by the pupils of the middle classes of our colleges. . . . The Essay of Goodwin on the Mosaic cosmogony displays the naïve assurance of one who receives the modern critical science from the second or tenth hand. The editor" (Hengstenberg) "asked the now deceased Andreas Wagner, a distinguished professor of natural sciences at the University of Munich, to subject this treatise to an examination from the standpoint of natural science. The offer was accepted, and the book given to him. But after some time it was returned with the remark, that he must take back his promise, as the book was beneath all criticism. . . . All these Essays tend toward atheism. Their subordinate value is seen in the inability of their authors to recognise their goal clearly, and in their want of courage to declare this knowledge. Only Baden Powell forms in this respect an exception. He uses several expressions, in which the grinning spectre makes his appearance almost undisguisedly. He speaks not only sneeringly of the idea of a positive external revelation, which has hitherto formed the basis of all systems of the Christian faith; he even raises himself against the 'Architect of the world,' whom the old English freethinkers and freemasons had not dared to attack" [Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, Vorwort, 1862].

The theological tendency of the Broad Church school in general is to drift through the channel of Unitarianism into Theism. Its Christology is restricted almost entirely to the human aspect of Christ's earthly life and ministrations; and so little of its Divine aspect, of Christ's Pre-existence, or of His present work, is recognised, that belief in His Deity has no real place in the personal creed of many Broad Churchmen; and all they have to say about our Lord is "Ecce Homo." The practical religion of the school is based on philosophical views of morals, in which self-control, rather than grace, is considered as the power by which holy living is to be accomplished, "manliness" rather than "godliness" being set up as the true ideal of Christian life.

But successive controversies have developed out of the original Broad Church party an extreme school, whose theology is of a much more positive character. This school is of a distinctly rationalist type, carrying Broad Church views about inspiration to the length of practical disbelief in Scripture; Broad Church views about our Lord to the length of Unitarianism; Broad Church views about everlasting punishment to Universalism; and Broad Church views about the priesthood and the Sacraments to an utter denial of their reality. Such is the natural terminus of the original school, and such must be the logical outcome of its opinions when they are taken up by men who are not satisfied to rest in negations and generalities.

BROWNISTS. [INDEPENDENTS.]

BRUGGLENIAN. A small sect of fanatics so called from the Swiss canton of Brugglen. In a village within that canton two brothers named Christian and Jerome Rohler blasphemously pretended [A.D. 1746] to be the two witnesses of the Book of Revelation; and the former of the two promised his followers that on a certain day he would ascend to Heaven and carry them with him. The Rohlers were both of them executed in the year 1753, and the fanaticism soon afterwards died out among their followers.

BRYANITES. [METHODISTS, BRYANITE.]

BUCHANITES. An insignificant sect which existed in Scotland for a few years at the close of the last century, and which bore, in its later development, some correspondence to the subsequent sect of Southcotians in England. Its foundress was Mrs. Buchan, the wife of a workman in a delf manufactory at Glasgow, and previously a domestic servant. She was originally an Episcopalian, but on her marriage about 1760 joined the sect to which her husband belonged, that of the Burgher Secession. About 1780 she began, probably under the influence of some religious excitement which deranged her mind, to teach that the millennium was close at hand, that no one of those who became her followers would die, but would be caught up to meet the Lord, and that while all the wicked would be at once struck dead for a thousand years, the believers in this immediate coming would, with their Lord, possess the earth for that period. She soon numbered among her followers a Relief Minister named Hugh Whyte of Irvine, a writer to the signet, a merchant, and various other persons. These forthwith, regarding the world as close to its end, forsook their worldly occupations, renounced marriage and attention to the duties of married life, and lived together in a society numbering forty-six members, with a common stock and purse, and occupied in the sole work of watching for the Great Appearing. Being assaulted by a mob at Irvine in April 1784, they moved to a farmhouse near Thornhill in Dumfriesshire. Here, in December of the same year, they were again attacked by a mob, for which thirteen of the assailants were fined in the Sheriff-court at Dumfries. In 1786 a number of Mrs. Buchan's followers returned to their homes at Irvine, relating the tricks and impositions which she had practised, and which were supposed to have for their aim the exhausting the patience and fidelity of her disciples so as to secure for herself the undivided possession of the goods which they contributed to the common stock. One of her latest pretended revelations was, that in order to be fit to ascend to Christ a previous fast of forty days and nights was requisite. This was immediately attempted by some, who would soon have died had they not been surreptitiously supported with spirits and water. She died in June 1791, and on her death-bed communicated to the few who remained with her (among whom was still Mr. Whyte) that she was none other than the Blessed Virgin, and the Woman spoken of in the Revelation as clothed with the sun; that she had been on the earth ever since the days of our Lord; that she should not now die, but only sleep for a while, and then awake and lead them to the New Jerusalem. Her infatuated followers in consequence would not bury her, but when compelled by the process of decay to place her body in a coffin, fixed it in a corner of a barn, until the neighbours procured an order from a justice of the peace for her interment. It is said that Mr. Whyte then went to America. [Scots Magazine, 1784, pp. 589, 590; 1785; p. 148, 1786; p. 461, 462. Ann. Reg. 1791, Chron. pp. 26, 27. BUDDHISTS. The believers in a faith originated in India about 2500 years ago by Siddhartha, better known as Sakya-mouni, or by the title of Buddha (the enlightened) which he afterwards assumed, and from which his religion is named. Buddhism, though it has now disappeared from India, is professed by 455,000,000, being 31·2 per cent. of the human race, in Cashmere, Nepal, Thibet, Tartary, Mongolia, China, Japan, Siam, Burmah, and Ceylon [Max-Müller, Chips from a German Workshop, i. 214; J. B. Saint-Hilaire, Le Bouddha et sa Religion, introd. ii.].

Buddhism was on one side the result of a protest against the religious and social despotism of Brahminism, which had wound itself round every act and moment of life. On another side it was an attempt to escape from the terrible theories involved in the doctrine of metempsychosis. Though many of the metaphysical doctrines of Buddhism may be found among the philosophers of Brahminism, yet, in practical bearing and social relations, the two religions are entirely at variance with each other.

The founder of Buddhism was born at Kapilavastu, the capital of a kingdom of the same name in Central India, at the foot of the mountains of Nepal, to the north of the present Oude. The date of his birth is variously given by M. Saint-Hilaire and other writers at B.C. 622 [Le Bouddha, introd. ii.], and by Professor Max-Müller about seventy years later [Chips, i. 205]. His father, the king of the country, was of the family of the Sakyas and the clan of the Gautamas; hence the son was called afterwards Sakya-mouni—the solitary of the Sakyas. He is also known as Gautama, from the name of his clan, but his original name seems to have been Siddhartha [Saint-Hilaire, 3], though it is doubtful whether this name, like that of Buddha, was not adopted by him in later life [Chips, i.

218]. He was, as the son of a king, of the Kshatrya or warrior caste. From boyhood he was noted for his talents and beauty, and also for his melancholy temper and love of solitary meditation on the problems of life and death amid the shadows of the forests. He married early, in compliance with his father's wishes, who vainly desired thus to drive away his melancholy. The sight, on various occasions, of a man overwhelmed by the miseries and infirmities of age, of one dying of fever and overcome by the fear of death, of a funeral attended by the lamenting relatives of the deceased, set him on thinking how to escape from the miseries and the fear of old age, disease and death. An encounter with a mendicant or devotee—one who, renouncing all pleasures and desires, lived a life of austerity, without passion or envy, supported only by alms, and seeking only to obtain self-conquest—determined Buddha to retire from the world. He left his father's palace by night in secret, and became the pupil, first of one, then of a second, of the most famous of the Brahmin teachers; but from them he learned no means of deliverance for man. He then, with five companions, retired for six years into solitude, subjecting himself to the most frightful penances. At the end of this time he became convinced that the austerities availed no more than the doctrines of Brahminism in producing peace of mind, and deliverance from the fears with which he was troubled. He gave up his exercises and set himself to elaborate his own system. After long meditations and ecstatic visions, he imagined that he had at last arrived at the true knowledge which discloses the cause, and so removes the fear, of all the changes inherent in life. From this time he adopted the title of Buddha (the enlightened). For a while he hesitated whether he should communicate his knowledge to the world; but compassion for the sufferings of man prevailed. He went to Benares, the sacred city of the Brahmins, where he preached and lectured with great success. He afterwards travelled over many parts of India, making converts wherever he went. Several of the kings, including his father, and all his relations, embraced his doctrines; but he was vehemently opposed and persecuted by the Brahmins, over whom however he was victorious in every discussion. At last, having reached the age of seventy, or, according to some accounts, of eighty years, he died while sitting under a tree in a forest near the city of Kusinagara, B.C. 543 [Saint-Hilaire], or 477 [Max Müller]. His funeral rites were celebrated with great solemnity, amid thousands of his followers. After his body was burned, his remains were divided into eight portions, to be preserved as relics in different parts of the country.

The story of the life of Buddha was handed down by tradition, and, as we now possess it, was committed to writing about the first century B.C. A vast mass of childish legend and fiction had grown up around his history. [For some account of these, see Saint-Hilaire, Le Bouddha, pt. i. chap. ii. pp. 48-78; Spence Hardy, A Manual of Buddhism, sec. 7.] Though many of the details are doubtful, the general outline of his life may be accepted. He left no writings, but his discourses were collected by his disciples from tradition, and now form a portion of the Buddhist sacred writings.

It is necessary to notice a theory concerning Buddha propounded by the late Professor Wilson, in his Essay on Buddha and Buddhism, and adopted in part by Mr. Maurice [Lectures on the Religions of the World]. Professor Wilson, gathering up the different dates assigned to him, the mythical character attaching to several parts of the story, the mass of miraculous legend that had grown up about him, and various geographical difficulties, considers it doubtful whether such a person as Buddha ever existed. But many of the difficulties of the history have now been solved; and this theory is not accepted by the most recent students of Buddhism. [For a refutation of it, see Max Müller, Chips, i. 217, 218.]

The most striking feature in the history of Buddhism is its spirit of proselytism, in which it has been surpassed by no religion except Christianity. This spirit arose from the feeling of sympathy and brotherhood between all men, from the prince to the outcast, which it taught. The only means adopted for its propagation was persuasion. It speedily made way in India, and about the end of the fourth century B.C. was established in that country by King Asoka or Piyadasi, many of whose edicts are preserved in rock inscriptions. In this king's reign missionaries were first sent to some of the countries beyond India; and, at one of the great councils of Buddhism, about B.C. 246, a regular plan of missions was developed by teaching, preaching, and publishing translations of the sacred books. Cashmere was the first country converted; the Himalayan countries and Thibet soon followed; while in the south Ceylon became almost wholly Buddhist. From Ceylon it spread to Siam and Burmah. The first mention of a Buddhist mission in China is about B.C. 217, where Buddhism flourished greatly, and in A.D. 65 was admitted as a state religion by the Emperor Ming-ti. It was alternately persecuted and favoured, but a great impulse was given to its extension about the fifth century A.D. Streams of pilgrims came into India from China, and carried back with them sacred pictures, books, and relics; and at the same time it spread largely in other countries, Mongolia, and Central Asia especially. In the next century, however, it received a formidable blow from the great uprising of Brahminist feeling in India, by which it was utterly expelled from that country, and never recovered the slightest footing there. For this loss it gained compensation by extensive conversions in China and Central and Eastern Asia, and has never had since that time to lament any serious permanent losses, unless indeed it has suffered in any way by the rise of the curious creed of the Chinese rebels.

The tenets of Buddhism are contained in the canonical sacred writings, which were originally

composed in Sanscrit, but have been translated into the languages of Thibet, Ceylon, China, Mongolia, Japan, and Burmah. These were entirely unknown to Europeans until 1824, when they were discovered in Nepal, in the original Sanscrit, by Mr. B. H. Hodgson, Political Resident in that state. They comprised sixty volumes. Shortly after, Alexander Csoma, of Körös in Transylvania, having acquired, in spite of great difficulties, a knowledge of Thibetan, gave himself up to the study of the Buddhist literature in that language, which consists of about 330 folio volumes, mostly translations from the Sanscrit works discovered by Mr. Hodgson. M. Csoma published an analysis of this immense bible in the Asiatic Researches, vol. xx. About the same period the existence of a Mongolian version, made from the Thibetan, of the Buddhist canon was made known by M. J. L. Schmidt of St. Petersburg, who published some extracts in 1829. A further great discovery was made in Ceylon by the Hon. G. Turnour of a version of the Buddhist canon, and also some historical works in Pali, the ancient sacred language of Ceylon. China, Japan, Burmah, and Siam also possess Buddhist literatures, the two former derived from the Sanscrit, the two latter, of which little is known, from the Pali.

The Buddhist canon was settled at three great councils, held in different parts of India, the last in B.C. 308. It is called the Tripitaki, or three baskets, being divided into three parts, the Suttas or discourses of Buddha, the Vinaya, containing all that has reference to morality, and the Abhidharma, which treats of metaphysical questions. The first two contain each five separate works, the last seven.

Buddhism is not a religion as Judaism, Christianity, Mahometanism are religions. It contains not a trace of the idea of God from first to last; it acknowledges man as the only being in the universe. Neither is it simply a philosophy, in the ordinary sense of the term, a theory of knowing and being. But it contains elements of both. Obstinate refusing to recognise aught else but man, it confounds man with nature, in the midst of which he lives, while it still preaches earnestly the laws of virtue. It is the practical element that has had such a great force with the multitudes. To the people at large Buddhism was a moral and religious reform. Its metaphysical speculations could have been followed by very few among its votaries; but the sight of a prince throwing away all his splendour, living as a beggar a life of the utmost privation, and withal of the utmost purity and virtue, proclaiming a deliverance from the religious and social despotism of the Brahmins, opening the way of happiness, not to one class or caste but to the veriest outcasts, this it was that caused its rapid spread. Hence it is that the social and moral code of Buddhism is far more important than its metaphysical theories, though in the Buddhist system they are closely connected with each other. That moral code is, taken by itself, one of the purest in the world. It forbids even such vices as pride, uncharitableness, hypocrisy; and enjoins such virtues as forgiveness of injuries, contentment, humility, patience.

The basis of the morals of Buddha is the Four Great Verities: [1] Pain and sorrow exist; [2] the cause of these is our affections and passions and our sins; [3] pain and sorrow can cease by Nirvana; [4] points out the way to Nirvana, the means of deliverance. This way to Nirvana consists of eight parts: [1] Right faith, or orthodoxy; [2] right judgment, dispersing all uncertainty and doubt; [3] right language, or the study of perfect and unswerving truthfulness; [4] right purpose, or the choice of an upright purpose in all words and deeds; [5] right practice, or the pursuit of a religious life; [6] right obedience, or the following all the precepts of the Buddhist law; [7] right memory; [8] right meditation.

These Four Verities alone comprise the earliest teaching of Buddha; he taught them indeed to the last, but with important additions in his latter years. The Four Verities are followed by a body of moral precepts. The first are the Five Great Commandments binding upon all, namely, not to kill, not to steal, not to commit adultery, not to lie, not to get drunk. Next come five precepts, of less importance, binding on professed disciples, namely, to abstain from unseasonable meals, from public spectacles (music, dancing, singing), from expensive dresses and personal ornaments and perfumes, from having a large or soft bed, and from receiving gold or silver. For those who embrace a religious life, twelve observances of the severest character are prescribed: [1] To wear only clothes made of rags cast away by others; [2] to wear only three garments, made by their own hands from these rags; [3] to wear over these rags only a yellow cloak; [4] to live only on the alms they have collected; [5] to eat only one meal daily; [6] to take no food after noon; [7] to live in forests and solitary places, entering towns only to obtain alms; [8] the only shelter is to be the shadow of trees; [9] to rest only sitting at the foot of a tree; [10] to sleep there, without lying down, but resting against the tree; [11] when once settled not to move the sitting-carpet about; [12] to meditate at night among the tombs in the cemeteries on the vanity of all things. The title given to those who follow these last precepts is Sramana, "victors over self." On ordinary persons, who could not attain such a height of virtue, were enjoined the Six Ordinary Virtues, almsgiving or charity, purity, patience, courage, contemplation, and knowledge. These virtues are inculcated in their very fullest extent. An instance of Buddha's charity is given for imitation. He saw one day a tigress starved and unable to feed her cubs, whereon he offered his body to be devoured by them. Among a number of minor precepts are included the government of the tongue, in its widest sense, humility, modesty, love for and dutifulness to parents and relations. One of the most remarkable of Buddha's institutions is that of public confession, before the whole congregation, of faults and sins.

What then is the end to be obtained by a life of such self-sacrificing charity and humility? That stated in the third and fourth of the Four Verities, namely, Nirvana. To ascertain what Nirvana is, we must go on to consider the metaphysical side of Buddhism.

The idea of God is utterly banished from Buddhism. Not even is there the notion of a Universal Spirit common to so many Eastern religions. The universe is a mere fleeting illusion without any reality. The only being that can lay claim to any real existence is the thinking subject, or man, for and to whom the universe seems to exist. Even his own ideas are thus but illusions, the effect of ignorance. Existence then is for man but sorrow, misery and trouble. But existence is not confined to human life nor closed by death. Before this human life man has gone through a multitude of states of existence of all kinds; and he may pass through a countless number hereafter, not merely animate, but also inanimate, and in fact through all forms of every kind. The transformations are regulated by the conduct of beings in their different states; virtue is rewarded, vice punished. There is no means whatever of escaping the consequences of deeds as long as existence continues; man is ever re-appearing, under some form or other, in this scene of misery, sorrow, and illusion. The great end of man then is to escape from existence by extirpating its cause. This cause of existence is "attachment"—an inclination towards something, which arises from desire. Desire must be preceded by perception, perception by contact; and this contact implies the existence of the senses. As the senses can only perceive what has form and name, that is, what is distinct, distinction is the real cause of all the effects which end in existence, birth and pain. This distinction is itself the result of conceptions or ideas; these ideas are mere illusions, the effects of ignorance. Ignorance therefore is the primary cause of all seeming existence. To know that ignorance as the root of all evil is identical with destroying it, and with it all the effects which flow from it. This can be done only by attaining to Nirvana, or extinction, that is in fact utter annihilation. As it is misery to be, not to be must be felicity. True wisdom consists in the desire for Nirvana. Nirvana is the reward and the end of the life of painful virtue described above. The means of entering into that state is by contemplation or ecstasy. This contemplation has four stages. In the first there is no desire but for Nirvana, there is a sense of freedom from sin, a knowledge of the nature of things. But the devotee still has a sense of pleasure in his own condition; the subject can reason, can distinguish, and choose between what conduces to the final state and what draws from it. In the second stage the use of these powers ceases, and nothing remains but the desire for Nirvana, and the satisfaction arising from the consciousness of growing perfection. In the third stage that satisfaction is extinguished, pure indifference succeeds, but there remains still some self-consciousness, and some amount of physical pleasure. In the fourth stage these last remnants vanish; memory is gone, all pleasure and pain have departed, nothing remains but absolute apathy. This is incomplete Nirvana, as near to that state as this life can attain, and a pledge of the future and perfect Nirvana. In attaining this state the votary acquires also omniscience and magic power. But there is a yet higher state to be attained by passing through the four regions of the formless world—the infinity of space, the infinity of intelligence, the region of nothing, and lastly, a region where not even the idea of nothing is left, not even the idea of the absence of ideas; where there is complete rest, undisturbed by nothing, or what is not nothing. This alone is perfect Nirvana. He who had attained the incomplete Nirvana, the only one possible in this life, was called a Buddha, and was greatly revered, especially after his death, that is when he had attained to perfect Nirvana. He who was striving after this state, but had not yet attained it, was a Bodhisatva, and was also revered, but in a less degree.¹

In consequence of the atheistic character of Buddhism, it admits of no idea of sacrifice, mediation, satisfaction, or propitiation. The worship is very simple, consisting simply of prayers and the offering of flowers, perfumes, &c., before the images and relics of Buddha. Reverence also is paid to his footmarks, and other traces of his presence, and especially to any spot where it is recorded that any remarkable occurrence happened to him. The statues of Buddha are very numerous, and generally of great size; to some of them miraculous powers of motion have been ascribed. Reverence is also paid to the statues of distinguished Buddhists, the Buddhas and Bodhisatvas. Different sects and individuals select certain of these to whom they pay special regard. The ministers, called Bonzes, are simply confraternities of mendicants, who act as patterns of the sternest self-renunciation, or else simply as teachers and preachers. They usually live in communities often containing thousands of persons, under rules strikingly resembling those of some of the mediæval monastic bodies. Many of them employ themselves in study of the sacred books, and in making translations of them; others in teaching young men and boys, the novices of the convents. In some countries there are also convents of women.

Such a system would naturally, in its pure atheistic philosophy, have but little hold upon the mass of unintelligent men. In the dreary blank of Nirvana it held out no hope worth striving for. It gave no comfort from the protection of higher and more mighty beings. Hence it suffered corruptions and changes in nearly every country where it was adopted, and in consequence became divided into numerous sects. In Nepal it lost its atheistic character entirely. Buddhism there has adopted the belief in one supreme, self-existent intelligence, Adi-Buddha, who projects from his own essence five Buddhas, intelligences of the first order, who in turn produce five of the second order, called Bodhisatvas. These inferior divinities are regarded as agents in the hands of the Supreme Deity, and as links which unite him with the lower orders of beings. Probably these features are connected with the previous religion of the country, which was superseded by Buddhism: for it is one peculiarity of this religion, and apparently also a cause of its rapid progress, that it easily allied itself with and adopted parts of those religions with which it came in contact. Thus even in India, its birth-place, it became in some points assimilated with Brahminism.¹ In China it allows the worship of ancestors, and of good and evil spirits. In Thibet, the poorer classes, with the sanction of the Lamas, make offerings to the genii of the rivers, woods, hills, &c.

In China, the only genuine Buddhists are the monks and mendicants. These alone have a common confession of faith, submit to initiatory rites, and form a separate corporation. The great mass of the worshippers of Fō, the Chinese corruption of Buddha, are rather tolerated than approved by the authorities of the sect. They are only expected to acknowledge the general superiority of their religion, to abstain from gross vice, to reverence the sacred writings, relics, statues, &c., and the various Buddhas and Bodhisatvas, and to contribute to the support of the monks, ascetics, devotees, &c. Those who fulfil only these conditions attain a higher sphere of being in the next life, but do not become enlightened. The only worship is paid to the Buddhas, who are popularly regarded as deified, and hence is really man-worship. Temples are very numerous, and filled with images, among which are always three of colossal size, representing Buddhas, to whom different spheres are allotted—one, ruling the world of intellect; a second, the author of joy and happiness in the family circle, who is also deputed to govern the whole earth; and the third and most important, the source of grace, mercy and deliverance. Under the charge of this last is a paradise, of which the most glowing descriptions are given, but totally free from the grossness of those in the Koran. Admission to this paradise is obtained solely by faith and trust in the third of this triad of Buddhas.

The remarkable features of the Buddhism of Thibet are the hierarchy of Lamas, the doctrine of the incarnations of Buddha, the severity of its discipline, the fervour of its moral tone, and the remarkable correspondence of its ritual and life with that of the mediæval Christian Church. The Lamas are very numerous, one at least of each family being devoted to the priesthood. There are also many large communities of nuns; and, owing to the numbers of those who adopt the religious life, they are allowed to work. The supreme, temporal, and spiritual, head of the country is the Grand Lama, who, by a gradual development, has come to be looked on as an incarnation of Buddha, who is ever being born again into the world for the guidance and help of man.² It has been suggested that, as this system was not elaborated till the thirteenth century A.D., the ritual correspondences, which are certainly very striking, are due to the influence of Christian missions. [See Hardwick, Christ and other Masters, ii. app. ii. pp. 214-219.]

It remains briefly to state the strength and weakness of Buddhism as a religion. One of its most important points is its practical character. Its end is the salvation of mankind, or rather of the universe. As a means of attaining this, it preaches the most exalted virtue, and holds up for imitation ideals—the founder and his chief followers—of the loftiest character. It propagates itself only by persuasion, it exhibits the most unbounded charity and toleration. On the other hand, the atheistic and nihilistic character of Buddhism takes from it all the power it might have gained for man's good. There is no hope of future life; no means of expiation for sin; no sanction to its precepts to inspire awe; no beneficent Creator to love; all is dark and drear and gloomy. Hence the many corruptions it has undergone, such as the elevation of Buddha to a god, and the lowering Nirvana into a paradise of pleasures. Hence also the weak hold it has over so many of its professors, so that even the professed religious are often utterly selfish, immoral and contemptible.

BUDNÆANS. One of the parties into which the Antitrinitarians of Poland and Transylvania were divided shortly after their separation from the Reformed Churches in the year 1565, until Faustus Socinus succeeded in uniting them in one heresy. The Budnæans denied the miraculous conception of our Lord, and consequently refused that degree of worship which the Socinians held to be due to Him. Simon Budnæus, their leader, was deposed in 1584 from the ministry, and excommunicated with all his followers. It is said that he afterwards recanted, and was re-admitted into the sect, which had then become Socinian.

BULGARIANS. A name given to the mediæval Catharists, or Albigenses. It is found in the Chronicon Autissiodorense, written in the year 1211, and also in Matthew Paris; and is elsewhere found in the form "Bulgri," "Bogri," and in the French forms "Boulgares," "Boulgres," and "Bougres." The name suggests a migration from Bulgaria, the chief seat of the Bogomiles, and a great home of the Paulicians.

BURGHES. In the year 1746 a discussion arose in the Associate Secession Synod in Scotland respecting the lawfulness of the religious clause of the oath administered to the burgesses of Edinburgh, Perth, Stirling, and Glasgow. The clause was as follows:—"I profess and allow with all my heart the true religion presently professed within this realm, and authorized by the laws thereof; I shall abide at and defend the same to my life's end, renouncing the Roman religion called Papistry." It was maintained by some that for seceders from the Established Kirk to make this declaration was to place themselves at once in a false position; that the oath must be taken in the sense of its imposers; that having forsaken the Kirk on account of the abuses of patronage and the license given to teaching held to be contrary to the Westminster Confession and the other Presbyterian standards, they could not then call the form of religion which was authorized by the laws the true religion, nor declare that they would defend it. It was answered on the other hand by some, amongst whom were the Erskines, that the oath itself spoke only of the true religion professed in Scotland, and not of the faulty human manner of professing and settling it; that it spoke indeed of the religion authorized by the laws, but not of that as authorized, which would have carried a different meaning; that in their various testimonies they had solemnly approved the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the Church of Scotland, and had declared their adherence to their former ordination vows, which pledged them to their maintenance; that their quarrel had been only with the corruptions in Church and State, and not with the true religion professed and authorized in the realm. The defenders of the clause offered for the sake of peace to consent to an act of synod declaring it ineexpedient for Seceders to swear the oath in the present circumstances, viz. the circumstances of controversy as to its precise meaning. Their opponents however would consent to nothing which did not declare the oath to be sinful and inconsistent with their testimony and engagement, and in a meeting of synod on April 9th, 1746, they carried a decision accordingly. Agreement with this decision was then made by the victorious party—now called ANTIBURGHES—a term of communion. They rejected, deposed and excommunicated their Burgher brethren (as the maintainers of the oath were now called), and in the following year two distinct bodies were constituted.

When Brown of Haddington wrote his Historical Account of the Secession, the congregations belonging to the two bodies numbered about 200; they both professed entire agreement with the Presbyterian standards, and were at one on all the articles of faith; but the Antiburghers still professed that their own religion was different from that of the Establishment, because they regarded the constitution of the latter, as authorized by the laws of the realm since the Revolution, as Erastian and founded on the will of the civil magistrate, and consequently still retained their hostility to the Burghers. In both bodies the rise of "free thought" tended to modify the earlier views. Among the Burghers the "rights of conscience," the "right of private judgment and private opinion," began to be put forward, and the power assigned in the standard documents to the civil magistrate for the maintenance of true religion was disputed as incompatible with these rights and with the duty of toleration. The principle of establishments (hitherto warmly maintained) was impugned, and a change was made which limited the assent given at ordination to the old Act and Testimony of the Seceders, to an approval only of its "scope and design," while subsequently, in 1797, a preamble to the Confession of Faith was adopted which disclaimed approbation of any principle therein supposed to favour compulsory measures in religion, and left the nature and kind of the obligation imposed by the Covenants an entirely open question. On September 5th, 1799, an attempt to remove the Preamble was defeated in synod by 91 to 28, and thereupon the Burgher body immediately split into two parties, called respectively (as in the case at the same time of the divided Antiburghers) the Old-Light and the New-Light. On October 2nd the Old-Light minority constituted themselves into a separate Presbytery, and as their number of ministers in settled charges gradually increased to fifteen, they established a Synod in September 1805, under the old name of The Associate Synod. In 1820 the New-Light Burghers united with the New-Light Antiburghers, and took the name of the United Secession, a body which is now represented, since its further union in 1847 with the RELIEF SECESSION, by the United Presbyterian Synod. The Old-Light Burghers retained their separate existence until 1839, when, in consequence of an act which passed the General Assembly on May 25th, by which their ministers and congregations were admitted to full and equal fellowship, they returned to the Established Kirk.

CACANGELICI. The word κακαγγελία as opposed to εὐαγγέλιον, in association with the idea that "the children of the wicked one" [Matt. xiii. 38], and the "angels" of the devil [Matt. xxv. 41; Rev. xii. 9], are heretical and apostate men [Iren. adv. Hær. iv. 41], appears to have suggested this name as that of heretics in general. The designation is not used by Epiphanius or Augustine, as might have been expected, as a play upon the sect of the ANGELICI, and was probably never used of any particular sect, but merely as a polemical term. Thus it is applied to the Lutherans and Calvinists by Hosius, Præteolus, and in Sianda's Lexicon Polemicum.

CADOLAITÆ. A name given to the adherents of the Anti-Pope Honorius III. [A.D. 1061], his name being Cadolaus. [Baronius, Annal. ad ann. 1061.]

CAIANITES. [GAIANITÆ.]

CAINITES. A strange sect of heretics mentioned by Irenæus and all later heresiologists of the patristic ages. Irenæus speaks of them rather as a school among the followers of Valentinus than as a distinct sect, but Tertullian incidentally mentions a distinct "Cainite heresy" in his treatise on Baptism [Tertull. de Bapt. i.], and is usually supposed to refer to them when he writes "Sunt et nunc alii Nicolaitæ; Caiana hæresis dicitur," in the authentic work on heresies which bears his name [Tertull. de Præscript. Hær. xxxiii.], though the reading is disputed. [GAIANA.] Later writers always class them as a separate sect.

The account of the Cainites given by Irenæus is very brief. He says they "declare that Cain derived his being from the Superior Power" of the Valentinian theory, "together with Esau, Korah, and the Sodomites. All such persons they acknowledge as being of their kindred. For this reason, they add, that they have been assailed by the Demiurge, yet none of them had suffered injury, for Sophia always carried off from them to herself that which was hers. They say that Judas the traitor had diligently studied the truth, and that it was because his knowledge of it was in advance of that possessed by all others that he brought about the mystery of the betrayal." He also states that the Cainites possessed an apocryphal gospel which they called the "Gospel of Judas" [Iren. adv. Hær. xxxi.]. Tertullian speaks of "a viper of the Cainite heresy" who had led away a great number of persons in the locality where he was writing, and who had made it her chief aim to oppose the ministration of baptism. For this reason he wrote his treatise on that sacrament [Tertull. de Bapt. i.], but he gives no further indication of the doctrines professed by the Cainites.

The account given of them by Epiphanius does not appear to be founded on any further acquaintance with the heresy than that which might be derived from Irenæus [Epiph. Hær. xxxviii.], and Origen declares that the Cainites were not Christians at all, and that Celsus had classed them as such in ignorance [Orig. contr. Cels. iii. 13]; though it is evident that he himself knew little or nothing about them. But the account of them given by Epiphanius shews that whether they were still existing or not as a separate sect in his time, he believed them to have held some form of those dualistic theories of good and evil which characterized all the Gnostic sects. For, according to him, Cain was regarded by the Cainites as the offspring of Eve by a superior power, and Abel as her offspring by an inferior power. Thus, it is probable, that the philosophy, such as it was, of the sect, set forth the struggle of good and evil under a rationalistic version of the murder of Abel, the two brothers being represented in exactly the opposite light to that in which they are shewn in Holy Scripture [Pseudo-Tertull. adv. Hær. iii.].

It is observable that both St. John and St. Jude bring the name of Cain into their epistles in a way that is consistent with the idea that they were protesting against some misbelief associated with it. St. John declares that Cain was a murderer as being of "that wicked one," not a spiritual seed of the holy Eve [1 John iii. 12]; while St. Jude expressly pronounces a "woe" against some who had gone in "the way of Cain," associating their error with that of Balaam, with the gainsaying of Korah, and with the wickedness of Sodom and Gomorrah [Jude 11-19]. The epistle of St. Jude is expressly written against certain persons "who separate themselves," and there is an unmistakeable likeness between his denunciation of them and the description given of the Cainites by Irenæus.

Probably these heretics were one of those many early sects of Asia Minor which were so adulterated, first with the dualism, and secondly with the licentious theories and practices of Oriental heathenism, that what Christian elements of belief had been originally current among them became all but obliterated in the course of a few years. Such were the SETHITES, the OPHITES, and the NICOLAITANES, with all three of which sects the Cainites are vaguely associated by ancient writers. Their relationship to the Gnostic family of heresies in general is shewn by the statement of Epiphanius respecting their apocryphal book the "Ascension of St. Paul" (Ἀναβατικὸν Παύλου). "They find their pretext for this in what the Apostle says of his having ascended to the third heaven, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter [2 Cor. xii. 2, 4]. These, as they say, are the unspeakable words." Like the Gnostic sects in general they evidently professed to have some special revelation respecting their religion which had not been communicated to other Christians, and their practical antichristianism is very evident.

CAJANISTS. [GAIANITES.]

CALIXTINES. A section of the Hussites who resisted the withdrawal of the cup from the laity of Bohemia in the fifteenth century, and received their name from the "calix," the Latin word for the Eucharistic chalice. They were called also "Utraquists," from the words sub utraque specie.

Huss himself had been willing to conform to the custom of administering the Blessed Sacrament in the form of the bread only, as he held the theory of "concomitance," which makes the virtue of the Presence of Christ to be contained in its integrity in either element. But his follower Jacobellus de Misa refused to administer it except in both kinds, and so general had the opposite custom become, that he is spoken of by the Moravian Apology of 1538 as "Primus omnium communionem utriusque speciei in Bohemia praticare cœpit" [Apolog. veræ Doctrin. in Lydiæ Waldensia, ii. 292, Dort, 1617]. The revival of the ancient practice formed one element in the most bitter and violent contest between the ruling powers in Church and State and the Hussites after the Council of Constance [A.D. 1415] and the execution of Huss and Jerome of Prague. The University of Prague pronounced in favour of the Communion in both kinds, and the Hussites immediately banded together under Nicolas of Hussinecz and John Zisca for armed defence of their practice. Among their number there was a large party of fanatics, who were chiefly the adherents of Zisca, and these acted with great violence and committed inexcusable cruelties in their attack upon Prague [A.D. 1419]. This violence led to a separation of the more moderate Calixtines from the party of Zisca, the former retaining the original name, and the latter being called TABORITES, from Mount Tabor in Bohemia, where they had first gathered their forces together to a Communion in which the cup was administered to a vast multitude.

From this time the Calixtines began to draw

towards the dominant party in the Church. In the year 1421 they made, at Prague, a statement of their wishes which is contained in four articles, as follows:—[1] that the Word of God should be preached freely and without impediment throughout the kingdom of Bohemia. [2] That the Sacrament of the Divine Eucharist should be freely administered in both kinds, that is, under the species of bread and of wine, to all Christians not disqualified by mortal sin, according to the command and institution of the Saviour. [3] That any clergyman engaged in the pursuit of secular power, or of wealth and temporal goods, contrary to the precept of Christ, to the prejudice of his office, and to the injury of the State, should be forbidden such pursuits and made to live according to the Evangelical rule and Apostolic life which Christ lived with His Apostles. [4] That all mortal sins, and particularly public ones, should be properly punished by those to whom the duty of suppressing them belong, and by reason of the law of God. The war still went on for some years with the Taborites, but when the Council of Basle met [A.D. 1433] these four "Articles of Prague" were made the basis of a compact, which was ratified at Iglau. The principal article, that respecting administration of the Holy Sacrament in both kinds, was so far modified and restricted that the priests in Bohemia and Moravia were to be permitted to administer it in that manner; but to those only who, being come to years of discretion, devoutly and reverently desired it; and who heartily acknowledged that either species was by itself "integer et totus Christus."

This compact was assailed over and over again by the Romanizing party, and their attempts were in some degree justified by the violence of the Taborites, with whom the Calixtines had once been so closely allied. Before the time of the Reformation arrived, a large number of them had been gradually reconciled to the Roman usage, while others had coalesced with the Taborites, and become the ancestors of the Moravian Brethren, or "Unitas Fratrum." CALIXTUS. [SYNCRETISTS.]

CALLISTIANS. This name is given to the partisans of Callixtus, bishop of Rome [A.D. 218-223], by Hippolytus, who accuses him of compounding a new heresy from the heresies of Noëtus and Theodotus. The substance of the opinions attributed to him is that which was afterwards called Patripassianism. But the account given of Callixtus by Hippolytus (who was bishop of a suburban see, and resided in Rome) is so mingled with personal invective and bitterness, that there can be little doubt it is exaggerated [Hippol. Refut. Hæc. ix. 2-7]. Callixtus has always been reckoned among the martyrs of the early Roman Church, and the abuse heaped on his memory by his contemporary has the air of being suggested by rivalry and disappointment.

CALVINISTIC METHODISTS. [METHODISTS.]

CALVINISTS. That large body of Protestants in various sects who profess to follow the opinions of Calvin, especially as regards the ministry, the sacraments, and divine grace. During the reign of Queen Elizabeth these opinions were also widely diffused in the Church of England, and when, at a later time, large numbers of the Puritans became dissenters, there still remained many Calvinists among the Low Church party, down even to the present day.

The founder of this school of Protestants, John Calvin, Chauvin, or in a Latinized form, Calvinus, was the son of a notary at Noyon in Picardy [A.D. 1509-1564], and being intended for holy orders received the tonsure at seven years of age from the bishop to whom his father was secretary. Such were the abuses of the times that he was nominated to a chaplaincy in the cathedral of his native town when he was only twelve years of age, to the benefice of Marteville when he was eighteen, and a little later to that of Pont l'Eveque; the last of which he sold in 1534, when his connection with the Huguenots made it impossible for him to hold the sinecure much longer. While Calvin held these benefices he was receiving his education successively at the High School of Paris, and the Universities of Orleans and Bourges, and became distinguished at each for his industry and learning. At Orleans he studied civil law with such success that he was occasionally appointed to supply the place of absent professors, and on leaving Orleans for Bourges the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Law was conferred upon him. At Bourges Calvin continued his studies under Alciati, the first lawyer of the age, but he also turned his attention to theology under the tuition of Melchior Wolmar, one of the reforming party, Professor of Greek and the tutor of Beza. On the death of his father he returned to Paris, where he shortly published a Commentary on Seneca's de Clementia, being then twenty-three years of age. At this time Calvin became known as one of the Huguenot party, and he escaped danger only through the protection of the Queen of Navarre, sister to Francis I. But in 1534 he left his native country altogether, settling first at Basle, and afterwards, when he was twenty-eight years of age [A.D. 1536], at Geneva. Before leaving France he printed a treatise entitled Psychopannychia, against the heresy of the soul's unconsciousness between death and the resurrection. But within a few months afterwards [A.D. 1534-5] he published, first in French and then in Latin, a far more important work, his Institutes of the Christian Religion, which he expanded into a much larger form in a subsequent edition [A.D. 1559], as the exponent of his theological system.

At the time when Calvin first came into notice, Geneva was a hotbed of immorality; and the profligacy of the laity having extended to the bishop and some of the clergy [Ruchat, Hist. de la Reform. de Suisse, ii. 277], the Church had lost all influence. Opposition between clergy and laity was the necessary consequence, and this was stimulated by the visit of an impetuous French Huguenot and doctrinaire named Farel, whose agitation led to tumult and bloodshed which ended in the withdrawal of the bishop from Geneva to Gex in Savoy [A.D. 1534], in the see being then declared vacant by the municipal council, and in the usurpation of the bishop's authority by Farel. It was during the time of Farel's supremacy that Calvin visited Geneva on his way from Italy to Germany, where he was about to take up his residence. Being introduced by a friend to the then chief man of the city the two proved to be such kindred spirits that Calvin was earnestly entreated to support Farel in his project of reformation, and threatened with the vengeance of God if he refused to do so. These persuasions and threats prevailed with Calvin, and he settled down at Geneva as a coadjutor of Farel, and as one of the chief "pastors" of the city [A.D. 1536]. The newly-fledged republicans were at first highly delighted with a divine whose principles were decidedly opposed to Episcopacy, and therefore to the authority which they had recently rejected. But when Calvin attempted a crusade against the wickedness by which he was surrounded they at once revolted, banishing both him and Farel from the city [A.D. 1538].

For three years afterwards Calvin acted as Professor of Theology at Strasburg, and was also pastor to the French congregation. But a fresh turn of affairs at Geneva led to his recall, and he returned there on September 13th, 1541. Thenceforward until his death, twenty-three years later, he was the ruler of Geneva in as absolute a sense as its former bishops had been, and often exercised his authority in the most tyrannical manner. At the same time he never slackened in literary industry, and by this means acquired an influence which extended far beyond Geneva even in his lifetime, and which made him only second, if second, to Luther, as a leader of thought among Protestants after his death.

It was as a leader of thought that Calvin became the founder of a great party, his politico-religious rule at Geneva being dependent chiefly on his personal influence, and, although copied by his followers in Scotland, for a short time (during the supremacy of the Presbyterians) in England, and in New England, never being definitely associated with his name. [PRESBYTERIANS.] Some of his works had become known in England as early as 1542, when there appear in a list of prohibited books, The Lytell Tretyse in Frensche of ye Soper of the Lorde made by Caluwyn, and The Works every one of Caluwyn [Brit. Mag. xxxvi. 395; Burnet's Hist. Reform. iv. 519, Pocock's ed.]. A few years later Cranmer projected a general union of foreign Protestants with the Church of England, and Calvin among others was invited to a conference at Lambeth [Jenkyne's Cranmer's Remains, i. 330, 346]. He did not accept the invitation, but wrote many letters to the Protector Somerset, to Edward VI. (by Cranmer's advice),¹ and to Craumer himself, condemning the Reformation of the Church of England as incomplete, and urging them to carry it further towards the Presbyterian pattern of Geneva [State Pap. v. 9, Edward VI.]; and it appears to have been in some degree through his influence over Somerset, Bucer, Peter Martyr, and John A'Lasco, that the alterations of 1551 were made in the Book of Common Prayer. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth he sent her his Commentary on Isaiah, but the Queen declined to accept the volume in such Tudor language as brought from its author a remonstrance addressed to Sir William Cecil [Zurich Letters, II. 34].

Calvin's influence in England and Scotland was, however, greatly extended by the return of those who had fled from the Marian persecution, and had lived during the greater part of Mary's reign at Frankfort, Zurich and Geneva. John Knox (who had lived in London as Chaplain to Edward VI. from 1549 to 1554) was pastor of a congregation in Geneva from 1556 until 1559, and returned thoroughly impregnated with the spirit and principles of the Genevese leader. Goodman, Bishop Pilkington, Dean Whittingham, Whitaker, and some others, accompanied Knox, and were thus brought under the direct influence of Calvin; while many others, such as Fox the Martyrologist, Bishop Jewel, and Bishop Parkhurst, though not in personal intercourse with him, had their opinions very decidedly moulded by his during their residence abroad. The extraordinary extension of Calvin's influence before the end of the sixteenth century is thus mentioned by Hooker in 1594: "Of what account the Master of the Sentences was in the Church of Rome, the same and more amongst the preachers of Reformed Churches Calvin had purchased; so that the perfectest divines were judged they which were skilfullest in Calvin's writings. His books were almost the very canon to judge both doctrine and discipline by. French churches, both under others abroad and at home in their own country, all cast according to that mould which Calvin made. The Church of Scotland, in erecting the fabric of their Reformation, took the selfsame pattern" [Hooker's Eccl. Polit. pref. ii. 8]. "Do we not daily see," he elsewhere says, "that men are accused of heresy for holding that which the Fathers held, and that they never are clear if they find not somewhat in Calvin to justify themselves?" Archbishop Whitgift himself was strongly imbued with this deference to the Genevan Reformer's authority, and in the original draft of the Lambeth Articles (approved by him but repudiated by the Church) certain expressions were said to be "ad mentem Calvini," though the words were eventually altered to "ad mentem Augustini" [Hardw. on XXXIX. Art. app.]. In the following century Bishop Sanderson wrote: "When I began to set myself to the study of Divinity as my proper business, Calvin's Institutions were recommended to me, as they were generally to all young scholars in those times, as the best and perfectest system of Divinity, and the fittest to be laid as the groundwork in the study of this profession."

The earlier followers of Calvin were principally bent on the substitution of his Presbyterian system for that of Episcopacy; but in the beginning of the seventeenth century Arminius brought into special prominence certain features of Calvinist theology which he opposed as inconsistent with the love of God and the free-will of man. [ARMINIANS.] The condemnation of Arminius by the Synod of Dort gave additional authority to the doctrines which he had controverted [DORT, SYNOD OF]; and since that time the Calvinists have maintained the doctrines of election, predestination, and irresistible grace as the distinguishing points of their system; many of them being as tenacious for Episcopacy as others are for Presbyterianism. According to these doctrines God has decreed from eternity the salvation of some men, who are called the "elect," and the everlasting perdition of others. Both the elect and non-elect come into the world in a state of total depravity and alienation from God, and can, of themselves, do nothing but sin. His grace, however, seizes hold of the elect, and, by an irresistible power works out their salvation, bringing them into such a condition that their final perseverance in holiness is certain, and they cannot finally fall or be lost. Thus the elect are saved without any will or work of their own. On the other hand, the non-elect or reprobate can by no means whatever attain to salvation, and must be eternally lost, not because they have made themselves worthy of perdition by their sins, but because God has so decreed in excluding them from the number of the elect. "We assert," says Calvin, "that by an eternal and unchangeable decree God hath determined whom He shall one day permit to have a share in eternal felicity, and whom He shall doom to destruction. In respect of the elect the decree is founded in His unmerited mercy, without any regard to human worthiness; but those whom He delivers up to damnation are, by a just and irreprehensible judgment, excluded from all access to eternal life" [Calvin, Inst. III. ii. 11]. From the doctrine of "Election" follows that of "Particular Redemption," i.e. that Christ died only for the elect and not for all men. A full statement of these dreadful opinions may be found in the Confession of Faith set forth by the Westminster Assembly of Divines [A.D. 1643], which is still the authoritative Confession of the Kirk of Scotland, and is recognised as more or less authoritative by all Calvinistic sects. Great controversies have arisen among Calvinists respecting the Divine decrees, and they are divided into two parties, the one holding that those imagined decrees were positively issued, and thus "absolute," the other that they were only God's foresight of the Fall. Whitfield also separated from Wesley on account of the determined opposition which the latter offered to the Calvinism of the former. In the present day the number bury has assured me that I can do nothing more useful than to write frequently to the King; this affords me much greater delight than if I had received a present of a large sum of money" [Gorham's Reform. Gleanings, 267].

CALVINO-PAPISTÆ. A name given by the Puritans to those Churchmen whose admiration of Calvin prompted them to consider the Church of England and its formularies as Calvinistic. [Stapleton, Promptuar. Cathol. i. 285; iii. 116. Sianda, Lexic. Polem. iii. 627, s. v. "Puritani."]

CAMERONIANS, or SOCIETY PEOPLE. Names given to a party formed among the Scotch Covenanters in the reign of Charles II. Upon the publication of the Indulgences in 1669 and 1672, which permitted Nonconforming ministers to return to their parishes upon certain easy conditions, specially that they should not publicly speak against the royal supremacy, a division of opinion ensued amongst those to whom these Indulgences were offered. Some accepted the proffered toleration; others rejected it as involving a sinful compliance with Erastianism and Prelacy. After the battle of Bothwell Bridge the latter formed, under the leadership of Richard Cameron and Donald Cargill, a distinct party, which claimed to represent, with the most uncompromising rigour and intolerant bitterness, the true principles and spirit of the original framers of the Covenant. In a statement of principles (called the "Queensferry Paper" from the place of its discovery), which was intended as the outline of a Declaration, they disowned monarchy, and avowed their intention to set up some other government in accordance with the Word of God; and in a declaration publicly read at Sanquhar on 22nd June 1680, they openly declared war against the King and all who acknowledged his authority. Cameron was killed in a skirmish at Airdsmoss on the 22nd of the following month, and Cargill, after solemnly excommunicating the King, was apprehended and executed at Edinburgh on July 27th, 1681. They were succeeded in the leadership of the party, first by James Renwick, who was executed at Edinburgh, February 17th, 1688, for, in his own words, "disowning the usurpation and tyranny of James, Duke of York," and maintaining the lawfulness of defending their meetings by force of arms, &c., and afterwards by Alexander Shields. Upon the Revolution¹ the three ministers who had adhered to the Cameronians, Shields, Thomas Linning, and William Boyd, were admitted as ministers of the Established Kirk, but because the General Assembly did not at that time expressly renew the Solemn League and Covenant, their people refused to follow them, and remained for some years without a minister.

At length Mr. John Macmillan, who was expelled from the Kirk in 1703, for refusing to take, and preaching against, the oath of allegiance, and for intruding himself into the parishes of others, became their leader. With him a few others became associated, particularly Mr. John Hepburn, who had been at first suspended for similar practices, restored in 1699, and finally deposed in 1705.² The union of the two kingdoms was particularly offensive to the Cameronians from the absence in the Act of any recognition of the Covenant (which absence they regarded as invalidating the authority of the civil magistrates), and also because by it Episcopacy was allowed and perpetuated as the established form of Church government in England, for the religion of which country the rigid Presbyterians wished to legislate as well as for their own. To such an extreme of indignation did the fanaticism of the Cameronians lead them, that, through the agency of Ker of Kersland, they entered into negotiations with the exiled Chevalier, were hardly restrained from at once-taking arms, and, had the abortive expedition from France in 1708 actually landed in Scotland, would have been found united heartily for the time with Episcopalian and Roman Catholic Jacobites.³ In 1743, Macmillan, together with only one other minister, Mr. Thomas Nairn (who had been expelled from the Secession body for maintaining that none but a covenanted Presbyterian could be the lawful sovereign of these realms), established the Reformed Presbytery, and organized a distinct body, to which small accessions from time to time accrued.

Under the name of Reformed Presbyterians the society still exists, claiming to be the representative of the old Covenanters in maintaining the Solemn League and Covenant as one of the standards, and still deploring the constitution of Church and State as established in both kingdoms at the Revolution of 1688 and at the Union. In accordance with these views it is, by the formal Act of Testimony, forbidden to the members to take the oath of allegiance or to exercise the franchise in elections for Parliament, because the persons so elected have themselves to take that oath. This prohibition had of late been frequently disregarded, though while some kirk-sessions had at times suspended or cut off offenders, the presbytery or synod had never upon appeal confirmed the sentence; but upon the rise of the Volunteer movement in 1860 the question of the oath assumed fresh prominence. Some sessions attempted to prevent their kirk members from becoming volunteers; the case was thereupon referred to the synod in 1862, which in 1863 enacted by a large majority, in accordance with previous practice, that, "while recommending the members of the Church to abstain from the use of the franchise and from taking the oath of allegiance, discipline to the effect of suspension and expulsion from the Church shall cease." Three ministers and eight elders, however, immediately protested against this formal abandonment, as they regarded it, of fundamental principles, withdrew from the synod, and formed another body under the same name, which has since then somewhat increased in numbers. There are therefore at the present time two distinct bodies in Scotland bearing the same name of "Reformed Presbyterians." The larger body numbers forty-five congregations and maintains six missionaries in the New Hebrides; the smaller (being the secession of 1863) has eleven congregations. At the census in 1851 the united body had thirty-nine places of worship. Branches of the Reformed Presbytery are found in Ireland and in America, and in both of these branches divisions took place earlier than in Scotland, on the same general grounds of modification of administrative rules and the application of fundamental principles to the varying circumstances of the times. Consequently the two Scottish bodies find themselves supported alike in their later controversy by distinct Irish and American synods. The larger body in Ireland has at present about thirty-three congregations, with a branch presbytery in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and the smaller has seven congregations. CAMERONITES. A school of French Protestants taking their name from John Cameron, a native of Glasgow, who emigrated to France in the beginning of the seventeenth century. He was a man of learning, and became a Professor of Theology among the Protestants at Sedan, Saumur, and Montauban. At Saumur he originated opinions afterwards taken up by Moses Amyraut [AMYRALDISTS], and which had for their object the reconciliation of the Calvinist and the Arminian doctrines respecting the Divine decrees. The substance of these opinions was that God wills the salvation of all men, and not of the elect only, that none are excluded from the possibility of salvation, and that those are saved who co-operate with God by using the power of judging between good and evil which He infuses into their understanding for the choice of good. This mitigated form of Calvinism was condemned by the Ultra-Calvinist Synod of Dort [A.D. 1518], and Cameron returned to Scotland to become for one year Professor of Theology in the University of Glasgow. He afterwards returned to Montauban, where he died, at the age of forty-five, in 1625. His Theological Lectures were published immediately after his death, and his collected works in a folio Latin volume, printed at Geneva in 1658.

² Among the articles presented against him in the General Assembly, and which he admitted, it was objected that for sixteen years he had neither administered nor received the Holy Communion lest he should be a fellow-partaker with unworthy recipients! A story is told by Boston, whose parish Macmillan visited, that one of the followers of the latter understood by the Solemn League and Covenant no other than the "Covenant sealed with Christ's blood" [Boston's Memoirs, Edinb. 1776, p. 226].

CAMISARDS. A name given to the French Calvinists of the Cevennes who rose to resist the tyranny of Louis XIV. after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The name is said to have been given them because of the camisole or blouse which they commonly wore; others say that it arose from their wearing a white shirt, or camise, to disguise themselves in their night attacks; and others derive the word from "camis," a road-runner. The fanatics to whom it was applied never called themselves by any other name than the Children of God (les Enfants de Dieu).

From the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685, a cruel and systematic persecution had raged against the Protestants of the South of France. Monks and priests, supported by large bodies of troops, were sent into the suspected districts, to convert by force all who were not "of the king's religion." The secret meetings for worship, which were held by night in woods, caves, and the hollows of the mountains, were attacked and dispersed with much barbarity. Hundreds of Protestants went to the scaffold in Montpellier and Nismes. The rack, the wheel, and the stake were unsparingly used to put an end to those "Assemblies of the Desert," as they were called, in which the peasantry strove to maintain their religious freedom. The Intendant Lamvignon de Baille held the country with forty thousand troops and militia, and opened the mountains by above a hundred new roads. His soldiers surprised the assemblies of Anduze and Vigan, and put nearly all who were present to the sword. By the express command of Luvois, the Minister of War, it was attempted to get rid of the whole Protestant population of Languedoc and Dauphiné, amounting to near half a million, by extermination or deportation. These severities are known by the name of the Dragonnades. After the peace of Ryswick, in 1697, they were redoubled, and seemed on the point of succeeding, when the fanatic and cruel vengeance which the Camisards perpetrated against the Abbé du Cheylu, one of the bitterest of the persecutors, gave the signal for a general insurrection. Du Cheylu was inspector of the mission for the conversion of the Huguenots, and the supposed instigator of the cruelties of De Baille. He had imprisoned in his house at Pont de Montvert a band of fugitives whom he had caught making their way to Geneva. It was resolved at a meeting in the Desert to rescue these prisoners. The house was surrounded in the night by the armed peasants under their leader Pierre Ségner, a notorious seditious preacher and one of their pretended prophets. It was set on fire, and Du Cheylu was put to death with great violence and barbarity. From that night for three years, 1702 to 1705, the mountainous district of the Cevennes was the theatre of a revolt which baffled the efforts of the generals of Louis, maintained itself against overwhelming numbers and the most bloody rigour, and was at last subdued more by policy than by arms.

After this first success Ségner descended from the mountains, in the words of the Cevenol historians, "like the storm out of the clond," and executed on the Catholics of the plain of Nîmes a wild vengeance, which he called the judgment of God. He was however soon defeated, taken, and burnt alive at Pont de Montvert, the scene of his first triumph. Laporte, a veteran soldier, succeeded him as leader, styling himself "Colonel of the Children of God." Around him was gathered a number of chiefs of various character, and often of the lowest origin, who afterwards became famous in the annals of the Cevennes. Among these may be named Castinat, Catinat, Salomon, Cavalier, Rastelet, and Ravenal. An indecisive battle was fought at Champ Domergue, between the Camisards and the royalist troops under Captain Paul. Shortly afterwards Laporte was surprised and slain. His nephew Roland was unanimously raised to the chief command, and soon shewed himself the most capable leader who had yet appeared. Under him the insurrection took the shape of an organized revolt; the country was divided into military districts, each under a subordinate chief, and magazines of arms were laid up in the caves of the mountains. Roland took the title of "General of the Troops of the French Protestants assembled in the Cevennes." He was a man of politic and far-reaching mind; superior to the rest of the Cevenol leaders in intelligence, while he was their equal in religious enthusiasm. His chief associate was the young and brilliant Cavalier, originally a baker; who by his military talents nearly ensured the triumph of the revolt, and by his desertion caused its ruin. Innumerable skirmishes only added to the strength and boldness of the insurgents; and in 1703 Marshal Montrevel was sent with a powerful army to the seat of war. He defeated the Camisards in two pitched battles at Vagnas and Pompignan, but without subduing them. At the head of sixty thousand men he swept the country, committing the most horrible cruelties. Thirty-two parishes were entirely desolated, and nearly five hundred villages destroyed. On one occasion, three hundred people were burnt alive in a mill where they had assembled for worship. The reprisals of the Camisards doubled these atrocities, and the country was reduced to a desert.

Next year the Camisards opened the campaign by gaining their two greatest victories, that of Martinargues under Cavalier, and of the Bridge of Salindres under Roland. But these successes were instantly counterbalanced by the severe defeat of Cavalier at Nages, and of Roland at Brenoux; and the victors of an hour before suddenly saw themselves reduced to extremities. Meanwhile Montrevel had been succeeded by Marshal Villars, who adopted a more humane and conciliatory policy, offering a free pardon to all who would lay down their arms, and professing the warmest admiration of the Cevenol leaders, especially Cavalier. Twenty thousand men had fallen in the last year of the war, and the country was completely exhausted. Nevertheless the indomitable Roland was preparing to renew the struggle, and refused to listen to any overtures.

But Cavalier was won over by his courtly antagonist, and declared himself anxious for peace, provided that his religion were respected. Conferences and negotiations followed between him and the royalist captains, and the result was that the terms offered were rejected by the other Cevenol leaders, who would be satisfied with nothing short of absolute religious liberty; but Cavalier was detached from the cause, and the greater part of the country was reclaimed by the generous policy of Villars. After this further resistance was hopeless. Roland died in battle, refusing all compromise to the last, and the insurrection did not long survive him. The bands were dispersed, and the leaders banished. In the summer of 1705 Villars returned in triumph to Versailles. One or two attempts were made to renew the struggle by Castinat, Catinat, Salomon, Ravenal, and other chieftains, who stole back from exile; but they were put down with terrible severity. Castinat and Salomon were broken alive on the wheel at Montpellier; Catinat and Ravenal were burnt alive at Nîmes. Cavalier entered the English service, fought with desperate valour at Almanza, became Governor of Jersey, and died in 1740.

The cause of the revolt of the Cevennes was barbarous tyranny. But its animating spirit from first to last was not rational resistance, but the wildest superstition; and in this it stands apart from all the popular movements in favour of religious freedom which took place in the same age. The "Children of God" believed themselves to be under the direct influence of the Spirit of prophecy. They chose their leaders for their spiritual gifts, not for their warlike skill, and marched forth to conquer or die "for the eternal." At their nocturnal meetings sights and sounds were never wanting, which their excited fancy proclaimed to be supernatural. They had a complete system of spiritual gifts and grades; innumerable prophets arose among them; ecstasies and trances were frequent, and the wildest utterances that could be prompted by misery, distress, and privation, were regarded as the teachings of the Spirit. Something of the mystic was displayed in the character of the most politic of their chiefs. Ségnier was moved by a vision to that attack on Du Cheylu which was the outbreak of the insurrection. Roland professed the gift of supreme inspiration. Cavalier was accompanied in the field by a prophetess of gigantic stature.

The supernatural gifts to which these fanatics laid claim in England (where, as in Holland and Germany, they were known as the "French Prophets"), are indicated by the following letter:—"Dear Sir,—I spake with Sr. R. Bulkeley yesterday, who solemnly affirms that there is a gift of languages among them, and that specimens will be printed; and that they shall speedily have the gift of healing. I would desire you to refrain printing anything against them for a while; for if these (truly miraculous) are manifest, they will demand an awful Regard. I called at your House yesterday to have spoken with you, who am, Sir, yr. affectionate Bro'r, J. W. July 11, 1717. To the Reverend Dr. Kennett, This" [Lansd. MS. 938, f. 39]. They desired to join the Moravian Brethren, but were repelled, chiefly on account of the hideous circumstances which attended their pretended inspirations. In England they sought in vain to join the Methodists; Wesley pronounced them to be a set of enthusiasts, whose imaginary inspirations "contradicted the law and the testimony."

CAMPBELLITES, or ROWITES. In the year 1830, the Rev. John McLeod Campbell, Minister of Row, Dumbartonshire, was condemned by the Presbytery of Dumbarton for teaching: [1] the universality of the Atonement; i.e. that Christ died for all men, and not for the elect only; [2] that God so far has pardoned all men as to make past sin no longer any barrier to the returning to God's love and favour; [3] that personal assurance is of the essence of faith, in the sense that in believing the Gospel there is necessarily present in the mind of the believer the certainty that he is (according to the views stated in the preceding articles) the object of God's love, that he has the remission of sins, the gift of the Spirit, and all things pertaining to life and godliness, bestowed by the free grace of God. On an appeal to the Synod of Glasgow and Ayr, the question was remitted by them to the General Assembly, by sentence of which body Mr. Campbell was deposed on May 24th, 1831, from the ministry of the Established Church of Scotland. The judgment could hardly have been other than it was; for the opinions of Mr. Campbell were plainly contradictory, in some respects to the Calvinistic standards of the Kirk, however agreeable to Holy Scripture. Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Campbell subsequently established a congregation in Glasgow, and (without on his own part ever formally seceding from the Kirk of Scotland) officiated as its minister from 1833 until 1859. In the census report of 1851, eleven persons were returned as having attended the place of worship of the "Campbellites" on the morning of the census Sunday, and fourteen in the afternoon. Dr. Campbell's views have lately attracted considerable notice in consequence of his work on the Nature of the Atonement [1856, 3rd ed. 1869], in which the Incarnation being regarded as the principal means of man's redemption and restoration, the humanity and life of our Lord are represented as themselves the Atonement, in which we share by fellowship with Christ. The death of Christ is considered as an offering to the Father in Christ's character of man's representative, of a confession of human sin and of sorrow for sin; while exhibiting at the same time a perfect sinless obedience and faith, the obedience "even unto death." Dr. Campbell's work is written in a style far from clear or attractive, and is very diffuse; but its general aim is to represent the At-one-ment as wrought out in the love exhibited by the whole of our blessed Lord's life, and not in any sense as consisting in a vicarious satisfaction of justice by His death. Dr. Campbell died at Roseneath, Argyllshire, February 27th, 1872.

CAMPBELLITES, AMERICAN. A sect of American Baptists known also as "Reformed Baptists," and "Reformers." They originated with an Irish preacher of the Presbyterian Seceders named Thomas Campbell, who emigrated to America from the North of Ireland, and settled in Washington county, Pennsylvania, at the beginning of the present century. Campbell, and his son Alexander Campbell, who had been educated at Glasgow, originated a movement for the promotion of unity on the plan of ignoring all creeds, confessions of faith, and formularies, and admitting persons to a communion in which the only test should be a satisfactory reply to the question "What is the meritorious cause of the sinner's acceptance with God?" The first place of worship built for this new communion was at Brush Run, and was opened on September 7th, 1810, with the two Campbells for its joint pastors. This pattern of dogmatic simplicity and primitive unity was, however, immediately divided into Pædobaptists and Anti-Pædobaptists, and the former separating off in the year 1812 the Campbells and their adherents were all re-baptized by immersion, and were received into the local Baptist community as members of that body. Still continuing their endeavours to promote union, the Campbells aroused the jealousy of the Baptists, and the younger of the two, Alexander, with about thirty of their adherents, departed from Brush Run in 1828 to form a new community at Wellsburg in Virginia, where they called themselves the "Mahoning Association," and established the separate congregations of which it was formed on the original footing of "unsectarianism." The Baptists again opposed Campbell, and he finally separated from them, re-forming his congregations on Independent or Congregational principles, and calling his followers "The Disciples" or "Disciples of Christ." On assuming this independent position the Campbellite sect began to extend itself largely, and they now number many congregations in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Virginia. A few are to be found in British North America and in England. Their present sectarian position is that of the Independents, plus baptism by immersion as an essential requirement for admission to their body.

CAMPITÆ. A name given to the small Donatist congregation at Rome, in allusion to their being driven to the plains outside the city for the purpose of carrying out unmolested their religious rites and ceremonies.

CANISTÆ. A sect of heretics of this name is mentioned by Theodoret [Hæc. fab. i. 1], and by Clement of Alexandria [Strom. vii. 549]. Danæus, in his introduction to St. Augustine's work on heresies, suggests that they were so named "a caninis et turpissimis moribus," but Ittigius considers that "Canistæ" is only a misreading for "Cainistæ," and that the CAINITES are the heretics referred to. It may, however, be remarked that St. Augustine speaks of the Cynics as "illi canini philosophi" [Aug. de Civit. Dei, xiv. 20. Cf. Hippol. Refut. iv. 48].

CAPHARNAÏTES. A controversial designation sometimes applied to those who—from John vi. 52, 59—hold the doctrine of Transubstantiation in a gross and material form.

CAPUTIATI. A fanatic sect of the twelfth century which caused much excitement in Burgundy and Auxerre, and was suppressed by troops led by the bishop of the latter diocese. They began, about A.D. 1182, to proclaim universal liberty and equality. They derived their name from caps in which they wore as a badge a leaden image of the Blessed Virgin, under whose patronage they professed to be acting. [Schroëckh's Kirchengesch. xxix. 636. Le Bœuf, Mémoires sur l'Histoire d'Auxerre, i. 317.]

CARAITES. [KARAÏTES.]

CARLSTADT. [ABECEDARIANS.]

CARPOCRATIANS. A branch of Gnostics who derived their doctrine from Carpocrates of Alexandria, one of the very earliest teachers of heresy. His name appears thus in Irenæus, Eusebius, and the majority of writers; but by Epiphanius and Philaster he is called Carpocras. This form is adopted by Baronius, who writes "Carpocras, fæx omnium hæreticorum, fæx totius continentiæ." His followers are called Carpocrasii by Epiphanius, Carpocrateni by Nicetas, Carpocratiani by Augustine and most others. The date assigned to the birth of Carpocrates has not been given; and writers are divided as to the exact time when his sect took definite form; but all agree in placing it in the former half of the second century, some as early as the year 120. Eusebius says he was a contemporary of Basilides in the time of Adrian. Some details of his life have been preserved. His wife was Alexandria of Cephallenia, and his son Epiphanes, who died young, but not before he had written a book entitled De Justitiâ, a few fragments of which are extant in Clemens Alexandrinus [Strom. iii. 430, and elsewhere].

These sectarians called themselves Gnostics. In most respects the teaching of their founder coincides with that of Basilides. [BASILIDIANS.] He held there was one principal Virtue from whom proceeded all other virtues and angels, who founded this world; that Jesus Christ was not born of a Virgin, but a man truly born of the seed of Joseph, though better than other men in integrity of life. He was endowed with a more robust soul; virtue was given Him by the Great First Cause, whereby He retained the recollection of things seen in a former state of existence; and being thus strengthened with the memory of things divine, He could escape the control of the angels, the founders of the world, and through the agency of this inherent virtue or power discharged the debt of nature, and so went to the Father. Metempsychosis and the pre-existence of the soul was an integral part of the system. In a former state, he maintained, the soul could not attain the height of perfection, except it overthrew the yoke of the angels, and so became eligible for the liberty of heaven. Thus bad deeds as well as good were necessarily wrought in pursuance of this idea. An extraordinary interpretation of our Lord's parable in Matthew v. 25, 26 was advanced to support this position. The adversary there (whom he named Abolus) is one of the angels who made the world and has the special charge of taking souls to judgment; being there convicted of not having done everything, ἐλεγχόμενος μὴ ποιησάρας πάντα ἔργασιαν, they are delivered to a minister, and put again into another body to work out their admission to heaven. "Prison" is the body; the "last farthing" is the migration of the soul, which must go through every experience, so that no kind of deed is left undone. It is remarkable how exactly this corresponds to the Platonic view. The office of leading souls to judgment is given by Pythagoras to Mercury [see also Hor. Carm. i. 10]. Faith and charity alone were necessary virtues; all others were useless. There is nothing evil in nature except as men think it; and this life becomes consummated to no one until all those blemishes which are held to disfigure it have been fully displayed in its conduct. [Epiphanius, adv. Hæres. i. 2, 27. Irenæus, contra Hæres. i. 25; and Massuet's Dissertationes Præviae. Augustine, de Hæresibus, vii. Tertullian, De Præscr. 48; de Anima, 23, 35.]

It is manifest that, without some corrective, this system appears to encourage sin [Mosheim, i. 199]: and hence the earlier writers do not hesitate to speak of the heresy in the bitterest terms. Carpocrates, "docebat omnem turpem operationem, omnemque adinventionem peccati," says Augustine. Lardner denies that the founders countenanced any of the grosser impurities which are specifically charged upon their followers, but that their principles led to them is clear; and the whole body of Christians suffered from the bad name acquired by the Carpocratians.

The resurrection of the body was of course rejected by them. It does not appear that they formally renounced any of the New Testament. They are however named by Jerome [adv. Luciferianos, 22] among the heretics who mutilated the Gospels, "qui Evangelia laniaverunt." The idea of a special grant of power, as it were, induced the belief that the career of Jesus might be achieved by any man who had strength to despise the angels, and by the excellences of knowledge, as well as accumulation of work, arrive at the unknown Father. Hence too they boasted themselves not only equal to the Apostles, but qualified to rival, if not to excel, the Saviour Himself. Irenæus charges them with magical superstitions, "incantationes, philtra quoque et charitesia, et paredros, et oniropompos, et reliquas malignationes." They are said also to have branded their followers with a hot iron "in posterioribus partibus exstantiæ dextræ auris."

The spread of the heresy in the East was more rapid than in the West. It is said to have been first brought to Rome [A.D. 160] by Marcellina. From the importance attached to Epiphaneus, although dying at the age of seventeen, it is thought that Carpocrates must have died before him: for a temple is even said to have been erected to him at Cephallene and worship paid to him [Clem. Alex. Strom. 3]. Marcellina adored indiscriminately images of Christ, Paul, and Pythagoras. Many sects known by different names are allied to the Carpocratians, and distinguished from them only in some one tenet. Some of these are named by Baronius [anno 120, xli.] References to modern writers are given by Lardner and Mosheim. Great weight was attached by this sect, as countenancing a migration of the soul, to the example of Elias [Matt. xvii. 12], suppressing the obvious answer that John Baptist came not in the person but in the spirit and power of Elias. The second Epistle of St. Peter, and that of St. Jude, are thought to have been directed against the first appearance of the unsound views which developed into this heresy. Philaster [de Hæres. 57] speaks of Floriani, a variety of this sect, composed mainly of military men. The notes of Fabricius and Galeardus on this author, given by Migne [Patrolog. xii. 1151, 1171], contain many references to other sources. The sect survived, but without great influence, until the sixth century.

CARTESIANS. [DESCARTES.]

CATABAPTISTS. [ANABAPTISTS.]

CATÆSCHINETANS [οἱ κατ' Αἰσχίνην]. A sect of Montanists who were followers of Æschines, an empiric of Athens in the second century. The writer who supplemented Tertullian De Præscriptione hæreticorum with the work Adversus omnes Hæreticos says, that the particular point in which they differed from the common blasphemy of the Cataphrygians was that they affirmed Christ to be Himself Son and Father in one [Tertull. adv. omn. Hæres. vii.]. Ittigius also says that they distinguished between the Holy Spirit and the Paraclete, identifying the former with the Person who inspired the Apostles, and the latter with Montanus. [Ittig. de Hæres. 243.]

CATANI. [CAINITES.]

CATAPHRYGIANS. [MONTANISTS.]

CATAPROCLIANISTS. [PROCLIANISTS.]

CATHARI. [NOVATIANS.]

CATHARI. This name was that by which the ALBIGENSES were chiefly known in their earlier days. They are also frequently so called by later ecclesiastical historians.

CATHARISTÆ. A local name for the Manichees. [Aug. Hæc. xlv.]

CATHOLIC AND APOSTOLIC CHURCH. [IRVINGITES.]

CATROPITES. [CIRCUMCELLIONS.]

CAUCAUBARDITES. A branch of the Eutychian heretics belonging to the sixth century, who took their name from the place where they held their first assemblies. They followed the party of Severus of Antioch and the Acephali, rejecting the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon. [Nicephor. Hist. Eccl. xviii. 49. Baron. Annal. ad ann. 335.]

CELESTIAL PROPHETS. A name given to or assumed by the early Anabaptists, or ΖΩΙΚΑΥ PROPHETS. [Hosius, de Orig. Hæc. nostri temp., 1559.]

CELESTIANS. An alternative name frequently met with for the Pelagians [Aug. de Hæres. lxxxviii.; Prædest. lxxxviii.], more commonly used in the East than the West. Cælestius was studying at Rome when Pelagius arrived there from Britain early in the fifth century, and accompanied him to Africa [A.D. 410-11] after the sack of Rome by the Goths. It is not known whether he was an Italian by birth or an Irishman; the latter view is based on an expression of St. Jerome [in Jerem. iv.] which the context permits to be referred to either Pelagius or Cælestius. His contemporary Marius Mercator further adds, that he was of noble birth, and of some weight at the bar, where he was employed in pleading the causes of cities or communities before the higher tribunals [nobilis natu, auditorialis scholasticus, naturæ vitio eunuchus. Commun. ad Lect. p. 30, ed. Garnier]. Much later fables trace his descent from a Gaelic chieftain in the wilds of Erin, or assert that his father was a certain Solomon, duke of Cornwall [Walch. Hist. Ketz. vol. iv. p. 506]. One more fact relating to his early life is preserved by Gennadius: While still a youth, before he had embraced the doctrines of Pelagius, he wrote three epistles, De Monasterio, to his parents, of the size of little books, possibly explanatory of his change from secular to monastic life, which contained no symptoms of the errors afterwards disclosed, but everything which could excite to virtue [de Viris Illustribus, cap. 44]. On reaching Africa [A.D. 411] he applied for priest's orders, but was publicly challenged by Paulinus, a deacon of Milan, and the biographer of St. Ambrose, with having taught various false doctrines, especially the four subjoined: [1] that Adam was created mortal, and that whether he sinned or not he would have died; [2] that the sin of Adam hurt himself only and not mankind; [3] that infants new born are in the same state that Adam was before his fall; [4] that a man may be without sin and keep the commandments easily if he will. Cælestius returned an evasive answer to these accusations, and was condemned by a council at Carthage [A.D. 412], presided over by Aurelius, bishop of that city, the first of twenty-four councils in connection with the Pelagian controversy [A.D. 412-431]. He then left Africa, saying that he would appeal to Rome, but it is doubtful whether he ever carried out his intention, because he is next found in Sicily, where he is said to have broached some very strange views,¹ and a little later on at Ephesus, where he succeeded in being ordained priest. A few years later [A.D. 416] he went to Constantinople, where Atticus its bishop would receive neither him nor his doctrine, so that after a very short stay he travelled to Rome [A.D. 417], and there at first met with a favourable reception from Zosimus, who had just succeeded Innocent I., and who, in spite of a warning letter from Paulinus, was pleased by the deference shewn by Cælestius to the papal see. When he asked him whether "he would renounce all those tenets objected to him formerly by the deacon Paulinus, and could give his assent to the letters of the apostolic see, which had been written by his predecessor of holy memory, he refused to renounce the articles objected by the deacon, but he did not dare to oppose the letters of the holy Pope Innocent, and he promised to renounce all things which that see did renounce." But the letters which hereupon Zosimus wrote in his favour, and the summons to all accusers to substantiate their accusations, were ignored by the various African synods, and when their indignant replies reached Rome, Cælestius was formally cited to appear again before the Pope; when, probably foreseeing that his cause was hopeless, instead of responding to the citation he disappeared from Rome; and a sentence of excommunication presently followed from the ecclesiastical, and a sentence of banishment from the civil court. His subsequent history is obscure; he wandered about in the East without being able anywhere to establish his views, which were condemned at synods in all parts of Europe, at St. Alban's [A.D. 429], at Rome [A.D. 430], at the General Council of Ephesus [A.D. 431]. After this he is said to have retired to the monastery at Lerins, thence to Sicily, where his death occurred within a few years, although the exact date is unknown. [PELAGIANISM.]

CELLITES. [LULLARDS.]

CERDONIANS. A sect that derived its name from Cerdon, or Cerdo, a Syrian Gnostic, who slightly varied the ordinary teaching of Simon Magus and Saturninus. His first appearance at Rome is assigned to the year 141; but he is mentioned by some as early as 125, and by others as late as 155. He was teacher of Marcion, and associated with him at Rome in the publication of his special views. We are told by Irenæus, in a passage where a fragment of the original Greek is extant, that Cerdon confessed his errors, but again relapsed into open heresy, or secret teaching of it, and that this happened more than once, so that at last he separated himself from the communion of the faithful [Iren. contra Hæc. iii. 4]. The word used by Irenæus, ἀποστράμενος, does not necessarily convey that he was ejected from the Church, as some have rendered it, but rather that he anticipated such an expulsion, as Valesius interprets it, by a voluntary secession. Epiphanius considers him a successor in heresy to Heracleon. Of his death there is no record.

He appears in the main to have adopted the principles of Simon Magus and Saturninus, but to have detached himself from them on the great question of the day, the existence of evil. He held that there were two first causes, one good, one evil; that one was not subject or inferior to the other. He maintained a distinct duality in the Supreme Being, which Bardesanes, whose difficulties were similar to those of Cerdon, had hesitated to affirm. [BARDESANISMS.] The moral code of the Jews proceeded from the malevolent spirit, that of the Christians from the beneficent one. The evil principle was known to men as the Creator of the world, revealed by the law and the prophets; the good principle was the unknown Father of Jesus Christ. The later followers of this heresy, Marcionites and others, separated the Creator of the world from the Supreme Being, and assigned Him an intermediate place between the good and bad first cause. Cerdon denied also the Incarnation; maintained that the Saviour was clothed with the appearance of flesh; that His sufferings were not real, since he was unable to account for such a passion on the supposition that it was allowed by a being infinitely good. Tertullian [adv. Marcionem, 2] compares Cerdon and his followers, in their inability to see one God clearly, to the blear-eyed, to whom one lamp appears manifold. Cerdon thus varied from those branches of the Gnostic heresy which held that the Saviour descended in the flesh from Heaven. He denied, of course, the resurrection of the body.

He rejected the whole of the Old Testament; of the Gospels, accepted only that of St. Luke, and that in part only; he acknowledged parts of some of St. Paul's Epistles, but altogether rejected the Acts of the Apostles, and the Apocalypse. Origen [contra Hæc. x. 19] accuses Cerdon of holding three first causes, ἀγαθόν, δίκαιον, ὕλην and says his disciples added a fourth, πονηρόν. His position that the world was created by an evil principle necessitated a rejection of pleasure; virginity therefore in his system was highly commended, and matrimony despised. No writings have been attributed to him.

The name Cerdonians, as a distinct sect, did not long survive, and, except the treatise of Epiphanius against them, their tenets are only disproved in writings against the Marcionites.

CERINTHIANS. The Cerinthians were the earliest Gnostics of the Judæo-Christian Church. Their Judaism was that which refused obedience to the Jerusalem decree regarding circumcision; their Gnosticism included the essential principles of that system, though it was not yet drawn out into a long detail of emanations. Thus they held the doctrine of an inferior Demiurge, and of a Christ or Power of God descending upon a man Jesus to form Jesus Christ. Cerinthus stands at the head of those who, being within the Church, adopted Gnosticism, as Simon Magus stands at the head of those who, being without the Church, added to their Gnosticism more or less of Christianity.

The undeveloped Gnosticism of Cerinthus points to an early date. Cabbalistic Gnosticism was completed by Basilides and Valentinus. Basilides probably flourished about A.D. 120, and Valentinus came to Rome in the pontificate of Hyginus, A.D. 137-141 [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 11]; and was then probably aged, for he had heard Theodas, a disciple of St. Paul [Clem. Alex. Strom. VII. xvii. 106]. But there is stronger evidence for an early date. The story of St. John meeting Cerinthus in the bath is too well attested to be lightly thrown aside. Epiphanius, it is true, names Ebion instead of Cerinthus. Mosheim remarks (and he is not credulous of legends) that if the disagreement between Irenæus and Epiphanius is to make us reject this story, the greatest part of ancient history must be laid aside and accused of falsehood. Further, Irenæus [Hær. iii. 11] says expressly that John sought by the proclamation of his gospel to remove Cerinthian errors. Jerome asserts the same [Proem. ad Matth.]. The Cerinthian heresy was probably, therefore, formed before A.D. 75-85. Again, Cerinthus' connection with the Ebionites leads us to infer that it must have been some time before. For it is not doubted that the Ebionites learnt their denial of our Lord's divinity and their partial Gnosticism from Cerinthus, and probably through Ebion. [EBIONITES.] But the doctrine of celestial emanations, as opposed to the Catholic doctrine of angels, must have been considerably advanced at the time of St. Paul's writing to the Colossians, that is, A.D. 58-63. Ittigius allows that St. Paul in that Epistle may refer to Cerinthianism [Dis. sect. i. cap. v.]. We cannot choose but think that at that time Cerinthus had begun to propagate his opinions. If so, there is no difficulty in believing that there may be some foundation of truth in Epiphanius' statement that Cerinthus in person opposed St. Peter [Acts xi. 3], and led the opposition to Gentile liberty at Antioch. He may at least have acted then with the Anti-Pauline party, and have afterwards adopted and propagated his Gnosticism. These reasons lead to the date A.D. 60 (the date assigned by Waterland) for this heresy. Irenæus is in favour of an early date; for he first describes the Gnostics generally; then [Hær. i. 23] he begins his account of the separate sects with Simon Magus, deriving from him the succession of Menander, Saturninus with Basilides, and Carpocrates. Then follow [cap 26] Cerinthus, the Ebionites, the Nicolaitanes. It is quite clear that Irenæus described the schools that sprung from Simon Magus, and then recurred to an earlier period for the beginning of the schools which sprung from Cerinthus. For to suppose a chronological order throughout would be inconsistent with Irenæus' own statement regarding the design of St. John's Gospel. Epiphanius, it seems, misunderstood Irenæus, and forgetting his own statement that Cerinthus opposed St. Peter at Jerusalem, makes Cerinthus succeed Carpocrates, as Carpocrates¹ had succeeded Basilides and Valentinus. Against this conclusion appears to be Eusebius' authority. He refers Menander, the Ebionites, Cerinthus, and the Nicolaitanes to the reign of Trajan, A.D. 98-117. But there is good reason to believe that Eusebius is speaking of the outburst of heresies which had for some time been burrowing underground [Hegesippus in Euseb. H. E. iii. 32]. Menander, a disciple of Simon Magus [Justin M. First Apology, ch. 26], requires to be dated earlier. The Nicolaitanes also must be dated earlier, for the internal evidence that the Apocalypse is a work of the Judæo-Christian Church is so strong that only the most direct contemporary evidence could set it aside. In the same way Cerinthus may be dated earlier, and Eusebius be understood to speak of a more bold publication of the heresy, or a more definite formation of a sect at the time of Thebuthis. Upon the whole therefore we may adopt A.D. 60² as the date of Cerinthus' heretical teaching. [See Danæus, note on Augustine, de Hæres. ch. viii.]

The Judaism of the Cerinthians is not related by the older writers, but it is rendered probable, if not implied, in the classification of them with the Ebionites and Nicolaitanes. By Jerome [Ep. ad August. lxxxix. tom. ii. p. 265, ed. 1616], Epiphanius [Hær. xxviii.], and Augustine [cap. viii.], it is told in the usual terms; that circumcision and the observance of the other rites of the law were held to be necessary to salvation. "Sic nova confessi sunt," writes Jerome, "ut vetera non amitterent." Cerinthus was circumcised, and appears to have been of Jewish extraction. He studied a long time in Egypt, and then removed to Asia, where he formed his sect. The Gnostic principles which he taught are given by Irenæus. According to this heresy the world was not made by the primary God, but by a certain power far separated from Him, and at a distance from that Principality who is supreme over the universe, and ignorant of Him Who is above all. He represented Jesus as not having been born of a virgin, but as being the son of Joseph and Mary according to the ordinary course of human generation, while He was yet nevertheless more righteous, prudent, and wise than other men. Moreover, that, after His baptism, Christ descended upon Him in the form of a dove from the Supreme Ruler, and then He proclaimed the unknown Father and performed miracles. But that at last Christ departed from Jesus, and then Jesus suffered and rose again, while Christ remained impassable, inasmuch as He was a spiritual being [Iren. adv. Hær. i. 26]. Again, the Cerinthians allege that the Creator was one, but the Father of the Lord another; and that the Son of the carpenter³ was one, but the Christ from above another, who also continued impassible, descending upon Jesus the Son of the carpenter, and flying back again into His Pleroma; that the beginning was Monogenes, but that Logos was the true son of the Only Begotten; and that the creation of our world was not effected by the Supreme God, but by some power lying far below Him and shut off from communion with the things invisible and ineffable [ibid. iii. 11].

We have here the Supreme Being existing in the Pleroma, not named Bythus, but clearly the same idea, Monogenes, from whom Logos, and an inferior Demiurge. There is no mention of other Æons. Epiphanius names "angels" as givers of the law and prophets as well as formers of the world [Hær. xxviii.]. Theodoret [Hær. fab. ii. 3] names "separate powers," and [v. 4] ascribes to Cerinthus the holding the same doctrine of angels as Basilides, of which angels Ialdabaoth is the chief. These statements may very well be true of the later sect, Irenæus reporting Cerinthus' own tenets. It will be remarked that nothing is said of an assertion of the eternity of matter; but this tenet was so closely connected with the notion of an inferior demiurge that perhaps we should not err in ascribing it to Cerinthus.

Epiphanius relates that the Cerinthians used the Gospel of St. Matthew (mutilated indeed) on account of its genealogy, which proves (they said) that Jesus was born of Joseph and Mary [xxviii. 5, and xxx. 14]. [EBIONITES.]

Those who denied the doctrine of a millennium sought to discredit the doctrine by insisting that it had been held by Cerinthus. There is little doubt that he did hold the doctrine, which was generally received by the Jews and passed into the Judæo-Christian Church; but that he held it in the sensual form ascribed to him by some is not likely. Controversial misrepresentation is probably at the bottom of the charge. [Regarding the statements of Cains and Dionysius quoted by Eusebius, H. E. iii. 28, see Lardner Credib. ii. 400, art. Caius, and p. 705, art. Dionysius; and Routh, Reliq. Sac. ii. p. 138. See also Dict. of Theology, Millennium.] Lardner acquits Cerinthus of immorality [viii. 414].

The sect did not last very long, being merged in other Gnostic sects; but the time of its disappearance as a distinct body is not known.

CHARURGITÆ. [THNEPTOPSYCHITÆ.]

CHAZINZARIANS. An Armenian sect mentioned by Nicephorus. Their name is derived from "Chaza," the Armenian word for the Cross. The members of the sect are described as worshippers of the cross, and hence are also called Staurolatræ [Niceph. Hist. Eccl. xviii. 54]. Demetrius of Cizycus, writing in the seventh century, speaks of the sect as still existing, and says that its adherents were Nestorians in principle, maintaining a dual Personality in Christ instead of two Natures in one Person. He also the Demiurge. Burton translates the word "Creator," but adds a note that Mosheim "thinks this may rather be taken for Joseph the carpenter" [Burton's Bampton Lect. 477].

records that they used fermented bread, and wine unminged with water, in celebrating the Holy Eucharist. [Demetr. Cizycens. de Jacobit. Hær. ac Chatzitzariorum, in Bibl. Max. Lugd. xii. 814.]

CHILIASTS. [MILLENNARIANS.]

CHILIONETITÆ. [MILLENNARIANS.]

CHOREUTÆ. [EUCHITES.]

CHRISTADELPHIANS. A small but arrogant sect of recent origin which owes its rise to a Baptist preacher named Watts, and which claims "to be 'the sect everywhere spoken against,' in the first century, newly revived." They adopt the name of Christadelphians, or "Christ's brethren," to distinguish themselves from Christians, whom they consider as apostates from the original religion of Christ. "They style their congregations ecclesias to distinguish them from the churches of the apostasy." Their tenets are much the same as those of the Unitarian or GENERAL BAPTISTS, except that they have in addition a partial acquaintance with and belief in the theory well-known to theologians, that the soul becomes immortal by supernatural regeneration, and is not so by natural birth. They profess to believe in "One God, the Eternal Father, dwelling in heaven, in light of glory inconceivable; one universal irradiant Spirit, by which the Father fills all and knows all, and, when He wills, performs all; one Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, and begotten by the Spirit of the Virgin Mary, put to death for sin, raised from the dead for righteousness, and exalted to the heavens as a Mediator between God and man; man a creature of the ground, under sentence of death because of sin, which is his great enemy—the devil; deliverance from death by resurrection, and bodily glorification at the coming of Christ, and inheritance of the kingdom of God, offered to all men on condition, [1] of believing the glad tidings of Christ's accomplishment at His first appearing, and of His coming manifestation in the earth as King of Israel and Ruler of the whole earth, at the setting up of the kingdom of God; [2] of being immersed in water for His name; and [3] of continuing in well-doing to the end of this probationary career."

The Christadelphians have places of meeting in London, Edinburgh, Birmingham, Swansea, and Oystermouth. They have also a growing literature, including several periodicals. The following is a copy of the notice-board on one of their meeting-houses, and is given as an illustration of the manner in which they invite persons to join their community:—"Christadelphian Synagogue. The Christadelphians meet within on Sunday mornings at eleven o'clock for worship and breaking of bread. On Sunday evenings at six o'clock for proclaiming the Truth as it is set forth in the writings of Moses and the Prophets, Christ and His Apostles, in contradiction to the writings and teachings of the Clergy of the Church of Rome and her Harlot Daughters the Church of England and Protestant Dissenters. On Tuesday and Thursday evenings at half-past seven for reading and consideration of Scriptural subjects. To all of which the Public are respectfully invited. All seats free and no collections. 'To the Law and to the Testimony. If they (the Clergy) speak not according to this Word, it is because they have no light in them' [Isa. viii. 20]. It is believed that the Christadelphians are an increasing sect. [Thomas] Who are the Christadelphians? 1869. Declaration of the first principles of the Oracles of the Deity, &c. The Christadelphian. Ritchie's Rel. Life of London, 291.]

CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION. When a "religious census" of England and Wales was taken in the year 1851, there were eight congregations which returned themselves under this designation, their aggregate number being given by them at 800. Nothing is known of their principles, and the name does not now appear on the Registrar-General's list of places registered for public worship.

CHRISTIAN BRETHREN. Some Unitarian Societies in Lancashire and Yorkshire are accustomed to call themselves by this title, but they are not distinguishable from the sect ordinarily known as Unitarians [Relig. of the World, p. 339, ed. 1870].

CHRISTIAN CONNEXION. A sect which originated in the beginning of this century in the United States by the union of seceders from other sects—chiefly the Baptists, Methodists, and Presbyterians—who professed to have no earthly leaders and no inspired creed, but to be guided entirely by individual interpretation of Holy Scripture. They are exactly analogous to the CHRISTO SACRUM in theory, but are practically undistinguishable from the great body of INDEPENDENTS or "Congregationalists."

CHRISTIAN DISCIPLES. An insignificant sect of recent origin, having for its leader an uneducated herb doctor at Wakefield of the name of Hodgson. It claims to be part of the American sect of CAMPBELLITES. The sect has one place of meeting only, which is called the "Christian Church," in Queen Street, Wakefield.

CHRISTIAN ELIASITES. [HICKESITES.]

CHRISTIAN ISRAELITES. A sect founded a few years ago at Wakefield by a follower of Joanna Southcote named John Wroe, who died while on a visit to Australia in the year 1863. At the time of the religious census of 1851 they had three places of meeting in England, and professed to number about 1000 members, but 160 only is the number given as attending the chapels on the enumeration Sunday. Wroe pretended to be possessed of a prophetic gift, and taught that the Second Advent was immediately at hand, when God's promises of restoration to Israel would be fulfilled. To this end it was necessary that there should be a great ingathering of Israel, that is of the lost tribes, which was to take place under the leadership of the Christian Israelites, Divinely inspired for the work. The sect has a larger body of adherents in Australia than in England, and members of it there pretend to perform miracles. Wroe's successors in Australia are, however, charged with imposture and profligacy of no ordinary character, and the sect, such as it is, has assumed a very antichristian character.

CHRISTIANS. A number of obscure local sects in England and Wales distinguish themselves by the special name of "Christians," as if Christianity was peculiar to them. In the census of 1851 there were returned 96 places of worship belonging to sectarians so designated. Others to the number of 26 were appropriated to Free-Gospel Christians, Freethinking Christians, New Christians, Original Christians, Primitive Christians, Protestant Christians, and United Christians. Some of these sects still appear on the Registrar-General's list of licensed chapels.

CHRISTIANS OF ST. JOHN. [SABIANUS.]

CHRISTOLYTÆ [Χριστός λύω]. Heretics of this name are mentioned by St. John of Damascus and by Nicetas Choniates, as belonging to the sixth century. Their name is derived from their distinguishing tenet that the Divine Nature of Christ was separated from His Human Nature when the latter descended into hell, and that only his Divine Nature ascended into heaven. [Nicetas, Thesaur. orthod. fid. iv. 41.]

CHRISTO SACRUM. A society for the union of all Christians who professed belief in the Divine Nature of our Lord, and in the redemption of the world by His Passion, which was founded by Jacob Hendrick, a burgomaster of Delft in Holland [A.D. 1797-1801]. They met every Sunday for adoration of the greatness of God as manifested in His works of creation, and every Friday to study the principles of revealed religion. It numbered at one time two or three thousand members, but soon became extinct.

CHRISTS, FALSE. [FALSE CHRISTS.]

CHUBB. One of the leading sceptics of the last century [A.D. 1679-1747]. He was a self-educated man, and followed the trade of a tallow-chandler, but was a most voluminous writer of Deistical pamphlets, and carried considerable weight with the infidels of his own and the succeeding generation. He denied the Divinity of our Lord, the truth of Scripture miracles, the doctrine of vicarious suffering and intercession, the inspiration of Scripture, the future judgment and everlasting punishment. He was a great promoter of infidelity among the middle classes. [SCPTICS. DICT. of THEOL., DEISM.]

CIRCUITORES. [CIRCUMCELLIONS.]

CIRCUMCELLIONS, CIRCELLIONS, or CIRCUITORES. An extremely fanatical section of the Donatists, whose rise has sometimes been placed as early as A.D. 317, but more generally about twenty-five years later [Tillemont, Mém. vi. p. 96]. They consisted mainly of the poorer inhabitants of North Africa, who gained their livelihood, as well as their name from their predatory and vagrant habits ("circumcellas"), living from hand to mouth, obtaining food by begging, or, if that failed, by violence, from the various hamlets or houses which lay in their way. In later times, as the controversy between the Catholics and the Donatists assumed more and more the character of a civil war, they formed the soldiery, or rather the volunteer or militia bands of the latter, and under the sanction of a religious cause committed every form of outrage; so that they became notorious for their lawlessness. Sallying forth under two leaders named Faser and Axid (or Faserus and Maxidus), and assuming as their watchword the motto "Deo Laudes" [St. Aug. contra litteras Petilianæ, ii. 146], they everywhere took the part of debtors against their creditors, and of slaves against their masters. Their cruel habits are shewn by the fact that every member of these lawless bands was armed with a club, which was called an "Israel," in allusion to the staffs which the Jews held in their hands when they ate the Paschal lamb; and that, besides this habitual use of the club, other modes of injuring their opponents were by degrees resorted to, it being a common practice with them in later days [c. A.D. 405] to put out the eyes of their prisoners with lime and water. Their fanaticism was of the most extreme type, for the forms of violent death which they imposed on others were courted by many of the Circumcellions themselves. They sought an imaginary martyrdom by suicide, rushing into the fire, hurling themselves headlong from precipices, compelling those whom they met to kill them, or to expect their own death as the penalty for refusing to comply with the strange request. Their character is thus summed up by St. Augustine, their contemporary as Bishop of Hippo: "They are a class of persons idly abstaining from all useful employments, most cruel in putting others to death, and yet with a fanatical contempt of their own lives; ranging up and down the country, and, for the sake of food, surrounding the houses (cellas) of the villagers, whence they have obtained the name of Circumcellions" [Aug. contr. Gaudent. Donatist. Episc. I. i. 32]. A history of the suppression and final extinction of the Circumcellions would be merely a repetition of the account of the Donatist schism, of which they formed so important a feature. The change from the mild policy of Constantine the Great [A.D. 324-337] to the harsh measures of Honorius [A.D. 395-425] was undoubtedly caused by their excesses. When they demolished a church which the first named emperor had erected at Constantina, he contented himself with ordering it to be rebuilt at his own expense, without exacting any penalty from the perpetrators of the mischief. Under his successor Constans, commissioners were sent to Africa, Ursacius and Leontius [A.D. 340], Count Gregory [A.D. 347], Macarius, and Paulus [A.D. 348], who attempted a reconciliation by a distribution of alms and presents before resorting to harsher measures. It was not till the fifth century, after a decision adverse to Donatism had been pronounced by the imperial legate Marcellinus at the Conference at Carthage [A.D. 411], that the severe laws of banishment, confiscation, and fine, were permitted to be put in force with their full severity by Honorius. The Circumcellions did not become totally extinct till the close of the same century, and in A.D. 429

they were sufficiently numerous to be of considerable assistance to Genserik, king of the Vandals, in his desolating expeditions through Africa. [Tillemont's Mémoires, vi. 147-165. Aug. Opera, Paris ed. 1694, vol. ix. passim. DONATISTS.]

The name of Circumcellions is also given to a religious body which existed in Germany in the thirteenth century. Politically they were adherents of Frederick II. [A.D. 1210-1250], and were condemned by Pope Innocent IV. at Lyons [A.D. 1244], at the same time that this emperor was excommunicated. But their religious views alone were sufficiently eccentric to have merited the sentence. They taught: [1] that the Pope was a heretic; [2] that all bishops were guilty of simony; [3] that no priest in mortal sin could validly administer the sacraments; and [4] amid a general abuse of all church teachers and officers, asserted that Frederick II. and Conrad ought to be commemorated instead of the Pope.

CIRCUMCISI. [PASAGIANS.]

CLANCULARS. An obscure sect of the Anabaptists in the sixteenth century, who also called themselves "Fratres hortenses" because they were accustomed to meet in gardens. Their principles were similar to those of the Quakers, consisting chiefly in the repudiation of outward means of grace, and in the asseveration of an inward spirit which superseded them.

CLAUDIANISTS. A sect of Donatists whom Primian, the successor of Parmenian in the see of Carthage, received into communion [c. A.D. 391]. They are mentioned in Tillemont's Mémoires, vi. art. 61.

CLAUDIUS. A heretic of this name is mentioned by Epiphanius. Speaking of those who denied the Divine Nature and the Miraculous Conception of our Lord, he says, "Hence Cerinthus and Ebion held Him to be a mere man, as did Merinthus, and Cleobius, or Cleobulus, and Claudius, and Demas, and Hermogenes" [Epiph. Hær. li. 6]. No other notice of Claudius appears in ecclesiastical writers.

CLEMENS SCOTUS was an Irish bishop accused of heresy by St. Boniface Winfred, at the second Roman Council, in A.D. 745, along with the more celebrated Adalbert. He was no doubt one of those dioceseless bishops of the ancient Church of Ireland who passed over in numbers to the Continent. These were always regarded with dislike by Rome, which everywhere established diocesan Episcopacy. We know nothing of the career of Clemens, except from the letter of Boniface to Pope Zacharias, which contains his accusation. According to this, he was entirely free from the fanatical self-exaltation imputed to Adalbert, and far less likely to attract the eyes of the multitude. He was accused of denying the authority of the canons of councils, and of the writings of St. Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory, the Fathers who were regarded with the greatest reverence in the Western Church. It was also laid to his charge that though he had two sons "in adulterio natos," he asserted that he might still continue in the state of a Christian bishop. This can hardly mean anything but that in the eyes of Boniface the marriage of Clemens was an adulterous connection, as that of any bishop would have been. It is well known that there was no rule of clerical celibacy in the Irish Church. Boniface accuses him still further of bringing in Judaism, by maintaining that it was lawful for a Christian man to marry his brother's widow. As however the Mosaic law only allowed this in case of a man dying without children, it follows either that Clemens went far beyond the Mosaic law, or else that the accusation against him was very loose and general. The last thing alleged against him was that he said that Christ in the descent into hell set free all, believers and unbelievers alike; and that he uttered "many other horrible" opinions concerning Divine predestination.

For these heresies Boniface, who had already in the Synod of Soissons, in the year 744, caused Clemens to be condemned and silenced, now demanded from the Pope and Council of Rome that he should be imprisoned for life. Indeed he seems to have already put him in prison, and at this time to have simply demanded the Pope's sanction of what he had done. A severer sentence was passed by the Council upon Clemens than upon his fellow-sufferer Adalbert. He was stripped of his sacerdotal office, and laid under an anathema (ab omni sacerdotali officio sit nudatus et anathematis vinculo obligatus). This sentence cannot be termed a just one, since no evidence was given against the accused, as there was in the case of Adalbert, nor was he heard in his own defence. But it was a milder one than Boniface had demanded, and gave no warrant for the imprisonment of Clemens. He remained in prison nevertheless; and in the year 747 the mild and just Pope Zacharias vainly interfered to procure a more equitable examination of his case, and that of Adalbert. Of the ultimate fate of Clemens we know nothing. [ADALBERTINES.]

CLEMENTINES. A name given to the adherents or followers of CLEMENS SCOTUS.

CLEOBIANS. A very early sect of this name is mentioned by Hegesippus, who says they were one of the seven Jewish sects, the Simonians, the Cleobians, the Dositheans, &c. [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 22]. Theodoret names them in a similar connection [Theodor. Hær. fab. i. 1]. Both these authors also assigned their origin to Cleobius, a contemporary of Simon Magus and Menander. With their testimony agrees that of the longer Ignatian Epistle to the Trallians, in which we read, "Avoid the branches which spring from the Devil, Simon his first begotten son, and Menander and Basilides; . . . avoid the impure Nicolaitanes; . . . avoid also the children of the Evil One, Theodotus and Cleobulus" [Ignat. ad Trall. 11]. The Apostolical Constitutions go a little more into detail, making the Apostles say, "But when we went forth among the Gentiles to preach the word of life, then the Devil wrought in the people to send after us false apostles to the corrupting of the word; and they sent forth Cleobius, and joined him with Simon, and these became disciples to one Dositheus, whom despising, they deposed from the chief place" [Constit. Apost. vi. 8]. Archbishop Ussher further mentions, in his commentary on the Epistles of Ignatius, an apocryphal letter of the Corinthian Church to St. Paul, in which they tell him that Simon and Cleobius had been spreading their dangerous doctrines at Corinth, teaching that the prophets were not to be read, that God was not omnipotent, and denying the resurrection of the dead. Beyond these vague notices nothing authentic is known of the Cleobians, who probably retained the name of their founder only for a short time, and then became lost in one of the larger Gnostic family of heresies.

CLEOMENES. [NOËTIANS.]

CLERICI ACEPHALI. A term used to designate those clergy who were ordained without cure of souls, by "absolute ordinations" as they were called, and who generally obtained their orders by paying for them, that is by simony. In the year 853 the Council of Pavia passed its 18th and 23rd Canons against them, from which it appears that they were mostly chaplains to noblemen, that they produced much scandal in the Church, and that they disseminated many errors. [Harduin, Concil. v. 98.]

COCCEIANS. A school of theologians which arose in the University of Leyden in the seventeenth century, under the leadership of John Koch, or Cocceius, Professor of Theology there. Cocceius was strongly opposed to the mode of interpreting the Scriptures which was adopted by Calvin and Grotius, viewing with special dislike the rationalistic tone of the latter, which regarded the Old Testament as a mere collection of national history and poetry. Cocceius maintained that there is a strict unity between the Old and the New Testament, that a proper interpretation of the former makes it full of evangelical revelations, and that the fulness of the Divine Word is such that its language must bear many meanings, suited to many times and persons. It became a common saying that Cocceius saw Christ everywhere in the Old Testament, but that Grotius saw him nowhere; a saying which shows how largely the former must have influenced the recoil from that dry literalness of mere scholarship which characterized so many of the Lutheran and Calvinist writers of the seventeenth century. The commentaries of Cocceius on Holy Scripture were printed at Amsterdam in A.D. 1701 in ten folio volumes.

CODDIANI. A local name of the Gnostics. Epiphanius thinks that they were so called from the Syriac word Coddā, which signifies a dainty side-dish [παρρησία], and that it refers to the Gnostic peculiarities respecting food, especially their habit of feeding apart from others lest they should be polluted with "unclean" meats. [Epiph. Hær. xxvi. 3.]

CÆLICOLÆ. A satirical name bestowed upon the Jews by the Romans in the later days of the Empire. Tacitus mentions with astonishment the fact that they had no images in their cities, and not even inside their temples.

[Hist. v. 5]. Juvenal describes them as persons who

"Nil præter nubes et cœli numen adorant."

[Sat. xiv. 97.] According to another satirist the Jew is one who

"Et cœli summas advocat auriculas."

[Petronius, Fr. p. 683, li.] These taunts may have reference to the pure monotheistic worship of the Jews, and to the narrative of the cloud in the wilderness and on Mount Sinai [Exod. xiv. xix.]; but they may also be justified by a relapse of the Jews into those idolatrous habits which led them in old times to make molten images and a grove, and to worship all the host of heaven, and to serve Baal [2 Kings xvii. 16]. Some such tendency is supposed to be condemned by St. Paul in his reference to "the worshipping of angels" [Jerome, in Col. ii. 18].

[2.] The name is applied to certain heretics who, early in the fifth century, partially relapsed into Judaism, practising circumcision as well as baptism, rejecting the Christian doctrine of the Trinity, and, according to the monotheistic principles of the Jews, worshipping only the God of heaven. This is probably the true meaning of their designation of "Cœlicolæ," Sianda's idea that they rendered idolatrous homage to the moon and the stars, or to a certain image supposed to have fallen from heaven and erected at Carthage, being founded on a misinterpretation. They are specified for condemnation in three distinct laws in the Theodosian Code [lib. xvi. tit. 5, de Hæret. leg. 43, 44, and tit. 8, leg. 19]; in which they are ranked with the Donatists, Manichæans, and other sectarians, are ordered to return to the Church within a year under pain of having their conventicles forfeited, and all the laws against heretics put in force against them. They are described as a new and audacious sect of Jews, whose doctrines are an unheard of superstition, and who dare like the Donatists to rebaptize all converts from without, a fact which is corroborated by St. Augustine. [Ep. 163, ad Eleusium, p. 284. Bingham, Antiq. p. 950. Baron. Annal. ad ann. 60, vol. i. p. 605.]

COGLERS. A sect of teetotallers having their origin at Kirdford in Sussex, and also known as "Coplars." A man named Sirgood was the first teacher of the sect, the chief characteristic of which is Antinomianism, its members considering themselves (but not being so considered by their neighbours) to be incapable of committing sin. They are said to have a "Book of Cople," in imitation probably of the Mormons.

COLENZO CONTROVERSY. [BROAD CHURCHMEN.]

COLLEGIANTS. A Dutch sect of an eclectic character founded in A.D. 1619 by three brothers named John James, Hadrian, and Gisbert van der Kodde, as a refuge from the bitterness of the Calvinist and Arminian controversies of the day. The name is derived from the custom which they had of calling their communities "Colleges," in which they were followed by Spener and the Pietists of Germany.

The Collegiants' first place of meeting was at the village of Warmand, the residence of one of the brothers, but they shortly established their headquarters at Rheinberg, near Leyden, and were hence called also "Rheinbergers." They rapidly increased in numbers, and at the present time they still form a considerable body in Holland and Hanover.

Their principle from the beginning has been to admit all persons to their society who are willing to acknowledge their belief in the Bible as inspired Scripture, and to take it as the guide for Christian life; but no confession of faith is used, and the widest diversity of opinion is permitted. Their form of worship consists of prayer meetings held on Sundays and Wednesdays, at which any men of the community may pray and expound the Scriptures; but there is no regular organization of a ministry among them. They recognise the necessity of baptism, which they administer by immersion, and twice a year they have sacramental meetings extending over several days, similar to those of the Scotch Presbyterians.

At the end of the seventeenth century the opinions of Spinoza had obtained a strong hold upon the Collegiants, and caused a temporary division of their members into two parties, with separate places of meeting. The leader of the Spinozist party was John Bredenburg, a merchant of Rotterdam, and he was opposed by a bookseller of Amsterdam, named Francis Couper, who attained some eminence by a work which he wrote against Bredenburg under the title Arcana Atheismi detecta. He was also the publisher of the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum seu Unitariorum. The two parties were reunited on the death of these two controversialists, and attracted many to their society from other sects during the last century. [Picart's Rel. Cerem. vi. ed. 1737.]

COLLUCIANISTS. This name was assumed by Arius and by Eusebius of Nicomedia [Theod. Hist. Eccl. i. 5] to signify that they were in doctrinal agreement with the martyred Lucian, bishop of Antioch. There is, however, no evidence that St. Lucian really countenanced Arian misbelief. [LUCIANISTS.]

COLLYRIDIANŚ. An obscure sect of female heretics who lived towards the close of the fourth century. They idolized the Blessed Virgin Mary as a goddess, offering little cakes in her honour, and their name is derived from this feature in their worship. The Greek κολλύρα, or κολλῦρις, appears to have been a round cake. The word does not occur in classical Greek, but it is used in the Septuagint, κολλῦριδα ἄρτον, "to every one a cake of bread" [2 Sam. vi. 19]: the Vulgate having, in this passage, "collyridam panis unam." The Greek σεμίδαλις, at Lev. vii. 12, and ἄρτος, Lev. viii. 26, are also rendered by "collyrida" in the Vulgate. The ordinary shape is said to have resembled the boss of a shield, and the name became applied to a fashion of dressing the hair by Roman ladies, "cujus formæ cum essent scutorum umbilici; et suggestus comarum, matronis Romanis in usu, hic quoque nomen id adeptus est" [Hoffman's Lexicon, s. v. Collyra].

Almost our whole information on the subject of this heresy is derived from a notice in Epiphanius [Hær. 78, adv. Antidicomarianitas], and a treatise by him against them [Hær. 79]. In the former passage he speaks of the dishonour cast upon the Blessed Virgin by the Antidicomarianites naturally producing a reaction, which took the form of honour in excess. Some women in Arabia, having gone thither from Thrace, introduced this new fashion (τοῦτό γε τὸ κενοφώνημα ἐννηόχασιν, ὡς εἰς ὄνομα τῆς ἀειπαρθένου κολλυρίδα τινὰ ἐπιτελεῖν), and Epiphanius cites in illustration of such a practice two cases in which women had divine rights paid to them instead of honourable commemoration. At Sicimi, afterwards Neapolis, there were some ceremonies in honour of a maiden (εἰς ὄνομα τῆς Κόρης), derived from the memory of Jephthah's daughter, of whom it is said in the sacred narrative that a memorial celebration of her death was instituted by the daughters of Israel [Judg. xi. 40]. The Egyptians also paid an unfit honour (ὑπὲρ τὸ δέον τιμῆσαντες Αἰγύπτιοι ἀντὶ Θεοῦ) to Thermutis, the daughter of Pharaoh who brought up Moses. In his book directed specially against the Collyridians, Epiphanius repeats what was said before about this heresy being a sort of reaction. It is an instance, he says, of extremes meeting, μακρότητες ἰσότητες. For the heresies in defect and in excess are equally noxious (ἴση γὰρ ἐπ' ἀμφοτέραις ταύταις αἰρέσεσιν ἡ βλάβη· τῶν μὲν κατεντελιζόντων τὴν ἁγίαν Παρθένον, τῶν δὲ πάλιν ὑπὲρ τὸ δέον δοξαζόντων).

The Collyridians existed, as has been said, chiefly in Arabia. The main feature in their rites is thus described. Some women used to decorate a four-cornered chariot board (δίφρον τετράγωνον), and spread a linen cloth thereupon, and on this they placed bread previously prepared, and offered it in the name of the Virgin. They all in the end partook of the bread thus offered. These ceremonies took place once only in the year. It is conjectured with great probability that the women who practised these rites were simple persons, with considerable heathenism among them; that they had been attached to some such form of worship which was customary among pagans; and that on embracing Christianity they had adapted the old ritual into the new worship. The heathen, it is known, offered cakes of some sort to the goddess Venus and to Astarte. [Mosheim, ed. Murdock and Soames, i. 410, note; where the annotator suggests that Mosheim was thinking of that very remarkable passage in Jer. viii. 18. References are also made to Walch, Historie der Ketzereien, iii. 577, &c.; and Tillemont, Mémoires, xii. 83.]

The confutation in Epiphanius is directed against two errors of the heresy. [1] The offering to the Blessed Virgin Mary worship which is due only to God. She should be honoured, but God alone worshipped (Ἐν τιμῇ ἔστω Μαρία· ὁ δὲ Πατήρ, καὶ Υἱός, καὶ ἅγιον Πνεῦμα προσκυνέσθω· τὴν Μαρίαν μηδεὶς προσκυνεῖτω) [Hær. 79, 7]; and [2] the irregularity of women taking upon themselves the office of the priesthood. From abundant instances in the Old Testament it is proved that men alone discharged this duty. It is shewn that there were indeed orders of deaconesses for certain church work, assisting in the baptism of females and the like, and that these were called πρεσβύτιδες, and never πρεσβυτερίδες; that women were not even allowed to speak in the Church, much less to discharge any sacrificial function. The entire absence of reference to this heresy after Epiphanius proves that it was very short-lived.

It is worthy of notice that the Reformers of the sixteenth century argued from this treatise against the Collyridians that image-worship was abhorrent to the mind of the early Church. [Jewel, iii. 576, Park. Soc. ed. Bp. Forbes' Instruct. Historico-Theologic. iv. 8, sec. 4. ANTIDICOMARIANITES.]

COLORBASIAN, COLARBASIAN, COLOBROSIAN, or COLOBROSIAN. These derive their name from Colorbasus, a Gnostic teacher of the second century, condemned by Theodotus, bishop of Pergamus. Little is known of his personal history beyond the fact that he was the successor of Menander, Marcus, and Valentinus, with one of whose pupils named Bassus he is identified by Philaster [Hær. 43] but not by other writers [Theodoret, Hær. fab. lib. 1]. He associated much with Marcus, but surpassed him in the strangeness of some of his doctrines, which were the following: [1] that the scheme of salvation was contained in some mystical way in the Greek alphabet, whence Christ was called Alpha and Omega; [2] that life was to be sought in the seven stars, that is, the seven churches mentioned in the Book of Revelation; [3] that Christ was not a true man, and that there would be no true resurrection of the flesh; [4] that there were two contrary supreme principles of good and evil at work; [5] that baptism should be administered in his own name and not in that of the Trinity. [Hippol. Refut. omn. Hær. iv. 13, vi. 50; Philaster, 43; Epiphanius, 251-261; Theodor. Hæret. fab. i. 12.]

COLUTHIANS. The followers of Coluthus, or as he is called by Gregory of Nyssa, Acoluthus [Greg. Nyss. contr. Eunom. xi.]. He was one of the Alexandrian clergy at the time when Arius was first coming into prominence, and seceded from the communion of the Patriarch Alexander, about A.D. 319, through discontent at the moderation which that noble champion of the truth shewed in the first instance towards the rising heresy. Thus impatiently rushing into schism, Coluthus began to ordain priests as if he were himself a bishop [Theod. Hist. Eccl. i. 4], and then went on to develop a new heresy in the opinion that God is not the author of those just punishments which providentially afflict men [Aug. Hæres. lxi.]. When Hosius of Cordova was commissioned by Constantine to inquire into the Arian controversy in a council at Alexandria [A.D. 324], he was also directed to inquire into the Meletian and Coluthian schisms. Coluthus and his adherents were summoned before the council, and on the recantation of their leader most of them followed his example and were with him received back into the communion of the Church. The sect was thus very short-lived and was never large in numbers. Coluthus died A.D. 340, having resumed his place as a parish priest in one of the districts of Alexandria. He is not to be confused with a Coluthus who subscribed the synodal condemnation of Arius at Alexandria in A.D. 320. [Epiph. Hæres. lxix. Tillemont, Mém. vi. 219. Neale's Eastern Ch. Patriarch. Alex. i. 116.]

COMARISTÆ. [NEW PELAGIANS.]

COMMUNISTS. [BIBLE COMMUNISTS.]

COMTISTS. [POSITIVISTS.]

CONCORDENSES. [CONCOREZENSES.]

CONCORENSES. [CONCOREZENSES.]

CONCORETII. [CONCOREZENSES.]

CONCOREZENSES. The name by which the mediæval Catharists, afterwards more generally called Albigenses, were known in Lombardy in the thirteenth century. Reiner, in his treatise against the Waldenses, says that the Concorezenses spread over the whole of Lombardy, and were more than 500,000 in number [Reiner, contr. Waldens. in Bible Max. xxv. 269, G].

CONFERENCE PARTY. A section of the Dutch Calvinists or "Dutch Reformed Church" in America, who wished to make their community in the Western Continent entirely dependent on that in Holland. An opposite section, who wished to establish the independence of the American Dutch Calvinists, was called the "Cætus Party." A bitter dispute on this subject raged among these sectarians from 1737 to 1772, which Dr. Brownlee, their historian, speaks of as "a war that waged for fifteen years with unmitigated fury," and during which there were "scenes of animosity, divisions, and actual violence; . . . tumults and disgraceful scenes, frequently occurring on the holy Sabbath; . . . ministers occasionally assaulted in the pulpits," &c. &c.

CONFESSIONS. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

CONFORMISTS. A name temporarily given to those Puritan clergy who accepted the conditions required by the Act of Uniformity of A.D. 1661, by conforming to the customs of the Church of England as set forth in the Book of Common Prayer.

CONGREGATIONALISTS. This name has been recently used by the sect of Independents to express their principle of making each congregation autocephalous. [INDEPENDENTS.]

CONONITES. A section of the sixth century Tritheists, so called after their leader Conon, bishop of Tarsus. They differed from the rest of the Tritheists, who were called PHILOPPONISTS, on the question of the resurrection of the body, Conon maintaining that the matter only and not the form of bodies is corruptible, and that hence their matter will be revived in the resurrection without being limited by their present form. [Niceph. Hist. Eccl. xviii. 49. Walch, Hist. Ketz. viii. 762.]

CONSOLATI. A name assumed by the stricter Catharists of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. [PERFECTI.] But it was probably given only to those Catharists who were received among the "Perfects" when in danger of death by means of some rite which was called the "consolamentum," and which appears to have been a form of clinic baptism and imposition of hands [Reiner, contr. Waldens. in Bibl. Max. Lugd. xxv. 268 A, 269 F]. By this "consolamentum" the recipients were supposed to escape purgatory and pass at once into paradise.

CONVULSIONARIES. The fanatics who obtained this name appeared in France in the second quarter of the eighteenth century and vanished before the commencement of the nineteenth. They were a remote product of the posthumous strife which Jansenism [JANSENISTS] had bequeathed to the Roman Catholic world, an immediate effect of the religious ardour which was awakened by the banishment of Quesnel and the suppression of the Port-Royalists.

It was only in an atmosphere which had been highly charged with elements of political and religious discord that the appearance of such a body as the Convulsionaries was a possible phenomenon; but in the France of the Regent Orleans such an atmosphere was found. Already, in 1699, the war between Jesuit and Jansenist, which had been appeased by the wisdom of Clement IX. and the liberality of Innocent XI., had been rekindled by the publication of Quesnel's Reflexions Morales. Louis XIV., in advancing years the willing tool of persecution, at the instigation of Le Tellier, the unworthy successor of Père la Chaise, had both exiled the innocent Quesnel, and expelled from their homes, with revolting accompaniments of cruelty and indecency, the harmless solitaries of Port-Royal. The detested opinions, however, far from being extirpated by those harsh measures, continued to give increased trouble to the Church, as the numerous briefs which they elicited from the Holy See abundantly testify. At length Clement XI., desirous if possible to quell the scandalous controversy, issued the famous bull "Unigenitus," in which one hundred and one propositions of Quesnel were formally condemned. It was fondly hoped that an end would thus have been put to the dispute; but instead of producing the hoped for effect, the publication of the Papal bull was the signal for the rise of a new and hostile Jansenistic sect, which claimed on Quesnel's behalf to appeal from the Pope to a general council. The opponents of Rome had always possessed some popularity in France, and the adherents of the appeal were soon a numerous and powerful minority of the Gallican Church. They counted among their numbers one cardinal (De Noailles), and at least three bishops, besides other high dignitaries and learned doctors. At this juncture Louis XIV., the main support of the Jesuitical party, died. Neither the Regent Orleans nor his favourite Dubois cared to intermeddle with the contending factions. The Appellants had besides a certain popular political value, which the Government was unwilling to discredit, and some interest at the Regent's Court. Under these singularly favourable circumstances the faction just contrived to hold its own against the Roman party. But the Pope's friends were not inactive. They intrigued with the government of the Regent; they permitted the installation of Dubois, though a laic and of infamous character, on the throne of the Archbishop of Cambrai, and subsequently procured for him a cardinal's hat on condition of the enforcement of the acceptance of the "Unigenitus" by the French episcopacy. Dubois died, however, soon after the last bribe was received, and after his death the French Government either could not or would not assist them. That these intrigues were unsuccessful must in part have been due to the watchfulness and anxiety of the Appellant party, who were painfully conscious of their own weakness.

Such being the state of affairs in 1727, there died in that year at Paris, in the parish of St. Médard (a dependency of Saint Geneviève), on the southern side of the Seine, a popular preacher of the Appellants named Pâris. He was the son of a man of ample means who was a Parisian, and a member of the Parlement of the City. In an access of devotion he had abandoned his possessions to his younger brother, had taken deacon's orders, and had become celebrated for his charities and piety. On May the 1st, 1727, the deacon Pâris died, having only just previous to his decease published an eloquent protest against the injustice of the "Unigenitus." On the 3rd of May he was buried in the cemetery of Saint Médard. His well-known character for piety and eloquence attracted a large number of admiring mourners to the funeral. The cemetery was thronged, both on the day of the interment and during the week which followed. Suddenly a rumour arose that a miraculous convulsion had taken place in the body of a sick and deformed person (it was said to have been followed by a miraculous cure of the disease) at the deacon's grave. Persons subject to epileptic or other seizures crowded to the cemetery. The grave of the eloquent Appellant was thronged by a crowd of excited sympathizers. Again some persons were seized with convulsions. Gradually the fame of the new shrine was established; it was thought to be the grave of a saint, whose bones, like Elisha's, had miraculous life-giving powers. The Cardinal Noailles, desirous that the Appellant cause should benefit by the enthusiasm excited, was eager to take advantage of the accident. He wisely directed all cures to be registered, thus at once increasing the credibility and the fame of the new miracles. This specious appearance of fairness did not fail of effect; more and more surprising phenomena recurring daily. The miracles, which had at first been simply involuntary convulsions, were soon produced at will, and the powers by which the crippled and paralytic had been restored were now vested in persons who joined to them the gifts of prophecy and of universal healing. It is worth noting that the famous Convulsionaries in whose persons miracles were worked were nearly all women. "La petite Lepère," a child of seven years of age; "Marguerite Thibaut," "Marie Couroneau," "Louise Coizin," "Louise Hardouin," "Françoise Duchesne," and "Marie Sonnet," are the most celebrated names. It is to be noted, also, that most of them were poor, all of them ignorant. Bishops, great lords, judges, and advocates visited the tomb with veneration or worship, but among the lower classes only do we find the personal arrogation of miraculous powers.

By 1730 the delusion had risen to such a pitch as to attract the attention and remonstrance of the Government; but it was not until nearly two years later, after a delay which is simply unaccountable, that the executive interfered. The cemetery was closed, and a royal guard stationed at the gates. A few days after this was done an inscription was found upon the doors to the following effect:—

"De par le roi défense a Dieu De faire miracle en ce lieu."

Expelled from the cemetery, the Convulsionaries found shelter in the great houses of the adherents of the Appeal, and, in the privacy of their new life, they developed all the latent powers of human self-delusion. They prophesied, they worked cures, they inflicted the most frightful tortures upon themselves, and they obtained a singular facility in producing or simulating the symptoms of catalepsy, hysteria and convulsion. As their numbers increased they began to divide themselves into groups, named after their respective functions in the performance of miracles or the infliction or endurance of torture. Such are the titles "Vaillantistes," "Secouristes," "Discernans," "Figuristes," "Melangistes," &c., which they adopted. Their principal performances were divided into two parts, "Les grands Secours," and "Les petits Secours," the great and the little aids to the work of God. "Les grands Secours" consisted of the torture or exercise of the "chenet" or burning andiron, "the buche" or beam, the "caillou" or flint rock, the "broche" or spit; while the scourge seems to have served for the principal instrument in "Les petits." In these hideous exercises a woman named Marie Sonnet, surnamed "La Sœur de feu," was the most accomplished performer. She was in the habit first of undergoing with cheerfulness the scorching infliction of the "chenet;" afterwards, upon rising from this bed of torture, she used to cry to the brother Convulsionaries who assisted at these horrid mysteries "Sucre d'orge, sucre d'orge." When she uttered these cries a pointed beam was brought to her, and placed upright on the ground. On this the wretched woman would fling herself, and, resting the middle part of her spine on the sharp end of the pole, she would remain with her feet and head hanging downwards for a considerable period. As soon as this "pose" was accomplished, her cries for a new and more appalling torture recommenced, which she besought the assistants to give her under the designation of "biscuit."

Upon this further demand, an enormous stone weighing fifty pounds was dropped from the ceiling of the room upon the convulsed form of the woman, inflicting a frightful blow upon her chest. The stone was then withdrawn by means of a cord and pulley, and the blow repeated at short intervals, until the physical fatigue of the assistants or the weariness of the spectators compelled the cessation of the torture.

Despite the incredible nature of these practices, their authenticity is beyond all question, and attested by the evidence of friends and foes alike; nor indeed were the tortures that have been detailed by any means the most cruel or objectionable of these Colyttian rites. The scandal caused by their performance (doubtless exaggerated by admiration and hatred) at length became intolerable. The wiser Appellants saw the danger of these exhibitions, and seceded from the Convulsionary faction. The Jesuits exerted the whole force of their powerful organization to suppress these hated relics of Jansenism. The philosophers ridiculed their supernatural pretensions. The Society of Jesus and the author of La Religieuse are for once to be found fighting on the same side. Yet the hold which the Convulsionary delusion had on the popular mind was considerable; for when D'Alembert, consulted as to the best means of discrediting these miracles, advised a performance of the simpler of them at the theatres, the Government, represented by D'Argenson, fearful of an émeute, at once declined the suggestion, preferring the safer means offered by a strict law of prohibition. By a rigorous infliction of penalties and an unsparing use of "lettres de cachet," all the more important personages who had lent their names to strengthen the Convulsionary cause were quietly removed. The less devoted Convulsionaries meanwhile gradually deserted the failing party; savants at the same time described the material character of the phenomenon to the educated world, while the necessity of complete secrecy from the police made proselytism impossible, and rendered the losses of the community almost irreparable. Gradually the lower classes, thus left alone, tired of their folly. By the middle of the eighteenth century the sect was discredited, before the era of the Revolution it had disappeared, and in that gigantic cataclysm all traces of its existence, if any then remained, were swept away. In 1772, however, the year of the publication of the Encyclopédie, the continued existence of these fanatics still calls forth the scorn and indignation of Diderot. The utmost period of the life of the Convulsionary sect is sixty years.

Literature of the Convulsionaries.—The most remarkable original book on this subject is the work of one Carré de Montgeron, who aspired to be the St. Paul of the Convulsionaries. A man of the world, a Conseiller de Parlement, a sceptic and a debauchee, he was suddenly converted by the spectacle of a miraculous cure, and became a bigoted Convulsionary. His book, which is copiously illustrated in the manner of the century, is entitled La vérité des miracles opérés à l'inter- cession de M. de Paris et autres Appellans démontrée contre M. l'Archevêque de Sens. He presented a copy to Louis XV., but this homage did not avail him, for he was imprisoned for complicity with the sect, and died in confinement. A most interesting account of a Convulsionary crucifixion by an eyewitness and a disbeliever is to be found in Baron H. C. Von Gleichen's Denkwürdigkeiten. Friedrich Bülow's Geheime Geschichten und Räthselhaften Menschen, Lanfrey's L'Eglise et les Philosophes du 18me siècle, and the Abbé Duvernel's work entitled l'Histoire de la Sorbonne dans laquelle on voit l'influence de la Theologie sur l'ordre social may also be consulted.

COPLERS. [COGLERS.]

COPTS. The Jacobite natives of Egypt, who have almost entirely supplanted the orthodox and once flourishing Church of St. Mark. They have thirteen Bishops and a Patriarch, the latter being nominally the Patriarch of Alexandria, but residing at Cairo. They have also twenty-six monasteries in Upper and Lower Egypt. The Coptic Church at Alexandria is said to cover the site of St. Mark's martyrdom, and his head is supposed to be preserved there. An intimate communion is kept up between the Coptic Jacobites and the Church of Abyssinia, the Patriarch of the former nominating the Abuna or Patriarch of the latter on every vacancy. Their Liturgy is a Jacobite version of that of St. Basil, and is thus a representative of the primitive Liturgy of St. Mark. It is still used in the ancient Coptic language, which is now understood neither by the people nor the clergy; but the Scripture lections which are said in the services are afterwards translated to the people in Arabic. The number of Coptic Christians is supposed to be about 150,000. [JACOBITES. Neale's Eastern Ch. Introd. i. 117.]

CORACION. [NEPOS.]

CORNARISTS. A Dutch sect of the followers of Theodore Coornhart, or Cornarus, secretary to the States of Holland at the end of the sixteenth century. Cornarus wrote against the Calvinistic doctrine of absolute decrees; and Arminius, who was set to refute his writings, became one of his converts. The Cornarists were afterwards absorbed into the sect of ARMINIANS.

COROPITÆ. [CIRCUMCELLIONS.]

CORPIANI. A local name for the Gnostics. Probably it is a corruption of "Scorpiani," which is said to have been found in some MSS. by Casaubon [Ittig. de Hæresiarch. II. ix. 11]. In his notes on Tertullian, Pamelius suggests that his treatise "Scorpiacus" was so called because it was written as an antidote to the poison of a heretic named Scorpionus. Epiphanius compares the many sects of the Gnostics to the articulations of the scorpion [Epiphan. Hær. xxxi. 38].

CORRUPTICOLÆ. [PHTHARTOLATRÆ.]

COTILIANI. [COLUTHIANS.]

COTOPITES, or COTHOPITHÆ. An African name for the Circumcellions. It is probably equivalent to the Latin "Agrestes," rustics or vagrants. [Isidore, Orig. viii. 5, 53. Honorius. Aug. de Hæres. 69.]

COUNTER REMONSTRANTS. [GOMARISTS.]

COVENANTERS. Those who bound themselves by "a Solemn League and Covenant" to substitute the Presbyterian sect for the Church in the reign of Charles I.

The document originally used for the purpose of subscription by those who were seeking this object was one which had been concocted in Scotland as "a Confession of Faith" in the year 1580, and revived under the name of "The National Covenant" in 1638. It was first set forth by the Scottish Privy Council and the General Assembly, and general subscription was enforced in the years 1581, 1590, 1638 and 1640. In the latter year it was ratified by an Act of Parliament, and it was subscribed by Charles II. at Spey on June 23rd, 1650, and at Scone on January 1st, 1651. The "National Covenant" in this original form was intended only for Scotland. It begins with a wordy protest against "Papistry," "the Roman Antichrist," "his five bastard Sacraments," "his absolute necessity of baptism," "his blasphemous opinion of transubstantiation or real presence of Christ's body in the elements," "his profane sacrifice for sins of the dead and the quick," "his blasphemous litany," "his three solemn vows with shavellings of sundry sorts; his erroneous and bloody decrees made at Trent, with all the subscribers or approvers of that cruel and bloody band, conjured against the Kirk of God." It then goes on to recite and enforce a number of Acts of the Scottish Parliament, which "ordain all Papists and priests to be punished with manifold civil and ecclesiastical pains, as adversaries to God's true religion," together with the "spreaders and makers of books or libels, or letters or writs of that nature," and "all sayers, wilful hearers, and concealers of the mass, the maintainers and reseters of the priests, Jesuits, trafficking Papists," who are "to be punished without any exception or restriction;" and if they "go to crosses" or observe "the festival days of saints," are "to be punished for the second fault as 'idolaters.'" It then goes on to order that "none shall be reputed as loyal and faithful subjects to our sovereign Lord, or his authority, but be punishable as rebellers and gainstanders of the same, who shall not give their confession and make their profession of the said true religion."

The "National Covenant" then closes with a very long oath, taken "before God, His angels, and the world"—called in the Act of Assembly of August 30th, 1639, sess. 23, "our great oath"—covenanting to perform all that is required by the document so sworn to and subscribed.

The "Solemn League and Covenant" was aimed at the Church of England, under the general name of "prelacy," as well as at "the Roman Antichrist." It also was of Scottish origin, and the terms of it are even more outrageously intolerant than those of the previous one. Its history is as follows. When the Civil War began, the Scottish Presbyterians endeavoured to extend their own "National Covenant" of 1580 and 1638 to the English people, the General Assembly writing to the English Parliament on August 3rd, 1643, to urge what they called a thorough reformation, with one Confession of Faith, one Directory of Worship, one public Catechism, and one form of Church government. This application proving ineffectual at the time, a petition in similar terms was sent by the Assembly to the King on January 4th, 1642-3, and this was now accompanied by propositions embodying the same requests, which were presented to Charles I. by the Commissioners of the Parliament as he was walking in the Broad Walk of Christ Church, Oxford. The King and his Council refused to grant what was desired, and sent a reply, in which the following sentence is to be found, shewing (as subsequent events have proved) how much better the Royalists had felt the pulse of the English people than had the Puritans. "Nor are you a little mistaken if either you believe the generality of this nation to desire a change of Church government, or that most of those who desire it, desire by it to introduce that which you only esteem a reformation, but are as unwilling to what you call the yoke of Christ, and obedience to the Gospel, as those whom you call profane and worldly men, and so equally averse both to Episcopacy and Presbytery." In the following summer the WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY of Divines was convened by the Parliament, but without any authority from the Crown. It met on July 1st, 1643, and was a packed assembly of Presbyterians, the few Episcopalians and Independents who had been summoned being utterly powerless on a division.

The Westminster Assembly immediately wrote to the General Assembly of Scotland, requesting their assistance to "strengthen them in standing up against Antichrist," their letter accompanying the request for armed assistance which was sent by the Parliament. The Scottish Government and Divines immediately proposed that the English nation should adopt the Scottish "National Covenant." The English Commissioners objected to this, and proposed a civil "League" or treaty between the two nations. In the end a nominal compromise was effected, in which the astute Scotch easily got the better of the unstatesmanlike English rulers of the day, a new Covenant being framed and approved by the General Assembly on August 17th, 1643, to which the double name was given of "a Solemn League and Covenant," but which related entirely to the abolition of the English system of Church government and the establishment of Scottish Presbyterianism in its place. This Covenant was presented to the Westminster Assembly on September 1st, 1643. It consisted of a preamble, six articles, and the enacting or covenanting clause, and was adopted by the Assembly and the House of Commons—with an explanatory parenthesis added after the word "prelacy"—on September 25th, 1643, in St. Margaret's Church, under the shadow of Westminster Abbey. All those present lifted up their hands to signify their assent to it; and then going up in turn to the chancel, affixed their names to the parchment on which it was written.

The force of the "Solemn League and Covenant" was contained in the first, second, and fourth articles, which are as follows:—

"I. That we shall sincerely, really, and constantly, through the grace of God, endeavour, in our several places and callings, the preservation of the reformed religion in the Church of Scotland, in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government, against our common enemies; the reformation of religion in the kingdoms of England and Ireland, in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government, according to the Word of God, and the example of the best reformed Churches; and shall endeavour to bring the Churches of God in the three kingdoms to the nearest conjunction and uniformity in religion, confession of faith, form of church government, directory for worship and catechizing; that we and our posterity after us may as brethren live in faith and love, and the Lord may delight to dwell in the midst of us.

"II. That we shall in like manner, without respect of persons, endeavour the extirpation of Popery, Prelacy (that is, Church government by Archbishops, Bishops, their Chancellors and Commissaries, Deans, Deans and Chapters, Archdeacons, and all other ecclesiastical officers depending on that hierarchy), superstition, heresy, schism, profaneness, and whatever shall be found to be contrary to sound doctrine and the power of godliness; lest we partake in other men's sins, and thereby be in danger to receive of their plagues, and that the Lord may be one, and His Name one, in the three kingdoms.

"IV. We shall also, with all faithfulness, endeavour the discovery of all such as have been or shall be incendiaries, malignants, or evil instruments, by hindering the reformation of religion, dividing the King from his people, or one of the kingdoms from another, or making any faction or parties amongst the people, contrary to this League and Covenant; that they may be brought to public trial, and receive condign punishment, as the degree of their offences shall require or deserve, or the supreme judicatories of both kingdoms respectively, or others having power from them for that effect, shall judge convenient."

This new Covenant was ratified by an Act of the Scottish Parliament on July 15th, 1644, and again in 1649. It was sent to the justices of the peace and other influential persons in every parish in England, and during the reign of terror which followed multitudes were forced to subscribe to it. Copies of it are still to be found here and there in the parish registers—e.g. at Houghton-le-Spring, near Durham, and at Over, near Cambridge—to which the names and marks of the parishioners are affixed, and which are a standing witness to the industrious energy of the Presbyterians when endeavouring to carry their Scottish innovations into every corner of England. Charles II. signed it in Scotland, and as King of Scotland, at the same time that he signed the "National Covenant," in 1650 and 1651.

At the Restoration in 1661, the Solemn League and Covenant, which had long been an object of contempt, was altogether set aside in England, but it continues to this day (as well as the National Covenant) to be one of the authoritative formularies of the Kirk of Scotland, being as regularly set forth by the "Publishers of Bibles, Testaments, Prayer and Psalms Books, Confessions of Faith, Catechisms, &c., by Royal Authority" as the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, and bound in one volume with the "Confession of Faith" and the "Larger" and "Shorter Catechism." It has never, however, been formally renewed by the General Assembly, and may be supposed to be in abeyance. The refusal of the Assembly to renew it at the time of the Revolution Settlement of A.D. 1688 caused the secession of the CAMERONIANS, or Reformed Presbyterians, among whom it is still a received dogma that only a "covenanted" sovereign has any right to the throne of the United Kingdoms of England and Scotland.

No more intolerant body of religionists ever existed than the Covenanters. The school of historical romancists has given a turn to their later history in Scotland which has invested them with a false colouring, and has thus won for them great sympathy among superficial readers; but in reality the spirit of the Covenanters was that of most bitter and unscrupulous persecutors; they were deadly foes to the religious liberty of any but those of their own faction; and it was only the want of power which (happily for England) made this Scottish aggression comparatively harmless. COZARENSES. [CONCOREZENSES.]

CREATICOLÆ. [CTISTOLATRÆ.]

CREATIONISTS. A controversial name for that school of Divines which maintains the theory that each soul is a separate creation of God infused into the unborn child. This theory is opposed to that of Traducianism, which is that the soul is derived, like the body, from the parents. St. Jerome, St. Leo, St. Anselm, Peter Lombard, and Thomas Aquinas, were of the Creationist school, and although there are many great names among the supporters of the opposite theory, the Creationist view is now generally regarded as orthodox. [DICT. OF THEOL., CREATIONISM.]

CREDENTES. A name assumed by the Catharists of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Reinerius speaks of it as if, like some modern religionists, they generally called themselves by the name of "Believers." [Reiner. contr. Waldens. in Bibl. Maz. Lugd. xxv. 269, G.]

CRISPITES. This name was used at the end of the seventeenth and in the eighteenth century, to designate those dissenters of various sects who adopted the extreme Antinomian opinions of Dr. Tobias Crisp. He was a clergyman of good family, educated at Eton and Balliol College, Oxford, and Rector of Brinkworth in Wiltshire from 1627 until his death at the early age of forty-two in the year 1642. Having attracted some attention by his Antinomian preaching, he was afterwards (when driven to London by the outbreak of the civil war) involved in controversy with Baxter, Howe, Flavel, and other Puritan Divines, but in the midst of this controversy he died. After his decease three volumes of sermons were published from his notes, but they did not at the time obtain much notice, although the Westminster Assembly of Divines proposed to have them publicly burnt. But after the Revolution in 1690, the sermons were republished in a quarto volume by the son of Dr. Crisp, at a time when the Socinian controversy was being actively carried on, the names of twelve Independent ministers being prefixed as approving and recommending the book. "By the means of this book," says Nelson, "thus recommended and authorized, the poison of Antinomianism soon spread, not only in the country, but infected this great city to that degree that the more sober of the Presbyterian ministers were scarce able to preach a sermon wherein either hope was arrested by conditional promises, or the fear of sin was pressed by Divine threatenings, but they were immediately censured and condemned as enemies of Christ and of free grace; and especially were cried out against by many of the Anabaptists and Independents." The sermons were answered by Dr. Daniel Williams, the founder of the Dissenters' Library in Redcross Street, in a volume entitled Gospel Truth Stated and Vindicated, and published in 1692. Further controversy arose between the supporters of Dr. Williams and the Antinomian party, and an appeal was made to Bishop Bull, whose Harmonia Apostolica contains a full refutation of Antinomianism. The sermons of Crisp were again republished by Dr. Gill in 1745, and are still a great authority among the Antinomian school of Dissenters. [Nelson's Life of Bishop Bull, ch. xlviii.]

CRYPTO-CALVINISTS. A name applied to the followers of Melancthon by the Lutherans, on account of their supposed secret sympathy with the doctrines of Calvin, especially with his theory of the Holy Eucharist. [PHILIPPISTS.]

CTISTOLATRÆ. A name compounded of a Greek word which was used in an ecclesiastical sense to designate a nature or being that is created (κτιστός), and of a word signifying Divine worship (λατρεία). Such "creature-worshippers" the ΑΡΘΗΤΑΡΟΔΟΤΕΣ declared the opponents of their heresy were, and it was only by them that the designation was used. [SEVERIANISTS.]

CUBRICUS. A name by which Manes, the founder of the Manichee heresy, was also known. [Epiph. Hær. lxvi. 4.]

CULDEES. An ancient religious order in Ireland and North Britain. Much research has been spent upon the derivation of the name; some supposing it to have come from the Gaelic Kill, a cell, and Dee, a house, and to mean the dwellers in the cell-house. There is nothing however known of the habits of the Culdees which should entitle them to such an appellation, their tendency having been to secularize religious offices and endowments rather than to keep up regular strictness of life. The true origin of the name is no doubt that which is pointed out by Braun [De Culdees, 1840], and by Dr. Reeves, who derive it from the Celtic Céle-dé, Servus Dei; an appellation not uncommon among the regular orders, and which was afterwards corrected in the Pope's style into Servus Servorum Dei [see Burton's Hist. of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 7]. In Latin originals they are called Keledei, and in old Scotch Kyldées. The forms Culdei and Colidei, worshippers of God, first occur in later writers, such as Giraldus Cambrensis (in the twelfth century), and seem to have arisen from the desire to suggest a Latin derivation for a word, the true origin of which was forgotten.

The history of the Culdees has acquired a factitious importance through the controversy in the seventeenth century between the Presbyterians and Episcopalians; the former party asserting them to have been of extreme antiquity, and addicted to the Presbyterian form of Church government; the latter denying both these positions. It may be confidently affirmed that there is no extant evidence of the extreme antiquity of the Culdees as a wide-spread and influential religious organization. There is no warrant for connecting them with St. Columba and his mission at Iona, nor are they named by Adamnan in his life of that saint; though it is true that when in the ninth century the ecclesiastical supremacy of Iona was transferred to Dunkeld, the latter establishment is mentioned at a still later period as belonging to Culdees. If they had been numerous in the eighth or ninth centuries, they could hardly have escaped the notice of Bede or of Nennius, by neither of whom they are mentioned; nor indeed by any historian for some hundreds of years after. Nor, whenever they occur in Scotland, are they found in any of the old west-lying settlements of the Scots, who came from Ireland; but always in the country of the Picts, the east of Scotland; and generally in some connection with the great see of St. Andrews. A leaf in the Register of St. Andrews, written about 1130, records that the son of the last king of the Picts gave an island in Lochleven to the Culdee hermits serving God there. These Culdees were under an abbot; and about the year 1090 they gave up their island to the bishop of St. Andrews, and a few years later were suppressed and replaced by canons regular [Chalmers' Encyclop. s. v.]. The Culdees of St. Andrews itself were probably as ancient as, and more important than, those of Lochleven; but we have no distinct notice of them until long after the time when St. Andrews had become a diocesan see, which began to be about A.D. 850. A hundred years after that, in A.D. 943, Constantine III., King of the Scots, is said to have voluntarily abdicated, and to have become abbot of the Culdees of St. Andrews. In the twelfth century, under the influence of the royal Saint Margaret and her sons Edgar and Alexander, the various establishments of the Culdees in Scotland, after a vain struggle to preserve their peculiar rights, were absorbed into the system of diocesan Episcopacy which was extended by Rome over every part of Europe. It was their extinction which procured them what notice they have in the scanty records of that age; and their antiquity can only be conjecturally estimated from the firmness with which they resisted change. The account of their long struggle at headquarters in St. Andrews is the chief memorial that we have of them.

It is related in the Durham Chronicle [Twysden's Decem Scriptores] that in the year 1108, Turgot, prior of Durham, was made bishop of St. Andrews; and that in his time all the right of the Culdees throughout the kingdom of Scotland passed from them to the bishopric of St. Andrews: "totum jus Keledeorum per totum regnum Scotiæ transiit in Episcopatum St. Andreæ" [Ussher, de Prim. p. 1032]. What this right might be has been the subject of much controversy; but there can scarcely be any doubt that it was the right of confirming the election of all the bishops in Scotland, which they possessed as dean and chapter of the metropolitan see of St. Andrews. Of this right, the first attempt to deprive them was made at the election of Turgot. At that time there were two parties in St. Andrews: the old foundation of the Culdees, consisting of a prior and twelve brethren, who performed divine service as clerical vicars: and the bishop and new representatives of offices which under the Culdees had passed into the hands of laymen, such as that of abbot. It was the object of the kings under papal influence to displace the former party and fill their room by canons regular. So tenacious however were the Culdees, that notwithstanding a succession of royal ordinances and papal decrees, they kept their ground, and exerted their peculiar elective right, to the middle of the fourteenth century. Thus, in 1297, they opposed the election of Lamberton to St. Andrews, who had been chosen by the canons; and their provost vainly appealed to Rome [Ussher, de Prim. p. 659]. On that occasion it is asserted in the Scotichronicon [lib. vi.] that "omne jus deinceps Keldeis abrogatum;" but they were not finally excluded from taking part in the election of bishops before 1332; from which time their name never occurs in records, their ancient corporation being changed into a provostry under the title of "præpositum ecclesiæ beatæ Mariæ civitatis Sancti Andreæ," which after the Reformation was vested in the Crown [Reeves' Culdees, 38; Burton's Scotland, ii. p. 31].

In this way the Culdees throughout Scotland appear to have been absorbed or transformed during the great Catholic revival of the twelfth century. Some of their establishments were important enough to be turned into bishoprics, as St. Andrews and Dunkeld, with chapters of secular canons; others were replanted with Augustinian canons regular; others again were gradually resolved into parishes. Far from manifesting sectarian rigour and purity, they present the aspect of a decayed and corrupt corporation, clinging to its temporalities, and settling into a secularization which was arrested by the spiritual strength of papal Catholicism. [A list of the establishments of the Culdees in Scotland, in which the struggle at St. Andrews was uniformly repeated, may be found in Chalmers' Encyclopædia, s. v.]

Authentic records of the Culdees of Ireland are singularly scanty. An abbot and bishop in the North of Ireland, who wrote a metrical calendar of Irish saints about the year 800, bears in ancient chronicles the name of Ængus the Ceile-De. And in Irish annals of undoubted authority it is recorded that in 919 "a Ceile-De came across the sea westward to establish laws in Ireland." The annals of Ulster record that, in 920, Armagh was plundered by Godfrey, son of Ivor the Dane, but that he spared the oratories with the Culdees and the sick. These Culdees of Armagh, like those of St. Andrews, seem to have been the dean and chapter of the Church; and were compelled to give place to canons of later institution, but yet were allowed to continue in the inferior capacity of vicars choral. Ussher mentions that the vicars choral of Armagh, and those of the collegiate Church of Cluanynish [Clones], were called Colidei in his day, and the chief of them, who was called their prior, served as precentor [de Primord. p. 657]. Ussher also produces a sentence of an archbishop of Armagh in the year 1445, to the effect that the office of prior or of an inferior Culdee not being accounted a cure of souls, may be held with any other benefice, provided that the holder keep his due residence in the Church of Armagh; and this sentence is expressly said to be founded on the chronologies of the holy Fathers and the Year Books of former archbishops (Sanctorum Patrum antiquis chronicis et prædecessorum Libris Annalibus perscrutatis) [de Primord. p. 637]. A papal brief of the year 1447 declared, to the same effect, that the priorate of the college of secular priests called Colidei was not a benefice but a simple office without cure [ibid.]. There were about seven other establishments of Culdees in Ireland besides these; but no writer mentions any of them before Giraldus Cambrensis, who speaks of the Cœlicolæ or Colidei of an island called Insula Viventium, of Tipperary, who devoutly served a chapel there [Girald. C.; Ussher, de Primord. p. 637]. The same writer affords the solitary notice which remains of Culdees in Wales. He speaks of the little island of Bardsey in North Wales as inhabited in his own time by a set of very religious monks named Cœlibes or Colidei [ibid.].

In England there is no trace of them, except that the canons of St. Peter's at York were called Culdees in the reign of Æthelstan in the first half of the tenth century; and that a suspected charter of Æthelred, in the year 1005, speaks of the canons of English cathedrals generally as "cultores clerici," a term of doubtful import.

It will be seen from the scantiness of these records how little can be concluded concerning the manners and institutions of the Culdees. As monks they were under the government of abbots, not of bishops, and in this were nothing different from other monastic orders. But some of their abbots may have borne the title of bishops, and have thus been bishops without dioceses, contrary to the law of the Church. There is no proof of this; though it is possible enough, since the Culdees may be held to have belonged to the ancient British or Scots' Church, in which no doubt dioceseless bishops abounded. This is a slender foundation for the theory of the Presbyterian controversialists, that the Culdees were the upholders of the primitive simplicity of Church government, by monks and priests, rejecting diocesan Episcopacy, clerical celibacy, and all later abuses, until they were finally overpowered by the frauds of Rome. Enquiry has completely upset this view, and it now finds no support among archæologists. Yet, as it occasioned a violent controversy in the seventeenth century, it may be worth while to mention the authorities from which it arose.

John of Fordoun, a monk of the fourteenth century, author of the Scotichronicon of obsolete authority, was the first to assert that the Scots were originally governed by monks and priests alone, and that in this they followed the usage of the primitive Church [Scotichron. iii. 8]. He was followed by John Major the Sorbonnist [Hist. Scot. ii. 2], who, like the monk of Fordoun himself, fell into the error of confounding Scotland, the ancient name of Ireland, with the present Scotland. In a similar way Hector Boëtius [Scot. Hist. i. 6, quoted by Ussher, de Prim. p. 636] had improved his account by making these monks and priests Culdees, and giving that account of their organization which has been the foundation of the Presbyterian theory. He says that they were called for their piety "cultores Dei," under which title they were recognised by all the people; that they came in the third century; that they elected among themselves a chief priest, who had power in things belonging to God, and that he was for many years after known as Episcopus Scotorum, or bishop of the Scots. He alleges for this the authority of ancient annals; but in his preface he owns that the most ancient annalist that he had seen was Veremundus, who wrote in the last half of the eleventh century. To say no more, the whole story of the Scots Church being governed by monks and priests in the third century is disproved by the fact that there were no monks at all in the Western Church at that time; a difficulty which Dempster the Jesuit tries to get over by supposing that the Culdees of Boëtius were canons regular [Ussher, de Prim. 637]. Selden was the first who brought the Culdees into the Presbyterian controversy, by his celebrated preface to Twysden's Historiæ Anglicanæ Decem Scriptores, London, 1652.

The best account of the Scots Culdees is in Grub's Ecclesiastical Hist. of Scotland; of the Irish Culdees, in Dr. Reeve's Dissertation in the Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy, 1860.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIANS. An American sect which originated in some "revivals" that took place among the Presbyterians of Cumberland County in Kentucky about the year 1800, and which constituted itself a separate community by formal separation from the general body of the American Presbyterians on February 4th, 1810. The cause of separation was the refusal of the governing body of the Presbyterians to recognise as ministers certain persons who had been admitted to their office without the usual education and preparation, and who also repudiated the doctrines of election and reprobation. The "Cumberland Presbytery" soon extended itself beyond its original locality, and the sect taking its name from this origin is said to number 900 ministers, 1250 places of worship, and 100,000 members: having also established Cumberland College, Princeton, Kentucky, and several other colleges for the education of its ministers. It is strictly Presbyterian in its character, with the exception that its "Confession of Faith," founded on the Westminster Confession, rejects the Calvinistic dogmas of election and reprobation, and maintains the doctrine of universal redemption.

CUTZUPITÆ. This name is used for the CIRCUMCELLIONS by St. Augustine in his 163rd Epistle, and is probably another form of Gotispitæ.

DALEITES. A sect in Glasgow at the end of the last century, which differed little from the Independents. The founder, David Dale (born 6th January 1739) was a wealthy cotton-manufacturer, and the original proprietor (in conjunction with Sir R. Arkwright) of the Lanark Mills, who had risen from the rank of a journeyman weaver, but was more distinguished by his munificent charities and the benevolence of his character. At an early period he adopted in general the views of Robert Glas, the founder of Scottish Independency; but differing from him in some few points, established a distinct congregation in Glasgow, to which he ministered up to the period of his death, which occurred on 17th March 1805. In order to qualify himself in point of learning for his self-imposed office, he is said to have studied the languages of both the Old and New Testaments with some considerable degree of success. The points of separation between his followers and the Glassites consisted partly in doctrine, the former laying more stress upon practical holiness than the latter, but chiefly in matters of discipline. The Daleites did not keep aloof from other Christian bodies with the exclusiveness (so distinctive of petty sects) with which the Glassites regarded them, and they entertained somewhat different views respecting the office of elders, particularly holding that the apostolic description of an office-bearer, as being "the husband of one wife," forbade only the having more than one wife at the same time, while the Glassites generally held that an elder was disqualified for office by re-marriage after a first wife's death.

At the time of Mr. Dale's death small congregations in connection with his Glasgow followers existed at Edinburgh, Perth, Kirkealdy, and several other places. Probably they have now all become merged either among the few remaining Glassites, or among the Congregationalists. Dale's son-in-law was the notorious Robert Owen, the originator of the English socialist theories. [New Theological Dictionary, Edinb. (for Jas. Morison, Perth), 1807. Scots Magazine, 1806, pp. 239, 653.]

DAMIANISTS. A section of the Alexandrian Monophysites which took its name from Damian, the Monophysite patriarch [A.D. 570]. In opposing the TRITHEISTS, Damian fell into the opposite error of Sabellianism, for he denied that each of the Divine Persons of the Trinity is in Himself God, and maintained that the Three have One Divine Personality only. The theory of the Damianists was, in fact, practically identical with that of Sabellius, namely, that God is One Person distinguished into three hypotheses by characteristic differences of His operations. But by maintaining these characteristic differences in the way they were maintained by the Damianists, their theory really led to the conclusion that there are four Gods, the three separate and subordinate Hypostases and the one superior Αἰτῶθεος, hence they were also named Tetratheites. [Niceph. Hist. Eccl. xiii. 49. Walch, Hist. Ketz. viii. 753.]

DANCERS. These were a sect of weak-brained fanatics, who appeared in the last quarter of the fourteenth century, and disappeared at the commencement of the fifteenth. The scene of their performances was the western part of the ancient province of Belgica, comprising Rhenish Prussia, Holland and Hainault. The origin of the outbreak is difficult to be accurately deciphered, but the famous black death or pestilence of Froissart was doubtless the remote or predisposing cause. This fearful visitation, which had more than decimated Northern Europe, produced and left behind it a vast amount of intellectual debility in the populations attacked by it, as is attested by the numerous fanatical enterprises which followed its disappearance. Though each of these, as it appeared, was invariably suppressed to the utmost of the sacerdotal and governmental ability of the time and place of its occurrence, similar new forms of mental disease were continually bursting forth; the sufferers being distinguished by this one abiding feature in creed or ritual, namely, the substitution of corporeal exertion for spiritual or intellectual worship. It was thus that in the month of July A.D. 1374, the dancing form of fanaticism appeared in the old capital of Charlemagne. The brotherhood, a crowd of all ages and of both sexes, began their celebrations with a kind of dervish dance in the public squares of that town. Emboldened by impunity they proceeded to the churches, and there, half naked and crowned with garlands, they supported the most laborious dances until they fell fainting into the arms of the bystanders. They alleged that they were enabled to endure these incredible fatigues by the special grace of the Virgin and the Saints, whose aid during their performances they incessantly invoked. The orthodox, however, referred their vigour to Satanic rather than heavenly interposition. From the city of Aix-la-Chapelle they spread rapidly through Hainault, making some stir, and perhaps acquiring some proselytes, both at Utrecht and Liège. Without definitely objectionable tenets, the people appeared to tolerate their folly, and they supported their precarious lives, like various recognised religious orders, by professional mendicancy. Fortunately their poverty, coupled with their numerical and intellectual weakness, preserved them from the persecution which might have given to even such fanatics a factitious importance in the eyes of the world. Saner and more merciful counsels prevailed than are sometimes met with in the history of the Church; and, as these sectaries were too ignorant or imbecile to confess themselves heretics, the orthodox were content to treat them, not as the accomplices, but as the victims of diabolical agency. We gather that, when the fainting performers were taken possession of by the clergy, and the evil spirit duly exorcised, they were at least in some cases entirely restored. It is stated that St. Weit, or Vitus, was on such occasions successfully appealed to. With the generation that had suffered from the debilitating effects of the Great Pestilence, or was born of parents who had so suffered, this form of frenzy died away; and its easy, rapid and complete extinction is a striking and satirical commentary on the prolonged existence of the greater portion of the other mediæval fanaticisms. In the fifteenth century there is hardly any trace of the Dancers to be discovered. Their modern homologues are to be found in the Convulsionary prophets of the eighteenth century [CONVULSIONARIES] and the Jumpers of the present day.

[The best account of these sectaries is from the pen of the monk Radulph de Rive, to be found in a work by Chapeauville, entitled Qui gesta Pontificum Tongrensisum et Trajectensium et Leodensium scripserunt auctores præcipui," &c. See also the Chronicon Belgicum, sub anno 1374; and Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, cent. xiv.]

DANISH PROTESTANTS. The Reformation first obtained a formal recognition in Denmark A.D. 1526. In that year King Frederick I. openly proclaimed his favour towards the Reformed doctrines, and issued orders for convoking a diet at Odensee [A.D. 1527], at which full liberty of conscience was allowed for both reforming and non-reforming parties, the marriage of the clergy and religious orders was legalized, and the bishops were forbidden any longer to receive the pallium from Rome. For some years previously the Reformed doctrines had been spreading, especially owing to the labours of John Tausen, who, after attending the lectures of Melancthon at Wittenberg, returned home to teach them in his native town of Viborg in Jutland [A.D. 1521]. Two years later Christian II. was succeeded on the throne by Frederick I., Duke of Schleswig-Holstein [A.D. 1523]. His own personal feeling in favour of Lutheran tenets led him immediately to proclaim liberty of worship in his own duchy, though he was prevented by the antipathy of the bishops from extending the same principle to his new kingdom till A.D. 1527. A Danish confession was subsequently drawn up and published at a diet held at Copenhagen [A.D. 1530]. It consists of forty-three articles, and resembles in many points the Confession of Augsburg, being partly based on the Schwabach and Torgau Articles [A.D. 1529], which also form the groundwork of the latter work. After a reign of ten years Frederick I. was succeeded by his son Christian III. [A.D. 1533], who, while travelling in Germany before assuming the crown, had been present at the Diet of Worms, and who at once showed his intention of standing fast by his father's policy in religious matters by being crowned by the Lutheran Pomeranian John Bugenhagen, whom he caused to be summoned from Wittenberg for that purpose. In taking this significant step the new king was actuated by a political as well as a religious antipathy. The Catholic clergy, especially the hierarchy, had supported the pretensions of his younger brother John, who, along with his exiled predecessor Christian II., were competitors for the vacant throne. They were forthwith banished from their sees, a new class of "superintendents" was substituted for the ancient order of bishops; the University of Copenhagen was remodelled on a Protestant basis, and the triumph of Lutheranism in Denmark proper may be considered complete.

It soon extended into Norway, which was finally incorporated into Denmark proper A.D. 1537. Here the Catholic bishops, after some opposition, were either deposed or conformed, and at the present date Lutheranism is the predominant and almost the exclusive form of religion in Norway.

The history of Iceland is similar. The Reformed doctrines were first propagated by Gisser Einarsen, who, at the age of twenty-five, was elected under Protestant influence to the bishopric of Skalholt in that island [A.D. 1540]. Supported by royal favour, his teaching spread so rapidly, that in the course of eleven years the whole island had changed its religious complexion, and has remained exclusively Lutheran up to the present day.

DAVID-GEORGIANS. [FAMILISTS.]

DAVID OF DINANT. [DAVIDISTS.]

DAVIDIANS. [DAVID-GEORGIANS.]

DAVIDISTS. A sect of the thirteenth century, the followers of David of Dinant.

Of the personal history of this heretic little or nothing is known beyond the fact that he was a disciple of Amalric of Bema, and was, like his master, trained in the pantheistic philosophy of Erigena. He however went beyond his teacher in heresy, for whereas Amalric had taught that the Deity is the principium formale of all things, David de Dinant asserted that He is the materia prima of all things [Thom. Aq. Summa I. qu. iii. art. 8]. The pantheism of the latter went, therefore, to the length of asserting that the Deity alone has any real existence, and that all other beings and things are part of Him. This principle the sect applied to Christianity in such a manner as to explain it away. Thus, instead of our Lord becoming the One Incarnation of God, each human being was represented as a separate and individual incarnation of Deity. In a similar manner the received doctrine of a Divine Presence in the Blessed Sacrament was admitted, but was also explained away by the statement that the species of it was already part of the Deity before it was consecrated, and that the act of consecration was merely such an annunciation of the fact as brought it home to the consciousness of those who heard and saw the priest at the altar. To this pantheism they added many other anticipations of later unbelief, such as that God had revealed Himself by the words of heathen poets like Ovid, as much as by Christian Fathers like Augustine; that heaven and hell are simply the present consequences of sin; that religion does not consist in what a man does, but in love alone, independently of good life and works.

The principles of the sect were at first propagated with great secrecy among the French laity by means of books written in the vernacular. But William of Aria, a goldsmith, making them known by public preaching, they were brought before a synod at Paris in A.D. 1209, and condemned as profoundly heretical. Its author was degraded from the priesthood, but had fled from Paris, while several of his clerical and lay adherents were apprehended, and refusing to recant were burnt as heretics [A.D. 1210]. A priest named Bernard shewed the full force of the principles he had learned by declaring that the fire could have no power to destroy his being, because it was part of the Divine existence, and so far as he had any being he was God himself.

The chief work of Dinanto was one entitled Quatermarii. On the condemnation of his heresy it and all his vernacular writings were destroyed, and so great was the odium into which they had brought the use of the vernacular for theological teaching, that all other theological works in the French language were also ordered to be burned, including the Metaphysics of Aristotle, which had been especially used in support of the heresy, having been lately recovered from oblivion through the prevalence of Moorish literature in Europe. DAVIDISTS. [DAVID-GEORGIANS.]

DAVISTS. [DAVID-GEORGIANS.]

DEISTS. A general name applied in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries to those who professed a belief in the existence of God (as distinguished from Atheists), but went little or not at all further towards belief in the truths of Christianity. In more recent times Deism has been regarded as a tenet of many schools of sceptics rather than as the distinguishing tenet of one. The reader is therefore referred to the article SCEPTICS in this volume, and to that of DEISM in the DICTIONARY of THEOLOGY, for historical and philosophical information on the subject.

DEMAS. The "fellow-labourer" of St. Paul

[Philem. 24; Col. iv. 14]—of whom he says towards the close of his ministry, "Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world, and is departed unto Thessalonica" [2 Tim. iv. 10]—is classed by Epiphanius with Cerinthus, Ebion, and others, as one who denied the Divine Nature and miraculous Conception of our Lord [Epiphani. Hæres. li. 6]. Another writer, in a work entitled Synopsis de vita et morte Prophetarum, Apostolorum et Discipulorum Domini, alleges that Demas became a priest in a heathen temple at Thessalonica; but this work is probably of later date than Epiphanius, though attributed to Dorotheus, who flourished A.D. 303. The expression used by St. Paul is consistent with the opinion of Baronius, Hammond, and others, that Demas did not forsake the faith when he forsook St. Paul; and even with that of Grotius that he is the same as the Demetrius of whom St. John many years afterwards wrote that he had "good report of all men, and of the truth itself," and that he himself bore record to the same effect [3 John 12]. On the other hand, Epiphanius and the other writer named may have had authentic sources of information from which they drew their statements, but which are now lost to us.

DESCARTES. René Descartes is the father of modern philosophy. He was born A.D. 1596 in La Haye of the Iourdane, of an old French family, and educated from his fourteenth to his eighteenth year in the Jesuit College at La Flèche, which he left well grounded in the mathematics of the day, and with a smattering of so many branches of learning as to have earned for himself the name of "Le petit philosophe." He took service under Tilly in the Bavarian army, and was present at the Battle of Prague; but quitted the army again, A.D. 1621, and, after travelling for some years in Europe, settled down in Holland [A.D. 1629-1649] for the purpose of working out the philosophical problems that had engaged his attention by flood and field. His system was branded as Atheism. His astronomical heresies were a serious gravamen, and read curiously at the present day: "Quod terram stellis annumerat; solem qui hactenus inter planetas fuit stellis fixis accenset, terram vero stellis erraticis; lunam in terram quandam convertit, dum ei montes, valles tribuit; denique motum, qui per tot mille annos solis fuit, in terram transfert" [Maestricht, Novitatum Cartesianarum Gangrena, 1675]. He was proscribed by the University of Utrecht, but opposition only attracted to him a greater following; and having accepted an invitation from Christine, Queen of Sweden, to become her preceptor in philosophy, he accepted it, but died the same year at Stockholm [A.D. 1650], in his fifty-fifth year. Descartes established a powerful school; in which the first principles of modern rationalism were developed. To accept a creed because it was ancient, not because it was true, was to give up the prerogative of thought rather than to think. Evidence must lie at the bottom of truth, but first the character of evidence must be determined. All, therefore, must be discussed, all must be sifted, weighed, and tested; and, after an elimination of every false or doubtful element, that alone must be retained which shews the raciness of truth. It was the death-knell of Scholasticism. Everything for the future was to be determined by reason, not by prescription. Bacon had shewed that a wide induction of facts must precede all attempt at scientific generalization; Descartes taught that those very facts in the first instance should be subjected to the "experimentum crucis" of doubt; hence termed "methodical doubt" [Med. i.]. There was so much in all antecedent systems of philosophy that was self-contradictory and positively wrong, that he assumed this as the surest basis of operations in building up a newer philosophy. "De omnibus dubitandum" was the negative germ of his system. From doubting he proceeded to deny every fact and every conceivable opinion; even in mathematical demonstration there might be elements of doubt. Doubt was the certainty of uncertainty; the only sure truth in the intellectual world; itself the only doubt in which there is no doubt. Thought is only self-certain in its doubt. Uncertainty is the negative certainty of doubt; and this negative certainty is as the positive self-certainty of thought. Everything but thought is open to doubt; we may imagine that there is neither God nor matter, that we have no real bodily substance, but we can never imagine, while thought is thus occupied, that we do not think. Thought, therefore, is true existence, and the self-consciousness of thought is the self-consciousness of being; hence the famous Cartesian maxim "Cogito ergo sum." The negative certainty of doubt is the positive certainty of existence; the first is the negative origin of philosophic reasoning, the latter is its positive source. "Hæc cognitio, Ego cogito ergo sum, est omnium prima et certissima quæ cuilibet ordine philosophanti occurrat" [Cartesius, Princ. i.]. Being and thought are reciprocal terms, the one is the predicate of the other, either may be taken as subject. "Cogito ergo sum unica est propositio, quæ huic, Ego sum cogitans æquivalet" [Med. ii.]. It is a subjective inconsequential certainty founded, not upon reasoning, but on self-intuition. The phrase is not a syllogism but an equation. Thought = existence. Thought, therefore, in its external relations is doubt; esoterically it is self-evidence of its own real existence. Doubt with respect to all that is external to my own being is the certitude of that being; and giving power of abstraction from all external phenomena, it leaves a residuum of pure thought which is the certitude of my being. Spirit is the antagonism of bodily nature, which is and ought to be a subject of doubt; "de rebus omnibus præsertim corporeis dubitandum." It needs no other being for its existence, it is self-existent. But that being which needs nothing else for its existence is substance; the essential property without which substance cannot become the object of thought is attribute. Thus thought is the attribute of spirit, and spirit is thinking substance. The antagonism of spirit is corporeal existence or matter. As its abstract antagonism, matter has no relation with spirit; it has its own independent being, and is equally substance. The attribute of matter is abstractedly opposed to the attribute of spirit; which is involuntal thought; the attribute of matter is evolutional extension. Matter is extended substance. Hence the axiom "Cogito ergo sum" involves the two definitions, that spirit is "thinking substance," and that matter is "extended substance." The one is "res cogitans," the other is "res extensa." It is the foundation of the Cartesian philosophy. Its physics are based upon the latter definition, its metaphysics on the former. Thought, it should be observed, in Cartesian terminology means "consciousness." "Cogitationis nomine intelligo alia omnia, quæ nobis consciis in nobis fiunt, quatenus in nobis eorum conscientia est." Thought assures me of my own existence even though the objects of thought be illusory; I see an object, it may or not be, but the very act of thought assures me of my own individual being. Descartes could not deny the sensation caused by external objects; it was the proof to him of his being. All truth he said must be sure, but the only sure thing is that I exist.

Descartes manifestly speaks of substance in a double sense; and this at once gives inconsistency to an important part of his scheme. Infinite Substance means that which is self-existent and requires no other substance to bring it into being. It is its own cause. Finite substance is wholly dependent and must be referred back to the infinite; hence it is not substance according to the preceding definition. Therefore with reference to the Divine Substance, finite substance is not substance but create being; but with reference to its various individual forms it is substance, because these forms reciprocally exclude each other; they are antagonistic and exist in mutual independence of being. "Hæc enim est natura substantiarum quod sese mutuo excludant."

Ordinary consciousness has faith in the reality of its objects. Philosophical consciousness replaces faith with doubt; it does not believe, it thinks. Certainty only extends so far as thought reaches; subjective existence is co-ordinate with thought, and is surrounded with an atmosphere of light. Objective existence in the external world is wrapt in darkness and doubt. They are as the two hemispheres, the one light and the other dark; only there is no penumbra at their point of contact. In the former reigns the lorn and lonely "I," which is mated with no "Thou." The next step opens out the solution of this unpromising problem.

To know the objective is to resolve the antagonism between subject and object, for knowledge of the objective is only then possible when the two interpenetrate each other. Some "tertium quid" is required, a synthetic principle that is wholly independent of either, and may serve as a connecting link between the two, thinking and extended substance, subject and object. These two substances are mutually exclusive of each other, and for this cause they are limited; the "tertium quid" or synthetic principle must have no limit, or it would be implicated in one or other of these two substances, and be neutralized. Infinite Substance is the synthetic principle that alone can solve the antithesis of self-certainty on the one hand, absolute doubt on the other; that can throw the light of knowledge upon the world lying in the shades of doubt, and add abstract self-certainty to objective certainty. It is by this infinite Substance that from the axiom "Cogito ergo sum" doubt is raised into objective knowledge. This axiom is absolute certainty; and it is certainty because my perception of it is clear and distinct: and everything is to us truth of which we have a clear and distinct perception. "Illud omne est verum, quod clare et distincte percipio" [Medit. iii.].

Everything must have its cause. Cause and effect are connected as truly as thought and existence: Cause must always be at least co-extensive with effect; often it is of far wider range. The artist's idea is the cause of his work of art, but it also reaches far beyond it. In the first case the effect is contained formally in the cause, in the latter transcendently (eminenter). "Cogito ergo sum" is not clearer as an axiom than this relation of cause and effect. Ideas present themselves to the mind, whether imaginative or intellectual, and as modes of mental existence they are real. These ideas may represent substance, or the accidents of substance. They are the "objective reality" of Descartes; the objective reality of substance exceeding that of its accidents. But every effect must have its cause, and an idea is the effect of an occult cause; also if the idea be an objective reality, so also will its cause be an objective reality, and be comprised in its effect either formally or transcendently. This objective real cause is the "archetype," and every real idea has its archetype in or without ourselves. "Neque etiam in nobis idea sive imago ullius rei esse potest, cujus non alicubi sive in nobis, sive extra nos archetypus aliquis, omnes ejus perfectiones re ipsa continens, existat" [Princ. i.]. But the objective reality of an idea in its full dimensions may transcend the individual mind which conceives it; the mind then cannot be its origin, the cause must be external to it. The perfect cannot have its rise in the imperfect, or the greater in the less. "Hinc necessario sequitur me non solum esse in mundo, sed aliquam aliam rem, quæ istius ideæ est causa, etiam existere" [Med. iii.]. The ideal accident of substance may be conceived in my mind transcendently, for I am substance. The idea of substance can be conceived "formally" for the same reason; but the idea of an infinite substance is beyond my grasp, for I am only finite substance. This idea, therefore, is the only one that convinces me that there is an existence above and beyond my own, the only one that cannot possibly be devoid of cause without me, and which for this reason is an immediate representation to me of objective existence as a reality. As truly, therefore, as I exist, there is an existent being without me. I am no solitary existence. There is a "Thou" and an "It" in addition to the "I" of individual being; an objective as well as a subjective reality. Light is dawning on the darker hemisphere, and the mind has learned to acknowledge everything to be as really existent as itself, the idea of which presents itself as a clear and manifest entity. The idea of "objective reality" is gained. The sun of infinite substance has risen and cleared away the darkness. By the light of this sun every following school of philosophy has pursued its course, though some, as Spinoza, have confounded the light with the illumined substance, the subjective with the objective.

The infinite substance of philosophy is the God of theology. But it is not by the above process that the human mind has reasoned out for itself the idea of God. God Himself has implanted it indelibly in the soul; it is the artist's symbol engraved upon his work, "Tamquam nota Artificis operi suo impressa" [Med. iii.]. The Absolute or Infinite, therefore, is a third substance, external to and independent of thinking and extended substance, both of which are finite, and are reciprocally antagonistic; in infinite substance there is no antagonism. This notion of the immanence of the Deity in the mind occupies a very subordinate part in the Cartesian system. It is as a mere mathematical point, but it extended itself concentrically on every side, and in Spinoza's scheme it comprised the universe.

The idea of an external infinite substance thus impressed upon the soul as an innate idea, is the existence of God within the soul. The same axiom here also applies, by the same certitude that I exist because I am a thinking being. I am sure that God exists in the universe because He exists in my thought, "Deus cogitatur ergo est." It is a certitude gained by immediate intuition, and not by dialectical reasoning. The idea of God is at once the proof of His existence, for it is the proof of that very existence. Every other idea presented to the mind suggests the possibility of existence, the idea of God involves the necessity of His being. I may form the idea of a griffin in my mind, but the idea does not give reality to such a being. The idea of the infinite is exactly co-ordinate with infinite existence; the mind could form no idea of such perfection if it did not really exist. Anselm professed to demonstrate the subjective Being of God; Descartes argues that the innate idea of the Deity shows His immanence in the soul. The propositions are of a cognate character, they are not identical. According to Descartes, in infinite substance the essential idea and real existence are co-ordinate terms (essentia et existentia), and the idea of Perfect Being comprehends within itself that of necessary existence. To have by intuition an idea of God is to have an intuitive knowledge of His Being. The idea of God and the Being of God are one. It is from this point that Spinoza took up the reasoning, and carried out the Cartesian theory in a thoroughgoing Pantheistic sense. The Schools had always kept philosophy in subordination to theology, both however being treated as parts of an entire unity. Descartes disjoined them, and applied to philosophy a new ontological nomenclature. Spinoza advanced further, and devised a system with which theology could have nothing further to do: it was practical atheism; its god was necessity.

The "primum movens" that sets all in movement is the Deity; but the idea included in the Deity is not a Divine Being that works everything according to His own good pleasure and with a benevolent design, but a principle of mere causation irrespective of any moral quality; a mechanical Deity that is only so far supernatural as that Infinite Substance must always stand in antagonism with the finite. A very easy step led Spinoza to discard the supra, and to find in nature its own immanent causation. "Deus supra naturam" then became "Deus sive natura." God, who is the cause of objective knowledge in the mind, is as the phenomenon of movement in inert and passive matter. We are on the threshold of pure naturalism. All nature is a huge unvarying machine. The Divine Principle created indeed, but exercises no further control over the work of his hands. "Semel jussit semper pariet." DIOTREPHES. The Venerable Bede, in his Commentary on St. John, speaks of Diotrophes, who in some unexplained way withstood the authority of the Apostle [3 John 9, 10]—as "a proud and insolent heresiarch." Other writers have also included him among the early heretics, and Hammond inclines to the opinion that he became a Gnostic [Dissert. de Antichristo, xiii. p. 43]. There is however no early evidence whatever on the subject of his heresy, and the words of St. John point to his having assumed a schismatical rather than an heretical position at the time when his name is mentioned. He is not noticed by Epiphanius, nor by any of the other early heresiologists.

DISCIPLES OF ST. JOHN. [SABÆANS.]

DISCIPLINARIANS. The Ultra-Calvinists of the Elizabethan age, whose object was to substitute the Presbyterian system established by Calvin at Geneva under the name of "the Discipline" for the Episcopal system of the Church of England. It was against this party, and especially in answer to the writings of their leader Thomas Cartwright, that Hooker wrote his work on Ecclesiastical Polity. The Disciplinarian "platform," as they were accustomed to call it, comprised the abolition of bishops, archdeacons, deans, canons, and all other ecclesiastical officers except "presbyters." It would also have abolished all existing courts as tyrannical and oppressive, substituting in their place the far more tyrannical system of "consistories," such as Calvin originated at Geneva, or that of "presbyteries" and "kirk-sessions" which has been established in Scotland. It also aimed at great strictness in repelling persons from the Holy Communion. At one time the Disciplinarians had so much expectation of carrying out their plans as openly to express their conviction that Parker would be the last Archbishop of Canterbury. [ADMONITIONISTS.]

DISSENTERS. A general name used in England and Wales for those who belong to any sect, to distinguish them from members of the Church of England. The term came into use soon after the Revolution of A.D. 1688, and its origin is indicated by words used in the title and body of an Act passed in that year, in which those formerly called "Nonconformists" are styled "Their Majesties' Protestant subjects dissenting from the Church of England" [1 Will. & Mar. cap. 18]. Their present numbers in England and Wales are estimated as follows:—

SECTS.	Members.	Children under 15.	Total.	Percentage to Pop.
Methodists .	655,800	515,272	1,171,072	5.2
Independents .	296,300	232,807	529,107	2.2
Baptists .	233,088	183,140	416,228	1.8
Roman Catholics
English . .	100,240	78,760	179,000	.7
Irish . . .	469,260	263,300	732,560	3.2
Miscellaneous	118,518	93,121	211,639	.9
Total . .	1,873,206	1,366,400	3,239,606	14.

Deducting the Irish Roman Catholics the Dissenting population of England and Wales thus numbers 2½ millions, or 11 per cent. in a population of 22,704,108. [NONCONFORMISTS. PURITANS.]

DISSIDENTS. The inclusive name for Polish Protestants, as Dissenters is for the Protestants of England. It was first used at the time of the Reformation, appearing in the Acts of the Warsaw Confederation of A.D. 1573. [POLISH PROTESTANTS. Krasinski's Reform. in Poland, ii. 11.]

DOCETÆ. Heretics of very early date who held our Lord's Body to have been only the appearance (δόκησις) of a body, not a material or real one.

This heresy rests upon the notion of the inherent evil of matter. For with a material body inherently evil the Divine Nature cannot be thought to have united itself; neither in the systems of the Gnostics, who tried, by a succession of Æons, to bridge over the space between the Deity and Matter, could it be thought that the Æon, derived from the Divine Nature, whose office was to correct the work of the evil Demiurge, united himself with the handiwork of that Demiurge. In this difficulty, some were led to deny the reality of the body, some the truth of the union. The former were the Docetæ. Of them, some held that the Body of our Lord was merely simulated, that it was an immaterial phantasm: some allowed that it was a substantial body, but of a celestial substance.

Hippolytus ascribes this heresy to Simon Magus. "And so it was," he writes, "that Jesus appeared as man, when in reality He was not a man. He suffered, not as actually undergoing suffering, but appearing to the Jews to do so" [Refut. vi. 14]. Docetism thus appeared along with Gnosticism. But, again, Hippolytus [viii. 1-8] treats the Docetæ as a separate sect, and describes the system of Æons which they held. Of this system it is sufficient to say that it is much more developed than the system of Simon, and very nearly identical with the system of Valentinus. It appears, therefore, that this point of Gnostic teaching was brought more prominently forward, so as to give to a division of Gnostics a distinctive name. By this, consequently, is to be interpreted the statement of Clement of Alexandria, that Julius Cassianus was the author of the sect of Docetæ [Strom. iii. 13]. The tenet had been held before,¹ but Cassianus insisted more upon it. Cassianus was a disciple of Valentinus. He brought Docetism into notice in connection with Encratite austerity. His book, quoted by Clement, was On Continence, and Clement states that in this matter he agreed with Tatian, with whom he was contemporary. Of this Encratite phase of Docetism Jerome speaks, making Tatian the author of the heresy as Clement made Cassian: "Tatianus qui putativam Christi carnem introducens, omnem conjunctionem masculi ad feminam immundam arbitrabatur" [Comm. in cap. vi. Epist. ad Galat.]. It appears strange that Clement and Jerome should speak of the heresy as introduced by Cassian and Tatian; for there is no doubt that it existed in apostolic times, and was generally held by the Gnostics.

Serapion, consecrated Bishop of Antioch in A.D. 190 or 191, found the error in the Gospel of Peter, which he obtained from the successors of some heretics called Docetæ [Euseb. H. E. vi. 12]. Grabe and Beausobre suppose, with much probability, that this Gospel was forged by Leucius, who is placed by Lardner A.D. 135-150. [Hist. of Heretics, Leucius.] From this Gospel Serapion says he learnt what the heresy of Marcianus was. Lardner assumes that Marcianus was Marcion, but it is very improbable that Serapion was not before acquainted with the tenets of so notorious a heretic. If, however, Leucius were the author of the Gospel of Peter, we have a connection with Marcion, Leucius being his disciple. Marcion undoubtedly was a Docetic [Tertull. adv. Marc. iii. 8, 9]. So were Cerdo, Bardesanes, Saturninus [Epiph. Hær. xli. lvi. xxiii.].² In short, the tenets of Gnosticism include the Docetic heresy, unless, as an alternative, one of two opinions be adopted, either that upon Jesus, born of human parents, the Æon Christ descended, or that the body assumed by Christ was of celestial substance, which passed through the person of the Virgin as water through a tube. This last was the opinion of Valentinus³ [Epiph. Panar. Indic. tom. II. xi.] These three, it is evident, alike deny that the Word was made Flesh. See Irenæus, adv. Hær. III. xi. 3, and xvi. 1, V. 1, 2. The first, or Docetic opinion, was held both earlier and more widely than the other opinions. It was opposed by Ignatius, εἰ δὲ λέγουσιν τὸ δοκεῖν πεπονθέναι αὐτὸν [ad Trall. x.; ad Symm. ii.]; by Hermas, as to that form of it which separates the Son of God from the body in death, and so gives up the body itself [Past. III. v. 6: see Dörner, On the Person of Christ, A. i. 132]; and Hippolytus' ascription of it to Simon Magus is supported by the general voice of antiquity. Jerome said that the Lord's body was declared to be a phantom while the Apostles were still in the world and the blood of Christ still fresh in Judæa [adv. Lucif. xxiii.]. There can be little doubt, then, that the words of St. John [1 Ep. iv. 3] were directed against a sect of Docetæ then existing.

Thus in the early Church there were two principal heresies, each of several branches, the Gnostic and the Jewish. The Gnostics were in general Docetæ. Erring with regard to the nature of God, they allowed, with more or less departure from Catholic truth, a divine nature, more or less clearly defined, in our Lord; but they denied His humanity. The Jewish sects avoided the error of an inferior creator, but asserted that our Lord was no more than man. All the Docetæ denied the resurrection of the body. This is a necessary consequence of their denial of the reality of Christ's body; and it is perhaps correct to infer that those of whom St. Paul speaks [1 Cor. xv. 12] were Docetæ whose existence somewhat later is proved by St. John's words.

We return then to Cassian and Tatian, who gave a new impulse to Docetism. They are placed by Cave in A.D. 173-4. Of the former nothing more is known than has been mentioned, except that his exegetical works are referred to by Clement of Alexandria [Strom. i. 21], where Tatian's works are also referred to. Tatian was an Assyrian, founder of a sect of Encratite Gnostics, which lasted till after the fourth century. The congruity of Docetic and Hyperas-

³ Of Valentinus' opinion Irenæus says, "I have proved already that it is the same thing to say that He appeared merely to outward seeming, and to affirm that He received nothing from Mary" [adv. Hær. v. 1, 2]. To the minor subdivisions of the Valentinian School Docetism is attributed; as to the Secundians, by Philaster expressly [Hær. xl.], and by Epiphanius [Hær. xxxii.], in the general assertion that, regarding Christ, they agreed with the Valentinians: and to the Marcosians by Prædestinatus [cap. xiv.]. But of these minor sects, testimony is hardly required. Vincent of Lerins writes, "Valentinus, Eutyches, Saturninus, Marcion, Basilides (but see foregoing note), Cerdo et Manichæus phantasiæ prædicatores, aiunt filium Dei Deum, et personam hominis non substantiæ extitisse, sed actu putativo quodam et conversatione simulasse" [cont. Hær. cxx.].

² Basilides held the proper manhood of Jesus, and that the Divine Intelligence united itself with Him at His baptism [Neander and Ritter]. The later followers of Basilides received into their system the views of the Docetæ. [BASILIDIANS.]

etic notions is too manifest to be dwelt upon ; and the expression of their union is fitly the practice of using water alone in the Holy Eucharist. [HYDROPARASTATÆ.]¹

Lastly, with a theosophy differing from Tatian's, Manichæus held the fundamental principle of the inherent evil of matter, and followed it to its conclusion of the necessity of mortifying, not the flesh with its affections and lusts in the scriptural sense, but the body as a body. His Docetism consequently was identical with that of Tatian. Prudentius names Manichæus as the representative of the Docetæ [Apoth. 961].

DONATISTS. A sect which separated itself from the Church in Africa early in the fourth century. It grew out of the misguided zeal, passing into fanaticism, which had adopted or produced Montanism and Novatianism. This spirit working in the Church was sure to find or to make an occasion of schism, and it now laid hold of the tenderness shewn to the "Traditores" who had given up the sacred books to escape martyrdom in the Diocletian persecution. Irregular and schismatical proceedings had taken place before the year 311, such as the sending envoys to Carthage by Secundus, senior bishop, and therefore, according to the custom of the province, primate of Numidia, who through these envoys appointed a visitor of the Church of Carthage [August. Serm. xlv. cap. xv.]. Such also was the rebaptizing of Catholics, and the uncanonical treatment of bishops who had fallen in persecution, by Donatus of Casæ Nigræ [Optat. I. xxiv. and Dupin's note]. But the immediate occasion of the Donatist schism was the disputing the election of Cæcilian to the bishopric of Carthage, and the schism was formed by the irregular consecration of Majorinus as his rival, Donatus of Casæ Nigræ being the chief consecrator. Heresy was superadded, principally under another Donatus, successor to Majorinus in the schismatical episcopate, in the astounding assertion that the whole Church, with the exception of the Donatist section, had failed through the contamination of communion with Cæcilian. In this assertion was reduced to a dogma that which is in fact virtually assumed in every schism, namely, the purity of the separating body, and the apostasy of the body which is deserted. The Novatians had made a similar assertion but upon different grounds. Donatism is also a separate schism, inasmuch as there was a second departure from the Church and a second line of irregular consecrations. The character of the younger party is moreover distinguished from the elder by greater fanaticism.

In the beginning of the fourth century Mensurius, bishop of Carthage, was cited to appear before Maxentius, on the charge of concealing in his house the author of a libel on the Emperor. He died, in his return home, in the year 311. Two presbyters, Botrus and Celestius, aspired to the bishopric. They belonged to a fanatical party,² which Mensurius and his Archdeacon Cæcilian had opposed, the party which courted martyrdom not unfrequently from unhallowed motives. Optatus states that Botrus and Celestius, in order to further their own purposes, contrived to bring on the election and consecration without summoning the bishops of Numidia³ [Opt. I. xviii., Dupin's ed. p. 15]. This certainly implies that the Numidian bishops had customarily been summoned, whether of right or by courtesy, to assist at such elections. Cæcilian however was elected in their absence, and was consecrated by Felix of Aptunga, a suffragan of the proconsular province of which Carthage was the metropolis.

The disappointed presbyters organized an opposition to the new bishop. Donatus of Casæ Nigræ was put at its head, and it was strengthened by the wealth and influence of Lucilla, a Spanish lady residing in Carthage. The party comprised also those to whom Mensurius, on leaving Carthage, had entrusted the church property, which (to their disappointment it is said) they were obliged to refund to Cæcilian. At the invitation of this party seventy Numidian bishops, under Secundus of Tigisis, the Nu-

² There were those who, courting persecution, boasted unasked that they possessed copies of the Scriptures which they would not surrender. This Mensurius did not approve. He opposed also the visiting the martyrs in prison "incaute et glomeratim." [Compare Cyprian, Epist. v. Oxf. ed.]

³ Optatus' words are: "Botrus et Celestius, ut dicitur, apud Carthaginem ordinari cupientes, operam dederunt, ut absentibus Numidis soli vicini episcopi peterentur qui ordinationem apud Carthaginem celebrarent. Tunc suffragio totius populi Cæcilianus eligitur: et manus imponente Felice Autumnitano episcopo ordinatur." Dupin explains the words by the statement of Augustine, which will be quoted above, and refers the supposed right of the Numidian bishops simply to the consecration. But Optatus relates the election of Cæcilian so pointedly, after the statement of the absence of these bishops, that one cannot but infer his meaning to be that Botrus and Celestius (mistaking perhaps the propensities of the several parties) manoeuvred to prevent the Numidians taking part in the election. Augustine relates the objection as made at the Conference of Carthage [A.D. 410], when doubtless the objection was put in the form which appeared most tenable. Dupin states: "Secundus et Episcopi Numidiæ vocati Carthaginem ad ordinationem Episcopi invenerunt Cæcilianum jam ordinatum" [Hist. Donatist. p. viii.]. Optatus plainly states that the Numidian bishops were sent for after the ordination: "Ab his tribus personis contra Cæcilianum causæ confictæ sunt, ut vitiosa ejus ordinatio diceretur. Ad Secundum Tigisitanum missum est, ut Carthaginem veniretur" [p. 16].

midian primate, met at Carthage, and cited Cæcilian to appear at their synod. They alleged that an election and consecration in their absence was irregular, that Cæcilian's consecration was null, because his chief consecrator Felix was a Traditor, and they charged Cæcilian with cruelty to the confessors in prison. Cæcilian refused to obey their summons. They excommunicated him, and consecrated a rival, Majorinus, a member of Lucilla's household.¹

The first of these allegations against Cæcilian refers directly to the schism, the second to the incipient heresy of the Donatists; the third is a personal charge brought by way of aggravation.

It seems plain that Optatus has stated the first as resting on a supposed right of the Numidian bishops to take part in the election. At the Conference at Carthage it was stated differently, and made to rest on the claim of the Numidian primate to be the consecrator of the Carthaginian primate. The two claims are really inconsistent, for the latter supposes Numidia to be a distinct province with its own metropolitan, the former (unless the presence of the Numidian prelates was merely by invitation of courtesy, in which case no charge of irregularity could be founded on their absence) supposes the Numidian bishops to have seats in the provincial synod of Carthage. Nevertheless, it is possible that both claims were made, for the province was only of recent formation, and the primate may have claimed what he thought his new rights, and the bishops not forgotten their old customs. Neither are factious men very careful to be consistent. At the Conference of Carthage the Donatists objected that Cæcilian's consecration was uncanonical, because he had not sent for the primate of Numidia to come and ordain him, "ut princeps a principe ordinaretur." Augustine answered, "that Cæcilian had no need of this, since the custom of the Catholic Church was otherwise;" which was, not to have the Numidian bishops to ordain the Bishop of Carthage, but the neighbouring bishops of the province of Carthage; as it was not the custom at Rome to send for a metropolitan out of another province to ordain the Bishop of Rome, but he was always ordained by the Bishop of Ostia, a neighbouring bishop of the same province [August. Brevic. Collat. Tert. Die. 29]. The former claim, viz. to take part in the election, supposes the Numidian bishops to be of the proconsular province. But they had certainly acted as a separate province six years previously, when their synod met at Cirta, the civil metropolis, under the presidency of Secundus of Tigisis, to elect a bishop for Cirta. This independent action shews that the Numidian bishops were not an integral part of the provincial synod of Africa Proconsularis, and that their presence at the election of a bishop of Carthage was therefore unnecessary. In Cyprian's time Numidia and Mauritania were attached to the proconsular province [Cyp. Ep. xlviii. Oxf. ed.], and probably continued so nearly to the time of Constantine. The claim to take part in the Carthaginian election, if really made, was, it seems, an attempt to retain their old privileges under their new status.

The second allegation against Cæcilian was that he had been consecrated by Traditors, Felix of Aptunga, the chief consecrator, being charged with this crime. In this allegation, besides the question of the fact, there is also the question of the character of the fact. The crime of Tradition was a new one. It was a peculiarity of the Diocletian persecution to endeavour to destroy all copies of the Scriptures. Was the surrender of the Scriptures to be considered equivalent to a denial of Christ? Those who put forward the objection as a justification of their separation from Cæcilian must have asserted this equivalence, and rested on the rule of the Church that they who lapsed in time of persecution were not to be ordained. [See Origen, cont. Cel. iii. p. 143, Spenser's ed. Cyprian, Ep. lxxvii. Oxf. ed. Conc. Nic. Canon x., which refers to Apost. Can. liv. or lxi. Bruns' Canons, p. 17.] Cæcilian's adherents however did not argue the question of the canonical capacity or incapacity of Traditors for receiving and conveying the grace of ordination. They met their opponents on the question of fact; and the several courts to which, as we shall see, the case was submitted, acquitted Felix. The charge was retorted on the objectors with terrible distinctness and certainty. The Numidian bishops under Secundus had at Cirta waived the inquiries which were inculcating the larger number of the members of the synod, and had elected to the see of Cirta a Traditor, Sylvanus [August. cont. Crescen. iii. 30; Optat. I. xiv.]. The third allegation, which charged Cæcilian with cruelty, was also disproved.

The schism being thus formed by the consecration of Majorinus, and Cæcilian standing firm, the Donatists set the first example of referring spiritual affairs to the decision of the civil ruler. They prayed the Emperor to appoint a commission of ecclesiastical judges, specifying the bishops of Gaul as men from whom impartiality might be expected. Perhaps it may be considered to afford some show of excuse for this appeal, that the Emperor had limited to the adherents of Cæcilian the distribution of a large sum of money, sent by him for the relief of the African Christians. Constantine² issued a commission to Miltiades of Rome, with whom he joined the bishops of Cologne, Autun, and Arles; but the commission was afterwards extended, and in virtue of it twenty bishops met at the Lateran in Rome [A.D. 313] to try the case.

The decision was in Cæcilian's favour. So also was the decision of the Council of Arles [A.D. 314], and the judgment of the Emperor himself [A.D. 316], which were successively taken upon the prayer of the Donatists for a further hearing. By the two last courts Felix was acquitted as well as Cæcilian.

Majorinus was succeeded by Donatus, called the Great, to distinguish him from Donatus of Casæ Nigræ. Under him the schismatic principles of the sect ossified themselves into a formal heresy, and its fanaticism was largely increased. The factious conduct of the sect provoked Constantine to take severe measures with them; they were deprived of their churches, their bishops banished. A fanatical banditti sprung from the exasperated body, and these ruffians grew so strong, and spread so much alarm, that the Emperor, in fear of civil war, recalled his edicts, and tried to appease the Donatists by a toleration. But the Circumcellions were not to be so checked, nor the general body to be so appeased. Constans was obliged to have recourse to arms, but he used them in such a manner that punishment became persecution. Julian favoured the sect, and in no long time it spread over the larger part of the province of Africa, while in Numidia it had an uncontested superiority. It is said to have numbered four hundred bishops. Gratian and Valentinian prohibited the assemblies of the Donatists, and commanded that their churches should be closed or restored to the Catholics. But these attempts to stop the schism were in vain, and a law of Honorius in the year 405, occasioned by the renewed violences of the Circumcellions, commanded these men under the severest penalties to reunite themselves to the Catholic Church. Augustine had now brought his power to bear on the controversy. In the year 411 a conference, at which were present two hundred and eighty-six Catholic, and two hundred and seventy-nine Donatist bishops, was held at Carthage, at the command of the Emperor, and under the superintendence of the prætor Marcellinus. The Catholic bishops pledged themselves, in the event of reunion, to receive the Donatist bishops with all their ecclesiastical dignities, an act of self-denial which was met with pride and contempt. "The sons of martyrs can have nothing to do with the race of Traitors." After evasive delays St. Augustine was enabled to refute the dogmatical proposition which his adversaries finally advanced; he proved that the Church, by the unavoidable tolerance of wicked men, had not forfeited its character of sanctity, truth, and Catholicity [Döllinger's Ch. Hist. Cox's transl. ii. p. 101].

Marcellinus, the Emperor's deputy, who presided in the assembly, decided in favour of the Catholics, and ordered them to take possession of the churches which the Donatist bishops had unjustly become possessed of.

Another and a more decisive law of the year 413 produced the effect, that many of the Donatist communities, together with their bishops, passed over to the Church. The prudence of the Catholic bishops, and the moderation of the canons of the Council of Carthage [A.D. 418-419], which will be detailed hereafter, restored many to the unity of the Church. But the sect was not quite extinct until the seventh century.

This outline, however brief, will be sufficient to introduce the consideration of the essential points and leading character of the Donatist schism. Montanism, which arose in Phrygia, grew in Africa as in a congenial soil. Novatianism, which sprung from Africa, returned from Rome to be received in its birth-place with enthusiasm. Donatism is to be attributed to the working of the same schismatic spirit, springing from a perversion of the fervency and zeal of African Christianity. The disputed election of Cæcilian was but an opportune occasion for this spirit to shew itself, the simony of Lucilla was but an accident in its development. Montanism, in setting up its claim to be the Church, had sheltered itself under the pretence of a new prophecy, by which the constitution and discipline of the Church was to be perfected. Novatianism had cast off this disguise, and proclaimed itself the Church of the pure, simply from the discipline which it enforced. It was to be the true Church, because of the character of its members. The Donatists rejected these principles of the Novatians¹ as heretical, boasted that they deviated in nothing from Catholic doctrine and practice, but maintained that they alone possessed an uncorrupted priesthood, that the ministry of the Church Catholic was invalidated by guilt. Donatism was to be the true Church² in regard of the validity of its apostolical succession. The sectarians of Africa thus bade the Church stand by, in the first case because it was incomplete, in the second case because it was impure, in the third case because it was priestless. Consequently, while both Novatians and Donatists³ rebaptized the Catholics who joined them, there were these differences in their practice. The Donatists retained the use of chrism, and admitted the lapsed to penance, and did not condemn second marriages. They were very strong Episcopalians, however irregular in their mode of working out their principles, while Novatian appears to have rather yielded to Episcopacy from necessity than to have adopted it from principle. [NOVATIANS.]

Fanaticism, which was increasing in the African Church, thus gained a special object, the Catholic priesthood, against which it could concentrate itself; and it burst forth in profanation of Church, altar, and Eucharist, in everything which could mark contempt for the body it counted profane. Outrage and cruelty followed, culminating in the ruffianism and rebellion of the Circumcellions. These excesses were disapproved and checked by the governing body of the Donatists to the best of their power, but those who have themselves rebelled against authority are seldom able to enforce order among their followers.

The history of the Synod of Circa appears to guide us to the cause of this rigorous fanaticism. Inquiry being then made into the number of Traditors, so many of the bishops appeared to be implicated in that guilt that the assembly dared not proceed with the inquiry, and closed the matter by referring all to the judgment of God. It is commonly observed that men who have been guilty of a crime are most severe upon that crime; and it seems that the Numidian bishops, conscience-stricken at the extent of guilt, instead of endeavouring to possess their souls in patience in future trials, instead of revenging their disobedience upon themselves in repentance, revenged themselves upon others, charging Cæcilian (wrongfully however) with the guilt from which they were not themselves free, and drawing conclusions from that guilt which they had not drawn in their own case. The history of the Church presents many an example of such inconsistency. They were compelled by the necessity of self-justification to extend those conclusions to the whole body of the Church.

It has been already observed that the Donatists set the first example of referring spiritual affairs to the decision of the civil ruler. In the consideration of this point it must be borne in mind that the established constitutional doctrine of Rome was that the Republic (now the Emperor) was the religious as well as the civil head of the State.¹ Accordingly when Christianity was established (at the very time we are speaking of), and when Constantine professed Christianity, the Emperor, by constitutional rule, accepted the chief government of all estates of his realm, whether ecclesiastical or civil. But it remained to define the true limits of the peculiar and special jurisprudence which had grown up in the action of courts Christian, to define the limits and rights of the internal legislation of the Church. It is nothing wonderful that at the very first establishment of Christianity men had no correct notions of the nature and extent of the imperial supremacy; nor is it any special blame to the Donatists, for they share it with all Christendom, that zeal made them think it right to call in the secular power to advance what was believed to be the truth. Catholics and schismatics alike upheld the imperial supremacy when it was on their side. But there must be bounds to these concessions and allowances; and surely the nature of the crime with which Felix was charged, and the effect of the fact, if proved, upon Cæcilian's consecration, was a matter, if any could be, for determination by Church authority. Again the appeal from the Council of Arles to the Emperor cannot be extenuated by any uncertainty as to the limits of the imperial supremacy. It was at the petition of the Donatists that the Emperor, whether or not exceeding his legitimate powers, had appointed ecclesiastical commissioners to try the case; and when they complained of the insufficiency of the tribunal he summoned a synod so large that writers of good repute have asserted it to be a plenary council. To appeal from this to the Emperor in person was to surrender the liberties of the Church by denying the power of her synods. The Emperor himself felt that their conduct was not that of Churchmen: "Sicut in causis gentilium fieri solet, appellationem interposuerunt" [Optat. i. 25, and Dupin's note]. Vexed at their successive defeats, and urged by the haughty temper of Donatus of Carthage, the party now asserted their independence of the civil power as insolently as they had before submissively courted its aid. "Quid Christianis cum regibus, aut quid Episcopis cum palatio?" "Quid est Imperatori cum Ecclesia?" [Optat. i. 22, and iii. 3.] Nor did their opponents fail to remind them of the inconsistency. One suit appears to have been heard in a civil court at the request of the Catholics. It was one step in the controversy, a part of the case, the whole of which had been referred to the Emperor. Silvanus had been elected bishop of Circa or Constantina. A deacon, Naudinarius, was excommunicated by him, and in revenge betrayed the secrets of the party. He made known that Silvanus was a Traditor, and he revealed the simony of Lucilla. An inquiry into this was conducted by Zenophilus, Proconsul of Numidia, and ended in the banishment of Silvanus [Aug. cont. Cres. iii. 30. Gestu apud Zenoph. in Monum., Dupin, p. 261]. Ursacius, a Comes in the province, then beginning to restrain the Donatists by force, they reckoned him their first persecutor.

From the time of their condemnation by Constantine in A.D. 348, the Donatists remained in exile until the reign of Julian. Their demeanour towards this Emperor is a remarkable instance of the deterioration of mind and conscience produced by schism. The simple fact that they sought and obtained Julian's permission to return from exile is surely no blame to them, while at the same time the character of the man who favoured them, and the degree of favour shewed them, are not unimportant in forming an estimate of the party favoured. But there is sufficient evidence of unseemly flattery and unworthy compliances having been used to obtain the favour. Augustine quotes and comments upon their petition: "Vobis enim, qui sic nos arguitis (the subject being the friendship between the Catholics and Christian kings) quid fuit cum rege pagano, et quod est gravius, apostata et Christiani nominis hoste Juliano, a quo vobis basilicas quasi vestras reddi deprecantes, hoc in ejus laude posuistis, 'quod apud eum sola iustitia locum haberet? Quibus verbis (credo enim vos latine intelligere) et idololatria Juliani, et apostasia iustitia est appellata. Tenetur petitio, quam vestri majores dederunt; constitutio, quam impetraverunt; gesta, ubi allegaverunt. Evigilate et attendite; inimico Christi, apostata, adversario Christianorum, servo dæmoniorum, talibus verbis ille, ille, vester ille Pontius supplicavit. Itē nunc, et nobis dicite, 'Quid vobis est cum regibus sæculi?' [cont. Lit. Petil. ii. 203. See also cont. Ep. Parmen. i. 12]. A stronger proof of the character of the petition is the law of Arcadius and Honorius [A.D. 400], ordering the petition and Julian's Rescript to be posted up, "quo omnibus innotescat et Catholicæ confidentiæ stabilita constantia et Donatistarum desperatio fucata perfidia" [Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 37].

Socrates tells us that the way to Julian's favour was to vilify the memory of Constantius; an accusation of Constantius ensured the granting a request: without it Julian indulged his hatred of all Christians [iii. 9]. It is not unreasonable to conclude that in this way the Donatists gained Julian's ear, and laid themselves open to the bitter taunt of Optatus, "Eadem voce vobis libertas est reddita, qua voce idolorum patefieri iussa sunt templa" [ii. 16].

We must now turn to the action of the Church with regard to this sect, and to the status of the sect as determined by canon. The assembly at Rome under Miltiades was clearly not a proper synod, but a meeting of imperial commissioners. Its authority seems to be derived in part from the imperial supremacy, in part to be that of arbitrators. But as its decision was appealed against, and the appeal allowed, a discussion of its authority would be superfluous. It is all important, however, to ascertain, if possible, the character of the assembly of Arles. That it was summoned by the Emperor will be no difficulty to an English Churchman, and we may pass over that point as concerning those of the Romish obedience, with a reference to the Dissertation of Natalis Alexander, and the animadversions of his editors [Diss. v. vol. vii. p. 372, ed. Bingii ad Rhen. 1787].

Constantine, in his letter to Chrestus, says that he has summoned πλείστους ἐκ διαφόρων καὶ ἀμυθίων τόπων ἐπισκόπους [Euseb. H. E. x. 5]. Two hundred bishops met.¹ They were principally from Italy, Spain, and Gaul [Aug. cont. Parmen. i. 5], but the subscriptions shew also bishops from Apuleia, Dalmatia, Britannia, Sardinia, Sicilia, Africa. They held themselves to be a formal synod, and proceeded accordingly. Without accepting then the estimate which some have formed of this council, that it was plenary, we can hardly reduce it to the rank of a provincial council of Gaul. It reckons as a great council of the Western Church, and such Döllinger calls it. Besides the special consideration of Cæcilian's case, the council enacted twenty-two Canons. [Dict. of THEOL. COUNCILS.] Of these Canon viii. lays down the principle by which the baptism of heretics is to be judged, and by consequence allows the baptism of the Donatists, and condemns their practice of rebaptizing. Heretics are to be received with imposition of hands. Canon xiii. deals with the case of Traditors. Traditors of the clergy are to be degraded if the crime is proved by public process; ordinations by Traditor bishops are valid if no other crime is charged to the ordained. Some manuscripts add six more canons, of which one is that a convert, "de Donatistis vel de Montensibus," is to be received with imposition of hands, as their baptism is irregular. But these probably belong to some other council [see Mansi in loc.].

The status of the sect was determined by the great Council of Carthage which framed the celebrated African code.² By this code those who were baptized in infancy by the Donatists may be ordained if they renounce their heresy, and have been received into the Church by imposition of hands [Can. lvii.; see also Can. xlvii. a re-enactment of Conc. Carthag. III. xlviii.]: the Donatist clergy may be received, retaining the same honour, if the bishop of the place thinks fit [Can. lxxviii. This canon mentions a canon of a transmarine council to the contrary, which it does not pretend to annul, leaving each Church to its liberty]: Donatist dioceses on conversion may retain their bishops without consulting the synod; on the death of such bishops, the diocese may be united to another diocese if the people wish it; bishops who converted people before the decree of unity shall retain that people, but since that decree all churches with their dioceses, and all the utensils of the Church, shall be challenged by the Catholic bishops, whether the people be converted or not [Can. xcix.]: the Donatists are to be treated with lenity and temper, their leaders to be called to conferences [Can. lxi. xci. and xcii.].

The attempts of the Donatists to establish themselves elsewhere than in Africa were unsuccessful. The sect early tried to obtain a footing in Rome, and sent thither Victor, Bishop of Garbis in Numidia, one of the Synod of Cirta, to attach the African residents to the party. Victor could not obtain one of the forty basilicas of Rome, and was forced to wattle in a hill cavern for a conventicle, whence his few adherents were called Montenses. He was, Optatus writes, "Pastor sine grege, episcopus sine populo."

² In the year 418-419 all canons formerly made in sixteen councils held at Carthage, one at Milevis, one at Hippo, that were approved of, were read, and received a new sanction from a great number of bishops then met in Synod at Carthage. This collection is the code of the African Church, which was always in greatest repute in all churches next after the code of the Universal Church. This code was of very great authority in the old English Churches, for many of the excerpts of Egbert were transcribed from it. And though the code of the Universal Church ends with the Canons of Chalcedon, yet these African Canons are inserted into the ancient code both of the Eastern and Western Churches. [Johnson's Vada Mœcum, ii. 171.]

Yet there was a succession of schismatical bishops down to Optatus' time [Opt. ii. 4]. The attempt to gain a footing in Spain failed also completely. A bishop was settled there on one private estate, the estate of a woman whom the Benedictine editors of Augustine not unnaturally suppose to have been Lucilla. The absurdity of the Donatists' claim to be the Catholic Church was convincingly shewn. Augustine applied to the Church the Psalmist's words, "A finibus terræ ad te clamavi," and remarked, "Non est ergo in sola Africa, vel solis Afris, episcopum Romam paucis Montensibus,¹ et in Hispaniam domui unius mulieris ex Africa mittentibus" [cont. Petil. ii. 247; see also De Unit. Eccl. 6]. Not less instructive is the internal history of the sect. This presents two things for consideration—the connection of the Circumcellions with the Donatist body, and the breaking up of the Donatist body into minor schisms.

Gibbon, who calls the Circumcellions the strength and the scandal of the Donatists, states that they were peasants of Numidia and Mauritania who had been imperfectly reduced under the authority of the Roman law, who were imperfectly converted to the Christian faith, but who were actuated by a blind and furious enthusiasm in the cause of their Donatist teachers. They pretended also to restore the primitive equality of mankind, and to reform the abuses of civil society; and opened a secure asylum for the slaves and debtors who flocked in crowds to their holy standard [Decline and Fall, ch. xxi.]. Mere motives of polity, however, whether of ecclesiastical or civil polity, will not account for the fanaticism of the Circumcellions. It was not simple enthusiasm for their teachers that inspired them, but enthusiasm for their teachers because they believed themselves to be, in connection with those teachers, the chosen of God. To engender religious fanaticism there must be a belief of some more special and closer relationship to Almighty God than is possessed by those from whom the fanatic is separated; with the belief, in which lies the original spring of the fanaticism, that the relationship to God is not mediate through a body which God has chosen, but immediate and direct. Herein lies the difference and total opposition of the genuine enthusiasm of the Jew as one of a holy nation; of the Christian as a member of a holy body, and of the spurious enthusiasm, leading to fanaticism, of the self-sufficient Jew and the self-sufficient and sectarian Christian. In the former is the abnegation, in the latter the predominance of self. In the former the individual is holy because he is a member of a holy body, in the latter the body is holy because it has the aggregate holiness of all its members. Now this predominance of self may be either personal, by a perversion of the doctrine of election, which sets aside the general body of the Church as non-elect; or sectarian, by a perversion of the doctrine of the ministry, which sets aside the general body of the Church as destitute of the grace of God. The English Puritans were fanatics of the first kind, the Donatists were fanatics of the second kind. Both agreed in the self-righteousness by which they alike held themselves to be the only pure and holy of men. And from this sprang the attachment of the Puritan to his Gospel preacher and of the Donatist to his immaculate priesthood. The Circumcellions, therefore, we must consider to be a body which was inevitably formed from the inculcation of the fanatical principles of the Donatist body upon a ferocious and half-civilized population. It was on this account that the opposition to them from the moderate part of the body was in reality so weak. Excesses might be disavowed and condemned, but the original principle of the fanaticism could not be controverted. Gibbon remarks that habits of idleness and rapine were consecrated by the name of religion and faintly condemned by the doctors of the sect. [CIRCUMCELLIONS.]

It was not long before the sect suffered the usual fate of sects, and was subdivided. Donatus was succeeded in the bishopric of Carthage by Parmenian. Primian followed, A.D. 391; but presently Maximian was consecrated in opposition to him by no inconsiderable minority. Opposing councils were held; one by fifty-three Maximian bishops in the neighbourhood of Carthage, A.D. 394, in which Primian was condemned on the score of many irregularities and crimes. The synodal Epistle of this council is given by Augustine, Enarr. in Ps. xxxvi. Primian was again condemned by a council of one hundred bishops, which met at Cabarsassis in the province of Byzacena [Aug. cont. Crescon. iv. 6]. But the Primian party prevailed. Three hundred and ten bishops of his side met at Bagai (in Numidia [Dupin], incerta sedes [Fell]), and condemned Maximian and his twelve ordainers. Maximian's adherents were allowed to return to the main body without penance if they returned within a limited period [cont. Crescon. iii. 56, 60]. The Primianists now claimed the title of Catholic, and prayed the proconsuls to eject the Maximianists from their churches by virtue of laws made against the Donatists in favour of the Catholics. There seems to have been hesitation regarding the validity of the Maximian baptism, but after a while both the baptism and the orders of the smaller party were allowed. By this conduct the Primianists, or larger party, afforded the Catholics strong arguments against themselves. The taint of the many crimes for which Maximian had been condemned did not unchurch those who had been in communion with him: how could the taint of Cæcilian's crimes unchurch the whole of Christendom? The baptism of the Maximianists was valid: why not the baptism of the Catholics? [August. de Hær. lxi. ; cont. Crescon. iii. 1, 7, 14; Brev. Collat. iii. 8; cont. Gaud. i. 39.] The same argument is urged in the 69th canon of the African Code, which is, "That legates be sent to preach peace to the Donatists, both bishops and laity; and to shew them that they departed from the Church as causelessly as the Maximianists have from them; and that they receive converts from the Maximianists as the Church does from the Donatists, viz. allowing their ordination and baptism". [Johnson's abridged translation in Vade mecum, p. 196]. Augustine relates that there were many other divisions, little known, among the Donatists. Next in importance to the division of Maximian appears that of Rogatus, but the cause of division is uncertain. The party of Rogatists inclined to moderation, and rejected the aid of the Circumcellions.

DORMITANTES. [NYCTAGES.]

DORRELLITES. The followers of a fanatic named Dorrell, who appeared at Leyden in Massachusetts at the end of the last century, and proclaimed himself as a prophet sent to supersede Christianity. He denied the Resurrection of our Lord, and of Christians, declaring that the only resurrection known to the Scriptures was the change from sin to righteousness. But the Scriptures are only a type of true revelation, which is an inward light given to the soul; those who possess the latter being incapable of sinning. The outcome of his heterogeneous heresy was simply Antinomian Deism, as he denied also the Omniscience of God.

DORT, SYNOD OF. A Calvinist Assembly of the United Provinces of Holland, joined by Royal Commissioners from England, and by Deputies from Hesse, Bremen, Switzerland, and the Palatinate, held at Dordrecht, or Dort, in the years A.D. 1618-1619, regarding the Five Points in controversy between Arminians and Calvinists.

This Synod is of considerable interest both in ecclesiastical and civil history: in ecclesiastical history, not from any weight which its canons have in the Catholic Church, but as an exhibition of Calvinistic theology, and as the turning-point at which Calvinism, seemingly triumphant, began to decline, while Arminianism rapidly degenerated into a dangerous Latitudinarianism; in civil history, from its close connection with the contest carried on between the ambitious Maurice and the republicans who were headed by Barneveldt and Grotius.

Political and religious motives united to bring about the Synod. Maurice and his partisans in the States knew that a synodical condemnation of the Arminians would further their purposes, and they fostered and made use of the "odium theologicum" to hasten the ends of the "odium politicum." The States accordingly ordered the Council to be assembled on the 1st of November 1618. In each provincial synod six representatives were to be chosen, four or three clerics, two or three laics. In these synods gravamina and instructions to the representatives were to be prepared. In the provinces of Holland and Utrecht, where a formal separation had taken place between the Calvinists and Arminians, the number of representatives was to be divided between the two. Delegates were appointed by the States to open the Synod and to act as moderators. It is to be noticed that in A.D. 1618 the controversy between the two parties was limited to the well-known Five Articles; the other subjects of contention were of later date. The substance of the Five Articles is given in the article ARMINIANS, and need not be repeated at length. It is enough to remind the reader, that [1] is De Electione et Reprobatione; [2] De Universalitate Mortis Christi; [3] De Libero Arbitrio; [4] De Operatione Gratiae Dei; [5] De Perseverantia vere Fidelium.

The Synod met at the time appointed, and after several sessions spent in preliminaries, at the fifth session there was passed a citation to the leaders of the Remonstrants to appear in fourteen days, "Ut in eadem (synodo) dictos Articulos libere proponant, explicant, et defendant quantum possunt et necessarium judicabunt." Until the real business could begin, on the appearance of the Remonstrants, the Synod occupied itself in debates concerning catechisms, the translation of the Bible, and the baptism of heathens adopted into Christian families.¹ On the 6th of December the Remonstrants appeared. Episcopius was their leader and chief spokesman. As business was now about to begin, a difficulty occurred with regard to the Arminians (particularly those of Utrecht) who had been returned as members of the Synod; and it was agreed that they should be allowed to act as members of the Synod on condition of not consulting with and assisting the Citati. They determined, however, to join their brethren. The Remonstrants now made objections to the Synod. It was, they urged, only a dominant party sitting to judge those to whom it was notoriously opposed. It contained many schismatics, for with that dominant party rested the guilt of the schism in several provinces between the Arminians and Calvinists. The Synod, backed by the power of the moderators, commanded the Remonstrants to plead their cause. They did not refuse to do so, but difficulties arose as to the mode of doing it. The Remonstrants insisted on beginning with the point of Reprobation, which the Synod determined to defer till cognate points had been discussed; they objected to the system of interrogatories, not choosing to be catechized as by paedagogues; they insisted on full freedom of disputation. The Synod insisted on prescribing the course and manner of the discussion, and ordered each man, as cited separately, to answer separately for himself. The Remonstrants would not yield, and were dismissed, the prolocutor telling them that they came with a lie and went away with a lie, that their actions had all been full of fraud, equivocation and deceit. The Synod then proceeded to gather the opinions of the Remonstrants out of their published books. They obtained in writing the judgments of the deputies of the provinces, province by province, and of the deputies of the foreign churches, church by church; from which they framed their canons, on the first point 18 articles and 9 rejections of errors; on the second, 9 and 7; on the third and fourth, 17 and 9; on the fifth, 15 and 9. "All I can say is," wrote Walter Balcanqual, "me thinketh it is very hard that every man should be deposed from his ministry who will not hold every particular canon; never did any church of old, nor any reformed church, propose so many articles to be held sub pœna excommunicationis." He had before warned Sir Dudley Carleton of the course things were taking: "We are like to make the Synod a thing to be laughed at in after ages. The president and his provincials would have their canons so full charged with catechetical speculations, as they will be ready to burst; and I perceive it plainly that there is never a Contra-Remonstrant minister in the Synod that hath delivered any doctrine which hath been excepted against by the Remonstrants, but they would have it in by head and shoulders in some canon, that so they might have something to shew for that which they have said" [Balcanqual's¹ Letters in Hales' Remains, pp. 146, 141]. These canons may be read in the Oxford Sylloge Confess. 1827. To describe them we will borrow the words of a writer in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, who speaks of the Synod of Dort as an "assembly which by its absurd definitions shewed that it had yet to learn the mere elements of scholastic theology, yet which had the impudence to boast that its miraculous labours had caused hell itself to tremble" [xiii. p. 621].

The English commissioners to the Synod were Carleton, Bishop of Llandaff; Joseph Hall, Dean of Worcester; John Davenant, Margaret Professor, Cambridge, and Samuel Ward, Master of Sidney College, Cambridge. These were joined after a while by Walter Balcanqual, a Scottish divine. These were only King's commissioners, and the Church of England is no way compromised by any act of theirs. James' instruction to them may be seen in Collier, vii. p. 409, ed. 1852.

¹ Balcanqual, opposed as he was to the Arminians, quite saw the character of the other party: "They are so eager to kill the Remonstrants, that they would make their words have that sense which no grammar can find in them" [p. 144]. The president "makes canons and passes them by placet or non-placet, and then he hath so many of the provincials at command to pass what he will" [p. 140]. Both he and Hales complain of the treatment the foreigners met with [pp. 73, 78].

They appear to have followed their instructions, and to have held a moderate course. In the 145th session, upon the introduction of the Belgic Confession, Bishop Carleton made a protestation on behalf of Episcopacy. His declaration to this effect, published upon his return to England, is in Collier. This is mentioned also in Balcanqual's notes of that session [Hales' Remains, p. 161], but in the published Acts of the Synod no notice whatever is taken of the protestation [Acta, p. 148].

The tenets of Arminius were thus condemned by the Synod, and the Remonstrants were required to subscribe the condemnation. Upon their refusal about seven hundred families were banished by an order of the States General. Aided by the religious fanaticism which he had fostered, Maurice summoned a council of his own creatures, and condemned Barneveldt to death, Hoogarbets and Grotius to perpetual imprisonment.

DOSITHEANS. There were two sects of this name, neither of them Christian; one, which might perhaps be more properly called Dosthenes,² an ancient Samaritan sect; the other, the followers of Dositheus, a Samaritan, who after our Lord's death (but at what exact time is not known) claimed to be the Messiah.

I. According to Jewish tradition the name of the priest sent to teach the settlers in Samaria [2 Kings xvii. 27] was Dosthai. Fabricius pointed out that this Dosthai was frequently confounded even by ancient writers with the later impostor. Thus the author of the Recognitions, knowing of the later Dositheus, and believing that the Sadducees were connected with the Dositheans (that is, with the early sect, as is stated by Epiphanius) has brought down the rise of Sadduceism to the late date, to the time of John the Baptist [i. 54]. This confusion will account for several inconsistencies in the notices of Dositheus. It explains, e.g., why many of the Fathers, as Gieseler remarked, attribute to Dositheus, as if peculiar to him, what was common to all the Samaritans. Fabricius further identifies with Dosthai the Dositheus of Epiphanius [note on Philast. cap. iv. in Oehler's Corp. Hæres. i. p. 8]. No doubt Epiphanius, as also Pseudo-Tertullian, speaks of an early Samaritan sect: for he derives from it the ancient sect of the Sadducees [Epiph. Hæres. xiii. xiv.; Ps.-Tertull. cap. i.]. But it is not explained how the original Dosthai, a teacher of the whole population, became founder of a sect of Samaritans; nor does the character of that sect at all suit the early times of Sennacherib. The sect is manifestly the product of a later time, though still early with regard to the time of Christ. Whether it was founded by a second Dosthai or Dositheus, or took the name of the original teacher of the Samaritans, imports little. These Dositheans believed in the Resurrection; lived an ascetic life, some in celibacy, some avoiding second marriages,¹ practised circumcision, and kept the Sabbath as the other Samaritans did. [See Drusus, de Tribus Sectis, III. iv. vi.]

II. That about the time of our Saviour there was a Dositheus, a Samaritan, who claimed to be the Messiah, is certain. Origen states that Dositheus, the Samaritan, endeavoured to persuade his countrymen that he was the Christ foretold by Moses; that this was after the time of Christ; that he appears to have gained some disciples, but that the sect did not flourish, and was extinct at the time of Origen's writing [cont. Celsum, pp. 44, 382, ed. Spencer]. Jerome says that he preceded the coming of Christ [adv. Lucif. 23]. Origen's statement is more probably correct; not only because he is the earlier authority, but because the false Christs were in general after Christ's death, and because Dositheus' connection with Simon Magus, and the Gnosticism he appears to have held, require the later date. With Simon, Dositheus is connected; but some make him the master, some the disciple. The author of the Recognitions makes him the master, influenced probably by the confusion with Dosthai. Theodoret reckons the Dositheans a branch of the Simonians [Hæc. fab. i. 1]. In the Clementine Homilies, Simon and Dositheus appear as followers of John Hemero-Baptist, and contending after his death for the leadership of the party [ii. 24]. Starting from the theology and practice of the Samaritan ascetics, Dositheus took so much of the system of Simon as would facilitate his pretension to be the prophet like Moses. Thus Origen tells of his over scrupulous observance of the Sabbath [de Princ. IV. i. 17], and couples him with Simon, the latter pretending to be the great power of God, the former to be the Son of God Himself [cont. Cels. vi.]. Origen has been quoted as saying that the sect was extinct. In another place [in Joan. tom. xiv.] he speaks of Dositheans then existing, who asserted their master to be alive. As late as A.D. 588 the Dositheans and Samaritans had a controversy in Egypt about Deut. xviii. 18, Eulogius the Patriarch of Alexandria interfering in the dispute, and publishing an oration entitled Decretum in Samaritanos. Some of the Samaritans asserted that Joshua was the prophet like Moses, others that the prophet was Dositheus, the contemporary of Simon Magus. [Eulogius in Photius, Bibl. Cod. 230, s. f.]

DOULEIANS. [PSATHYRIANS.]

DRABICIANS. A temporary sect of MORAVIAN BRETHREN, followers of a fanatic named Nicolas Drabik or Drabicius, who appeared in Hungary about A.D. 1630. Drabik was a pedlar who had been compelled to leave Moravia, his native country, when the Protestants were driven thence by persecution in the previous year.

A few years later he professed to have seen heavenly visions announcing the approach of great armies from the North and the East, which were about to overthrow the house of Austria. These visions he printed in the form of a prophetic book, prefaced by the formula, "The word of the Lord came to me," and entitled Light out of Darkness. They spoke of the reigning dynasty as being the house of Ahab, which, like it, was doomed to be utterly destroyed, and pronounced a sentence of equally rapid destruction upon Rome. This book was written in his native tongue, but was translated into Latin (then spoken as much as the Magyar in Hungary) by one of Drabik's followers, and printed at Amsterdam in the year 1665. Its fanatical contents, and the number of followers which such teaching attracted, caused Drabik to be apprehended and tried for treason and heresy, and upon his execution in 1671 his followers are lost sight of in the ten years' severity which followed this and several other rebellious movements among the Protestants of Hungary. [Debrezenus, Hist. Eccl. Reform. in Hungar.; Hist. of Prot. Ch. in Hungary.]

DUALISTS. Early Christianity was so much brought into contact with Oriental philosophy, that many speculative thinkers were led to seek for some means of reconciling its fundamental theories with Christian revelation. Hence the Oriental theories of two Deities, one the author of good, the other the author of evil, were introduced into every early heresy that pretended to view Christianity in its philosophical aspect; and the opinion so floating down along the stream of Eastern heresy, found a broader means of diffusion in the Manichæan system, which infected not only the waning East, but mediæval Europe. Some account of the dualism of particular sects will be found under their respective names, but for a general view of the origin and course of the theory the reader is referred to the article DUALISM in the DICTIONARY OF THEOLOGY.

DUCE SANCTORUM. A complimentary title given to the CIRCUMCELLIONS by Donatus as the military "champions or leaders of the Saints."

DUCHOBORTZI. A name signifying "combatants in the spirit," which was given to a Russian sect of BEZPOPOVSHINS, whose existence dates from the reign of the Empress Anne in the middle of the eighteenth century [A.D. 1730-40]. From the opposition of the sect to the use of devotional pictures or "icons" it is also sometimes called Ikonobortzi.

The Duchobortzi were persecuted under Catharine II. and Paul I. [A.D. 1762-1801] for refusing to serve in the army, but they were tolerated under Alexander I. [A.D. 1801-1825], who allowed them to settle in some numbers on the banks of the river Molochna. They believed themselves to be descended in a mystical manner from Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, and were sufficiently conservative in their views to reject the emendations of the Patriarch Nikon and to use the old Slavonic liturgies in public worship. They combined in a remarkable degree a metaphysical belief, full of abstract ideas, and much resembling Gnosticism, with gross practical superstitions. One of their most famous leaders, named Kapustin, who resided at Terpenie, introduced the community of goods. He was imprisoned [A.D. 1814] for proselytizing, and died [A.D. 1820] in a cave in which he had spent the last few years of his life. The following are some of the chief points of their creed, as presented to Kochowski, governor of Jekatrinoslaf, during their persecution by Catharine II. :—

“God is only one, but He is one in the Trinity. This holy Trinity is an inscrutable Being. The Father is the light, the Son is the life, the Holy Ghost is the peace. In man the Father is manifested as the memory, the Son as the reason, the Holy Ghost as the will. The human soul is the image of God, but this image in us is nothing else than the memory, the reason and the will. The soul had existed before the creation of the visible world. The soul fell before the creation of the world, together with many spirits who fell in the spiritual world alone; therefore the fall of Adam and Eve, which is described in the Scripture, must not be taken in its usual sense; but this part of the Scripture is an image, wherein is represented, firstly, the fall of the human soul from a state of exalted purity in a spiritual sphere, before it came into this world; secondly, the fall, which was repeated by Adam in the beginning of the days of this world, and which is adapted to our understanding; thirdly, the fall, which since Adam is spiritually and carnally repeated by all of us men, and which will be repeated till the end of the world. Originally the fall of the soul was brought about by its contemplating itself, and beginning to love only itself, so that it turned away from the contemplation and love of God, and by a voluntary pride. When the soul was for its punishment enclosed in the prison of the body, it fell for the second time in the person of Adam, through the guilt of the seductive serpent; that is to say, through the evil-corrupted will of the flesh. At present the fall of all of us is caused by the seduction of the same serpent, which has entered into us through Adam, through the use of the forbidden fruit, that is to say, through the pride and vaingloriousness of the spirit, and the lasciviousness of the flesh.”

With regard to miracles the Duchobortzi said, “We believe that Christ has performed them. We were ourselves through our sins dead, blind, and deaf, and He has animated us again. But we do not know of any outward bodily miracles.”

This last view did not imply the rejection of Holy Writ as either false or as uninspired by God, but they maintained that everything recorded there had a mysterious and symbolical meaning which was exclusively revealed to themselves. The history of Cain was an allegory of the wicked sons of Adam, who persecute the invisible church typified by Abel. The confusion of tongues at Babel was the separation of churches. The drowning of Pharaoh and the Egyptians was a symbol of the defeat of Satan, who, with all his adherents, will perish in a Red Sea of fire, through which the elect, i.e. the Duchobortzi, will pass unscathed. The same principle of interpretation was applied to all the facts of the New Testament, which were not considered to have literally taken place, but to be an allegorical mode of conveying spiritual truths.

This metaphysical creed did not preserve the members of this sect from gross practical superstitions and the exercise of intolerable cruelties. A judicial inquiry ordered by the government [A.D. 1834-9] established the fact that they gave asylum to military deserters, concealed the crimes of their brethren, and were in the habit of carrying off all whom they suspected of defection from their sect and from the regulations laid down for its welfare by Kapustin, their convert and leader in the earlier part of the present century, to an island of the Molochna, ironically termed by them Ray i Muka, i.e. “paradise and torment,” and putting them to death in various ways. They were sentenced by the Emperor Nicholas I. to transportation to the Trans-Caucasian provinces, where they were so divided from each other that they could not meet for consultation or for any form of public worship.

DUTCH PROTESTANTS. The Reformation spread in the Netherlands in spite of State opposition, rather than in consequence of royal favour. The writings of Erasmus on the abuses of religion, quite early in the sixteenth century, and those of Luther some years afterwards, first began to rouse general attention to the subject, the latter works having become so popular that Charles V., two years after his accession to the Empire of Germany [A.D. 1521], placed them under a ban throughout Holland. From this time to the end of his reign [A.D. 1556] the Emperor pursued a policy of extermination which effectually checked for the time the progress of Protestantism. It is calculated that at least fifty thousand persons were put to death for their religious opinions during this period, including a vast number of the Anabaptists, whose outrages cast discredit on the reformed doctrines generally, and whose political principles went far to justify the imperial severity. In consequence of the continued spread of the obnoxious doctrines the Inquisition was introduced from Spain [A.D. 1550], and was mercilessly worked under Philip II., who succeeded his father A.D. 1556, and by the Romish prelates (increased by him from five to seventeen in number), under the leadership of Granvella, Cardinal bishop of Arras. The Dutch Confession of Faith, “Confessio Belgica,” consisting of thirty-seven articles [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS], was publicly put forward in 1562, probably with a view of mitigating, if not the cruelty of the Inquisition, at least the antipathy of the authorities, by proving the political harmlessness of the doctrines of the Reforming party. This manifesto was disregarded, as also was a protest signed [A.D. 1566] by a hundred thousand Protestants. Under a feeling of exasperation many of the latter now began to retaliate, by attacking the churches of the opposite party and breaking their ornaments; and the title of "Gueux," or beggars, has been contemptuously bestowed upon the ringleaders of these iconoclastic tumults. The Duke of Alva, with Spanish and Italian soldiers, was sent to chastise them [A.D. 1567], but the national spirit was now fairly roused, and nobles and people alike combined to throw off the oppression of a foreign yoke. William of Orange, who had openly espoused the Protestant cause, was placed at the head of the revolt against Philip II., and after several years of varying success was elected Stadtholder [A.D. 1573]. Six years later he had been so far successful that the seven northern provinces were rent from the Spanish rule [A.D. 1579]. The Roman Catholic religion was formally interdicted, and a Protestant university was founded at Leyden, from which time [A.D. 1581]

Holland has remained as staunchly Protestant as the Lower Provinces, constituting the modern kingdom of Belgium, have continued devotedly Catholic. The Protestantism of Holland assumed a strong Calvinistic complexion, the Dutch Confession having been avowedly based on that of the French Protestants, while, at the first provincial synod held at Dort [A.D. 1574], the Heidelberg Catechism was recognised and ordered to be publicly taught. There is contemporary evidence of this fact in a letter which has been preserved, written by Viglius Van Zuichem, dated Brussels, May 23rd, 1567, and in which the following sentence occurs:—"Very few of them abide by the Confession of Augsburg, but Calvinism has possession of nearly every one, for the door being opened by the Lutherans to further errors nearly all of them proceed beyond" [Gieseler's Eccl. Hist. iii. 1, 559]. In recent times Holland has been a hotbed of Rationalism. [ANABAPTISTS. DORT, SYNOD OF. MENNONITES. RATIONALISTS.]

EBIONITES. A sect of heretics developed from among the Judaizing Christians of Apostolic times late in the first or early in the second century. They accepted Christianity only as a reformed Judaism, and believed in our Blessed Lord only as a mere natural man spiritually perfected by exact observance of the Mosaic law.

It is disputed whether these heretics were so designated from a leader named Ebion, or whether they were called Ebionites because the Hebrew word Ebion (עֲבִיּוֹן) expressed the "poor" substance of their creed, which was that return to "the weak and beggarly elements" (τὰ ἀσθενῆ καὶ πτωχὰ στοιχεῖα) of an effete law so strongly condemned by St. Paul [Gal. iv. 9]. If the longer recension of his Epistles is genuine, St. Ignatius writes in such a manner as partly to support the latter opinion, saying of the Judaizer, "such a man is poor in understanding, even as he is by name an Ebionite" [Ignat. ad Philadelph. vi.]. The same may be also said respecting a statement of Origen that "the Ebionites, who savour of earthly things, derive their appellation of 'poor' from their very name, for 'Ebion' means 'poor' in Hebrew" [Orig. de Princip. iv. 22]. On the other hand, Tertullian, who wrote earlier than Origen, distinctly speaks of "the heresy of Ebion" as being confuted by St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians and the Gospel of St. John [Tertull. de Præsc. Heret. xxxiii.; de Carn. Chr. xxiv.], says that certain opinions are "very suitable for Ebion" [Tertull. de Carn. Chr. xiv.], and that Ebion believed Christ to be a mere man [ibid. xviii.]. These passages shew that Tertullian had no doubt as to the existence of an individual heretic so named; later writers all speak of him as a real person; and no writer whatever of early times expresses any actual doubt as to his existence. There is, in fact, no better historical ground for supposing that there was no such person as Ebion than the play upon the name, which seems to have been suggested by St. Paul's apposite language respecting the poverty of a Judaizing creed; and it would be much the same to suppose that there was no such person as Heber because a similar play upon the name was observable in the case of his descendant "Abram the Hebrew" or "crosser over." The non-existence of Ebion is however maintained by Vitranga [Obs. Sacr. ii. 127], Le Clerc [Hist. Eccl. 476], Priestley [Hist. early Opin.

177], and Matter [Hist. du Gnost. ii. 320]. His existence is supported by Fabricius [Annot. ad Philast. 81], Ittigius [de Hæresiarch. 59, and App. 17], and Bishop Bull [Judic. Eccl. Cath. ii. 17]. Other writers of less importance are also referred to in Burton's Inquiries into the Heresies of the Apostolic Age [Burton's Bampt. Lect. 496].

It is easy to trace up the Ebionite heresy to the Judaizing Christians of whom St. Paul so frequently wrote, and whom he so vigorously condemned. When Jews first became Christians they all agreed in observing the Mosaic law, as did the Apostles themselves, at least during their residence in Judæa. But Hebrew Christians soon began to differ among themselves as to the necessity of such observance. Certain "men from Judæa" criticized and objected to the free manner in which Jewish customs were set aside by the Christians of Antioch, and the consequent dispute had to be referred to the Apostles at Jerusalem. Before that final tribunal the objectors were supported by "certain of the sect of the Pharisees who believed," and a distinct Judaizing party seems at once to have been formed [Acts xv. 1-31]. The fanaticism of this party resisted even the authority of the Apostles. They would not recognise St. Paul's mission to the Gentiles or his office as an Apostle, and his life was, hence, a continual struggle with them. In Galatia the Judaism which opposed him was "of the sharp Pharisaic type, unclouded or unrelieved by any haze of Essene mysticism, such as prevailed a few years later in the neighbouring Colossian Church. The necessity of circumcision was strongly insisted upon. Great stress was laid on the observance of days and months, and seasons and years. In short, nothing less than submission to the whole ceremonial law seems to have been contemplated by the innovators. At all events this was the logical consequence of the adoption of the initiatory rite" [Prof. Lightfoot, Comm. on Galatians, p. 26, et seq.]. At Philippi the opposition was of the same character [Phil. iii. 3-14]. At Corinth [2 Cor. xi. 4, 22], as most probably in Galatia, emissaries from the headquarters of Judaism, coming with commendatory letters [2 Cor. iii. 1], headed the opposition. Their ministration was of the letter of the Old Testament, which, although glorious in its proper period, was even then, and much more therefore since Christ's coming, a ministration of death. These false apostles, transforming themselves into apostles of Christ, were really ministers of Satan in the guise of ministers of the righteousness of the New Testament [compare 2 Cor. iii. 1-9 and xi. 13-15]. Although, then, circumcision and the rites of the law are not specified, this general description, and the pretence of the leaders that they were Hebrews of the Hebrews, sufficiently mark the character of the false teaching. At Colossæ, St. Paul's opponents are of a different character. They appear to be Jews of the Essene school, with elements of theosophy which belong to Gnosticism. Thus, Col. i. 16, ii. 18, 19, are statements of the true doctrine of angels, and of the dependence of the whole Church on Christ, in opposition to the celestial powers of Gnostic theories, to the vanities of a deceitful philosophy [ii. 8], to fables and endless genealogies [1 Tim. i. 4], to profane and vain babblings and oppositions of science falsely so called [1 Tim. vi. 20]. The rudiments of the world [Col. ii. 8, 20], denoting Judaism [see Gal. iv. 3, 9], exhibit themselves not only in meats and drinks, holy days, new moons, and sabbaths of Pharisaism, but also in the "Touch not, taste not, handle not" of Essene asceticism. [ESSENES.]

The connection of the Ebionites with Cerinthus appears to rest upon sufficient testimony. It is shewn in the myth or the historical fact, whichever it be, that the Eponymus of the sect was the successor, perhaps the pupil, of Cerinthus. Whether there was a man Ebion, from whom the sect was called, is a matter comparatively unimportant. That which is shewn alike by the fact or the myth, the transmission of doctrine, is the really important point, and it is in itself most probable. The appendix to Tertullian's De Præscr. states it thus, "Hujus (Cerinthi) successor Ebion fuit, Cerintho non in omni parte consentiens."¹ Philastrius also declares Ebion to have been a scholar of Cerinthus. Cerinthus was himself of Jewish extraction; he insisted on the observance of the law; his esoteric teaching was mainly founded on the Cabbala—all which points would recommend him to the Essene Christians: and on the other hand, their desire to identify Judaism and Christianity could not but tend to depreciate the character of our Lord, to rank Him with Moses, and therefore to predispose them to learn from Cerinthus to deny His divinity. It is easy to imagine, and appears to be the natural result of such a combination, that the Jews, who had originally derived their Christianity from the Apostles, surrendered to Cerinthus their belief in our Lord's proper divinity, but retained their belief in His miraculous birth, and thus formed the higher of the two classes named by Origen; while those who joined the party later, after Cerinthianism had established itself among them, accepted only so much of Christianity as Cerinthus had to give, and formed the lower of the two classes.

The doctrines of the Ebionites may be shortly stated as follows, on the authority of Irenæus, Hippolytus, Tertullian, Eusebius, and Theodoret. They believed in the creation of the world by Almighty God, therein differing from Cerinthus; their opinions (i.e. of one party) with respect to our Lord were similar to those of Cerinthus and Carpocrates, for they considered Him a mere common man, raised above other men only by His exalted virtue; holding His birth to have been by ordinary generation, yet that He was more glorious than the prophets, inasmuch as God's angel dwelt within him.

A second party did not deny Christ's birth of a Virgin by the Holy Ghost, yet did not acknowledge His pre-existence. They practised circumcision, and persevered in the observance of all customs enjoined by the law, of the sabbath, and other similar rites of the Jews, saying that otherwise the servant would be above his lord: and they held this observance to be necessary to justification. They were so Judaic in their style of life as even to adore Jerusalem as the house of God. On the other hand, they also celebrated the Lord's day in commemoration of Christ's Resurrection. In the Holy Eucharist they rejected the commixture of the "heavenly wine" [HYDROPARASTATÆ], and wished it to be "water of the world only," not receiving God so as to have union with Him. They used the Gospel according to Matthew or, that is, the Gospel of the Hebrews; those who held our Lord's human birth the Gospel of the Hebrews; those who held His miraculous birth the Gospel of St. Matthew [Theod.]; they rejected all the Epistles of St. Paul, whom they branded as an apostate from the law.

These notices belong to the earlier Ebionites. In Epiphanius we have a description of the later or Essene school. He states in general [Hær. xxx.] that the Ebionites, in imitation of the Samaritans, go beyond the Jews. It will be remembered that Epiphanius considered the Essenes to be a Samaritan sect. This Essene element appears in voluntary poverty, in ceremonial washings, as, e.g., after the touch of a person of another religion, in abstinence from flesh and wine. But Essene practice was forsaken in refusing the honour once paid to virginity, in denying the duty of continence, in allowing divorces and remarriage without limit.

The Dualism which Epiphanius attributes to the Ebionites appears to have been held by them before Elchasai joined them. [ELCHASAITES.] Epiphanius describes it while speaking of Cerinthus and Ebion [xvi. compare with xiv. and xv.]. Two, it is said, were appointed by God, Christ and the Devil; to the former was assigned the world to come, to the latter the present world, by the ordinance of the Almighty, at the request of each [DICT. OF THEOL., DUALISM, p. 223, d.]. This delegation of the kingdoms to two opposing powers involves the conception of the Supreme Being not ruling His creation by His providence and grace, but existing apart; the conception of Bythus and Sige. And, further, when we connect it with the emanations of the Cabbala, from which the world was evolved, we are led to the Zoroastrian tenet that the First Principle and Cause of all, existing in solitude, contained within itself the germ of antagonizing principles, light and darkness. It may be concluded, therefore, that Essene Ebionites held those parts of Gnosticism which were contributed to Gnosticism by the Cabbala, and were at least ready to adopt its other elements. They held a partial or undeveloped Gnosticism.

Jerome states that the Ebionites held millenarian doctrine [Comm. ad Esa. lxi.]. Optatus Milevitanus states that they were Patripassians [lib. iv. de Schism. Donat.]. His authority is not given, and the statement is not in itself probable [Ittigius, de Hæresiarch. l. vi. 8].

Epiphanius relates that Cerinthus and Carpocrates used the same Gospel as the Ebionites, and wished to prove from the genealogy at the beginning of Matthew's Gospel that Christ (Jesus) was born of Joseph and Mary: but that the Ebionites had a different notion; for they cut away the genealogies in Matthew and began with the words, "In those days," iii. 1 [Hær. xxx. 14]. The Ebionites felt that the Cerinthian argument from the genealogy was inconclusive, and took the surer course of rejecting the genealogy.

ECEBOLIANS. This was a favourite controversial nickname in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries for those who changed their opinions. So Bullinger, in A.D. 1566, classes together "Ecebolians, Lutherans, and semi-Papists" [Zurich Letters, i. 169]; and so Antonio de Dominis was called "Alter Ecebolius" after his return to Rome in A.D. 1622. The original Ecebolius was a sophist of Constantinople, who professed to be a Christian under Constantius, turned his coat to the colour of heathenism during the reign of Julian the Apostate, and returned to Christianity again in that of his successor [Socr. Hist. Eccl. iii. 1, 13].

ECHETÆ [ἡχῆται]. Some monks are mentioned under this name by Nicetas Choniates, who held it to be a religious duty for monks and nuns to follow the example of Moses and Miriam by celebrating Divine service with dancing and exuberant displays of joy. In all other respects they were, he says, orthodox [Nicetas, Thesaur. Orthod. fid. iv. 38].

ECKHART. [FRIENDS OF GOD.]

ECLECTICS. A school of philosophers which arose at Alexandria in the third century, and took its name from the principle on which it was founded, that of selecting truths out of every system in which they were to be discovered (πᾶν τὸ ἐκλεκτικόν), and combining them into one common theology.

Although the eclectic principle is to be traced in the writings of Clement of Alexandria, the definite formation of a school of thought upon it is traceable to Ammonius Saccas [A.D. 193-242], his contemporary and survivor, who carried on the humble occupation of sack porter to the cornships, but was only next to St. Clement in his intellectual influence at Alexandria.

The original idea of the Eclectics was to reconcile portions of the philosophical systems of Pythagoras, Plato, and Aristotle with Christianity; and it found material expression in the domestic Pantheon of the heathen Emperor Alexander Severus, who placed on one level the statues of Orpheus, Pythagoras, and our Lord. As far as Christianity was concerned the Eclectics were willing to water it down to a similar level with the ancient philosophies, denying inspiration, explaining away miracles, and allegorizing facts; and the reconciliation of Christianity and philosophy came practically to a compromise, in which the former was made to give up everything that was of vital importance. The Neo-Platonism which developed out of Eclecticism, partly in the hands of Ammonius himself but still more in those of Plotinus and Porphyry, gradually assumed a more definite position of hostility to Christianity; and neither have much right to be associated with it, though claiming to be Christian. But the Eclectics and Neo-Platonists represent a transitional influence by which many philosophers who had hitherto looked on Christianity with such contempt that they would not even listen to its history and reasoning—as Tertullian so often complains—were led to investigate its claims to respect. They were beginning to see that it could not be passed by; and their earlier acquaintance with it led them to give it a place in what seemed to them to be the new universal religion and philosophy which thoughtful minds among the heathen were craving after when Polytheism had become dead to them. Over such minds Christianity would often, in the end, assume its proper supremacy. [NEO-PLATONISTS.]

ECTHESIS. An heretical edict promulgated by the Emperor Heraclius [A.D. 638] for the purpose of reconciling the Monophysites to the Church. This Exposition of the Faith (Ἐκθεσις τῆς πίστews) was drawn up by Sergius, the patriarch of Constantinople. "After an orthodox statement of faith, so far as respects the Holy Trinity, the Incarnation, the one Person and the two Natures of our Blessed Lord, it proceeded to forbid the teaching of either one or two operations, the former as appearing to destroy the doctrine of the two Natures, the latter as an expression entirely new to theology, appearing to imply two contrary wills, and leading to results more dangerous than even the tenets of Nestorius. At the same time it was clearly and positively stated that the Catholic Faith required the acknowledgment of only one will" in our Lord [Neale's Hist. East. Ch., Alexand. ii. 70]. The text of this document is given in Harduin's Concilia, iii. 791. It was rejected as heretical by a council held at Rome [A.D. 639] under John IV., and by a great number of bishops, and was superseded nine years later by an edict of the Emperor Constans, entitled the Type, which enjoined silence respecting the doctrine of one or two wills in Christ. In the following year both the Type and the Ecthesis were condemned by the first Lateran Council [A.D. 649], a condemnation which led to the deposition and exile of the Pope, Martin I., by the Emperor. [MONOTHELITES.]

EDGEITES. A sect quite recently established at Rangoon, combining the principles and practices of the Baptists and the Plymouth Brethren.

EFFRONTES. An obscure sect of heretical fanatics who appeared in Transylvania about the year 1534. They professed to be Christians, but rejected the use of Baptism, and substituted for it a strange custom of shaving the forehead until blood flowed, and then anointing the scarified surface with oil. They blasphemously declared the worship of the Third Person in the Blessed Trinity to be idolatry, and maintained that His Name only represented a divine operation on the soul of man [Pluquet, Dict. des Hérés. s. v.]

ELCHASAITES. A sect, dating, so far as is known of them in history, from the pontificate of Callistus [A.D. 219-224], which proclaimed a second baptism of remission of sins, over and above Christian baptism, to all believers in the revelations of a book named Elchasai. The leading tenet of the book was, that the Son of God had many times manifested Himself in the world in the persons of righteous men, that Jesus Christ was such a manifestation, Jesus being the Son, naturally, of Joseph and Mary. To this was added, as the rule of life, the observance of the law of Moses, with the exception of sacrifice, the practice of astrology and magic, the use of incantations and charms. The revelation was said to have been made in the third year of Trajan [A.D. 100] to some one of the tribe of the Seres, described as a Parthian tribe.

"These Seres hold the same place in the fictions of Essene Ebionitism as the Hyperboreans in Greek legend; they are a mythical race, perfectly pure, and therefore perfectly happy, long-lived and free from pain, scrupulous in the performance of all ceremonial rites, and thus exempt from the penalties attaching to their neglect." [See Recogn. viii. 48; ix. 19. Prof. Lightfoot, "St. Paul and the Three." Comm. on Galat. p. 304.]

Eusebius states that the sect was almost stifled in its birth [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 38]. Its leading tenets were however adopted by other sects, particularly by the Ossenes and the Ebionites [Epiph. Hær. xix. xxx.]; and in this way its author exercised great influence.

Hippolytus states that upon Callistus sanctioning a practice of rebaptizing, which was noised abroad throughout the entire world, one Alcibiades, of Apamea in Syria, took occasion to repair to Rome, carrying with him a book which a certain just man, Elchasai, had received from the Seres, a Parthian tribe, and had given to one named Sobiai. There is little doubt that Elchasai is originally the name of the book—Epiphanius rightly interprets it δύναμις κεκαλυμμένη; and that Sobiai means the sworn member, who might be initiated into the revelation. But it is quite likely that the founder of the sect, or that Alcibiades, whether he was an emissary or an adventurer, took the name Elchasai. In Hippolytus [chap. viii.] Elchasai is used as synonymous with Alcibiades. Theodoret states that the sect takes its name from one Elchasai, the founder of the heresy, and ends his chapter by saying that Alcibiades (συνεκρότησε) hammered it out. Although it may appear unlikely that the heresy should have existed from the time of Trajan to the time of Callistus without any record or trace of its existence, still a passage quoted from the book—"Take care not to commence your works the third day from a Sabbath, since when three years of the reign of the Emperor Trajan are completed from the time that he subjected the Parthians to his sway, war rages between the impious angels of the northern constellations" [Hippol. ix. 11]—looks very much like one of those supposed prophecies which are made soon after the events. A few years later this supposed prophecy would have been scarcely understood. Upon the whole, the notices we have lead to the conclusion that the book Elchasai was written in Trajan's time in Parthia, and brought to Rome by Alcibiades; that Alcibiades took the name of Elchasai, and was the Elchasai who, according to Epiphanius, joined the Ossenes and the Ebionites, of whose family the sisters Marthus and Marthana were said to be [Epiph. Hær. xix. 2].

The book was delivered by an angel ninety-six miles high, who was accompanied by a female form of like stature; the former being the Son of God, the latter the Holy Spirit. According to Hippolytus this vision was stated to have been simply for the delivery of the book. It must not be extended, as it is by Epiphanius, into a dogma of the Elchasaite creed, as if they taught such to be the proper forms of the Son and the Holy Spirit. Neither are these forms to be identified with any pair of male and female Æons of Gnosticism. They are rather the expression of a belief borrowed from the Egyptian mysteries through the Alexandrian school, the belief in a male and female principle as pervading the Deity [Dict. of THEOL., CABBALISM. Christ. Rememb. xliii. 352]; for Elchasai's system did not involve a series of world-creating angels. He acknowledged that the principles of the universe were originated by the Deity [Hippol. x. 25]. "Concerning the beginning of all things they agree with us. They hold that there is one Unbegotten, and Him they call the creator of all things" [Theod. Hær. fab. ii. 7].

The leading doctrine of the Elchasaites is that which regards Jesus and Christ. They held the Pythagorean tenet of the transmigration of souls, and accordingly believed that the soul of Jesus had inhabited many human bodies. When Jesus became the Son of Mary, as the last of the transmigrations, some held that His birth was as the birth of other men, some that it was miraculous, Mary being a virgin. But in this latter case the birth was a miracle merely of God's creating power, not such a birth as the Church understands it to be from Luke i. 35. These successive births of Jesus had also been manifestations of Christ. "Christ" appears to have been a term equivalent to Power of God, including both the Son of God and the Spirit of God. "Thus Christ appeared and existed among men from time to time, undergoing alterations of birth and having his soul" (the soul of Jesus) "transferred from body to body."

Elchasai taught that believers ought to be circumcised and live according to the Law [Hippol. ix. 9], but condemned sacrifice and priestly ministrations, as foreign from God's nature, and denied that they were offered to God according to the Law and the Fathers [Epiph. Hær. xix. 3].

His theory of baptism is thus given in a quotation from his book: "Whoso is desirous of obtaining remission of sins, from the moment that he hearkens to this book, let him be baptized a second time in the Name of the Great and Most High God, and in the Name of His Son the Mighty King. Thus let him be purified and cleansed, and let him adjure for himself those seven witnesses that have been described in this book—Heaven, Water, Holy Spirits, Angels of Prayer, Oil, Salt, Earth" [Hippol. ix. 10]. This baptism [ἐπὶ τῇ τῶν στοιχείων ὁμολογίᾳ, Theod. Hær. fab.] is connected with the Cabbalistic magic, which commands the aid of good angels, and brings evil ones into subjection; which controls the forces of nature, and makes the elements of the world subservient. And it was a second baptism, not as denying the former and Christian baptism, but as in addition to it; with a second remission of sins, and that a plenary remission.

The invocation of the powers of nature was not confined to this baptism. Men were taught to swear by Salt, Water, Earth, Bread, Sky, Air, Winds; and these powers or principles, Epiphanius tells us, were marked out for adoration. Water was the emblem or principle of good, fire of deception [Epiph. Hær. xix. 3]. Astrology and magic were deeply studied: the latter with its train of incantations and charms, the former with its pretence of predictions.

The Elchasaites held it to be indifferent to deny Christ, and urged that a prudent man will so deny with his lips, not in his heart [Origen in Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 38]. They despised virginity, and compelled to marry. They set aside certain parts of the collective Scriptures, and made use of passages from the Old Testament, and from the Gospels, rejecting the Apostles altogether.

Epiphanius states that among the Ossenes, in Nabathæa and Peræa, two sisters, Marthus and Marthana, were in his time revered as deities, on account of their being of the family of Elchasai. One was still alive when he wrote, the other had not long been dead. It appears that the Roman Ebionites adopted much of the system of Elchasai, but there is no evidence that they idolized him. May it not then be that, failing to secure in Rome the position he aimed at, he retired to Peræa, was more successful there, and that his rank remained with his family?

The system of the Clementine Homilies is in many features identical with that of Elchasai. It is summed up thus by Gieseler:—"God, a pure, simple being of light, has allowed the world to be formed in contrasts, and so also the history of the world and of men runs off in contrasts (συζυγίαι), corresponding by way of pairs, in which the lower constantly precedes the higher. From the beginning onward, God has revealed Himself to man, while His Holy Spirit (Σοφία, Υἱὸς Θεοῦ, Θεῶν Πνεῦμα, Πνεῦμα Ἁγίων) from time to time in the form of individual men (Adam, Enoch, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Jesus), as the True Prophet (ὁ προφήτης τῆς ἀληθείας), constantly announced the very same truth, and in Jesus caused it also to be communicated to the heathen. According to the law of syzygies, false prophets also are always produced in addition to the true [γεννητοὶ γυναικῶν, Matt. xi. 11], who corrupt the truth. Thus, the original doctrines of Mosaism are perfectly identical with Christianity, though they have not been preserved in their purity in the Pentateuch, which was not composed until long after Moses, and in the present form of Judaism have been utterly perverted. In general, the truth has been constantly maintained in its purity only by a few, by means of secret tradition. Man is free, and must expect after death a spiritual continuation of life, with rewards and punishments. The conditions of happiness are love to God and man, and struggling against the demons, which draw away to evil through sensuality. For this purpose these sectaries prescribed abstinence from animal food, frequent fastings and washings, recommended early marriage and voluntary poverty, but rejected all sacrifice" [Gieseler's Compend. i. 209].

This system would be produced by adopting into Ebionitism Elchasai's doctrine of the early manifestations of Christ, but without his second baptism, and the magic with which it was connected. Whether the Ebionites had received from Cerinthus the doctrine of world-forming angels, and renounced it through the influence of Elchasaitism, or whether they never accepted that doctrine, is uncertain. But the testimony of the appendix to Tertullian's de Præscr. is strong in favour of the latter alternative: "Hujus successor Hebion fuit, Cerintho non in omni parte consentiens, quod a Deo dicat mundum, non ab angelis factum." The authority of this appendix is high, if (as is supposed) it is an early work of Hippolytus translated by Victorinus; and the early date will account for the omission of all mention of Elchasai. Hippolytus' early work would date before the appearance of Alcibiades in Rome. The Ebionites then had the following points in common with Elchasai: the ascribing creation to the Supreme Being, the denial of the divinity of Jesus, the observance of the Law, the importance of lustrations, the rejection of St. Paul. They were at least prepared to reject the prophets, for the earlier Ebionites had adopted a singular mode of expounding them, and the Samaritans who joined the party accepted only the Pentateuch. The acceptance of the doctrine, that certain holy men were manifestations of Christ or the True Prophet, would suit their controversial position, which aimed at identifying Judaism and Christianity. Seeing this, and assuming that the Clementine Homilies proceeded from Rome about the time of the appearance there of Alcibiades the prophet of Elchasaitism, the inference is, that these Homilies represent the Elchasaitism of the Ebionites; while, as already suggested, the reverence paid to the descendants of Elchasaï in Nabathæa and Peræa shews that among the Essenes an unmitigated Elchasaitism established itself. Elchasaitism, as Gieseler has remarked, is opposed to that theosophy which is in historical possession of the name Gnosis [Gieseler's Compend. i. p. 101, n.], and its influence (whether or not its leading doctrine was accepted by all the Ebionites) probably prevented the Ebionites from fully adopting and developing the system of Cerinthus.

With this doctrine there could be no other feeling towards St. Paul, than that of strong antagonism; and this antagonism, which underlies the conception of the whole narrative on which the Homilies are based, manifests itself, though for the most part indirectly, with much bitterness. [See Schliemann, Die Clementinen, pp. 96 and 534.] The other Apostles who acknowledged St. Paul's commission (although St. Peter is made in the Homilies the exponent of true doctrine) were yet really subordinated to the authority of the Ebionite Gospel. Epiphanius states, that the Ebionites only pretended to admit the names of the Apostles, attributing to them fictitious writings [Epiph. Hær. xxx. 23], and Eusebius states that they esteemed the Gospels as of little value in comparison with the Gospel according to the Hebrews.

The doctrine of the True Prophet appears in a less objectionable, though still heretical, form in the Recognitions of Clement; in the form, namely, that from the beginning Christ Himself was the True Prophet, assuming humanity (though not a human body) by uniting Himself with a pre-existent human soul, and appearing from time to time to the Fathers, but not being properly incarnate until born of the Virgin Mary. This phase of the doctrine is farther exhibited in the article on JUDAISM. The desire to identify Judaism and Christianity, and at the same time to avoid Ebionite psilanthropism, appears to have occasioned its adoption in the more orthodox portion of the anti-Pauline school.

There was much uncertainty regarding the heresy of the Elchasaites before the publication in 1851 of the "Refutation of all Heresies" of Hippolytus; and how little was known may be seen by what Lardner has brought together [Lardner's Hist. of Heretics, ii. 22]. The authorities now available for their history are: Hippolytus, Philosophum. ix. 8-12, x. 25; Origen, quoted in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. vi. 38; Epiphanius, Hær. xix. the Ossenes, and xxx. the Ebionites; Theodoret, Hær. fab. ii. 7, who used other writings than the revelation itself; and may be taken as an independent authority. Augustine merely quotes Epiphanius, from whom, too, Damascenus' notices are borrowed. Of modern commentators, Ritschl, Die Entstehung der Altkatholischen Kirche, 1857, may be especially named.

'ENANTIOΔOKH'TAI. A controversial term used by Leontius of Constantinople to express the opposition between the heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches; one heresy making the Divine Nature and the other the Human Nature of our Lord an unreality [Leont. Byzant. contr. Nestor. et Eutych. in Bibl. Max. Lugd. ix. 675, F.].

ENCRATITES [Ἐγκρατεῖς, Iren.; Ἐγκρατῆται, Clem. Alex. and Theod.; Ἐγκρατίται, Epiph.]. This name was taken, in the second century, by those who renounced marriage and abstained from flesh and wine, not from an excess of Christian asceticism, but from the heretical principle of the inherent evil of matter. The principle that matter is inherently evil, and its consequence, that creation is the work of an inferior and evil agent, was common to all Gnostics. From this principle some inferred the necessity of mortifying the body; and, consistently with their erroneous assumption, carried, or professed to carry, that mortification to the extent of asserting that the propagation of men and animals is only a ministering to the evil work of an evil creator (inconsistently, however, stopping short of the point of self-starvation): others, holding that knowledge is all in all, disregarded the rules of chastity and temperance, as pertaining only to the work of the inferior demiurge [Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 5, 6, 7]. Out of the former class those who laid especial stress on this practical deduction from their principles called themselves Encratites, "the continent," "the self-controllers."

St. Paul names such precepts as "forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats," as proceeding from those who give heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils [1 Tim. iv. 1-5]. There can be little doubt that although he spoke in the main prophetically, the Gnostic doctrine of asceticism had been already started, and the principles of that doctrine had certainly been laid. But the doctrine is not attributed to any known teacher of Gnosticism before Saturninus in the beginning of the second century. After him Cerdon, Marcion, and Apelles held it, and the followers of all these heretics must be considered as Encratites, though they may not have assumed the name. Irenæus states that the Encratites sprang from Saturninus and Marcion [Iren. Hær. i. 28], and passes on to connect them with Tatian, Theodoret also calling Tatian the leader of the Encratites and Hydroparastatæ [Theod. Hær. fab. i. 20]. It appears from this that the Encratites who had existed previously as dispersed among several sects, or as schismatical congregations, gathered themselves into a separate and heretical sect under Tatian.

Epiphanius relates that in his time they existed in great numbers in Pisidia, Phrygia, Galatia, and in the whole of Asia Minor [Epiph. Hær. xlvii.].

The fundamental tenet of the Encratites doubtless of itself constitutes a heresy [Hippol. Philosophum. viii. 20], and might of itself be the cause of schism. But it was not held, and indeed cannot be held, independently of other heresies. The notion of the inherent evil of matter affects not only the doctrines regarding God the Creator, but the doctrine of the Incarnation and Human Nature of our Lord, and it penetrates therefore to the doctrine of the Sacraments. The reader is referred therefore to the notices of the sects whose doctrines involve this tenet, particularly SATURNINIANS, MARCIONITES, TATIANISTS, SEVERIANS, HYDROPARASTATÆ.

Encratite practice is rightly described by Epiphanius: "Most of these heresies forbid to marry, and order men to abstain from meats, not giving such precepts for the regulation of life, nor for the sake of superior virtue and its rewards and crowns, but because they think those things abominable which were instituted by the Lord" [Epiph. Hær. xlviii. 8]. So too by Theodoret: "They abstain from flesh and wine, abhorring them as evil. Lawful wedlock they call the work of the devil" [Theod. Hær. fab. i. 20]. Against this practice and its principle the 51st and 53rd (or 43rd and 45th) Apostolic Canons are directed. The 51st is, "If any bishop, priest, deacon, or any of the sacerdotal catalogue, do abstain from marriage, and flesh, and wine, not for mortification but out of abhorrence, as having forgotten that all things are very good, and that God made man male and female, and blasphemously reproaching the workmanship of God; let him amend, or else be deposed and cast out of the Church, and so also shall a layman." The 14th Ancyran Canon [A.D. 314] decrees "That those of the clergy, priests and deacons, who abstain from flesh, shall taste it, and then abstain if they think fit; but if they will not, nor even eat of the herbs which are mingled with the flesh, nor obey the canon, then they cease from their function." The tasting was a declaration that they did not hold there was uncleanness in the meat itself. The Council of Gangra anathematized those who declared marriage to be incompatible with a state of salvation, but Eustathius, whose errors occasioned the council, probably advanced not Gnostic tenets, but a fanatical standard of sanctity.

The baptism of the Encratites is mentioned, among other baptisms, some heretical, some schismatical, in St. Basil's first and second canonical Epistles, canons i. and xlvii. The first of these canons was much discussed in the controversy between Bingham and Lawrence regarding the validity of lay-baptism; and the controversy shews that the interpretation of St. Basil's words is not without difficulty. For Johnson renders one sentence thus: "The Encratites have altered their baptism to make themselves incapable of being received by the Church" [Johnson's Vade mecum, ii. 226]. Lawrence thus: "They gave it with precipitation on purpose to hinder the receiving of it from the Church" [Lawrence, Lay Bapt. Invalid, p. 15]. St. Basil's words are, Τὸ δὲ τῶν Ἐγκρατικῶν κακούργημα νοῆσαι ἡμᾶς δεῖ, ὅτι, ἐν αὐτοῖς ἀπροσδέκτους ποιήσωσι τῇ Ἐκκλησίᾳ, ἐπεχείρησαν λοιπὸν ἰδίῳ προκαταλαμβάνειν βαπτίσματι. The only point we are now concerned with is, whether in these words is necessarily implied an alteration of the Catholic form of baptism. They would doubtless carry such an interpretation if history and the context required it; but they do not necessarily demand it; and canon xlvii. is against such an interpretation. Canon xlvii. introduces the Encratites saying that they are baptized in the Catholic form, and warns them not to rest on this, because they do not hold a right faith in the God in whose Name they are baptized [see the note of the Benedictine editor on canon i.]. The κακούργημα, then, of the Encratites appears to be the undue haste of administration in opposition to Catholic practice, and perhaps the addition of uncatholic ceremonies.

Epiphanius writes regarding the Encratites, Tatianists, and Cathari, παρήλλακται δὲ παρ' αὐτοῖς καὶ τὰ μυστήρια [Hær. xli. or lxi.]. These words are sufficiently verified in the Encratite rejection of wine from the Eucharist, and the addition of novel ceremonies in Baptism, without pressing them so far as to imply from them a change of the form of baptism. Further, St. Basil [canon xlvii.] classes together the Encratites, Saccophori, and Apotactics, and (as his text stands) subjects them all to the same rule as the Novatians, namely that they are to be baptized for admission to the Church. The Benedictine editor wishes to insert a negative, and does so in his translation. Johnson accepts the present text. It is clear that the baptisms of the three are of one rank, and there can be little doubt that St. Basil disallowed them as of no more efficacy than lay baptisms. The 7th canon of Constantinople [A.D. 381], which determined against St. Basil in favour of the baptism of the Novatians, does not specify these sects.

The Gospel according to the Egyptians, the fragments of which were collected by Grabe [Spicileg. i. pp. 31-37], was probably composed in the second century by an Encratite.

ENCYCLOPEDIISTS. The term ἐγκύκλιος παιδεία was used of old to designate the entire curriculum of instruction which qualified the student for public office. Encyclopédiste is a term applied to certain French savans who, in the middle of the eighteenth century [A.D. 1751], put forth an Encyclopédie by joint-stock contribution, under the general editorship of Diderot, and of D'Alembert for the mathematical articles. English Deism paved the way for it, but the Encyclopédie has had a more permanent effect upon the French national character than Deism on the English. The other colleagues were the Abbé Mallet, Regius Professor of Theology in the University of Paris, who was author of most of the articles on theology and history, with others on poetry and general literature: the Abbé Bergier also supplied theological articles, and the Abbé Yvon was author of metaphysical and philosophical papers, to which section the Abbé Pestré and the Abbé de Prades also contributed the political metaphysics that were termed by Coleridge "Metapolitics." Rousseau helped out the musical section, but withstood the materialistic tone of his colleagues; Daubenton represented the department of natural history. Toussaint took charge of the juridical subjects; Le Mounier and Malouin of the physical and chemical; Blondel wrote the architectural papers. The Baron d'Argenville, privy councillor, and the Comte d'Heronville de Claye, high in military command, supplied articles respectively on diplomatic and strategical subjects. Voltaire, Marie François, Arouet, also, may be named as having had a definite object in floating the scheme. Five or six men of head, he said, might easily overthrow a religion set up by a dozen illiterate fishermen and peasants. The names may be added of Marmontel, Condorcet, La Lande, Adanson, Turpin, Montigny, and De Sacy. Among the learned of foreign lands, Bernoulli contributed to the astronomical sections; Haller to the anatomical and physiological; Engel to the geographical, and Sulzer to the theory of the fine arts. Many of the writers enumerated contributed highly valuable articles: but the capacity of the Encyclopédie for mischief wholly counteracted the good. Papers written by Baillet, the apostle of infidelity, were incorporated in the work, as were others by the atheist Nicolas Freret. La Mettrie the materialist was another writer, whose works, saturated with the grossest immorality, were publicly burnt at Paris and Leyden; yet he failed not to receive the distinguished patronage of Frederick, and ended his days at Berlin, as protégé of the "Grand Monarque." Charles de St. Denys, Baron de St. Egremond, was equally corrupt, whose work on the "Morality of Epicurus" was dedicated to Ninon de l'Enclos. It was in her house that Rousseau learned his first lessons of evil. Even dignitaries of the Church were not the last in the race of vice and irreligion. The Abbé Chaulieu was known as the "Anacreon of the Temple." Pierre Camus was the "Lucian of the Episcopate," a sneering, scoffing spirit; and Berni, afterwards cardinal, was the composer of Pompadour erotics. Even the purer Montesquieu was carried away by the evil spirit of the day, and supplied articles in the tone of his "Lettres Persanes," rather than of his "Esprit des lois," though he afterwards expressed regret for the way in which he had spoken of sacred matters.

The first two volumes appeared A.D. 1751, and in the first instance the continuation of the work was prohibited; but, unfortunately, it was to the taste of the public, and obtained the suicidal patronage of the Court and noblesse. The preliminary discourse of the editors at once excited attention. It avowed Locke's principle of sensualism, deriving from sensation the origin of all our ideas; but they fused into one the external and internal sense of the English philosopher,—our mental experience being summed, not by the combined factors of sense and reflection, but by the impact of sense alone. In their introduction D'Alembert takes a rapid view of the various subjects on which the work treats, and indicates the relation in which they stand to each other. All direct knowledge, he says, reduces itself to that which we gain from sensation. That our senses may originate knowledge, leads him to assume that they do so in all cases, and he argues from the particular to the universal. To the objection that the perception of sensation is something subjective, and that there is no relation between sensation and the object that causes it, or to which we refer it, and therefore that there is no substantial connection between the two, he answers, that a kind of instinct, more mighty than reason, bridges over the intermediate gulf, and gives to the object as real a subjective existence in our sensation as it already has an objectivity in the great world without us. He leaves it for metaphysicians to determine how the soul, distracted from without by a vast mass of objects suggestive of sensation, and thereby liable to perpetual dissipation of its power of centralization, or again, cramped and limited by its own confined sphere, should step forth, as it were, from itself, and gain its first elements of knowledge from things external, acting upon its inner being. For example, a mathematical proposition is true, and we are conscious of the train of reasoning that issues in the necessary demonstration; but what is the connecting-link between the mathematical truth and the inner consciousness? There is a void between them that has always been a mystery, and the sensualist theory least of all has been able to throw any light into it.

Further, D'Alembert's theory of morality is thoroughly abject and unsatisfying. The idea of justice, he says, originates as an antagonism from fear of the oppression that the strong will always inflict upon the weak; and of virtue, from the evil that the vices of others cause to us. Our comfort we find to be concerned in the development of these necessary notions. Hence the readiness with which the world rewards the just and virtuous, and punishes the deceitful and vicious: and the general axiom being true, its principle is good for the whole extent to which it can reach.

He rises in the following way to the idea of God. What is the active principle, the determining and perceptive being in us that exercises judgment and will? It is not the body, for matter has no properties in common with will and thought. But there is a double self in the individual "Ego" of two very different natures, so intimately interwoven, that there is a perfect unity between the affections of the one and the movements of the other; a spontaneity that leaves nothing to be distinguished between the two, or to mark the point where volition ends and action begins. This co-ordination of which we are conscious, together with the speculations into which our thoughts for ever glide, with reference to our twofold nature and its manifold imperfections, raises us to the contemplation of a Supreme Intelligence, to whom we owe our existence, and ought to render an unswerving loyalty. Consequently, proof of the Divine existence arises from our own inner perception: it is D'Alembert's ontological proof. It is demonstrable in the same way that our ideas of virtue and vice, the principle and necessity of laws, every art and every science, the spirituality of the soul, as well as our knowledge of the Being of God, of our duty to Him, and of every other needful truth, are only the results of our reflective powers, exercising themselves under the sway of material sensation. This train of reasoning at once took possession of the popular mind, and is still found fossilized in the various strata of French society.

It will be seen, therefore, that the Encyclopédistes are not fairly chargeable with blank atheism. With all their sensualism, they acknowledged the necessity for a Divine revelation, and that the written Word contains it. But its truths, they say, lie within certain limits. Only so much is revealed as it concerns us to know. There is a Divine and a human element in the Word. A few necessary matters of faith, and some practical precepts, comprise its truths; yet even these have thrown more light on human life, present and future, than all the schools of an enlightened philosophy. The learned Abbés engaged upon the work have even given to it a certain tone of anti-Protestant Church principle, which raises it above the mere Theism of the articles on "God" and "Providence." Under "Deists," it notes that natural religion is insufficient to teach men how to worship God—a point upon which Deists have always been supremely indifferent—or to guide them to the highest happiness of which human nature is capable. "Christianity" is declared to be the sole form of revealed religion, and its title-deeds are shewn to be contained in the Old and New Testaments; while further confirmation of the same fact is given under "Bible," "Prophecy," "Revelation," "Testament," &c. The doctrine of the Holy Trinity also is maintained against the assault of Jews, Heathens and Socinians, as well as of more modern Deists and Atheists; still, these articles scarcely rise above the old deistical axiom, that Christianity is a mere republication of the law of Nature. The general tone of the work induces the belief that its religion was suggested by a temporizing prudence rather than by genuine conviction. The Goddess of Reason had not yet been publicly enshrined.

The spirit of the Encyclopédie gives to it a highly dangerous character. Faith is the handmaid of Reason, taking up the work only where Reason fails. Under Morality, it exalts the subject treated above faith, because, forsooth, it is easier to be good and to benefit our fellow creatures by moral excellence without faith, than by faith without morality,—as though faith worthy of the name were really separable from morality. Christian faith is, in fact, morality. Our sinning are a want of faith. "Natural religion" is made to convey so clear a knowledge of the Deity, as almost to supersede the necessity for revealed religion; while "Theism" is shewn to be more excellent than Atheism, only because belief in the existence of God and Providence is more serviceable to the state and society than unbelief. "Monasticism" is to be discouraged, because it withdraws so many from taking their proper share in the active duties of life. Its philosopher, like Spinoza or Horace, "Epicuri de grege porcus," is not to imagine that because he upholds truth and morality, he may not lawfully enjoy the good things of life; it is no part of a wise man's duty to be content with bare necessities, like Cynics and Stoics and such pseudo-philosophers. True wisdom consists in the enjoyment of the good things of life, and in promoting the greatest happiness of the greatest number: there is nothing in him of the ascetic. "Il vaut mieux être gastronome qu'astronome," would seem to have been the ultimate idea of the literary associates at the Holbach banquetings.

This worldliness marks the character of the work throughout—sensualist in its philosophy and sensualist in its morals, it is answerable for much of the miserable irreligion into which France sunk in the next generation. The idealism of the Bible and of the Church of all ages is not openly attacked, but it is entirely overlaid by the materialism of Epicurus and the sensualism of Locke, the step from whence to infidelity is easy and natural. Articles that give scope for the exhibition of the dominant influence of soul and spirit are slurred over, or altogether omitted. High art, as Marmontel states it, is only admirable for the pleasure that it can confer, and owes its origin to the satisfaction felt by man in his social condition when his wants are supplied: a sense of the beautiful issues forth from this material comfort. To talk of the high ideal of art is, with the Encyclopedist, to utter words without meaning, and ends as it began in the perceptions of sense. The liberal only differ from mechanical arts in this, that the latter minister to our wants, the former to our pleasures. Of any connection between the fine arts and religion no single trace is seen. Architecture, Religion's most faithful ally, can neither symbolize deep truths nor raise the soul to high and worthy thoughts of its relations and destiny: its whole mission is accomplished when use and pleasure are combined in its results.

Important articles are treated superficially, to give room for lengthy articles on Theatre, Dance, various "objets d'agrément," trades and manufactures; and Pantheism is passed over to make place for trifling talk on Pantomime and Pantoufles. The after effects of the Encyclopédie shew how easily sensualism gravitates through materialism into the dregs of atheism; and for that reason the lesson that it holds out is a memorable one.

It is an observation of Buckle, that until the Encyclopédie had made its appearance, there was scarcely an atheistical book or tract in existence. [Civilization, i. c. 14; Dict. of Doctr. and Hist. THEOLOGY, ATHEISM.] After the horrors of the French Revolution, there came the inevitable reaction. The weak points of sensualism were detected and brought to the light. Its narrow scope and extraordinary assumption of results, "per saltum," were exposed. The spiritual once more gained the ascendancy over the material, and from four several quarters an overwhelming tide set in. The religious argument was brought to bear upon it by Joseph de Maistre and De Bonald; legitimatist and literary sentiments were developed once more by Chateaubriand and Mme. de Staël; Laromignière and Main de Biran opened fire upon it from the metaphysical side, and Royer-Collard from the moral. Materialism was held to be one with atheism, and the way was opened out for the philosophical idea of Scotch and German universities. The reign of the Encyclopédistes was over; unhappily the evil that they have done could not so easily be stamped out. It seems to demand a periodical baptism of blood. [Barante, Lit. Fr. du 18me siècle. Schütz, Staatsveränderung in Frankreich. Berthier, Journal de Trévoux.]

ENERGICI. This name was given to those foreign Reformers in the sixteenth century, pupils of Zuingli and Calvin, who taught that the bread and wine in the Holy Eucharist were merely efficacious signs of the Body and Blood of Christ. Thus the original words of Institution, "This is My Body," were explained away to mean, "This is an efficacious sign of My Body;" not the Body but the virtues of the Body at the most being believed to be present.

ENTHUSIASTÆ. [EUCHITES.]

ENTHUSIASTS. Writers of Elizabethan days not unfrequently refer to sectarians called by this name. Thus Thomas Rogers, Archbishop Bancroft's chaplain, in his treatise on the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion, says, "This truth is gainsaid by the Phrygians, Montanists, and Messalians, also by the Enthusiasts, Anabaptists, and Family of Love" [Rogers on XXXIX. Art. 158, Parker Soc. ed.]. They are noticed by Hooper, Jewel, and other writers of that age; and also by Enoch Clapham in his curious little volume Errour on the right hand through preposterous Zeal. In this there is a satirical dialogue between two voyagers on board a "fly-boat" or "hoy" between London Bridge and Gravesend, the one of whom is called "Flyer," and the other "Anabaptist." At the end of this dialogue Anabaptist, having converted Flyer, says, "Stay, holy Proselyte, thou must first be baptized, and have some divine vision from above, and so, being made a perfect Enthusiast, thou shalt be able to turn back the floods of Jordan." Rogers also speaks of their "depending wholly upon visions and revelations" [Rogers on XXXIX. Art. 196, Parker Soc. ed.]. There is no reason to think that there was ever any organized sect of the name, and probably the persons referred to are simply that fanatical section of the Puritans, from which sprung the Fifth Monarchy Men and the Quakers in the days of Vavasour Powell, and Fox. When writing about the Familists, the quaint Fuller says, "In a word, as in the small-pox (pardon my plain and homely but true and proper comparison), when at first they kindly come forth, every one of them may severally and distinctly be discerned, but when once they run and matter they break into one another, and can no longer be dividedly discovered. So though at first there was a real difference betwixt Familists, Enthusiasts, Antinomians (not to add high-flown Anabaptists) in their opinions, yet (process of time plucking up the pales betwixt them) afterwards, they did so interfuse amongst themselves, that it is almost impossible to bank and bound their several absurdities" [Fuller's Ch. Hist. ix. 3, § 38]. Henry More uses the name in many parts of his works, and almost always with reference to the Family of Love.

ENTYCHITES. [EUTYCHITES.]

EONIANS. A sect of Breton fanatics, followers of Eon d'Etoile, in the middle of the twelfth century. He was a wealthy nobleman, either very ignorant or very mad, who imagined himself to be the Messiah; his profane fancy being founded on the similarity between his own name Eon and the word "Eum" in the formula of exorcism, "Per Eum Qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos." He drew together so large a number of followers as to become a dangerous political fanatic of the Communist kind, and was therefore imprisoned by the civil authorities. While in prison Eon died [A.D. 1148], but his followers maintained that he would appear again as the judge of quick and dead. Some were burned as heretics, and the heresy was condemned by the Council of Rheims [Labbe and Cossart, Concil. x. 1107]. This fanatical movement is mentioned by Matthew Paris and William of Newbury [Hist. rerum Anglic. i. 50].

EPEFANOFTSCHINS. A sect of Russian Dissenters which separated from the POPOFTSCHINS about the year 1724 under the leadership of a monk from whom it takes its name. He assumed the office of bishop, and was in consequence placed in prison, where he died; but his death was considered as a martyrdom by his followers, and they made pilgrimages to his tomb at Kief.

EPIGONUS. [NOËTIANS.]

EPIPHANES. A son of Carpocrates is mentioned by this name in the Stromata of St. Clement of Alexandria as having been the real founder of the heresy of the CARPOCRATANS. Epiphanes is described by St. Clement as being the son of Carpocrates' wife Alexandria, a woman of Cephallenia, and as living only to the age of seventeen. His father is said to have instructed him in all ordinary learning, and especially in the philosophy of Plato; and, young as he was, Epiphanes is said to have been the author of the Monadic γνῶσις, out of which arose the heresy going by his father's name. He accuses him also of originating the profligate practice which accompanied that heresy, the community of women. The works of Epiphanes were extant in the time of St. Clement, who quotes a passage from a treatise on Justice, the object of which is to shew that the institution of marriage is opposed to the justice of God, who intended all things to be common to all as the light of the sun is common to all. St. Clement adds that, after the death of Epiphanes, he was worshipped by the Cephalenians, who erected a temple at Sama in his honour, with altars, a grove, and a museum, and celebrated his apotheosis on every new moon with hymns, libations, and sacrificial feasts. Epiphanius gives a similar account [Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 2; Epiph. Hæres. xxxii. 3].

ERASTIANS. A conventional name for those who lean more or less to the opinion that the Church is only a department of the State. The extreme form of this opinion was maintained by a physician of Heidelberg named Lieber, who lived in the Reformation age [A.D. 1524-1583], and wrote "Theses" under the classic form of his name "Erastus." These were levelled against the Calvinists, whose outrageous tyranny wherever they gained the upper hand was as extreme a form of Ecclesiasticism as that of Ultramontanists. Recoil from this drove Erastus to maintain a theory which goes to the opposite extreme, namely, that the spiritual part of religion is entirely a matter of individual conscience, and that the external organization of it, such as the nomination and commission of ministers, is entirely a matter of civil government. English Erastians have found their most conspicuous advocate in Hobbes, who maintained that the Church has no authority whatever except such as is conferred upon it by Act of Parliament or an equivalent authority [Hobbes' Leviathan, iii. 42].

ERIGENA. [SCHOOLMEN.]

ESAIANITES. One of the sects into which the Alexandrian ACEPHALI split up at the end of the fifth century. They were the followers of Esaias, a deacon of Palestine, who claimed to have been consecrated to the episcopal office by the Bishop Eusebius. His opponents averred that after the bishop's death his hands had been laid upon the head of Esaias by some of his friends [Neale's Patriarchate of Alexandria, ii. 22]. This consecration by mortmain was also charged against the APHTHARTODOCETÆ half a century later.

ESSAYS AND REVIEWS CONTROVERSY. [BROAD CHURCHMEN.]

ESSENES. An ancient Jewish sect which renounced the Temple worship and the Levitical priesthood, and embodied in itself the ascetic and mystical elements of the Jewish religion, with an admixture of tenets and practices derived from the Oriental philosophy.

This sect is described at length by Josephus [De Bell. Jud. II. viii.; Antiq. Jud. XVIII. i. 5, and XIII. v. 9], more briefly by Philo [Quod omn. prob. Liber. ii. p. 457, and Fragment, ii. p. 632, Mangey's ed.; De Vita Contempl. ii. 471], and is mentioned by Pliny [Hist. Nat. v. 17]. From these three writers the accounts of all later writers appear to be derived. Philo distinguishes between the Practical Essenes, those of Judæa and Syria, and the Contemplative Essenes, those of Egypt, the Therapeutæ.¹ Regarding the Essenes of Judæa the authority of Josephus stands highest, because he was some time conversant among them and under their discipline. As regards the Essenes of Egypt Philo's authority is good.

I. The doctrines of this sect are but briefly described. They believed in God the Governor of all things, and were strict predestinarians. They believed in the immortality of the soul, but denied the resurrection of the body. They described the states of future reward and punishment as the Greeks described them, that is, as regions of delight and warmth, or regions of gloom and cold.

II. To the Temple, Josephus writes, they sent gifts, but offered no sacrifices there on account of the superiority of their own purifications (διαφορότητι ἀγνείων ὡς νομίζουσιν). Wherefore, being excluded from the Temple, they perform their own sacrifices apart [Joseph. Ant. XVIII. i. 5]. These sacrifices were in fact the ordinary meals of their societies, taken with such solemnity as to turn the meal into a religious service. There was a ceremonial washing, a linen garment, the refectory was considered as a temple, prayer was made before and after meat [Joseph. Bell. Jud. II. viii. 5]. Again, Philo says of them, "that they do not sacrifice to God any living creature, but rather choose to form their minds to be holy, thereby to make them a fit offering to Him" [Philo, Omn. prob. Lib.]. From these premisses Ritschl concludes that the principle of Essenism was to recover from the Levites the prerogative of the priesthood, according to God's original design that the nation should be a kingdom of priests, and to form themselves into a priestly society, which should carry out the prophetic idea of self-sacrifice, along with the sacrifice of prayer and praise [Ritschl, Die Entstehung der Altk. Kirche, p. 179, et seq.]. Hence the lustrations [Exod. xl. 30-32]; the linen garment [Lev. vi. 10]; the disuse of wine [Lev. x. 9], because as priests they were always on service; the rejection of oil as the sign of consecration to a separate priesthood; the priest, not of Levi, but one of themselves. Thus instead of the Temple-ritual was established the ritual of a solemn public table; "Sind alle ihre Mahlzeiten Opfermahlzeiten."

III. To introduce and carry out this principle of a common priesthood requires separate societies under a strict rule. The principle was probably suggested to men already forming themselves into distinct bodies for the sake of leading a stricter and more devout life. These bodies it would define more sharply as well as consolidate, while at the same time it would strengthen their Philo himself says, that they employed themselves with a φιλοσοφία διὰ σύμβολων, a philosophy which was supported by an allegorical interpretation of Scripture; for this kind of allegorizing interpretation was usually the accompaniment of a certain speculative system [Neander, i. 40, Rose's transl.] The chief difference in the practice of the Essenes and the Therapeutæ appears to be that the former, living in societies, had their fixed hours of labour, the latter, living apart, so long as they could procure food, might contemplate or dream at their pleasure. [THERAPEUTÆ.]

purpose of attaining to a higher degree of holiness. Accordingly, in almost every respect, the Essenes became the monastic orders of the Jews. Their rules of morality were severe. They were bound by vow to despise pleasure, to live in continence, to despise riches, to keep fidelity, truth, and justice, to be reverent to the aged, sparing in speech, grave in demeanour, peaceful, laborious. For this end they were distributed into sodalities, and had in every place one or more sodalities according to their number, in which they lived according to the rules of each particular order. In these societies there was an absolute community of goods, no employment but agriculture and study of their sacred books, the religious common table, set hours of labour and sleep.¹

IV. So far the fairer side has been shewn. But neither the principles of a common priesthood, nor the genuine mysticism and asceticism of the Jewish religion, are sufficient to explain some further parts of the system or the general tone and character of the whole. The forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, are of the kind which St. Paul denounced, not of the kind which he practised. Milman has observed that the main principles of Essene tenets are evidently grounded on that widespread oriental philosophy, which, supposing matter either the creation of the Evil Being, or itself the Evil Being, considered all the appetites and propensities of the material body in themselves evil, and therefore esteemed the most severe mortification the perfection of virtue [Milman's Hist. of Jews, ii. 151]. It is alleged that the forbidding to marry cannot have arisen from an application of the principles of Dualism, because it was not universal; in some societies marriage being allowed. In these, however, no other conjugal intercourse was allowed than that necessary for the procreation of children; it was allowed as of inevitable necessity, not as being consistent with the highest state that man ought to aim at.

"The reverence for the names of the angels," says Milman, "points to the same source." It will be remembered that the latest revelation concerning the office of angels was made to the Jews during the Captivity, as if, by possessing them with the full truth, to guard them against the corruptions of the truth which prevailed in the East [Rawlinson, Five Monarchies, iii. p. 98; iv. p. 329]. By Josephus the "names of the angels" are so closely connected with the "sacred books" of the Essenes as to leave little doubt that Prideaux is right in translating the passage thus: "The books containing the doctrines of their sect, and the names of the messengers (angels) by whose hand they were written and conveyed to them" [Prideaux, Connect. iii. 489]. Men who professed to receive the books of the Old Testament, and yet rejected the national priesthood, certainly needed for their justification a new revelation. A like pretension occurs in later times among the Ossenes, who were the Essenes of the east side of the Dead Sea. The book Elchasai was said to have been brought from heaven by an angel. Again, the Essenes appear to have added to their worship of God a worship of the sun, as the image or representative of God. The meaning of Josephus' words has been much disputed. They are, Πρός γε μὴν τὸ Θεῖον ἰδίως εὐσεβεῖς· πρὶν γὰρ ἀνασχεῖν τὸν ἥλιον, οὐδὲν φέγγονται τῶν βεβήλων, πατρίους δὲ τινὰς εἰς αὐτὸν εὐχὰς, ὥσπερ ἱκετεύοντες ἀνατεῖλαι [Joseph. Bell. Jud. VIII. i. 5]. The natural interpretation is that the prayers were made to the sun. Also the regulation for preserving cleanliness in the wilderness camp [Deut. xxiii. 12, 13], which was adopted most strictly by the Essenes, was said to be that they might not offend τὰς αὐγὰς τοῦ Θεοῦ.²

In general, also, the readiness with which Essenism lent itself to early Gnosticism to form Ebionitism is a strong indication that there were Oriental elements already existing in Essenism. It may be stated therefore, with little chance of error, that the asceticism and mysticism of the Essenes was not a pure product of Jewish religion, but was largely mingled with the principles of Eastern philosophy. The self-righteous pride of the four classes of ascetics, by which the touch of one of a lower class was pollution to the upper class, might be Pharisaic; the refusal of marriage is not Judaic. And the ground on which, according to Josephus, that refusal was adopted, namely, that, "being aware of the lasciviousness of women, they are persuaded that none of them can keep true faith to one man," appears to be morally absurd. One is little inclined to believe in a continence of men which is grounded on the lasciviousness of women.

The growth of the sect of Essenes is not recorded; but we have in the Assideans a party "voluntarily devoted unto the law" [1 Macc. ii. 42], bound by vow to its stricter observance. They would naturally fall into two classes, as the ceremonial or the moral law was put foremost, and form the parties of Pharisees and Essenes. In the latter a mystic asceticism was gradually developed. When the rejection of the Temple service and Levitical priesthood took place we have no information. From that time, whenever it was, the formation of the sect must be dated. It seems to be no improbable supposition that the treacherous slaughter of Assideans by Alcimus [1 Macc. vii. 16] alienated them from the "priests of the seed of Aaron," that they then added to their ascetic principles the principle of a common priesthood, and being separated from the Church of the nation, and under the disadvantages of schism, were open to the temptations of Eastern philosophy. The earliest Essene mentioned, about fifty years later, is Judas, an Essene prophet, who foretold the death of Antigonus, brother of Aristobulus, which took place in B.C. 107 [Joseph. Bell. Jud. I. iii. 5]. This notice shews that the sect must have existed a considerable time.

² So strongly was this regulation insisted on, that by a connection of it with the sabbatical prohibition of labour, the ordinary relief of nature on the seventh day became unlawful. The little pickaxe which was carried about for the purpose became, as it were, a masonic badge. It was presented with a white dress to the novices. There must have been some mystical meaning given to it. Was it a mark that the Essenes thought themselves to be in the same state as Israel in the early days of the wilderness before the separation of the Levites? or was it rather only a badge in general of agricultural employment to the exclusion of commerce?

The Essenes were cruelly persecuted by the Romans, who probably entered their country after the capture of Jericho. Josephus records their perfect patience under torture. Herod favoured the sect, one of their prophets having foretold to him when a boy that he should be King of Judæa [Joseph. Antiq. XV. x. 5]. Philo computed the number of the Essenes to be four thousand, and Josephus states that there were above four thousand of the stricter sort who forbade marriage [ibid. XVIII. i. 5]. One of the gates of Jerusalem was called the Essene gate [Joseph. Bell. Jud. V. iv. 2].

ETHNOPHRONIANS. A name given by some early heresiologists to those who mixed up heathen customs and superstitions with Christianity. Those who practised astrology, fortune-telling, divination, sortilege, or auguries, were all reprobated under this title [Nicetas, Thesaur. orthod. fid. iv. 42].

EUCHITES [Εὐχίται]. A sect which arose in the fourth century, and which reappeared, with slight variations in their tenets, and under other names, at various subsequent times. Their original designation of Euchites, or "praying people," refers to a special feature in their system, that of regarding prayer as the one means of grace, to the exclusion of all others. The Latin name, Precatores, and the Syrian form, Massalians or Messalians, both allude to the same characteristic. They themselves seem to have preferred the appellation of Spirituales or Enthusiastæ. Some extravagances in their public worship gave rise to the latter name, which they however accepted: the same reason may be alleged for the names Choreutæ, Psaliens, and others. Some early imitators of their eccentricities called themselves Euphemites.

Baronius speaks of them first under the year A.D. 361, by which time they had probably begun to attract attention. Epiphanius, who died A.D. 403, makes them the latest in his treatise of Heresies. They were sufficiently numerous and important, A.D. 383, to occasion synodical action in Pamphylia. No founder of the sect appears to have been assigned by contemporary writers; but Pagius [Notes to Baronius, sub anno 1118, xxxiii.] names as such Petrus or Lycopetrus. It seems more reasonable to suppose them to have taken definite shape in consequence of a systematic attempt to combine the older forms of religion with Christianity; and Gieseler [ed. Cunningham, i. 182] considers them to have held a sort of fashionable mean between the old and the new religions. Their first recognised appearance as a sect was in Mesopotamia, from whence their views spread to Syria. At Antioch there was a considerable congregation.

The original heretics maintained that prayer only was necessary to salvation. They understood the injunctions of our Lord [Luke xviii. 1] and St. Paul [1 Thess. v. 17] to prescribe an unceasing practice of prayer, and rejected any such interpretations as a habit of prayer, a daily certain time assigned for prayer, and the like. They therefore gave themselves wholly to an ascetic life, detached from the world. As they lived in community, and are said to have held that monks ought to do nothing whatever towards the support of life, they were joined in large numbers by some whose only aim was to live without work. The principle of almsgiving to the worldly poor they denounced, saying that they, the poor in spirit, were the true mendicants, and the only proper recipients of alms. Baptism, holy orders, marriage, were all rejected as useless. They had little oratories, προσευχὰς, in public places.

Epiphanius makes the description above given apply to a second kind of Euchites. The more ancient, and far less numerous kind, were neither Jews nor Christians, but pagans, who admitted many gods, but worshipped one only as the Supreme, or Most High. These are nearly identical with HYPSTARIANS. They too had places of prayer, which were built in imitation of Christian churches.

The name Enthusiasts was given in allusion to the perfection they professed to have attained in the religious life. Every man at his birth, they said, became the abode of a demon ever enticing to ill; which was not driven forth by baptism (hence the uselessness of that sacrament), but by prayer only. After this demon had been wholly expelled by ceaseless prayer, then the Holy Spirit descended upon the soul, and gave sensible indications of His presence, by illumination, the gift of prophecy, by the privilege of beholding the Divinity (which they said could be done with the bodily eyes), and by revelations of the future. In this state they considered themselves as wholly perfect, and assumed the names of the old prophets, of the angels, and even of the Redeemer. They had become entirely free from all movements of the passions and every inclination to ill; they had then no need of fasts, mortification, or any religious exercise, no need of labour or of good deeds; the soul had become like to God, and absolutely sinless [Theodor. Ecll. Hist. iv. 11].

"Their principles," says Mosheim, "did not necessarily lead to vicious conduct, yet they might afford occasion for practising vice." And, accordingly, it is but seldom that any impugnors of their practices do more than accuse them of excessive frivolity in their services, bordering upon impiety. They did not openly separate from the Church, as they professed indifference. In some places they became the subjects of persecution; and many were even put to death by some magistrates. One of the earliest persecutors was Lupicianus; and from this persecution arose another phase of error, and another name, Martyriani, as they claimed the glory of martyrdom. The theory of an indwelling demon became expanded into one of a power co-ordinate with the Almighty, if not superior; from this they were called Sataniani. Why, they argued, should we not fly to Satan and worship him, so that, conciliated by our devotion, he may cease to afflict us? There are full replies to all the earlier tenets of the sect in Epiphanius [Epiph. Hæc. lxxx.].

The first public action taken against them was at the Synod of Syda, in Pamphylia [A.D. 383]. Amphilochius, Bishop of Iconium, presided, and twenty-five other bishops are said to have been present. Letters were sent to Flavianus, Bishop of Antioch, and by him another synod was convened. At this one of their leaders, Adelphius, though he professed penitence, was not admitted. Baronius says the sect broke out in Africa, A.D. 398. They were many times condemned in various dioceses; and the bishops at last, wearied out with repeated lapses, decreed that the lapsed should not be readmitted. An important condemnation was issued at a council at Constantinople, A.D. 427, held under the presidency of Sisinnius. In the following year they are mentioned in a general law of Theodosius and Valentinianus against heretics; "Massaliani, Euchitæ, sive Enthusiastæ," being forbidden to have places of prayer. Proceedings were also taken against them at Alexandria; and these, as well as the condemnation by Sisinnius, were confirmed at the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431; where Valerian, a Pamphylian bishop, and Amphilochius, who had presided at Syda, were the principal opponents of the sect. The former produced a book called Asceticon, by one of the body, and it was condemned. This book, and some writings, said to have been brought out by Johannes Cassianus, who founded two monasteries for the Euchites, and died A.D. 448, are the only literary efforts which are mentioned. Atticus, Bishop of Constantinople, wrote against them; and so did Euthymius Zigabenus, the title of whose work, "Damnatio et triumphus de impia et multiplici execrabilium Massalianorum secta, qui et Phundaitæ et Bogomili, nec non Euchitæ, Enthusiastæ, Eneratitæ, et Marcionitæ appellantur," shews how many sects had adopted the chief characteristics of the Euchites [Cave, Hist. Liter. i. 410, ii. 199].

In the tenth century a resuscitation of the sect took place, which seems to have embraced some of the views of Manicheism. They admitted two gods, born of one Supreme Being, who were continually at war, though ultimately to be reconciled [Le Clerc, Bibl. Univ. xv. 119]. Again in the twelfth century some heretics appeared, calling themselves Euchites and Massalians, who are said to have been precursors of the Bogomiles: but it is hard to discover their points of identity with the older forms of the heresy: and in A.D. 1347 the names of both these sects were given to the Hesychasts. [BOGOMILES. Natal. Alex. Hist. Eccl. iv. 270. Nicet. Choniast. Thesaur. orthod. iv. 36.]

EUDOXIANS. This sect derives its name from Eudoxius, one of the most prominent figures in the Arian controversy in the fourth century.

There is some uncertainty attaching to the dates of the earlier events in his life. He was the son of Cesarius, a martyr of Arabissus in Lesser Armenia, and as a boy was a pupil of St. Lucian the Martyr, whose firmness cannot have been very deeply imbibed by one who, while still young, is taunted with having sacrificed to idols in the Diocletian persecution [c. A.D. 303], and who, when older, passed through successively the phases of Arianism, Semi-Arianism, and Aëtianism. His good education enabled him to support these views at various times with much success, although none of his numerous works are extant, with the exception of some fragments of one of them entitled "De Incarnatione Dei Verbi." At some period between A.D. 330-340 he was made Bishop of Germanicia in Syria, which he held till his translation to Antioch [A.D. 357]. The mode in which he obtained that see is given at length by Nicephorus [Hist. Eccles. ix. 36], and affords us some insight into the scheming character of the new bishop. He was in attendance on the Emperor in the West when the news of the death of Leontius of Antioch was brought to the court. Directly that the intelligence reached him he obtained leave from the Emperor on false pretences to return home, and by extremely rapid stages went straight to Antioch, where he declared himself to have been the imperial nominee for the bishopric, and obtained consecration before there was time to prove the falsehood of his statement. Four years later [A.D. 461], on the deposition of Macedonius, against whom he himself, in conjunction with Acacius, had laid various charges and stirred up the popular enmity, Eudoxius was translated to Constantinople, and his occupation of this see lasted, with the exception of a brief banishment by Constantius, till his death [A.D. 370], when he was succeeded by the Arian Demophilus.

During the latter part of his life Eudoxius not only held himself, but laboured among his flock for the propagation of, Arianism of the most advanced type. His Aëtian or Eunomian views on the complete inferiority of the Son to the Father, and his denial of the Trinity, brought down upon him the condemnation of the Semi-Arian Council of Seleucia [A.D. 359] as well as that of Lampsacus [A.D. 365]. While at Antioch he laboured to restore his friend Aëtius to the Church, and held a synod for his readmission to the diaconate. When he officiated at the baptism of Valens, before that Emperor started on his Gothic expedition [A.D. 367], he extracted an oath from him to persecute the Catholics; a fact which, taken in connection with the way in which he obtained promotion to the sees of both Antioch and Constantinople, is extremely inconsistent with the character of mildness and timidity bestowed upon him by the historian Gibbon. [Nicephorus, Eccles. Hist. ix. 36, 45; xi. 15. Tillemont's Mémoires, vi. art. lxx. p. 422, et passim. Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, iii. 25, p. 250, note.]

EUNOMIANS. A name given to the ANOMÆAN sect of Arians as followers of Eunomius,

Bishop of Cyzicus. The sect originated with Aëtius, whose name was at first associated with it, but his friend and disciple Eunomius was a man of more popular influence and authority, who had not acquired the reputation for immorality which brought disgrace upon the former, and thereby made his name one that none would willingly assume, however much they might agree with his speculations in theology.

Eunomius was a native of Dacora in Cappadocia, but became secretary to Aëtius at Antioch, where he was ordained deacon. He was afterwards taken up by Eudoxius, the Acacian Patriarch of Constantinople, and through his influence was sent to succeed Eleusius the Macedonian, Bishop of Cyzicus, in the year 360. In the very same year, however, he was deposed from his see by order of the Arian Emperor Constantius, and was never permitted to return. From that time until the reign of Theodosius the Great he lived at Constantinople and Chalcedon; but Theodosius sent him into exile, where he was driven from one country to another by the Arians, with whom he continued an unceasing controversy. He was allowed to return from exile a short time before his death, which took place at his native village about A.D. 394, more than a quarter of a century after that of Aëtius.

The literary reputation of Eunomius was considerable, and the influence which he gained for the Anomœan opinions by means of his works was so great that imperial edicts were several times issued for the destruction of them [Cod. Theod. xvi. 34]. They consisted of a commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, an apology for Anomœan doctrines, forty Epistles, and an Ecthesis or exposition of faith. The latter alone of these is extant, and may be found in Greek in the annotations of Valesius to the Ecclesiastical History of Socrates, or in an English translation in Whiston's Eunomianismus Redivivus, printed in the year 1711. Although adopting many Scriptural expressions respecting our Lord, it distinctly denies that He partakes in the Divine Glory of the Father, and acknowledges His Pre-existence before the Incarnation only as a Being possessing the nature of an angel. His statements respecting the Third Person in the Holy Trinity are inconsistent with the real existence of that Person, verbally denying His Divine Nature, and inferentially His Personality. This Ecthesis was presented to the Emperor Theodosius by Eunomius at a synod held by the latter at Constantinople [A.D. 383], he having been summoned to the council as the representative of the Anomœan party.

Eunomius was the first to discontinue the practice of trine immersion in baptism, and he further corrupted the rite by administering it with a form which set aside the Name of the Holy Trinity and substituted words which made it a baptism in the Name of the Creator and into the death of Christ. This change in the formula of baptism being a very glaring deviation from the words of our Lord's command, was considered to invalidate the baptism of the Eunomians, and while that of the Arians in general was recognised by the Church, and converts from their sects admitted to communion by imposition of hands only, Eunomian converts were ordered to be baptized in the orthodox manner by the General Council of Constantinople [can. vii.], which also anathematized the heresy in its first canon. [Socr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 35; iv. 7, 13. Sozom. Hist. Eccl. iv. 26; vi. 26. Philostorg. Hist. Eccl. vi.-x.]

EUNOMIO-EUPSYCHIANS. [EUNOMIO-EUTYCHIANS.]

EUNOMIO-EUTYCHIANS. A sect of Eunomian heretics, followers of Eutychius of Constantinople. They are spoken of by Socrates the ecclesiastical historian in association with the sect noticed in the next article, and what he says of them seems to be said also of these. [Socr. Hist. Eccl. v. 24.]

EUNOMIO-THEOPHRONIANS. A sect of Eunomian heretics, followers of Theophronius of Cappadocia, in the end of the fourth century. Socrates the ecclesiastical historian speaks of him as being trained up under Eunomius in the subtleties of logic and of Aristotle's philosophy, and as being himself the author of a book on metaphysics, of which the title only, "Concerning the exercise of the intellect," has come down to us. Being reckoned an apostate by the Anomœans, he formed a sect of his own, adding to the Eunomian heresy that of baptizing in the Name of Christ alone instead of in that of the Blessed Trinity. [Socr. Hist. Eccl. v. 24.]

EUPHEMITES. A synonym for the ENTHUSIASTÆ or EUCHITES [August. de Hæres. cap. 57]. But, according to Epiphanius, the Euphemites were heathens, who, in the reign of Constantine, rejected polytheistic worship, and, without attaching themselves to Christianity, met in temples day by day for the worship of one Almighty God; resembling the Enthusiastæ in other respects, but differing from them in not being formally members of the Christian Church. [Epiphanius. Hæres. lxxx.]

EUPHRATAS. There is a common statement in ecclesiastical histories that an heretical bishop of Cologne of this name was condemned by a Council of Cologne in the year 346 for denying the Divinity of our Lord. It is, however, established on good evidence that there was no such council nor any such bishop of Cologne; though it has not been discovered out of what circumstances the mistake originally arose. [Mansi, Concil. i. 173. Natal. Alex. Hist. Eccl. iv. 276. Dupin, Biblioth. ii. 326.]

EUPHRATES. According to Origen, the founder of the OPHITES. [Origen, contr. Cels. vi. 28.]

EUPHRATES. According to Hippolytus, the founder of the PERATÆ. [Hippolytus. Philosoph. v. 8.]

EUPHRONOMIANS. [EUNOMIO-THEOPHRONIANS.]

EUSEBIANS. A name given first to the Arians from the violent partizanship shewn by Eusebius, Bishop of Nicomedia, at the Council of Nicæa, and afterwards more generally to the Semi-Arians of Palestine, from the leadership of Eusebius the historian, Bishop of Cæsarea. [ARIANS. SEMI-ARIANS.]

EUSTATHIANS. A local name given to the Euchites from Eustathius, Bishop of Sebaste in Armenia, who was deposed by the Council of Gangra [A.D. 380], and his principles condemned in twenty-one canons of that council. [Soer. Hist. Eccl. ii. 33.]

EUSTATHIANS. During the time of Arian ascendancy at Antioch [A.D. 358] the Catholics were called by the name of Eustathius, the last presiding orthodox bishop of that see. [MELETIANUS OF ANTIOCH. Sozom. Hist. Eccl. iii. 20. Theod. Hist. Eccl. ii. 12.]

EUTICHISTÆ. [EUTYCHETÆ.]

EUTYCHITES. [EUTYCHETÆ.]

EUTYCHETÆ. A sect of heretics of this name is mentioned by Theodoret, who writes, "From this most bitter root" of Simonianism "sprang the Cleobians, Dosithæans, Gorthæans, Masbothæans, Adrianists, Eutychetæ, and Canistæ," adding that they lasted but a short time, and were then consigned to perpetual oblivion [Theod. Hær. fab. i. 1]. In the edition of Cotelierius the sect is supposed to be identical with the Euchites; Theodoret in one place naming together Carpocrates, Epiphaneus, Prodicus, the Cainites, the Antitactics, and the Euchites [Coteler. in Theod. Hær. fab. v. 9]. Ittigius, however, considers that they are the same as the Eutyechites mentioned by Clement of Alexandria as being named from their iniquitous practices [Stromat. vii. 17, ad fin.]; and that they probably made their profligacies (ἐντυχίαι), as did the Nicolaitanes, part of their religion.

EUTYCHIANS. Eutyches and his followers were the early Monophysites. They asserted that from the union of the two Natures in our Lord there resulted only one Nature. In virtue of this assertion they were Monophysites when that term is taken in its wider and proper signification. But they went on to assert that the one resulting Nature is the Divine Nature, the Nature of the Incarnate Word. This the later Monophysites, led by Xenaias and Fullo, denied; and the term Monophysites is often used in a limited sense, as the name of those who defined in a different manner from the Eutychians the character of the one resulting Nature.

Eutyches, a presbyter and archimandrite of Constantinople, had exerted himself to the uttermost in opposing the Nestorian heresy, and had distinguished himself in this manner at the Council of Ephesus [A.D. 431]. But the genuine development of Christian doctrine is seldom, if ever, carried on in a direct course. It has aberrations to the right and then to the left, between which the truth nevertheless makes its way. So Eutyches, in combating Nestorianism, fell into the opposite error. In the enunciation of his error he used language which had been used in a Catholic sense both by earlier and contemporary theologians. Dogmatic terms were not then accurately defined. The language of theology was still in a state of change. This was the case with the word φύσις, which had been not infrequently used to signify "Persona." Photius noticed this in the writings of Pierius of Alexandria [c. A.D. 283, Cod. 119]. In this way Bull explains the passage of Clement of Alexandria [Strom. vii. 2, p. 831, Pott's ed.]: ἡ νιοῦ φύσις ἡ τῷ μόνῳ παντοκράτορι προσχευτάρη, of which Petavius said, "Ariani dogmatis indolem sapit" [Bull's Defens. Fid. Nic. II. vi. f]. Bull afterwards says, "Atque eodem sensu vocabulum (φύσις) accipi a Gregorio Nysseno, ab Epiphanio, adeoque ab ipso Athanasio ostendit Petavius de Trinit. iv. 1, n. 2, 3" [ibid. II. ix. 11]. This uncertainty of theological terms, though of considerable importance, is however by no means sufficient for an explanation of the origin of the errors of Eutyches.

There was a real difference between the theology of Alexandria and that of Antioch, and consequently an antagonism between the schools. Each held adequately a portion of the truth concerning the person of Christ, but failed to set forth adequately the complement of that portion, and was therefore liable each to its distinctive heresy. "The school of Antioch, by way of preventing an Apollinarian identification of the divine and the human in the νοῦς of Christ, distinguished between the two aspects as two natures, the school of Alexandria started with laying emphasis on the unity (ἐνωσις φυσικῇ), and then proceeded to consider what could be said concerning the duality. Both held that the divine nature, the Logos, had a substantial existence, an hypostasis; but whilst the Alexandrians attached the humanity of Christ, including the soul and its powers, to the divine hypostasis as little more than a receptive passive material, the Antiocheins, for the reasons previously mentioned, strove to prove that the human factor also had a relative independence, but shewed themselves not infrequently inclined to the use of expressions which attributed to the human aspect an independent hypostasis or personality" [Dörner's Person of Christ, II. i. 56, Clark's tr.]. Cyril of Alexandria, whose side Eutyches warmly took, and by whose words he afterwards defended himself, was thus, by the character of the theological school to which he belonged, inclined to use that language which set forth most strongly the union of the two natures; and his fault, Dörner remarks, was principally that of too tenaciously clinging to the vagueness of expression and thought which prevailed at an earlier period, without its defectiveness being felt,—treating it as though it were perfect and satisfactory, and setting himself in opposition to those who demanded that the unity should be more accurately defined, and the rationale thereof be more distinctly exhibited. Eutyches, with a theological acumen far inferior to Cyril's, imperfectly understood his leader, exaggerated his forms of expression, and drew inferences from them which Cyril would not have allowed. About A.D. 448, he taught that in Christ there was but one nature, that of the Incarnate Word. Cyril had expressed himself in this manner, and had appealed to the authority of Athanasius, and had protested that he had used the word "nature" according to the ancient usage to signify "person," and that he professed in Christ two substances, the divine and the human. Eutyches put forward this Athanasian formula μίαν φύσιν τοῦ Θεοῦ λόγου σεσαρκωμένην; and pushed it to an extent which seemed to annihilate the Humanity of Christ. Petavius remarks that there may be three senses of this expression, and that Eutyches had not the penetration to discriminate between the sound and the unsound senses [Petavius, de Incarn. I. xiv. 6-8; IV. vi. 8].

It appears that a representation on the subject of Eutyches' errors was first made by Domnus, Bishop of Antioch, to Flavian of Constantinople, but was little attended to. In A.D. 448, Eusebius, Bishop of Dorylæum, in Phrygia, at a synod at Constantinople, accused Eutyches of heresy, stating that private remonstrance had failed. At a second synod Eusebius presented his articles of accusation, and Eutyches was summoned. After repeated citations he appeared. [1.] He professed his belief that in Christ is the union of two natures. This is not to be understood as an assertion of the pre-existence of Christ's Humanity, but only as of our conception of the existence of Christ. [2.] He professed the Nicene faith. [3.] He confessed that up to that time he had not spoken of Christ's Human Nature as consubstantial with ours. [4.] At the bidding of the synod he admitted this consubstantiality, though with hesitation and reluctance.¹ But [5.] he refused to acknowledge the two natures in Christ, and to anathematize the contrary opinion. Upon this he was sentenced to be deposed from the priesthood and deprived of his abbey. He afterwards asserted that he had appealed to Rome, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, but it does not appear that a formal appeal was made.

Eutyches then sought the advocacy of Peter Chrysologus, Bishop of Ravenna, with Pope Leo, which Chrysologus refused, advising him to submit himself to Leo's judgment. Both Eutyches and Flavian appealed by letter to Rome, and the former, through the favour of the eunuch Chrysaphius, induced the Emperor Theodosius to recommend his cause to Leo, and to procure the convocation of another council, at which the acts of the former council were examined, and the question of Eutyches' alleged appeal considered. The result of this was that Dioscorus of Alexandria, a personal enemy of Flavian, and Chrysaphius, who favoured Eutyches, persuaded the Emperor to convene a general council, as if to free the Church from Nestorianism. Leo thought the proposed council unnecessary, and if it met at all, it ought to meet in Italy. But he at length consented, and appointed his legates for the council, and wrote his celebrated letter to Flavian, declaring the doctrine of the Church on the mystery of the Incarnation. The council met at Ephesus in August, A.D. 449. It had been unfairly packed, and its proceedings were conducted with such violent outrage that it came to be called the "Robber-synod" of Ephesus. The Emperor had assigned to Dioscorus the presidency of the synod. Its whole power was in his hands, and he extorted from the bishops the condemnation and deposition of Flavian and Eusebius. Flavian lodged his appeal to Rome in the hands of Leo's legates. He died shortly afterwards, in consequence of the violence he had suffered in the synod.

In the same year a synod at Rome under Leo declared the acts of the Latrocinium invalid, and two other synods consulted upon the assembling a general council. In the next year [A.D. 451] a synod was also held at Milan against the Ephesine assembly. Leo expressed his wish that a general council should meet in Italy, and Valentinian III. joined in the request. But Theodosius, who had confirmed the Ephesine acts, adhered to them till his death. In the year 450, Marcian ascended the throne, and a synod was held at Constantinople by Anatolius, although he had been created patriarch through the influence of Dioscorus, in which Leo's letter to Flavian was subscribed, and both Nestorius and Eutyches were condemned. Leo now thought a general council unnecessary, but Marcian had already summoned it. It met at Chalcedon in October, A.D. 451, and determined the Catholic faith, and fixed the most suitable terms for its enunciation. The profession of faith it is unnecessary to give at length. It describes Christ, True God and True Man, consubstantial with the Father according to the Divinity, with us according to the Humanity, One and the Same Christ, Son, Lord, and Only-begotten: ἐν δύο φύσεσιν ἀσυγχύτως, ἀτρέπτως, ἀδιαίρετως, ἀχωρίστως γνωριζόμενον. The Greek text in the common editions of the councils has the preposition in this quotation, ἐκ. At first it was so proposed. The influence of Leo's legates prevailed, and ἐν was inserted, as Evagrius gives it [Evagr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 4]. Routh has accordingly admitted ἐν in his text [Routh's Opusc. ii. 426, 475, n.].

Eutyches, who had been already banished by the Emperor, was condemned. Dioscorus was condemned, deposed, and banished. Of the last days of Eutyches nothing is known.

The salutary effects of a council are to be looked for in the whole course of subsequent Church history: the council is not to be judged by disturbances which may immediately follow its decisions. The direction given to the stream is to be regarded, not the eddying of the waters at the time of building the breakwater. And they who regard the definition of Chalcedon as the great guide in the doctrine of the Incarnation need not be disconcerted at the tumults which followed, much as they are to be lamented. Upon the death of Marcian, Proterius, the successor of Dioscorus in the see of Alexandria, was murdered in a rising of the people. Timotheus Ælurus, a Eutychian, was placed in his room.

After his death there was a formal schism, Peter Mongus being chosen by the Eutyechians in opposition to Timotheus. Mongus was banished by the Emperor Zeno, but restored to the see, and Talaia, the successor of Timotheus, displaced. Meanwhile in Syria, Barsumas, an abbot who had assisted Dioscorus at the Latrocinium, spread widely the doctrines of Eutyches. But his followers, about A.D. 460, received from Xenaias, Bishop of Hierapolis, and Peter Fullo, a modification of the Monophysite tenet.

Eutyches taught that the one Nature of our Lord, which is ἐκ δύο φύσεων, is the nature of the Incarnate Word. From this it appears to follow of necessity that the Human Nature is absorbed in the Divine; and in this way the doctrine of Eutyches is commonly stated. But Eutyches expressly repudiated the notion of a transmutation of the human element, as also the doctrine of its absorption, which Theodoret tried to fasten on him. How he explained the transition from duality to unity it is not easy to discover. "His idea must have been," Dörner writes, "that the effect of the Unio was not merely an exaltation or glorification, but an ennobling transmutation of humanity [Dörner's Person of Christ, II. i. pp. 81, 82]. Xenaias and Fullo rejected both the definition of Chalcedon and the doctrine of Eutyches. They asserted the oneness of Christ's Nature, but held at the same time that this one nature was twofold. Eutychanism, as distinguished from Monophysitism, thus soon disappeared, and in the latter doctrine is seen something of a less departure from the faith regarding the verity of our Lord's Human Nature. [MONOPHYSITES.]

EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION. An American sect founded in the beginning of the present century by a German Lutheran of Pennsylvania, named Jacob Albrecht, and hence also going by the name of the Albrecht Brethren. They were organized into a kind of Episcopal form by him in the year 1803, Albrecht going through a form of ordination at the hands of the other preachers of the sect, by which he was made the presiding elder, an officer intended to be analogous to the primitive bishop. For many years the sect was confined exclusively to German immigrants, and their services were all carried on in the German language; but recently they have begun to use English in a large proportion of their places of worship. The principles of the sect are those of the Methodists, except that they more or less deny the doctrine of original sin. Their so-called bishops are elected every four years, and they have under them the ordinary organization of Methodist communities. In 1871 the sect was said to number 60,241 members.

EVANGELICAL LUTHERANS. [UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH.]

EVANGELICAL UNION. [MORISONIANS.]

EVANGELICALS. A name assumed by the modern "Low Church" party in the Church of England in the early part of the nineteenth century. It is equivalent to that of GOSPELLERS, which was assumed by their predecessors at the time of the Reformation, and is much to be deprecated for the arrogance of the assumption which it expresses, that they are the only faithful preachers of the Gospel in the Church of England. [LOW CHURCHMEN.]

EXCALCEATI. A superstitious sect is mentioned under this name by the ancient heresiologists, who thought it a duty of religion to walk barefoot, pleading in support of their notion the command given to Moses and Joshua and the example of Isaiah [Philast. de Hær. lxxx. i. ; Aug. de Hær. lxviii.] They are called Gymnopodæ by the author of Prædestinatus. [Præd. lxviii.]

EXOTIANS. A name given to the Arians of Constantinople when they were deprived of their churches by Theodosius the Great, and compelled to carry on their services—ἐξω τῆς πόλεως—beyond the walls of the city [Socr. Hist. Eccl. v. 7]. The name occurs in the chronicle of Alexandria, and in a decree of Justinian by which he gives all the churches of the heretics to the orthodox except those of the Exotians. The name was probably limited to the EUNOMIANS.

EXUCONTIL. A name given to the Arians at Antioch to express their distinctive tenet that the Son of God, although entitled to divine rank, was a created Being, brought forth from non-existence—ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων, and not eternally existing. [Socr. Hist. Eccl. ii. 45.]

F

FALSE APOSTLES. By this term we are no doubt referred in the first place, and most properly, to apostolic times. But inasmuch as the reception of apostolic doctrine enters into all Church communion, and as apostolic powers for the ordinary government of the Church are vested in the episcopate, there is a proper sense, although it may be a lower sense, in which the term belongs to all ages.

In the first place, then, regarding apostolic times, St. Paul denounces as false apostles the leaders of the party which tried to supplant him in the Church of Corinth [2 Cor. xi. 13]. It was evidently the Judaizing party which there, as in other churches, opposed him. If not actually subdivided, this party was yet at variance within itself as to the name its members should adopt. One said "I am of Apollos," another "I of Cephas;" and the extreme section wished to take the name of Christian as if by an exclusive title [comp. 1 Cor. i. 12 and 2 Cor. x. 7]. This gives emphasis and full meaning to the term ψευδαπόστολοι, and to the ironical designation οἱ ὑπερλίαν ἀπόστολοι. The absence of allusions to false doctrine, and the description of the way in which these men lorded it over God's heritage [2 Cor. xi. 20], lead to the conclusion that they were men who sought their own interests in fomenting the differences between the Jewish and the Gentile Christians. So Tertullian remarks, "Conversacionis non prædicationis adulteratæ reos taxat: adeo de disciplina non de divinitate dissidebatur" [Tertull. adv. Marc. v. 12]. These false apostles put forward some special claim to be apostles of Christ [from 1 Cor. ix. 1 it may perhaps be inferred that they had seen, and so pretended to be witnesses of, Christ]; they commended themselves, they were intruders into another man's line, of things made ready to their hands. They assumed an office to which they had no mission.

In another case the teaching of antichristian doctrine is insisted on, while we are left to form from history our judgment as to the assumption of apostolic powers. "Many false prophets," writes St. John, "are gone out into the world" [1 John iv. 1]. Those of them who set up altar against altar, and claimed the obedience of their followers, would be raised thereby above the general rank of false teachers into the grade of false apostles. The false doctrine appears to be that of the Docetæ, which was common to the Gnostic sects. It was not denied that Jesus Christ was come, but that He was come in the flesh. Where the Gnostics formed sects, their leaders were false apostles.

A different class of heretics is referred to in 1 John ii. 22, those namely who separate Jesus from the Christ. Its teachers are called antichrists, a designation given also to the heretics named in the former passage.

Diotrephes is clearly a false apostle, comparable to those of Corinth, loving to have the pre-eminence, resisting St. John, excommunicating by his own authority. Hymenæus resembles the false prophets named by St. John, the denial of the resurrection following from Docetic doctrine, but whether he was in any degree a usurper of apostolic power is not known.

No true Episcopalian will deny that we may rightly pass from the powers of the apostles to the powers of their successors, and that in what degree the episcopate is the successor of the apostolate in the same degree those who form separate communions in opposition to rightful bishops are false apostles. In the leaders of schisms then we have a line of successors of the ὑπερλίαν ἀπόστολοι, and the characteristics of pretending exclusively to be Christ's, of self-commendation, as well as the essential, the usurpation of authority, are seen in them but too clearly.

If then we take into consideration the other terms connected with the present subject, namely false Christs and false prophets, we have outside of the Church false Messiahs and their attending prophets, such as Barcochab and his prophet Akiba; within the Church prophets or teachers of Christ, but of Christ wrongly set forth, such as the teachers of Docetism; of whom those that assume apostolic authority, and make themselves rulers in the Church, are false apostles. All these, it is evident, have their representatives in later times.

Our Lord's prophecy, delivered on the Mount of Olives, includes all these, and is not only a prophecy of the times immediately before the destruction of Jerusalem and the Coming of the Son of Man, but a prophecy regarding the whole period of Christianity, the latter days, the final dispensation of religion. [FALSE CHRISTS.] Between the destruction of Jerusalem and the Second Advent the fulfilment of the prophecy is found in the teachers who misrepresent the Person and Office of Christ. And the part which is of universal application is the verse [Matt. xxiv. 26], "Wherefore, if they say unto you, He is in the desert," &c. For as the errors named by St. John are sufficient examples (so comprehensive indeed as to be almost exhaustive) of the false doctrines regarding our Lord's nature which have rent the Church, so these words of Christ's prophecy point to the two great errors regarding our Lord's relation to the Church which tend to disunion. Both errors are a forsaking the general society of the faithful, one to seek Christ in the solitudes of ascetic seclusion, the other to seek Him in the secret chambers of self-constituted conventicles. The Church is warned on the one hand against a perverted and exaggerated monasticism, on the other hand against the false pretences of Catharism or Puritanism.

To this latter head may be referred also the schisms of those who pretend to special and new revelations and dispensations of the Spirit. The error in these cases seems at first sight to be solely regarding the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity. But it is remarkable how in these cases error regarding the Second Person is brought to light, as if it were really the fundamental or original error. Theology gathers itself around the doctrine of the Incarnation, and heresy is found sooner or later to refer itself to the belief and estimate of the Son of God. So that, if we include erroneous representations of Christ in the term False Christs, it is hardly too much to say that all heresies and schisms are referrible to the false apostles of false Christs. [HERETICS.]

FALSE CHRISTS. Ψευδόχριστοι are named in our Lord's prophecy, Matt. xxiv. and Mark xiii. They are manifestly those who deny the Son of Mary to be the Christ, and themselves assume and counterfeit the very Person of Christ. With them are named false prophets, and guided by this connection the term false prophets may be limited to those who proclaim a false Messiah, either said to be already come or yet to come. In 1 John iv. 1-3, the term is used more widely. It is applied to those who did not deny that the Word of God had come into the world, but who denied that He had come in the flesh. These false prophets are to be classed with the false apostles of 2 Cor. xi. 13. [FALSE APOSTLES.]

Our Lord's prophecy, delivered on the Mount of Olives, is eminently one of those prophecies "which are not fulfilled punctually at once, but have springing and germinant accomplishment throughout many ages; though the height or fulness of them may refer to some one age." It is possible, indeed, with a certain degree of verisimilitude, to distribute this prophecy between the last great event to which its fulness refers, and the most signal anticipation of that fulfilment,—to say that in Matt. xxiv. verses 4-14 are general, pertaining to the subject at large, that verses 15-22 belong specifically to the destruction of Jerusalem, and verses 23-31 to the second coming of Christ.¹ But, regarding the middle portion of these three, although it is expressed, for the guidance of the disciples, in terms belonging to the destruction of Jerusalem, yet the assertion [ver. 21] of the extremity of tribulation can only refer to the tribulation of the last days, and leads to the conclusion that before Christ's Second Coming there will be an abomination of desolation standing where it ought not, which will constrain the faithful to flee from the Holy City to the mountains.² There seems, again, to be no good reason why the second capture of Jerusalem, and the false Messiah Barcohab should not be accepted as another partial accomplishment of the prophecy; nor why the many Antichrists [1 John ii. 18] who, though they may not have assumed and counterfeited the very person of Christ, yet challenged and pretended His authority and pre-eminence, should not also be included in its scope. It is better to consider our Lord's prophecy as one and entire, without attempting to refer one portion to one time and another portion to another time, to say that it is a prophecy of the last days, with earlier and therefore partial accomplishments. The disciples who inquired "What shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of the end of the world?" and connected these last things with the destruction of the Holy City, approached in their ignorance to the knowledge of God, with whom there is no time [Williams' Holy Week, p. 245, ed. 1870]. In this view of the prophecy are also to be admitted, for the perpetual instruction of the Church, the pregnant lessons to be drawn from the 26th verse. There have been few ages of the Church in which false prophets and false apostles have not bade men leave the true society of God's House to seek Christ either in the deserts of ascetic seclusion or in the secret chambers of self-righteous conventicles. We shall thus be relieved also from the necessity which many commentators have felt themselves to lie under, the necessity of finding false Christs, in the strictest sense of the term, at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem: for we shall have to seek only a partial accomplishment of the prophecy. A false Christ, to that generation, could be only one, who threw himself upon the Messianic hope of his nation, and pretended to meet it. In later times, and in the Christian Church, a false Christ might be one who based his pretensions on Gnostic theories, as is recognised by Hegesippus [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 22]; but such men were not Jews speaking to Jews. Simon Magus little answers to our conception of a false Christ appealing to the national hope of a Messiah. Dositheus, it may be, made some attempt to enlist that hope on his side; still, the foundation of the subject of that verse immediately with the preceding subject, so that the tribulation spoken of is the tribulation of the time of Antichrist named in ver. 24; and the word τότε of ver. 23 an indefinite term, = at some later time. [Hom. in Matt. lxxvi. vol. ii. p. 383 of Field's ed.]

² Is this to be interpreted, from that which ought to be the centre of unity, but which Christ has forsaken (μεταβαλόμεν ἐνρείδεν), to what appears to be the outskirts, but where Christ really is?

his claim was the same as that of Simon's. Nor does any false Messiah appear in history before Barcochab. False prophets there were who promised a miraculous interference of God on behalf of the Jews, and it is probable they based this promise on the promise of the Messiah. Many were mere impostors, suborned, Josephus says, by the tyrannical leaders to prevent the people from deserting to the Romans [Joseph. Bell. Jud. VI. v. 2]; others appear to have been genuine fanatics, and to have added the elements of fanaticism to the party of insurgent Galileans formed by Theudas [Joseph. Antiq. XX. v. 1; cf. Bell. Jud. VII. xi. 1, Antiq. XX. vii. 6].

Barcochab is known in history as the first false Messiah. He appeared when Hadrian's edict forbidding circumcision [JUDAISM] had threatened to exterminate Judaism, and the additional insult of intending to settle a Roman colony at Jerusalem, and to build a heathen temple on the site of the Holy of Holies, had driven the Jews to a mad despair. His name (whether real or assumed is not certainly known) was held to identify him with the star of Balaam's prophecy. He professed to exhibit signs and wonders. The most celebrated Rabbi of the time, Akiba, was his adherent and standard-bearer. The advantages he gained over the Romans, and the time he is said to have held Jerusalem, shew the extent to which his imposture prevailed. After him, a long list of false Messiahs and false prophets might be produced. The chief in the list are—Moses, in Crete, in the fifth century [Socr. Hist. Eccl. vii. 38]; the failure of whose pretensions led to the conversion of many Jews to Christianity; Julian, in Palestine, about A.D. 530, whose followers were dispersed, and he himself taken by the troops of Justinian [Basnage, Hist. of Jews, VI. xxi. 9]; Serenus, in Spain, about A.D. 714, who professed that he would lead the Jews to Palestine [Marca, Hist. de Bearn. ii. 2; Finn, Sephardim, p. 139]; in the twelfth century, no fewer than seven or eight in France, Spain, and Persia [Basnage, Hist. vii. 9]; Sabbatai Levi, a native of Aleppo, or Smyrna, about the year 1666, who was proclaimed in Jerusalem [Milman, Hist. of Jews, xxvii.].

But these instances, interesting as they are to a historian of the Jews, scarcely belong to our present subject. For our Lord's prophecy, which is our guide, considers the false Christs as connected with and bearing on the Christian Church. In the case of Barcochab that connection and bearing is most close. He appeared when the last barrier of Judaism was about to be thrown down, and the line of bishops of the circumcision about to cease. His insurrection led to the capture of the city and to its rebuilding under its new name, which determined the Church of Jerusalem to embrace Catholicity. It was meet that the faith of the Jewish Christians at such a time should be tried; but the conduct of the later impostors can have no such bearing on Christianity.¹

To return, then, to the early Christian Church. It has been already noticed, that Hegesippus finds a fulfilment of our Lord's prophecy in the various teachers who "divided the unity of the Church by the introduction of corrupt doctrines against God and against His Christ." Hegesippus specifies several Gnostic sects. The Gnostic heresies, however, did not follow the example of Dositheus, and set up false Christs in the strict sense of the term, i.e. men denying altogether that Jesus is the Christ, and themselves assuming the person of Christ; they were antichristian, as denying, in one form or another, the true nature of Christ. They were, for example, in general Docetæ; not denying that Christ was come in some way or other, but denying that He was truly come in the flesh [1 John iv. 2]. According to the distinction drawn between false prophets and false apostles, these Gnostic heresies, and all heretical teaching regarding the person of Christ, must be considered as the work of false apostles. There have appeared, indeed, in the Church from time to time, impostors, fanatics, or madmen (and these three classes blend together in a wonderful manner), who have proclaimed themselves "the Christ;" but they have been for the most part obscure adventurers, and certainly have not founded sects of note, or left any mark upon the Church. The trial of false doctrine, which has sifted and winnowed the faith of the Church, has been heresy regarding the Person of our Lord, and then the claim of a new and special dispensation of the Spirit.

Still, the pretensions to be the Christ are interesting, as illustrating the state of that part of the Church in which they occur. Every lunatic asylum has an inmate calling himself Christ; and not a few of these have cunning enough to play the part, and gather followers, if there be fanaticism enough in the Church. Thus, in the year 591, at Gabalum, in Aquitania Prima (now Javols), "an immense multitude of people was seduced" by such an impostor, and those "not only rustics, but also priests of the Church" [Gregor. Turon. Hist. x. 25; ix. 6]. In 1663 Simon Morinus was burnt alive at Paris, for taking the title of the Son of God [Bayle's Dict. art. Morinus].

These are only very partial outbursts of fanaticism, and it may be concluded that not until the near approach of the Second Coming of our Lord will there appear a false Christ who shall deceive many, so as to seduce, if it were possible, even the elect. [DICT. OF THEOLOGY, ANTICHRIST.]

FAMILISTS. A section of the Anabaptists, which was known also by the name of "The Family of Love." Some of them emigrating to England, won over many disciples from among the Puritans, and thus a separate sect was organized, which attracted much attention during the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and James I., but was assimilated to other sects during the time of the Great Rebellion.

The Familists are traced up in the first instance to a Dutch Anabaptist named David Joris, or

George, who was born at Delft in the year 1501, and died at Basle, under the assumed name of John Von Brügge, in 1556. He was a man of no education, but had travelled in France and England, and having obstructed a procession in the former country, was punished by flogging, imprisonment, and the boring of his tongue. About the year 1535, he separated from the Anabaptists, and formed a sect of his own, professing to have visions and revelations by which he was guided, and some of which he printed in his "Wonder Book" in 1542. But after having seen his own mother beheaded at Delft in 1537 for her opinions as one of his followers, together with the persecution, sometimes to a similar end, of others among his adherents, he finally settled down into the safe rôle of a rich citizen of Basle, where he lived under his assumed name, and with the appearance of being a respectable Calvinist during the last twelve years of his life. After his death he was accused of heresy by his son-in-law (to whom he had not left his property), and his body having been tried and condemned by the Calvinist senate of Basle, was publicly burned by the hangman. The accuser afterwards added to this indignity that of publishing his father-in-law's life. [Blesdyck, Hist. Davidis Georgii, Displaying of an Horrible Sect, &c. by J. R. 1579.]

The leadership which had been dropped by Joris, was taken up by Henry Nicolas (generally called "H. N."), an Anabaptist who had been mixed up with the Münster insurrection in his native city of Amsterdam [ANABAPTISTS], and had fled thence to Emden in the year 1533. During the time of Joris' wandering life, he and Nicolas had become acquainted, and thus the fanaticism of the latter became more fanatical. He set himself to oppose all existing forms of religion, and to establish an entirely new one. As the contemporary writer just referred to says, "Henry gave himself to writing of books, which he put in print, especially one among the rest which was the chief, called 'The Glass of Righteousness' the less (for he compiled two books of that title), wherein he certifieth his Family of Love, that they must pass four most terrible castles, full of cumbersome enemies, before they come to the house of love. The first is John Calvin, the second the Papists, the third Martin Luther, the fourth the Anabaptists; and passing these dangers, they may be of the Family, else not" [Displaying, &c.].

Fuller says that Nicolas came to England "in the latter end of the reign of Edward VI., and joined himself to the Dutch congregation in London, where he seduced a number of artificers and silly women, amongst whom two daughters of one Warwick, to whom he dedicated an epistle, were his principal perverts." [Fuller's Church Hist. ix. 3, § 38.] The statement is confirmed by a letter of Micronius to Bullinger, dated May 20th, 1550, in which he expresses satisfaction at the arrival of John à Lasco in England, because it is a matter of the first importance that the Word of God should be preached in London in the German language, "to guard against the heresies which are introduced by our countrymen, there being Arians, Marcionists, Libertines, Davists, and the like monstrosities, in great numbers" [Orig. Lett. Park. Soc. ii. 560]. Davidians are also numbered among the "damnable sects" which were then troubling the reign of Edward VI., by Becon [Works, ii. 379, Park. Soc. ed.]; and on the accession of Queen Elizabeth, Archbishop Parker writes that "the realm is full of Anabaptists, Arians, Libertines, Free-will Men," &c. [Parker's Corresp. 61].

The Familists maintained that there was no true knowledge of Christ or of the Scriptures out of their community: that as Moses had taught law, and Christ had taught faith, so their mission, superior to both, was to teach love. They professed to have attained a kind of deification by direct communion with God, and spoke of others as "ungodded" and "unilluminated" men. [Henry More's Theol. Works, 171; Sir F. Knollys to Lord Burghley; Wright's Q. Eliz. and her Times, ii. 153.] Every principal doctrine of Christianity was interpreted allegorically, so that they denied the reality of our Lord's Incarnation, and of His future Advent; explained away the resurrection of the body and the general judgment, and taught that the "Last Day" was the time of the new dispensation established by themselves, in which "the Service of Love" had become the climax of all dispensations, and the entrance into the Holy of Holies. This habit of explaining away the truths of Christianity is spoken of by Hooker, who writes, "When they of the Family of Love have it once in their heads that Christ doth not signify any one person, but a quality whereof many are partakers—that to be raised is nothing else but to be regenerated, or endued with the said quality, and that when separation of them which have it from them which have it not is here made, this is judgment; how plainly do they imagine that the Scripture ever speaketh in the favour of that sect" [Hooker's Eccles. Polit. pref. iii. 9]. Bishop Bancroft also writes of Nicolas, "He turneth the whole doctrine of our salvation into a vain mystery, and an allegorical conceit of his own, leaving the Church no mediator at all beside himself. He hath framed a platform or new kingdom and gospel of his own invention, bearing this title, 'Evangelium regni Dei.' Into this kingdom as vicegerents he hath brought for our ministers his 'Seniores sanctæ intelligentiæ, Patres familiæ Christi;' and for our archbishops and bishops his 'primates,' his 'seniores parentes,' and I know not how many illuminated and deified governors" [Bancroft, Survey, &c. p. 2].

It is evident from all accounts of the Familists that they were extreme Antinomians. Indeed Strype mentions two sections of them, the "Family of the Mount," and the "Family of the Essentialists," who denied that there was such a thing as sin [Strype's Ann. II. i. 563, ed. 1824]. Immorality was, therefore, very common among them. William Penn says of them, that "divers fell into gross and enormous practices, pretending, in excuse thereof, that they could, without evil, commit the same act which was sin in another to do" [Penn's Journal of Fox, pref. i. 7, ed. 1852]. Baxter speaks of them as infidels [Baxter's Life and Times, i. 91]; and his severe condemnation is fully justified by the facts stated by one of themselves, that many among them questioned whether there were any heaven or hell beyond the pleasures and pains of the present life. It was thus that they acquired the name of Epicureans with some writers, as if their distinctive tenet had been the lawless saying, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die."

It was to be expected that such principles as these would attract the attention of the Government, for in those days they would be considered dangerous to civil order as well as to morality and religion. We find, accordingly, that in 1574 Robert Sharp, rector of Stretchal in Essex, was apprehended on the charge of having formed a congregation of these lawless fanatics at Balsham in Cambridgeshire [ibid. 556]; and that in 1576 David Thickpenney, vicar of Brighton, was brought before the Privy Council on a similar charge [Grindal's Remains, 359, Parker Soc.]. In both cases they denied the accusation, although events proved, at least in the latter case, that the denial involved shameless falsehood. This agrees with what is stated respecting their principles by Archbishop Sandys, who charged them with teaching "that it is good Christendom to lie, swear and forswear, to say and unsay, to any saving such as be of the same Family, with whom they must only use all plainness, and keep their mysteries secret from all others to themselves" [Sandys' Serm. 130, Parker Soc.]. A vigorous attempt was made to suppress them by a proclamation issued "against the Sectaries of the Family of Love" on October 3rd, 1580; and this was followed by a form of abjuration issued by the Privy Council, in which the members of the sect were required to abjure their most conspicuous heresies [Wilkins' Concil. iv. 296, 297]. These measures seem to have broken up the sect, although some persons were found for half a century afterwards who still owned to the name. They were, however, gradually absorbed into the ranks of the Puritans, and Strype writes, "I remember a gentleman, a great admirer of that sect, within less than twenty years ago, told me, that there was then but one of the Family of Love alive, and he an old man," which shews that they must have ceased to exist as a body about the middle of the seventeenth century. Latterly, Fuller says, they were known by the name of "Ranters."

FARNOVIANS. The Antitrinitarians of Poland and Transylvania, who separated from the Reformed Churches in the year 1565, were divided into several parties, until Faustus Socinus brought them together into one sect. Of these parties the Farnovians held Arian opinions. Being able therefore to render a certain degree of worship to our Lord, a point on which the Socinians laid much stress, they were treated much more leniently than the Budnæans, who were Psilanthropists, and gradually passed into Socinianism. Their leader Farnovius died in the year 1615. [SOCINIANS.]

FIFTH MONARCHY MEN. A section of Puritans whose Millenarian opinions were so heated by the temporary overthrow of the Monarchy and the Church during the Great Rebellion that they expected it to be followed by the personal reign on earth of Christ and His Saints.

This fanatical form of Millenarianism first began to make itself conspicuous about the year 1653, when a majority of the members in what is called the "Little Parliament" set themselves (under the leadership of the regicide Harrison) to carry out a great number of reforms by way of preparing for the Divine reign. These preparations, however, which were to go the length of destroying cathedrals, dissolving the universities, confiscating church tithes, and superseding all other laws by the law of Moses, were interrupted by Cromwell's dissolution of the Parliament. But the preachers of the party kept up its excitement and expectation long after its political hopes had been thus summarily extinguished, the chief of them being Feake and Vavasour Powell. The substance of their teaching was "that Christ was setting up a fifth monarchy in the world; that a spirit of prophecy had been communicated to the saints, whereby they were enabled to describe future events; and that the design of Christ was to destroy all antichristian "forms," including established churches, together with their clergy;" and Powell is said once to have broken out while preaching into the ejaculation, "Let us go home and pray and say, 'Lord, wilt Thou have Oliver Cromwell to reign over us, or Jesus Christ to reign over us.'" These visionaries were also strong supporters of the Dutch War, believing that God had given Holland to the English as a "landing-place of the saints, whence they should proceed to pluck the whore of Babylon from her chair, and to establish the kingdom of Christ on the Continent" [Stoughton's Eccl. Hist. ii. 65, 72]. But the strong hand of Cromwell prevented any attempt to bring about the fulfilment of their hopes, and after the arrest of Feake and Powell the "Monarchy Men" continued their agitations in a more private manner.

The disbanding of the army after the settlement of Charles II. on his throne stimulated the sect, however, to a frantic effort at obtaining possession of London. A wine-cooper, named Venner, had persuaded a number of them to accept him for their leader, promising them that they would be able to bear down all opponents, as Jonathan and his armour-bearer had borne down the Philistine garrison, and that the Lord would fight for them. Full of these ideas they issued forth from their meeting-house in Blackfriars at midnight on Sunday, January 6th, 1661, carrying a banner inscribed with the words "The Lord God and Gideon," and marching through the City with the cry "Long live King Jesus!" Their sudden attack overpowered for the moment the City guard, but they did not remain in the City, Venner marching off his followers to Caen Wood at Highgate. There they were attacked by a regiment of Guards on the following day, and after a desperate resistance, in which many were killed, Venner and those who remained were taken prisoners, covered with wounds. Venner and ten others were executed for high treason on January 19th and 21st, and thus the projected Fifth Monarchy came to an end. [Secret Hist. of Charles II.'s Court, 343, 1792. Peppys' Diary, i. 167. State Trials, vi. 105. Pagitt's Heresiography, pp. 269-295, ed. 1662, contains a contemporary account.]

FLACIANS. [ADIAPHORISTS.]

FLAGELLANTS. The ascetic devotees whose astounding practices won them this appellation appeared in Italy in the middle of the thirteenth century; and thenceforth, at intervals, their fitful outbreaks continued to vex Europe for above a hundred and fifty years. The tenets of these sectaries were indeed simple; their creed being the scourge, their ritual flagellation. In its first presentation, this singular fanaticism seems simply to have been a paroxysm of devotional hysteria, undirected by any rational hope or fear, without aim, method, or formula, and one which a unique combination of time and circumstance alone made possible. Though public collective penance was known perhaps fifty years before, the date of this movement is not earlier than A.D. 1260, which year, marking as it does, nearly the central point of the thirteenth century, was perhaps that moment of all others when the profligacy which made penance desirable had reached its flood. Never had the wars of Guelph and Ghibelline produced such monsters of selfishness, treachery, and brutish ferocity as at this time. The intellectual despotism of the Church of the great Innocent was degraded into the mere selfish tyranny of a self-seeking pontiff. The imperial throne was vacant. There was no longer a common cause of civic freedom to fight for under the Church's blessing; no longer even any loyalty to the Cæsar. In every city and state, each fought for his own hand, each sought only his personal aggrandizement. With the exception perhaps of France, whose throne was still filled by the saintly Louis IX., continental Europe presented at this epoch one monotonous scene of bloodshed, desolation, and more than Indian savagery. In Italy of all countries was this degradation most entire, and there of all countries would it be most keenly felt; and thus it was natural that an Italian city should be the first to quiver with this strange spasm of remorse or repentance.

The desire for expiation, once awakened, ran naturally into the channels which the labours of the great ascetics Peter Damiani and Dominic "Loricatus" had made for it. These leaders and popularizers of penance had preached largely on the merits of flagellation, and had gone so far as to teach, without the disapproval of other churchmen, that years of ordinary mortification might be condensed into the less troublesome, if more painful, infliction of the scourge. It is to be noted, however, that this movement was in no sense a Church movement, nor was this self-inflicted punishment in any way to be connected with that penance received from the hands of the priest (though flagellation itself had thus obtained a certain spurious dignity), which was recognized as the last mark of subjection to the sacerdotal power. Furthermore, it was not the effect of the eloquence of some fiery preacher, eager for the fame and influence attaching to the founder of a new sect of ascetics, for the first leader of a Flagellant pilgrimage, Rainer, a monk of Perugia, though his eloquence excited the actual outburst of the fanaticism, does not seem to have been responsible either for its continuance or its rapid spread throughout the rest of Italy. In A.D. 1260 it appeared in Perugia, in a few months or weeks it was heard of in every town of Italy; but, although its passage of the Alps was not slow, it is not until the next century that the Flagellant devotees succeeded in making a permanent impression on the Teutonic peoples. By that time the first wave of the fanaticism had passed clear over Italy, and that country, no longer the prey of two contending powers only, was forgetting her unrivalled miseries in an almost equally unrivalled material prosperity.

The subsequent outbursts in Italy appear rather to have been the ineffectual work of a small body of sentimental revivalists, than the spontaneous outcome of a profound popular agitation. Of this most interesting and unique phenomenon, the first appearance of the Flagellants, two writers, one an Italian monk of Padua, the other the Abbot of Nieder Altaisch, have left us a history. The account given by the former of these, in all respects corroborated by his German brother, is to this effect: "When all Italy was stained with crimes of every kind, this superstition, hitherto unknown to the world, suddenly appeared. It first seized the inhabitants of Perugia, then those of Rome, and afterwards almost all the inhabitants of Italy. To such a degree were they affected by the fear of God, that both noble as well as ignoble persons, young and old, even children of five years of age, went naked about the streets without any sense of shame, walking in public, two and two, in solemn procession. Every one of them held in his hand a scourge, made of leather thongs, and with tears and groans they lashed themselves on their backs till the blood ran from the infliction. All the while they continued weeping and giving tokens of a sorrow as bitter as if they had been actually witnessing the Passion of our Saviour, imploring the forgiveness of God and His Mother, and praying that He Who had been appeased by the repentance of so many sinners, would not disdain theirs. Nor was this done in the daytime only, but during the night, and in the depths of winter, hundreds, thousands, and tens of thousands of these penitents, with lighted tapers in their hands, and preceded by priests who carried crosses and banners, filled the streets and the churches, humbly prostrating themselves before the altars. The same scenes were enacted in the small towns and country villages, so that both hill and valley resounded with the voice of men crying unto God. All musical instruments were silenced, all songs of love were hushed. The only music that prevailed (both in town and country) was that of the mournful voice of the penitent, whose dolorous accents might have moved hearts of flint. The most obdurate sinners were melted to tears. Nor were women exempt from the general spirit of devotion, and not only was it the common people who did this, but girls and matrons of noble family underwent the same mortifications in the retirement of their own chambers." The monk's account of the effect of these proceedings is equally marvellous. "Enemies," he says, "became friends; usurers and robbers hastened to restore their ill-gotten gains; criminals of all sorts confessed their offences; the gaols were opened; prisoners set at liberty (doubtless without ransom) by their captors; the exiles were permitted to return to their homes." So many and so great were the good works thus performed that the writer can only account for it by the hypothesis that "a universal apprehension had fallen on mankind that the Divine Power was preparing to consume them with fire, or destroy them by earthquake, or by some other of those agencies within the ken of Divine justice for taking vengeance upon crime."

When the mania had spread throughout all Italy, it passed beyond the Alps as far as Hungary. Outbursts similar to that of Perugia, are, though less authentically, reported in Alsace, Bavaria, Poland, and Bohemia—countries, it is to be observed, in which numerous free spiritual organizations already practised a rigorous and kindred asceticism. In Italy, however, this access of devotion was as ephemeral as from its purely emotional character might be expected. The wealthier classes tired of these scenes of equality with the poor, the magistrates looked with suspicion on these tumultuous assemblages, the priests looked coldly on a movement in which the laity took so leading a part, and, as if by the consent of the community, the sect, bound by no ties except that of a common penance, melted into the surrounding population. For half a century and more no further outbreaks disturbed the peace of Italy; while in Germany the fanaticism slumbered. North of the Alps the Flagellants doubtless found shelter among the schismatic associations, of whom the Beghards were the most audacious and enduring in their hostility to the Church; while in Italy and Piedmont, where the cities swarmed with heretics flying from the Albigensian massacres, they were not likely to find a too austere hospitality. Partly, doubtless, through absorption by the more rational sects, partly through the decay of their enthusiasm, the Flagellants are scarcely to be heard of again until the time of the Great Plague.

That awful visitation known as the Black Death

swept over Europe in A.D. 1348, and never had pestilence been so fatal in its nature, or so unsparring in its ravages. No country was exempt, no precaution or remedy availed. Death, sudden, cruel, of the most loathsome kind, knocked at every door. The feelings of men passed suddenly from an everyday confidence in existence to the extremity of despair. No expiation seemed too great for a penance, no suffering too heavy, compared with the appalling misery which the penance or suffering it was hoped might allay. To Europe in such a mood came the Flagellants again, offering to the distraught and despairing souls penances the rigour of which diverted the mind, and an enthusiasm which raised it, at least temporarily, above the agony of material grief and terror. But the Flagellants, as they issued from their retirement in Hungary and the German States, were very different from the early emotionalists of Italy. They brought with them a genuine dislike to the Church, a creed very distinctly heretical, and a comparatively complete though simple organization. They were led by a general of devotion and two lieutenants, and governed according to a very stringent code. They affirmed that they derived their authority from St. Peter, who had placed a letter of authorization on the altar of his church at Jerusalem. Sabbath-breaking, blasphemy, usury, adultery, and non-observance of fasts, were the sins they especially reprobated. Those who joined them had to be capable of self-support, for they would accept no gifts except banners for their processions. They marched through the cities in long processions, clad in mourning garments, with red crosses on back and breast, their eyes fixed on the ground. Lighted candles, banners of velvet, of purple, and cloth of gold, preceded them. Gradually, as their influence increased (as with the decrease of the pestilence it was certain to do), they were welcomed with the ringing of bells, with the admiration of the crowd that came to listen to their psalms, and to see the penance that would avert the plague.

That penance was indeed, at least when it was fully organized, a bizarre spectacle. Twice a day they went forth to the place of flagellation. There, amid penitential hymns, they stripped themselves naked to the waist, or retained only a thin linen tunic to protect their flesh from the blows of the scourge. They then lay down in different positions, the adulterer with his face to the ground, the perjurer holding up three fingers, their attitudes being adjusted to the nature of their several crimes. The master commenced the ceremony by administering punishment to each in turn, then bade them rise and scourge themselves; at other times, after administering one blow to each, the master himself lay down at the head of the procession, and one by one, each as he became the hindmost of the brethren, rose in turn, scourged his fellows, and again lay down. For thirty-three days and a half, the number of years of Christ's sojourn upon earth, did they ply their triple scourges, iron-knotted, in each town where they made halt.

Joined by large numbers, the brotherhood passed through Hungary, Austria, Germany, and threatening France, they entered Spain. At Bergamo in Italy was a notorious flagellation, but there and there only did the papal mandate silence the ineffectual revival. Venturini, the leader of the movement, was banished to the mountains and his band dispersed. But in other countries Flagellants were more successful; in some they took possession of the churches. The Emperor Charles IV. applied to the Pope for aid in his German dominions; the Sorbonne asked advice for France. The Pope Clement VI. fulminated his anathema upon them, but the papal bull was ineffectual in hushing the sounds with which all ears were grown familiar, the lash, the cry of pain, the droning psalm or "Geisslerlied." Interdicted though their processions were, and excluded from France by Philip VI., a colony of one hundred and twenty succeeded in reaching London. The citizens gazed and wondered at this baptism of blood; but they went no further, nor did a single English proselyte recompense the fanatics for the dangers of their voyage. Though excluded from France, unwelcomed in England, having made but little impression on the fickle Italians, yet so sincere and audacious were these voluntaries of the scourge (they attempted to carry on their proselytizing in Avignon itself), that the Inquisition was directed to turn its attention to their heresy. In proportion, however, as the Flagellants are tracked into more distant regions by the Church, they are found to have developed the constitution of their unorthodoxy, and in Thuringia, under the leadership of Conrad Schmidt, they were successful in giving to their dislike of the established religion and their passion for the scourge the form of a connected system of heretical doctrine. In the year 1414 the Dominican Henry Schonefeld, a most able inquisitor, conducted a judicial inquiry of unexampled rigour and success at Sangerhausen. Above one hundred and twenty Flagellants were convicted and given to the flames in that district alone; and it was mainly owing to the activity of the Inquisition that the Council of Constance was enabled to distinguish and condemn fifty errors of the Flagellant sect. Of these the chief were, that the sect was miraculously instituted by St. Peter; that God had decreed the abolition of the special power of the priesthood; that the baptism of water was abolished, and that of blood substituted; that Transubstantiation was untrue; that the sale of masses was a selling of Christ, worse than that of Judas; that by the institution of flagellation the seven sacraments were abolished; that a Beghard burnt at Erfurt in A.D. 1366 was Elias; that Conrad himself was Enoch; that Enoch and Elias had thus returned; and that the Pope was Antichrist.

It is not difficult to discern Lollard proclivities in these tenets, nor to recognise their undisguised hostility to the papal pretensions. The Inquisition triumphed again as it had done in Toulouse, and was about to do in Spain. The Flagellants disappeared in Germany, but the evil fashion, which in the last years of the fourteenth century had been again coquetted with in Italy, where it produced the Bianchi of the Peninsula, found under the orthodox leadership of another Dominican, Vincent Ferreri, new victims in Spain. It required the influence of the great Gerson himself to induce the Flagellant leader to forego his foolish enterprise. Persecution, while it did not destroy the practice of flagellation, was entirely successful in destroying the corporate or sectarian existence of the Flagellants; and although in the sixteenth and even seventeenth centuries numerous devotees of the scourge appear under the name of white, black, grey, blue, and other penitents, subsisting under the protection of popes, and by the encouragement of the Jesuits, yet these are orthodox bodies, and the heretical Flagellant has disappeared. The fifteenth century saw the complete destruction of the sect, the total suppression of the heresy, so far at any rate as any public manifestation is concerned, though there is reason for believing that under the title of Beghards a remnant continued to exist until the date of the Reformation.

[For the first period of the history of the Flagellants the authorities are Justinus, Monachus Patavinensis, in Muratori; Hermannus Altahensis; in Böhmer's Fontes rerum Germanicarum, and the Brit. Mus. Chronicle. For the second period, that which followed the Great Pestilence, Closener's Strasburg Chronicle, and the other authorities cited in Gieseler's Eccl. History. The modern authors to be consulted are Boileau's Historia Flagellantium; Hecker's Epidemics of the Middle Ages, and in particular the work entitled, Die Christlicher Geisslergesellschaften, by Dr. E. G. Förstemann, which last leaves little to be desired.]

F LANDRIANS. [FLEMINGS.]

FLEMINGS. The stricter sect of the Mennonites, whose members profess to maintain the more rigid principles and practices of their founder, and hence are called the "Fine," or rigid Mennonites ("die Feinen"), as distinguished from the lax, or "Gross" Mennonites ("die Grohen"), who are also known as WATERLANDERS. The Flemings were so called, because a majority of the sect lived in Flanders; the Waterlanders, because they were principally people of Waterland, in the north of Holland. The question on which they separated was that of discipline, and social custom—not of doctrine; the Flemings maintaining the manners of the rigid Puritans, and excommunicating members of their sect for "worldliness," as well as for immorality. But the Flemings also maintain tenaciously the original heresy of Menno respecting the Incarnation, namely, that the Son of God became Man by a special act of creation in the womb of the Blessed Virgin, and not by natural growth "of the substance of His mother." They practise the ancient rite of washing each other's feet as a Divine law, and are hence called also Podoniptæ, or "feet-washers." [Mosheim's Eccl. Hist. iii. 153, Stubbs' ed.]

FLORINIANS. A sect of Valentinians, who followed Florinus, a Roman priest, contemporary with Blastus, the founder of the Quartodeciman schism. Florinus had been a disciple of Polycarp, and Irenæus wrote to him, "While I was yet a boy, I saw thee in Lower Asia with Polycarp, distinguishing thyself in the royal court, and endeavouring to gain his approbation." In his later years he embraced the heretical opinion, that God was the author of evil, and being deposed from the priesthood by Eleutherus [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 15], he afterward became a Valentinian, seducing many others to that heresy [ibid. 20.] Irenæus wrote to him before his fall an epistle, which formed a work entitled "De Ogdoad," and of which a most interesting fragment is preserved by Eusebius [ibid.]. He also addressed to Florinus another treatise, Περὶ μοναρχίας, but this is entirely lost.

What the opinions of Florinus were is indicated by the words of Irenæus, "These doctrines, Florinus, to say the least, are not sound doctrines. They are not in agreement with the Church, and they are calculated to involve those that maintain them in the greatest impiety. Not even the heretics outside the pale of the Church ever ventured to assert such doctrines; and they were never delivered to thee by the presbyters who were before us." Then, speaking of his intimacy with Polycarp, and of the distinctness with which he remembered what he used to say about St. John, and others who had seen the Lord, Irenæus goes on to say, "I can bear witness before God, that if that blessed and apostolic Father had heard any such thing, he would have cried out and stopped his ears, and would have exclaimed, according to his custom, 'O, good God, unto what times hast Thou reserved me, that I should endure such things?' He would have fled, too, from the place in which he had been sitting or standing when he heard such words" [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 20].

St. Augustine gives as the characteristic feature of the Florinian heresy the tenet, that God is the author of evil [Aug. de Hæres. lxxvi.]. But if the "Floriani" named by Philaster are the same sect, they also denied the resurrection and future judgment, together with the Divine Nature and miraculous conception of our Lord [Philast. de Hæres. lvii.]. Philaster identifies them, indeed, with the CARPOCRATIANS, and says that they were also called Milites "quia de militibus fuerunt," this expression agreeing with what Epiphanius says of the Egyptian Gnostics, Οἱ αὐτοὶ δὲ ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ Στρατιωτικοὶ καλοῦνται [Epiph. Hæres. xxvi. 3]. The Florinians, like the Quartodecimans, are associated with Judaizing tendencies by the ancient heresiologists. [Theod. Hæret. fab. i. 23.]

FRATERCULI. [FRATICELLI.]

FRATICELLI. Italian fanatics of the fourteenth century, who also called themselves "Fratres de paupere vitâ," and were closely allied to the BEGHARDS and the BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT.

The Fraticelli were, in the first instance, a body of Franciscan friars or Minorites [PAULO-JOANNITES], who were permitted to form themselves into a separate community, under a friar named Liberatus, for the more rigorous observance of their rule, especially as to poverty, and who received the pet name of "Little Brethren" from the populace, of whom they begged their daily bread. These "Cœlestine Hermits" were established by a bull of Pope Cœlestine V. [A.D. 1294]; but the bull was said to have been obtained by misrepresentation, and the order was dissolved by Boniface VIII. [A.D. 1302] before it had been in existence eight years, on the ground that heresy had become prevalent among its members. The Fraticelli openly resisted this decree of the Pope, and fled to Sicily. Clement V. endeavoured to suppress them by conciliating the original party, and inviting them to reunite with the Franciscans, for which purpose he heard their complaints in person, and published a new interpretation of the rule of the order [A.D. 1310], in the hope of winning them over. A few years later [A.D. 1317] they were the subject of a bull of condemnation issued by Pope John XXII., in which they were threatened with excommunication. The next year another bull was published, ordering the bishops of Sicily to imprison the pseudo-Minorites, and to hand them over to the Franciscans for punishment. He also wrote to the sovereigns into whose territories they were now beginning to spread, to assist in their suppression, and charged the Inquisition with the duty of effecting it.

From this time the Fraticelli began to lose their original character, the Franciscans who had formed the original body dying off, and its new members consisting principally of workmen and labourers, for whom a new fanaticism, a wandering life, and subsistence on alms after the manner of the mendicant orders, proved a combination of attractions strong enough to draw them from their homes, and take up with a professedly religious life. Thus cast loose from the Church, resisting authority, and having no religious teachers except those who set themselves up as such from the midst of themselves, the later Fraticelli became simply one of those fanatical sects of the Middle Ages among whom antagonism to the Church took the place of religion. Many of them fell into the hands of the Inquisition, and were accounted as martyrs by the sect. Eventually they were most of them absorbed into the Beghard community, but some still existed under the original name in Central Italy, as late as the middle of the fifteenth century, when a missionary named John de Capistran was sent to them in the Marshes of Ancona, to bring about their conversion. Their principles appear to have become developed into the same Antinomian form which characterized the Beghards, the Apostolicals, and other continental sects of mediæval times. Wadding, *Ann. Min. FRATICELLI. [FRATICELLI.]

FRATRES POLONI. [SOCINIANS.]

FREE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. This title is assumed by a few sporadic bodies of seceders from the Church of England, some of whom are of that extreme Low Church type, which was originally represented by Lady Huntingdon's connection, and others of the extreme Broad Church type developed in the direction of Unitarianism. There is at present no coherent body of any extent calling itself the "Free Church of England;" and the separate communities which use that name would more logically describe themselves if they were to assume instead the names of the respective sects with which they are, in fact, allied in their principles and customs. They generally consist, however, of clergymen and laymen who are dissatisfied with some features in the doctrine or discipline of the Church of England, but yet retain some affection for its general principles, and are unwilling to dissociate themselves altogether from its name. Modified forms of the Prayer-Book are used by them, the changes following the anti-sacerdotal or the Unitarian line, according to the views of the seceders.

FREE CONGREGATIONS. This name was assumed by a section of the German Rationalists in the days preceding the Revolution of the year 1848. The first "free congregation" was established by Pastor Rupp in Königsberg in 1845, after he had been turned out of the Lutheran ministry for his attacks upon the Athanasian Creed. Others quickly followed in other parts of Germany, but their principles soon attracted the notice of the civil authorities; the police broke up their meetings, and as many as forty such congregations were suppressed in Prussia alone.

The "Free Congregations" professed to admit the witness of Scripture so far as it teaches the Unity of God, but rejected its authority. They also rejected the Creeds and the Sacraments. In the place of Baptism, they invented a rite in which they used the form—"I baptize thee after the manner of the old apostolic baptism, that Jesus is the Christ; I anoint thy head with water as a sign that thy soul remains pure, pure as the water that runs down the mountain side: and as the water rises to heaven and then returns to the earth, so may you be continually mindful of your heavenly home." This substitution of sentiment for reality is characteristic of sects which reject the old traditions of Christianity, and yet cling to its imaginative influences [Hurst's Hist. of Rationalism, 228, ed. 1867].

FREE KIRK OF SCOTLAND. A large body of Presbyterians which separated from the Scottish Presbyterian Establishment in the year 1843. The movement towards this secession began in 1834, and hence it is often called "The Ten Years' Conflict." But it might equally well be called The Hundred-and-Ten Years' Conflict, for it was the last fight in a war between opposing elements in the Scottish Establishment which had been going on for fully that period.

The question of Patronage had ever since the time of Queen Anne been the great question in the Kirk. Lay patronage had been abolished in 1690, and the heritors and elders of each parish were authorized, upon the occurrence of vacancies, to propose the name of some eligible minister to the congregation, who approved or disapproved, their reasons in the latter case being given in to the Presbytery, whose judgment was final. But in 1712 an Act of Parliament (conceived, as its opponents supposed, in the interest of the Jacobites and Episcopalians) restored to the Crown and all other patrons their lost rights, expressly providing, however, that the persons presented by them should be received and admitted by the respective presbyteries in the same manner as persons presented before the passing of the Act ought to have been admitted, a provision which appeared to reserve to the Church Courts the right of final judgment which they previously possessed. For some years the Act worked quietly, patrons judiciously deferring to the wishes of congregations, and the presbyteries and higher courts in several disputed cases maintaining their old position. But by degrees the rights of presenters and presentees were more and more pressed, and when presbyteries refused to induct ministers whose "call" was not sustained by the majority of the congregation, the General Assembly, anxious to preserve peace and to avoid involving the recusants in legal proceedings, sent out deputies (who were popularly called "Riding Committees") from their own body to act in the room of the presbyteries. Parties rapidly developed, and in 1733 Ralph and Ebenezer Erskine headed the "Secession" which then took place, solely on the ground of the growing interference with the people's alleged rights—rights which the Erskines pushed to extravagant extremes, and maintained with intemperate violence. In 1752 the General Assembly had become so far composed of "Moderates" (the name given to those who in general subservency to the civil power, lack of evangelical teaching, and worldliness of tone, corresponded to the "High and Dry" clergy in the Church of England during the same period of spiritual deadness¹), as to dispense with the formality of "Riding Committees," and to compel unwilling presbyteries themselves to institute unacceptable presentees. From this came the next great secession, the "Relief" body of dissenters thereupon originating with Mr. Gillespie of Carnock, who had been deposed for disobedience. The new method of procedure was adopted at the instance of Dr. Robertson, who thenceforward, down to the year 1780, was the ruling spirit in the Kirk, and under whose management "Moderatism" became dominant, and the right of presentation to livings became as purely in practice a matter of external patronage as it is at present in the Church of England. The form of a "call" by the congregation was still maintained, and objectors were invited to appear before the presbytery on the day appointed for ordination and admission of the presentee, and if objections were found relevant, proceedings could be stopped;² but the form had degenerated into a mere matter of course, and objectors never appeared. After Robertson's retirement, the abolition even of the form of a call was proposed by his successor, Dr. Hill, but his motion was rejected by the Assembly. In 1784, however, he procured the omission of a clause which, from the year 1712, had been inserted in the Instructions annually given to the Commission of the Assembly, directing application to be made to the Crown and Parliament for redress from the grievances of patronage. But the question began again to be agitated; and a reforming party arose, headed by Dr. Andrew Thomson, a leading minister in Edinburgh, who founded in 1825 an "Anti-Patronage Society."

In 1833 the new contest was formally initiated under the guidance of the great leader who conducted it to its close, Dr. Thomas Chalmers. He proposed in the General Assembly of that year the adoption of the Veto Act, which provided that the dissent of a majority of resident male heads of families, being communicants, with or without reasons, should set aside a presentation. The proposal was rejected by a majority of twelve (149 v. 137), but an equivalent proposition brought forward in the following year by Lord Moncreiff (one of the Judges of the Court of Session) was carried by 184 to 138. It was at once acted upon as the law of the Church, and regarded as in no way contrary to the law of the land. In October, however, of the same year, the famous parish of Auchterarder began to make itself known. The Earl of Kinnoull having presented one Mr. Robert Young as minister, whose call was only approved by two persons, but rejected by 287 out of 330 who were qualified, the presbytery refused to institute. The case was carried from one court to another, in slow succession, until at length the final decision was given in the House of Lords by Lords Brougham and Cottenham, on 2nd May 1839, which altogether denied the legality of the veto, and pronounced that the only valid objections which could be made to a call were such as distinctly related to doctrine, literature, and life, and that therefore reasons must be alleged, and must involve heresy, ignorance, or immorality. Mere questions of acceptableness in manners, in preaching, and the like, could, consequently, afford no legal ground for objection. Simultaneously with the litigation in this case, two others were carried into the Courts; in the first, that of Lethendy, the presbytery were condemned in heavy costs and damages for refusing to institute; in the other, that of Marnoch, seven ministers who formed the presbytery of Strathbogie were first suspended, and at last formally deposed by the Assembly on 29th May 1841, for obeying the decrees of the civil court and instituting a presentee whose call was signed by only one out of 300 communicants. A bill was introduced by the Earl of Aberdeen in the House of Lords with a view to a settlement, which allowed the right of presbyteries to reject presentees upon approval of reasons of dissent; but because it did not allow rejection irrespective of reasons, it was condemned in the General Assembly by a majority of 221 to 134, and at last withdrawn. Thereupon a bill, approved by the Assembly, was brought forward by the Duke of Argyll, which allowed the veto, unless it should be proved that the opposition proceeded from factious and causeless prejudice. Being dropped however, in the House of Lords, it was introduced in the House of Commons, but there, in June 1842, its progress was stopped, on the technical ground that the Royal assent to its introduction had not been obtained, as is requisite in the case of bills affecting (as this did with reference to patronage) the rights of the Crown.

A second adverse judgment by the House of Lords now accelerated the course of events; a Petition of Right, embodying the claims of the Non-Intrusionists, was sent from the Assembly to Parliament, but a motion for inquiry, founded upon it, was rejected by the House of Commons on 8th March 1843, by 211 to 76. It was the final blow; it was seen that no concessions sufficient to satisfy the claims preferred were now to be hoped for from Government or Parliament, and the secession was resolved upon, which was to deprive the Establishment of some of its best blood and of the majority of its members. The General Assembly met on 18th May 1843; but as soon as it was constituted, the Moderator, Dr. Welsh, rose to read a solemn protest, signed by 203 members, against the alleged civil aggressions and the action of Parliament, and then quitting his place, headed, with Dr. Chalmers, a long procession which in silence quitted the hall of meeting, and passed out at once from all the endowments and privileges of the Establishment. Out of 1203 ministers 451 seceded, leaving only 752 in the Establishment.¹

The Free Kirk at once sprang into vigorous life; it had all the enthusiasm of self-sacrifice, all the zeal of earnest conscientiousness, all the inspiring influences of old Covenanting traditions, all the confidence of numbers, and carried with it most of the real religious feeling of the country. Extravagant as the claim cannot but be regarded which would submit the question of every minister's pastoral fitness to the irresponsible judgment, given without reasons, of the mere majority of the male communicant members (the communicants, it is to be remembered, including in Scotland every person who is not notoriously immoral, or a total abstainer from church services) of every congregation in town and country, unreasonable as was the opposition which refused the compromise of leaving the decision in the hands of each presbytery, and wild and even profane as was the declamation which represented this submission of ministerial qualification absolutely, to the judgment of the ignorant and prejudiced,² as well

² In Story's life an anecdote is told of the veto being as the instructed and impartial, as being simply a vindication of the Supreme Headship of our Lord over His Church, and the opposite course as being a dethroning of Him and denial of His Sovereignty, it is nevertheless impossible to contemplate the final action of the Seceders without the highest admiration of their unshrinking consistency, and their noble testimony to the power of conscientious principle. Well might even the worldly-minded Lord Jeffrey, the lawyer and the essayist, exclaim when he heard of it, "I am proud of my country!"

The appeal made by the Seceders to their countrymen was enthusiastically responded to; the collection of nearly £3000 on the following Sunday in but one place of meeting gave an earnest of what would follow. Every parish ere long, in spite of obstacles, had its Free Kirk and Manse planted within it, while a "Sustentation Fund" was raised for endowments, which at present provides a minimum dividend of £150 for 775 ministers, irrespective of the separate congregational collections. The total amount of the sums raised for all purposes was, in 1844-5, £334,484; and in the twenty-six years from 1843 to 1869 the sum amounted to £8,487,774. The number of congregations is now about 920, with 597 schools. There are large bodies in England and Ireland and Canada which are in connection, as well as congregations in many of the Colonies. The total number in Canada and the Colonies is about 1000 congregations, with 800 ministers. Missions are maintained in India and South Africa, and amongst the Jews.

The principles of the Free Kirk are on all points identical with those of the Established Kirk, except as regards patronage, and the right of the State to interfere in ecclesiastical causes. The Free Kirk is Voluntary not by choice, but by necessity; it maintains (like its great leader Dr. Chalmers) the rightfulness and national advantage of Establishments, and therefore disagrees with the other dissenting Presbyterian bodies which are Voluntary in principle. But the standing outside the Establishment for a quarter of a century has much weakened the adherence in this respect to the original views maintained at the Disruption, and a movement is consequently making rapid progress for an incorporating union between the Free Kirk, the Reformed Presbyterians, and the United Presbyterians, on "the basis of the Westminster Standards, as at present accepted by the said Churches." The union will probably take place at an early date, for a motion strongly in favour of the measure was carried in the General Assembly, on 25th May 1871, by 435 votes to 165, against a motion which proposed that the pending negotiations should cease. FREE LOVERS. [PERFECTIONISTS.]

FREETHINKERS. A school of English Deists which arose in the beginning of the seventeenth century among those unbelieving members of the "polite society" of the day, for whom Spinoza was too learned, the materialism of Hobbes too unfashionable, and the obscene atheism of the Caroline roués too vulgar.

The leading principle of the Freethinkers was that of liberating thought from the tyranny of creed and dogma, and relying on the understanding alone as the means of arriving at truth. "By Freethinking," says the leader of the school, "I mean the use of the understanding in endeavouring to find out the meaning of any proposition whatsoever, in considering the nature of the evidence for or against, and in judging of it according to the seeming force or weakness of the evidence" [Collins' Discourse of Freethinking, p. 2]. This proposition was applied to Christianity in such a manner as to place it on a level with other religions, and then to shew that all are false together. "The priests throughout the world differ about Scriptures and the authority of Scriptures. The Bramins have a book of Scripture call'd the Shaster. The Persees have their Zundavastaw. The Bonzes of China have books written by the disciples of Fo-he, whom they call the God and Saviour of the world, who was born to teach the way of salvation, and to give satisfaction for all men's sins. The Talapins of Siam have a book of Scripture written by Sommonocodom, who, the Siamese say, was born of a Virgin, and was the God expected by the universe. The Dervizes have their Alchoran" [ibid. p. 52]. But all these books, and the Christian Scriptures, are equally the productions of ancient writers who invented the Jewish, the Christian, and other religions, and then persuaded the world to believe in their impostures. It was assumed, with a freedom of thought which was quite above weighing their respective authority, that the evidences for Christianity are of no more worth than those for Brahminism, of which next to nothing was known by those who thus flippantly wrote about them.

This school of Deists maintained, in respect to morality, that Christianity, whether true or false, is wholly unnecessary for the good of individual persons or of society at large, but dwelt much upon the excellence and beauty of virtue in the abstract. They also gave great prominence to the necessary benevolence of the Deity, but in such a manner as practically to set aside His justice, and thus to undermine the foundation of moral responsibility.

The original leaders of this school may be said to have been Lord Shaftesbury and Anthony Collins, although the former really belonged to the earlier school of Deists. Collins was a man of fortune and good taste, and gave a "respectable" tone to infidelity which it had not previously possessed. He printed his "Discourse of Freethinking, occasioned by the rise and growth of a sect called Freethinkers," in the year 1713, and his "Discourse on the grounds and reasons of the Christian religion" in 1724. The former was answered by Dr. Bentley, in "Remarks on a late Discourse of Freethinking by Phile-leutherus Lipsiensis," who opposed the shallowness of its apparent learning; and by Hoadley, afterwards Bishop of Winchester, in "Queries addressed to the author of a late Discourse of Freethinking," in which Hoadley exposed many irrational errors and dishonest statements that had been made by Collins. But the principles of the Freethinkers proved very attractive to superficial thinkers, and have been perpetuated to our own time. [RATIONALISTS.]

FREE-WILL BAPTISTS. An American sect answering to the General Baptists of England, which struck off from the body of the Baptist sect in the year 1780.

The founder of this sect was Benjamin Randall [A.D. 1749-1808]. He had been one of George Whitfield's converts at twenty-two years of age, but five years afterwards joined the Baptists and became a preacher, when he very shortly gave up the Calvinistic dogma of election, and began to teach that the Atonement of our Lord was made for all men, that salvation is possible for all, that the will of every man is free to choose or to refuse salvation, and that there is no eternal decree of any to perdition such as makes their salvation impossible. These "free-will" doctrines constituted the only difference between the followers of Randall and the ordinary Baptists, but they were considered incompatible with continued union between the two bodies, and a separate sect was therefore established at New Durham on June 30th, 1780, under the name of "Free-Will Baptists," and under the ministry of Randall. They are now a large body numbering about 70,000, being represented in British North America as well as in the United States. In the latter they have shewn themselves strongly opposed to slavery. Some of them copy the FLEMINGS of Holland in using as a necessary Divine ordinance the ceremony of washing each other's feet.

FRENCH PROPHETS. [CAMISARDS.]

FRENCH PROTESTANTS. The earliest class of persons meriting this title are the ALBIGENSES and WALDENSES at the close of the twelfth and commencement of the thirteenth centuries. But the term must, with historic propriety, be confined to those who, early in the sixteenth century, were affected by the tide of feeling then passing over the religious mind of Europe. In A.D. 1523, the doctors of the Sorbonne at Paris first took active steps, alarmed by the proceedings of Jacques Lefevre, a native of Picardy, and Briçonnet, Bishop of Meaux, whose opinions found a still more powerful advocate in Margaret d'Angoulême, sister of Francis I. and wife of Henry d'Albert, King of Navarre, whose territory afforded shelter to those suspected of heresy. The persecution which followed nearly extinguished the hopes, if it did not exterminate the persons, of the Protestants. Calvin fled from Paris to Switzerland [A.D. 1534]. In Provence alone [A.D. 1545] two towns, Merindol and Cabrières, and twenty-eight villages were destroyed, and four thousand persons put to the sword. The feeling of hostility rather increased than decreased under Henry II. [A.D. 1547], who married Catharine de Medici, niece of Pope Clement VII. Yet in spite of this opposition the French Protestants found themselves sufficiently numerous, and with such leaders as Anthony of Bourbon, King of Navarre, Louis Prince de Condé, the Admiral de Coligny, and his brother the Seigneur d'Andelot, sufficiently influential to organize themselves into a body [A.D. 1555], and formally to accept the Genevan discipline and doctrine. Four years later [A.D. 1559] the Gallican Confession of Faith, consisting of forty articles, first drawn up in Latin, and then translated into French, was publicly adopted. Their increasing numbers compelled the regent queen mother to assume a conciliatory tone, both during the short reign of Francis II. and the earlier years of Charles IX. In the hopes of accommodating matters, a conference was held between the Romanists and Protestants at Poissy [A.D. 1561], the latter being championed by Beza and Peter Martyr, when, though an edict was passed removing the penalties of nonconformity, no lasting reconciliation was achieved. In the very next year a Protestant congregation, while engaged in worship at Vassy, was massacred in cold blood [A.D. 1562]. Their friends flew to arms, but were defeated at the battle of Dreux. The assassination of the Duke of Guise followed, by the Huguenot Poltrot de Merey, in revenge for his supposed instigation of the massacre of Vassy. Ten years of civil discord succeeded, hardly broken by the pacification of Amboise [A.D. 1563], until the deeds of atrocity perpetrated on both sides culminated in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, planned by Catharine de Medici, and executed on August 24th, 1572. Though nearly annihilated at the moment, the Protestants revived again, to meet with more favourable terms under Henry IV., who, although a convert to Catholicism, accorded them full liberty of worship by the Edict of Nantes [A.D. 1598], a concession which was afterwards revoked by Louis XIV. [A.D. 1685]. According to recent calculations the Protestants in France now number about a twentieth part of the population, and Rationalist views of the very broadest type prevail among them. [Merle d'Aubigné's History of the Reformation. De Felice, History of the Protestants of France, Lond. 1853.]

FRIENDS. [QUAKERS.]

FRIENDS OF GOD. A designation by which the mystics of Germany were commonly known among themselves during the fourteenth century, and which was taken from our Lord's words, "Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth: but I have called you friends" [John xv. 15]. It may be doubted whether they ever formed a separate community, yet there is a succession of names associated with the title which distinguishes the "Friends of God" as in some degree a school of themselves, and they mark clearly a period of transition from the mere speculative mystics of the Middle Ages to the practical pietists of post-Reformation times.

The first of these names is that of the Dominican Henry Eckhart [A.D. 1304-1328], generally known as Master Eckhart. He became the first provincial of the Dominicans in Saxony when that country was made into a separate province of the Order in the year 1304, and was the teacher of Tauler, whose influence has extended even to our own times. In 1324, while he was presiding over the Dominican monastery at Frankfort-on-Maine, he was brought to trial for his opinions by the General of the Order, and afterwards, in 1327, by the Bishop of Cologne. The accusations brought against him were framed on twenty-six propositions taken from his sermons, which were alleged to be pantheistic in their teaching. These were formally condemned, and the condemnation was afterwards confirmed (but with conspicuous tenderness towards Eckhart's memory) by a Bull of John XXII., issued in A.D. 1329, after Eckhart's death. Although the tendency of his teaching was dangerously suggestive of Pantheism, his object was to set forth the closeness of the union with God into which the soul may be brought by holy living. Thus he maintained that we should be united with God essentially, individually, and entirely, by means of contemplation; and that just in proportion as man is united with God he is more God than creature. "Wherefore," he asks, "is God become man? that I may be born the same God. God died for this reason that I may die to all the world and all created things" [Gieseler's Compend. Eccl. Hist. iv. 176, Clark's transl.]. These principles were corrupted into Antinomianism by the BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT, and a similar result followed their revival in the case of the Methodists.

Nicolas of Basle [A.D. 1330-1383] took up the principles of Eckhart on their practical side, and endeavoured so to purify his life by ascetic devotion that he might effect a complete separation of his soul from the world, and perfect its union with God. After a long course of such devotion he believed himself to be favoured with Divine revelations and visions and ecstasies. Though a layman he became spiritual director to multitudes, and seems to have been associated in this capacity with some of the early and purer Beghards. When he was very old he was arrested as a Beghard by the Inquisition, while he was travelling through France, and was burnt to death at Vienne about the year 1383, in company with one of his disciples.

John Tauler [A.D. 1290-1361] was a Dominican at Strasburg, and had been brought under the influence of Nicolas of Basle about the year

1340, having previously been a disciple of Eckhart. Nicolas had won followers as a layman by the private influence of his character, but Tauler was one of the great Dominican preachers, and was listened to by crowds in the cities and villages on the banks of the Rhine, as Wesley and Whitfield were in England in later days. While Germany was under an interdict by which the Pope forbade all ministrations of the clergy, Tauler boldly continued his work, and when the dreadful "Black Death" desolated every house and drove away the few surviving clergy, he and a few other Dominicans went fearlessly from house to house in Strasburg, comforting the dying, giving courage to the living, and winning the hearts of all. This noble friar was the practical expositor of Eckhart's intellectual speculations, and the one aim of his life was that of persuading men to give up worldliness and sin, and to become "friends of God" by deepening and widening their spiritual communion with Him. His Theologia Germanica and his sermons were widely circulated after his death, and had great influence upon the mind of John Wesley four centuries later. The former was translated into French by Castalion, who was closely associated with the "Family of Love," and it is extremely likely that its fervid teaching of what has been called the deification of man's nature was perverted to the support of the Antinomian principles for which those enthusiasts became notorious.

Henry Suso [A.D. 1300-1365] was of the same school of Dominicans as Tauler, but belonged to Suabia. His influence among the "Friends of God" was exerted chiefly by his writings, which were in the dialogue and catechetical form, and being written in the vernacular circulated widely among those who were able to read. Neander speaks of him as conspicuously setting forth the mediation of our Lord as the channel by which communion with God is to be attained, and as thus counteracting the pantheistic tendency of the mysticism which spoke constantly and strongly about union with the Divine Essence, but omitted to shew that this was the result of a mediatorial, not a direct, intercourse with God.

The "Brethren of the Common Life" were a Dutch section of the "Friends of God," and owed their origin to Gerard Groot of Deventer [A.D. 1340-84], a Canon of Utrecht and Aix, who gave up his preferments to become a missionary preacher throughout the diocese of Utrecht. Preaching at Utrecht, Deventer, Amsterdam, Haarlem, and many other places, he became so popular, that people left their business and their meals to hear his sermons, so that the churches could not hold the crowds that flocked wherever he came [Thom. à Kemp. Vita M. Gerardi magni. xv.]. When his preaching was prohibited, Groot established in his house a theological college for those who were preparing to take Holy Orders, and this was developed two years after his death into a house of regular canons at Windesheim in Zwolle, with a cell at Deventer. At Windesheim the clergy continued to prepare candidates for Holy Orders, and they were joined by many laymen, who lived together in a community of goods and labour, but without any monastic vow, as "Fratres vitæ Communis," "Fratres bonæ voluntatis," or "Fratres Collationarii." It was at Deventer that Thomas à Kempis was trained, at Windesheim that he spent the greater portion of his days; and through him another link of connection was established between the Friends of God and devotional Christians of subsequent ages. Within fifty years of Groot's death the Brothers of the Common Life numbered seventeen collegiate churches in the Netherlands, and contributed much to the mystical theology of the Church. The Order was extinguished by the flood of the Dutch Reformation. [Schmidt's Johannes Tauler von Strasburg, 1841. Ullmann's Reformers before the Reformation, Clark's transl. Neale's Hist. of Jansenist Ch. of Holl. ch. ii.]

FRIENDS OF LIGHT. A sect of Lutheran Rationalists which originated in Prussian Saxony about the year 1841. Their founder was pastor Uhlich, who, in company with sixteen friends, held the first meeting at Gnaden in July of that year. A second convention met at Halle, and was numerously attended by clergymen, professors, and laymen of every class of society. A session held at Köthen in 1844, was a great popular assembly, and attention being drawn to the new sect, and to its new leader, Pastor Wislicenus, by Guericke the ecclesiastical historian, an order in council was issued by the Prussian Government in August 1845, prohibiting them from holding further meetings.

The Friends of Light professed to develop the principles of the Reformation by a recurrence to the spirit of the Reformers as distinguished from the actual shape into which their reforms were forced by the circumstances of the times in which they lived. This spirit they interpreted as that of perfect intellectual freedom in religion, with individual judgment for the sole guide. Such a fundamental principle as this was calculated to embrace every school of Rationalists, and does in fact represent the common ground on which all rationalizing systems take their stand. Although therefore they were not allowed to organize themselves into a community, the "Friends of Light" have found many converts both in Germany and England. [Hurst's Hist. Rationalism, 228, ed. 1867.]

FRIESLANDERS. A section of the Mennonites who separated from the FLEMINGS, and maintained a separate position for some time on the questions of discipline which had caused division among the Mennonites. They eventually coalesced with the WATERLANDERS. [Mosheim's Eccl. Hist. iii. 149, Stubbs' ed.]

G

GAIANA. In a passage of Tertullian, which is according to ordinary texts read "Sunt et nunc alii Nicolaîtæ; Caiana hæresis dicitur" [Tertull. de Prescrip. Hær. xxxiii.], Oehler reads Gaiana instead of Caiana. Nothing is known of any early sect of Gaianites, and it is commonly supposed that the CAINITES are the sect referred to.

GAIANITÆ. The Alexandrian section of the APHTHARTODOCETÆ, so called from their leader Gaianus, a contemporary and theological colleague of Julian of Halicarnassus. Gaianus was Archdeacon of Alexandria, and on the death of the Patriarch Timotheus III. [A.D. 536] was tumultuously placed on the patriarchal throne by the monks and people in opposition to Theodosius, who had been nominated by the Emperor and consecrated to the see. After three months, Gaianus was however deposed and exiled, first to Carthage and then to Sardinia, after which his name appears only in association with the sect to which it was given.

GALENISTS. The Arminian division of the Mennonite WATERLANDERS, who owe their origin to Galen Abraham de Haan, a physician and Baptist preacher at Amsterdam in the year 1664. Galen advocated open communion, and taught Socinian doctrine.

GALLICAN CONFESSION. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

GALLICANS. A name given to an historical party in the Church of France which has constantly protested against, and, when it was able to do so, opposed, the invasion of its liberties by the See of Rome. Without developing any special school of thought, and without in any important particulars deviating from Roman doctrine, the Gallicans maintain much the same theory as to the independence of national churches that is maintained by learned writers in the Church of England: but circumstances have never compelled the Church of France to seek so entire a repudiation of the papal claims to authority as has taken place in the Church of England. The principal efforts of the Gallican party, as opposed to the Ultramontane party, in recent times, have been directed towards the revival of the native Liturgy, a local form of the great Ephesine Liturgy of Asia Minor, variations of which continued in use in several dioceses of France down to our own time. But these efforts have been effectually counteracted by Ultramontane influences, and no breviaries or missals except the Roman are now permitted to be used in

French churches. [DIOT. of THEOLOGY, PRAGMATIC SANCTION.]

GAZARES. [GAZZARI.]

GAZZARI. The Italian name for the mediæval Catharists or Albigenses. [Steph. de Borbone in d'Argentre, i. 90.]

GENISTÆ. A Jewish sect named by Justin Martyr [Dial. c. Tryph. c. lxxx.]. It is probably to be identified with the Nazareans of Epiphanius [Hær. xviii.]. The name, which would be better written Genitæ, implies that its bearers were of the original stock of the Jews, and preserved the ancient patriarchal faith. [JEWISH SECTS.]

GERMAN CATHOLICS. Two movements of German Catholics have occurred during the last quarter of a century, having a promise of the more important results still to flow from them.

I. The question of mixed marriages between Catholics and Protestants had become an aggravated difficulty in the kingdom of Prussia, where both forms of religion exist side by side. Benedict XIV. [A.D. 1741], in the case of the Netherlands, declared mixed marriages to be abominable, wretched, and accursed proceedings, and such as never could be allowed by the Roman See. Still such marriages were not wholly interdicted, and papal dispensation was never refused to rich suitors. But the clergy were forbidden to solemnize such marriages; they were a mere civil contract, the priest acting only as witness by "passive assistance." The same Pope [A.D. 1748], by a formal constitution, decreed that mixed marriages could only take place under a pledge that the children should be brought up as Catholics; and that the Catholic party in the contract should not be molested in the exercise of Catholic duties; for that there was always a hope of reclaiming the uncatholic element to the faith of the Church. Accordingly, such marriages were celebrated in Prussia, either unconditionally, or with the sole engagement that, according to sex, children should be brought up in the faith of the parent. A.D. 1825, engagements of this kind were abrogated by order of the State; but by papal edict of Pius VIII., March 1830, they were still to be enforced as a necessary condition for obtaining dispensation. The civil and ecclesiastical powers were in open antagonism. But the State, wise in its generation, prevailed. Count Spiegel, Archbishop of Cologne, was persuaded to circulate the edict among his suffragans, with a pastoral brief, and accompanied with secret instructions to obey the Cabinet order of 1825; "passive assistance" also might be rendered even where no engagement was made with respect to the education of the children, such marriages only being forbidden under the unlikely contingency of the woman certainly knowing that all her children would be brought up as Protestants. In 1835, Baron Droste-Vischering succeeded to the see of Cologne, having engaged to carry out the Cabinet regulation with respect to mixed marriages; the papal edict, however, was enforced by him, and the Government removed him to Minden, the effect of which was that all restriction upon mixed marriages was rescinded throughout Rhenish Westphalia.

In the eastern State of Posen, the Church authorities took vigorous action against all Catholics who contracted such marriages, the provost shewing much fiery zeal in the matter. A strong bond of sympathy existed between Czerski, the provost's vicar, and his flock; for while they demanded toleration in their alliances, he himself was secretly married to a Polish lady. Both priest and people soon proceeded to question the scriptural grounds on which the ecclesiastical decrees rested; and they came to the conclusion that the Church view with respect to matrimony was one thing and the law of Christ something widely different. Czerski was suspended March 1844, and in the August following he separated himself altogether from the Roman communion. Twenty-four members of his congregation, threatened with excommunication, declared themselves at the same time an extra-Roman community, under the name of Apostolical Catholic Christians. They next set up a place of worship of their own where Czerski officiated as priest, now publicly married by a Protestant pastor. The whole party were of course excommunicated; but neither Czerski nor his flock considered themselves to be anything but Catholic Christians, and still preserved a broadly marked distinction from the Protestant body by their retention of the seven sacraments. They also drew up a brief formula of faith [October 19th] to mark their total separation from the Roman communion, in which nine fundamental errors of the Roman Church were condemned: communion in one kind, canonization of saints, worship of saints, absolution that involved auricular confession, indulgence, prescriptive fasts, public service in a foreign language, celibacy of clergy, prohibition of mixed marriages, and the temporal power of the Pope. Their Confession of Faith commenced with the Nicene Creed; Holy Scripture is declared to be the only sure ground of faith; and private judgment is a sufficient guide to its meaning; the seven sacraments are means of grace ordained by Christ; the sacrifice of the mass is a memorial of the death of Christ, and is of efficacy for the living and the dead; the Body and Blood of Christ are truly present in the sacrifice of the altar; confession and absolution are no prerequisites for communicating. The reality of a purgatorial fire is affirmed, but not in the material sense of the Romish dogma. Marriage of the clergy is not only allowed, but encouraged, as being conducive to the edification of the flock through the influence of domestic example. The kingdom of God must be realized in the believer's life upon earth. The new community applied for State recognition as a security against persecution, but obtained no answer. The seceders at the commencement, A.D. 1844, numbered eighty-five of burgher rank, who were known as the Schneidemühl section of German Catholics, and kept more closely to the faith of the Church Catholic than the second or Breslau-Dresden section of seceders under Ronge.

II. For the Czerski movement was eclipsed by the contemporaneous defection of Ronge in the more southern province of Silesia. His pen had got him into disgrace, and he was suspended from all clerical duty, when the exhibition of the seamless coat of Christ¹ at Treves [A.D. 1844] drew from him a vigorous protest.² His attack aroused attention in the highest degree, and procured for him the further publicity of excommunication. He at once became a martyr; addresses and rich presents poured in upon him. The circle widened, and Dr. Regenbrecht, Professor of Canon Law at Breslau, ostentatiously quitted the Church of Rome; German Catholic communities sprung up in all the principal towns of Northern Germany [A.D. 1844-45], and hopes were entertained of the formation of a German Reformed National Church, maintaining the doctrine but denying the authority and regimen of Rome. All such hope was soon dispelled; for at a meeting held at Leipsic [March 23rd, 1845], at which thirty delegates from thirteen German Catholic congregations were present, the following formula was drawn up, shorn of nearly every distinctive attribute of the faith, and toned down to suit the coldest rationalism: "I believe in God the Father, who, by His Almighty Word, created the world, and governs it in wisdom, righteousness, and love. I believe in Jesus Christ our Saviour. I believe in the Holy Ghost, one holy universal Christian Church, the forgiveness of sins, and life eternal." Only two sacraments were retained, and the Bible interpreted by private judgment was declared to be sufficient for salvation. Czerski's endeavour to procure the recognition of Christ's Divinity was ineffectual. The Ronge or Breslau party became known as German Catholics, and were thoroughly rationalistic; the Posen Separatists retained the denomination of Apostolical Catholics, but silently acquiesced in the exposition of faith put forth by the Breslau party, which became the dominant type of German Catholicism.

These new notions rapidly spread through Northern Germany, wherever an exclusively Romanist population and a determined Romanist government could not withstand the tide. But the original taint of dissension clung to the movement. Neither was Ronge exactly the character to inspire confidence. He had nothing solid or dignified to recommend him. Vain of the noise that he had made in the world, and self-conceited, he hoped by thrusting himself for ever before the public in meetings and ovational gatherings, to open a new page in the history of the world. But his most serious drawback was, that there was no depth of religion in him, without which it is impossible for the reformer to make any permanent impression upon old established modes of religious thought. Already, in May 1845, Czerski declared, by letters to the several congregations, his dissatisfaction with the Leipsic Declaration, which he had also refused to sign, because it ignored the Lord's Divinity. Ronge in reply objected, that to stop short at that point would be to re-enact the Reformation of Luther; that the march of opinion demanded a radical reform in matters of faith; the time had come for the Church to cast aside old traditional forms, such as the Apostles' Creed, and to generalize in the direction of the rational conviction of the age. Christ was no longer to be worshipped as God over all, but to be hailed as a brother. By such notions he hoped to recover that grasp upon Germany which the Protestant movement had missed. The two rival leaders met and fraternized at the Conference in Rawitz, February 3rd, 1846; but their difference of opinion, as in the case of Luther and Zwingli, was too decided for a thorough reconciliation, and each continued to propagate his own particular form of German Catholicism.

The political relations of the community presented considerable difficulty. What claim had they on the toleration of the Catholic States which only recognised the Church of Rome and the Evangelical party as bound by the Augsburg Confession? And who were the German Catholics? In Bavaria they were looked upon, not as a religious community, but as political radicals and communists. In Austria the very name of German Catholic was proscribed. Internal distraction weakened their hold upon public respect, and a soulless liberalism was the only idea in which the entire party could agree. Ronge's views having been taken up by members of the Chamber on the side of the opposition, they assumed some public importance; but the political changes of 1848 brought about a coalition between his party, and the Pantheistic Hegelian following, the FRIENDS OF LIGHT, whereby German Catholicism ranks now among the various denominations of rationalizing Protestantism, rather than with any section of the Church Catholic. A more formal alliance was made between German Catholicism and the Protestant party at Leipsic, A.D. 1850, under the name of the "Religious Association" (Religions-Gesellschaft). The principles of communism, in a religious direction, are not disowned by this sect; and it has always had the strongest sympathies with political democracy. It exhibits an altogether humanitarian form of religion as compared with the spiritual faith of the Church Catholic. [Gervinus, Die Mission d. Deutschkath.; *Die Prot. Geistlichkeit u. d. GERMAN PROTESTANTS. The history of the rise of German Protestantism is so closely allied with that of LUTHERANISM that it will be sufficient here to present a summary of the important events which took place between A.D. 1517, when Luther, at that time philosophical lecturer at Wittenberg, was roused into action by Tetzel's sales of indulgences at the neighbouring town of Jüterbösch, and when the religious peace was extorted from the Emperor Charles V. at Augsburg in 1555. The first overt act of hostility was a bull of excommunication launched against Luther by Leo X. [A.D. 1520], and publicly burnt by him at Wittenberg. In the following year he was declared a heretic, and his writings were proscribed at the Diet of Worms, on January 28th. Great commotions followed. The Anabaptists at Zwickau in Misnia, and the ultra-Reformers under Carlstadt at Wittenberg, flew to arms, and hence "The Peasants' War" [A.D. 1524], in which the excesses of the Protestant party, which Luther was unable to influence or control, gained them an unenviable notoriety, and helped to detach Erasmus from the cause of the Reformation. In A.D. 1526, the league of Torgau was formed, John Elector of Saxony, and Philip Landgrave of Hesse, with others, demanding reforms, which were discussed at the first Diet of Spire, but instead of being adopted, were recommended to be referred to a future General Council. Any delay was favourable to the reforming cause, and the opposition of Charles V. was at the same time mitigated by his quarrel with the Pope, which led to the storming of Rome and the surrender of Clement VII., and by the claim of Archduke Ferdinand to the crowns of Hungary and Bohemia. A second diet was summoned at Spire, A.D. 1529, at which the name of Protestants was first assigned to those who differed from the Church of Rome, in consequence of a document or protestation submitted to the Emperor, signed by John Elector of Saxony, George Elector of

Brandenburg, Ernest Duke of Lunenburg, Philip Landgrave of Hesse, and by fourteen imperial cities, Strasburg, Ulm, Nuremberg, Constance, Reutlingen, Windesheim, Memmingen, Nordlingen, Lindau, Isny, Kempten, Heilbron, Wisingen and St. Gall. A conference of the leaders of the Reformation also took place at Marburg, at which fifteen articles were drawn up, revised and augmented to seventeen at the convent of Schabach [Oct. 17th], and embodied in the Confession of Augsburg [A.D. 1530]. In the next year, alarmed by an imperial decree in favour of Catholicism, nine Protestant princes and eleven cities formed the Smalkaldic League, by which they bound themselves for six years to maintain the tenets of Augsburg. On seeing their determined attitude, and now in his turn alarmed by the Ottoman invasion of Hungary, and by the opposition of the German princes to the election of his brother Ferdinand as King of the Romans, Charles made peace with the Reformers at Nuremberg [A.D. 1532], and agreed to a compromise until the session of a General Council. Various proposals were made during the next few years to summon it at Mantua, Piacenza, or Bologna, but a formal protest against a German question being settled on Italian soil, and a vindication of Protestant principles, was published under the title of the Smalkaldic Articles [A.D. 1537]. About the same time, on the Catholic side, a union called the Holy League was formed between Charles V., Ferdinand Elector of Mayence, the Archbishop of Salzburg, and the Dukes of Bavaria, Saxony, and Brunswick. Both sides were too strong to think of yielding unconditionally, and once more a reconciliation was attempted, and nearly but not quite achieved at a conference at Ratisbon [A.D. 1541], Melanchthon and others acting as the Protestant advocates against Eck and his coadjutors on the Catholic side. So matters stood till Charles V., having made peace with the King of France at Cressy [A.D. 1544], and the Romish party, elated by the prospect of the General Council summoned to meet in the following year at Trent, found themselves in a position to recommence hostilities on the German Protestants. Death spared Luther from witnessing the horrors of the Smalkaldic War which followed [A.D. 1546], with disastrous results to the Protestants, who were completely routed at the battle of Muhlberg [A.D. 1547], and saw their champion, John Frederick, fall into the Emperor's hands. They were saved, however, from utter annihilation by a coolness which sprang up between Charles V. and Paul III., who, to the Emperor's dissatisfaction, ordered the removal of the council from Trent to Bologna. Soon afterwards, at a Diet held at Augsburg [A.D. 1548], a provisional formula was put forth with Charles' permission, known as the Interim Augustanum, to last till the final settlement of disputed points by the General Council. It was disliked by many Protestants for its decided leaning to Roman views, but was accepted by others called "the Adiaphoristic party," who were willing to treat a great many points as open questions. The Tridentine Council resumed its sittings under Julius III. [A.D. 1551], and renewed activity was simultaneously displayed by the Protestants. The Confession of Saxony was drawn up by Melanchthon. The Confession of Wurtemberg was composed by Brentius, and submitted at Trent. The German princes again resorted to arms, attacked the Emperor unexpectedly at Innsbruck, and extorted from his fears, by the Treaty of Passau [A.D. 1552], full liberty of opinion, which was extended and ratified at the Diet of Augsburg [A.D. 1555] in the following terms, viz.: "That those who followed the Confession of Augsburg should be for the future considered as entirely free from the jurisdiction of the Roman Pontiff, and from the authority and superintendence of the bishops; that they should possess perfect liberty to enact laws for themselves relating to their religious sentiments, discipline and worship; that all the inhabitants of the German Empire should be allowed to join the church whose doctrine and worship they thought the purest and most consonant to the spirit of true Christianity; and that all those who should injure or persecute any persons, under religious pretences, and on account of their opinions, should be declared and proceeded against as public enemies of the Empire, invaders of its liberty and disturbers of its peace." This principle of toleration was acted upon throughout the reigns of Ferdinand [A.D. 1558-1564], Maximilian II. [A.D. 1564-1576], and Rudolph II. [A.D. 1576-1612], until the smothered jealousy between Catholics and Protestants broke out into the Thirty Years' War [A.D. 1618-1648].

The smaller states in and round Germany embraced the Reformation at the following dates: Silesia [A.D. 1523], Hesse [A.D. 1526], Linden [A.D. 1527], Electoral Saxony [A.D. 1527], East Friesland [A.D. 1527], Franconian Brandenburg [A.D. 1528], Wurtemberg [A.D. 1535], Ducal Saxony [A.D. 1539], Electoral Brandenburg [A.D. 1539], the Palatinate [A.D. 1546]. GERMAN TEMPLE. [JERUSALEM FRIENDS.]

GEULINCX. Arnold Geulincx [born at Antwerp A.D. 1625, d. A.D. 1669] followed generally the Cartesian system, but developed from it a more thoroughgoing Rationalism. His fundamental axiom was that no intelligent agent can produce any effect of the means of which it is ignorant; or, in the converse way, any agent can only effect that of which it knows the operative cause. Hence, since we know nothing of our own springs of action, it is not we who act, but some power external to us. He accounted for the apparent action and reaction of mind and matter by affirming that Mind is a mode of Infinite Substance, and that bodily action is the result, not of individual will, nor of any inherent power of the body, for this is merely passive, but of the Divine Energy, which is causative of every movement of the human machine. Mind (i.e. Divine Substance)¹ and Body are as two watches that keep exact time with each other, but are of entirely independent action; to the Divine Artificer alone they owe their exact correspondence. "Obstupescere ergo, cum hæc sic animadvertis, cum vides a Deo hæc ita moveri, et corporis ejusque membrorum motum ad arbitrium voluntatis nostræ dirigi, idque ita ab ejus providentia temperatum esse" [de Humil. 328]. "Qui motum indidit materiæ et leges ei dixit, is idem voluntatem meam formavit; itaque has res diversissimas inter se devinxit, ut cum voluntas mea vellet motus talis adesset, et contra cum motus adesset, voluntas eum vellet, sine ulla alterius in alterum causalitate vel influxu; sicut duobus horologiis rite inter se et ad solis diurnum cursum quadratis, propter meram dependentiam, qua utrumque ab eadem arte et simili industria constitutum est" [Eth. 124]. Leibnitz made use of the same illustration in explaining his very similar notion of a "Pre-established Harmony." The following are the main principles developed by Geulincx: [1] I can effect nothing externally to myself; [2] all that I can effect is esoterically within myself; [3] by Divine energy my sphere of action extends at times beyond myself; [4] but the act is not my own, it is of God, [5] and that according to Divine laws ordained arbitrarily, but with perfect freedom of the Divine will: when I utter the word "earth," it is as great a marvel that my tongue should vibrate as it would be if the earth itself should quake; [6] I can only contemplate the world; [7] the world cannot offer itself to my vision; [8] God alone causes that I should behold the world in an incomprehensible manner; and I myself, among the innumerable wonders of the world that I am allowed to witness, am of all the greatest and most continuous wonder. It was thus that Geulincx accounted for the phenomenon of apparently spontaneous action, by referring it to the will and energy of the Divine Being, perpetually directing the mechanism of the world as its motive power. In every movement God alone works. The whole universe is a series of the perpetually recurring marvels of Divine Providence.

This notion of Occasionalism, or of bodily action harmonizing with mental impulse by Divine regulation, had already been broached by Louis De la Forge, a French physician, and a devoted follower of Descartes [Brucker, Buhle, Walch, but denied by Tennemann]. It was termed "Occasionalism," because, on the occasion of any impulse of human will, the Divine Being moved the body, and on the occasion of any bodily affection the same cause produced sensation in the mind. The causality in either case being in God, the system was one of absolute fatalism,¹ so far as any moral agency in man is concerned; and philosophically considered, it was only a modification of Pantheism, towards which scientific opinion was now verging. Thus the secondary causes, acting on mind and matter which Descartes harmonized by the intervention of Infinite Substance, Geulincx treated as occasional phenomena, coming and going, as the Divine principle supplemented the action of one or other substance by corresponding impulse in its correlative. Malebranche, as will be seen, affirmed that these secondary causes have a reality and harmony only in the Deity; and Spinoza brought the pantheistic notion to a culminating point in the assertion, that these reciprocal impulses of mind and matter only represent to us the one action of that one Divine Energy which quickens the universe in all its parts. As regards Occasionalism, however, Geulincx is its principal exponent, and stands as a true mean between Descartes and Leibnitz. [Tennemann, Gesch. d. Phil. x. Fischer, Gesch. d. Neuern Phil. i. 195. Ritter, Gesch. d. Phil. xi. 2.]

GICHTELIANS. [ANGELIC BROTHERS.]

GLASSITES. This Scottish sect derives its name from John Glas or Glass [born 1695, died 1773], minister of Tealing in Forfarshire. He at a very early period of his ministry began to teach that all national establishments of religion are contrary to the teaching of the New Testament, and that the Church and State may in no way be connected; and he consequently opposed the principles inculcated in the Solemn League and Covenant, and denied some of the articles of the Westminster Confession of Faith. He maintained that congregations may appoint their own teachers, and was the first in Scotland to admit uneducated persons and persons engaged in trade to the office of preachers. He also taught that all members of Christian congregations should have a share in Church government, and that civil magistrates ought not in any way to interfere in religious matters, either for the encouragement of true religion or for the restraint of heresy. He was thus the original promulgator in Scotland of the distinctive views of the English Independents, which he put forth to the world in 1728, in a book entitled The Testimony of the King of Martyrs. He was thereupon suspended by the Synod of Angus and Mearns "for holding tenets inconsistent with the established government of this Church, and declining to come under engagements to forbear venting them." He appealed against this sentence to the General Assembly, but was deposed from the ministry by particulares et limitatæ non sunt Mens, sed Mens eo usque, sed cum certo limite" [ib. 235]. "Ratione in mundo non sumus, sed supra mundum et apud Deum" [Phys. 147]. And with respect to the moving power he says, "Si corpus movendum est, movendum est a mente. Non potest enim a se moveri." "Extra corpus nihil est præter mentem; igitur si motus ponendus est, ponendus est a mente" [Met. 85]. "Nos corpora nostra non movere; si moveremus, sciremus utique quomodo moveremus, ad hoc profundissime nescimus" [Phys. 110]. "Ad arbitrium voluntatis meæ quædam subinde partes in corpore meo moventur, non quidem a me sed a Motore" [Met. 34].

the Commission of the Assembly on 12th March 1730. Mr. Francis Archibald, minister of Guthrie, Forfarshire, his first supporter among the ministers of the Kirk, shared in his sentence of suspension. He was, however, restored to the ministry by the General Assembly on 22nd May 1739; the Assembly "declaring, notwithstanding, that he is not to be esteemed a minister of the Established Church of Scotland, or capable to be called and settled therein, until he shall renounce the principles embraced by him that are inconsistent with the constitution of this Church." Glas established congregations in Dundee, Perth, and other places, but the distinctive teaching of the sect was before long largely affected by the views of one of its elders, Robert Sandeman, on the nature of justifying faith. Sandeman maintained in some controversial letters addressed to Hervey on his Theron and Aspasio, that faith is simply an assent to the Divine testimony concerning Christ; and his notion being generally adopted by the Glassites, the sect gradually became better known by the name of Sandemanians, under which title a few congregations were established in England. A notice of the subsequent history of the sect, with further particulars of their distinctive peculiarities, will be found under the article SANDEMANIANS. [Acts of the General Assembly. GNOSTIMACHI. [RHETORIANS.]

GNOSTICS. An appellation which was probably assumed by the heretics of apostolic times, and which was afterwards extended in its application until it became the generic name of about twenty-five sects that arose in various parts of the Church during the first two centuries of its existence.

The earliest form of Gnosticism is indicated by the word γνῶσις, from which the name is derived, and which had acquired the ecclesiastical meaning of "theological" knowledge, as distinguished from the knowledge arising out of the mere reception of truth.¹ Such γνῶσις is often spoken of in the New Testament as a thing to be desired, but when so spoken of it is clear that purely intellectual knowledge of Christianity is not intended, but such an intellectual knowledge as runs parallel with a development of holiness, a comprehension of the breadth and length, and depth and height of Divine Truth which leads up to the knowledge of the love of Christ [Eph. iii. 18, 19]. In one of St. Paul's last epistles [1 Tim. vi. 20], he speaks of a γνῶσις which was evidently dissociated from this progressive holiness and associated with subtle speculations about the oppositions (ἀντιθέσεις) of good and evil; and this he declares to be "science," or theological knowledge "falsely so called" (ψευδώνυμος γνῶσις). The cultivation of the true γνῶσις had therefore passed, in some cases, into that of a speculative, unspiritual γνῶσις even in the lifetime of St. Paul; and the latter had already begun to deal with those questions respecting the origin of evil, moral light and moral darkness, which were an invariable feature of Gnostic speculations.

Whether those who cultivated the true γνῶσις were ever called Gnostics is uncertain. That they may have been so seems likely from St. Paul's use of the name when he speaks of Herod Agrippa as an expert (γνώστης) in all Jewish "customs and questions;" and, as is well known, Clement of Alexandria uses the name in this good sense throughout his Stromata, which work was probably written in the latter part of the second century. But in the common sense of the name as used in later ages οἱ γνωστικοί are first so designated by Irenæus, late in the second, and Hippolytus early in the third century [Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 4; Hippol. Philosoph. v. ad init.]. The epistles of St. Ignatius however, and especially his Epistle to the Church of Smyrna, contain such numerous references to the principles of the Gnostics as to shew that they had become widely diffused in the beginning of the second century, whether the name was or was not in use at so early a period as distinctive of the heretics who taught them.

The Gnostics have been commonly traced up to particular founders, such as Simon Magus, but it seems more in accordance with historical evidence to consider them as the natural outcome of Jewish and Gentile intellect when exercised in a speculative manner upon the philosophical phase of Christianity and of other religions of the world. The first principle of the Gnostics was that "the beginning of perfection is the science (γνῶσις) of man, and the science of God is absolute perfection" [Hippol. Philosoph. v. 1, 3]. This principle was worked out in its details by intellectual Christians who lived in the midst of religious systems which were much older than Christianity. The Jew had his Rabbinical traditions, the Oriental his Zoroastrian system of philosophical light-worship, the Greek or Roman his classical philosophy and mythology. Though the force of Christianity could not be resisted, yet the old national faiths had their charms both for the mind and the heart, at least where the convert was only subdued by the intellectual and not by the spiritual force of the new faith. At the same time an uninquiring reception of truth by mere faith had no attraction for such minds, and they were accustomed to sneer, Irenæus tells us, at the simple Christianity which sufficed for "Catholics and Ecclesiastics" [Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 15].

Two elements thus combined towards the development of the Gnostic; first, a desire to form a philosophy of Christianity; and secondly, the craving after a philosophy of religion to which Christianity and the old faiths of the world should each contribute their share of truth and theory. Hence arose three principal types of intellectual speculation, the Judaizing, the Oriental, and the Greek. All three had the common feature of eclecticism, but the eclecticism of each was influenced by local colouring; and hence the general speculative tendency which produced Gnosticism produced a Cabbalistic, a Zoroastrian, or a mythological Gnostic, according to his antecedent habits of thought and the intellectual atmosphere in which he lived. All experience teaches that the first outbreak of such a speculative tendency at various centres, and into each particular type of Gnosticism, would be sporadic, and that those who became leaders of its various systems would not be the originators of them, but the condensers and moulders of materials which they found already in existence. They laid hold of the spirit of inquiry which pervaded the intellectual part of the Christian world, and offered to satisfy it by means of a knowledge which had not been given to the Christian world at large, but only to a select few of whom they were the representatives [Iren. adv. Hær. i. 25; iii. 2]. Hence the Gnostic claimed to be not only the philosophical Christian, who evolved truth out of thought, but also the depositary of a secret tradition on which his system was mainly grounded as that of the ordinary Christian was grounded on the less recondite foundation of a revelation whose statements were open to all. The chief of such leaders of Gnostic thought were Simon Magus, Basilides, Valentinus, and Marcion, each of whose systems, as well as those of less conspicuous founders of Gnostic sects, are explained in separate articles. [SIMONIANS, VALENTINIANS, &c.]

The development of these various systems of Gnosticism led to a most involved and complicated theosophy and anthropology, a large portion of which seems to the modern student, as it seemed to the ancient Father, neither more nor less than nonsense; though it is just barely possible that there is a key to it unknown to contemporaries as it is to moderns, which might shew that it was a kind of verbal hieroglyphics. But amidst this maze of incoherent absurdity there are to be found certain definite theories respecting God and man which may be taken as representing the generic character of Gnostic thought. These may be shortly stated in a summary form.

1. One Infinite and Self-Existent Being alone has existed from all eternity, and is the original source of all being.

2. At some epoch or epochs of eternity, there emanated from Him other Beings called Æons, in whom He limited His own Infinity by manifesting in each of them one of His Divine attributes.

3. These inferior Divine Beings made the creation of still inferior beings possible, for they themselves were a transition from the Infinite towards the Finite.

4. Further processes of emanation ensued by which the circles of beings evolved from the first emanation became more and more distant from the Infinite, making a nearer and nearer approach to the Finite, yet not becoming material.

5. The material world, on the contrary, is a kingdom of creation opposed to the kingdom of emanation, the only explanation of whose original existence is that it was the work of a rebellious Divine Being who constituted himself a "Demiurge," i.e. first, a Creator of matter, and secondly a Disposer of matter into form.

6. Thus arose a dualism in which there was on the one hand a Kingdom of Spirit, Light, and Good, and on the other hand a Kingdom of Matter, Darkness, and Evil.

7. Human nature became a mixture of spirit and matter, and therefore of good and evil.

8. To eliminate the matter from human nature, and make it consist of spirit alone, is the great work of man's moral discipline, reaching its climax in final reception into the higher world of Spirit and Light.

9. But this work is hindered by the power of the Demiurge, who being the ruler of the material world opposes this process of spiritualization as one that removes man from his kingdom.

10. To counteract the evil work of the Demiurge, therefore, to assist man in working out his moral probation, and to secure his final removal from the bondage of matter and the Demiurge, one of the Æons (from the innermost circle in some Gnostic systems, from a more outward one in others) came into the world to be man's Saviour.

11. This Divine and Heavenly Spirit or Æon united Himself to the material and earthly body of the Man Jesus whom John the Baptist baptized in Jordan, and thus constituted Him Jesus the Christ; heavenly as to His Spirit, earthly as to His Body. But some sects of Gnostics, as the Docetæ, imagined that the Body of Christ was only a phantom or ideal Body and not one of real flesh and blood.

12. The death of Christ was the work of the evil Demiurge, but was thwarted by the return of the heavenly Æon to the place from whence He had descended; the crucified Body, or apparent Body, having no further part in the work of man's redemption.

As regards the influence of Christ on the moral probation and the ultimate salvation of mankind, all the Gnostic systems were extremely indefinite. There was one general idea that He was a Divine Teacher who secretly communicated to His apostles the γνώσις, which was soon treated as a mysterious tradition rather than intellectual theology; and this γνώσις was held to be the means by which human nature was purified. But there was, in reality, no place for Christ in the Gnostic systems. The purification of human nature was effected by each individual man's own efforts of self-discipline and progressive acquisition of the secret science, neither sacramental nor other grace being required. In early times this principle led the Gnostics to practise severe mortifications for the purpose of bringing the body into subjection to the spirit: and they also made the contemplative life a means towards the same end. But their theory of the Demiurge was soon extended from the sphere of physical creation to that of moral law, and then the moral law shared with the material world in condemnation as his evil work. Thus a theoretical antinomianism sprung up which soon developed into practical license and profligacy; marriage especially being despised, first, as inconsistent with a life of mortification, and afterwards as being part of the bondage of a law which spiritual persons were called on to despise and renounce. Thus, more and more, the historical Moral Teacher of the Gospels, and the mystical Giver of grace of the Church system, would have to be explained away; for He was always a disturbing element in the consistency of the Gnostic systems, the New Creation of the Gospel being as alien to their theories as the Old Creation of Genesis. This congeries of heresies thus essentially represented antichristianism; and they who moulded them into form and disseminated them in the world were often looked upon as representatives of the personal Antichrist.

The Gnostics are little heard of after the second century, but many of their principles survived among the Manichæans, and there is so much analogy between those of the Oriental Gnostics and the Buddhists as to suggest some connection between them. GOMARISTS. The Supralapsarian Calvinist party opposed to Arminius and his followers, and taking this name from its leader, Francis Gomar, who was (like Arminius himself) a Professor of Theology in the University of Leyden. [ARMINIANS. SUPRALAPSARIANS.]

GORTHÆANS. These are mentioned as a sect founded by Gorthæus, a follower of Simon Magnus [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 22]. They are also mentioned in the same way by Theodoret [Hæc. fab. i. 12]. Epiphanius names them as the third sect of the Samaritans, the Essenes and the Sebuzæ being the first and second [Epiph. Hæc. xii.], and the Dosithæans the fourth.

GOSPELLERS. A name assumed in spiritual conceit by the early Puritans, as that of "Evangelicals" was by the Low Church party of recent times, to signify that they were exceptional representatives of the life and truth taught in the New Testament. It became a general popular term among the party-opposed to the Puritans, for those factious religionists who made an ostentatious profession of piety but had a keen eye to worldly interests. Thus Latimer quaintly describes the man who appealed to our Lord to make his brother divide the inheritance with him [Luke xii. 13] as "a thorny brother, a gosseller, a carnal gosseller (as many be nowadays for a piece of an abbey or for a portion of chantry-lands), to get somewhat by it, and serve his commodity. He was a gosseller, one of the new brethren, somewhat worse than a rank papist." In another place he speaks of the "carnal gossellers, which commonly begin well at the first, but now having rest and tranquillity, and all things going with them, they leave the Gospel, and set their minds upon this naughty world" [Latimer's Sermons, i. 233, ii. 36, ed. 1824.] Archbishop Cranmer describes them with some minuteness. "It is reported that there be many among these unlawful assemblers that pretend knowledge of the Gospel, and will needs be called Gospellers, as though the Gospel were the cause of disobedience, sedition, and carnal liberality, and the destruction of those policies, kingdoms, and commonweals where it is received." Elsewhere they are spoken of as men "whose wit and virtue is in their tongues, hot disputers, busy talkers, taunters, and fault-finders with others, rather than menders of themselves" [Cranmer's Works, ii. 260, iv. 161]. Such was the estimate of the "Gospellers" formed by those of their contemporaries who stood in the forefront of the Reformation struggle. Later writers have been accustomed to characterize them simply by their own idea of what the name ought to have indicated, as when Bishop Burnet writes of them, "so were all those called who were given to the reading of the Scriptures." [Burnet's Hist. Reform. ii. 182, Pocock's ed.]

GOTISPITÆ. One of the numerous names by which the CIRCUMCELLIONS were known. [CUTZUPITÆ. Pseudo-Hieron. de Hæc. xxxii.]

GRINDLETONIANS. A sect of Familists in the North of England, who are described as repudiating the use of Prayer, the observance of the Lord's Day except as a "Lecture Day," and of the Holy Scriptures: as maintaining that "their spirit is not to be tried by the Scripture, but the Scripture by their spirit," and "that when God comes to dwell in a man, he so fills the soul that there is no more lusting." [Knewstubb's Familists, 1575. Denison's White Wolf, a Paul's Cross Sermon of 1627, p. 39.]

GRÖNINGEN SCHOOL. An eclectic section of Dutch theologians, arising out of a recoil from Calvinism on the one hand and Rationalism on the other, uniting some of the features of both, but chiefly characterized by a Socinian form of Theism. Its immediate origin was an attempt of Professor Van Heusde to modernize Platonism and adapt it to modern modes of thought and action, but its principal literary expositor has been Professor Hofstede de Groot, in Die Gröninger Theologen, published at Gotha in the year 1863.

This school teaches with Plato that there is a kind of Divine spirit or element [τὸ θεῖον πνεῦμα, Plato, Opp. III. iii. 514] in human nature by which the moral life is actuated, and the development of which carries man on to the highest perfection of which he is capable. This development is a state of progress towards perfect conformity to God which was attained in its degree by good heathens such as Zoroaster, Plato, and Confucius, and in its highest degree by the Son of Man. Their view of our Lord is that he was a holy man who became the Theanthropos by this process of development, and not by what is ordinarily understood as the Incarnation of Deity. Hence He is not a person possessing two natures, but having only one, the human developed to such an extent that it has become in a manner deified. His death was the great manifestation of His love, but it did not constitute Him a Redeemer, nor was His resurrection anything more to mankind than an earnest of that to which all men universally will at last attain.

This negative theology is scarcely to be distinguished from positive Rationalism, and such probably is the terminus which it reaches in the minds of most of its disciples.

GUEBERS. [PARSEES.]

GUEUX. This name, meaning "Beggars," was given to the confederate nobles and other malcontents of the Netherlands in the time of Philip II. In 1566, the last year of the administration of the Regent Margaret, Duchess of Parma, Philip re-established the Inquisition in the Netherlands, thereby precipitating the open revolt which previous misgovernment had prepared. It was computed that before this fatal measure fifty thousand persons had been put to death for religion and thirty thousand driven from the country. These severities had been mainly instigated by Granvella, Margaret's minister; and when he was recalled in 1564 a mitigation was hoped for. Catholics no less than Reformers held the Inquisition in horror, and felt that the government was ruining the country. Count Egmont, a devout Catholic, as the rest of the nobles were, was sent in 1565 on an embassy to Madrid to lay the state of affairs before the King. The reply of Philip was to send nine Inquisitors to put in force the decrees of the Council of Trent. Hereupon a number of nobles bound themselves by a compact, known as the Compromise, to resist the Inquisition, though still professing that they meant nothing against the King's dominion. The principal members of this league were the heroic Louis of Nassau, the illustrious Sainte Aldegonde, Broderode, and De Hammes. The more cautious Orange held aloof from it. A deputation of three hundred of the confederates entered Brussels in procession, and presented to the Regent Margaret their celebrated Request, in which, amidst abundant expressions of loyalty, they declared plainly that the recent resolutions of the King were likely to produce a general rebellion. This declaration was received with contempt. The Princess happening to shew some embarrassment during the audience, it is said that Berlaymont, president of finance, exclaimed that she should not have any fear of such a mob of beggars (tas de gueux). This sarcasm, which he is said to have repeated elsewhere the same day, was communicated by Broderode to the rest of the confederates at an evening banquet. They immediately resolved to call themselves by that name, and drank to the health of "the beggars" with loud shouts. A wallet and bowl were hung up in the hall, and each of the company in turn threw some salt into his goblet, and standing beneath those symbols of the order of mendicity, repeated the following distich:—

"Par le sel, par le pain, et par le besache, Les gueux ne changeront pas, quoy qu'un se fache."
"By the salt, by the bread, and by the wallet,
The beggars shall change not, let whoso will fret."

They adopted the costume of beggars, appearing in doublet, hose, and short cloak of ashen grey, with common felt hats, and pouches and bowls at their sides. They also caused medals of lead and copper to be struck, bearing on one side the head of Philip, on the other two hands meeting in a wallet, with the motto, "Faithful to the King, even to wearing the beggars' sack." Such was the origin of this famous name, destined to be carried far and wide by the exploits of the "wild beggars," the "wood beggars," the "beggars of the sea," in the war which soon broke out. [De Thou, Hist. Univ. v. lib. xx. 218. Bentivoglio, Guerra di Flandra, lib. ii. p. 27, Monmouth's transl. (1654). Motley's Rise of the Dutch Repub. pt. ii. ch. vi.]

In origin the Beggars were a confederacy of nobles to resist the merciless dominion of foreigners; and it was they who offered the first armed opposition to Alva, on his arrival from Spain at the head of a powerful army to succeed the Duchess Margaret in 1568. Louis of Nassau gained the victory of Heiliger See the same year; but the army of the Beggars was immediately afterwards annihilated at Jenningen by Alva himself. Then Orange, who had refused to join the Beggars, took the field with an army raised by himself, and in a long campaign was completely baffled by Alva, driven without a battle over the French frontier, and compelled to disband at Strasburg. About the same time Orange began the navy of Holland by giving commissions to seafaring persons to cruise against Spanish commerce. These privateers called themselves "Beggars of the Sea;" they were under strict regulations and discipline, and each ship was ordered to have on board a minister to preach and keep piety [Grotii Annal. ii. 49]. By a fleet of these marine outlaws, under their most famous leader De la Marck, was effected the memorable seizure of the port of Brill in 1572, which was the first real success of the Dutch patriots, and laid the foundation of the republic.

The Beggars were not at first a religious sect, but Bentivoglio seems always to use the word "heretics" as an equivalent designation. No doubt, as the great struggle with Spain proceeded they better deserved to be so called by a Roman cardinal. They belonged to the Calvinists, not the Lutherans; for the Reformation reached the Netherlands not from Germany but France. The Gueux of the Walloon or Western Provinces were in constant intercourse with the French Huguenots, and were often called Huguenots. The Prince of Orange stated that in 1566, at the beginning of the war, there were only two Lutheran churches in all the Netherlands, and that of the others half were Calvinist. [Motley's Rise, &c. pt. ii. ch. vi.]

GUERINETES. [ILLUMINATI.]

GYMNOPODÆ. [EXCALCEATI.]

H

HÆMATITES. A sect of heretics named by Clement of Alexandria as one of those which, like the Docetæ, took their names from peculiar dogmas [Clem. Alex. Stromat. vii. 17]. What the dogma was in the case of the Hæmatites he does not state, merely leaving us to draw the inference that it was in some way associated with blood [αἷμα]. Spencer, in his treatise on Jewish laws, supposes that the sect was so called because those who belonged to it ate either animals which had been strangled without blood-shedding, or animals offered to idols [Spencer, De leg. Hebr. Diss. in loc. Act. xv. 20]. Others have supposed that they offered sacrifices of human blood; but nothing is really known of them but what is indicated by the name.

HÆSITANTES. The name by which those who refused to acknowledge the authority of the Council of Chalcedon were originally called. The ACEPHALI were eventually developed from among them, and the earlier name seems to have been used only for a short time. [Leontius Byzant. de Sectis, vi.-ix. in Bibl. Max. Lugd. ix.]

HAGARENES. Apostates from Christianity to Mahometanism were so called in the early days of the latter.

HALDANITES. The followers of Robert and James Haldane, two Scotch gentlemen, of Aithrie, near Stirling, who established Independent meeting-houses with their property in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, and many other places in Scotland, at the beginning of the nineteenth century. The principles of the sect were identical with those of the Daleites; but the members of it were, within a few years, absorbed into other denominations.

HAMSTEDIANS. [ADRIANISTS.]

HARD-SHELL BAPTISTS. A small sect of Baptists in the Southern States of America, known only by name.

HARDTHOFITES. [JERUSALEM FRIENDS.]

HARMONIUS. The son of Bardesanes, who is said to have promoted the heresy of his father by writing hymns by which the people at large learned his doctrine. The hymns of Ephraem Syrus were composed on the orthodox side to counteract the evil wrought by those of Harmonius. [Theod. Hist. Eccl. iv. 29; Hæret. fab. i. BARDESANIANS.]

HARMONY SOCIETY. A community formed in 1805 by an emigrant seceder from the Lutherans of Wurtemberg, named George Rapp, on the principle of having all things common, according to the example of the first Christians. It still exists in Pennsylvania, where about 4000 of the community occupy the town of Economy in Beaver county. They do not maintain communion with the general body of the Lutherans, but their religious principles and practices do not differ from those of the sect from which they separated.

HATTEMISTS. A Dutch sect, taking its name from Pontianus von Hattem of Philipsland in Zealand. He was a great admirer of Spinoza, and although wishing still to be considered as a Lutheran, was deposed from his office as pastor on account of his heretical views. Mosheim says that both the Hattemists and the Verschorists deduced a doctrine of necessity from that of the absolute decrees of Calvinism, denied the doctrine of original sin, and maintained that Christianity does not impose a law of good actions but only a law of suffering, God punishing men not for their sins but by them. Hattem denied the expiatory virtue of Christ's death, and considered the latter to signify that there is nothing in us which can offend God. It seems impossible that such teaching should not lead to Antinomianism. The sects are said still to exist, but to have discarded the names of their founders. [Mosh. Eccl. Hist. iii. 390, Stubbs' ed.]

HEGELIANS. A school of philosophy founded by George William Frederick Hegel in the early part of the nineteenth century, the leading point of which is "Absolute Idealism," i.e. that all "being" is represented by "idea;" and that thus absolute thought and absolute existence are identical. The law of this is defined as that of the "identity of contraries."

Hegel was born at Stuttgart on August 27th, 1770, and educated in the University of Tübingen. After being occupied for some years as a private tutor he went to the University of Jena with the object of becoming lecturer; and in the year 1806 he was made professor of philosophy there. In 1808 he was appointed rector of the Academy of Nuremberg; in 1816 he was made professor of philosophy at Heidelberg, and from 1818 until his death by cholera in 1831 he was professor of philosophy at Berlin. His literary work during this comparatively short life was of so industrious a character that his collected writings on philosophy fill eighteen octavo volumes.

The Hegelian system has been called a process rather than a principle. The Absolute of Spinoza was found in an universal substance; that of Fichte, the predecessor of Hegel at Berlin, in an universal "ego;" that of Schelling, his contemporary, in an universal mind. Hegel took up the theory of his friend Schelling, and attempted to give it more scientific exactness by shewing that "absolute thought" is the highest stage of a process of which the two lower stages are sensational intuition and intelligent perception. Following up this line of logical abstraction, Hegel denied the existence of Object and Subject, and averred that nothing exists except Relation, which he further explains by saying that Thoughts are not only Thoughts but also the realities of things, that Being and non-Being are identical. All nature thus becomes only a manifestation of Thought; and a Pantheism of Idea is substituted for a Pantheism of Substance, by the conclusion that Absolute Thought is God. "It appears," says Hegel, "that the World-spirit (Weltgeist) has at last succeeded in freeing Himself from all encumbrances, and is able to conceive Himself as Absolute Intelligence. . . . For He is this only in as far as He knows Himself to be Absolute Intelligence, and this He knows only in Science; and this knowledge alone constitutes His true existence" [Gesch. der Philos. iii. 689].

This singularly shadowy principle being once developed, and accepted as having a tangible meaning, its application to Christianity was easy. First, the Personality of God vanishes from the Hegelian view of Christianity, absolute thought and absolute existence finding their highest development in human intelligence. Secondly, but although human nature seems thus to be deified it loses in reality the quality by which it is made in the image of the Divine, ceasing to possess free will, and becoming merely a portion of the Universal Intelligence, the continual evolution of which, under the operation of the law of the "identity of contraries," is the history of mankind. Thus human personality, and with it moral responsibility, vanishes in the personality of God, as the Divine personality vanishes in the personality of man.

Particular doctrines of Christianity might have seemed unworthy the attention of a philosopher who had attained so sublime a height as this; but it was a peculiarity of Hegel's mind that he clung to the terminology of Holy Scripture and to the practice of Christianity, wishing only to find the theoretical explanation of them in his own philosophy. Thus the doctrine of the Trinity became a threefold movement of Absolute Thought developed by the action of the law of contraries; the Fall of Man became a departure of the Absolute Idea into a state of objectivity or externality; redemption became the restoration of unity between opposites; and the practical forces of Christianity, such as means of grace, both signify and accomplish this restoration.

After the death of Hegel his followers immediately began to wrangle with great bitterness over his system, the difficulty of finding out what that system really meant in its application to religion and politics being the real cause of division. But while the metaphysicians of the school were arguing, a race of practical Hegelians arose, who were content to take up the philosopher's principles where he laid them down, and to carry them on to their natural consequences, Republicanism of the wildest type in politics, and Rationalism of an equally extreme form in religion. The exponent of the latter was Strauss, whose "Life of Jesus" idealized the Gospel history into a congeries of myths.

Hegelianism, however, like many other speculations of a similar kind, loses much of its force when it is translated into plain language and divested of that abstruse verbiage which has so great a charm for some minds. "The mountain looming through a fog," says Lewes, "turns out to be a miserable hut as soon as the fog is scattered, and so the boasted system of Absolute Idealism turns out to be only a play upon words as soon as it is dragged from out the misty terminology in which it is enshrouded." [Lewes' Biog. Hist. Philosophy, 613, ed. 1857.]

HEIDELBERG CONFESSION. [PROTESTANT CONFESSIONS.]

HELIX. There is a fragment of a treatise of Hippolytus entitled Katà Bérōnos καὶ Ἡλικος, against Beron and Helix. But Fabricius considers that the second proper name is a misreading, and that the true title of the treatise was Katà Bérōnos καὶ ἡλικιωτῶν αἰρετικῶν, against Beron and his fellow heretics. No heretic of the name of Helix is elsewhere mentioned. [BERON.]

HELLENIANS. A Jewish sect named by Justin Martyr [Dial. c. Tryph. clxxx.]. They are not mentioned elsewhere. By a comparison with other lists of Jewish sects it appears most probable that they are to be identified with the Herodians, and to be considered a political rather than a religious body. [JEWISH SECTS.]

HELMSTADIAN CONTROVERSY. [SYNCRETISTS.]

HELVETIC REFORMED CHURCH. [SWISS PROTESTANTS.]

HELVIDIANS. A sect of heretics who denied the perpetual virginity of the Blessed Virgin Mary. They took their name from Helvidius, who lived at Rome in the latter part of the fourth century, and was the first who, at that place, had advanced this view. Earlier heretics, who had said that Jesus Christ was the natural son of Joseph and Mary, had of course denied the virginity of our Lord's mother; but until Helvidius no one at Rome who believed our Lord was born of a virgin, had denied that she remained a virgin for the rest of her life. Helvidius wrote a book in support of his views, and this was at last answered by St. Jerome. This refutation, De perpetua Virginitate Beatae Mariæ, adversus Helvidium, is assigned from internal evidence to the year 383. Helvidius is said to have been an ignorant and obscure man, "vix primis imbutus litteris," and for a long time St. Jerome refused to reply to an adversary so unworthy. At length he did so,

"ut discat aliquando reticere, qui nunquam didicit loqui." St. Jerome speaks very strongly of his illiterate production; and of his obscurity says, "Ego ipse qui contra te scribo, cum in eadem tecum urbe consisto, albus, ut aiunt, atreve sis nescio." Helvidius quoted two Fathers of the Church, Tertullian and Victorinus Petaviensis. It is suggested [Migne, Patrologiæ Cursus] that the passages he may have cited from Tertullian as supporting his doctrine were possibly De velandis Virginibus, c. 6. n. 48; or else De Carne Christi, c. 23, n. 164. His other authority was probably martyred in the fourth century: very few fragments of his works being extant, and certainly none that could have served Helvidius in this connection. Cave calls Helvidius a disciple of Auxentius, and the precursor of Jovinian, and supposes him to have been of the dignity of a presbyter. But this last seems unlikely, or St. Jerome would hardly have spoken in so marked a manner of his obscurity [Cave's Hist. Lit. 1720, i. 278]. Gennadius also says that he followed the teaching of Auxentius, an Arian who had intruded himself into the see of Milan, at which place Helvidius was at one time residing, and an imitator of Symmachus, who wrote in defence of idolatry. But these points are not mentioned in St. Jerome's book, and are therefore doubtful. The book written against the virginity of the Blessed Virgin is not now extant, nor any other writings of Helvidius, except the few passages quoted by St. Jerome for the purpose of refutation.

No proceedings of councils seem to have been taken against Helvidius personally, nor is his name mentioned in contemporary conciliar acts. His tenets were condemned at Milan and Thessalonica [ANTIDICOMARIANITES; where see the different places at which the heresy obtained a footing, and references for the theological question]. In the seventh century Hildefontus, Archbishop of Toledo [died A.D. 669], wrote a book (which is rather invective than argument) against certain people in Spain who attempted to revive the Helvidian heresy. It is entitled De Virginitate perpetua Sanctæ Mariæ, and is directed "adversus tres infideles." Hugo de Sancto Victore [died A.D. 1140] wrote a lengthy work on the same subject, but not, as it seems, with reference to any special reappearance of the heresy in his own time. Alfonsus a Castro [A.D. 1665] compares Helvidius to Ishmael: "Oportet ergo ut manus omnium catholicorum contra Elvidium levantur, quia ille manus contra omnes levare tentavit" [adv. Hæc. lib. x.].

Of Helvidius himself we know nothing more than we can gather from St. Jerome's treatise. His followers were at no time numerous or important; and although at various periods the Antidicomarianite heresy has broken out afresh, it has not since the fourth century had any supporters of sufficient weight to be remembered by name.

The following curious verses, relating to the subject of the Blessed Virgin's relatives, have lately been discovered written on the vellum binding of a book in the Cathedral Library at Peterborough:—

"Nupserat Anna viris tribus, hoc si forte requiris.
Hic manifestatur quo nomine quisque vocatur.
Quod Joachim scimus, hanc duxit in ordine primus.
Hanc Cleophas duxit, Salomeque postea nupsit.
Nostis nempe piam Joachim genuisse Mariam.
Post Joachim sacre Cleophas conjungitur Anne.
Filia tunc alia fuit illi dicta Maria.
Post Cleopham tandem Salomas sibi junxit eandem.
De quo mox aliam concepit ex Anna Mariam.
Filia prima datur Joseph, quo virgo regatur.
In qua Salvator fit homo, mundique creator.
Alpheus medie sociatur nempe Mariæ.
Unde fuit natus, Jacobus minor vocitatus.
Tercia Judeo, desponsatur Zebedeo.
Hii Jacobum vere, fratremque suum genuere.
Johannem justum, vicisque scimus inustum."

HEMERO-BAPTISTS. A sect of the Jews, so called from their daily ceremonial ablution, which was used by them as a daily means of spiritual cleansing from sin. They appear to have been a sect of the Pharisees, but are said to have agreed with the Sadducees in denying the Resurrection [Epiphanius, Hæres. xvii.]. This is all the information we possess about the sect, but it is mentioned by Hegesippus [Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv. 22], and by Justin Martyr [Justin M. Dial. cum Tryph.]. In the second of the Clementine Homilies St. John the Baptist is spoken of under the name of a Hemero-Baptist [Hom. Clem. ii. 23]; and some modern writers believe that the MENDEANS, or Christians of St. John, are the descendants of this Jewish sect. [Mosh. Comment. de Reb. Chr. 43. Paciandius, De cultu S. Johann. Bapt. dissert. ii. cap. 7, Rome, 1755.]

HENOTICON. An edict promulgated by the Emperor Zeno [A.D. 482], as a formulary for the promotion of unity [Ἐνότης] between the Monophysites and the Church. This document is given at length by Evagrius [Evagr. Hist. Eccl. iii. 14]. It was suggested and composed by Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, and addressed to the bishops and faithful in Alexandria, Libya, Egypt, and Pentapolis. It commanded the reception of the decrees of the first three councils, and the rejection of those of the Council of Chalcedon. Although it contains no directly heretical statement, but on the contrary anathematizes the Nestorians and the Eutychians, and all who taught doctrines dividing or confounding the two Natures of Christ, the implied condemnation of a general council by an individual person was in itself on the very boundary of heresy, to say the least; and hence the Henoticon was far from promoting the unity which it professed to desire. [MONOPHYSITES.]

HENRICIANS.¹ This sect of anti-sacerdotalists was founded by Henry the Deacon, known otherwise as Henry of Lausanne, at the close of the first quarter of the twelfth century. Henry, who was of Swiss or Italian extraction, had been one of the regular clergy and attached to the renowned Abbey of Clugny. About the year A.D. 1116 he came from Switzerland, and commenced a course of preaching at Le Mans, the capital of Maine. Central and Southern France was at this moment in a mood most favourable to receive his teaching, agitated as the country was with the deep discontent inspired by the arrogance of the regular, the godlessness of the secular, clergy. At first he did not profess, or at least laid no stress on, the peculiarities of his own dogmatic system, but his preaching wrought marvels on the morality of the almost barbarous populace. He was of imposing stature, wore a cropped beard and flowing hair, went barefooted in winter, with a frame so robust as to endure with ease the utmost rigours of the climate, and a voice so powerful that his adversaries compared it to the roar of legions of devils. His rude eloquence, coupled with the ascetic life he led, and the manifest sincerity of his enthusiasm, appears to have favourably impressed even Hildebert, the Bishop of Le Mans. On Henry's arrival he was received with respect by this prelate, who on his departure to Rome accorded to Henry the free use of the pulpits of his diocese. The whole country yielded to his eloquence, and gave themselves up to his direction.

Henry dwelt much on two points. Although a monk by education, and by profession and practice a rigid ascetic, he was emphatically the apostle of marriage and the uncompromising foe of the clergy. He especially undertook the reclamation of the courtizans. These unfortunate women flocked to his preaching, and readily obeyed his singular rule. He bade them cast into the flames all their adornments; their costly robes, their jewels, and even their long hair. Young men of noble families wedded at his bidding these reclaimed harlots, dressed in the vilest rags, purchased, the chroniclers state, at the meanest price (quatuor solidorum), in the face of the day. So universal was his influence, that, when in the insolence of popularity he proceeded to arraign the vices of the ecclesiastics, not only did the populace desert the churches, but even threatened the persons of the clergy. On the return of Hildebert to his see, his flock, instead of meeting him, and advancing to receive his episcopal blessing with rejoicing, met him with the greeting:—"We have a father, a bishop, an advocate, far above thee in worship, wisdom, and sanctity." The wise and gentle bishop bore the indignity in silence, but forcing Henry to a public interview, he asked him to recite the Morning Hymn. Through ignorance or insolence Henry could not or would not repeat it. The populace, though by no means filled with indignation at this spectacle, could not but be gravely affected by it; for, attached as they were to Henry's person, they took no steps to protect him from further discomfiture. The bishop declared him a poor and ignorant man, and to mark the contempt with which he inspired him, he took no harsher measure than that of expulsion from his diocese. Henry therefore retired into the South of France, and became a disciple of, and fellow-worker with, a heretic who held similar opinions, named Peter de Brueys. [PETROBRUSIANS.] This is denied on the grounds of the hostility of that heretic for the emblem of the cross, which it was Henry's custom in early times to carry, but the evidence of Peter the Venerable is conclusive to the effect that Henry, whom he terms a "pseudapostolus," was also the "hæres nequitia," the inheritor of the wickedness of De Brueys. Adopting the heretical tenets of the latter (they were already at one in their morality), he recommenced his heretical ministrations in South-eastern France about the year 1119, and continued to preach there until the death of his coadjutor, which took place about A.D. 1126.

Henry escaped the fate of De Brueys, and retired into Gascony, but, some years afterwards, venturing to enter the diocese of Arles, he was captured by the archbishop and sent a prisoner to Innocent II. The Pope, who was opposed to violent measures, himself an exile at Pisa, contented himself with placing him in the care and custody of St. Bernard. His confinement did not last many years: he escaped and returned to Languedoc, where he was protected by Ildefons, Count of St. Filler and Toulouse. A short period sufficed for the re-establishment of all his ancient influence: again the churches grew deserted, and indignities were heaped upon the clergy. He continued unmolested during some years, for the times were busy, and the advocacy of the Second Crusade employed all the resources of the Roman Pontiff. At length, Eugenius III. despatched Alberic, Cardinal of Ostia, to restore order in heretical Languedoc. He implored the assistance of Bernard, in a letter which is the best testimony to the ability and character of the heresiarch. "Heresy," says he, "is an antagonist that can only be overthrown by the conquerors of Abelard and Arnold." The indefatigable Bernard acceded to the request, and it is thus that he epitomizes the condition of the country. "I have found," he writes, "the churches without people, the people without priests, the priests without respect, the Christians without Christ, God's holy places denied to be holy, the sacraments no longer honoured, the holy days without solemnities." As ever, Bernard was victorious, and shortly afterwards Henry was taken prisoner by the Archbishop of Toulouse, and sent to Rheims, where Eugenius was engaged in presiding at a general council. At the intercession of the archbishop his life was spared, but he was cast into prison, where he shortly afterwards died: his career thus closing about the year 1149. The sources of information in respect of this sect that have been preserved to us are Acta Episcoporum Cenomanensium, in Mabillon's Analect. Vet. cap. 35-6; De Hildebert's Episc. S. Bernardi's Epistol. 241; and Pet. Venerabilis' Epistola adv. Petrobrusianos.

HERACLEONITES. A sect of Gnostics belonging to the second century, and followers of Heracleon, whom Clement speaks of as "the most distinguished of the school of the Valentinians" [Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 9]. He seems to have been contemporary with Valentinus, and the date assigned to him by Cave is A.D. 126. He is mentioned by Irenæus, who speaks of the "Æons of Ptolemy and Heracleon" [Iren. adv. Hæres. ii. 4], by Tertullian [adv. Valentin. iv.], and by Origen in his Commentary on St. John's Gospel. The treatise "against all heresies" going under the name of Tertullian speaks of him as a heretic of the same class with Ptolemy and Secundus, whose opinions agreed with those of Valentinus but who introduced an original terminology, speaking of a Monad as the original source of all things, of two beings who sprung from that Monad, and of Æons as emanating from these; after which he introduced the whole system of Valentinus [Pseudo-Tertull. adv. omn. Hæres. iv.]. The few words of Philaster [Hæc. xli.] and Augustine [Hæc. xvi.] respecting the Heracleonites agree with this statement. Epiphanius identifies his teaching with that of the Marcosians, mentioning especially his theory of Ogdoads [Epiphanius. Hæres. xxxvi.].

The followers of Heracleon are little spoken of, and were probably identified with the Valentinian stock from which they grew. Heracleon himself seems to have exercised much influence upon Christian philosophy by a Commentary on St. John's Gospel; some fragments of which are preserved by Origen in his own [Grabe, Spiceleg. 85-117]. In this he appears to have worked out a Christian trichotomy, and to have adopted a highly mystical system of interpretation. Both Clement of Alexandria and Origen speak of him with considerable respect, the former preserving also, in the passage previously quoted, what seems to be a fragment of a commentary on St. Luke. But they and all other early heresiologists associate him and his followers with the Valentinian school of Gnostics. Prædestinatus speaks of him as teaching his heresy in Sicily, and as flying thence on board ship in the middle of the night when refuted by the Bishop Alexander [Prædest. xvi.]. The story seems doubtful, not being mentioned by any earlier writer.

HERESIOLOGISTS. Writers on heresies and sects are of three classes: first, those, especially among the early Fathers of the Church, who had to oppose the originators and supporters of heresies, or who endeavoured by their writings to convert such as had been misled by them; secondly, those who necessarily wrote respecting them when writing general ecclesiastical history; and thirdly, those who dealt with the history and principles of particular heresies and sects, or of all which came within their knowledge. All three classes of these writers must be consulted for obtaining a complete acquaintance with heresiology, but for the reader's convenience a catalogue is here given of the principal writers of the third class, to whom the designation at the head of this article more properly belongs.

JUSTIN MARTYR [A.D. 89-163]. In his First Apology Justin Martyr tells Antoninus Pius, "There is a book against all heresies and sects which we ourselves have written, and which we will give you if you wish to read it" [Just. Mart. Apol. ii. p. 54, ed. 1593]. This work is referred to by Eusebius and Theodoret, and Irenæus quotes a work of Justin Martyr against Marcion [Iren. adv. Hæres. iv. 14, v. 26], which seems to be referred to by Eusebius as if it had been distinct from that on "all heresies" [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 2]. But neither of these have come down to us.

The heretics named by Justin Martyr are as follows:—

Simon Magnus.	Valentinians.
Menander.	Basilidians.
Marcionites.	Saturnilians.
Marcians.

IRENÆUS [A.D. 130-202]. The important work of Irenæus, the Apostolic Bishop of Lyons, "against all heresies," is supposed to have been written about the year 185. It is extant only in a Latin version (which is however of very early date) under the title Adversus Hæreses libri quinque, but its original Greek title was, "A Refutation and Subversion of Knowledge falsely so called" [Euseb. Hist. Eccl.], from which it appears to have been written against the Gnostics. The Valentinians are, in fact, the heretics against whom Irenæus chiefly argues throughout the work, but he also gives short notices of all the following heretics, in addition to those named by Justin Martyr:—

Colorbasians.	Tatianites.
Carpocrates.	Encratites.
Cerinthians.	Barbeliotes.
Ebionites.	Ophites.
Nicolaitanes.	Sethians.
Cerdonians.	Cainites.

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA [A.D. 150-216] notices many heresies in his eight books of Miscellanies [Στρωματεῖς], the object of which was to shew what are the principles of the true Gnostic as opposed to the false. This work was probably written before the close of the second century, and its accounts of heretics are very valuable, coming as they do from a man of the highest learning among the learned men of Alexandria. The following are the heretics named by him:—

Simon Magus.	Heracleonites.
Nicolaitanes.	Hermogenes.
Marcion.	Encratites.
Valentinus.	Peratici.
Basilides.	Hæmatitæ.
Carpocrates.	Entychites.
Epiphanius.	Hydroparastatæ.
Prodicus.	Julius Cassianus.
Ophites.	Montanists.
Caianistæ.

TERTULLIAN [A.D. 150-220] wrote voluminous treatises against Marcion, Praxeas, and the Valentinians; and also a refutation from Scripture and tradition of all other heresies which had arisen during the century and a half of Christianity preceding his time, under the title De Præscriptione Hæreticorum, which was written about the year 207. There is also a shorter work entitled Catalogus Hæreticorum, which has often been attributed to Tertullian, but is probably of rather later date. [Oehler's Corpus Heresiol. i. 271-279]. Tertullian names the following heretics in addition to those named by Justin Martyr, but does not mention the Marcians:—

Cerdo.	Cainites.
Lucian.	Nicolaitanes.
Apelles.	Praxeas.
Tatian.	Hermogenes.
Carpocrates.

To these the catalogue of later date going under his name adds—

Ophites.	Cataphrygians.
Sethites.	Cataproclians.
Ptolemy.	Cateschinetans.
Secundus.	Blastus.
Heracleon.	Theodotus the Carrier.
Marcians.	Theodotus the Banker.
Colorbasus.	Victorinus.

HIPPOLYTUS [A.D. 160-236] was a disciple of Irenæus, and Bishop of Portus or Ostia near Rome. A work of his, entitled Refutatio omnium Hæresium, was formerly known in a fragmentary form under the name of Philosophumena, and attributed to Origen, but it has recently been discovered entire and shewn to be the work of Hippolytus. It is largely indebted to the works of Irenæus and St. Clement of Alexandria, but also contains much that is original and of great value. Hippolytus treats of the following heresies:—

Pharisees.	Apelles.
Sadducees.	Hermogenes.
Essenes.	Cleomenes.
Docetæ.	Quartodecimians.
Theodotus.	Montanists.
Melchisedechians.	Noëtians.
Elchasaites.	Callistians.
Monoimus.

EPIPHANIUS [A.D. 303-403]. This most voluminous of early heresiologists was the first of the Post-Nicene. He was Bishop of Constantia, or Salamis, in the island of Cyprus, from A.D. 367 to A.D. 403, when he died at not less than one hundred years of age, having written a work against eighty heresies, entitled the Panarium or Arcula, which was commenced in the year 373, and afterwards added to it an epitome or Ana-rephalaësis. In the Panarium, which is generally referred to as Epiphanius adversus Hæreses, he deals with all heresies known to him at great length, the work occupying 1100 pages in the folio edition. Although Epiphanius is a valuable writer, because he goes into details at such length as apparently to exhaust his subject, he must be read with judgment, having evidently been of a credulous disposition, and inclined to exaggeration. [Oehler's Corpus Heresiol. i. ii. iii.]

PHILASTER [circ. A.D. 380] was Bishop of Brescia, and wrote a work, De Hæresibus, which was probably quite independent of that of Epiphanius, but which goes very much less into detail respecting them. He enumerates 28 before Christ and 128 after Christ. [Galland. Bibl. Vet. Patr. vii. 480. Oehler, Corpus Heresiol. i. 2-185.]

end of his own book on heresies, says that he had heard of a work De Hæresibus written by St. Jerome, but that it was not in their library at Hippo. This was supposed by Menard to be the Indiculus de Hæresibus which he published in 1617, but the latter is not now considered to be the work of St. Jerome, and the one referred to by St. Augustine is not known to be extant. [Oehler, Corpus Heresiol. i. 283-300.]

AUGUSTINE [A.D. 354-430]. A concise account of eighty-eight heresies was written by St. Augustine under the title Catalogus Hæreseon, generally referred to as Augustin. adv. Hær. It was written at the close of his life for a deacon named Quodvultdeus, and was professedly taken chiefly from the great work of Epiphanius. It also bears much resemblance to the work of Philaster, of which however St. Augustine speaks slightly, saying that Philaster was a man of much less learning than Epiphanius. [Oehler, Corpus Heresiol. i. 189-225.]

THEODORET [A.D. 393-457]. The historian Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus in Syria, wrote a work against all heresies, known generally by its Latin title Hæreticarum fabularum Compendium, about the year 452. It is the most detailed of all early works of the kind next to that of Epiphanius, and is of higher historical value than the latter. [Theodoret, Opp. iv. 187, ed. 1642.]

PRÆDESTINATUS [circ. A.D. 461]. A work under this name, or that of Prædestinatorum Hæresis, is extant, the author of which is unknown, but which is supposed to have been written by an African bishop named Primasius. It consists of a treatise on ninety heresies, the first eighty-nine occupying less than one-half of the treatise, and the remaining portion being taken up with a refutation of the Predestinarians. [Galland. Bibl. Vet. Patr. x. 363. Oehler, Corpus Heresiol. i. 229-268.]

ANASTASIOS SINAITA [circ. A.D. 561], a Patriarch of Antioch, left a short account or catalogue of heresies in the fourth chapter of his work entitled Hodegus. [Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. viii. 350, ed. 1802.]

LEONTIUS OF BYZANTIUM [circ. A.D. 610] wrote a small treatise entitled De Sectis, which is very valuable on account of the personal knowledge he possessed respecting sects which were at that period striking off from the Eastern Churches. He also wrote separate treatises against the Eutychians and Nestorians. [Galland. Bibl. Vet. Patr. xii. 623.]

TIMOTHEUS PRESBYTER [circ. A.D. 620] of Constantinople, wrote a tract on the manner in which heretics and schismatics are to be received into the Church. It contains the names and a very short account of early heretics, and of several Constantinopolitan sects otherwise unknown. [Timoth. Presb. in Combefis. Hist. Monothelit. 650.]

SOPHRONIUS [circ. A.D. 629], a Patriarch of Jerusalem, compiled a catalogue of heresies in an epistle to Sergius, Patriarch of Constantinople. [Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. viii. 353, ed. 1802.]

ISIDORUS HISPALENSIS [A.D. 570-636]. In the eighth book of St. Isidore's Origines there are three chapters, the third, fourth, and fifth, in which he gives a succinct catalogue of the heresies down to his own time. [Isidor. Hispal. Opp. p. 64, ed. 1617. Oehler, Corpus Hæresiol. i. 303-310.]

JOHANNES DAMASCENUS [A.D. 730], or St. John of Damascus, left a catalogue of eighty heresies among his works, but it is compiled from Epiphanius, and contains nothing original except a short notice of the Nestorians and Eutychians.

RABANUS MAURUS [A.D. 847] gives a catalogue of fifty-eight heresies in his work De Clericorum Institutione, but it has no original feature about it, and is probably copied from that of St. Isidore. [Raban. Maur. Opp. vi. 32, ed. 1626.]

EUTHYMIUS ZIGABENUS [circ. A.D. 1118], a monk of Constantinople, wrote a work against all heresies entitled A Dogmatic Panoply of the Orthodox Faith, in which there is much valuable matter respecting the early, and early mediæval, Eastern sects. The original Greek work still remains in manuscript only in the Bodleian and other great libraries, but it has been several times printed in a Latin version. It is also in Bibl. Patr. Lugd. xix. 1.

ZONARAS [circ. A.D. 1120], in early life commander of the Emperor's body-guard, and afterwards a monk of Mount Athos, refuted several heresies in a tract entitled Canon in Sanctissimam Deiparam, which is printed in Cotelierus' Monumenta Ecclesiæ Græcæ, iii. 465; and in a less complete form in Bibl. Patr. Lugd. xxiii. 633.

HONORIUS [circ. A.D. 1130], a priest of Aulun in Burgundy, wrote a Catalogue of Heresies from the beginning of the world, which was printed at Basle in the year 1544. [Oehler's Corpus Hæresiol. i. 325-332.]

CONSTANTINUS HARMENOPULUS [circ. A.D. 1150] was author of a work entitled Liber de Sectis Hæreticis, which was printed at Basle in 1578.

NICETAS CHONIATES [A.D. 1205], historian of the Byzantine Emperors, wrote also a work entitled Thesaurus Orthodoxæ Fidei sive Panoplia Dogmatica, of which the fourth book contains an account of forty-four heresies of the first three centuries, and the fifth is against the Arians and Eunomians. Only the first five books of the work have ever been printed, and that in a Latin version, but the whole remain in Greek in the Bodleian Library. [Bibl. Patr. Lugd. xxv. 108-180.]

LUCAS TUDENSIS [circ. A.D. 1230], wrote a work of much value as regards mediæval sects under the title Adversus Albigenisium Errores. [Ibid. 188-262.]

REINERUS [circ. A.D. 1230]. About the same time Reinerus de Saccho, a preaching Friar, wrote a tract of great historical value against the Waldenses, he himself having been formerly one of their number. [Ibid. 262-277.]

PILICHDORFF, PETER [circ. A.D. 1250], wrote a somewhat larger work in the same age, Contra Waldenses, which also contains a valuable chapter upon the Beghards. [Ibid. 277-310.]

BLASTARES, MATTHEW [circ. A.D. 1330] deals with some of the early heresies in the second chapter of his Alphabeticum Canonum Syntagma, which was the basis of Bishop Beveridge's Synodicon.

PERPINIANO, GUIDO DE [circ. A.D. 1330], was the author of a work entitled Summa de Hæresibus omnibus, et earum confutationibus, which was printed at Paris in 1528, and at Cologne in 1631. This is the largest work on heresies that had then been written since the time of Epiphanius, consisting of 228 folio pages, and no other of any importance appeared until the epoch of the Reformation.

LUTZENBURGUS, BERNHARDUS [A.D. 1522] was the first to write a Dictionary of Sects and Heresies in an alphabetical order. His work is a small volume of about 270 pages, entitled Catalogus Hæreticorum, the latter thirty of which are de Lutero et Luteranis in the fourth edition, printed at Cologne in 1529.

A'CASTRO, ALPHONSUS [A.D. 1534], a Spanish Friar Observant, wrote a folio work of fourteen books, Adversus omnes Hæreses, in which he dealt with them under doctrinal headings and not under those of the sects or heretics themselves. An edition of 1556 is dedicated to Philip, King of Spain, England, France, and Ireland, and appears from this dedication to have been prepared by A'Castro, as the King's chaplain and director, for his information when dealing with the English "heretics."

HOSIUS, STANISLAUS [A.D. 1559], Cardinal, and Bishop of Wormia in Poland, published a small work entitled De origine Hæresium nostri temporis, in which he dealt chiefly with the Calvinistic, Lutheran, and Unitarian sects of various kinds that had sprung up since the beginning of the Reformation.

PRATEOLUS, GABRIEL [A.D. 1567]. The Elenchus Hæreticorum Omnium of this writer consists of 519 closely printed quarto pages, containing notices of 600 heresies and heretics alphabetically arranged, and preceded by 100 pages of chronological apparatus, and a full index. It is a valuable work which gives the cream of all its predecessors; but it is also rather uncritical and very Ultramontane, and thus tends towards exaggeration.

SCHLUSSELBURG'S [A.D. 1597-9] Hæreticorum Catalogus, in twelve small but thick volumes, is a bitter and most prolix Lutheran confutation of Anabaptist and Calvinist sects.

GRAVINA [A.D. 1619], a Neapolitan professor of theology, printed two folio volumes entitled Catholicæ Præscriptiones adversus omnes veteres et nostri temporis Hæreticos. A valuable comparison of the principles of ancient and modern heresies is to be found in vol. i. pp. 606-687.

ROSS, ALEXANDER [A.D. 1658], printed a small volume entitled Πανόρεβεια, or a View of all Religions . . . also a discovery of all known heresies in all ages and places, which has gone through several editions.

MALVASIA BONAVENTURA [A.D. 1661] printed a Catalogus omnium Hæresium et Conciliorum of no value.

ARNOLD'S Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie, from New Testament times to the year 1688, was published in two folio volumes in the year 1699. The accounts of heresies and sects are not so full as in Walch, but those of the mediæval and Reformation periods are very valuable.

ITTIGIUS, THOMAS [A.D. 1690] was the author of a very learned and authoritative dissertation De Hæresiarchis ævi Apostolici et Apostolico proximi, seu primi et secundi à Christo nato seculi. It was by far the most critical history of the early heretics that had as yet appeared; and has not been entirely superseded by more recent works.

DEFOE [A.D. 1704] is said to have been the compiler of the small work entitled Dictionarium Sacrum, seu Religiosum. It is of no value.

NEAL [A.D. 1720], a learned dissenting preacher, wrote a History of the Puritans or Protestant Nonconformists from the Reformation in 1517 to the Revolution in 1688, in three octavo volumes. It is a laborious book, generally accurate, but written with strong prejudices against the Church.

PICART [A.D. 1723], a French engraver, published seven folio volumes entitled Cérémonies et Coutumes religieuses de tous les peuples du monde. The letterpress was written by J. F. Bernard and Bruzen de la Martinière. It was translated into English, and published with the same magnificent array of copperplates in the years 1731-39. The text is of little value.

SIANDA'S [A.D. 1733] Lexicon Polemicon, in two folio, or in three small, volumes, is chiefly occupied with an alphabetical list of heretics, whose history is generally borrowed from Præteolus, and an original refutation added, probably from second-hand resources.

PINCHINAT, BARTHOLOMEW [A.D. 1736] published a Dictionnaire des Sectes, Hérésies, Schismes, &c., in a quarto volume.

BROUGHTON, THOMAS [A.D. 1737], a Prebendary of Salisbury, was the author or compiler of a work of no modern value in two folio volumes, entitled Bibliotheca Historica Sacra. Later editions bear the title An Historical Dictionary of all Religions.

PLUQUET [A.D. 1762]. A distinguished French Abbé of this name was the author of a very valuable Dictionnaire des Hérésies, des Erreurs, et des Schismes, &c., in two volumes, which has been frequently republished; and which was again printed, with additions by L'Abbé Claris, in L'Abbé Migne's Encyclopédie Théologique, in the year 1863. The work is largely indebted to Præteolus, but it is the most valuable of all works of the kind that have been published for ordinary readers. It is supplemented by a very full account of all Jansenist writers, and by the Index Expurgatorius, but is of a Gallican rather than an Ultramontane tone. The work is deficient in references.

WALCH, CHRISTIAN WILHELM FRANZ [A.D. 1762]. This learned writer produced an invaluable History of Sects and Heresies in eleven octavo volumes under the title Entwurf einer Vollstän- digen Historie der Ketzereien, Spaltungen und Religionsstreitigkeiten, bis auf die Zeiten der Reformation. It is a great treasury of information, and also of references to original sources of history on the subject.

MURRAY [A.D. 1764], a dissenting preacher at Newcastle, was the author of a History of Religion in four octavo volumes. He was the writer of the well known Sermons to Asses and Doctors of Divinity, and the former work is often, as may be supposed, eccentric and superficial, though written in some parts after careful research.

LARDNER [A.D. 1780]. A posthumous work of Dr. Lardner's was printed sometime after his death, entitled The History of the Heretics of the first two centuries after Christ. Having been left in a very unfinished state by Lardner, it was completed with large additions by John Hogg. The historical account is supplemented with many quotations in the original; but the disposition of the writer to apologize for all heretics, and to explain away all heresies makes the history itself of little value.

ADAMS, HANNAH [A.D. 1805], compiled (chiefly from Mosheim) an American View of religions in one octavo volume.

BOGUE and BENNETT'S [A.D. 1808] History of Dissenters from the Revolution in 1688 to the year 1808, in four octavo volumes, is the standard history of Dissenters from an extreme dissenting standpoint, and contains much valuable information.

ADAM'S [A.D. 1809] Religious World Displayed, in three octavo volumes, contains much useful information respecting the state of English sects early in the nineteenth century. Mr. Adam was a Scotch Episcopalian clergyman.

GREGOIRE [A.D. 1810], Bishop of Blois, wrote a Histoire des Sectes Religieuses . . . depuis le commencement du Siècle dernier jusqu'à l'époque actuelle. A new edition of this, in six octavo volumes, was printed with large additions in 1845. It contains a very full account of all the schools of French Deists, and may be called a religious history of the Revolution.

EVANS' [A.D. 1827] Sketch of the various Denominations of the Christian World is a small volume compiled from authorities of no value. It is a work of the most flimsy character, yet perhaps the most popular book of its kind. The edition of 1841 is the least worthless.

BURTON [A.D. 1829], Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, printed his Bampton Lectures for that year under the title of An Inquiry into the Heresies of the Apostolic Age. This work is of the highest authority, dealing with the history and principles of the Gnostic sects. More than 350 out of 600 octavo pages are occupied with elaborate notes, abounding in references to original authorities.

CONDER'S [A.D. 1838], Analytical and Comparative view of all Religions now Extant, was written by a popular dissenting minister of some learning.

GUYOT'S [A.D. 1847] Dictionnaire Universelle des Hérésies, &c., was printed in a single volume at Lyons, a second edition appearing in 1855.

A CYCLOPEDIA OF ALL DENOMINATIONS [A.D. 1851], republished in 1870 as the Religions of the World, gives an account, from the "Low Church" point of view, of the Jews, the Roman Catholics, the Greek Church, the Church of England, the Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, &c. The book was compiled for the Evangelical Alliance, and in a polemical and homiletic style (by writers of the sects described) rather than with any historical research.

MARSDEN'S [A.D. 1856] History of Churches and Sects, republished as a Dictionary of Churches and Sects, deals with a few only of the principal ancient and modern sects, and is of rather more authority than the last named work.

GARDNER'S Faiths of the World, a Dictionary of all Religions and Religious Sects, is an undated work extending to three large and thick volumes, and published about 1865 at Glasgow and in America. It is compiled from Neander's Church History and Pluquet's Dictionnaire des Hérésies, &c., and is carefully written, though with too great diffuseness, and with a total absence of reference to authorities.

SKEAT'S [A.D. 1869] History of the Free Churches of England from 1688 to 1851, the second edition of which was printed in 1869, contains many valuable particulars respecting English Dissenters during the last two centuries, and is an useful supplement to Neal's History of the Puritans.

CURTEIS [A.D. 1871]. The Bampton Lectures for that year, by G. H. Curteis, Principal of the Lichfield Theological College, are entitled Dissent in its relation to the Church of England. They comprise an admirable and very trustworthy account of the Independents, the Romanists, the Baptists, the Quakers, the Unitarians, and the Wesleysans.

HERETICS. The "one faith" [Eph. iv. 5] was given "once for all" [ἀπαξ, Jude 3] by the Apostles from the momentary Voice of God the Father [Luke iii. 22, ix. 35], the long continued instruction by word and act of God the Son [John xiv. 25, xvi. 33, xx. 31], and the abiding inspiration of God the Holy Ghost [John xiv. 26, xvi. 13; Acts ii. 3, 4]. The faith thus delivered by the Apostles as the messengers of God was gradually formulated into a few principal propositions (as particular doctrines were successively called in question), by the collected representatives of the Church, until a Standard of Faith was completed in the Nicene Creed, comprising those truths which all hang together in such an unity that one link of the chain cannot be taken away without injury to the whole chain.

Heretics are, therefore, those who break the "one faith" by making a selection [ἀίρεσις] of some parts of it for acceptance and belief and of others for rejection and disbelief.

That heresies would arise in the Church was predicted by our Lord in the parable of the tares which were sown among the wheat: and from

His use of the word "enemy" [Matt. xiii. 25] He seems to direct us to consider them as originating with that Sower of division who originally separated man from God, and broke up the first human family by the suggestion of crime. But Christianity was almost necessarily reacted upon by Judaism, and by the Greek and Oriental philosophy with which it came into contact; and such reaction may be considered as the first sowing of the tares. The early forms of opposition to Christianity, therefore, the denial of the facts which lay at the foundation of its principles, soon passed into a perversion of those facts, and this again into misleading interpretations of the principles themselves.

All heresy, moreover, may be described as an answer more or less false to the question, "What think ye of Christ; whose Son is He?" for as the germ of the whole faith was contained in its first Divine proclamation from heaven, "Thou art My Beloved Son," so the correlation of all parts of the Creed is such that every form of heresy may be traced to some misbelief respecting the Incarnate Person of the Blessed Trinity. The earliest heretics, consequently, after those who actually denied the Incarnation or the Resurrection, were those who endeavoured to depreciate the glory of Christ, by setting themselves up as rival claimants to a Divine mission.

In SIMON MAGUS, MENANDER, and DOSITHEUS, we thus see a type of the earliest heretics as distinguished from the open antagonists of Christianity. Simon Magus, born a Samaritan (as were the other two also), but educated in Egypt, probably in Alexandria, where he became imbued with Oriental philosophy, represented that he was "the great power of God," not denying the Divine Nature of Christ, but claiming for himself a still nearer place to the Godhead, the Father to Samaritans, the Son to Jews, the Holy Ghost to Gentiles, come as the true redeemer of the human race. Menander and Dositheus appear in a similar manner to have assumed the character of redeemers, although very little else is known about them. Such were, therefore, the very type of the "false Christs" predicted by our Lord, who tried to suppress the religion of the true One by presenting themselves in some similar relation to Christ as that which the Egyptian magicians assumed towards Moses.

The next development of heresy is represented by CERINTHUS and the DOCTÆ, who methodized into a pseudo-philosophical system that which in Simon Magus was nothing but a crude, though supernatural, imposture. Cerinthus maintained that the Incarnate Son of God was at first a mere human child, brought into being as other children; that when he grew up to manhood, Christ came in the form of a dove and settled on Jesus; to be united to His natural person until the Crucifixion, when the Christ departed and Jesus alone, as a mere natural man, suffered and died. To this impious theory the Docetæ added that the body which was crucified was the mere δόκησις, or appearance of a body, a phantom which seemed to suffer and seemed to die, but which had no substantial existence. Against this attempt to rationalize a mystery, St. John opposed arguments of more truly reasonable a character, drawn from practical knowledge and experience, "That which was from the beginning, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled. . . . That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you" [1 John i. 1, 3.]

The more subtle reaction of Oriental philosophy on Christianity began with the Gnostics, of whom Cerinthus was indeed the precursor. They began to speculate on the moral phase of religion, and passed on from thence to its doctrine. The world is not all good as God is: how did evil come there? The explanation of this, and the consequences following from that explanation were their γνώσις, a knowledge of things Divine which they alone possessed, and which constituted them the true "knowers" of truth, or "Gnostics." But this γνώσις was a mere adaptation of Christianity to old Persian speculations (little better than the poetical mythology of the Greeks), in which Ormuzd figured as the First Cause of a Kingdom of Light and Good, while Ahriman was the First Cause of a kingdom of Darkness and Evil. There was no history in these speculations, but mere imagination; and the Christianity whose history was so recent as almost to belong to that generation was treated as if it had little or no connection with facts, and almost as if it, like the Persian dualism, was an ideal system evolved out of some philosopher's brain. Thus the dualistic philosophy and the Christian history were fused into a clumsy amalgam, of which these were the component parts. [1] God was never manifested to the world until Christ came. [2] Everything material belonging to the kingdom of evil, the material world cannot be a creation of the good God. [3] But all created things came into being by a process of emanation from God, those emanations proceeding more directly from Him being nearest to Him in spirituality and goodness, and those emanating indirectly through previous emanations gradually deteriorating until material and evil things came into existence at a vast distance from the "Pleroma," or Fulness of the Divine Nature. [4] That Christ was one of the inferior beings, sent into the world to give the true γνώσις or knowledge of things Divine. [5] That He descended on the man Jesus at His baptism, as held by the Docetæ. [6] That after death, the soul is absorbed into God, and the body, being material and evil, has no future existence.

All these blasphemous theories are plainly part of the chain which Cerinthus and his predecessors began to forge: and in the third century they culminated in the heresy of the MANICHEANS. Manes, the originator of this heresy, who claimed to be the Comforter promised by Christ, took up the dualistic notions of his predecessors, and carried to its extremest length their heretical principle that everything material is essentially evil. He represented this world as the battlefield of the two opposite kingdoms, and each particular man as an epitome of the world itself, in whom matter and spirit are continually struggling for supremacy. On these principles was founded a severe austerity, the object of which was to emancipate the spirit of man from the power of his material body, but which became the root of fanaticism and Antinomianism in subsequent times. For there was a singular vitality in Manicheism, and though apparently suppressed in the fourth century, it crops up in every direction, even in the middle ages, among those numerous anti-sacerdotal sects which sprung from the Paulicians, and which, under cover of professed superiority to Church ordinances, veiled profligacies that made them hateful to Church and State alike.

These flagrant and broad lines of heresy were followed by a more subtle class, in which the two natures of Christ as God on the one hand, or as Man on the other, were made the subject of assault, doubt, and misbelief. These all grafted themselves on the original fundamental denial that He was anything more than man, a denial that underlay the systems of preceding heresies, and originated with the unbelieving Jews.

The SABELLIANS, the earliest of these heretics, built their heresy upon the opinion of PRAXEAS, that "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost" were but three names for one Person; Sabellius originating the more subtle notion that these names indicate three properties or capacities of one Person. This rejection of the doctrine of the Trinity was, in reality, the form in which the Divine Nature of our Lord was repudiated, the Word of God being considered to be not a distinct Person in the Godhead, but only one of its properties.

The Sabellian heresy failed to account for the historical wonder of Christ's life. The SAMOSATANIANs, therefore, followers of Paul, Bishop of Samosata, while still accepting the doctrine of the Trinity only in the Sabellian sense, admitted a certain supernatural connection between God and Christ; maintaining that Jesus was a man only, though miraculously conceived, but that being supernaturally favoured he grew up to a sinless manhood, and then received that property of the Divine Nature called the Word and Wisdom of God in such a manner as to be clothed with it though not being it. Thus Christ was represented as a deified man, and as such received a certain amount of worship, but He was not adored as God.

Out of such opinions arose those of the ARIANS. Their founder, Arius, followed in the track of former heretics, and kept up the succession which is to be traced through Paul of Samosata, Sabellius, Praxeas, the Gnostics, the Docetæ, and Cerinthus, back to the Apostolic age itself. But as the last general persecution of Christians was the most severe trial which the Church had to undergo from brute force, so the heresy of Arius was its most severe intellectual trial in those early ages. The substance of the Arian heresy stated in a few words is: That the Second Person in the Holy Trinity is not God in the same sense as the First, or in any true sense, for the Second Person is not eternal, and there was, therefore, a time when God the Father existed, but the Son of God did not exist. Like all preceding heresies it was thus a consistent part of the enduring opposition which from the first had been made to the Incarnation, that is to the union of Perfect God with Perfect man.

Subsequent heresies that have arisen in the Church have, to a very large extent, been developed out of Arianism. Thus the MACEDONIANS found it a natural consequence of that heresy to deny the Godhead of the Third Person in the Holy Trinity; the NESTORIANS to deny that the Mother of Jesus was the Mother of One who was God as well as man from the time when He began to be incarnate by taking of her substance; the EUTYCHIANs to deny the Incarnation altogether, maintaining that Christ was God alone. In a similar manner the Unitarianism and Socinianism of the Reformation period embodied the misbelief of the Arianism of a thousand years' earlier date; and modern Rationalism, as represented by Strauss' or Rénan's Life of Jesus, continue the attack upon the great central dogma of Christianity.

But our Lord Himself predicted that the tares should grow with the wheat until the harvest, and the race of heretics cannot be expected to become extinct, though the capacity for inventing quite novel heresies seems long since to have been exhausted. The truths that were proved and the errors that were confuted twelve or fourteen hundred years ago, have to be proved and refuted over and over again through the ignorance and perverseness of those who are seduced by the pleasures of controversy, and the pages of the present volume bear witness to the multitudinous variety of forms in which a few main lines of heresy can be moulded. By providing materials for comparative heresiology it will also contribute towards an exhibition of the intellectual weakness which in reality pervades heresy in general, for, in the words of St. Jerome, "Hæreses suam ad originem revocasse, refutasse est."

HERMIANS. [HERMIONITES.]

HERMIONITES. [SELEUCIANS.]

HERMOGENES. In the last of St. Paul's writings he records that "all they which are in Asia" had turned away from him, and he particularly specifies Phygellus and Hermogenes [2 Tim. i. 15]. His words do not necessarily convict them of heresy, but Tertullian speaks of them as among those who denied the resurrection of the body [Tertull. de Resurr. Carn. xxiv.], and Epiphanius classes them with Cerinthus, Ebion, and others, as heretics who denied our Lord's Divine Nature and His miraculous conception [Epiphan. Hæres. li. 6]. This is all that is known respecting Hermogenes, unless a legend under the name of Abdias is taken into account, which states that he had been a magician, and was converted by St. James the Greater. [Fabricius, Cod. Apocr. IV. i. p. 517.]

HERMOGENIANS. A school of very early Christian Materialists who took their name and their tenets from Hermogenes about A.D. 170.

This heretic is known to us almost entirely from a chapter of Hippolytus [Refut. viii. 10], and from Tertullian's tract, Adversus Hermogenem. Philaster and Augustine name him in their respective articles on Sabellius. Irenæus and Epiphanius do not notice him at all. Theodoret's summary is probably second-hand [Hæc. fab. i. 19], but it mentions one particular not given by Hippolytus or Tertullian.

Hermogenes asserted in the first place the eternity of a subject-matter out of which the world was made. Lardner remarks, "I do not see that Hermogenes argued so much from the impossibility of God's making the world out of nothing, as from the unfitness of it. If the world has been made out of nothing, he feared that the evil therein must be ascribed to the will of God, which would have been a reflection on His goodness. But matter, out of which the world was made, being inherently evil, he supposed that he thereby vindicated the Divine goodness" [Lardner's Works, viii. 583, ed. 1861]. This remark is based upon Tertullian's second chapter, in which Hermogenes is represented as arguing thus: The Lord made all things either out of Himself, or out of nothing, or out of something; not out of Himself, for then He would be dissoluble into parts; not out of nothing, for then all things would have been made good, as good as the Maker Himself is good; therefore out of something, coeval with Himself, but in itself faulty. This argument proceeds, not on the supposition of a physical impossibility of an act of creation, but on the supposition of an inherency of evil in all matter. On which supposition "unfitness" and "impossibility," when used with regard to Almighty God, become synonymous terms.

Hippolytus and Theodoret state that Hermogenes held simply the impossibility of a creation out of nothing. Tertullian says that the doctrine of an eternal subject-matter was learnt from the Stoics. He represents Hermogenes as deserting Christianity for the old philosophy. Hippolytus says that Hermogenes unconsciously followed the Platonists.

Hermogenes' second argument was this: There never was a time when the title of "Dominus" did not belong to God; but that title is relative, it implies the existence of something over which God was Lord; that something was matter. Tertullian denies the major of the syllogism.

To the main argument brought against Hermogenes, that by attributing eternity to matter he invested it with the attributes of Deity, and thereby introduced two Gods, he is represented as replying that in his system the prerogative of the Almighty, as the Author of all things, is preserved. Tertullian's rejoinder is an attempt to shew that according to Hermogenes' principles matter must be also the author of all things (auctrix omnium). It is not told in what manner and in what terms the distinction between the eternity of matter and the eternity of God was made. The course of Tertullian's remarks leads us to think that Hermogenes considered the existence of matter to be a necessary result of the eternal self-existence of God; and matter therefore to be eternal, not in itself as if it were self-existing, but by consequence.¹ Such a notion it is true involves greater difficulties than those the theory is intended to remove; but it usually happens that a heresy adopted to remove difficulties only plunges its author into greater difficulties.

I. This eternal matter was said to be partly corporeal, and partly incorporeal; and we are told that by the incorporeal part was meant its unregulated motion (inconditus motus) [adv. Herm. ch. xxxvi.]. One cannot think that Hermogenes made the absurd assertion that motion is a substance, however incorporeal; it may be supposed that he asserted some active principle, styled an incorporeal substance, some principle of nascent life, combined with matter, causing and manifesting itself in motion. His homely illustration, mentioned both by Hippolytus and Tertullian, is that of a seething-pot. According to Hippolytus, he described the formation of the world as follows:—"When matter was continually moving in a rude and disorderly manner, God reduced it into order by the following expedient. As He gazed upon matter in a seething condition, like the contents of a pot when a fire is burning underneath, He effected a partial separation. And taking one portion from the whole He subdued it; but another portion He allowed to be whirled about in a disorderly manner. What was thus subdued is the world, but that other portion remains wild, and is denominated chaotic matter" [Hippol. Refut. viii. 10, Clark's tr.].

Hermogenes' arguments, as has been already noticed, proceed on the assumption that matter is inherently evil; but on this point Tertullian charges him with ambiguity. In chapters xii. xiii., Tertullian argues on the assumption of that inherent evil; in chapter xxxvii. he says that matter is alleged to be neither good nor evil. Still, in this case, it was considered to retain "a certain blind force, a degree of inflexibility, owing to which it could not be entirely bent and conformed to the will of the Deity. Hence the evils and disorders that afflict the world" [Prof. Jeremie, in Enc. Met. xi. 159]. The tenet of the inherent evil of matter was doubtless the origin of the wild notion that our Lord in the course of His Ascension deposited His Body in the sun.² This notion is mentioned by Hippolytus and Theodoret, and is named in a fragment of Clemens Alexandrinus [iv. 49, ed. Klotz]. The same belief was held by Hermias and Seleucus of Galatia, who were probably disciples of Hermogenes [Philast. lv.; August. lix. SELEUCIANS.] The words "in the sun hath He placed his tabernacle" [Ps. xix. 4, Sept. vers.] were, Theodoret says, alleged in support of this notion, to which was added that the devil and all demons are to be related into matter.

II. From this primæval matter Hermogenes maintained that not the body only but also the soul of man was formed. "Ex materie suggestu" are the words employed to describe this second materialistic tenet [Tert. de Anima, i.]. Tertullian here refers to another tract on this special point, De censu Animæ, which is not extant, and does not dwell at length upon it in the existing tract Adversus Hermogenem. We are not told therefore precisely what Hermogenes meant by "anima." Probably he meant only the principle of animal life, derived from the incorporeal substance of his supposed original matter.³ Certainly there is no reason to say that he meant "soul and spirit," as his tenet has been represented. In ch. xxi. of the treatise De Anima Hermogenes is charged with denying the freedom of the will.

Both Hippolytus and Tertullian acknowledge the orthodoxy of Hermogenes in other respects. The former writes, "He acknowledges, however, that Christ is the Son of God, who created all things, and he confesses that He was born of a virgin and of the Spirit, according to the voice of the gospels;" the latter writes, "He does not appear to acknowledge any other Christ as Lord," but goes on to argue that holding Him in a different way, he really makes Him another being.

The work of Theophilus of Antioch against "the heresy of Hermogenes" [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 24] is lost. Neither is there any record of a special synodical condemnation of Hermogenes. [SABELLIANS.]

HERNNUHUTTERS. [MORAVIANS.]

HESYCHASTS [ἡσυχία, stillness]. A school of Greek Quietists which sprung up among the monks of Mount Athos in the middle of the fourteenth century. They were also called ὀμφαλόφυχοι, or "Umbilicani," from the strange mystical opinion which they held that the illumination of his soul was made visible to the monk who practised perfect stillness, by fixing his intent gaze upon the umbilical region of his person. The names of the Euchites and the Massalians were also revived as appellations of the Hesychasts by their opponents, and they were called "Palamites," from Palamis their leader.

The mysticism of these Greek monks appears to have been founded on that of Dionysius, the author of the "Celestial Hierarchy" and "Mystical Theology," whose works were extensively read during the middle ages, and from being uncritically assigned to Dionysius the Areopagite, were considered to possess an almost apostolical authority. The well-known Light theory of Dionysius was adopted by the Hesychasts in the form of these three propositions: [1] That God dwells in an eternal Light, and that although His Person is never seen, this Divine Light sometimes becomes visible to His saints on earth, as at the Transfiguration: [2] That this Divine Light is the activity of God, as distinguished from His Person: [3] That it operates in men by illuminating the soul from within, in the case of those who practise intense abstraction and self-renunciation (ἀπαθεία), and that it may become visible to those who possess it. Dionysius had written in his third chapter that prayer "is a chain of light let down from the height of heaven and reaching to earth; and, as we grasp it, first with the one hand and then with the other, we seem to draw it to us, while really we are raised by it to the loftier splendour of the light;" and the Hesychast notion seems to have been a perversion of Dionysius' spiritual perception into a sensuous perception.

¹ Certainly, although Hermogenes considered matter as coeval with the Deity, he nevertheless maintained that the Deity had from all eternity ruled over it. [See Mosheim, de Rebus Christ. ii. p. 368, Vidal's tr.]

² From the silence of Tertullian as to this singular opinion Mosheim argues, notwithstanding Theodoret's authority, that the Hermogenes referred to by Clement is not the Hermogenes of Tertullian. Hippolytus' testimony settles the point against Mosheim. The passage in Clement is from the Eclogæ ex Prophetis. [See Routh, Rel. Sac. i. 378.]

In the year 1337, the Hesychasts were brought into controversy with Barlaam, Abbot of the Basilian monastery of St. Saviour's at Constantinople. He was a native of Calabria, and to his Western mind the Eastern mysticism was a fanatical heresy. He carried on the controversy for four years, his opponent being Gregory Palamas, the intellectual leader of the Hesychasts, who was afterwards Archbishop of Thessalonica. A Constantinopolitan Council of 1341 deciding in favour of the Hesychasts, Barlaam returned to the Latin Church and became Bishop of Gierace in his native country. The controversy was afterwards revived by Acindynus, a monk also of Constantinople, who wrote a treatise De Essentia et Operatione Dei. The principal writer on the opposite side was Nicolas Cabasilas, the then Bishop of Thessalonica, in his Life of Christ, in which he put in the background the Light theory and Umbilicanism of the Hesychasts, and maintained from an intellectual standpoint the principle that there is an incommunicable essence in the Divine Nature, and also a communicable property of that Nature, the latter being the operating power of Christian perfection. This theory was applied especially by Cabasilas to the operation of the Sacraments, associating the spiritual life of the Christian with the life-giving Light proceeding from the Person of Christ. In doing so he seems to have lost sight of the very questionable, if not heretical, proposition of the Hesychasts respecting the Nature of God, and to have passed onward to such a development of Sacramental theology as that founded on Hooker's well-known statement that Sacraments are an extension of the Incarnation.

The Hesychast controversy was but of a few years' duration, closing with the work of Cabasilas; the mystics of Mount Athos being dispersed in the troubles of the waning Empire. [Natal. Alex. Hist. Eccl. viii. 90, ed. 1762.

Dorner's Person of Christ, II. i. 236, Clark's transl.]

HETEROUSIANS. A name given to the extreme Arians, who maintained in its broadest form the heresy that the essence of the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity was different from that of the First Person (ἑτεροούσιος). The more commonly used name was that of ANOMŒANS.

HETHERINGTONIANS. A sect of London Familists, whose distinctive tenet was (like that of the Grindletonians in the North of England) a repudiation of the observance of the Lord's Day. Hetherington did penance at Paul's Cross on February 11th, 1627, when Dr. Stephen Denison, Rector of St. Catharine Cree, preached a sermon, afterwards published under the title of The White Wolf, and containing some interesting notices of contemporary Puritanism.

HICKSITES. The principal section of the American Quakers. They are so called from Elias Hicks of Philadelphia, who endeavoured, in the year 1827, to revive what he considered to be the original tenets and practices of George Fox and the earlier members of his sect. This revival, however, is on the Rationalist side rather than the Quietist side of Quakerism. For the Hicksites repudiate altogether the doctrines of the Trinity and the Atonement; and their view of the "light within" reduces it to mere natural conscience, by following the dictates of which alone they consider that men will gain salvation. The Hicksites are not recognised by the English Quakers; and the older section of the American Quakers consider them to have openly denied the fundamental principles of Christianity. They are, however, by far the most numerous section of the Quakers in America.

HIËL. Under this name, which means "salvation," some mystical books were published in the latter half of the sixteenth century, by a fanatical Dutch writer whose real name was Hendrik Jansen. Translations into German were printed as late as between 1680 and 1690; and English translations of several of them, made in that century, exist in MS. in the Bodleian Library, and probably elsewhere. Some account of Jansen's writings is given in vol. iii. of Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie. He is erroneously identified by Adelung, in his Supplement to Jöcher's Allg. Gelehrten-Lexicon, with Fred. Breckling, a voluminous German writer of similar books of mystical fanaticism, who died in 1711. Of the latter a very full account is given in Möller's Cimbria Literata.

HIERACITES. Hierax, the leader of this school, was of Leontium in Egypt, and flourished in the beginning of the fourth century. He was confessedly a man of great ability and learning, and of unblameable life. His followers were chiefly gathered from the Egyptian monks, who were attracted by his ascetic teaching; but he himself was neither monk nor priest.

Hierax is placed by Epiphanius [Hær. lxvii.] immediately after Manichæus, and some have therefore inferred that he was of the Manichæan school. But Epiphanius attributes to him none of the peculiar tenets of that school. There is late authority indeed, that of Photinus and Peter of Sicily in the ninth century, for calling Hierax a Manichee.¹ This evidence however cannot outweigh the statement of doctrines made by Epiphanius. In two particulars, Epiphanius refers the doctrine he names to Origen: and Hierax' "allegorical interpretation, his rejection of the resurrection of the body, and of sensual notions of a future life, as also his disapprobation of marriage, and of the use of flesh and wine, point rather to a maintenance of Origenist principles carried out to extremes, than to a Manichæan origin" [Gieseler, Comp. i. p. 246]. But with regard to the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, Epiphanius expressly states that Hierax did not hold with Origen, that he rather held that the Son is truly begotten of the Father, and that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father. Against this testimony to Hierax' orthodoxy in the first article of our faith is the charge of Arius, who, in his letter to Alexander, declaring his own belief in a true generation of the Son, denies several heresies, and among them ὡς Ἰεράκας λύχρον ἀπὸ λύχρου, ἢ ὡς λαμπάδα εἰς δύο [Epiph. Hær. lxi. cap. 7]. The former illustration of fire kindled from fire, however weak, may be used, and was used by Catholic Fathers. The illustration of a lamp with two wicks, fed with the same oil, points rather, if it be pressed, to a much later heresy, condemned at the fourth Lateran Council, the heresy which taught that there is a distinct substance or common essence from which the Three Persons of the Trinity derived their being, so that in reality the Trinity became a Quaternity. It cannot be thought, in opposition to Epiphanius' testimony, that Hierax held this tenet. The illustration may have been unadvisedly used, or it may have been misrepresented. The errors ascribed by Epiphanius to Hierax, stated also by Augustine [Hær. xlvii.] and in Prædestinatus [xlvi.] are—

I. The denial of the resurrection of the body. This, it is said, seems to be borrowed from Origen; and it may be doubted whether it arises from anything more than an assertion of the spiritual body [1 Cor. xv. 44].

II. The denial of a visible Paradise. This also is said to be an error of Origen's. Few will now dispute Augustine's dictum, that the argument concerning the place to which God translated Enoch and Elias does not touch Christian faith² [de Peccato Orig. ii. 23].

¹ Fabricius and Beausobre reckon Hierax among Manichees. Mosheim, Lardner and Gieseler deny that he was so. [See Lardner, Credib. chap. lxiii. sec. 7.]

² That the denial of a visible paradise is mentioned as a grave error in Hierax, as it is mentioned also in the case of the Seleucians, shews that much stress was laid on the point in the early Church. Irenæus writes [adv. Hær. v. 2]: "Where, then, was the first man placed? In Paradise, certainly. . . Wherefore, also, the elders who were disciples of the Apostles tell us that those who were translated were transferred to that place (for Paradise has been prepared for righteous men, such as have the Spirit; in which place also Paul the Apostle, when he was caught up, heard words which are unspeakable as regards us in our present condition), and that

III. The assertion that Melchizedech was the Third Person of the Holy Trinity. This is doubtless heretical. [MELCHIZEDECIANS.] Hierax supported this notion by appealing to an apocryphal book called Anabaticon, the Ascension of Isaiah.

IV. The assertion that infants cannot inherit the kingdom of God. This was grounded on an argument from the words, that a man is not crowned except he strive lawfully; in which by a fallacy, the state of those who do not strive lawfully is attributed to those whom God has not called to strive at all. The error is connected with the hyperascetic errors which follow.

V. On the ground that Christ requires a higher righteousness than Moses, and that there is no other way in which such higher righteousness can be exhibited than in mortification of the body, Hierax taught that marriage, and the use of meats and wine, were inconsistent with Gospel perfection. He wished to admit to Church communion only monks, nuns, and the unmarried. The author of Prædestinatus tells that a controversy with Hierax was undertaken by Aphrodisius, Bishop of the Hellespont, of whom nothing is known. Hierax lived to the age it is said of ninety years, and strictly observed his own rule. His followers do not appear to have formed themselves into a separate sect.

HIERARCHITÆ. [HIERACITES.]

HIGH CHURCHMEN. Those lay and clerical members of the Church of England who exalt the authority of the Church, as being derived from Christ and His Apostles, and give prominence to the sacerdotal aspect of the ministerial office.

The name first came into use in the early years of the eighteenth century, a writer of 1705 speaking of it as being then quite novel. "By whom," he writes, "this distinction has been set up my narrow sphere of intelligence will not reach to inform me" [The Distinction of High Church and Low Church, &c.]; but the term had been freely used in pamphlets of the preceding year. It was at first applied to that party in the Church which, on the accession of Queen Anne, supported the there shall they who have been translated remain until the consummation, as a prelude to immortality" [Tr. in Ante-Nic. Lib.]. Here paradise is the paradise of the intermediate state. But in the end of the same book, Paradise appears as the earth during the period of the Millennium. At the first resurrection of the just, some are admitted to Heaven, some enjoy the delights of Paradise, some possess the beauty of the city [chap. xxxvi. sect. 2, compared with sect. 3]. The two descriptions harmonize. The paradise of the intermediate state was thought to be the original paradise of Adam, still existing on earth, and to be extended over the whole earth at the first resurrection. The denial of a visible paradise is thus connected with the rejection of the Millennium, Origen, from whom Hierax learnt that denial, having been the first to reject the Millennium. It must be observed that a belief in the Millennium by no means presupposes or requires a belief in a visible earthly paradise now existing; or rather that the true doctrine of the Millennium is only enumbered by the unfounded notion. It may well be that the early Fathers were led to their belief in a visible paradise from opposition to the Rabbinical conceits on the subject adopted by the Gnostics. [See Harvey's note on Iren. v. 5, 1, and i. 30, 8; vol. i. p. 235, ii. p. 331. See also Routh, Reliq. Sac. iv. p. 66.]

direct succession of the Stuarts as of divine right, and opposed the settlement of the crown on the Hanoverian dynasty. During the Sacheverell disturbances [A.D. 1709-1713] it acquired a still narrower political sense; and at the end of the last century it had come to be a half political half ecclesiastical nickname for those orthodox clergy (of a rather chilly school of orthodoxy) who discountenanced alike Whiggery, Methodism, and Calvinism. Since the revival of theological principles and ritual practices, the term has been generally used to designate those who adopt them, the political meaning of it having entirely passed out of use.

It is customary, for the rough-and-ready purposes of popular literature, to fix upon some particular names as the founders of the High Church party, according to the phase of controversy which happens to be uppermost in the popular view, and the particular person of that party who happens to be most prominently associated with it. But, in reality, the Christian Church has always had parties within its walls, from the days when orthodox Christians who held a common faith said, "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ" [1 Cor. i. 12], to the days when they began to be divided into "High" Churchmen and "Low" Churchmen. There have always, in fact, been a Petrine and a Pauline school of Christianity, the one magnifying the sacrificial work of the Church under the traditional shadow of the Apostle who especially pointed out Christ's pastoral relation to His people [1 Pet. ii. 25]; the other magnifying the pastoral work of the Church under the patronage of the Apostle who especially taught its sacerdotal relation to Christ [Heb. v.—x.]. These are, however, but the golden and the silver sides of the same "shield of faith," and it is only impatience, intellectual intolerance, and deficiency of love, which have divided into parties those who gazed on different aspects of one truth as if they had looked on two doctrines which were opposed to each other in their essential character, and could not both be truths. It may also be added that it is only the comprehensive bond of true faith which can so hold together even intolerant, impatient, and unloving men, that such parties within an orthodox Church do not wander beyond its periphery and become sects outside of it.

The lineage of the two great parties is distinctly traceable in the Church of England during the last three centuries, as may be seen by placing some few of the more conspicuous names at various periods opposite to each other.

The continuity of these two leading schools in the Church of England having been thus exhibited, the history of the High Church school may be best shewn by a sketch of its course through each of the four periods indicated, from the Reformation epoch, which began in the earlier half of the sixteenth century, to that development of the theological and ritual phases of High Churchmanship which has been so conspicuous in the middle of the nineteenth.

I. High Churchmen of the Reformation period. The controversies which reached their climax during the reigns of the Tudors divided Englishmen into three parties, the Mediævalists, who took the authority of Rome as the key of their position; the Puritans, who desired to supplant the ancient theology and ritual of the Church of England by a Calvinistic system of Presbyterianism; and the Reformers, in the exact sense of the word, who endeavoured so to re-form the Church of England as to clear it from mere mediæval and foreign accretions, so to preserve its Catholic position, that it should still remain the true Church of England, and so to adapt its customs to the altered condition of society, that it should continue to be the Church of the people. The third of these parties were the High Churchmen of the Reformation, allied with the Roman party, on the one hand, in their anxiety to preserve the Episcopal system; and with the Puritan party, on the other hand, in their determination to get rid of Ultramontaniam from our theological and devotional standards.

The abiding monuments of this party are the Book of Common Prayer and the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion. Both of these were, indeed, modified to a considerable extent through the influence of the Puritans; but even after these changes they continued to represent, in the main, the principles of the High Church Reformers, and attempts to impose an opposite sense upon them have never been permanently successful. Another admirable monument of the school is the "Ecclesiastical Polity" of one of its most obscure members, the great Hooker.

II. High Churchmen of the seventeenth century. The controversies of the Reformation period were handed down to the next century, but the Roman party had left the Church of England and formed a sect outside of its borders in the year 1570 [ROMAN CATHOLICS], while the extreme Puritans were also gradually forming sects of Baptists, Independents, and Presbyterians. There still remained, however, a very distinct division of High Churchmen and Low Churchmen, the latter being the parents of the Nonconformists, who were expelled from their benefices because their anti-sacerdotal principles would not allow them to receive holy orders in 1662. [NONCONFORMISTS.]

In the earlier part of the seventeenth century the devotional spirit was very strongly developed among High Churchmen: being carried on also, in a remarkable degree, into the next century. This development gave rise to the production of several books of private prayers, in which the theological framework of practical devotion was much more accurately articulated than in the loose and verbose rhetoric which went for prayer among the Puritans. Such were the private devotions of Bishop Andrewes, Archbishop Laud, and Bishop Cosin. From the same cause a ritual movement arose among High Churchmen, who endeavoured, by restoring the Lord's Table to the east end of the chancel, and placing it "altar-wise" instead of "table-wise," to bring about a more reverent recognition of Divine Service as an act of worship towards God, and not a mere act of preaching, and of precatory forms said before the congregation. To the same time may be traced the education of a school of independent theologians such as Bishop Pearson, Bishop Bull, Archbishop Bramhall, Bishop Beveridge, Dean Jackson, Bishop Sanderson, Bishop Barrow, Thorndike, and Hammond.

In this century High Churchmen had to defend the principles of the Reformation against the Puritans and the Roman Catholics at the cost of great sufferings. The life of Archbishop Laud was sacrificed to the Puritans, and a generation later seven bishops were sent to prison for making a stand against those encroachments of Popery which the Nonconformists were abetting under James II. During the Great Rebellion few escaped loss of property, and many were persecuted even to the loss of their lives. It was the same school of Churchmen which furnished the ranks of the Nonjurors—eight bishops, including the Primate and several of those who had been foremost in the defence of the Church during the late reign, with about four hundred of the clergy [Hallam's Const. Hist. iii. 148]—among whom were such holy men as Archbishop Sancroft, Bishop Ken, and Kettlewell. [NONJURORS.]

For the restoration of the Prayer Book in 1661, and its preservation from Presbyterian adulteration in 1689, later generations are also indebted to the High Churchmen of the seventeenth century. The Prayer Book Annotations and Commentaries of Andrewes, Cosin, L'Estrange, Sparrow, and Comber, shew how faithful the divines of this century were to the traditions of the Reformation; while Bishop Pearson's Commentary on the Apostles' Creed—a work of the highest theological rank—contributed greatly to the maintenance of orthodoxy when the dangerous errors of Arianism were being revived.

Two great monuments of the practical work originated by the High Church laity and clergy at the end of the seventeenth century still remain in the Societies for Promoting Christian Knowledge at home and for the Propagation of the Gospel abroad.

III. High Churchmen of the eighteenth century. The Revolution of 1688, and the following expulsion of the Nonjuring bishops and clergy, placed the most influential positions of the Church of England in the hands of the Latitudinarians, and tended greatly to suppress the school of orthodox theology and earnest devotion which had arisen under the guidance of the divines referred to in the preceding section. A similar result was produced by the cold shade of philosophical scepticism which pervaded society, and by the demoralized condition of the latter under the first two Hanoverian sovereigns. High Churchmanship too generally assumed a political aspect, and always lay under the cloud of disloyalty to the de facto sovereigns and of a desire to see them supplanted by the exiled Stuarts, so that "High Churchman" and "Jacobite" became synonymous to the popular mind [Matthew Tindall's Jacobitism, Perjury, and Popery of High Church Priests, 1710]. There were, however, many literary men of the party who were never, like Dean Swift and Bishop Sprat, swallowed up in the political whirlpool, and whose works are among the greatest treasures of an ecclesiastical library. Bishop Butler's Analogy provided the Church with a keen and nearly irresistible philosophical weapon against the unbelief of the age; while almost equally good service was done for logical minds by Paley's work on the Evidences of Christianity.

Vast accumulations of material for Church history were made in the works of the great canonists, Johnson, Bishop Gibson, and Wilkins, in a work which has commanded as much respect among foreign as among English theologians, the Origines Ecclesiasticæ of Bingham, in the Fæsti Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ of Le Neve, and in the most laborious works of Strype on Reformation History. Among the more distinctly theological works of the party during the eighteenth century are Hickeys' Treatises on the Christian Priesthood and the Episcopal Order, Wall's great History of Infant Baptism, and Waterland's controversial treatises against the Arians of his day. Many valuable works on Holy Scripture were the production of the same school in this century, such as Dean Prideaux's Connection of the Old and New Testament, with Shuckford's Continuation, Bishop Lowth's Commentary on Isaiah, and Bishop Horne's Commentary on the Psalms. The Prayer Book was also well illustrated by Wheatley, in a volume which continued to be the standard work on the subject for more than a century.

IV. High Churchmen of the nineteenth century. The literary phase of the High Churchmanship of the eighteenth century left its legacy to the nineteenth in the shape of a scholarly class of divines, who held ignorance and ignorant enthusiasm in great abhorrence, and who were very often designated—though often most unjustly as to the latter of the two epithets—"high and dry." They were mostly unobtrusive men, of refined culture, strongly opposed to changes in the Church, and better adapted for filling quiet positions as dignitaries than for keeping pace with the world's progress in good or evil, as leaders in the one or combatants of the other. A strong intellectual influence was, however, ripening in the midst of this quiet school, the type of which may be traced in such men as Alexander Knox, Bishop Jebb, Wordsworth, Dr. Routh, Bishop Van Mildert, and John Miller.¹ It was by such an influence that this "old school" of High Churchmen (best represented perhaps by Dr. Routh, President of Magdalen College, who died, when more than ninety-nine years of age, in the year 1854) were training up another generation whose practical work made the name of "High Churchmen" more conspicuous than it had ever been before.

THE TRACTARIANS. The development of this new school of High Churchmen was, however, the ecclesiastical result of political circumstances in the first instance, rather than of any design founded in ecclesiastical learning.

At the time of the Reform Bill agitation, the Reform politicians exhibited great indignation against the clergy on account of the conservative principles which were manifested by their leaders, and especially by the twenty-one bishops whose votes were supposed to have thrown out the Bill in 1831. The course taken is indicated by the well-known admonition of the dictatorial Lord Grey to the bishops "to set their house in order," by frequent appeals of the Times newspaper, such as "Will no question occur to the people of England touching my lords the bishops? Will nobody ask what business have they in Parliament at all?" [Times, October 10th, 1831], and by the motions which were made in the House of Commons at the time for the expulsion of the bishops from Parliament. At the same time, the Dissenters began to organize their discordant sects into a united opposition to the Church. "The whole machinery of popular agitation was put in motion, and it appeared that English Dissent was at last organized for the overthrow of the Church Establishment" [Skeats' Hist. of the Free Churches of Eng. 589]. First one, and then (on its failure) another, society was formed to carry on this work of opposition, and no means were left untried for the accomplishment of the unchristian object in view.² By the assistance of O'Connell and the Roman Catholics, these efforts were so far successful, that in the year

1833 ten of the Irish bishoprics were abolished, and it was in contemplation to suppress others also. This course of events created general alarm among the members of the Church of England, and, in the absence of any special organization for its defence, there seemed little prospect of averting further assaults.

It was as the religious result of this crisis that the Tractarian party originated. The real founder of the party was a distinguished High Church divine, who had long been labouring with his pen towards the accomplishment of that revival which his failing health and early death threw into the hands of others. This was Hugh James Rose, editor of the British Magazine, and subsequently Professor of Theology at Durham, Principal of King's College, London, and Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury. He was consulted in July 1833 by Arthur Perceval, Hurrel Froude of Oriel, and William Palmer of Worcester College, with reference to a movement projected by them for stemming the tide of destruction which seemed to be flowing over the Church, and after a week's conference of this small party at Hadleigh, it was agreed that an united effort should be attempted among High Churchmen in behalf of two points, the maintenance of the doctrine of Apostolical Succession, and the preservation of the Prayer Book from Socinian adulterations. When the subsequent intellectual leader of the party, John Henry Newman, returned from his long vacation tour on the Continent, he also took part in the Oriel conferences; and they were occasionally joined in by Keble, whose Christian Year had already made him famous as a reviver of devotional Churchmanship. The first measure taken in consequence of these consultations was an attempt to form an "Association of Friends of the Church," of which the objects were to be these: "[1] To maintain pure and inviolate the doctrines, the services, and the discipline of the Church; that is, to withstand all change which involves the denial and suppression of doctrine, a departure from primitive practice in religious offices, or innovation upon the apostolic prerogatives, order, and commission of bishops, priests, and deacons. [2] To afford Churchmen an opportunity of exchanging their sentiments, and co-operating together on a large scale." This plan, however, failed through discouragement by the bishops, and only a few country associations were formed on the principles proposed.

But although no such general agitation was permitted as had been contemplated, the feelings of Churchmen had been thoroughly aroused by the course taken in Parliament and elsewhere, and both clergy and laity spoke out in a manner that shewed how great was their latent strength. In February 1834, an address was presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury signed by 7000 clergy, in which anything like reckless change was deprecated, but a promise given of "cheerful co-operation and dutiful support" in any measure that would "tend to revive the discipline of ancient times, to strengthen the connection between the bishops, clergy, and people, and to promote the purity, the efficiency, and the unity of the Church." A similar address was signed by 230,000 lay heads of families, declaring their determination to uphold the Church with all their power. In May of the same year, King William IV. made a birthday speech to the bishops, in which he also declared his firm determination to uphold the Church, and added with emphasis, "I have spoken more strongly than usual, because of unhappy circumstances that have forced themselves upon the observation of all. The threats of those who are enemies of the Church make it the more necessary for those who feel their duty to that Church to speak out. The words which you hear are indeed spoken by my mouth, but they flow from my heart" [Perceval's Collection of Papers, 1842; Palmer's Narrative of Events, 1843]. There was then a general arousing of Churchmen. Meetings were held throughout the country to organize for defence of the Church in opposition to those who were seeking its destruction; and when the real strength of Churchmen began to be exhibited in Parliament by the constitutional method of presenting petitions, it was found expedient to delay for the present the contemplated attacks that were to have been made.

² These Anti-Church Associations were: [1] The Protestant Society, [2] The Ecclesiastical Knowledge Society, [3] The Voluntary Church Association, [4] The Religious Freedom Society, [5] The Evangelical Voluntary Church Association, [6] The Anti-Church Association, [7] The Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control. None of these seven societies were co-existent.

The plan ultimately adopted by the "Friends of the Church" at Oxford, was that of endeavouring to influence public opinion by the publication of that series of pamphlets on Church History and Doctrine which, soon after its commencement, took the general title of Tracts for the Times. The first of these was published in 1833, the last, the famous "No. 90," in 1841. The writers of them were chiefly Newman, Froude, Pusey, and Isaac Williams. The first sixty-six of these publications consisted of extracts from Cosin, Beveridge, Wilson, and Bull, with "Records of the Church," consisting of fragments from the Ante-Nicene Fathers, and a few original tracts on the Church, the Liturgy, and similar subjects. The succeeding twenty-four tracts comprised several on a much larger scale, and of a more theological character, including Dr. Pusey's large work on Baptism, printed in 1834-5, a catena of authorities on the Apostolic Succession, a similar catena on the Eucharistic Sacrifice, with compact treatises by Keble on Tradition, by Isaac Williams on "Reserve in communicating Religious Knowledge," and by Newman on the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion. Several of them have been republished as separate works.

The last of these tracts was the most important of all. Its object was to shew that the Articles, "the offspring of an uncatholic age, are, through God's Providence, to say the least, not uncatholic, and may be subscribed by those who aim at being Catholic in heart and doctrine." This view was in reality (as Dr. Pusey shewed when reprinting this tract a quarter of a century afterwards) a necessary result of the theological knowledge which the writers of the tracts and many others of the clergy were now acquiring; and no sober-minded and well-informed person would now dream of contradicting the main point of this assertion, or the line taken in Tract 90 itself. But some of the leading tutors at Oxford were not then either sober-minded or well-informed; and four of them, Messrs. T. T. Churton, H. B. Wilson¹ (one of the writers of Essays and Reviews), John Griffiths, afterwards Warden of Wadham, and A. C. Tait, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, having represented in a letter, dated March 8th, 1841, that a mode of interpreting the Articles which was consistent with Catholic belief had a "tendency" to mitigate the differences between Roman and Anglican doctrine, the Tract was condemned by a decree of the Hebdomadal Board, signed by Dr. Wynter, the Vice-Chancellor, on March 18th, 1841. This was done in the face of an explanation printed by Newman two days before in a letter to Dr. Jelf, and without waiting for a fuller explanation which was then in the press, in which Newman stated that he did consider that "the Thirty-nine Articles do contain a condemnation of authoritative teaching of the Church of Rome, upon the very subjects upon which the 'Four Tutors' had alleged that he suggested that they do not." The heads of houses refused to grant the respite of twelve hours which Newman had asked for the publication of this explanation, knowing that it would have been impossible for them then to condemn the Tract in the terms in which they did so, "for the ground of the censure was cut away. No one can tell how much of the subsequent history of the Church of England might not have been altered had that respite of twelve hours been granted." Dr. Pusey adds, "It appears from the letter of John Keble . . . that the Heads of Houses knew that they were condemning the author of The Christian Year as well as Newman" [Pusey's Pref. to Tract xc. ed. 1865]. The names of these local officials can doubtless be exhumed from old Oxford Calendars, but the names of those whom they condemned are written in the world-wide records of ecclesiastical history, and of a nation's devotional habits.

These events ultimately led to the secession of Newman, and some of his more intimate friends and followers, from the Church of England; though he himself did not take that step until the year 1845. In that year a Fellow of Balliol College, named Ward, was censured by a vote of the University for publishing a fanciful volume called The Ideal of a Christian Church, an ideal which he and other theorizing members of the party found in their optimistic view of the Church of Rome. The clique which had censured Newman now endeavoured to include him in the censure of Ward, but the Proctors prevented this by exercising their right of veto upon the proposition, and were thanked by 554 Members of Convocation for taking this most unusual course.¹ The patience of the great High Church leader had, however, been overstretched; his leadership of the party came to a close, and he transferred his acute intellect into the ranks of the Roman Catholic sect, where he was soon—happily, perhaps, for the Church of England—as completely extinguished by authority (though by a different process) as in the University of Oxford.

Meanwhile the same party which had driven Newman out of Oxford was lying in wait for Pusey also, and in the year 1843 the Vice-Chancellor, Wynter, suspended him from his office of University Preacher for a sermon on the Holy Eucharist. This step did not drive Pusey from Oxford, or from the Church of England, and for more than thirty years afterwards he was conspicuous in both as the most learned English theologian of the age. But it considerably accelerated the fashion of "secession" which had set in, and during the next few years some hundreds of recruits were added to the ranks of the Roman Catholic dissenters; the "seceders" consisting chiefly of impressible undergraduates, young ladies, and young ladies' curates. This secession acquired a factitious importance in after years, when it was joined by Archdeacon Wilberforce, a very able theologian; Maskell, a Ritual scholar; and Archdeacon Manning (afterwards the schismatical "Archbishop of Westminster"), one of the most gifted preachers of the day. Wilberforce died shortly after his secession, and, with the exception of Newman, none of the other seceders were persons of any great theological weight either as a loss to the Church which they left or a gain to the sect which they joined.

It might have been expected that the defection of so great a leader as Newman would have broken up the High Church party and stopped the movement which it had begun. Instead of this it went on rapidly increasing in numbers and influence, and, in spite of most vigorous opposition from Low Churchmen, statesmen, newspapers, and the thoughtless multitude, it became in a very few years the dominant party in the Church of England. This result was owing, in a large degree, to the controversies which were raised on the subject of Baptism and the Holy Eucharist. For these controversies a most effective preparation had been made by the "Library of the Fathers" (commenced in the year 1838), which had attracted the attention of the clergy to Patristic Theology, and by Isaac Wilberforce's admirable work on the Incarnation (published in the year 1848), which formulated the ideas of the clergy on the subject of the Sacraments to an extent that can hardly be appreciated by a generation which has received such ideas by inheritance in their already formulated condition.

The Baptismal Controversy was brought to a crisis in 1848 by the refusal of Bishop Phillpotts to institute a clergyman named Gorham to a benefice in the diocese of Exeter, to which he had been presented by the Lord Chancellor. The litigation which followed turned substantially upon the following three questions, which were placed before Gorham in an examination to which the Bishop of Exeter thought it necessary to subject him before deciding whether or not to admit him for Institution:—"Q. V. Does our Church hold, and do you hold, that every infant baptized by a lawful minister, with water, in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is made by God in such Baptism a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven? Q. VI. Does our Church hold, and do you hold, that such children, by the laver of regeneration in Baptism, are received into the number of the children of God, and heirs of everlasting life? Q. VII. Does our Church hold, and do you hold, that all infants so baptized are born again of water and of the Holy Ghost?" It is only necessary to say respecting the answers made to these questions by the candidate for Institution, that it was to the effect that the benefits of Baptism are suspended until baptized persons shew themselves worthy to receive them; and that the Committee of Privy Council considering that it was not unlawful for a clergyman to hold such an opinion, Gorham was instituted by Archbishop Sumner in the year 1850. It is of more importance to add that the storm of controversy raised by the "Gorham case" so cleared the atmosphere of the clouds by which the subject of Baptismal Regeneration had been obscured, as practically to put an end to all discussion about it; and a later generation wonders how such a discussion could ever have arisen when the language of Holy Scripture and of the Prayer Book is now seen to be so singularly plain and dogmatic.

The Eucharistic Controversy, raised by the sharply definite teaching of the Tractarians respecting the Real Presence, was of longer duration. It was brought before the Courts in the "Denison case," in which the Archdeacon of Taunton was deprived by Archbishop Sumner (sitting at Bath as President of a pro-Diocesan Court) on October 22nd, 1856, for having preached three sermons in Wells Cathedral, in the years 1853 and 1854, in which it was alleged that the Body and Blood of Christ are given to all, without exception, who receive the consecrated Bread and Wine administered in the Holy Communion. This was practically a statement that the sacred Substance of the Blessed Sacrament is present in the consecrated elements before they are received by the communicant, and cannot be dissociated from them even by unworthy reception. The sentence of deprivation was reversed by the Court of Arches on preliminary technical grounds; and the accuser having appealed against the decision of the Court to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the decision of the Arches Court was confirmed on February 6th, 1858.

The question of doctrine did not come before either of the Courts above, and no opinion was expressed upon it by either of them.

Ten years later, issue was again joined in behalf of opposite schools of thought respecting the Holy Eucharist by the prosecution of Bennett, Vicar of Frome, by one of his parishioners named Sheppard. In this case the clergyman was accused of using language respecting the Blessed Sacrament which expressed the same doctrine of the Real Presence in the Elements as distinguished from the Presence of Christ in the faithful receiver of them, and which also embraced the question of the Eucharistic Sacrifice. Sir Robert Phillimore gave judgment in this case on July 23rd, 1870, the substance of his decision on the real point at issue being contained in the following words:—"Upon the whole it will appear, I think, from an examination of the Formularies, and from the language of the authorities which I am about to cite, that they were intended to set forth, and do set forth, the doctrine of a real Spiritual Presence in the Holy Eucharist. It may be said with truth that on some formularies this doctrine is more doubtfully, or more faintly, expressed than on others; but the result which I have stated is not only the legal inference from the construction of all the formularies, but also especially from those which are in their nature the most important and, as a matter of history, the latest in date. Though, indeed, that there is a change in the Holy Elements after consecration, and that they then convey in a divine ineffable way the Body and Blood of Christ, seem necessary inferences from the language of the Communion Service alone. . . . I say that the Objective, Actual, and Real Presence, or the Spiritual Real Presence, a Presence external to the act of the communicant, appears to me to be the doctrine which the Formularies of our Church, duly considered and construed, so as to be harmonious, are intended to maintain" [Phillimore's Rep. of Judgm. 117]. This judgment was appealed against, and (although some of the expressions used by the Judge were censured as extra-judicial) it was not altered by the Committee of Privy Council when they gave their more than usually careful decision in 1872. Thus the High Church view of Eucharistic doctrine was declared finally to be that of the Church of England: it may be said that the conclusion of the Eucharistic controversy completed the justification of the Tractarian movement, establishing the fact that the main principles on which that movement was founded, those of "the Sacramental system," are as truly Anglican as they are truly Catholic.

THE RITUALISTS. The revival of ecclesiastical learning, which was so conspicuous a feature of the Tractarian movement, necessarily made the clergy better acquainted with the Primitive Liturgies and with the ancient Service Books of the Church of England. Palmer's Origines Liturgicæ, Maskell's Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England, and Monumenta Ritualiæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, with Neale's Tetralogia Liturgica, laid the foundation for many smaller works on liturgical subjects, and thus spread among the laity, as well as the clergy, a larger amount of information respecting the principles and practice of Divine Service than had been possessed by any modern generation of English Churchmen. Contemporary with this revival of liturgical knowledge, there sprung up also a widely diffused taste for ecclesiastical design in the fabric and furniture of churches; a taste which was greatly promoted by the works of Augustus Welby Pugin, and by the formation of the "Cambridge Camden Society" in the year 1839. This study of "Ecclesiology," as the science came to be named, was soon brought to bear upon the restoration of old churches and the construction of new ones; and as men of taste could no longer be contented with such churches as were built in the eighteenth century, so the educated clergy and laity were beginning to revolt against a type of Divine Service in which it was represented almost entirely as intended for the edification of those who took part in it. Theological knowledge and an intelligent spirit of devotion were combining to raise a general feeling that there should be more recognition of the fact that Prayer, Praise, and the Holy Eucharist are offered to God, as well as used for the spiritual advantage of man. It was out of such circumstances, and under such influences, that what was afterwards called "Ritualism" took its rise.

The earliest form in which it was manifested was that of introducing into parish churches customs which recent generations had known only in connection with cathedrals, minsters, and college chapels. Instead of the old "parson and clerk duet," carried on with occasional interludes of "Brady and Tate," or even "Sternhold and Hopkins," performed by a few singers in a distant gallery, choral services were established; choirs, analogous to those of cathedrals, being formed, clad in surplices, and placed beside the officiating clergy.

The second stage of the Ritualist movement consisted of attempts to follow out with exactness the rubrics of the Prayer Book; when the ritual customs of the existing book were soon found to be supplemented to a large extent by those of the "First Book of Edward VI.," the Prayer Book of 1549, to which reference was supposed to be made in the "Ornaments Rubric" prefixed to Morning Prayer. This development of ritual was promoted by a work entitled "Hierurgia Anglicana, or documents and extracts illustrative of the ritual of the Church in England after the Reformation," which was published in 1848. In the preface to this the editors said, "We take our stand on the ground held by Andrewes, Bancroft, Laud, Wren, Montague, and their fellow confessors, and we claim, with them, for the English Church, the revival of all the vestments and ornaments to which it can be proved she is justly entitled." This principle was fully developed at several churches in London, Oxford, Leeds, and elsewhere, during the next few years; the development of it at St. Paul's Church, Knightsbridge, and the more recent Church of St. Barnabas, Pimlico (which had been opened in 1850 for the purpose of carrying it out completely and honestly), leading to litigation which ultimately brought the advocates and the opponents of ritual to issue before the Privy Council in the year 1857. Some portions of the furniture of those churches were considered, by those members of the Privy Council who constituted the tribunal, to be unsanctioned by the existing law; but the principle then contended for by the Ritualists was affirmed by their interpretation of the "Ornaments Rubric," respecting the varying forms of which they decided that "they all obviously mean the same thing, that the same dresses and the same utensils, or articles, which were used under the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. may still be used" [Brodrick and Fremantle's Eccl. Rep. 131].

The third stage of the Ritualist movement began to develop itself soon after the "St. Barnabas case" had been decided, and was originated by a younger school of clergy and laity on the principle that the ritual standard of "the Ornaments Rubric of the Prayer Book" is the practice of the Church of England in the second year of Edward VI., which is interpreted to be that of pre-Reformation times adapted to the English Prayer Book, and including a much larger amount of ceremonial than that which is actually ordered in the rubric of that book. The practical use of such a standard was set forth in a volume entitled "Directorium Anglicanum, being a manual of directions for the right celebration of the Holy Communion, for the saying of Matins and Evensong, and for the performance of other rites and ceremonies of the Church, according to ancient uses of the Church of England," edited by the Rev. John Purchas, and published in the year 1858. A full development of ritual usages on the principle thus indicated was established at St. Alban's Church, Holborn, built about 1861, and at a later date at a Brighton Chapel, of which Mr. Purchas became incumbent; while at many other churches the ceremonial of Divine Service was raised to a much higher standard than had been contemplated by the elder school of Ritualists. There was much, indeed, to provoke opposition in the ritual adopted by this younger school of Ritualists—very inferior in learning to their predecessors—for it was chiefly copied from modern Continental customs, and was mixed up with a sentimentalism about candles and flowers, as well as with an excessive minuteness in regard to postures and gestures, which made it easy to charge the school with trifling and want of manliness. Prejudices thus excited, led to the prosecution of Mackonochie, the Vicar of St. Alban's, and Purchas, the Incumbent of St. James's Chapel, Brighton; and their cases were eventually carried, on appeal, before the Privy Council. A surprising want of knowledge respecting ecclesiastical history and ritual on the part of the Privy Councillors, enabled them to condemn such ancient and Catholic customs as the use of the mixed Cup and of Eucharistic lights. But the general tendency of the judicial decisions which were given, was—notwithstanding Mackonochie, the Vicar of St. Alban's, and Purchas, the Incumbent of St. James's Chapel, Brighton, were both prosecuted, and some of their practices were condemned—to raise the limit to which the ritual of the Prayer Book may lawfully be carried far higher than it was before placed: and there was consequently a corresponding movement throughout the country in the direction which the Ritualists had taken; even Bishops resuming that use of copes which had been dropped in the middle of the eighteenth century. Thus the danger of a narrow reaction which had been provoked passed away, and a revival of ritual such as kept pace with the revival of devotion and taste received the sanction of authority.

In the year 1867, the Visitatorial authority of the Crown was exercised for the appointment of a Royal Commission "to inquire into and report upon differences of practice which had arisen, and varying interpretations which were put upon the rubrics, orders, and directions for regulating the course and conduct of public worship, the administration of the Sacraments, and the other services contained in the Book of Common Prayer." This Commission was also directed to reconstruct the Tables of Lessons used at Morning and Evening Prayer. Several reports were made by it, and its reconstructed Lectionary was authorized for use by Parliament and Convocation in the year 1871; but no further action was taken at that time on the subject which it was appointed to investigate.

One great work of the High Church party from the Reformation downwards has been that of preserving the substantial catholicity of the Church of England; during the forty years' revival between 1833 and 1873, it was also that of renewing its life and vigour. The High Churchmen of the Reformation age saved the Church from becoming Lutherized or Calvinized, and carefully preserved its continuity with the English Church of preceding ages. Those of the seventeenth century restored health to the Church of England when it was being fatally cankered by the blood-poison of Presbyterianism; those of the eighteenth century withstood the dangers in which it was placed by the scepticism that in the end overturned the Church of France; those of the nineteenth century have revived ecclesiastical learning and the devotional spirit, and have carried the influence of the Church home to the hearts of rich and poor in face of difficulties arising from very novel conditions of social, religious, and intellectual life.

HINDOOS. [BRAHMINS.]

HISTOPEDES. A name given to the Eunomians with reference to a strange custom which they are said to have practised, of baptizing persons with the head and breast in the water and the feet upright [ιστός] in the air. [Epiph. Hær. lxxvi. ad. fin. Theod. Hær. fab. iv. 30.]

HOADLY. There were two branches of the English Latitudinarian School; the one headed by Cudworth, More, and Smith, the other by Wilkins and Tillotson. The former was distinguished by its Platonism, which imparted a depth and fervour, not without a strain of mysticism, to a theology which otherwise would have been both shallow and cold; the latter lacking this adjunct, and little addicted to patristic study, found no better guide, in the revulsion from Puritanism, than the foreign Arminian divines. Thus, Birch refers the formation of Tillotson's mind first to Chillingworth on the desertion of Puritanism, and then to Episcopius. The writings of Episcopius,¹ he says, contributed very much to the forming of some of the greatest divines of our country in the last age, and in particular Archbishop Tillotson himself [Life of Tillotson, pp. 5, 219].

The leaders of the Platonists for the most part lived and died in colleges. The latter school furnished the Latitudinarian political bishops by whom the Church was afflicted in the eighteenth century. Of these Hoadly is the most thorough specimen. Tillotson was kept at a higher level by some knowledge of the Fathers, and by his intimacy with Barrow and Nelson. Hoadly followed out his principles to their legitimate results, and produced what Secker called a Christianity "secundum usum Winton."

Benjamin Hoadly, born 1676, Fellow of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, then Rector of St. Peter-le-Poer, London, brought himself into general notice by becoming (as the Nonconformist Calamy writes) a strenuous assertor of our civil and religious rights. In a sermon before the Lord Mayor, he represented the public good as the end of the magistrate's office, and asserted the warrantableness of resistance when that end is destroyed. Objection² being made to his doctrine, he defended himself in Measures of Obedience to the Civil Magistrate, which was answered by Atterbury in Concio ad Clerum, Lond. 1709. That passive obedience has its limits few will now doubt; and it is the hardest problem that can be presented to the mind and conscience of a statesman to fix those limits. [DICT. OF THEOL., NON-JURORS.] Hoadly's error appears to be not of principle but in the application of the principle.

The House of Commons thanked him for his zeal and recommended him for promotion. Queen Anne did not attend to the recommendation. George I. made him Bishop of Bangor (he never visited this see), and he was translated afterwards to Hereford, Salisbury, and Winchester in quick succession. The last bishopric he held twenty-six years. [BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY.]

Hoadly's doctrine proved to be that which vacates the office of the Church, undermines its constitution, denies the power of its ministry and the efficacy of its sacraments. The Church he defined to be "the number of men, whether small or great, dispersed or united, who truly and sincerely are subjects to Jesus Christ alone, as their Lawgiver and Judge, in matters relating to the favour of God and their eternal salvation" [Sermon on Nature of the Church]. There is not a word of the bands which knit men together in one communion and fellowship, but each man, in isolation, stands in immediate reference (it is not said to his Saviour, but) to his Lawgiver and Judge. In this relation of the individual to his Judge it is said that a man's "title to God's favour cannot depend upon his actual being or continuing in any particular method, but upon his real sincerity in the conduct of his conscience:" that "the favour of God follows sincerity, considered as such, and consequently equally follows every equal degree of sincerity" [Preservative against Principles of Nonjurors]. That is, Saul the persecutor, who verily thought he ought to do many things contrary to the Name of Jesus, had an equal title to God's favour with Paul the Apostle.

Further, Hoadly argued that, inasmuch as "the Church of Christ is the kingdom of Christ, He Himself is King," that "in this it is implied that He is Himself the sole Lawgiver to His subjects, and Himself the sole Judge of their behaviour, in the affairs of conscience and eternal salvation. And in this sense, therefore, His kingdom is not of this world; that He hath left behind Him no visible human authority, no vicegerents, who can be said properly to supply His place; no interpreters upon whom His subjects are absolutely to depend; no judges over the consciences or religion of His people." This passage seems to deny (the Committee of the Lower House of Convocation observed) all authority to the Church, and under pretence of exalting the kingdom of Christ, to leave it without any visible human authority to judge, censure, or punish offenders, in the affairs of conscience and eternal salvation.

Hoadly of course denied the existence of a line of rightful bishops. "As far as we can judge of things, God's Providence never yet in fact kept up a regular uninterrupted succession of rightful bishops." "It hath not pleased God in His Providence to keep up any proof of the least probability, or moral possibility, of a regular uninterrupted succession." He holds up to scorn and contempt "all trifles and niceties of authoritative benedictions, absolutions, excommunications:" "human benedictions, human absolutions, human excommunications have nothing to do with the favour of God" [Preservative, fol. edit. pp. 588, 592, 593, 595]. In these trifles and niceties are included all exercise of the power of the keys, all ministries of the Word and Sacraments.

Let it be sufficient to notice how the Holy Eucharist is dealt with. "The phrase of eating

² Compton complained of it in the House of Lords, and was told by Burnet that he ought to have been the last man to complain, for if the doctrine were not good he could not be defended for appearing in arms at Northampton [Life of Calamy, ii. p. 40].

Christ's Flesh and drinking His Blood, signifies the duty of believing and digesting His doctrine; and not any benefits accruing from that eating and drinking." "I now give you this Bread, and call it My Body, in order to shew you that you are to take and eat bread in this manner after My death; and to introduce My command to you to do this, to break and eat bread in remembrance of Me and of My Body broken, after it shall be broken, and after I shall be removed from you." "The Bread and Wine are outward and visible signs or marks, ordained by Christ to call to our minds, and to point out to us, the greatest inward and spiritual grace (i.e. favour or mercy) bestowed on man by Almighty God. They call to mind the death of Christ," &c. [Plain Account.]

While Hoadly thus rejected on the one hand all that flows to man through the society of the Church, through her ministers and sacraments, he rejected no less on the other hand those parts of Christian truth which he might have learnt from Leighton, which were soon to form the strength of the Evangelical School. [DICT. OF THEOL., EVANGELICALS.] Regarding Prayer, the Atonement, Grace, Justification, and kindred topics, his opinions are scarcely discernible from those of modern Unitarians.¹ Destitute of the excellencies of the schools and leading men with whom he was connected, which preserved them from the full effects of their Latitudinarian principles, he has shewn to what those principles really lead, to a system, namely, of prayer without fervour, sacraments without grace, clergy without a calling, and a church without cohesion.

Such is the natural issue of the rationalizing Christianity introduced by Hales and Chillingworth, aided presently by the Dutch Remonstrants. The deterioration of the Arminian divines after the Synod of Dort was rapid. Episcopius drew perilously near to Socinianism. His form of Arminianism, as embraced by the English Latitudinarians, never possessed the Church's sacramental element, and it had rejected or at least neglected the doctrine of the Atonement which had given an evangelical tone to the teaching of Arminius. It set forth Christ as an example rather than as a Saviour. In Hoadly, therefore, Arminian Latitudinarianism became a kind of Protestantism within the Church of England, protesting not only against the doctrinal system of Calvin (for which it might be excused), but against all the vital powers and agencies of Apostolical Christianity. An alleged sincerity of purpose took the place of faith; revelation was to be brought down to human comprehension; all mysteries were to be excluded. All who said that they loved Jesus Christ in sincerity, whatever their creed, whatever their worship, were Christian brethren: and (as a necessary consequence of Chillingworth's original dictum) all who held the Scriptures to be the rule of belief and morals were alike members of the Church. Many in the Church of England fell into this state of indifferentism. They were not Arminians in a true sense of the word, they were such only because they were not Calvinists. When a revival of religion came there was, besides a recurrence to primitive doctrine through the leading of the English Church, a reappearance also of the distinctive tenets of Arminius and Calvin. Wesley reinvigorated Arminianism, while a fervent and more spiritual Latitudinarianism (of which Leighton remained the unsurpassable type) joined with distinct Calvinistic tenets, revived in Evangelicalism. But the Evangelical School has borne marks of Hoadly throughout its whole course. Its doctrine of the Sacraments, particularly of the Holy Eucharist, fell below Calvin's, and is only distinguishable from Hoadly's by greater devotion. Hoadly's tenet that a man's title to God's favour cannot depend upon his actual being or continuing in any particular method, which, if it mean anything, means first that there is no Church to which God joins those whom He will save, and then that all sects whatever (the Catholic Church being a sect) are equal, remained theoretically in Evangelicalism; with the practical distinction however that dissenters from the Church of England were commonly looked upon as the more godly.

HOBBS. Few philosophical writers who have not written directly against Christianity have had a wider influence in promoting scepticism than Thomas Hobbes: and yet his philosophy is rather one of politics than of religion.

He was the son of a clergyman, was born at Malmesbury on April 5th, 1588, took his degree at Oxford, was private tutor, first to Lord Cavendish, and afterwards to his surviving brother, the Earl of Devonshire, and through his pupils became intimate with Bacon and Lord Herbert of Cheshire. During his absence from England under the Long Parliament he also became acquainted at Paris with Descartes. In the year 1651 he published his principal work, The Leviathan, and shortly afterwards returned to England. Having been for a short time mathematical tutor to Charles II. (though he had not learned the first rudiments till after his fortieth year) he received a pension of £100 a year at the Restoration, and lived to the great age of ninety-two, dying on December 4th, 1679.

Religion received little attention from Hobbes except as a part of government, a matter of police, by means of which the absolute sovereign may be assisted in maintaining order in his kingdom. But the whole of his philosophy is pervaded by Materialism, the foundation of which he thus lays in the first chapter of his Leviathan: "Concerning the thoughts of man I will consider them first singly, and afterwards in a train or dependence upon one another. Singly they are every one a representation or appearance of some quality or other accident of a body without us, which is commonly called an object—which object worketh on the eyes, ears, and other parts of a man's body; and by diversity of working, produceth diversity of appearances. The original of them all is that which we call 'Sense,' for there is no conception in a man's mind which hath not at first, totally or by parts, been begotten upon the organs of sense. The rest are derived from that original." Elsewhere he says, "All the qualities called 'sensible' are, in the object that causeth them, but so many several motions of the matter by which it presseth on our organs diversely. Neither in us that are pressed are they anything else but divers motions; for motion produceth nothing but motion." "Conception is a motion in some internal substance of the head."

The Materialism of Hobbes did not develope into Atheism, for he acknowledged the existence of God, and looked upon Pantheism as absurd. But he denied the possibility of knowing anything about God beyond the fact of His existence; and as regards the duty owing to Him by man he expressly defines religion as "the fear of an invisible power feigned by the mind or imagined from tales publicly allowed." When such fear is associated with "tales," not "publicly allowed" by the civil authority, he defines it as "superstition."

The principal opponents of Hobbes were Archbishop Bramhall, who printed The Catching of the Leviathan in 1658, with the object of shewing that no man who is thoroughly a Hobbeist can be a good Christian, or a good Commonwealth's man, or reconcile himself to himself: Lord Clarendon, who wrote A Brief View of the Dangerous and Pernicious Views to Church and State in Mr. Hobbes' book entitled Leviathan; and Archbishop Tenison, the author of the Creed of Mr. Hobbes Examined. The Leviathan has been little read since the age in which it was published, but a new edition of Hobbes' works was edited by Sir William Molesworth in the year 1845. HOFFMANITES. [JERUSALEM FRIENDS.]

HOMINICOLÆ. This is not the name of a sect, but a controversial term of reproach used by the Apollinarians and other heretics towards the orthodox as worshippers of "the Man Christ Jesus."

HOMMES D'INTELLIGENCE. [MEN OF UNDERSTANDING.]

HOMIOUSIANS. A name given to the SEMI-ARIANS, who refused to accept the statement of the Nicene Creed that the Son is of one substance with the Father, and maintained instead that He was of a like or similar substance.

HOMŌOUSIANS. The orthodox believers in the doctrine stated in the Nicene Creed, that the Son is "of one substance with the Father."

HOMUNCIONITÆ. This name is given by the author of Prædestinatus to those who maintained the opinion that the image of God was to be found in the body and not in the soul of man [Prædest. Hæc. lxxvi.]. St. Augustine just mentions the opinion, writing "alia dicit corpus hominis, non animam, esse imaginem Dei," but gives no name to those who held it [Aug. Hæc. lxxvi.].

Philaster confutes at some length an opinion that the body was created before the soul, and that it, and not the soul, was created in the image of God; but neither does he give any name to those who maintained it [Philast. de Hæc. xcvi.]. Epiphanius attributes the same opinion to the Audians [Epiphanius. Hæc. l.], as does also Theodoret [Hist. Eccl. iv. 10.]. It has also been attributed to Melito of Sardis and his followers, whose belief respecting the corporeity of God approached Anthropomorphism [ANTHROPOMORPHITES]; but there seems no foundation for this beyond the presence of the word "Melitonii" against the opinion in the Indiculus which precedes St. Augustine's work on heresies, but which is of very doubtful authenticity.

It is singular that Prudentius, who wrote his Apotheosis about the end of the fourth century, entitles a portion of it "contra Homuncionitas," without saying a word about the opinion referred to in the preceding paragraphs. The opinion condemned by him is stated in the lines—

"Hoc tantum quod verus homo est; at cœlitus illum
Affirmant non esse Deum; pietate fatentur
Majestate negant: morum pro laude sacratum
Concelebrant: adimunt naturæ summa supernæ."
[Prudent. Apoth. 553.]

This so plainly refers to the Arians that the title "contra Homusionitas" has sometimes been substituted.

HOPKINSIANS. A party among the Independents of America, who slightly differ from their sect in general as to their view of Calvinism, but who have never formed themselves into a separate body. Their name is taken from Samuel Hopkins, an Independent minister at Newport in Rhode Island, whose System of Divinity was published in the year 1803, shortly after his death. The principal point in which they differ from ordinary Supralapsarian Calvinists is in denying the imputation of Adam's guilt or of Christ's righteousness. They also make a great point of maintaining that holiness consists in disinterested benevolence, and sin in interested selfishness. [H. Adams' Diet of Sects.]

HOREBITES. A party of the Hussites who took their name from a mountain in Bohemia, to which they gave the Scriptural name of Horeb, and on which they encamped when commencing the war with Germany. [BOHEMIANS. HUSSITES.] A similar party called themselves Taborites, and they were accustomed to name the adjacent German provinces Edom, Moab, Amalek, &c., after the nations who were opposed to the Israelites.

HUME. The historian Hume [A.D. 1711-1776] became also known as the founder of a sceptical school of thought which carries into the province of religion the great principle of the Baconian philosophy, that the only way of certainly arriving at truth is by experience. This had led Hobbes, the friend of Bacon, to Materialism, and was in no small degree the teaching of Locke, but it was reserved for David Hume to formulate the opinion in such a manner as to bring it to bear directly on Christianity; the key of his position having two fronts, the denial of a First Cause and the denial of miracles. Both forms of denial Hume based upon the principle that only that can be received as true which can be proved on the evidence of experience.

Hume's theory respecting God may be condensed into two statements. [1] That when we argue from the course of nature, and infer a particular intelligent Cause which at first bestowed, and still preserves, order in the universe, we embrace a principle which is both uncertain and useless, because the subject lies entirely beyond the reach of human experience. [2] That the idea of God as an infinitely intelligent, wise, and good Being, arises from reflecting on the operations of our own minds, and augmenting those qualities of goodness and wisdom without bound or limit; so that, whatever we esteem good in human nature, we elevate into an attribute of Deity by adding to it an arbitrary idea of infinity.

His theory respecting miracles was: [1] That there can, by no possibility, be sufficient ground for believing in them. Experience, he alleged, is our only guide in reasoning on matters of fact, and even experience is not an infallible guide. Thus, when any testimony is presented to us respecting alleged miracles, we must balance it against opposite circumstances which may create doubt, and thus the value of the evidence on one side may be destroyed by that on the other, or by the very nature of the facts alleged when interpreted by evidence so balanced. The experience of mankind, he maintained, is against the truth of miracles, and we do not know the attributes of God sufficiently to know whether He can or cannot work them; and thus no evidence in proof of their occurrence is possible. [2] But he further maintained that no miracle had ever been recorded on historical testimony that was sufficiently good to establish it as a matter of belief. The witnesses of a miracle ought, he said, to be of such unquestionable good sense, education, and learning, as to secure us against any mistake on their part. They should also be of such integrity as to raise their evidence beyond suspicions of interestedness or of untruthfulness. And, lastly, miracles should be performed so publicly, and under such circumstances of publicity, that imposture should be evidently impossible. Of course Hume's conclusion was that the Gospel miracles will not stand the test required by the à posteriori argument; but it is the à priori argument alone which has any force, as the general opinion of thinkers altogether favours the soundness of the Gospel history.

Hume's reasonings had much influence on the scepticism of his time, and have affected later literature to an extent far greater than might be supposed from the obscurity into which his Philosophical Essays have fallen. Perhaps this may have arisen from the great perspicuity of his writings, in which he presents a conspicuous contrast to German philosophers. [SCERTICS.]

HUMANITARIANS. This is a term occasionally used to designate those who believe only in the humanity or human nature of our Lord, rejecting the doctrine of His Divine Nature.

HUMANITY, RELIGION OF. [POSTIVISTS.]

HUNGARIAN PROTESTANTS. An anti-papal party existed in Hungary very long before the Reformation. It has been calculated that it contained as many as eighty thousand Waldenses in the earlier part of the fourteenth century. The Hussites in the succeeding century were equally numerous, so that it causes no surprise to learn that Lutheran teaching speedily found its way into Hungary. As early as A.D. 1521, George Szakmary, Archbishop of Gran, ordered a condemnation of Luther's books to be read from the pulpits of all the principal churches; episcopal edicts to the same effect followed [A.D. 1523-1525], accompanied by a persecution so relentless that the Protestant party was nearly destroyed. Political events, however, caused a respite. On the death of Louis II. [A.D. 1526] John Zapolski and Ferdinand I. endeavoured to enlist sympathy for their rival claims to the crown by denouncing the Reformers, who continued to grow in numbers and importance, and even ventured to retaliate on the inmates of the religious houses, while the minds of the community were distracted by the civil war. Some years later a printing-office was established at Cronstadt by John Honter [A.D. 1533], for the purpose of disseminating Protestant opinions through the press as well as through the pulpit; and Matthew Devay, "the Luther of Hungary," published a Magyar translation of St. Paul's Epistles, followed in three years' time by the Gospels, and afterwards by the whole New Testament both in Magyar and in the Croatian dialect [A.D. 1563]. Originally Devay was a Lutheran in his opinions, and as such had signed the Augsburg Confession, but he subsequently changed, and adopted Zwinglian views, especially on the Holy Eucharist. This led to a division in the Reformers' camp. Five leading cities drew up a protest against the Swiss doctrines known as the "Confessio Pentapolitana" [A.D. 1549]. The common Confession of Faith of the Reformed Hungarians, "Confessio Czengerina," was published at Czenger [A.D. 1557], containing strong Calvinistic teaching, and based on the Helvetic Confession, which had been printed at Torgau in Prussian Saxony in the previous year. The issue of these confessions proves by itself the sway by this time obtained by Protestantism in Hungary. Leave to conform to it was demanded and obtained by five free cities in North Hungary, twelve market towns in the county of Zips, a few towns in Lower Hungary, and by the heads of several noble houses [A.D. 1555]. The final abandonment of Lutheranism and open union with the Swiss Calvinists took place A.D. 1566.

In Transylvania, which became an independent kingdom A.D. 1540, the widow of John Zapolski granted full religious liberty to the Lutherans A.D. 1557, and to the Calvinistic Protestants a few years later. Her successor, John Sigismund, extended this toleration to the Socinians, who, on being driven out of Hungary, settled in great numbers in Transylvania.

HUNTINGDON CONNEXION. A sect of Calvinistic Methodists which derives its name from Selina, widow of the ninth Earl of Huntingdon. Its history dates from the year 1748, and is closely connected with that of the "Evangelical" party in the Church of England. [LOW CHURCHMEN.]

Lady Huntingdon was brought into an early association with the Methodists through the marriage of her husband's sister, Lady Margaret Hastings, to Mr. Ingham, one of the Oxford "Religious Society" out of which Methodism took its origin, and one of Wesley's companions on his voyage to Georgia. [INGHAMITES.] On the separation of Wesley and Whitefield, Lady Huntingdon attached herself closely to the latter, and in 1748 appointed him one of her chaplains, that she might have a claim on his services to preach to her friends at her residence, afterwards Cremorne House, Chelsea, and the next mansion to that of Count Zinzendorf, the founder of the Moravians. Here, and at her house in Park Street, large assemblies of the nobility, including even such men as Lord Bolingbroke, Lord Chesterfield, and Horace Walpole, used to gather to listen to the famous preacher; and under his influence fashionable ladies invited parties for prayer at each others' houses as they had been accustomed to invite parties for cards.

The next step taken by Lady Huntingdon was to build chapels in fashionable towns, such as Bath, Clifton, Tunbridge Wells, Brighton, &c., which she kept entirely in her own hands, and provided with clergymen, whom she called her chaplains. This she did on the ground that as a peeress she had a right to employ as many chaplains as she pleased, and that she was entitled to employ them where she pleased. To secure a succession of such chaplains of her own way of thinking, she then set up a theological college in an old mansion named Trevecca House, at Talgarth, near Brecon. This was opened by herself and George Whitfield on August 24th, 1768, the first principal being Sir Richard Hill's well-known French chaplain, Fletcher, or Jean Guillaume de la Flechère, afterwards Vicar of Madeley. Lady Huntingdon required the bishops to ordain as her chaplains, and for her chapels, such candidates for orders as should be sent to them from this college; but this they declined to do, the number of chaplains to an earl, and therefore to a countess, being limited to five by the Act of Parliament 21 Henry VIII. c. 13, and the kind of duty for which they are intended being ministrations within the domestic chapels of mansions, and not in public chapels like those erected by Lady Huntingdon. It was not to be expected, however, that a lady whose ecclesiastical habits had acquired for her the name of Pope Joan would be easily brought to submit to any other discipline than her own, and she therefore continued to tempt clergymen into her chapels by the bribe of a "scarf," the badge of a nobleman's chaplain, which was at that time considered a mark of dignity and social position. Thus many "Free Churches," as they would now be called, were set up throughout the country, in which Calvinistic clergymen officiated according to the customs of the Church of England; but entirely without any ecclesiastical authority. They were appointed and removed entirely at the pleasure of their patroness; and nothing could be more abject than the submission with which they bowed to "her ladyship's condescension" on every occasion.

The extravagant claims of Lady Huntingdon were brought to the test of law in the year 1776. Shortly before that time a large chapel in Spa Fields called the "Pantheon"—intended for the worship of all denominations—had been taken by a company for the purpose of being used as a chapel on the same plan as Lady Huntingdon's, and two clergymen named Jones and Taylor were engaged to officiate in it. The Vicar of the parish of St. James, Clerkenwell, in which "Northampton Chapel" was situated, at once took proceedings against these two clergymen, and they were prohibited from further ministrations, neither they nor the chapel being licensed by the Bishop. Lady Huntingdon then bought the chapel, placing there as her "chaplains" Dr. Haweis and Mr. Glascott. Proceedings were taken against them with the same result, when it was determined to license the place as a dissenting meeting-house, and two clergymen named Wills and Taylor qualified themselves, under the Toleration Act, as dissenters, for the purpose of taking charge of it. From this time many of Lady Huntingdon's chaplains, including Romaine, De Courcy, Venn and Toplady, withdrew from her service, and became distinguished as early members of the Low Church school in the Church of England. But the discovery of her sectarian position had not the same effect upon Lady Huntingdon, for when she found that the law of England requires every place of worship to be licensed either for the use of the Church or for the use of dissenters, she gave up all connection with the former, and chose that her chapels should become avowedly those of dissenters rather than yield her authority over them. Thus, in the year 1783, a sect was formally established by her, and to provide ministers for some of the vacated chapels six of the young men from Trevecca were "ordained" by the seceding priests at Spa Fields.

At Lady Huntingdon's death in 1791, at the age of eighty-four, her chapels were, by her will, bequeathed to Dr. Haweis, Mrs. Haweis, Lady Ann Erskine, and Mr. Lloyd, who formed a trust for the administration of them and of Trevecca College. The latter, however, was removed to Cheshunt in Hertfordshire, in the following year, where it was eventually reformed for the education of young men "who are left entirely free in their choice of the denomination of Christians among whom they may prefer to exercise their ministry." The result has been that the college has become a nursery for ministers of the "Congregationalist" or Independent sect, though its numbers have always been very small.

The position taken up by Lady Huntington's Connexion was that of a "Free Church," in which the Calvinistic aspect that some Divines have discovered in the Church of England should be strongly wrought out in association with the use of the Prayer Book. During her lifetime it attained enough popularity to win the jealousy of Wesley, who hated Calvinism, and did not much love a successful rival who could be as imperious a pope as himself. Four years after her death, Dr. Haweis estimated that her preachers had Sunday congregations amounting in the aggregate to 100,000 people. But when the Religious Census was taken in 1851, the Connexion only returned 19,159 members, with 101 chapels. A large number of its members were absorbed into the Low Church section of the Church of England during the first half of the nineteenth century, and the sect is now very small. HUNTINGTONIANS. The followers of an Antinomian preacher known as William Huntington, the "preaching coalheaver," who collected a congregation around him first in a chapel in Margaret Street, Cavendish Square, and then at Providence Chapel in Gray's Inn Lane, London, at the end of the last and the beginning of the present century. He made some stir among the Dissenters in London, but did not leave any formally constituted sect behind him.

Huntington was the son of a man of some social position named Russel, by the wife of a Kentish labourer named Hunt. He was born near Cranbrook in the year 1743, and was brought up as one of his large family by the labourer, whose name he bore for the first thirty or thirty-five years of his life. He professed to have changed his name from Hunt to Huntington at his "conversion," writing "with this name I was born again," &c., but he also gives as his reason that being unable or unwilling to pay the parish officers for the maintenance of a bastard son, he made the addition of the two latter syllables to the one by which he was known, on the ground that "if I let my present name stand, I may by that be traced by means of the newspapers." When he became a preacher he always wrote his name "William Huntington, S.S.," the initials representing his spiritual degree of "Sinner Saved."¹ He worked as a labourer until he found preaching more profitable, but died a wealthy man, having drawn largely upon the pockets of his admirers, and having (after the death of his wife and six infants) married Lady Saunderson, the widow of a Lord Mayor. He had been accustomed to rail at the bishops for "rolling their fat carcases about in chariots," but having now a chariot of his own he justified the change to himself and his followers by quoting Acts xxi. 15, "And after those days we took up our carriages, and went up to Jerusalem."

This popular preacher of his day seems to have acquired considerable influence by preaching in an exaggerated form the two doctrines of Faith and Indefectible Grace, which were made so prominent by the Methodists and the Calvinistic clergy, and by spicing his sermons with coarse humour, such as attracted so many to Spurgeon in a later generation. He was strongly, though justly denounced by Rowland Hill, who is said to have shewn his detestation of the man and his works by taking up one of Huntington's volumes with a pair of tongs, and giving it thus to his servant for lighting the kitchen fire. But the humour and invective of the gentleman were no match for those of the coalheaver.

Huntington contrived to leave twenty volumes in print, but his own portion of them is filled with cant and vulgar wit, and they also include whole volumes of letters written to him by his obsequious dupes. [Huntington's Works. Quart. Rev. xxiv. 462.]

HUGUENOTS. The origin of this name, which was given in contempt to the Calvinists of France, is uncertain. It is generally thought to be a corruption of the German word Eidgenossen, confederates; but it is difficult to see how a German name ever came to be applied to the French Calvinists, who took their beginning from Geneva, not from Augsburg. Davila says that they were called Huguenots because their first conventicles in the city of Tours, where their doctrines first gained strength, were in certain cellars near the gate of Count Hugo, which seems a more plausible derivation [Dav. Hist. des Guerres Civ. t. 1]. In public documents they were called Religionaires, or "Ceux de la Religion pretendue Reformée." They were not called Protestants before the seventeenth century.

The doctrines of the Reformers, especially as formulated by Calvin, spread widely in France during the reign of Francis I. [1515-47]. That Prince, while he lent support to the German Protestants, as a means of annoying his rival Charles V., persecuted the Calvinists in his own country. It was during his reign that Calvin, having been driven from France, published his Institutio Christianæ Religionis, expressly as the confession of faith of those who were persecuted in France [Basle, 1553], a work which he republished almost every year with additions and amendments. In 1538 he formed a French community in Strasburg, the number of refugees even at that early date being great enough to require organization. The persecution grew more severe toward the end of Francis' reign; it was made criminal to aid the new doctrines in any way whatever; and an inquisition was set up, which had the power of hunting out heretics and delivering them over to the ecclesiastical and criminal courts.

Under Henry II., the feeble successor of Francis [1547-9], the same double policy was continued. The war of the Protestant party, headed by Maurice of Saxony, against the Emperor, broke out in 1552. Henry agreed to join the Protestants; and the war was made memorable by the French conquest of Metz, which was retained to the kingdom mainly by the skill of the Duke of Guise. This was perhaps the greatest public service rendered by the great house of Guise, which at this time became eminent for the talents of its members and for its bitter hostility to the Reformed religion. The house of Guise, of French Lorraine, was a branch of the old sovereign house of Lorraine, and in this century became united with the Bourbon branch of the royal family of France. The defender of Metz had married a granddaughter of Louis XII. His brother, the Cardinal of Lorraine, was not inferior to him in ambition or ability. The chief rival of the Guises was the Constable Montmorency, a soldier who had shared the wars of Francis I., but whose harsh and unpopular character little fitted him to dispute the ascendancy of the Guises. The religionists were at this time held in contempt as a misguided rabble: an accident revealed to the Guises that many men of high rank were among their adherents. Some followers of the new faith met together in Paris, where they were attacked by the mob. A riot followed, and the whole of them being taken in custody, they were found to have among them a number of the highest rank, including the celebrated Admiral Coligny, the nephew of Montmorency. Several of them were condemned and burned under the existing edicts by the alarmed court; and greater powers for the suppression of heresy were demanded from the Parliament of Paris. The King held a bed of justice in 1559, and with apparent candour requested the members of the Parliament to give utterance to their opinions of the new doctrines. Two of them incautiously spoke in favour of the Reformers, and were put to death for that reason.

Under Francis II. [1559-60] these dissensions first began to threaten the peace of the kingdom. The power of the Guises was increased by their relation to Mary of Scotland, the new Queen of France, who was their niece. On the other hand the Bourbons openly avowed the new doctrines. These princes of the blood—the King of Navarre and his brother Louis, Prince of Condé—were however unable to resist the Guises at court. The latter had gained a powerful auxiliary in the Queen mother, Catharine of Medici, who had no other motive than to increase her own power by joining the prevailing faction. The Guises continued the persecution of the heretics with fanatical fury. In every parliament there was established a chamber called the burning chamber (chambre ardente), for the purpose of examining and punishing heretics. The estates of those who fled were sold and their children reduced to beggary. But notwithstanding this persecution the Reformers would not have thought of rebellion unless they had been countenanced by a prince of the blood. They inquired of lawyers and theologians whether they could with a good conscience make war against the Guises: and the divines of Germany answered that with the aid of a prince of the blood it would be lawful to do so. In 1560 was formed the conspiracy of Amboise for seizing the person of the young king. The brave Prince Louis of Condé was chosen to be leader of the enterprise, but his name was kept secret, and a gentleman of Perigord, Jean du Barry, Sieur of Remandie, was appointed his deputy. The plot was betrayed; and about 1200 persons paid with their lives the penalty of being concerned in it. The Guises now desired to establish the Inquisition, but the good Chancellor De l'Hôpital, to avoid the greater evil, obtained the amendment that all cases of heresy should be put into the hands of the bishops, the parliament ceasing to have any jurisdiction therein. This was ordered by the edict of Romorantin [A.D. 1560], and the civil power was thus superseded.

About the same time an assembly of notables was held at Fontainebleau, where Coligny presented a petition for liberty of conscience, which, he said, would ere long be signed by ten thousand persons holding the same faith with himself. "And I," replied the Duke of Guise, "will present another, which a hundred thousand men under my orders will sign with their blood." The States-General met at Orleans at the end of the year, and both parties regarded the meeting as a battlefield for the superiority. Before the day arrived however the two Bourbon princes were arrested and thrown into prison by the contrivance of the Guises; Condé was condemned to death; and, in order to strike terror into the Religionaires, his execution was fixed for the first day of the meeting, and the scaffold was to be raised in the hall where the sittings were to be held. The sudden death of the king saved the life of Condé.

On the accession of Charles IX. [A.D. 1560-74] the power of the house of Lorraine seemed to be on the wane. They lost the hold on the court which they had through the young Queen Mary, their niece. A long minority ensued, the King being only ten years old, and though the Queen mother got herself appointed regent, yet the King of Navarre was named lieutenant-general of the kingdom. The Constable Montmorency, on the other hand, joined himself more closely with the five Guises. An edict, known as the Edict of July 1561, freed the Huguenots from the penalty of death, but remitted no other severity, and ordered their ministers to be expelled the kingdom [Davila, t. 11]. Shortly afterwards a meeting was held, which is known as the Conference of Poissy, at which the two parties entered into theological controversy in a spirit of conciliation, which was only prevented by the Sorbonne from ending in pacification. The following year the edict of January granted the Huguenots freedom of worship. But their enemies continued to disturb their assemblies. Bloody scenes frequently ensued, and the massacre of Vassy in 1562 was the immediate cause of the First Civil War. The Huguenots made Orleans their headquarters, where a considerable army was gathered. The war was marked by petty conflicts, in which both sides behaved with perfidy and cruelty. At the outset the King of Navarre deserted the Huguenots, and formed a union with Guise and Montmorency, which the Huguenots called the Triumvirate. Condé advanced on Paris with a small army, but was compelled to retreat; then came the bloody battle of Dreux in Normandy, in which Condé was taken prisoner on one side and Montmorency on the other. The Huguenots were defeated; and Guise advanced on Orleans, before the walls of which he was assassinated by a pretended deserter named Poltrot. His death inclined both sides to come to terms; and the first religious war was concluded by the peace of Amboise, by which certain cities were assigned in every province for the religious assemblies of the Huguenots. This peace was made upon the fatal principle of treating the Huguenots not as part of the general population, to be dealt with under a uniform law, but as a separate community of pacified rebels. They had been declared rebels; and it must be admitted that they had behaved as such in calling in the English, to whom they had surrendered several fortified towns.

The terms granted by the peace of Amboise were gradually infringed; and in 1567 the Huguenots again had recourse to arms. Montmorency was slain at the beginning of the struggle in the indecisive action of St. Denis. Cruelty and treachery marked this second religious war, which ended in a peace as hollow as the former.

The third war was memorable for the death of the great Huguenot leader Condé, who fell in the battle of Jarnac in 1569. Coligny was now the only great leader left on either side of those who had seen the beginning of the troubles, so rapidly fatal were the religious wars to the leaders on both sides. But the place of Condé was filled by the illustrious Henry IV., then Prince of Béarn, who joined the Huguenots with three thousand men. His presence compensated for the defeat of Coligny at Moncontour, and an advantageous peace was concluded in 1570.

Meanwhile the young King of France, as he advanced towards manhood, manifested a disposition singularly cruel, bigoted, and treacherous. The Queen mother fostered these qualities, which she shared to the full, and along with him began that system of deceitful blandishments, lavished upon Coligny and the other Huguenot leaders, which were to be the prelude of St. Bartholomew. Coligny appeared at court, and was loaded with favours. A marriage was proposed between Henry of Béarn, now King of Navarre, and the king's sister Margaret. For two years the mask was worn. The royal marriage was celebrated on the 17th August 1572, and Paris was filled with the principal Huguenot gentry. On the evening of the 24th August the festival of St. Bartholomew, that crime was enacted, which in magnitude, malice, and success stands unrivalled even in the blood-stained streets of Paris. There, and throughout France, vast numbers, calculated by historians at from 30,000 to 100,000, were slaughtered in cold blood, and the aged Coligny was among the number of the victims. The slaughter had been planned with the knowledge and advice of the Pope Clement VIII., and when the news of it arrived, "a Solemn Procession" was "made by the Sovereign Pontiff" to the Church of St. Louis, "for the most happy news of the destruction of the Huguenot sect," as is shewn by the official document, of which a copy exists in the Bodleian Library. Silver and copper medals were also struck by the Pope, with his head on one side, and a representation of the slaughter on the other, above the latter being the inscription "VGONOT-TORVM STRAGES 1572." Medals of a similar kind were also struck at Paris, and the national fratricide was treated as if it had been a victory over foreign enemies. Yet the blow eventually improved the position of the Huguenots, who, shutting themselves up in Rochelle and Montauban, defeated with great slaughter the armies sent against them. Another hasty peace was made; and in two years the wretched king ceased to pollute the throne of France.

He was succeeded by his brother Henry III. [A.D. 1574-89], in whose reign the relations between the contending factions became still more intricate. A body called the Politiques had formed itself, consisting of moderate Catholics, who condemned the excesses of civil war. On the other hand, the dependants of the Ultramontane party were formed by Guise into one well united body, which obtained the name of the League. This body had its centre in the fanatical populace of Paris, by whom Guise was idolized, and it became evident that they intended to raise him to the throne. Yet the feeble king, after a vain attempt to abide by more moderate counsels, was compelled to become the head of the League, and to lend a sanction to the violent war which was waged by it against Henry of Navarre, the next heir to the throne. Guise was all powerful; his army overran the Huguenot part of the country; town after town was taken; and at last resistance was confined to the small but unconquerable kingdom of Navarre. Four distinct wars, divided from one another by short, scarcely observed treaties, are enumerated by the historians between St. Bartholomew's Day and the accession of Henry IV. In 1587 Henry, while still King of Navarre, defeated the army of the League at Contros, near Bordeaux. The assassination of Guise by the King in 1588 was followed by the assassination of the King by the Duchess of Montpensier, Guise's sister, in the following year, and Henry IV. was left heir to a vacant throne.

A rival candidate was set up by Mayence, brother of Guise, who now headed the League, in the person of the Cardinal of Bourbon, the only Catholic member of the Bourbon family. Henry now entered on that war for the maintenance of his rights, which was made memorable by the victories of Arques and Tory, and the siege of Paris. The capital was reduced to the utmost extremities of famine, and must have yielded but for the generosity of Henry, who allowed convoys of provisions to enter, and women and children to leave the place. This enabled the League to hold out until a Spanish force under the great Parma entered the field against Henry ; whose cause was then reduced to desperation. It was not until, by the advice of Sully, he had embraced the Roman Catholic religion, that he obtained possession of his kingdom in 1593. Five years afterwards he secured to the Huguenots their civil rights by the Edict of Nantes : which confirmed to them the free exercise of their religion, and gave them equal claims with the Catholics to all offices and dignities. But, according to the old system, this edict, by leaving to them as a security the towns and fortresses which had been ceded to them, afforded them the means of forming a kind of republic within the kingdom ; and such a powerful body, established on terms of mistrust towards the government, could not fail to become sooner or later a source of danger to the state.

It was the work of Richelieu, in the succeeding reign of Louis XIII., to destroy this territorial independence of the Huguenots. The religious war broke out afresh in 1621 ; and the Huguenots lost the greater part of their strongholds through the treachery or cowardice of the governors. Some of them however were still remaining, and among them the important fortified city of Rochelle, when, weary of the war and disunited among themselves, they concluded a peace. But while Rochelle remained, the great cardinal saw that his work was imperfect. That stronghold, situated on the sea, enabled them to keep open their communications with England, and gave them a meeting-place for their independent representative assemblies. The siege of Rochelle was formed, and prosecuted with the utmost vigour by Richelieu in person, the cardinal shewing a genius for war worthy of his political renown. After enduring every extremity, after seeing the English fleet retire without being able to relieve it, Rochelle fell in 1629. The Huguenots were compelled to surrender all their other strongholds ; and lay at the mercy of their enemies. But the opposition of Richelieu was political, not fanatical. Having broken down their autonomy, which was becoming dangerous to the consolidation of France under the monarchy, the object of his policy, he left the Huguenots undisturbed in their religious freedom ; and thus a final settlement seemed to be made of the great struggle which had convulsed France for more than half a century.

This settlement was not disturbed by Mazarin, and might have remained for ever, but for the orthodoxy of Louis XIV. Not to be "of the King's religion" was an offence in the eyes of that monarch, of his confessors, and of his mistresses, an offence for which civic harmlessness could not atone. Louis began to persecute the Huguenots, and in 1681 he deprived them of most of their civil rights. After the death of the moderate Colbert, he was urged still further in the path of persecution by Louvois, Le Jellin, and his confessor, La Chaise the Jesuit. Bodies of dragoons were sent into the South, where the Protestants most abounded, to compel them to abjure their religion. The frontiers were strictly guarded to prevent emigration. Yet more than half a million of Huguenots made their escape to Holland, Germany, Switzerland, and England. Many who remained were forced to renounce their faith. Lists of convicts, real or pretended, were sent to the King, who was led to believe that he had nearly extirpated false opinions in France. Under this impression he took the fatal step of the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the great charter of religious liberty, in 1685. But he had still half a million of Protestant subjects ; and this unjust and senseless policy deprived the kingdom of a great number of rich and useful subjects, whose wealth and skill found a welcome in foreign countries. In the provinces between the Rhone and the Garonne the Protestants continued numerous in spite of emigration ; and the mountains of the Cevennes afforded them shelter. There the CAMISARDS maintained a resistance for twenty years ; and in 1706 compelled the government to come to terms with them.

Under Louis XV. the rigour of the persecution was relaxed : and in 1746 the Protestants began to shew themselves publicly in Languedoc and Dauphiné. The court was as fanatical as ever ; but public opinion was now set strongly against persecution ; and though severe edicts were issued, they could no longer be carried out. The horrible fate of John Calas put an end to all active persecution. This unhappy man, on a false accusation of murdering his son for turning Catholic, was condemned in 1762 by the Parliament of Toulouse to be tortured and then broken on the wheel ; and this sentence was carried out. Voltaire brought the case before the bar of public opinion in his Essay on Toleration, in which he drew attention to the defective state of the criminal law. The family of Calas solicited a revision of the trial. Fifty judges re-examined the evidence, and pronounced Calas to have been entirely innocent. From that time the Protestants were no longer molested ; they were restored to equal rights, but still remained ineligible for public offices.

The Revolution gave them back all their rights, and they frequently laid out their concealed treasures in the purchase of public domains. Their equality with the Catholics was confirmed by the Code Napoleon. At the Restoration they manifested a strong attachment to the former government, and though they did not offer any opposition to the new order of things, yet troubles, attended with bloodshed, took place at Nismes and the vicinity, which were however suppressed by the judicious measures of the government. After the Revolution of 1830, universal freedom of religion was proclaimed by the Reformed Charter of France, and this principle has prevailed ever since. The Protestant Church, in which are included both the Reformed and the Lutheran, is under the control of the State, from which its pastors receive their salaries.

The doctrines held by the Huguenots were those of Calvin ; their worship was extremely simple, preaching being the principal feature in it. The Confession of France was first presented in French in the year 1559, to Francis II. at Amboise, "in the behalf of all the godly of the kingdom;" again in 1561 at Poissy to Charles IX.; and at length was published in Latin in 1566 by the pastors of the French Churches, with a preface to all other evangelical pastors. It may be seen in the Harmonia Confessionum Reformatarum Ecclesiarum, which was published at Geneva in 1581 [English transl. Lond. 1842, Hall's ed.].

HUSSITES. The Hussites were a party among the Bohemians, who, after the execution of Huss, professed to be his immediate followers, and received from their opponents a name derived from his, although they differed from him in many important points both of doctrine and ritual. As soon as the execution of Huss was known, the nobles of Bohemia met together in the chapel of the Bethlehem, and issued an address, denouncing the deed of the Council of Constance. In this Wenceslaus, the king, joined, but the storm of public indignation soon passed beyond his control. A large body of Hussites, consisting of more than 30,000 men, met together on the White Mountain, afterwards called Tabor, near Prague, to celebrate the Eucharist in both kinds, under the guidance of two noblemen, Nicholas of Hussinetz, and Ziska. The first of these died shortly afterwards, and the latter assumed the command in the war that followed. This John of Trocznow, surnamed Ziska, was a nobleman of small means, who had won distinction, and lost an eye in a war between the Prussians and Lithuanians in A.D. 1410. He was afterwards appointed chamberlain to Wenceslaus, with whom he became a great favourite. After the meeting on the White Mountain he led his followers to Prague, where a street tumult kindled the flame of the war which agitated Bohemia for many years. During a procession to the Church of St. Stephen one of the Hussite priests was struck by a stone thrown from the senate-house; Ziska and his followers broke into the house, and murdered the city judge, and seven of the senators, by defenestration, that is, throwing them out of the window, according to the old Bohemian mode of putting criminals to death. This act threw Wenceslaus into a fit of passion, of which he died A.D. 1419.

An important distinction now became observable between the Bohemians in general and the Hussites, or followers of Ziska. The latter set on foot a system of iconoclasm; they defaced the altars, seriously injured the churches, overthrew the monuments, and utterly destroyed a Carthusian convent near Prague. Bohemia at that time prided herself on her beautiful churches, and the havoc caused by the religious war which followed may be estimated by the fact that she has now only one of earlier date than the introduction of the Jesuits. During this civil warfare, a foreign war was also in progress with the Emperor Sigismund, who laid claim to the crown. The national Bohemians or Calixtines, and the Taborite followers of Ziska, united to oppose him, but they held very different opinions. The Bohemians, though Catholic, were antipapal, and while they opposed the Emperor, had yet no objection to monarchy in the abstract, much less to their own old constitutional monarchy; the party of Ziska, on the other hand, anticipated the Protestants of the following century, and the seeds of Socialism had been sown among them. They appealed to no authority in religious matters except the Scriptures, as interpreted by every man's individual judgment. In 1420 they published fourteen articles, of which the following are the most important:—

I. No other writings of learned men are to be received by the faithful, except those that are contained in the Canon. All the rest should be destroyed as the work of Antichrist.

II. Every student in polite literature, and every graduate therein, is vain and a Gentile, and sins against the gospel of Christ.

III. No decrees of the Fathers, no ancient rite or tradition of men, is to be retained, save those which Christ and His apostles have declared in the New Testament; all others are to be abolished as the traditions of Antichrist.

IV. Whence it follows that the holy oil, and the consecration of the water in Baptism, and, in fact, the whole ritual of the Church is rejected.

V. Infants ought not to be baptized with exorcisms, and the use of sponsors is to be discontinued.

VI. All the office books, vestments, monstrances, chalices, &c., are to be destroyed.

VII. Auricular confession is not to be retained.

VIII. The stated fasts of the Church, as Lent, Ember-tide, and the vigils, and in like manner the festivals, except the Lord's Day, are not to be considered of obligatory observance.

IX. The clergy are not to be allowed, as such, to hold property.

To these follow protests against Elevation, Reservation of the Sacrament, Purgatory, Prayers for the Dead, the Invocation of Saints, the erection of images for any purpose whatever.

They did not, however, go to the fullest length in their opposition to the received doctrines. Some of them, indeed, maintained that the bread and wine in the Eucharist are mere signs, but these were expelled from the community. A strange sect, the Adamites, Men of the Free Spirit, who held that, like Adam, they were the sons of God, and went so far as to discard the use of any clothing, alleging his example, were ruthlessly exterminated by Ziska.

Upon the death of Wenceslaus, his widow, Sophia, assumed the regency, and occupied the citadel of Prague with those who had espoused the cause of Sigismund. Ziska failed to reduce the citadel, and at length a suspension of arms was concluded, during which an appeal might be made to the Emperor. Ziska retired to Pilsen, which he fortified, and there proceeded to discipline his forces, in preparation for the conflict he saw was at hand.

The commissioners sent to Sigismund could effect no accommodation. The national excitement increased, and when the Pope (Martin V.) published a crusade against the Bohemians, and the Emperor denounced the ban of the empire against them, they retaliated by a solemn league at Pilsen, in which they rejected him as their king.

The war that followed, glorious as it was for the Bohemians, who, though single-handed, and often divided among themselves, more than held their own against all the power of the papacy and the empire combined, exceeded all former wars in horror, and in the disasters that it brought upon all persons concerned in it. On the one side, it was held that no faith should be kept with heretics, and on the other that it was a sacred duty to destroy the enemies of God's people. In Kuttenberg, a German and Catholic city, no less than 1600 prisoners of war were burned, beheaded, or hanged as heretics, and Ziska retaliated upon priests and monks wherever he could take them. His soldiers were for the most part infantry, but he trained some of them to fight from war chariots, the fiery onset of which was a terror to the Germans, while, when the fight was over, they served to strengthen the fortifications of the camp. He was soon forced by a movement of the royal troops to evacuate Pilsen, whence he betook himself to a mountain in the district of Bechin, which his followers named Tabor, and from it derived their distinctive name of Taborites. It was a hill almost encircled by a river and a torrent. On the exposed side he formed an artificial trench, and within a triple line of fortifications.

In the first campaign [A.D. 1420] Sigismund advanced as far as Prague, and went through the ceremony of his coronation in the castle, granting at the same time general liberty of conscience; but the constant assaults of Ziska forced him to beat a retreat, which soon became a flight, and was followed by a signal defeat in the battle of Wyschehrad. It was in this campaign that Ziska lost his remaining eye by an arrow-shot, but his total blindness did not break off his career of victory. It was his custom to take his stand in the centre of his army on some elevated position, surrounded by his officers; they reported to him the state of affairs, and he issued his orders to them accordingly. In the next campaign another invasion was made; the Germans penetrated as far as Saaz, but the approach of Ziska threw them into a panic, and in the flight that followed they suffered terrible slaughter.

Nor did they fare the better in the following year, A.D. 1422. Sigismund advanced into Moravia with a Hungarian force, but was utterly routed in the battle of Deutchbrod.

A ray of hope was afforded to the Emperor by a quarrel between Ziska and the people of Prague, headed by the nobles, to whom his exactions and sacrilegious excesses had given great dissatisfaction. Ziska fled some distance to the mountains, in which his pursuers became entangled, and were routed with the loss of 3000 men. He fired Cuthna, with the fugitives that were in it, and laid siege to Prague; but a reconciliation was effected by the friendly intervention of John Rochezana, afterwards archbishop. Sigismund now tried to gain over Ziska. He offered him the government of Bohemia, the command of the armies, and a yearly tribute, if he would acknowledge the Emperor as king of Bohemia. But these negotiations were broken off by the death of Ziska from the plague, before the town of Prebislana, which he was besieging. After his death his followers were divided. Many submitted to the leadership of his favourite officer, Procopius, a priest, surnamed the elder to distinguish him from another of the same name; but many refused to acknowledge any successor to their great captain, and, in their sorrow for his loss, styled themselves "orphans." These, however, although governed in the main by councils of war, were always ready to march with the followers of Procopius against their common enemies, and consequently the Taborites continued as formidable as ever.

A new campaign was commenced by a plundering foray into Moravia and Silesia, and another crusade was preached by the Pope against these irreclaimable Bohemians, who had become as great an object of terror as the Turks themselves to the Empire. Three large armies invaded Bohemia, composed of Saxons, Franconians, and Rhinelanders—200,000 in all. But the mere rumour of the enemy's approach served to put them to a shameful flight, with the abandonment of all their treasures and munitions of war in 1427. The Bohemians now determined to retaliate. They assembled together at the White Mountain, whence they broke into the enemy's country on every side, plundering and destroying, and their conduct may be estimated by the fact that they took for their rule of warfare the invasion of Canaan by the Israelites.

Again Sigismund attempted to conciliate his opponents, and at least to detach the national Bohemians or Calixtines from the Taborites. Each party was invited to send commissioners to the Council of Basle, where their grievances might be discussed. In the debate upon their demands Procopius distinguished himself by his eloquence and by the firmness with which he maintained his views, but the Council would concede nothing. A reconciliation was afterwards effected with the Calixtines, chiefly by the labours of Aeneas Sylvius, who obtained the concession that the cup should be allowed to the laity. But the requirements of Procopius and his Taborites were far more extensive, and they refused to be bound by this arrangement. Another invasion of the country proved as unsuccessful as the former, and the victory of Taas was the most complete one gained during the war. Meanwhile the national Bohemians, who had been won over by Æneas Sylvius, determined to put an end to this exhausting strife, and turned against the Taborites. The nobles and burghers met in Diet, and chose Alexius of Wzestiof as chief of the state, an office that was meant to be annual, and a civil war followed. Procopius, the elder, was besieging Pilsen, when he heard of the failure of his younger namesake to maintain himself at Prague against the new governor. Upon this he raised the siege and marched to Prague. He was met at Bochmischgrod, in the neighbourhood of the city, and after an obstinate engagement was himself slain, whilst his followers were exterminated. Tabor itself surrendered, and shortly afterwards the authority of Sigismund was acknowledged throughout the kingdom.

As a political party and military power the Hussites had now ceased to exist, but as a religious body they may be said to have been represented to later ages by the BOHEMIAN BRETHREN.

HUTCHINSONIANS. A school of divines which sprung up in the early part of the eighteenth century, whose leading principle was that the key to all scientific and philosophical truth is to be found in the Holy Scriptures.

John Hutchinson, the founder of this school, was a self-educated Yorkshireman, born at Spennythorn in 1674, and for about twenty years, between the age of twenty and forty, steward in the households of Mr. Bathurst, Lord Scarborough, and the Duke of Somerset. The latter obtained him a sinecure office as purveyor of the royal stables, worth about £200 a year, and this he retained until his death in the year 1737. Hutchinson was an ingenious mechanic, attained some knowledge of Hebrew, and had an empirical acquaintance with natural science. After he obtained his sinecure, he became a voluminous writer, and his collected works, republished in 1748 and 1749, fill twelve octavo volumes, the whole of them having been printed during the last thirteen years of his life.

The philosophy of Hutchinson is chiefly contained in his Moses' Principia; Power Essential and Mechanical; Glory or Gravity; and Glory Mechanical, or the Agent of Nature, and Manner of their Agency explained. He supposes the air to exist in three conditions, fire, light, and spirit; pure fire forming the life and motion-imparting body of the sun, pure light its surrounding medium, and a commixture of light and spirit constituting the atmosphere in which the earth is placed. Beyond the earth, onward to the periphery of the solar system, he imagined the atmosphere to become more and more dense, and as it recedes in distance from the sun, to be less and less capable of that motion which the heat of the sun imparts: until at the verge of the solar system, he found the "outer darkness" and "blackness of darkness" of the Scriptures. In his Moses' Sine Principio, and elsewhere, he suggests that Fire, Light, and Spirit, the three principal agents in nature, are three conditions of one substance, in which he seems to have had a dim foresight of the modern scientific dogma of the "correlation of forces." But the philosophy of Hutchinson oscillated dangerously towards the heresies of Sabellius and the Tritheists when he made these three conditions of one substance explanatory of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. Jones of Nayland expresses this opinion in the words: "Nature shews us these three agents in the world, on which all natural life and motion depend; and these three are used in the Scripture to signify to us the three supreme powers of the Godhead in the administration of the spiritual world" [Jones' Life of Bp. Horne, p. 29, ed. 1801].

Some other characteristics of the Hutchinsonian system are also stated by the last writer, who was one of Hutchinson's greatest admirers. "Few writers for natural religion," he writes, "have shewn any regard to the types and figures of the Scripture, or known much about them. But the Hutchinsonians, with the old Christian Fathers, and the Divines of the Reformation, are very attentive to them, and take great delight in them. They differ in their nature from all the learning of the world; and so much of the wisdom of revelation is contained in them, that no Christian should neglect the knowledge of them. All infidels abominate them. Lord Bolingbroke calls St. Paul a cabalist for arguing from them; but the Hutchinsonians are ambitious of being such cabalists as St. Paul was. In natural philosophy they have great regard to the name of Newton as the most wonderful genius of his kind. But they are sure his method of proving a vacuum is not agreeable to nature." Hutchinson, in fact, spent a large part of his time in endeavouring to overthrow the Newtonian theory of gravitation, denying that inert matter could be capable of active qualities, and maintaining that motion was the result of an universal force, exercised by the fluid medium which he divided into Fire, Light, and Spirit.

Among many other interpretations which the Hutchinsonians gave to the Old Testament Scriptures, they believed the cherubim of Eden, of the Tabernacle, and of Ezekiel's vision, to be mystical figures of deep signification, especially as typifying the Divine attributes; and it was part of their theory that all heathen idolatry originated in corrupt notions respecting these mystical figures. Laborious and interminable essays on the cherubim are extant in the writings of Hutchinson's disciples, as well as in his own; and this mysticism also occupies a large place in the sermons of the clergy belonging to the school. Almost equally prolix were their speculations on the Names of God, on the garden of Eden, and on the symbolism of sacrificial ceremonies. These speculations are not without a certain value, but they are too often of a one-sided character, based almost entirely on peculiar and untrustworthy notions respecting the Hebrew language, and undertaken with far too little knowledge of, or regard for, the received theology of Christendom.

The most distinguished divines of the Hutchinsonian school were Bishop Horne, Jones of Nayland, Parkhurst and Romaine; and most of the more learned clergy among the early Evangelicals belonged to the school. Many of the Scotch Episcopal clergy also adopted Hutchinsonian tenets; and among others, Macfarlane, Bishop of Moray and Ross in 1787, who carried out Hutchinson's view of the doctrine of the Trinity in such a manner as to lay himself open to the charge of Sabellianism.

There were, indeed, few of the school who did not fall into error respecting the eternal generation of the Second Person in the Blessed Trinity, and Neale remarks that even a few passages of Jones of Nayland require to be received with all possible charity, while some of Bishop Horne's assertions cannot be defended at all [Neale's Life of Bishop Torrey, 29].

Hutchinsonianism died out during the first quarter of the nineteenth century. The later Evangelical clergy had not the same taste for speculative study that had made it attractive to their predecessors, and were more engaged in writing hortatory sermons than in working out labyrinthine problems respecting the cherubim. Hutchinson's opposition to the Newtonian system failed, moreover, to hold its place against the faith of modern science, which will not permit that system even to be called in question. While, lastly, his philological views respecting Hebrew have been exploded by the more thorough knowledge of the Semitic languages.

HUTITES. A religious fraternity formed in the sixteenth century by an Anabaptist, named John Hut, Huta, or Hutter, at Marhern, in Moravia. A writer in the time of the Commonwealth describes them as living "at this day in great number at Marhern in palaces and convents, upon their accidental contributions, and where they get their livelihood with their hands, and apply themselves to any handicraft whereof they are the masters and governors, who by the commodities gained by them increase the common stock. They have at home with them their cooks, their scullions, their errand boys, and their butlers, who have a care, and dispose of all things as they do in monasteries and hospitals. They study to maintain mutual peace and concord, being all equal. These, even to this day, are commonly known by the name of the Hutsian Fraternity" [Pagitt's Heresiology, app.]. This settlement of Hut at Marhern appears likely to have been the original from which the Hernnhut settlement of the Moravians under Count Zinzendorf, in the eighteenth century, was copied. [MORAVIANS.]

HYDROPARASTATÆ. Water-officers: that is, those who offered water instead of wine in the Holy Eucharist. This heretical practice was not confined to one sect, but was common to several. Gieseler says to "many" parties, but he does not enumerate the parties. Clement of Alexandria, giving a mystical interpretation of the "bread and water" of Prov. ix. 17, and using the additional verses which are found in the Septuagint, says that the Scripture manifestly applies the terms "bread and water" to those heresies which use bread and water in the Eucharist, not according to the rule of the Church. "For there are some who celebrate the Eucharist with water only" [Clem. Alex. Strom. I. xix.]. St. Chrysostom speaks of the evil heresy of those who used water only in the mysteries. He cites our Lord's words, "I will not henceforth drink," &c. [Matt. xxvi. 29], and urges that, to pluck up this heresy by the roots, the cup of our Lord's ordinary resurrection-table was a cup of wine [Chrysost. Hom. in Matt. lxxxii. Field's ed. ii. p. 462-3]. St. Cyprian's Epistle to Cæcilius is on this practice; on the practice, however, not as proceeding from an heretical principle, but from a desire to avoid notice in time of persecution. Cyprian shews that wine is necessary for the legitimate consecration of the sacrifice; and expressing his hope that the omission may have been pardonable in the case he is dealing with, as arising from ignorance or misapprehension, he warns Cæcilius of the guilt that will be incurred by continuing the practice after admonition [Cyp. Ep. lxiii. Dict. of Theol., CONCOMITANCE].

Leaving this case, and confining ourselves to the practice as proceeding from heresy, it will be seen at once that the practice indicates heresy regarding our Lord's Person, and the sacrifice of His death. If the Holy Eucharist were instituted merely on the principle of a memoria technica, merely a reminder to us, it would be otherwise. But when the Body broken and Blood shed are to be re-presented to God, and are to be our necessary spiritual food and sustenance, the Mysteries must needs correspond to the Passion, and the outward signs to the thing signified. A departure from the sign shews a previous departure from the faith. Whence Irenæus writes of the Ebionites, "They are vain, not receiving by faith into their soul the union of God and man. . . . Therefore do these men reject the commixture of the heavenly wine, and wish it to be water of the world only, not receiving God so as to have union with Him" [Iren. Hæc. v. 1].

The followers of Tatian, again, used the same custom; the asceticism of the ENCRATITES springing from the belief that matter is the source of evil. Hence they endeavoured by excessive rigour to mortify the flesh. Consistently, they denied the reality of Christ's Body. From this came their rejection of the element of wine. As Docetæ, they held that Christ did not die, and consequently that we are not redeemed by His blood. And if there be no real bloodshedding, why should wine, the symbol of blood, be used? The unreal, shadowy blood, cannot have a real, substantial symbol.

The practice of the Hydroparastatæ incidentally draws out the opinions of some of the Fathers respecting the mixture of water with wine (an almost universal custom of the Church) in the Eucharist. Irenæus and Cyprian take the same view respecting it, Irenæus stating its symbolism as it looks to the Divine Nature of Christ Himself, Cyprian as it looks to those who are made members of Christ. In the former view, the union of God and man is typified in the commixture, the two natures of Christ being set forth: in the latter, from the foundation of the general principle that in Scripture water symbolizes peoples, the water of the mixed cup is taken to represent the faithful who are joined unto Christ. The two views coalesce. "When, therefore, the mingled cup and the manufactured bread receive the Word of God, and the Eucharist becomes the Body of Christ, from which the substance of our flesh is increased and supported, how can it be affirmed that the flesh is incapable of receiving the gift of God, which is life eternal, which flesh is nourished from the Body and Blood of the Lord, and is a member of Him? Even as the blessed Paul declares, 'We are members of His Body, of His Flesh, and of His Bones'" [Iren. v. 2].

Cyprian, although his primary object was to shew the necessity of the wine in the mixed cup, speaks very strongly on the necessity of the element of water. "Water cannot be offered alone, as neither can the wine be offered alone: for if the wine be offered by itself, the blood of Christ begins to be without us; and if the water be alone, the people begin to be without Christ" [Ep. ad Cæcil. p. 154, Fell].

The Canons relating to this subject are: [I.] St. Basil, Canon i. [A.D. 370], in which the Hydroparastatæ are named after the Encratites, as if their custom had not been adopted by all the Encratites. The chief point named in the Canon is the alteration of the form of baptism by the Encratites. [II.] The third Council of Braga, Canon I. [A.D. 675], which condemns sundry errors in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, and quotes St. Cyprian, as given above. [III.] The Quinisextine Council, Canon xxxii. [A.D. 692], which condemns both the Hydroparastatæ and the Armenians, who offered wine alone. This Canon quotes St. Chrysostom (as referred to above), and, secondly, produces the authorities of the Liturgies of SS. Basil and James, and the fortieth Canon of the Council of Carthage [A.D. 408].

HYDROTHEITÆ. A sect of heretics are mentioned by several of the early heresiologists as holding the opinion that all created things had emanated by a process of spontaneous evolution from the element of water, which they alleged to be co-eternal with God. Nothing is known of their history, or of the locality to which this heresy belonged. Probably it was nothing more than the speculation of some early materialists [HERMOGENIANS], never formulated into the dogma of a sect. The name is found only in Prædestinatus, but Dauæns assigns that of "Aquæi" to them in his edition of St. Augustine. [Philast. Hær. xcvi. Aug. Hær. lxxv. Prædest. Hær. lxxv.]

HYMENÆUS. One of the two heretics mentioned by St. Paul, as having "erred concerning the truth, saying that the resurrection is past already," and who had not only been guilty of holding such errors themselves, but had spread their false doctrine among others, and "overthrown the faith of some" [2 Tim. ii. 18]. He was probably the same person who is elsewhere named with Alexander as having put away a good conscience, and made shipwreck concerning the faith [1 Tim. i. 19]. The heresy of Hymenæus and Alexander was of so serious a description, that St. Paul had passed on them the extreme sentence of excommunication, which he expresses in the words, "Whom I have delivered unto Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme" [1 Tim. i. 20]. The Apostle also characterizes the heresy of Hymenæus and Philetus as "profane and vain babblings," of which he predicts that "they will increase to more ungodliness," and that their doctrine "will eat as doth a cancer" or gangrene [2 Tim. ii. 16-18]. From these few indications, it would seem that the heresy of Hymenæus was an early form of that which afterwards became known by the name of Valentinus, the dogma that "the resurrection is past already" being one which Tertullian specially attributes to the Valentinians [Tertull. De Præscr. Hæret. xxxiii.], and the "profane and vain babblings" being singularly characteristic of the Gnostic theories, which did indeed eat into the Eastern Churches like a deadly cancer.

The Gnostics in general interpreted the resurrection allegorically, maintaining that to "rise again" was to receive the γνῶσις, or secret knowledge of God, which they possessed and handed on to the initiated. Hence "the resurrection" was "passed already" when a man received this knowledge. Such, probably, was the heresy of Hymenæus and Philetus. The wide extent to which such a heresy reached in the very first age of the Church is shewn by St. Paul's words to the Corinthians, "How say some among you, that there is no resurrection of the dead?" [1 Cor. xv. 12]; and by those of Polycarp to the Philippians, "Whosoever perverts the oracles of the Lord to his own lusts, and says that there is neither resurrection nor judgment, he is the first-born of Satan" [Polyc. ad Philipp. vii.]. The immoral tendency of a heresy which virtually repudiates the expectation of a future life is obvious; and when St. Paul says that Hymenæus and Alexander had put away a good conscience, he indicates that this tendency was already manifested.

HYPOTHETICAL UNIVERSALISTS.
[AMYRALDISTS.]

HYPYSTARIANS. A sect of heretics which existed in Cappadocia in the fourth century, the leading principle of whose belief was the recognition of God only as "the Most High" ["Υψιστος"]. They rejected sacrifices and circumcision, but observed the Jewish Sabbath and Jewish distinctions of clean and unclean food. They also held the Jewish objection to pictures and images, but used fire and lights as representative symbols of the Deity, apparently using them in the same manner in which they were used by the Magians.

These heretics are only noticed under the name of ὑψισταριοί by St. Gregory of Nyssa [adv. Eunom. ii.] and St. Gregory of Nazianzum [Orat. xviii. 5], but they appear to be the Cappadocian representatives of a widely-spread eclectic heresy in which an attempt was made to combine such portions of Judaism, Magianism, and Christianity as were not utterly irreconcilable. They seem to be closely allied to the EUPHEMITES or Masalian Syrians and Phœnicians [Epiphan. Hær. lxviii.], who professed to be neither heathens nor Christians, yet originated in heathenism.

I

ICONOCLASTS. The name of a party in the Church which maintained a long controversy on the subject of the devotional use of pictures and statues, a controversy that raged with great violence in the East for more than a century, i.e. from the tenth year of the reign of Leo III. [A.D. 726] to the second year of the regency of the Empress Theodora [A.D. 843].

To understand its bearings we must recollect that a great change had swept over the whole Christian Church on the question of the use of external aids to devotion. Not only had an elaborate ritual arisen, but the arts of painting and sculpture had been pressed into the service of the sanctuary, and by the eighth century almost every church possessed its pictures or images or relics, in which some special virtue was believed to reside, and which were the objects of attachment and veneration to the whole congregation. Some indeed enjoyed a far wider reputation. At Edessa there was a famous statue made after a likeness of our Saviour, which Christ Himself had sent to King Abgarus [Euseb. Eccl. Hist. i. 13, ii. 1], and which was said to have saved that city from the arms of the Persian monarch, Chosroes Mishirvan [A.D. 611]. This miraculous image was often appealed to during the controversy; by Gregory II. in an epistle to Leo the Isaurian [Isaur. Concil. tom. viii. 656]; by John of Damascus [Opera, tom. i. p. 281, edit. Lequien], and by the second Nicene Council [Act v. p. 1030]. At Rome there was the famous "veronica" handkerchief. In Diospolis in Phrygia there was a church on one of whose marble pillars the face of the Blessed Virgin had been supernaturally outlined. All this was a great contrast to the belief and habits of the first centuries of the Christian era. Churches then possessed neither images nor pictures. On the contrary there was an actual dislike of both, which is quite accounted for by the opposition raised by the early Christians to the idolatry that surrounded them.

There are however frequent protests made by early writers which seem to betoken a change of sentiment on this subject. Tertullian [A.D. 160-240] insisted that God forbade the making equally with the worship of an image [Tertull. de Idolatria, c. 3]. In another tract he appears to disapprove of a Christian pursuing the trade of either a painter or a statuary [Tertull. contr. Hermog. c. 3]. Origen [A.D. 185-255] said that the use of images was of the Ophites [Orig. contr.

Cels. vii. 4]. The thirty-sixth canon of the Council of Illiberis [c. A.D. 305] forbids pictures in churches, "lest that which is worshipped and adored be painted on the walls;" an enactment evidently levelled against a recent and growing practice. Eusebius of Cæsarea, writing to Constantia, sister of Constantine the Great, says that no one ought to attempt to represent the personages of Scripture, that the glory of the Saviour cannot be represented, and that the true image of the saints is a holy life [Hardu. Concil. iv. 405]. St. Augustine [A.D. 354-430] wrote: "Do not follow the crowds of ignorant persons, who even under the shelter of the true religion itself become so superstitious or surrender themselves so far to their lustful imaginations (libidinibus) that they forget what they have promised to God. I know that many are adorers of sepulchres and pictures," &c. [Aug. de Mor. Eccl. Cath. xxxiv.].

Epiphanius, Bishop of Constantia in Cyprus [A.D. 394], tore with his own hands a curtain in a church of Palestine, declaring that the painting of a figure of the Saviour or of a saint upon it was contrary to Scripture [Hieron. Ep. li. 9]. About two hundred years later Serenus, Bishop of Marseilles, removed or demolished the pictures in the churches of that town, because of the misuse the common people made of them. This involved him in a correspondence with Gregory the Great, whose verdict on his conduct ran thus: "We altogether commend you for having forbidden the worship of images, but we blame you for having broken them" [Greg. Ep. ix. 91]. This moderate judgment found much favour in the Western Church, and Charlemagne closes the four Caroline Books with an allusion to it, although the ardent Roman apologist Baronius [A.D. 1538-1607] has endeavoured to evacuate it of its real meaning, by interpreting Gregory's prohibition as against the worship of the material colours used in making the image or picture.

The above quoted passages amount to an occasional protest against what at the same time they prove the existence of, a gradual reaction against the primitive simplicity of worship, and a widespread sentiment in favour of the use of images; a sentiment which became firmly established by the close of the sixth century, and had run into such extremes by the commencement of the eighth century that many writers have considered them to justify as well as explain the iconoclastic mania. People knelt before images, burned incense and lighted candles before them.

Some of the clergy scraped off the paint from them, and mingling it with the eucharistic elements, administered the mixture to the communicants [Mich. ap. Baron. 824, 16]. The rich used to send their bread to the church, to have it held up to an image before eating it. Some people even employed images as sponsors for their children, a course defended by Theodore, nephew of the Abbot Plato, when introduced by the Patriarch Nicephorus to argue with Leo the Armenian [A.D. 814].

But in the earlier part of the eighth century a reaction sprung up in the East of Europe. A party of "image-breakers" arose, which was even more fanatical and extreme in its opposition to images, and in the means employed to abolish them. The rise of the "Iconoclastic Controversy" which followed is by some writers thrown as far back as A.D. 712. In that year the Emperor Philippicus Bardanes ordered the removal of a picture of the sixth General Council from the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople, and sent an order of a similar character to Rome. Pope Constantine made a vigorous protest; and caused the Emperor to be condemned as an apostate for what looks like a repudiation of the council rather than of the picture, and he also followed up this protest by directing that pictures of the six General Councils should be suspended in the porch of St. Peter's. But Leo III. "the Isaurian," who came to the throne A.D. 717, was undoubtedly an iconoclastic emperor. At the time of his elevation from the army to the imperial dignity, the Mahometans were pressing hard on the Byzantine empire, and the first eight or ten years of his reign were occupied in defending his kingdom and his capital itself against the Saracen foe under Moslemah. During this time there were no symptoms of his future hostility to images; it was only as external troubles disappeared that his secret antipathy began to manifest itself. As a first step he wanted the Pope to consent to a General Council being summoned to consider the whole question; but Gregory demurred to the proposal. He then desired that the images and paintings on the walls of the churches should be raised higher so as to be out of the reach of the embraces and kisses of the devout multitude. Then discovering that his object was by no means attained, he issued an edict forbidding the worship of all statues, paintings, or mosaics. The chronology of this period is obscure, but the date of the last step is generally placed at A.D. 724-726. There is much obscurity also attending the investigation of the causes which led both Leo and his successors into this line of action. The edicts and letters which might have thrown light on the reasons assigned are not extant, but conjecture would certainly suggest that in the case of the once humble Isaurian, it must have been a barbarian dislike of the fine arts, rather than the championship of a more spiritual religion, which actuated him in the course that he pursued. Others have supposed it to be the action of a general who found men relying for safety on their tutelar images instead of their own military exertions, or part of the scheme of an ambitious monarch wishing to establish an ecclesiastical as well as a civil autocracy. Legend also has attempted to supply the motive. A thick smoke was said to have been seen rising from the sea between the islands of Thera and Terasia, and this was interpreted to Leo as a token of the displeasure of Heaven against the permission of image-worship. It was rumoured that Leo, while still an obscure youth on his native hills, had been met by two Jews, who promised him the sovereignty on a condition which they afterwards called on him to fulfil; that condition being the extirpation of image-worship throughout his dominions. Another report said that he was under the influence of a certain Bezer, formerly in the service of the Caliph, and an apostate from the Christian faith. But whether the emperor acted proprio motu or at the suggestion of others, it is certain that this first edict was shortly followed by a second of a far more sweeping and severe character, ordering a general destruction of images throughout the Western empire. Its precise date is unknown, but it must be placed before the death of Gregory II. in A.D. 731, as that Pontiff was among its most strenuous opponents. No words can exaggerate the dismay which it occasioned, or the tumult and agitation which followed its promulgation; unlike the decision of some abstruse question in a court of law, or the authoritative solution of some metaphysical subtlety which would only agitate the narrow intellectual circle capable of understanding its bearings, this was a question affecting the religious life of multitudes. Every church had its picture or its image, before which rich and poor had been accustomed to offer their devotions; almost every household had its representation of some patron saints, which they had been wont to regard with feelings of the utmost affection. It has been suggested that the effect would be similar if an order were issued to destroy the images of the Blessed Virgin which deck the thoroughfares of a modern Roman Catholic town; but even this would not effect such a total revulsion of both domestic and public feeling as the first iconoclastic edict of Leo the Isaurian. It was the signal for sedition at home and revolt abroad. In Constantinople the soldiers who were charged with the execution of the order were insulted and maltreated. The man who dared to plant his ladder against the palace gate, and to demolish the time-honoured image of Christ with which it was adorned, was hurled to the ground and killed by the indignant mob. Abroad an insurrection was organized in the Cyclades, under a leader named Stephanus. In Greece the usurper Cosmas was proclaimed by the rebels. In Italy the provinces subject to the Greek empire threw off their allegiance. At an appeal from Gregory II., Ravenna, whose exarch lost his life, Venice, the cities of the exarchate, and Pentapolis, declared against Leo, and refused the usual tribute, and what caused more anxiety, the fleet despatched against them to the Adriatic Sea was repulsed off Ravenna.

But Leo was not without his supporters. The army was devoted to him, and there was a small section of the ecclesiastical body which declined to oppose him, of which Theodosius, metropolitan of Ephesus, Constantine, Bishop of Nacolia in Phrygia, John, Bishop of Synnada, Thomas, Bishop of Claudiopolis in Paphlagonia, are mentioned as leaders. But it had far more formidable opponents, both in position and ability. First of all there was Germanus, the Patriarch of Constantinople, who had reached the venerable age of ninety-six, and whom, when unable to win him over, Leo did not hesitate to depose, and to supersede by his own secretary Anastasius. Then there was the famous controversialist, John of Damascus, who delivered three orations advocating the proper use of images, which from their learning and eloquence have won for their author the title of Doctor of Christian art. Pope Gregory II. [A.D. 715-731] likewise wrote in favour of images. He is the author of two extant letters to Leo, in which he upbraids him with fickleness and impiety, refuses the request for a General Council, defies him to attempt to carry his edicts into execution, and finally predicts the most disastrous consequences if he does so. His successor, Gregory III., pursued the same policy, and summoning a synod of ninety-three bishops at Rome, openly pronounced sentence of condemnation on iconoclasm and its imperial author.

The Emperor Leo was succeeded, A.D. 741, by his son Constantine Copronymus. During the first year of his reign, while he was absent on an expedition against the Saracens, the hopes of the image-worshippers revived, and a report being spread of the Emperor's death, they attempted to place Artavasdus, his brother-in-law, and a favourer of images, on the throne in his stead. This resolution was supported by the Patriarch, who, having been an iconoclast under Leo, changed sides under Artavasdus, and veered round once more to his original party under Constantine.

Ten years of comparative quiet followed the suppression of this rebellion, lasting until Constantine summoned the bishops to meet at the capital in a council known as the third Council of Constantinople [A.D. 754], and which also aspired to the grander title (one never acknowledged in the West) of the seventh (Ecumenical Council. It consisted of three hundred and forty-eight bishops, who unanimously condemned image-worship. Unfortunately the Acts of the Council have perished, but from the passages which are quoted for condemnation by the Fathers assembled at Nice [A.D. 787] we learn that it ordered the destruction of all images and paintings both public and private; persons found with images in their possession, if ecclesiastics, were to be degraded, if laymen, excommunicated; to make an image of Christ was said to involve either Nestorianism in separating the persons of Christ, or Eutychianism in confounding the two substances; and the chief champions of image-worship, the Patriarch Germanus, John of Damascus, and George of Cyprus, were ana-thematized by name. The great flaw in the constitution of this Council was that none of the patriarchates were represented in it. The Bishop of Rome was not present either in person or by deputy. The see of Constantinople was vacant, Anastasius having died just before the first sitting, and his successor, an iconoclastic monk named Constantine, Bishop of Sylæum, not being nominated till its close, lest it should be said that its deliberations had been presided over by a nominee of the Emperor. The other three patriarchs, those of Antioch, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, were under Mahometan dominion, and could not have obtained leave to be present. In their absence the council was presided over by Theodosius, Bishop of Ephesus and exarch of Asia, and Pastillus, Bishop of Perga and Metropolitan of Pamphylia.

The attempt to carry out the decisions of the Council was met by universal opposition on the part of the monks, and then followed a general persecution of the monks by the Emperor, who attempted to exterminate the whole order. Among the most famous victims were a certain Andrew, who for having ventured contumeliously to remonstrate with the Emperor, was publicly scourged and afterwards strangled; another zealous monk named Stephen was thrown into prison and there assassinated. The patriarch himself having incurred the suspicions of the Emperor's party, was deposed, insulted, scourged, led round the city on an ass, and having been compelled to assent to the consecration of Nicetas, a Slavonian eunuch in his place, finally beheaded. These cruelties, of which the above instances are only samples, were effectual for the time. Iconoclasm was triumphant for the rest of the reign of Constantine Copronymus, who died during an expedition against the Bulgarians [A.D. 775]. He was succeeded by his son and heir Leo IV., surnamed the Chazar, a man of feeble health and mild disposition, who continued his father's opposition to the monkish party, but in a much less severe form. This was partly owing to the influence of his wife Irene, a lady sprung from an Athenian family well known for their attachment to image-worship, and who figures very prominently during the next twenty years of the controversy. Emboldened by a knowledge of Irene's sympathy and Leo's mildness of character some officers ventured stealthily to introduce images into the palace itself. They were detected and severely punished, and for the rest of his short reign of four years and a half Leo's persecuting character was more strongly developed.

Constantine VI., who succeeded his father on the throne [A.D. 780], was a boy only ten years of age, and his mother Irene acted as regent during his minority. Her opposition to the iconoclastic policy of the last three Emperors began now more plainly to manifest itself. As a first step permission was publicly granted to every one to employ images in domestic acts of worship. Then Paul, a Cypriot by birth, who had been elevated by Leo IV. from the office of reader to that of patriarch, was induced, probably by Irene's solicitations, to retire from his dignity into a monastery. This left the Empress free to elect a successor who would carry out her views. She selected a layman, Tarasius, one of her privy counsellors, who was known to be favourable to images; and his appointment was followed by the summoning of a general council to be held at Constantinople. To this course Pope Hadrian gave his consent, allowing himself to be represented by two legates, Peter, chief presbyter of St. Peter's, and another Peter, abbot of St. Sabes. The Eastern patriarchs were also indirectly represented by two monks, John, the late syncellus of the patriarch of Antioch, and Thomas, who had been Abbot of St. Arsenius in Egypt, and became afterwards Archbishop of Thessalonica. The Council held its first session at Constantinople, but in consequence of the disturbances raised by the troops, who were still devotedly attached to the memory of Leo III. and Constantine Copronymus, no business could be transacted, and the session was adjourned. It met again [A.D. 787] at the quieter town of Nice. Here between three hundred and thirty and three hundred and eighty-seven prelates assembled and proclaimed the legality of image-worship with as much vehemence and unanimity as the Council of Constantinople [A.D. 754] had condemned it. They were at the same time careful to distinguish between the reverence (τιμητική προσκύνησις) due to images and the worship (λατρεία) to be paid to God alone. It has also been asserted that they referred to pictures only, a limitation to which the Greek Church adheres to this day. Much exception has been taken to the arguments employed and the apocryphal miracles quoted in defence of images on this occasion, but over and beyond this reason the English Church has refused to recognise the claim of this second Council of Nice to the title of Seventh General Council on these grounds: [1] Because no subsequent recognition of its œcumenicity has been given by the universal Church; [2] because the Eastern Church was only informally represented so far as concerned the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem; [3] because the representation of the Western Church was more nominal still, and neither Gaul nor Germany acquiesced in its decisions. This is proved by the Caroline Books, which, composed by Alcuin and the French bishops, but published in the name of Charlemagne [A.D. 788], reject this second Council of Nicaea equally with the third of Constantinople; and also by the Council of Frankfort [A.D. 794], whose second canon is to the same effect.

Constantine VI. came of age A.D. 791, and the remaining six years were occupied in a desperate struggle between him and his mother for the reins of government. At last Irene gained the upper hand, and after blinding her son, a deed of cruelty which Cardinal Baronius and other Roman advocates have vainly attempted to palliate [Baron. Annal. sub. ann. 796], she enjoyed five years of sole rule [A.D. 797-802], until, in the latter year, she was dethroned and banished to the island of Lesbos, where she died in the year following. Her secretary, Nicephorus, who had headed the rebellion, then ascended the throne. During his reign [A.D. 802-811] and that of his successor's, Stauracius, who only reigned a few months, and of Michael I., surnamed Rhangabes [A.D. 811-813], the controversy was allowed to slumber. But when in the latter year Michael, feeling his own incapacity for the sovereignty, retired into a monastery in favour of Leo V., surnamed the Armenian [A.D. 813-820], it broke out again. This Emperor, nicknamed the Chameleon, from his vacillating policy at his consecration, when he declined to make any personal declaration of faith, seems to have allowed several synods to be held; the first under Nicephorus [A.D. 814], which pronounced in favour of images; the second [A.D. 815], which consented to the deposition of that patriarch as a heretic, in consequence of which he was banished and lingered fourteen years in a monastery; the third [A.D. 816], under the presidency of Theodotus Cassiteras, a layman of noble birth but of iconoclastic family, being a collateral descendant of Constantine Copronymus, and whom Leo had raised to the vacant throne; this synod openly annulled the decisions of the second Nicene Council [A.D. 787] and re-affirmed those of the third Council of Constantinople [A.D. 754]. It was accompanied by an imperial edict forbidding image-worship, to which the Emperor is said to have been urged by the prophecies of some obscure monk, who foretold a glorious reign if he would tread in the steps of his famous predecessor Leo the Isaurian. John the Grammarian and Antony, Bishop of Sylæum in Pamphylia, were among the few men of eminence who supported this policy, which was unrelentingly opposed by the monks, especially by Theodore the Studite, who, like many others, endured scourging and imprisonment rather than acknowledge Cassiteras or consent to give up the use of images. In A.D. 820 Leo V. was assassinated by conspirators in the midst of the sacred rites early on Christmas morning, and one of his generals named Michael was taken from prison and chains for elevation to the imperial throne. Michael II., surnamed the Stammerer, being an ignorant man, and generally indifferent to all ecclesiastical questions, tolerated both parties with a contemptuous impartiality. Antony of Sylæum, the Iconoclast, was raised to the patriarchate A.D. 821, but the banished monks were at the same time allowed to return, not excepting Theodore the Studite, who however was found intractable, and being again banished died in exile [A.D. 826].

In A.D. 829 Michael was succeeded by Theophilus, his son by his first wife Thecla, and the most bitter and cruel of all the iconoclast emperors. He had been the pupil of John the Grammarian, whom he raised to the patriarchate on the death of Antony in A.D. 832, and who probably presided at the local synod which in that year repeated the condemnation of image-worship. Thereupon Theophilus announced his determination no longer to copy his predecessors' indifference, but to root out the whole race of monks from the face of the earth. The cruelties of preceding reigns were repeated in an exaggerated form. One entire confraternity, the Abrahamites, are said to have suffered martyrdom on an island in the Euxine Sea. Others were scourged and imprisoned. A celebrated painter Lazarus had his hands burnt with hot-iron plates to prevent his pursuing his hated art. Two brothers, Theophanes the singer and Theodore the illuminator, were branded in the face with some iambics which had been composed by the Emperor, who in consequence of these and similar cruelties has been called by his opponents a second Belshazzar, but has been described by his apologists as "a most virtuous prince, equal to the greatest emperors, a most rigid exacter of justice, and the severe punisher of all impiety, a Tydidēs melior patre" [Spanheim, Hist. Imag. p. 584]. But the failure of these violent efforts to extirpate the popular affection for images might be traced to his own roof. His wife Theodora and her mother Theoctista, had always cherished a fondness for them, and though the secret was discovered by the impertinent curiosity of a dwarf and revealed to the husband, he would not resort to harsh measures against his nearest relations. He died in A.D. 842, and the history of A.D. 780 repeated itself. There was another minor, Michael III., afterwards known as "The Drunkard," entrusted to the guardianship of two image-worshipping uncles, Manuel and Theoctistus, and another empress mother left as regent, whose sentiments corresponded to those of Irene. At first indeed Theodora was restrained by affection for her late husband and unwillingness to compromise his memory, but when these scruples had been overcome she gladly gave vent to her own prepossessions. The monks were recalled from banishment; a synod was summoned which restored the Nicene decrees. John the Grammarian, who had been made patriarch by Theophilus, being found unwilling to recant his iconoclasm, was deposed, and Methodius, a monk and confessor in the late reign, substituted in his place.

On the 19th of February, the first Sunday in Lent [A.D. 842], a solemn perambulation of St. Sophia took place, headed by the archbishop and clergy, the Empress and her infant son, and that day has ever since been observed by the Eastern Church as the Feast of Orthodoxy, or thanksgiving for the final overthrow of that iconoclastic heresy which for more than a century had disturbed the peace of the Church.

There is little to record of that party after this date beyond the fact, supported by two later allusions to it, that it dwindled gradually away. When the patriarch Photius appealed to Pope Nicolas against his rival Ignatius [A.D. 860], the application was nominally made for aid to extinguish a remnant of the iconoclastic party. Nine years later, at the eighth General Council at Constantinople [A.D. 869], Theodore, surnamed Κρίθινος, Nicetas, an ecclesiastic, and two laymen, Theophanes a jurist, and Theophilus, were accused of iconoclasm. The three latter, overawed by the unanimity of the Council, confessed their error; the first named, along with all who then did or should hereafter share his opinions, were pronounced to be under an anathema.

Papal share in the Iconoclastic controversy. The Roman Church was largely and not always indirectly affected by the controversy that raged at Constantinople. Its members, like those of the Greek Church, were devotedly attached to images and pictures, and used them habitually as aids to devotion and as decorations of their churches. Pope John VII. [A.D. 705-708] dedicated a chapel in St. Peter's to the Blessed Virgin, whose walls were inlaid with representations of the saints of former days; and his successors, still in theory subjects of the Eastern empire, were only the representatives of the popular feeling in the various steps by which they represented the impious decrees of the Byzantine emperors. It may be useful to subjoin a summary of the different occasions on which collisions occurred, although most of them have been alluded to in the foregoing columns.

In A.D. 712, when Philippicus Bardanes sent an order to Rome for the removal of a picture of the sixth General Council, Pope Constantine not only declined to obey it but had several additional pictures suspended, and in a synod summoned at the same time caused the Emperor to be condemned as an apostate. His successor Gregory II. [A.D. 715-731] was the author of two letters of remonstrance to Leo the Isaurian, which have been preserved, without date, in the Acts of the Nicene Council [Isaur. Conc. viii. 651-674]. In them he declares Leo unworthy of the name of a Christian; to which Theophanes and other Byzantine historians add that it was at his suggestion that the Italian provinces refused to pay the usual tribute, though they continued nominally under the Eastern rule till the coronation of Charlemagne [A.D. 800], but for whose succour and that of his father Pepin they must have become the subjects of the Lombards under their successive monarchs, Liutprand, Astolphus, and Desiderius. Pope Gregory III. [A.D. 731-741], a Syrian by birth, pursued the same policy. In the second year of his pontificate ninety-three bishops met at Rome and condemned iconoclasm and all its abettors, a step for which Leo took revenge by confiscating Sicily, Calabria, and other parts of his dominions, and transferring Greece and Illyricum from the Roman to the Byzantine patriarchate. His successor Zacharias was the first pope who did not obtain the imperial sanction to his election through the exarch of Ravenna. From the Iconoclast Council of Constantinople [A.D. 754] Stephen II. held entirely aloof; but when twenty-one years later it was proposed by Tarasius to summon a council for the purpose of restoring image-worship, Pope Adrian not only expressed his approbation but consented to be represented at Nice [A.D. 787] by two legates. In his answer to the Eastern patriarch he fortifies the orthodox party by repeating how, when on one occasion St. Paul and St. Peter appeared to Constantine the Great in a dream, the latter recognised his heavenly visitors by their resemblance to pictures of them in the possession of Pope Sylvester. Later on Pascal [A.D. 817] refused to admit the envoys of Leo the Armenian, but sent his own legates to the Emperor to intercede for image-worship, and built a monastery for the reception of Greek refugees, and assigned a church for the performance of the liturgy in their own language. In a similar way he dismissed the legates of Michael the Stammerer, who arrived [A.D. 824] with costly presents for St. Peter's, to justify that Emperor's attitude by quoting the extremes to which image-worship sometimes ventured. He also censured a work against the use of images in divine worship which appeared about this time from the pen of Claudius, Bishop of Turin. Once afterwards [A.D. 860] Photius thought that the surest way to secure papal sympathy for his side would be by representing to Nicolas that his appeal against his rival Ignatius was really an appeal for aid in suppressing the then dormant, if not quite extinct, spirit of iconoclasm.

Western share in the Iconoclastic controversy. The Western Church, by which we mean the Churches of Germany, Gaul, and England, pursued a middle course between both the extreme parties in this controversy. Just as the Eastern Christians seem to have cherished images for the sake of contrast with the Mahometans, so the Franks were restrained from any ultra reverence for images, to oppose the idolatry of the unconverted Germans. Still it was impossible that the atmosphere of Western Christendom should remain entirely unaffected by the storm which raged at Constantinople, and the question is said to have been discussed at a mixed assembly held at Gentilly, under Pepin [A.D. 767], in consequence of an embassy from Constantine Copronymus to that king. The result is uncertain. Paul I. expressed his satisfaction with it, probably out of gratitude to Pepin for his refusal to restore to the Greek Emperor the territory which had been seized from the Lombards and given to the Roman See. In A.D. 790, Charlemagne, influenced possibly by irritation with Irene for breaking off the match between her son and the Princess Rothrud, issued four books on the subject of images, known as the Caroline Books.¹ They were probably only in part the Emperor's own composition, and mainly the work of the English Alcuin and other ecclesiastics. In them the independent and medium view of the Western Church is clearly mapped out. The Council of Constantinople [A.D. 754] is condemned for its destruction of images, and the Council of Nice [A.D. 787] for allowing their worship, its edicts being combated and all its views examined at great length, and its claim to œcumenicity denied. Four years later the Council of Frankfort was summoned by Charlemagne [A.D. 794]. It was attended by three hundred bishops, who were unanimous in allowing the use of images while forbidding their worship; the conclusions of the Council of Nice were openly rejected [canon ii.], the Caroline Books confirmed, and Pope Adrian's answer to them [A.D. 792] condemned. It should be added that their rejection of the decrees of the second Nicene Council was based upon a mistake. The passage most objected to was, "that those should be anathematized who should not bestow service or adoration on the images of the saints even as on the Divine Trinity"—a resolution which could not possibly have been passed by a council which carefully distinguished between the reverence due to images and the worship to be reserved for God alone.

Charlemagne was succeeded [A.D. 814] by Louis the Meek. When the Emperor Michael despatched an embassy to him [A.D. 824] for the purpose of renewing bonds of confederation, and with the view of winning him openly over to iconoclastic principles, Louis assembled a council at Paris [A.D. 825], which refused to depart in any way from the resolutions of the preceding council at Frankfort, and repeated its censure of the Council of Nice, and its condemnation of the papal views, as expressed in Adrian's answer to the Caroline Books. Michael was apparently too indifferent, and the Pope too much indebted to the Western Emperor, to make any further remonstrance, and the Franks became shortly afterwards engaged in domestic troubles, which prevented their taking further active interest in the controversy.

Two tracts, strongly tinged with iconoclasm, were written about this time by Western authors. The first by Agobard, Archbishop of Lyons [died A.D. 840]; the second, and the more violent, by Claudius, a pupil of Felix of Urgel, raised by Louis to the see of Turin [A.D. 814]. The latter work was censured not only by Pope Pascal, but by the general voice of the West, as represented by the Abbot Theodemir; Dungal, a Scot; Jonas, of Orleans; and Walafrid Strabo.

The iconoclastic movement was never a popular one. Throughout its course the monks, who were a very numerous body, and the great majority of the population, especially of the poorer classes, were devotedly attached to the use of images. Iconoclasm emanated from the Emperors only, and was the attempt of despots to force their views on their subjects. No religious movement has ever been successful under these conditions; and, therefore, in spite of the spiritual tendency of which its admirers regard it as a manifestation, it ultimately failed.

Nor was the movement grounded on any principle of abstract theology. The questions which had hitherto agitated the Church had been mainly abstract and metaphysical in their character. Nestorianism, Eutychianism, and other previous heresies, referred to notional distinctions, and disturbed the small and intellectual circles rather than the mass of men. Iconoclasm, although the philosopher might detect in it a phase of the contest between spiritualism and materialism, was in the eyes of the many merely an unprovoked attack on their sensible, outward, and familiar aids to devotion, and would therefore occupy their thoughts, and create a resentment unparalleled in the history of previous religious controversies.

It was also an inherent element of weakness in iconoclasm, that it was negative rather than positive; it pulled down without being able to build up; it destroyed the popular objects of veneration and accessories of worship, but had nothing wherewith to supply the minds of those worshippers whose walls it had denuded of their pictures and statues. Unlike the Reformation it did not attempt to concentrate men's minds on some overpowering conviction, such as personal illumination or justification by faith, and unlike the Reformation it failed.

The view in which the advocates of iconoclasm have always delighted to regard it, is as a protest against a transformed paganism. It was the view of the Emperor Theophilus and his tutor, John the Grammarian [Neander, Church Hist. vi. 368]. It is endorsed by the Deist historian, who says, "By a slow though inevitable progression the honours of the original were transferred to the copy. The devout Christian prayed before the image of a saint, and the pagan rites of genuflexion, luminaries, and incense again stole into the Catholic Church" [Gibbon's Rom. Emp. chap. xlix.]. Again, "So long as the ancient mythology had any separate establishment in the empire, the spiritual worship which our religion demands, and so essentially implies, as only fitting for it, was presented in its purity by means of the salutary contrast; but as soon as the Church became completely triumphant and exclusive, and the parallel of pagan idolatry totally removed, then the old constitutional appetite revived in all its force, and after a short but famous struggle with the iconoclasts, an image-worship was established and consecrated by bulls and canons, which, in whatever light it is regarded, differed in no respects but the names of its objects from that which had existed for so many years as the chief characteristic of the religion and faith of the Gentiles" [H. Nelson Coleridge]. It will be observed that the last quotation ignores entirely the distinction laid down carefully by the second Nicene Council between προσκύνησις and λατρεία—a distinction which had never been insisted on in paganism.

The defenders of image-worship during the time of the controversy, and its apologists in later days, have always identified the opposition to it with the iconoclastic religion of Mahomet, which was making such rapid progress at the expense of Christianity during the seventh and eighth centuries. There is much in favour of this view. It explains the intense opposition raised by the monks of the West. It is suggested by the resemblance of the edicts of such Emperors as Leo and Constantine to those of the Mahometan princes, as when the Caliph Yezid, the ninth of the race of the Omniadæ, caused all the images in Syria to be destroyed [A.D. 719]. It is also supported by the fact of the friendship which existed between Theophilus, the cruellest of all the iconoclastic emperors, and the Caliph of Bagdad, to whom he sent a magnificent embassy under the charge of John the Grammarian. Others have regarded it as a retrogression towards Judaism, or, with John of Damascus, as a result of the Manichæan theory of the essential evil of matter.

The consequences of the iconoclast movement were very disastrous.

[1.] Such eminent soldiers as Leo the Isaurian and Constantine spent their lives amid the turmoil of civil disturbances, instead of being able to devote all their energies, and to concentrate the Empire's forces, against the inroads of Mahometanism.

[2.] Iconoclasm was never acceptable in Italy, whose inhabitants opposed it consistently, and from the very first; and the schism between the Eastern and Western Churches, which commenced by the refusal of the Italian provinces to pay tribute [A.D. 729], continued to grow in intensity until it was completed territorially by the coronation of Charlemagne [A.D. 800], ecclesiastically by the excommunication of Eastern Christendom [A.D. 1053] by Leo IX.

[3.] While the power of the Patriarchs of Constantinople sensibly waned, from the character of some of those whom successive emperors raised to that dignity, and from the ignominious treatment which they repeatedly received at their hands, the influence of the popes continued steadily to increase, not only from the high character of such men as Gregory II. and III., but from the unshaken fidelity with which both they and their successors supported the orthodox, and in Italy the universally popular, cause.

IDEALISTS. [DESCARTES. MALEBRANCHE. SPINOZA. KANT.]

IKONOBORTZI. A name signifying the same as "Iconoclasts," and used as a designation of the Russian sect of Dissenters more generally known as DUCHOBORTZI.

ILLUMINATI. [HESYCHASTS.]

ILLUMINATI. A Spanish sect, known by the vernacular name of "Alombrados," which originated about the year 1575 in the teaching of a Carmelite named Catherine de Jesus, and a native of Teneriffe, named John of Willelpando. They were almost identical with the Familists, rejecting the use of sacraments, holding that by mental prayer they could attain such a state of perfection as to make it unnecessary for them to do good works, and that they might commit any kind of crime without sin. Many of them were burned as heretics at Cordova, and others, abjuring their heresy, the sect was for the time suppressed in the usual high-handed manner of the Spanish Inquisition; but it again revived, again to be suppressed in a similar manner in the year 1623. [Spondanus, Annal. Eccl. ad ann. 1623, n. 7.]

ILLUMINATI. An obscure sect of French Familists arose under this name in Picardy, in the year 1634, which united with the Guérinists, disciples of Peter Guérin, and afterwards spread into Flanders. They claimed to have a special revelation as to the mode of attaining Christian perfection, which had been first made to one of their number named Anthony Bocquet. This "perfection" resulted in that which the Familists called "deification;" and, as with that sect, this principle led them into Antinomianism, for they held that no act could be sinful to those who were so deified. The sect was soon exterminated by Louis XIII. [Spondanus, Annal. Eccl. ad ann. 1623.]

ILLUMINATI. A society of Atheists was founded under the name of "Illuminaten" in the year 1777, by a Professor of Canon Law in the University of Ingoldstadt, named Adam Weishaupt. The professed objects of the Society were those of diffusing light, union, charity, and tolerance; of abolishing wrongs; of spreading education; and ameliorating, in general, the condition of society. But they were, in reality, an association for the abolition of Christianity, and the introduction of Freethinking Republicanism. The "Illuminaten" adopted a curious secret system which was made up of a pseudo-classicism and freemasonry, each member of the association assuming a Greek or Roman name, similar names being given to cities and countries, a new calendar being formed, with the year 630 for its era, and new names being given to the months. When the organization of the Freemasons was combined with this new paganism it became politically dangerous, and the "Illuminaten" were suppressed in 1785 on the accession of Frederick William II. to the throne of Prussia. But the flood of infidelity flowed on notwithstanding, and the principles of the "Illuminaten" of Prussia are sufficiently evident in those of the leaders of the French Revolution.

ILLUMINATI. A name given to the French infidels elsewhere noticed as ENCYCLOPÉDISTES.

IMPANATORES. There has never been any sect of this name, but it is given by some Roman controversialists to those who maintain the co-existence of the natural Bread and the Body of Christ in the consecrated element used in the Holy Eucharist. The term "Impanation" has been used both by Lutheran and by English divines, and is a very unsatisfactory one, since analogy with the Incarnation requires us to believe that the lower nature is taken into the higher, not the higher into the lower. But it only expresses a sporadic and rather rare form of opinion on the subject of the Eucharist; and neither Lutheran nor Anglican divines can truly be called "Impanators," as if they were generically distinguished by the name. The most conspicuous English divine who has held the theory of Impanation, was Johnson, the author of The Unbloody Sacrifice, who accounted for the Real Presence by the theory that a special Eucharistic Body of Christ exists which is associated with the elements used by consecration. [ADESSENARIANS.]

IMPECCABLES. A name assumed by the Antinomian BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT.

INCORRUPTICOLÆ. [APHTHARTODOCETÆ.]

INDEPENDENT METHODISTS. A name assumed by the very few remaining congregations of the Calvinistic Methodist followers of Whitfield. [METHODISTS, CALVINISTIC.]

INDEPENDENT CHRISTIAN UNIVERSALISTS. [RELYANISTS.]

INDEPENDENTS or CONGREGATIONALISTS. A sect so called from its fundamental principle that every particular congregation of Christians is an independent body, which has within itself the right of electing and deposing its pastors, of settling its faith, and of exercising discipline over its members; and that there ought to be no such organized unity among congregations as may in any way interfere with their perfect independence of each other.

All congregations of Puritans which separated from the Church of England before the reign of Elizabeth were necessarily of this independent character in practice, and until the Presbyterians began to establish their system, which was about the year 1572, they were so to some extent in theory. Thus such congregations as Foxe speaks of as being surprised in a house in Bow Churchyard, on New Year's Day 1555-6, and sent to prison, or at the Saracen's Head in Islington in December 1557, held themselves independent of the Church of England and of every one except themselves so far as religious discipline was concerned, and thus fairly represented the principle. Of a similar kind was that congregation under Richard Fitz, which was sent to the Bridewell on May 20th 1567 [PURITANS], and which is often spoken of as the first Independent community in England. But the principle of Independency was not their reason for thus separating, and was not probably in their minds. They would have been quite content with the system which Calvin had originated at Geneva, and yet this was as far removed from Independency as that of the Church itself; and their object in holding assemblies apart from the Church was to escape from the liturgical and doctrinal system of the latter, and to have such preaching and praying as suited their tastes.

The first person, in fact, to formulate the Independent or Congregational principle was no doubt the Robert Browne on whom tradition has fastened it for three centuries, and from whom the sect was known by the name of "Brownists" down to about the year 1642.

Fuller (who in his youth had seen him) says that Browne belonged to "an ancient and worshipful" family settled at Tolethorp in Rutlandshire, that he was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and that he was chaplain to the Duke of Norfolk. For two years he was also Master of the Free School of St. Olave's, in the borough of Southwark, at which time he used to preach in a gravel pit in Islington. In June 1571 he was cited before the High Commission Court, with other Puritan preachers, for refusing to subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles, but was screened by the Duke of Norfolk, and seems to have left London at this time for Norwich. This was at that time, and long afterwards, the principal manufacturing town of England, and contained a large Dutch population of Calvinists with whom Browne at first associated himself. But he afterwards formed separate congregations in several parts of the Diocese of Norwich, until he was apprehended by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in April 1581, "upon complaint made by many godly preachers for delivering unto the people corrupt and contentious doctrine." In reporting this apprehension to Lord Burleigh the Bishop of Norwich speaks of Browne's "arrogant spirit of reproving being such as is to be marvelled at, the man being also to be feared, lest if he were at liberty he would seduce the vulgar sort of the people who greatly depend on him, assembling themselves to the number of a hundred at a time in private houses and conventicles to hear him, not without danger to some thereabout" [Lansd. MS. 33]. Burleigh replied to this communication immediately, on April 21st, 1581: "Forasmuch as he is my kinsman, if he be son to him whom I take him to be, and that his error seemeth to proceed of zeal rather than of malice, I do therefore wish he were charitably conferred with and reformed; which course I pray your lordship may be taken with him either by your lordship or such as your lordship shall assign for that purpose; and in case there shall not follow thereof such success as may be to your liking, that then you would be content to permit him to repair hither to London, to be further dealt with as I shall take order for upon his coming; for which purpose I have written a letter to the sheriff, if your lordship shall like thereof" [Fuller's Ch. Hist. iii. 62]. Shortly after this Browne was released, and in company with fifty or sixty other persons, and a Puritan preacher named Harrison, left England and settled at Middleburgh in Zealand. Here he became teacher of the little colony in conjunction with Harrison, and from thence he sent forth "A book which sheweth the life and manners of all true Christians, and how unlike they are to Turks and Papists and Heathen folk. Also, the points and parts of all Divinity, that is of the revealed will and word of God, are declared by their several definitions and divisions." In this work he stated those principles of congregational self-government which have since been made the distinctive characteristic of the Independent sect.

The "arrogant spirit" of Browne was, however, so intolerable to his independent community that he was driven from them within three months, and recrossed the North Sea to land in Scotland. But even there "he was so great a malcontent that he was committed to ward and detained a night or two in prison." From Scotland he returned to his own neighbourhood, but his arrogant spirit again broke out to such an extent in Northampton that he was solemnly excommunicated by Lindsell, Bishop of Peterborough. This brought to a close his association with the sect which he had founded. On July 17th, 1584, Lord Burleigh wrote to Archbishop Whitgift, "I am content that your grace and my lord of London, where I hear Browne is, should use him as your wisdoms think meet. I have cause to pity the poor man." By Burleigh's permission Browne retired for a time to his father's house, and on June 20th, 1589, the great minister wrote to the Bishop of Peterborough, saying, that "he hath now a good time" forsaken his opinions and "submitted himself to the order and government of the Church," and asking the Bishop "to receive him again into the ministry, and to give him your best means and help for some ecclesiastical preferment" [Lansd. MSS. 103, 60]. The founder of the Independent sect then became Rector of Thorpe-Achurch in Northamptonshire, where he died after a forty years' incumbency, in the year 1630, just as the shadow of those national troubles which his sect helped so much to originate was beginning to fall upon the country.

The principles of Church government which Browne invented fell in with the inclination of large numbers of the Puritans, and the sect increased very rapidly. In a speech made in the House of Commons by Sir Walter Raleigh in April 1580, he says, "In my conceit the Brownists are worthy to be rooted out of the Commonwealth; but what danger may grow to ourselves if this law pass it were fit to be considered. If two or three thousand Brownists meet at the sea, at whose charge shall they be transported, or whither will you send them? I am sorry for it, I am afraid there are near 20,000 of them in England, and when they be gone, who shall maintain their wives and children?" [D'Ewes' Journ. 517].

After Browne's personal influence had been withdrawn from the growing sect, his place was filled by a barrister of Gray's Inn, named Henry Barrow, a Cambridge graduate, and from him the early Independents were called "Barrowists," as well as Brownists. In November 1586, Barrow was summoned before the Court of High Commission, and his own account of his examination shews that he held principles similar in many respects to those of the Quakers of the next century, objecting to the whole system of ecclesiastical government, refusing to take an oath, and having a fanatical antipathy to set prayers. Lord Bacon says of him that "he made a leap from a vain and libertine youth to a preciseness in the highest degree, the strangeness of which alteration made him much spoken of" [Bacon's Works, i. 383, Child's ed.]. The tone of his Independency may be illustrated by two quotations from this examination. When he was asked, "Whether the Church of England, as it standeth now established, be the true established Church of Christ, and whether the people therein be the true and faithful people of God or no?" his answer was, "I think that these parish assemblies, as they stand generally in England, are not the true established Churches of England." Respecting the Prayer Book he said, "I think that this Book of Common Prayer, publicly enjoined and received in the assemblies of this land, is well-nigh altogether idolatrous, superstitious, and Popish." When, again, he was asked, whether it was lawful to use the Lord's Prayer "publicly in Church, or privately, as a prayer, or no?" he replied thus: "It is to be used to that end for which it was given by our Saviour Christ to His disciples, as a summary groundwork or foundation of all faithful prayers, whereby to instruct and assure their consciences that their petitions are according to the will and glory of God; but that these prescript words are enjoined, or that Christ or His apostles ever used them as or in their prayer, I find not in the Scripture. Moreover I see not how it can be used as a prayer, seeing that our particular wants, and present occasions and necessities, are not therein expressed; and, therefore, I think it not to be used as a prayer." [Harleian Misc. iv. 347. Egerton, Pap. Camd. Soc. 167].

Barrow's chief assistant in spreading these principles was a young clergyman, named John Greenwood, who had been his associate as an undergraduate at Cambridge. He, too, was brought before the High Commission Court in November 1586, and was interrogated respecting his office and opinions. When asked if he was a minister in orders, and if so, who had degraded him, he answered, "I was one according to your orders; and I degraded myself, through God's mercy by repentance." He too condemned the Church in similar language to that of Barrow. In an appeal which they and others of their sect made to the Privy Council, these opinionative young men also declared their conviction that the English hierarchy was dissonant from Christ's institution, and derived from Antichrist, and that they had therefore joined in a new community, and had chosen to themselves a ministry of pastor, teacher, elders, and deacons as Christ had appointed; which new order they were ready to prove by the word of God, and by the same evidence to disprove the Church system [Neale's Puritans, i. 365]. After several years' imprisonment Barrow and Greenwood were brought to trial at the Old Bailey "for writing and publishing sundry seditious books and pamphlets, tending to the slander of the Queen and government," and were executed at Tyburn on April 6th, 1593.

At the end of the following May, another of the sect, John Penry ("Martin-Marprelate"), also a clergyman, educated at Cambridge, and afterwards of St. Alban's Hall, Oxford, was executed in Southwark. These three were the only Brownists executed in London, although a great number had been arrested; but two others named Thacker and Copping had been executed at Bury St. Edmunds in 1583. They were executed for conscientious principles, which impelled them to say that the Queen was perjured, that she was an enemy to religion and her people; and when Penry writes to her while free, that his purpose, and that of his friends, "is to take the penalty of the transgressions against your laws," he doubtless expressed the feeling of all, that they meant to have their own way, or to suffer the penalty of not getting it. A law of conscience which bade young fanatics write and talk treason wholesale came into conflict with the law of the land, which required that talkers of treason should be sent to Tyburn. If these three could have been spared like the rest, it is just possible that the one would have found his level and his work in his practice as a barrister, and the other two theirs as country clergymen, by the time they had respectively reached the more sober age of five-and-thirty or forty. But they had greedily sought the distinction so captivating to half-matured minds, that of being martyrs for their cause, and they suffered for the "insane fanaticism which led them to urge the overthrow of the ecclesiastical constitution of the country in language so violent and inflammatory, that no court of justice, in such dangerous times as those were, could possibly forbear to put the Act of Parliament into execution" [Curteis' Bampton Lect. 78].

The next leader of the Brownists was a clergyman named Francis Johnson, Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, who had been expelled from the university for a seditious sermon preached at St. Mary's in January 1589. He was one of those who had been set at liberty when Barrow and his companions were executed; and leaving England, with a company of other liberated prisoners, established a Brownist community at Amsterdam. Here at Rotterdam, the Hague, Leyden,¹ and Utrecht, a number of the sect expatriated themselves, but they were looked upon with suspicion by the Dutch authorities, being characterized as "a discontented, factious, and conceited people who could not be tolerated in their own land." At Amsterdam Johnson and a coadjutor named Ainsworth published The Confession of Faith of certain English people, living in the Low Countries exiled, of which successive editions were printed in 1596, 1598, and 1602, and which was also translated into Latin by Ainsworth, and sent forth to the learned of various European countries in his own name. In the 23rd article of this confession the Independent principle is thus stated: "As every Christian congregation hath power and commandment to elect and ordain their own ministry, according to the rules in God's Word prescribed; and, whilst they shall faithfully execute their office, to have them in superabundant love for their works' sake, to provide for them, to honour them, and reverence them, according to the dignity of the office they execute : so have they also power and commandment when any such defaulters, either in their life, doctrine, or administration, breaketh out as by the rule of the Word debarreth them from, or depriveth them of, their ministry, by one order to depose them from the ministry they exercised ; yea, if the case so require, and they remain obstinate and impenitent, orderly to cut them off by excommunication.” This is followed by the statement in the 24th article, that “Christ hath given this power to receive in or cut off any member, to the whole body together of every Christian congregation, and not to any one member apart, or to more members sequestered from the whole, or to any other congregation, to do it for them.”

The principles thus set forth were combated by Henry Jacob, a Kentish clergyman, in a work printed at Middleburgh in 1599, and entitled A Defence of the Churches and Ministry of England : Written in two Treatises against the Reasons and Obligations of Mr. Francis Johnson and others of the Separation called Brownists. This was answered by Johnson in the following year, in An Answer to Master H. Jacob : His Defence, &c. ; and Master H. Jacob was so convinced by the reply, that he left the Church, and joined the sect against whose principles he had written.

Anthony Wood says that Jacob's son used to say his father was the first Independent in England. In the beginning of James the First's reign he is found as the leader and spokesman of the sect, and in the year 1616 he established a community at Blackfriars in London, which is usually called “The first Independent or Congregational Church in England.” It was Jacob also who began to substitute the more modern name for that of Brownists or Separatists, by defining each congregation as “an entire and independent body-politic, endued with power immediately under, and from, Christ, as every proper Church is and ought to be”¹ [Jacob's Declaration and Plainer Opening of Certain Points, &c., p. 13, 1611]. Jacob emigrated to New England after a few years, and died there in 1624, his place being taken in London by John Lathrop, also a Kentish clergyman, who got into trouble with the High Commission Court in 1632, but of whom very little else is known.

In the year 1620, the Leyden Independents matured a plan which had been in view for some years, for joining in the stream of emigration which was now beginning to flow towards North America. They found life in a continental city extremely distasteful to them ; they could not compete in trade with their Dutch neighbours, and they were losing their hold upon the rising generation of their own families. Some of the home Independents fell in with the scheme, and arrangements were made with a Plymouth emigrant company, recently incorporated, for their transport to “New England,” the northern part of the colony of Virginia, formed in Queen Elizabeth's time. Two ships were chartered for the purpose, one at Leyden and one at Plymouth, but eventually the Leyden party took in the few who were going from England, and the united company of one hundred and one sailed from Plymouth in the Mayflower on August 21st, 1620, arriving in New England on November 11th of the same year. An absurd sentimentality has been connected with this emigration, and many who gaze on the very unhistorical painting of the “Pilgrim Fathers” which adorns the Royal Robing Room in the House of Lords, suppose that it was a general transfer of all the Dissenters of England, under the effect of a bitter persecution, to a foreign shore. But of the fifteen or twenty families of “Pilgrim Fathers” only two or three started from England, and the whole of the party went, as many other parties of emigrants were going in that generation, to “seek their fortunes,” as shrewd and bold “adventurers,” for so colonists were then significantly called, in a land, the rapid development of whose resources soon justified their enterprise.

The English Independents were meanwhile becoming so prosperous a sect, and so influential a political party, that they found it much more for their interest to remain at home. In a short time some of them became leaders in a revolution which overthrew for half a generation the Church and the Monarchy ; and from the district which had been principally leavened with their principles by Browne, sprung one of their number whose power gave him a place among the sovereigns of his day. During the time of Cromwell's rule, although he himself was an Independent, the Scottish Presbyterian system was established throughout the country, and the Presbyterians made vigorous attempts to suppress the rival sect altogether. Many Independent preachers, however, were made rectors and vicars by the Government ; while in not a few places, as in Exeter Cathedral, Holy Trinity, Hull, and St. Nicholas, Great Yarmouth, walls were built up in the choir arch, that the two sects might share alike in the sacred buildings which they had taken from the Church.

After its first triumph, however, the Presbyterian system began at once to lose ground, being always distasteful to the people of England : and those who were not at heart lovers of the old Church were generally turning towards the Independent system as that which most suited their tastes. Thus it came to pass that when the Church returned to its position again, and the Act of Uniformity of 1662 enacted that none should officiate in churches who were not episcopally ordained, a large proportion of those who became Nonconformists were Independents and not Presbyterians. Independent congregations were established in great numbers ; while of those in which it was endeavoured to preserve the system of Presbyterianism, some soon lapsed into that of ordinary Independency; while others, though remaining Presbyterian in name, became Unitarian in doctrine and Independent in government. [PRESBYTERIANS.]

During the eighteenth century, the Independents, and the Presbyterians thus assimilated to them, formed the great bulk of English Dissenters (being fairly represented by the names of Dr. Watts and Dr. Doddridge), and continued to do so until the death of Wesley brought about the formal separation of the Methodists from the Church. [METHODISTS.] In May 1688, a return of the numbers of Dissenters was made to the Government, from which it appears that there were then 93,153 in the province of York, and 15,525 in the province of Canterbury. Of these 108,678 Dissenters no doubt seventy or eighty thousand were Independents. In the year 1716, Neal, the historian of the Puritans, stated that there were 1397 Dissenting congregations in England and Wales. Of these 247 were Baptist congregations, but of the remaining 1150 no classification is given. In 1812 there were 1024 Independent congregations in England and Wales, one-fourth of them being in the principality. In 1838, the number had increased to 1840 congregations, and in 1851 to 3244, of which one-fifth were in Wales. It is estimated that in the year 1870 the number of the sect amounted to 296,300 members, to whom are to be added 242,430 children under sixteen years of age.

By the fundamental theory of Congregationalism, every particular congregation has the right to settle its own doctrine, and no person or persons external to it have any right to interfere with its belief any more than with its government. But this theory is contrary to the religious instincts of Christians, which inevitably point towards some bond of unity in matters of faith, and it has never been strictly carried out. With the object of establishing some kind of uniformity in the midst of Independency, there was published in 1659 A Declaration of the Faith and Order owned and practised in the Congregational Churches in England. With the same object the "Congregational Union" was formed in 1831, and has set forth a "Declaration of the Faith, Order, and Discipline of the Congregational or Independent Dissenters." This Declaration consists of thirty-three articles, twenty of which relate to the "Principles of Religion," and the remaining thirteen to the "Principles of Church Order and Discipline."

Two of these articles may be quoted as shewing the relation of the sect to the peculiar doctrines of Calvinism. "XIV. They believe that all who will be saved were the objects of God's eternal and electing love, and were given by an act of Divine sovereignty to the Son of God; which in no way interferes with the system of means, nor with the grounds of human responsibility; being wholly unrevealed as to its objects, and not a rule of human duty. XV. They believe that the Scriptures teach the final perseverance of all true believers to a state of eternal blessedness, which they are appointed to obtain through constant faith in Christ, and uniform obedience to His commands."

In two of the articles on Church order and discipline, may also be seen the existing official utterance of the sect on the subject of its ministry and its Independency. "IV. They believe that the New Testament authorizes every Christian Church to elect its own officers, to manage all its own affairs, and to stand independent of, and irresponsible to, all authority saving that only of the Supreme and Divine Head of the Church, the Lord Jesus Christ. X. They believe that it is the duty of Christian Churches to hold communion with each other, to entertain an enlarged affection for each other as members of the same body, and to co-operate for the promotion of the Christian cause; but that no church, nor union of churches, has any right or power to interfere with the faith or discipline of any other church, further than to separate from such as, in faith or practice, depart from the Gospel of Christ."

The Independents maintain sixteen colleges in various parts of Great Britain, in which 316 students were being educated in 1870. The "London Missionary Society," with an income and expenditure of about £100,000 a-year, is also substantially one of their institutions, though founded in 1796 on a nominally undenominational plan. They also principally maintain the "British and Foreign School Society," with an income and expenditure of £10,000 a-year, though that also was founded for promoting the education of the labouring and manufacturing poor of every persuasion. INFERNALS. The name given by Roman Heresiologists to those who maintained the opinion that when Christ descended into Hell, He descended thither to suffer torment. The invention of this opinion is attributed to Nicolas Gallus and James Smidelin. It was held also by Beza, Calvin, and by some of the early Puritans. Calvin's words are "Si [Christus] ad inferos descendisse dicitur, nihil mirum est, cum eam mortem pertulerit quæ sceleratis ab irato Deo infligitur . . . Cum diros in anima cruciatus damnati ac perditii hominis pertulerit" [Calvin, Inst. ii. 16, c. xvi. sec. 10].

INFIDELS. Those who have never received the faith were formerly called by this name, especially the Mahometans, and this negative sense is that in which the word Infidel [ἄπιστος] is used by St. Paul [2 Cor. vi. 15; 1 Tim. v. 8]. But the term has been applied during the last two centuries (and perhaps, in the Good Friday Collect, as early as 1548) to all classes of persons who consciously reject those articles of the Christian Faith which bear upon the Personality and Providence of Almighty God. The collective and negative term is not now much in use, particular forms and developments of infidelity being generally spoken of under names assumed by their adherents as specially defining them. Such for instance are Positivism, Secularism, and Deism.

INFRALAPSARIANS. [SUBLAPSARIANS.]

INGHAMITES. A sect formed in the North of England in the middle of the eighteenth century by Benjamin Ingham, of Aberford, near York, its particular characteristics being drawn from the Moravians and the Methodists.

When at Queen's College, Oxford, Ingham became a member of Wesley's original community there, and the friendship between him and the two brothers was so close that he accompanied them on their missionary voyage to Georgia. The Moravian influences under which John Wesley fell during that voyage affected Ingham, and on their return from America he accompanied him also to Herrnhut. When Wesley separated from the Moravians, Ingham returned to the district in Yorkshire where the property of his family was situated, and from that centre began to form societies on Wesley's plan; being, however, assisted by some Moravian friends by whom he continued to be chiefly guided. These societies shortly increased to the number of eighty, extending into the adjoining counties, and finding much support from those clergy who countenanced the Methodist revival.

Ingham was brought into intimate relations with Lady Huntingdon, having married Lord Huntingdon's sister, Lady Margaret Hastings; and also with Count Zinzendorf, the founder of the Moravian sect. It was probably the example of Zinzendorf (fortified by the hyper-Episcopal authority exercised by Lady Huntingdon) which led Ingham to assume the position of "general overseer" or bishop. Having done so he proposed an union between his own societies and those of Wesley, but the latter declined this arrangement. Wesley's record of this in the Minutes of Conference for 1749 is, "Mr. Ingham seems to desire a reunion. Can we unite with him? Yes, as soon as he returns to the old Methodist doctrine. Meantime let us behave with all tenderness and love" [Min. of Conf. i. 43, ed. 1812].

About the year 1759, Ingham was so much impressed with the writings of Glas and Sandeman that he sent two of his preachers to Scotland to investigate the principles of the sect which was there being formed. These preachers returned to Yorkshire as zealous Sandemanians, and won over so many converts from among the members of Ingham's societies, and caused so much discussion among the sect, that in a short time only thirteen out of the eighty remained attached to their original founder. Some of these have lingered on until recent times, nine Inghamite chapels being enumerated in the Religious Census of 1851. The sect was thus of very short duration, its founder having lived to see its almost total extinction.

INSTABILES. [ASTATHIANS.]

INTERIMISTS. The party who supported

the Emperor Charles V. in his attempt to bring about a scheme of comprehension by which the Lutherans might be reunited to the German Church. The "Interim" itself was a proclamation of the Emperor, composed by two bishops and the Lutheran John Agricola, making concessions to the reforming party with the view of keeping them in union with the Church during the time necessary for assembling a General Council. [ADIAPHORISTS.] The thirteenth volume of Schlüsselberg's Hæreticorum Catalogus contains 879 pages, "De Secta Adiaphoristarum seu Interimistarum."

INTUITIONISTS. A name assumed by those American Deists of whom Emerson and Theodore Parker are the leaders. It indicates the repudiation of all religion dependent on an external revelation, and looks to the intuitions of the soul as the only guide of humanity. Shortly described, this may be defined as a substitution of the idolatry of self for the worship of God; and hence it is often called the "Religion of Humanity"—a name more commonly recognised in connection with the Positivist followers of Comte—as if consciously opposed to the religion of Deity.

INVISIBLES. Those who deny the visible character, that is the external organization, of the Church, are thus named by some controversial writers.

IRVINGITES. A sect originated in the year 1831 by Edward Irving, a popular Presbyterian preacher in London, and Mary Campbell, a poor Scotch widow's daughter of Fernicarry, on the borders of the parishes of Rosneath and Row, a few miles from Greenock. The distinctive characteristic of the sect is the belief that a new "outpouring" of God the Holy Ghost has re-established the prophetic and apostolic offices, and also the power of speaking in unknown tongues, and of working miracles. The Irvingites give themselves the name of "The Catholic and Apostolic Church," the arrogant assumption of which title they explain as signifying that they form an orthodox community with an apostolic ministry.

Irving [A.D. 1792-1834] was a man of glowing enthusiasm, gifted with a rich eloquence which attracted large congregations to his chapel in Regent Square, London, during the reign of George IV. But his eloquence was like the paintings of Turner, which surround common objects with exaggerated splendour; and however well suited his mind might be for the delivery of rhetorical "orations"—as he called his sermons—it was of a very excitable, dreamy cast, looking for wonders, and unconsciously turning common events into wonders when real marvels did not appear. It thus happened that between 1826 and 1830 Irving's enthusiastic nature was much influenced by two movements in the "religious world," one being that of the formation of a brotherhood in 1827 by James Haldane Stewart organized to offer united prayers for a fresh "outpouring of the Spirit," and the other that of the meetings held at Albury Park, from 1826 to 1830, by Henry Drummond for the study of prophecy.

One of the forty-three clergymen and laymen¹ who attended the Albury meetings was Robert Story, the minister of Rosneath in Dumbartonshire; and when Irving was engaged, in 1828, on a tour in Scotland preaching those glowing lectures on the Apocalypse which he published under the title of The Last Days, he paid a visit to Rosneath. Mary Campbell was at this time in a very impressible condition, having been prostrated by the death of her lover, and being supposed to be at death's door herself from decline. She partook in the excitement² of the whole district respecting Irving and his preaching, and easily fell into the tone of his mind, that of looking for wonders. Her attention was especially directed at first to an idea of Irving's which had already attracted much notice, "viz., that bodily disease was the direct infliction of Satan, and that therefore faith and prayer, and these only, should be employed as the means of deliverance from it; and that moreover, by the due exercise of these, the power of effecting miracles of healing, and other wonderful works, would be restored to the Church—a power hitherto kept in abeyance because of the Church's faithlessness." [Story's Life of Story, 195. Oliphant's Life of Irving, 275.] On a mind so excited by Irving's visit to Rosneath his influence was again brought to bear not long afterwards by the return home in 1829 of his assistant preacher, a young "probationer" named Alexander Scott, whom Irving had carried up from Rosneath to London. Of this visit and its results Irving himself gives the following account in Fraser's Magazine:—

"Being called down to Scotland upon some occasion, and residing for a while at his father's house, which is in the heart of that district of Scotland upon which the light of Mr. Campbell's ministry had arisen, he was led to open his mind to some of the godly people in these parts, and among others to a young woman who was at that time lying ill of a consumption, from which afterwards, when brought to the very door of death, she was raised up instantaneously by the mighty hand of God. Being a woman of a very fixed and constant spirit, he was not able, with all his power of statement and argument, which is unequalled by that of any other man I have ever met with, to convince her of the distinction between regeneration and baptism with the Holy Ghost; and when he could not prevail he left her with a solemn charge to read over the Acts of the Apostles, with that distinction in her mind, and to beware how she rashly rejected what he believed to be the truth of God. By this young woman it was that God, not many months after, did restore the gift of speaking with tongues and prophesying to the Church" [Fraser's Magazine, January 1832]. The nature of this conversation is more exactly indicated by the fact that a number of people at Port-Glasgow, a neighbouring town, "had been led to pray for and to expect the restoration of 'spiritual gifts' to the Church by a sermon on the nature of the 'Charismata' of the Corinthians, preached by Mr. A. J. Scott" [Story's Life of Story, 205].

² This was so great that at Kirkcaldy the church was overcrowded to an extent which broke down a gallery; when, and in the subsequent panic, more than thirty persons were killed.

The expected wonders now arrived quickly both at Port-Glasgow and Fernicarry, and in both places they came to invalid young women. For at Port-Glasgow there was a counterpart of Mary Campbell, named Macdonald, she also having been in bad health for eighteen months. After she and her family had been praying in obedience to the teaching of Mr. Irving's juvenile but self-confident curate, this young woman suddenly exclaimed, "'There will be a mighty baptism of the Spirit this day,' and then broke forth in a most marvellous setting forth of the wonderful works of God; and, as if her own weakness had been altogether lost in the strength of the Holy Ghost, continued, with little or no intermission, for two or three hours in mingled praise, prayer, and exhortation." At dinner time, "her twin brothers James and George,"—who were shipbuilders, and had recently been converted, and had become very enthusiastic young men as to their religion,—"came home as usual, whom she then addressed at great length, concluding with a solemn prayer for James that he might at that time be endowed with the power of the Holy Ghost. Almost instantly James calmly said, 'I have got it.' He walked to the window, and stood silent for a minute or two. I looked at him, and almost trembled, there was such a change upon his whole countenance. He then, with a step and manner of the most indescribable majesty, walked up to —'s bedside, and addressed her in those words of the twentieth Psalm, 'Arise, and stand upright.' He repeated the words, took her by the hand, and she arose, when we all quietly sat down and had our dinner. After it, my brothers went to the ship-building yard, as usual, where James wrote over to Miss Campbell, commanding her in the name of the Lord to arise." The result may be told in Miss Campbell's own words. "I received dear brother James M'Donald's letter, giving an account of his sister's being raised up, and commanding me to rise and walk. I had scarcely read the first page when I became quite overpowered, and laid it aside for a few minutes; but I had no rest in my mind until I took it up again, and began to read. As I read, every word came home with power; and when I came to the command to arise, it came home with a power which no one can describe; it was felt to be indeed the voice of Christ; it was such a voice as could not be resisted. A mighty power was instantaneously exerted upon me. I felt as if I had been lifted from off the earth, and all my diseases taken from me at the voice of Christ. I was verily made in a moment to stand upon my feet, leap and walk, sing and rejoice" [Norton's Mem. of James and George M'Donald, 107-110].

Meanwhile the expected gift of working miracles had been accompanied, or just preceded, by the expected gift of tongues; for which also Mary Campbell had been prepared by Irving's writings [Story's Life of Story, 215]. "On a Sunday evening in the month of March" [A.D. 1830], "Mary, in the presence of a few friends, began to utter sounds to them incomprehensible, and believed by her to be a tongue such as of old might have been spoken on the day of Pentecost, or among the Christians of Corinth. This was the first manifestation of the restored 'gift,'—for such it was imagined to be. She desired to ascertain what the tongue was in order that she might, if strengthened to do so, repair to the country where it was intelligible, and there begin her long contemplated labours" as a missionary. "By and by she announced that she believed it to be the language of a group of islands in the South Pacific Ocean; but as nobody knew the speech of the islanders, it was impossible either to refute or corroborate her assertion; and for the present, at least, she was unable to proceed in person in quest of the remote savages whose mother tongue she held had been revealed to her" [Story's Life of Story, 204]. Irving's Turneresque account of the same incident is, "In the midst of their devotion the Holy Ghost came with mighty power upon the sick woman as she lay in her weakness, and constrained her to speak at great length and with superhuman strength in an unknown tongue, to the astonishment of all who heard and to her own great edification,—for 'he that speaketh in an unknown tongue edifieth himself'" [Fraser's Mag. Jan. 1832].

The account of this occurrence would be incomplete if the reader were not provided with a specimen of the "tongue" thus spoken, as taken down with much care by a man of education who believed in its supernatural character. "I now proceed," he writes, "to insert a written specimen of the gift of tongues—this specimen is a very brief vocabulary of a tongue. It was collected by me, on different occasions, in the beginning of this present year [1831], on which I heard the same individual speak in a tongue, and it was written down by me on the spot, while the individual was in the act of speaking. . . . The words of the tongue, as written down by me, are widely scattered; none in the order they were spoken, except those marked within inverted commas. ¹ The FRENCH PROPHETS had long before claimed to speak in unknown tongues, and to work miracles. Calamy describes the "tongues" in their case as "syllabical, with a distinct heave and breathe between each syllable; but it required attention to distinguish the words." The SHAKERS of America, who were descended from the Camisards, professed to do the same, and Dr. Dwight describes their "unknown language," as he heard it in 1783, as a succession of unmeaning sounds, frequently repeated, and half-articulated." At the very time also when the "unknown tongues" began to be uttered in Scotland and England they were being uttered among the MORMONS (clearly without any communication) in America.

Such "utterances," made by a hysterical young girl² lately disappointed of marriage to a few credulous village people in the West of Scotland, are as unlike as possible to those of the twelve Apostles, who had companied with their Lord all the time that He went in and out among them from the time of His baptism until that of His Resurrection [Acts i. 21, 22]; and whose utterances among the devout men out of every nation under heaven confounded the multitude, because that every man heard them speak in his own language [Acts ii. 4-6]. Nor was it exactly consonant with an experience which if true was so astounding, that Mary Campbell immediately afterwards filled up the place of her lost lover by marrying a lawyer's clerk, named Caird, whose acquaintance she had recently made. But such critical considerations did not occur to Irving, who, after very little inquiry, was satisfied that the "gift" was a reality, and invited the young couple to his house in London, whence they went to be fêted at Brampton Park by Lady Olivia Sparrow, and at Albury Park by Lady Harriet and Mr. Henry Drummond.³

Before this visit to London took place, however, three gentlemen (one of whom was a member of Irving's congregation) went down to Scotland to make inquiries respecting the alleged "gifts." These returned in October 1830, and their report⁴ was of such a nature as to lead to the organization of prayer meetings (under the guidance of Irving and several Evangelical clergymen), "to seek of God the revival of the gifts of the Holy Ghost in the Church." These prayer-meetings began towards the close of 1830; and on April 30th, 1831, the first "utterance" was heard from the lips of a lady (the wife of one of the three who had formed the deputation), who was attending such a prayer-meeting in her own house, Mary Campbell (now Mrs. Caird) being then, or within a few days, a visitor in Irving's house [Letter on certain Statements in the Old Church Porch. ed. 1855, pp.

² The two young men before referred to, and some others, also professed to have the gift. They were never in any way connected with Mr. Irving's London ministrations, and both died in 1835.

14, 15]. On her arrival, the "manifestations" began among Irving's own people, but they were not permitted by Irving to be made in public until Sunday, October 16th, 1831. From the account given in the Times, it appears that on the morning of that day Irving preached in his chapel in Regent Square on the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit; and that a Miss Hall, a governess, mindful of her pastor's fiat as to privacy, retired to the vestry, and spoke there for some time in an unknown tongue. In the evening, Irving preached on the same subject, and expressed doubts whether he was doing right in forbidding the publicity of the "utterances." Upon this, the master of a "young gentlemen's academy," named Taplin, rose and gave forth the first "utterance" that had as yet proceeded from a masculine voice: this effusion ending with the intelligible words, "Oh! Britain, thou anointed of the Lord! thy destruction is at hand! Fear not ye people of God." Much confusion of course ensued, and when Taplin had sunk into his pew exhausted, Irving put an end to it by concluding the service [Times, October 19th, 1831]. Some illustrations of the unknown tongues spoken at this stage of the sect's history, are given by one who had himself been carried away by the excitement [Pilkington's Unknown Tongues, p. 27], and they are of just the same character as those of Mary Campbell, allowing for the difference between Scotch-English and London-English. Such were "gthis dil emma sumo," "hozeghin alta stare," "holimoth holif au than" [holy, most holy father], "hozehamenanostra, hozehamena-nostra, hozehamenanostra" [oh! send men and apostles], "casa sera hastha caro, yeo cogo nomo," which look like scraps of English broken up and spoken in an hysterical voice. Nine times out of ten, the utterances of this "unknown" type were long-drawn "Ohs" and "Ahs" with a fragmentary syllable interposed at rare intervals, the whole being brought to a close in a cadence which ended in a theatrical whisper.

Irving now wrote to his father-in-law, Dr. Martin, on October 26th, "Thanks should be returned in all the churches for the work which the Lord has done, and is doing amongst us. He has raised up the order of prophets amongst us, who, being filled with the Holy Ghost, do speak with tongues and prophesy" [Oliphant's Life of Irving, ii. 193].

Three months afterwards, on January 24th, 1832, he was able to write again respecting an old acquaintance who had joined him in London, "The Lord hath anointed Baxter of Doncaster after another kind, I think the apostolical: the prophetic being the ministration of the Word, the apostolical being the administration of the Spirit" [ibid. 234].

Irving was now expelled from the Scotch Kirk, partly for an unsound opinion that the human nature of our Lord was capable of sin, and partly on account of the "manifestations" made under his sanction; the sentence of expulsion being passed by the Presbytery of London on May 2nd, 1832, and by that of Annan in March 1833.

For a time he preached in the streets and fields, collecting congregations such as had surrounded Whitfield nearly a century before, at Charing Cross, in Goodman's Fields, on Islington Green, and in such public localities. But a temporary chapel was shortly obtained for him in Gray's Inn Lane, and a permanent one before long in Newman Street, and in these he began to resume the ministrations which had been broken in upon by his expulsion from Regent Square. He was now, however, reduced to the ranks by the powers which he had been instrumental in calling into existence. Having been absent from London for a short time he was about, on his return, "to resume his functions, when he was directed by a word spoken supernaturally by the apostle who had been first called," "to suspend his ministry except in preaching, and not to administer the sacraments in the congregation until he should receive a new ordination" [Davenport's Edu. Irving and the Cath. Ap. Ch. 2nd ed. 16]. Having thus been brought into a proper submission to the new authorities he was soon afterwards reinstated in office by being ordained as "angel over the Church in Newman Street," on April 5th, 1833: but he exercised his new office for a very short time, being soon afterwards prostrated by his last illness, and dying at Glasgow, in the cathedral of which city he was buried, on December 8th, 1834, when he was only forty-two years old.

The "apostolical anointing of Baxter," spoken of by Irving in the letter recently quoted, indicates the development of the sect into its characteristic ministerial organization. Some of the leading members of the rising sect at this time were members of the Church of England, especially Mr. Henry Drummond, the financial backbone of the sect, Mr. Bayford and his sons, Proctors in Doctors' Commons, and Mr. Bayford's son-in-law, H. J. Owen, the minister of Park Chapel, Chelsea, and son of one of the principal founders of the Bible Society, who had been minister there before him, and a prominent member of the Evangelical party. Mr. Bayford, who was afterwards conspicuous for his utterances in the Irvingite Chapel at Chelsea, began them on a Sunday morning in 1833 at Park Chapel by shouting out, during his son-in-law's sermon, "The darkness, the darkness, the darkness, covereth, covereth the earth, and gross darkness the people thereof." An unmarried daughter afflicted with epileptic hysteria, was one of the most frequent speakers of "utterances" of the "unknown tongues," which in her case were precisely such sounds as are usually made by persons in that sad condition. Her case (which was known to so wide a circle of persons that it became a matter of public knowledge) is mentioned as indicating the probable origin of these alleged supernatural manifestations in natural causes. It must be remembered that the "utterances" all came from young women at first: and the sympathetic contagiousness of hysteria is well known. Mr. Owen, son-in-law to Mr. Bayford, was "ordained angel of the Church in Chelsea" in January 1834.

To none of these was the Presbyterian system acceptable, but at the same time as Churchmen they well knew that the Episcopalian system could not be adopted for a permanency without an episcopate. Just at this time much prominence was also being given to the doctrine of apostolical succession by the rising school of High Churchmen, under the teaching of Bishop Lloyd, Hugh James Rose, Keble, and Isaac Williams, and the idea of an apostolate as the only true source of a ministry had become familiar to the thoughtful laity and clergy of the Church of England. Thus a want was felt by them in respect to the organization of any new body in which the supernatural gifts of the Spirit should manifest themselves, a want which would not have been felt by Irving (who was quite content with the Presbyterian system); and "at the very beginning of the utterances, the cry in the Spirit came, 'Send us apostles—send us apostles.' The same word was often heard, though but imperfectly" [ibid.]. This want was, as usual, met by an "utterance." While Mr. Drummond was holding a prayer-meeting in his house on December 26th, 1832, "The Spirit spoke through Mr. Caird"—who with his wife, Mary Campbell, was staying at Albury Park—"saying, Let the Lord do His work: let Him declare all His mind: let His working alone be seen in the midst of you." Lady Olivia Sparrow's rising young "lay missionary" was shortly followed by the master of the young gentlemen's academy. "The Spirit broke forth in Mr. Taplin with great power in a tongue, and thus said, 'The Lord commandeth you, you who have been called to be an apostle, to lay hands on the angel of this church, and ordain him to rule and feed this people—to feed them with the Body and Blood of the Lord; be faithful, be faithful, and Jesus will honour you.' After a short pause, Mr. Cardale advanced to Mr. Drummond, who was kneeling at the desk, and after a prayer, mighty in the Spirit, beginning at Creation, and going through the manifestations of God unto the Person, sufferings, and glory of the Lord Jesus; with strong crying for faith, and that the hand of the Lord alone might be seen, put both his hands on Mr. Drummond's head, the latter seemingly deeply absorbed in communion with God; the Spirit in Mr. Cardale saying, 'Be thou filled with the Holy Ghost, and with the spirit of wisdom and of knowledge, and of a sound mind; be thou of a quick understanding in the fear of the Lord; feed and rule this people; be thou faithful unto death, and thou shalt receive the crown of life which the Lord hath prepared for thee, and for all who love the Lord Jesus.' Then turning to Mr. Bayford, he blessed him, and spake words of encouragement, exhorting him to feed this people, and in so doing he himself should be fed. Immediately after this, the Spirit burst forth in Mr. Drummond in a song, 'Glory to God in the highest,' when the Spirit in Mr. Caird took up the same strain in the name of the Church, singing the doxology, in which the congregation joined." After further exhortations to Mr. Drummond and Mr. Bayford, "the Spirit in Mr.

Taplin then, after singing for a while in a tongue, declared that Jesus had been in the midst of us, that His arms were open to receive us, that we should flee into them" [A Letter written from Albury Park, on Dec. 28th, 1832. Story's Life of Story, 409].

It was in this manner, by several persons of low education and station, and in needy circumstances, designating their patron the rich banker as a minister, that the manifestation of the new apostolate was made, and thus that a new apostolic fountain is alleged to have been opened for the outflow of a new stream of ministry in the Church of God. According to an Irvingite writer, "the apostolate to the Gentiles, of which the beginning and pattern were seen in Paul, was restored, in order that the work of presenting the Church as a chaste Virgin to Christ at His coming, which Paul was compelled to leave unfinished, might be taken up and carried to its completion" [Andrews' Ch. History, &c. of Cath. and Ap. Ch. 1868, p. 16]. By July 14th, 1835, other "apostles" to the number of twelve had been appointed, and by these the "angels" and "elders" were ordained, who are supposed to have the same ministerial standing as bishops and priests in the Church of England and other churches. Having shut themselves out from that historical succession which is derived from the call and the ordination of Christ, the sect has supplied itself with another succession derived from the call of "utterances," made under the peculiar circumstances above indicated.

The value of such utterances in "unknown tongues" may be estimated by the specimen given above. It was necessary for practical purposes, such as the deposition of Mr. Irving and the establishment of an apostolate, that the utterances should be in plain English; and there are some which are on record as spoken on the day when the Newman Street Chapel was opened. In expounding the history of Hannah, Irving spoke of the Church as barren, "conceiving, but not having brought forth." An utterance—not quite catching the idea—comes in, "Oh, but she shall be fruitful, oh! oh! oh! she shall replenish the earth and subdue it—and subdue it." A little further on another, still less apposite to the subject of the discourse, breaks in as follows:—"Oh! you do grieve the Spirit—you do grieve the Spirit! Oh! the Body of Jesus is to be sorrowful in spirit! You are to cry to your Father—to cry, to cry in the bitterness of your souls! Oh! it is a mourning, a mourning, a mourning before the Lord—a sighing and crying unto the Lord because of the desolations of Zion—because of the desolations of Zion!" Another utterance is thus given:—"Oh! grieve Him not! Oh! grieve not your Father! Rest in His love! Oh! rejoice in your Father's love! Oh! rejoice in the love of Jesus! in the love of Jesus! Oh! for it passeth knowledge! Oh! the length! Oh! the breadth! Oh! the height! Oh! the depth of the love of Jesus! Oh! it passeth knowledge! Oh! rejoice in the love of Jesus! Oh! sinner! for what, for what, what,

Oh! sinner! what can separate, separate, separate from the love of Jesus! Oh! nothing, nothing! Oh! none can pluck you out of His hands! Oh! none shall be able to pluck you out of your Father's hand." Notice is given that persons will only be admitted to the body of the church by ticket, when Mr. Drummond—a forcible speaker in the House of Commons—adds the following "utterance":—"Ah! be ye warned! be ye warned! Ye have been warned! The Lord hath prepared you a table, but it is a table in the presence of your enemies. Ah! look you well to it! the city shall be builded—ah! every jot, every piece of the edifice. Be faithful each under his load—each under his load; but see that ye build with one hand, and with a weapon in the other. Look to it! Look to it! Ye have been warned! Ah! Sanballat! Sanballat! Sanballat! The Horonite! The Moabite! The Ammonite! Ah! confederate! confederate! confederate with the Horonite! Ah! look ye to it! look ye to it!" [Oliphant's Life of Irving, ii. 223-5]. Such utterances as these were to be heard in Irvingite chapels for many years, but the better educated and less hysterical portion of the sect has been long growing ashamed of them.¹ On no other ground than their validity can the sect, however, lay claim to a divinely commissioned ministry; and if they are given up then also the claims of the community to be "catholic" or "apostolic" must be given up likewise.

The ceremonial first adopted by the Irvingites was intended to be as near an approach as was practicable to that of the Primitive Church. At the upper end of the chapel a "bema" or platform was erected, affording room for forty or fifty persons. On the front of it seven seats were arranged, the middle one being occupied by the "angel," and the three on either side by the "elders." On a step lower down were seven other seats for the "prophets," the centre one being occupied by the senior or principal one. On a still lower step seven deacons were seated in a similar manner. The general direction of the service rested with the "angel;" but the elders preached short sermons in order, the prophets spoke occasionally, and every now and then, with more or less frequency, the services were interrupted by utterances either of the "unknown tongue" type or of that shewn in the specimens given from those spoken by Mr. Drummond. As the High Church movement and literature developed in the Church many progressive changes in accordance with it took place in the Irvingite chapels; choral services, copes, and splendidly vested altars being introduced; and this ritual movement in the sect reached its climax in a magnificent chapel which was erected in Gordon Square, London, and opened on Christmas Eve in the year 1854. A very elaborate ritual is now adopted, and a Service Book has been compiled, which shews a high degree of liturgical knowledge, and great ability on the part of its compilers in applying it to the wants of the day.

In the early days of the Irvingite movement it was expected that the Day of Judgment and the Millennium were close at hand, that the movement itself was the immediate preparation for Christ's Second Advent, and that hence it would spread far and wide throughout the world. The "apostles," therefore, first of all prepared a "Testimony," which was delivered in 1836 to King William IV. and his Privy Councillors, and in 1837 to the Pope and Prince Metternich; and, secondly, dispersed themselves among the "twelve tribes of the Gentiles" throughout Europe. "Their hearts had been enlarged to embrace all the baptized, and they longed for the perfecting of that one body, of which every tribe was an essential part, and each necessary to the completion of the whole. But those aspirations were not destined to be immediately realized" [Chron. of Events, 28]. In fact nothing came of this apostolic mission except a pleasant ecclesiastical tour and some instruction respecting the Christianity of European nations. A tour of a similar kind was undertaken again in the year 1845, when a few converts were made in America and in Germany. In England the sect has never grown beyond a few thousands, and is more important as to its principles and claims than as to its numbers. [Story's Life of Story of Rosneath. Oliphant's Life of Irving. Norton's Memoirs of J. and G. Macdonald. ISBRANIKI, or "The Company of the Elect." One of the numerous sects which were formed in Russia in the middle of the seventeenth century, during the patriarchate of Nikon [A.D. 1654]. The cause of separation was not any difference of doctrine or ritual, but a desire to protest against the laxity and inclination to change displayed by the clergy, and to adopt a greater piety and purity of life. They were termed by the orthodox party Roscoldschika, or "Seditionists." Pinkerton in his dissertation on Russian sects speaks of the Isbraniki as identical with the STAROVERTZI, or "Believers of the old faith" [Platon, Present State of Greek Church in Russia, Pinkerton's transl.].

ISCARIOTÆ. Among the strange freaks of early heretics was that of honouring Judas Iscariot, on the ground that his act of betraying our Lord into the hands of His persecutors and executioners was done with the intention of bringing about the salvation of mankind. They are alleged also to have maintained that this act of Judas was the more meritorious because he knew that the "Virtutes" desired to hinder the sufferings of Christ, and therefore to obstruct the salvation of men. The sect is mentioned only by Philaster, and he does not assign to it any particular locality [Philast. de Hæres. xxxiv.]. But Irenæus attributes a similar belief to the Cainites [Iren. adv. Hæres. i. 31], and it has not been

ITALIAN PROTESTANTS. Protestantism never obtained a firm footing in Italy, where, as in Spain, and in Southern Europe generally, it was crushed out by the Inquisition. Its history consists of little more than the enumeration of the names of certain distinguished individuals, who betrayed a leaning towards some of the Reformed doctrines, especially that of Justification by Faith as taught by Luther and his contemporaries. Such were the Cardinal Gaspar Contarini; the exile Reginald Pole, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury; Cardinal Morone, Archbishop of Modena, imprisoned for his opinions by Paul IV. A.D. 1557; Bruccioli, who translated the Bible into Italian, first the New Testament A.D. 1630, and the remainder two years afterwards; Juan de Valdez, the Spanish secretary at Naples; Aonio Paleario, the probable author of a book entitled The Benefit of Christ's Death, which appeared A.D. 1543, and of which 40,000 copies were afterwards bought up and burned by the Inquisition. About this period also [A.D. 1530-1542] many refugees took shelter in different parts of Italy, holding Protestant opinions, which they began to disseminate with activity. In this course they were aided by Bernardino Ochino, who was compelled to fly to Geneva A.D. 1542, and Peter Martyr Vermigli, who about the same time found refuge at Zurich. These events led to a strong counter-movement, commenced under Pope Paul III. and continued under his successor Julius III. Commotions caused by the Reformers in Naples [A.D. 1546] were quelled by the united forces of Charles V. and his viceroy Don Pedro de Toledo. But it was the spiritual power directed by Cardinal Caraffa, afterwards Paul IV., and carrying out its purpose by the establishment of the Inquisition, which effectually quelled the tendency to Protestantism, and rendered it till recent years, under Victor Emanuel, a stranger to the soil of Italy. [M'Crie's History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy.]

J

JACOBELLUS. The parish priest of St. Michael's Church at Prague, with whom the CALIXTINES originated. His native place was Misa in Bohemia, though he is sometimes called Jacobellus Misnensis from the mistaken impression that he belonged to Misnia. Huss had not considered it essential that the laity should receive the Cup in the Holy Communion, although he stated his opinion at the Council of Constance that it was proper they should do so. But about the end of the year 1414, James of Misa revived the practice of administering the Holy Communion in both elements at the instigation of Peter of Dresden, who had himself been recently driven out of Bohemia. Jacobellus defended his practice before the Council of Constance on June 15th, 1415, a few weeks before the condemnation and execution of Huss [Hardt's Hist. Conc. Const. iii. 591]. He also wrote Demonstratio per testimonia Scripture Patrum ac Doctorum, communicationem Calicis esse necessarium, and other tracts, in support of the practice in the controversy that arose [ibid. 805]. The account of his first administration of the Cup is given from the Roman side by Aeneas Sylvius, in the 35th chapter of his History of Bohemia; and by an eye-witness on the Calixtine side, Laurence Brzezyna, or Byzinus, Chancellor of the city of Prague, in his Diarium belli Hussitici ab anno 1414 ad 1423 in Ludwig's Reliq. MSS. vi. 124.

JACOBITES. The name by which the adherents of the Monophysite heresy have been known since the sixth century. Some Jacobite writers trace the origin of the name to James the brother of our Lord, others to Dioscorus, whose name was James before he became Patriarch of Alexandria. The more probable derivation of it is from Jacobus Baradaeus, a Syrian monk, who was Bishop of Edessa, about a century after the rise of the sect [A.D. 541-578], and who was the greatest propagator of its distinctive principles in Syria and Egypt. Baradaeus was also surnamed Zanzalus, and hence the Jacobites have been sometimes called Zanzalians [Neale's Patriarch. Alex. ii. 7].

The history of the heresy will be found under the title MONOPHYSITES. It is sufficient here to notice that the Jacobite Churches comprise three Patriarchates, those of Alexandria, the East or Antioch, and Armenia; and that since the conquest of Alexandria by the Saracens, the Jacobite form of Christianity has been that recognised or established by the Mahometan rulers of Egypt.

This arose partly from the fact that the Jacobites were far more numerous than the orthodox, or MELCHITES, and partly because the latter represented the established religion under the Greek Emperors, had offered vigorous opposition to the conquerors, and were looked upon as "royalists" in the sense of still adhering to the Greek Emperors. JANSENISTS. A school of Roman Catholic theologians which derives its name from Cornelius Jansen, the great champion of Augustinianism in the sixteenth century.

From the fifth century to the present time the Western Church has ever taken St. Augustine as its leading theologian, but in the scholastic age a disturbed view of his teaching had been adopted, and the severe Pelagianism of the Schools was notorious. During the Reformation period, Baius, Professor of Theology at Louvain, aimed at a restoration of the true Augustinian scheme of grace, and laboured at this work from the year 1551 to 1580, when he was silenced by Pope Gregory XIII. [BAIUS.]

In A.D. 1588, Molina, a Spanish Jesuit, published a work On the Agreement of Free-Will with Grace and Predestination. It was more Pelagian than anything that had been advanced by the Schoolmen. The different theories of the doctrine of grace had been made needlessly intricate by a confused use of terms. The Thomists allowed that divine grace per se is efficacious, and requires no co-operation on the part of man's will to give it full effect, though the will side with it, but that it does depend in some degree on external circumstances for its efficacious virtue. The Augustinians agreed with the Thomists; only in lieu of this external "premotion" associated with the action of grace they imagined a moral or esoteric "premotion," the virtue of which is the same. But beside this efficacious grace, or grace which cannot fail of its effect, both parties recognised grace of a lower order, which the will of man has power to thwart. The Thomists called it "sufficient," but it was a misnomer; for it was an insufficient agent upon the will of man, which may and does rebel against it; the Augustinians therefore, with more preciseness, termed it "ex-citant." The adoption of two terms to express a single idea was sure to cause misunderstanding. A fresh element of confusion was introduced by Molina, who, discarding the idea of efficacious grace, as already defined, retained the name. This grace was simply the "sufficient" grace of the one school, the "excitant" grace of the other; but whereas that grace might or might not be resisted by the will of the recipient, so he made a twofold distinction: "efficacious" grace which is not resisted, and "sufficient" grace which is thwarted by yielding to concupiscence. The Roman doctrine has never swerved: it has always been that of Aquinas and Augustine.

In the controversies that ensued on the publication of Molina's work the Franciscans took part with the Jesuits, now called Molinists, against the Dominicans, who were chiefly formidable as being the living soul of the Inquisition. The case was brought before that tribunal, having already been prejudged in favour of Augustinianism by the Universities of Salamanca and of Louvain and Douay in the Low Countries. Even Baronius allows that the book of Molina contained more than half a hundred Pelagian propositions. The Jesuits however were sufficiently powerful to avoid impending condemnation, for which purpose a bull, still extant, was prepared, though never put in force. The Molinist system sets forth, that all possible action of free-will is foreseen; that God wills to save where man is willing to be saved; He gives all necessary help in varying degree; predestination and reprobation are dependent upon God's foreknowledge; His grace per se is not efficacious, for it was not so in our first parents; God wills the salvation of all through Christ, and grace is given to all sufficient for salvation, "sufficient" meaning grace supplemented and made efficacious by the will of man. The Dominicans attacked these notions with vigour; and, with the view of composing the strife, Clement VIII. [A.D. 1597] called into being the "Congregatio de auxiliis," to consider and report upon the true doctrine of Divine aid by grace. Its deliberations were continued interruptedly till A.D. 1607, when Molinist doctrine was declared to be Pelagian; though the Bull prepared for its formal condemnation was reserved till some favourable time for its promulgation: but the Jesuits were known and feared, and the "fulmen" was never launched.

Such were the controversies on grace that were going on during the younger years of Jansen, and determined the complexion of his theology, and that of the writers of Port-Royal. This convent, the headquarters of Jansenism, was situated in a romantic valley three miles from Versailles. It was originally a cell of the Cistercian order, but transferred by papal authority to the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Paris. Pope Honorius III. [A.D. 1223] granted to it certain privileges as an asylum for lay persons who were weary of the world. La Mère Angelique, still of tender age, of the Arnauld family, became abbess of the house A.D. 1602. By the advice of her confessor, the Jesuit Binet, she removed her nuns to a house in the Rue St. Jacques, Paris [A.D. 1638], known as Port Royal de Paris, when the original establishment, designated "Port Royal des Champs," became, under the rectorship of St. Cyran, an asylum for those who wished for seclusion without taking monastic vows. Here he gathered around him Antoine le Maistre, who renounced a brilliant parliamentary position, with his brother, Simon Séricourt, and Isaac de Sacy, the translator of the New Testament; Robert and Dr. Antoine Arnauld, author of the work on Frequent Communion, in opposition to the scholastic theory of the "opus operatum;" Lancelot, and other distinguished men. Prayer, reading of Scripture, study, and bodily exercise, filled out the day; and the severe simplicity of Port Royal life contrasted significantly with the neighbouring frivolity and courtly vices of Paris. St. Francis of Sales and its first abbé, St. Cyran, of the Benedictine order, gave to the establishment a tone of mysticism, and at the same time its character of literary enthusiasm and educational zeal.

Cornelius Jansen was born [A.D. 1585] at Acqoi in Holland, and became Professor of Theology at Louvain, A.D. 1630. His Mars Gallicus obtained for him the bishopric of Ypres [A.D. 1636], and for his friend Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, better known as the Abbé St. Cyran, a seven years' imprisonment in the Château of Vincennes till the year of his death, A.D. 1643. Jansen having, to use his own expression, played long enough "the school pedant and ass," made it the great object of his life to restore the teaching of Augustine to its proper position in the Church, and to shew how much it had been perverted by the Schoolmen, and more especially by the Scotist party. In a twenty years' preparation he read over Augustine's treatises on Pelagianism thirty times, and the remainder of that Father's works ten times. His Augustinus was still in MS. when he died of the plague, A.D. 1637, commending the publication of it to his friends Libert-Fromond and Calenus. It was a service of difficulty and of some risk, for the Jesuits, aware that it was aimed at their Molinist notions, obtained possession of sheets as they passed through the press, and denounced the work both at Rome and to the Faculty of Theology at Louvain, as contravening the injunctions of Sixtus V. against the maintenance of controversies with respect to grace. Before any steps could be taken, the printers, by redoubled diligence and with the connivance of the university, had completed their work; the Augustinus was published at Louvain, in the centenary year of the Jesuit order [A.D. 1640],¹ and reprinted shortly afterwards at Paris and Rouen.

In the first volume Jansen defines the distinctive tenets of the Pelagian and Semi-Pelagian, and shews that the doctrines of Molina essentially agreed with them. The second volume assigns the limits of human reason and adjusts the claims of authority with a particular reference to the authoritative teaching of Augustine. Reversing the scholastic principle, he affirmed that philosophy and theology were entirely unconnected with each other; the former affecting the intellectual faculty, the latter being determined by prescription and traditions flowing from the fountain-head. Augustine is the careful exponent of these traditions, raised up for that purpose by Divine Providence, inspired by God's Spirit, and predestined by His grace; to advance beyond the lines laid down by him is full of peril. The germ of evil in Adam, which led to the Fall, was his freedom of will, unfettered by the grace in which he was created, Jansen adopting the Infralapsarian view. Grace was no superadded gift, it was the dowry of Adam's being. He was at liberty to forfeit his freedom, if he cast away the love of God, which alone is perfect freedom. Original sin is not mere imputation of sin, it is a deprivation of nature. Concupiscence is a taint of sin in body and soul. The penal consequences of birth-sin are ignorance and evil desires; both of which are truly sin as corresponding with nothing in the divine exemplar in which man was created. The position of concupiscence is to be noted, which the Manichee and Pelagian make the antecedent, and Augustine a consequence, of the Fall. The sinner's will is free though bound by sin, as the Divine Will is free though bound by its own law of mercy and truth. The best deeds of the natural man are no better than splendid sins; a proposition that had been condemned in Baius by Pius V., as Jansen stated, through an insufficient acquaintance with Augustine and the decisions of former popes.

The third book treats in ten sections of the Grace of Christ. This is not merely revealed truth, but inward remedial aid, a real power. The fear of God and of eternal punishment cannot remove evil from the heart; fear is the self-growth of the fallen soul, there is nothing of God in it, and occasion is taken to attack by the way the scholastic notion of attrition.¹ Grace as a divine power restores to man his freedom in will and deed. God is the Author of all grace, and He gives it according to His good pleasure; not as foreseeing in the recipient any fitness, but simply because He wills it. Yet the recipient is no mere passive agent in the hand of God; for God's work, co-ordinate with human action, obtains its adjustment through the will of the agent. God gives to many a desire for His love and for gracious deeds, but vouchsafes to few power and performance. Faith is the source of all good, and love is its fruit. God bestows the gift of faith on many, but the rare "gift of perseverance" alone can make faith effective. All things work together for good to the elect; and all things, even the gifts of faith and love, apart from perseverance, work together for the damnation of those that are rejected. God determines their destined end, both to the objects of election and of preterition; He appoints also the correlative mean, the stirrings of grace and the errings of sin. The fulfilment of duty is the happiest condition of man, and it is the pledge of his election. The reprobate by their sins are as a lurid beacon-light to the elect, to warn off from the rock of destruction, and thus even these fulfil the purpose of their being. In bestowing His grace upon the elect God bestows Himself.

The Bull of Urban VIII., "In eminenti" [A.D. 1642], condemned the Augustinus as a revival of Baian error, but its publication was deferred from a hope of stifling controversy by quiet means. In the next year Dr. Antoine Arnauld, "the great Arnauld" as the Jansenists termed him, but whose name was derived by the Jesuits from ἀποστάτης, "the renegade," published his treatise De la fréquente Communion,² based entirely on Jansen's view of predestination and rejection. His legal training suggested the notable distinction of "de facto" and "de jure" that afterwards acquired so much importance. The book was denounced at once by the Jesuit College at Rome, and condemned by Urban VIII., A.D. 1643. Arnauld yielded to the storm by retiring into private life to exercise his pen in the Jansenist cause [A.D. 1649]. Dr. Cornet, Syndic of the Theological Faculty, laid before the Sorbonne seven propositions, subsequently reduced to five, framed from Jansen's writings, but without his name. The Doctors were divided, but the propositions were referred to the Court of Rome, where they were formally considered and condemned by Innocent X. in the Bull "Cum occasione," A.D. 1653. The distinction of "de facto" and "de jure" now came to the rescue of the perplexed Jansenists. All of the clerical order and members of religious houses were commanded to subscribe the condemnation of the propositions as drawn from Jansen's writings. It was generally denied that the terms were "de facto" Jansen's; their heretical tendency "de jure" was another thing. The distinction was pressed home, and while infallibility was allowed to the Court of Rome in synod assembled "de jure," in matters of doctrine its complete fallibility was shewn from several historical instances, in which it was seen that the Holy See had often erred in matters of fact.³ Thus the Jansenist party could subscribe the document in the "de jure" point of view, while they denied "de facto" that it contained any ground of personal condemnation as regarded Jansen. The impugnement of infallibility in any sense was a serious gravamen. But were the five propositions really to be found in the Augustinus? Cornet, the originator of the movement, had made no such statement. The Papal Bull had not named Jansen; though in a brief from the Pope to the Bishop of Tulle the propositions were assumed "to have been taken from the book of Cornelius Jansen."

While the subscription was being enforced another element of discord arose [A.D. 1655]. The Duc de Liancourt was refused absolution in the Church of St. Sulpice at Paris for harbouring a Jansenist abbé under his roof. This drew forth the letters from Arnauld "To a Person of Quality," from which the watchful adversary extracted two points contrary to Roman authority: 1. That the five propositions had never been held by Jansen. 2. That the grace without which man is inoperative was wanting to St. Peter, since it is impossible to say that he was without sin. Arnauld, it should be noted, maintained that it is not only after deadly sin that grace deserts a man, but after sin of whatever kind, the incitement to which is not loyally resisted. Upon these points Arnauld was condemned, though informally, by the Sorbonne, and degraded from the doctorate.¹ Eighty others shared his disgrace rather than subscribe an unjust sentence. From that time Arnauld was emphatically known by his party as "the Doctor."

It was at this juncture that Blaise Pascal, on intimate terms with the inmates of Port Royal, put forth his Provincial Letters.² The injustice done to his friend by the Jesuits drove him to carry war to the knife into their camp. The rough material for his weapons of offence was prepared by Arnauld, who knew thoroughly well the whole system of equivocation called by the Jesuits casuistical divinity; but they were polished up by Pascal, pointed with an exquisite irony, and feathered with a wit that has never had its parallel. The way in which he disposes of the inadequate notion of "sufficient" grace may be cited as an example. "'Well now, my father,' he says to an imaginary Thomist, 'is this grace, vouchsafed to all, sufficient?' 'Certainly.' 'Yet void of effect without efficacious grace?' 'Just so.' 'Then all men have sufficient but not efficacious grace?' 'Yes.' 'That is, all have sufficient and not sufficient grace. In truth, a subtle distinction. Have you then forgotten on giving up the world what the word "sufficient" means there? . . . To use an illustration that you will comprehend: If they gave you no more than a couple of ounces of bread and a glass of water for your daily meal, would you be content with your superior if he were to tell you that it was sufficient for your need? that is, with something else that he withheld from you, you would have all that was required for your support. How then can you bring yourself to say that all men have sufficient grace to act, when you add that another grace which all men have not is absolutely necessary that action may be possible? . . . If I deny sufficient grace you call me a Jansenist; if I acknowledge it with the Jesuits, and affirm that efficacious grace is not necessary, you brand me with heresy; if I confess its necessity with you, asserting that efficacious grace is also necessary, I sin against common sense, and I am a fool, as the Jesuits say. What am I to believe then in this inevitable predicament of being either a Jansenist, a heretic, or a fool?"

Elsewhere there is a grotesqueness in his description of Jesuit doctrine with respect to the love of God that sadly jars with the sacred subject on which it treats. But Pascal was the vivisector rather than the anatomist. If the nerve could be demonstrated quivering beneath the scalpel, why be nice about the means? "Listen to Escobar on this question," he says, "When is a man bound to feel a positive love for God? Suarez says it suffices if we love Him before the moment of death, without defining any exact time; Vasquez, that it will do if we love Him at the moment of departure; others, at baptism; others, when we are bound to feel contrition; others, on fête days. Father Castro Palao contests all these notions, and with reason. Hurtado de Mendoza declares that we are bound to love God once in the year, and are so far treated with much consideration. But Father Koninek imagines that the obligation recurs every three or four years; Henriquez, every five years; while Filiutius affirms that, correctly speaking, we are not bound to love God every five years, but leaves the matter for wiser heads to settle . . . Dr. Thomas teaches that we must love God as soon as we attain an age of reason, that is somewhat early; Scotus, every Sunday; others, when we are grievously tempted, in case there be no other way of avoiding temptation; Soto, when we receive any blessing from God, it is a fit way of shewing thanks; others at our death, which is somewhat late. Nor would it seem to be necessary at every communion; attrition with confession (where opportunity serves) is enough." He disposes of the Jesuit masters of casuistry in a similar way. "'But, father, I do not see how you are to act when the Fathers of the Church are in antagonism with your casuists.' 'You do not understand,' he said; 'the Fathers were good for the morality of their age, but they are too distant for ours. They no longer guide the conscience, but our casuists.' 'That is to say, my father, that at your appearance St. Augustine, St. Chrysostom, St. Jerome, St. Ambrose, and others vanished, so far as Christian morality is concerned; but tell me now the names of their successors: who are these more recent authors?' 'They are able and celebrated men,' he said; 'Villalobos, Koninck, Llamas, Achokier, Dealkoser, Dellacruz, Veracruz, Ugolin, Tambourin, Fernandez, Martinez, Suarez, Henriquez, Vasquez, Lopez, Gomez, Sanchez,' &c. 'But oh, my father,' said I in alarm, 'were all these Christians?'" [Lett. v.]¹

³ Again, a little further on, "he concludes that, rigorously speaking, a man is only bound to obey the other commandments without any love for God, and without giving our heart to Him, so that we do not hate Him." "See," says Suarez, "the goodness of God; we are not so much enjoined to love Him as to forbear from hating Him."

As these letters appeared all Europe enjoyed the discomfiture of the Jesuits; but Louis XIV. made it a matter of conscience, as he declared to the Assembly of the Clergy [A.D. 1660], to extirpate Jansenism. A formulary therefore was prepared containing a condemnation of the five propositions, extracted professedly from the Augustinus; and every ecclesiastical person, whether monk or nun, parish priest or dignitary of the Church, was compelled to sign it. Recusants were thrown into prison, and De Sacy in the Bastille commenced his translation of the New Testament [Le N. Test. de Mons.]. Arnauld still maintained his stand on the distinction "de facto" and "de jure;" but Pope Alexander VII., by a constitution of February 15th, 1665, demanded a faithful submission to the papal declaration "de facto." Four bishops, in lieu of signature, promised a "respectful silence" on the question of fact, and were marked down for penal visitation, when nineteen others made the cause their own, and discretion was seen to be the wiser course. Clement IX., no friend to Molinist doctrine, having succeeded to the papal throne [A.D. 1667], allowed the distinction to be valid; when peace having been apparently restored, a medal was struck in commemoration of the "Pacification," the specimens of which however the Jesuits have contrived to make very scarce.

Port Royal was now once more filled with its recluses, who directed their energies against the writings of the Reformed communities. Thus Nicole and Arnauld defended the Catholic doctrine of the Eucharist against Claude and Blondel. But the old paths of controversy were not forgotten in Arnauld's Morals of the Jesuits and Nicole's Latin translation of the Provincial Letters. Tillemont, representing the party that met the papal claim to authority "de facto," with the "silence respectueux," and denying that Jansen was justly charged with the substance of the five propositions, there compiled his invaluable historical works and Mémoires; De Sacy completed his translation of Scripture; the Mère Angélique composed her Reflections, Conferences, and Spiritual Letters, to brace her nuns for the recurrence of persecution; and more important in its results than all, Quesnel wrote his Moral Reflections on the New Testament, which quickly superseded the Augustinus in the acrimonious disputes that followed, and called forth the Bull "Unigenitus." This work also gave occasion to the celebrated Problème Ecclésiastique, by Thierry de Viaixnes, written in true "Provincial" style; for the Cardinal de Noailles having, as Bishop of Chalons, approved the Réflexions Morales, and recommended it to his clergy, condemned it in the next year as Archbishop of Paris, in condemning the Exposition de la Foi de l'Eglise, by a nephew of St. Cyran, which wholly followed the Réflexions. The problem to be solved therefore was whether the same individual as the Bishop of Chalons in 1695 or as the Archbishop of Paris in 1696 were the safer guide. The Jansenist party seemed to be at the top of the tide, when sixty-five Jesuit propositions, of a lax casuistry, which Nicole and Arnauld had drawn up, were condemned by Innocent XI. [A.D. 1679]; but it was the last Jansenist triumph, for Louis XIV., wholly devoted to his pleasures and his ghostly counsellors the Jesuits, made Jansenism a matter of personal offence; and when Arnauld and his party took the Pope's side in the quarrel that led to the Gallican Articles [DICT. OF THEOL.; GALLICANISM], Arnauld found it safer to migrate as a voluntary exile to the Spanish Netherlands, where he lived for the remainder of his days, from A.D. 1679-1694. Quesnel had gone thither in the preceding year, and Gerberon, the learned Benedictine, followed in A.D. 1682.

Although the Jansenists had always repudiated the idea of any dalliance with Protestantism, many of their notions were more in unison with the Reformation idea than with the traditions of the Schools, the key of the Roman position. They were the Calvinists of the Roman Communion.² The Schools had drifted away from pure Augustinian teaching; Luther and Melancthon insisted on recurring to it, as did Baius and Jansen. Hence the two widely divergent systems that divided the Gallican Church, and the ease with which men learned to believe that "Jansenist" was only a synonym for "Protestant," notwithstanding the overt fact that Arnauld and Nicole, the master spirits of Jansenism, both wrote against the principles of the Reformation. In a moral point of view the teaching of Augustine was very different from that of Mariana and Suarez, whose ethics had filled Europe with astonishment. But the Jansenists taught the necessity of simple goodness and deep religious feeling; they demanded the moral and spiritual reform of monastery and manse; the dissemination of the Word of God among the people, and the encouragement of primary education, as the only means of dispelling error. These principles being of a more popular cast, made the Jansenist community an object of intense aversion to the Jesuits and at the same time truly formidable. Religious austerity, pietism, and a strain of mysticism, will always make a sect popular with the lower orders. The laxity of court morals on the other hand found more indulgent confessors in the Jesuit body. Hence the recluses of Port Royal were regarded by the lower orders with something like veneration, while the noblesse sided with the Jesuits in bringing about their suppression; and Jansenist disregard of papal authority where it was manifestly in error gave the desired opportunity to their foes.

In 1700 the Case of Conscience reopened the whole question of the five propositions. Forty doctors of the Sorbonne declared that the papal claim of infallible authority in matters of fact might be received in a passive attitude, however the individual judgment might reject it, the Pacification of Clement IX. permitting such a course; but Clement XI., strong in the Molinist interest, condemned their decision in the Bull "Vineam Domini Sabaoth." The complete destruction of Port Royal was determined when its inmates refused to subscribe the papal decree, and a commission was issued to the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris to suppress the convent [A.D. 1709]. Ten minutes alone were allowed for the nuns to clear out from the premises. The buildings were demolished, and even the cemetery was desecrated by a horrible exposure of the recently interred, to the lasting reproach of Molinism. French Jansenism was from that time destroyed, but its spirit survived in Holland.

When the Bull "Vineam Domini" was accepted by the clergy, Clement XI. made good another step, and condemned Quesnel's Réflexions Morales on the New Testament [13th July 1708], which he had at first read with pleasure and profit. A.D. 1712, a congregation of five cardinals and eleven theologians was appointed to reconsider the work. After close deliberation for more than a year, the famous Bull "Unigenitus" appeared [Nov. A.D. 1713], in which one hundred and one propositions in Quesnel's book were declared to be heretical; the number is precise, le Père le Tellier, confessor to Louis XIV., having pledged himself to find in it more than a hundred heretical statements. The Abbé Guettée in his history classes the propositions as follows:—twelve heretical, twelve not worthy of censure, and eighty-seven erroneous, suspicious, or offensive to pious ears. His information is drawn from original documents preserved at Rome. The propositions were condemned, not seriatim but in bulk, that Le Tellier might save his credit as a prophet of evil. Among these propositions several were taken from Scripture; others either echoed the statements of Augustine or harmonized entirely with Tridentine doctrine.

A serious division now took place in the French Church on the constitutional question, whether the Bull should be acted upon or rejected as an infringement of Gallican liberties. The two parties were named respectively Constitutionists and Anti-Constitutionists: Acceptants and Recusants. To determine the strife an appeal was organized from the papal decree to the next general council; a step that had ample precedent in its favour. The Archbishop of Paris, at the head of fifteen bishops, the Sorbonne of old historic fame, and a whole host of abbots, canons, and clergy of every grade, joined in the appeal [March 1st, A.D. 1717]. Clement XI. met them with the Bull "Pastoralis Officii," which excommunicated all who joined in the appeal, of whatever grade, from the cardinalate downwards. The Parliament was throughout on the side of the appellants, and ordered a remonstrance to the Regent from Mailly, the Molinist Bishop of Rheims, to be publicly burnt by the hangman. The writer was promoted to the cardinalate A.D. 1727. Soanen, the aged Bishop of Senes in Provence, one of the appellant bishops, having commended in a pastoral letter the Réflexions Morales, and added to his offence by strong expressions against Papal infallibility and the Bull "Unigenitus," was summoned before a provincial council at Embrun. He was deposed and consigned to the Chaise Dieu, a keep in the high ground of the Haute Loire.

At this juncture a large body of Benedictine, Carthusian, and Cistercian dissentients from the Bull "Unigenitus" settled at Utrecht; which church had also put in an appeal, powerfully drawn up by Van Erkel, in favour of Quesnel. According to Ranke [Hist. of Popes, viii. 18], Jansenists found their way at this period in considerable numbers to Vienna, Brussels, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, disseminating their doctrines and detailing their many grievances either openly or by stealth. Jansenism, after originating in such men as Jansen and St. Cyran, Arnauld and De Sacy, thenceforth evaporated in France in a rout of fanatics, as the Rhine loses itself amid the sandbanks of the coast. A.D. 1727 marks the year in which this decay set in. A deacon named François de Paris, who had lived as a Jansenist ascetic, and refused to sign the "Unigenitus," died, and was buried in the cemetery of St. Médard. His grave, as Voltaire said, was the grave of Jansenism. Miraculous cures were said to have been performed at his tomb.¹ The place was soon thronged by devotees, whose frenzied extravagances procured for them the name of CONVULSIONARIES. Fanaticism and immorality are often closely allied, and the place of sacred associations became notorious for licentious excesses that compelled the authorities to close it; when the excluded avenged themselves with the epigram—

"De par le roi; défense à Dieu De faire miracles en ce lieu."

Various sects of Convulsionists still existed in the time of the Revolution, but they had nothing essentially in common with Jansenism, of which Utrecht thenceforth became the headquarters. The troubles caused by the Bull "Unigenitus," and the discord that it created, dividing the inferior clergy from the upper, may be considered to have been one of the remote causes of the French Revolution.

Jansenism again shewed front on the death of Louis XIV., the great patron of its rivals. The Sorbonne, Molinist under his reign, became Jansenist in the regency. [Duvernet, Hist. de la Sorbonne, ii. 225.] By the middle of the century Jansenism was sensibly felt in the French parliament, and its principles were openly professed by men of high political position.

JERKERS AND BARKERS. A name given to the fanatics who, at "camp-meetings" in America, indulge religious "exercises of falling down, rolling, shouting, jerking, dancing, barking," &c. Like the Welsh Methodist practice of jumping, that of "jerking" is a kind of nervous epidemic which attacks those persons who are devoid of self-control, and who give way to the excitement of a crowd, under the influence of stimulating harangues from their preachers. [CONVULSIONARIES. DANCERS. JUMPERS. SHAKERS.]

JEROME OF PRAGUE. A contemporary and colleague of Huss, whose full name was Jerome Faulfisch. He was of a noble family in Bohemia, and is said to have studied at Oxford (where he drank in greedily the principles of Wickliffe), as well as at Paris and Heidelberg. Wherever he went Jerome seems to have shewn himself an ardent defender of Wickliffe, being imprisoned at Venice and elsewhere through the extravagance of his opinions. When the troubles about Huss had reached their height, Jerome left Prague to visit Cracow, but on the imprisonment of Huss, he returned to the city, and travelling thence arrived secretly at Constance on April 4th, 1415. He shortly fled from the dangers of Constance to a place of security in the neighbourhood, from whence he applied for a safe-conduct, that he might return to defend his own principles and those of Huss before the council. This was not granted, and having been apprehended, Jerome was brought before the council in chains on May 23rd. Huss was executed on July 6th, 1415, and two months afterwards, on September 23rd, Jerome recanted, abjuring the heresies of both Wickliffe and Huss, and acknowledging the justice of their condemnation. He was still kept in prison, and having demanded a public trial, he was once more brought before the council, where he defended himself from seven in the morning until one in the afternoon on May 23rd and 26th, and retracted his recantation. A few days afterwards he was condemned, and was executed on May 30th, 1416. [Æneas Sylvius' Hist. Bohem. Hardt's Hist. Conc. Const.]

JERUSALEM FRIENDS. Henry Nicolas and "his New Jerusalem Friends" are spoken of by Ross in the last page of his Παρορεσία, shewing that this was a name by which the "Family of Love" was known in 1654.

JERUSALEM FRIENDS [Jerusalemfreunde]. A German sect, known also by the name of Hoffmanites [Hoffmannianer], Hardthofites [Hardthöfer], and "the German Temple" [der Deutsche Tempel]. They originated in the year 1854 at Kirchenhardthof, near Winnenden, in Würtemberg, their founder being Christian Hoffmann, whose father had established the KORNTALITES [A.D. 1819]. Their distinctive idea is that of collecting together a community of faithful Christians in the Holy Land, and from thence extending a revived kingdom of Christ into other lands. Their number amounts to about 3000, and they have founded colonies at Jaffa and Haisa under the superintendence of Hoffmann, who takes the title of bishop in the sect. In principle the Hoffmanites are simply Pietistic Lutherans, holding extreme Millenarian opinions.

JEWISH SECTS. There are two lists of Jewish sects, one given by Hegesippus and the other by Epiphanius, which must be considered as professing to be complete. Each gives seven names: each includes the three great sects, Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes [Ossenes, Epiph.]; each has Hemerobaptists: but Hegesippus gives the other three, Galilæans, Masbothæans, Samaritans; Epiphanius' other three are Scribes, Nazareans, Herodians. In comparing these lists, and others which will be named, it will be assumed, in consequence of Josephus' mention of three great sects, that all other sects which may occur were branches of these three, and included by Josephus under the three. They may be mentioned or not by other writers, according to the point of view from which those writers regarded the sects. Hegesippus evidently gives under his seven heads all the different bodies which inhabited Palestine; and takes into his consideration political divisions as well as religious differences. Accordingly, he names as a sect the insurgent Galilæans, the party formed by Theudas, as well as the Samaritans and Masbothæans. The Samaritan sects do not enter into our present subject; neither does the political body, the Galilæans. There remains, therefore, as a Jewish religious sect, only the Hemerobaptists. From the mention of these in a politico-religious list, it is fair to infer that they were a large body.

Epiphanius rightly distinguishes the Samaritans from the Jews, and he deals only with religious bodies. Such he considered the Herodians to be, for he attributes to them the notion that Herod was the Messiah. Such the Scribes were, but certainly they did not constitute a sect. Dismissing these, then, there remains, besides the Hemerobaptists, only the Nazareans.

Another enumeration of Jewish sects is made by Justin Martyr [Dial. c. Tryph. lxxx.]. He says to Trypho, "One would not admit that the Sadducees, or similar sects of Genistæ, Meristæ, Galilæans, Hellenians, Pharisee-Baptists, are Jews." Here we must read "Pharisee-Baptists," not "Pharisees, Baptists." For the typical Jew Trypho was a Pharisee,¹ and could not be called upon to grant that a Pharisee was only nominally a Jew. The Pharisee-Baptists must have been the Hemerobaptists, a party who exaggerated the

Pharisaic washings, and separated from the Pharisees on that account. From Justin's list, therefore, there remains to be considered the Genistæ, Meristæ, and Hellenians. Of these Kaye wrote, "in the enumeration of Jewish sects, the names of the Genistæ, Meristæ, and Helleniani occur; of the former two Isidore [Origin. viii. 4, p. 63], has given some though not a satisfactory account; of the Helleniani no trace, I believe, is to be found in any other writer" [Account of Justin M. p. 45]. Now the list of Pseudo-Hieronymus [Indic. i.-x.] is evidently made up of the lists of Hegesippus and Justin (if it be allowed that in Justin the Pharisee-Baptists are only one sect), with the exception that the Herodians take the place of the Helleniani. It is very probable then that Justin's Helleniani are only Herodians.

Again, comparing Justin's list with that of Hegesippus, there appears to be no sect named by Hegesippus which can possibly be identified with, or can include the Genistæ and Meristæ. But comparing it with the list of Epiphanius, the Nazareans present themselves for consideration. Now Epiphanius describes the Nazareans (to use modern sectarian language) as primitive Jews. They revered the Fathers down to Moses, and Moses himself, but said that the books of Moses were forgeries. They offered no sacrifices: they ate no flesh. Is it not probable, then, that "Genistæ" is only another name¹ of this sect; that the Nazareans were so called from their claim, not merely to be descended from the original stock of the Jews, but to have preserved uncorrupted the faith of the patriarchs? The occurrence of the name in Justin and its omission in Epiphanius, who was diligent in accumulating his sects, are otherwise difficult to account for. Isidore missed the true point aimed at in the term; and to the statement of Pseudo-Hieronymus, that the Genistæ boasted to be of the stock of Abraham, which clearly is not of itself sufficient to constitute a Jewish sect, he added his own explanation founded upon the Babylonish intermarriages. It seems also as probable that "Meristæ" is another name of the same sect, or perhaps the distinguishing name of a portion of it. Pseudo-Hieronymus and Isidore, absurdly enough, derive the term from separating the Scriptures by rejecting some books. This rejection of certain books cannot be attributed to any ancient Jewish sect except the Nazareans.² Scaliger says, "Hoc potius pertinet ad Karraim, et non video quo applicetur nomen Meristarum" [Elench. cap. iii.]. It may serve to identify the Meristæ with the Nazareans; but instead of deriving the name from such separation we may conjecture that it was given in opposition to the pretensions of the name "Genistæ." The sect pretended to be the true representative of the γένος of the nation, but to the true children they only represented those who divided the inheritance.

From these four authorities which have been named we have then only two sects, the Hemero-baptists and the Nazareans, to add to the three great sects. Philaster's supposed Jewish sects are really not worth consideration. The Hemero-baptists manifestly border on the Pharisees; they were Pharisee-Baptists. The Nazareans (whose existence³ we thus take to be guaranteed by Justin Martyr, by their rejection of sacrifices and the Levitical law, are connected with the Essenes.

The Sadducees and the Essenes, with the minor sects, disappeared in the second century [see Epiph. Hæres. xx. s. f.], and the Jews justly consider themselves successors of the Pharisees. [ESSENES. HEMEROBAPTISTS. KARAITES. PHARISEES. SADDUCEES.]

JOACHIMITES. The heretical followers of Joachim, Abbot of the Cistercian monastery of Floris in Calabria, who lived through a large portion of the twelfth century, A.D. 1130-1200.

Joachim was an enthusiastic preacher and writer on the subject of Old and New Testament prophecies, and these he applied in such a manner to the existing corruption and future condition of the Church, that he himself came to be regarded by many as a prophet, and the Prophecies of the Abbot Joachim are well known to the reader of mediæval history. He also wrote a treatise on the doctrine of the Trinity, in which he opposed the theology of Peter Lombard, and fell into an error very nearly akin to Tritheism, asserting that when Lombard maintained that there are Three Persons in One Essence he really maintained a quaternity rather than a Trinity. This error was controverted at some length, and condemned, in the second canon of the fourth Council of Lateran [A.D. 1215], "De errore Abbatis Joachim," within a few years of his death [Hardu. Concil. vii. 18]. In the Trinitarian controversy of the seventeenth century Bishop Sherlock was accused of having maintained a similar error in his Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity, printed in 1691.

The apocalyptic tone of Joachim's writings led his followers into the most extreme fanaticism. One of them—probably a monk, named Gerard, belonging to the newly created Franciscan order, whose rise, with that of the Dominicans, Joachim was alleged to have predicted—collected three works of his master into one under the title of The Everlasting Gospel, probably interpolating it here and there with sentences of his own. This he declared to be the Gospel named in Rev. xiv. 6, representing that St. Francis, the founder of his order, was "the angel" who was to bear it forth to the world, and that it would supersede the New Testament in the year 1260. This wild and profane book was suppressed by order of Alexander IV. in the year 1255; but some of the principles contained in the work had already acquired a strong hold upon the ignorant, and had much influence in the production of that wild and lawless phase of Millenarianism which

The theory thus started into life by Joachim was that the successive periods of human history are associated with the Three Persons of the Blessed Trinity. The ages before Christ were those in which God the Father was revealing Himself in the letter of the Old Testament by power, fear, and faith. Then followed the ages of the New Testament, in which God the Son was revealing Himself by the letter of the Gospel, and giving to men the fulness of humility, truth, and wisdom. This dispensation of the Son was to be succeeded by the "Last Days," in which God the Holy Ghost would crown all that had gone before with perfect love, joy and freedom. It is easy to see how this theory could be perverted into the notion broached in the Evangelium Æternum, that Christianity as it had been hitherto known was passing away, and was to be superseded by a spiritual religion of the heart, in which sacraments and all outward means of grace were to be superseded by contemplative love. It is also easy to see how the "freedom" of the predicted "Last Days" could without effort be perverted into Antinomianism, as in the case of the "Brethren of the Free Spirit," the Franciscan Fraticelli, the Beghards, the Albigenses, and other mediæval sects: and how the idea that the active life of Christianity was to give place to the contemplative life of the Spirit was the parent of that mendicancy which characterized them all. As early as the year 1260 the Council of Arles spoke of the Joachimist error as spreading like a cancer [Hardu. Concil. vii. 511], and already it was found necessary to pass canons enjoining the clergy to teach the people that Baptism was a necessary sacrament, and that the union of man and woman, without the blessing of the Church, was not marriage.

Thus, although the Abbot Joachim never founded a sect, and can scarcely be said, at least in his lifetime, to have formed a school, his writings fell upon the excited Christianity of his age like sparks on stubble, and very soon indeed the flames of Antinomian and anti-sacerdotal fanaticism burst forth in every direction throughout Europe as the result of the principles which he taught. Those principles however went side by side with the pantheistic spiritualism of Amalric of Bena, who originated the notion that the Holy Spirit becomes present by a kind of incarnation in every spiritual Christian: and it may be that in both cases the teachers were riding on the wave of opinion rather than directing it; that they were merely expressing in forcible language opinions which had arisen from subtle and, now at least, undiscoverable causes.

The works of Joachim were printed at Venice in the years 1517-19, and his life was written by a Dominican named Gervaise in 1745. A full summary of his opinions, and those contained in The Everlasting Gospel, may be found in Natalis Alexander's Ecclesiastical History, vol. viii. pp. 73-76.

JOANNITES. Those who refused to recognise the deposition of St. John Chrysostom from the See of Constantinople by the Emperor Arcadius [A.D. 404], and would not submit themselves to his successors until some time after his death. They took up a position somewhat similar to that of the English Nonjurors, but it does not appear that they ever attempted to continue a succession, although many bishops and clergy, besides those at Constantinople, belonged to the party. Some of them returned to the communion of St. Chrysostom's second successor, Atticus, when he introduced the confessor's name into the Diptych of the Church of Constantinople. The rest conformed when Proclus persuaded the Emperor Theodosius II. to bring back the remains of St. Chrysostom, to be buried with reverence in the principal church of the city, A.D. 438. JOSEPPINI. [JOSEPHISTÆ.]

JOVINIANISTS. This sect or school was named after Jovinian, a Milanese monk, who left Milan for Rome, and about the year 388 opposed the estimate then prevalent in the Church of celibacy, monasticism, fasting and martyrdom. His character is accordingly represented in very different lights by different branches of the Church, and by different parties in the same Church. In some histories he appears as the honest and bold reformer, in some as the sensual monk and abandoned heretic. Our knowledge of him coming from his opponents, it is impossible to say exactly what allowance is to be made for personal animosity and controversial bitterness. More or less of Jerome's vituperation is believed according to the style of the reader's theology—few believe the whole.

The extent to which it was right in the fourth century to carry the practice of celibacy it is difficult for us to judge correctly. That it was right for many to make themselves eunuchs for the Kingdom of Heaven's sake, and that they gained the reward of chastity and self-denial, no one can doubt. In many cases, celibacy was incumbent on clergy for the service of God's ministry, and in many cases expedient for both clergy and laity on account of the distress of the times. At the same time, there can be no doubt that the same motive for enforcing the celibacy of the clergy which acted so powerfully in later ages, was then working; the desire, namely, to separate the sacerdotal order from the rest of society, and for the sake of clerical power, to raise the clergy to a seemingly higher level than men in general could attain. To oppose this was the part of a wise and good man.

Jovinian, however, appears to have opposed, not so much this particular instance, as the pernicious principle which had then entered into the doctrine of celibacy itself, whether applied to clergy or laity. The Manichæan tenet of the innate sinfulness of all sexual intercourse, as partaking of the inextinguishable impurity of matter, was working itself into the general feeling of religious men [see Milman, Latin Christ. i. 98, ed. 1867]. It came in under the disguise that there are not merely degrees, but states of righteousness differing in kind, with the higher of which marriage is incompatible. So that celibacy was recommended, not upon the ground named by our Lord, that is, for the sake of the Church, that God's work might be better done [Matt. xix. 12], not in the case named by St. Paul [1 Cor. vii. 26], in the time of a present distress,¹ but in and for itself, as a state in itself holier than marriage; until, by a perversion of St. John's words [Rev. xiv. 4], defilement was attributed to the state which God has consecrated. Augustine's notice of Jovinian [Hæc. lxxxii.] is an instance of this false estimate. Jovinian, who remained unmarried, is condemned for doing so, "Quod non propter aliquod apud Deum majus meritum in regno vitæ perpetuæ profuturum, sed propter præsentem prodesse necessitatem, hoc est, ne homo conjugales patiatur molestias, disputabat," a condemnation from which we cannot see how St. Paul is excluded. Into monasticism there entered, besides this false estimate of celibacy, the mischievous belief that in order to attain the higher degree of righteousness it was necessary to withdraw from the general body of the Church. Christ was to be sought in deserts and secret chambers. Fasting, instead of being the accompaniment and expression of penitence, the aid to penitential devotion, and the means of subduing the flesh to the spirit, became the maceration of the body meritorious in and for itself. Ingenious self-torture frequently took the place of a healthy asceticism: and the principle which brought about these changes was that which influenced the heretics, whose command, "Touch not, taste not, handle not," was denounced by St. Paul. The ordinances were no longer founded on the will of God and on conscience, but were after the doctrines and commandments of men. That the veneration of martyrs was become excessive in the fourth century is allowed on all hands. It does not appear, however, that there was any new and erroneous principle introduced as in the former cases. The abuses were of degree only.

It was about three years after the appearance of Siricius' decretal, which peremptorily forbade the marriage of the clergy and implied the ascendancy of monastic opinions, that Jovinian, with Helvidius and Vigilantius, attempted in vain to stem the mingling tide of authority and popular sentiment.

¹ These words must be held to rule the whole chapter, otherwise we should be putting into St. Paul's mouth the intolerable assertion that God's purpose, who gave woman to be a helpmeet for man, was defeated by Christianity [ver. 32-34]. In the present Vulgate the words are "Propter instantem necessitatem," with which compare Augustine's words which follow in the text.

Jovinian taught,² first, that virgins, widows and married women, being baptized, and not differing in other works, have the same degree of merit. Secondly, that between fasting and eating with thanksgiving there is no difference of merit. It is clear that this denial of merit is made regarding celibacy and fasting when they are considered in and for themselves: that no assertion is made regarding the one when adopted for the sake of God's service, or regarding the other when practised with reference to the penitence and devotion which it accompanies and assists. Augustine's words before quoted are a proof of this. Thus far Jovinian taught the truth, and a truth most wanted in those times. In making his protest against growing error, he fell certainly into other errors, but probably by no means to the extent represented by some historians.³ For, looking to Jerome's statement as quoted below, it is at once seen that the terms of the first tenet are inconsistent with that wide interpretation of the fourth tenet, which considers it to be a denial of different degrees of bliss in heaven. The words "si non discrepent cæteris operibus" expressly require an equality of works in order to an equality of merit; and surely Jovinian would have allowed that the reward will be in proportion to the merit. So far it appears therefore that the fourth tenet only denies a distinctly separate and higher state in the Kingdom of Heaven to be assigned to virgins. It was thought that there are two states, each allowing different degrees; the existence of the supposed higher state is denied, not the different degrees of the one state. Nor is there anything inconsistent with this explanation in the words, apparently Jovinian's, in which future punishment is referred to.⁴ All evil-doers are alike said to be doomed to one state, the state of Gehenna; but there is nothing that denies a difference in that one state of degrees of punishment. In like manner all who endure to the end in persecution wear the victor's crown, but one victor's crown may be brighter than another. The two parables which are then quoted (the parables of the two sons and of the labourers hired at different hours) undoubtedly refer to the different dispensations of revelation. An argument regarding the merits of celibacy and marriage founded upon these parables must have been, that as the Gentiles called at the eleventh hour were admitted to equal privileges with those called earlier, so neither of the two competing states conferred a distinctive privilege. With the validity of the argument we are not concerned.

Further, Jovinian is said to have taught that they who have been once truly born again in baptism cannot be subverted by Satan. There does not appear to be in this particular, as there was in the last particular, any inconsistency leading us to doubt the accuracy of the statement. The evidence goes to shew that Jovinian held the error of indefectible grace. Lastly, there is no doubt that he denied the perpetual virginity of the Mother of our Lord. This he did probably through the mistake of treating the case of her who was the instrument of the Incarnation as if it were an ordinary case of the comparative merits of the two states.

Jovinian made many converts at Rome, chiefly among the laity. Being condemned and excommunicated by a synod at Rome under Siricius [A.D. 390] he returned to Milan. Siricius warned Ambrose against him, and he was again condemned in the same year by a Milanese synod [Letters of Siricius and Ambrose. Harduin, Concil. i. 852-853]. Jerome speaks of him as dead in the year 404. It is much more probable that the edict of Honorius [A.D. 412], ordering one Jovian or Jovinian to be severely scourged and then banished, for holding conventicles in the neighbourhood of Rome, refers to him [Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. v. legg. liii.]; in the old editions "Jovian" stands in the text of this constitution, but Haenel [ed. 1839], upon manuscript authority, admits "Jovinian" into the text. Augustine states that the Jovinianist heresy was quickly extinguished.

JUDAISTÆ. [ISCARIOTÆ.]

JUDAIZERS. The term Judaizers, which in a Christian mouth cannot but be a term of disparagement, is used of those who refused to join in the several steps by which Catholic Christianity was evolved out of Mosaism through the intermediate stage of Jewish Christianity. It is used also in a less definite sense of those who, being members of the Catholic Church, seek to reintroduce some of the thoughts, feelings, and observances of the earlier dispensation.

The classes of men to be united into a Catholic church were Jews who believed, Gentiles who joined Judaic churches, and Gentiles neither of the churches nor under the Apostles of the Circumcision. The work to be done was to bring all alike into the freedom of the Gospel, that is, to free the first and second classes from the bondage of the Mosaic law, to prevent the imposition of that law on the third class, to raise the Gentile churches to an equality with the Church of Jerusalem, and to stop the supremacy which Jerusalem held over Judaic churches from extending itself into a supremacy over the Church Catholic.

In considering the steps by which this work was accomplished, it is to be remembered that Mosaism was not only a dispensation of revealed religion, but also an established national religion. Such of its ordinances as were compatible with a belief in Christ had the claim of national law on the obedience of the people; and the providence of God permitted a certain time in which there was rightfully a blending of Mosaism and Christianity. It may be conceded also, that even after this time was really come to an end, so that it could no longer be required of any "to walk orderly and keep the law," it was still open to the Church of Jerusalem to retain those ordinances a while, in the hope, excusable at least though groundless, that the Jews might yet regain their place as one of the nations of the world; provided always that there was no attempt to impose this burden on others, or to represent the bearing it as necessary to salvation.

The main steps in this work, the turning-points in its history, are manifestly the determination of the conditions on which Gentiles should be received into Judaic churches, the recognition of St. Paul's mission to the Gentiles, involving the recognition of the entire freedom of the Gentile churches, the renunciation of Judaism by the Apostles of the Circumcision, the renunciation of Judaism by the Church of Jerusalem.

It will be the object of this article to trace the action of the Judaizers in the several periods defined by these steps.

On St. Peter's return from Cæsarea to Jerusalem after the conversion of Cornelius, the believing Jews contended with him for eating with Gentiles. Hearing his statement, they submitted: but some (perhaps not a few) were only silenced for a time, and soon renewed their opposition; not, however, so far as we know, against St. Peter personally, but by interfering in the churches which in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia were receiving the Gentiles into communion, and that (in Antioch at least) upon terms of freedom. Converted Pharisees from Judæa preached at Antioch the necessity of circumcision. Appeal was made upon this to the Apostles at Jerusalem. The Apostles were still Apostles of the Circumcision, having their headquarters at Jerusalem, and (as it seems) leaving the city only upon occasional missions. The Church at Antioch was in its foundation a Judaic church; so that it appealed, as a daughter church, to the mother church. St. Paul and St. Barnabas appeared in the synod at Jerusalem, not as assessors with the Apostles, but as counsel for the appellants. The decree which issued asserted the principle contended for; but abstinence from things strangled, from blood, and from fornication, was enjoined as necessary for Gentile not less than for Jewish Christians. Being thus defeated in the Judaic churches, the Judaizers turned to the Gentile churches, and so soon as these were in process of formation endeavoured to pervert them.

The Apostles at Jerusalem fully recognised St. Paul's mission; they did not impose any terms of communion on his converts; they requested only that as Jerusalem had ministered to the Gentiles in spiritual things, the Gentiles would minister to the poor saints of Jerusalem in temporal things [Gal. ii. 10; Rom. xv. 27]. Their influence however, which was sufficient to give peace to their own churches, was not able to establish St. Paul's authority in the estimation of the discontented Pharisees. The Judaizers felt also, not only that St. Paul was the leader in the cause of liberty whose course they ought to hinder, but also that they had some plausible arguments to produce against him. He had not followed Christ upon earth, therefore he was no true Apostle. He flinched from claiming the rights of an Apostle [1 Cor. ix. 1-6. Conybeare and Howson, ch. xiii.]. Nor were ungenerous representations wanting [2 Cor. x. 10]. With such arguments, and in such spirit, was the Apostle of the Gentiles constantly followed. "His career was one life-long conflict with Judaizing antagonists. Setting aside the Epistles to the Thessalonians, which were written too early to be affected by this struggle, all his letters addressed to churches, with but one exception, refer more or less directly to such opposition. It assumed different forms in different places: in Galatia it was purely Pharisaic; in Phrygia and Asia it was strongly tinged with speculative mysticism; but everywhere, and under all circumstances, zeal for the law was its ruling passion" [Prof. Lightfoot, Comment. on Gal., St. Paul and the Three, p. 292]. These attacks on the Apostle did not cease at his death. In the Clementine Homilies and Recognitions they are carried on with increased virulence [Recognitions. Dict. of THEOL.]. Such was the second stage of Judaizing efforts, the efforts of parties within the Judaic churches, who falsely alleged the authority of the Apostles of the Circumcision to impose on the Gentiles the yoke of the law [comp. Gal. ii. 12; 2 Cor. iii. 1].

The next turning-point in the history of the Judaizers was said to be the renunciation of Judaism by the Apostles. It cannot be thought that when the Apostles left Jerusalem to preach the Gospel to the whole world they carried with them the restrictions to which they had submitted as Apostles of the Circumcision. Their withdrawal from Jerusalem must have tended in no small degree to reduce the supremacy of the Church of Jerusalem and to raise the Gentile churches to their proper level: at the same time it must have given freer scope to the Judaizing faction by removing the immediate check of apostolic authority. But of the time when this change took place, and of the results which we naturally attribute to it, we have no information, except in the case of St. John. It appears to be most probable that the time was when Cestius [A.D. 66] retired from before Jerusalem, and gave the Christian Church the opportunity of retreating to Pella. St. John retired to Ephesus, and entered upon the last stage of his long career, no longer an Apostle of the Circumcision, but an apostle and bishop of the Church Catholic. To this time the Apocalypse may be referred. [NICOLAITANES.]

The Judaism of the Jerusalem Church was not destroyed even by the destruction of the city. The main body which returned from Pella retained such forms of the law as the circumstances of a desolated city and destroyed temple permitted. Until the rebuilding of the city as Ælia Capitolina their bishops were all of the Circumcision. Nor was there in this course anything to hinder communion with Catholic churches, provided there was no attempt to rule the consciences of others. In the insurrection of the Jews under Barcocheba, Jerusalem was for a time in the possession of the insurgents, and an attempt was made to rebuild the temple. The Christians, persecuted by Barcocheba, were regarded favourably by Hadrian, and were allowed to settle in Ælia Capitolina. The Church of Jerusalem was then collected as a Catholic Church, Marcus being the first bishop of the uncircumcision. Sulpitius Severus [Chron. ii. 31] remarks concerning the forbidding the Jews to approach Jerusalem, "Quod quidem Christianæ fidei proficiebat, quia tum pæne omnes Christum Deum sub legis observatione credebant: nimirum id Domino ordinante dispositum, ut legis servitus a libertate fidei atque ecclesiæ tolleretur."

A part of the Jerusalem Church remained in Pella. These persisted in retaining Judaism even after the election of Marcus at Jerusalem; and formed the sect of the NAZARENES. But the activity of the Judaizing faction is now to be looked for outside the Church. From the large party which so perseveringly opposed St. Paul, with the addition of members of the sect of the ESEENES, and a modification of their doctrine, sprang the EBIONITES. From these elements, again, but with a doctrine opposed to the Gnosticism which was developing among the Ebionites, sprang the ELCHASAITES.

The catholicity of the Church was thus formally established, but for a considerable time there were remains of Judaic practices; and the spirit of Judaism, as a natural impulse of man's heart, is ever working. Such Judaic practices may be in themselves perfectly innocent, and may call for the interference of the Church only when they are likely to breed contention, or when they are made to rest upon unsound doctrine. Thus the custom in the Asiatic churches of celebrating Easter according to the Jewish calculation, on account of the uncharitable feelings which it called forth, required the authoritative settlement of the question, which it received at Nicæa and Antioch. [QUARTODECIMANS.] The apostolic decree of Jerusalem was observed for some centuries in many parts of the Church. We have proof of this, not only in history (as e.g. in the martyr's answer to the charge of eating human flesh, "How could such as these devour children, who consider it unlawful even to taste the blood of irrational animals?") but also in canons which recognise the observance [Apost. lxiii.; Conc.

Gangren. ii. ; Conc. Aurel. ii. 20 ; Conc. Trull. lxviii.]. Beveridge, upon the Apostolic Canons, writes that the primitive Church, both Eastern and Western, for a long time kept this decree. The observance proceeded from reverence to an apostolic decree, the temporary character of which was not clearly perceived. Some modern divines of great name, as Grotius, have held its perpetual obligation, and to this day it is thought by the Greek and Æthiopic Churches to be a portion of Christian law. Again, in some churches, the Sabbath has been observed as a fast, in some as a festival ; the difference arising from opposition to heresies which connected themselves with one or the other side of the question. [SABBATARIANS.]

JULIANISTS. A name given to the APH-THARTODOCETÆ, from their leader, Julian, Bishop of Halicarnassus in Caria [A.D. 510], who fled to Alexandria on the accession of the Emperor Justin [A.D. 518], and there originated the opinion that the body of our Lord was always incapable of corruption, in opposition to the Monophysites, Severus of Antioch, and Damianus of Alexandria, who maintained that until His Resurrection it was liable to the ordinary changes of human bodies, and therefore was corruptible. The dogma of the sect is extinct, says Neale, except so far as its general type is preserved among the Armenians [Neale's Patriarchate of Alexandria, ii. 9]. They seem to have disappeared from Syria in the eighth or ninth century, and also from Egypt ; but a portion of them penetrated into Ethiopia and Nubia, where they had a patriarch as late as A.D. 798. Julian wrote a commentary on Job, which is sometimes quoted by more recent writers as a not unorthodox work.

JULIUS CASSIANUS. [DOCETÆ.]

JUMPERS. This name was originally given to the Welsh Methodists on account of a peculiar frenzy which arose among them soon after the introduction of Methodism into Wales. The excited ravings of their preachers produced a sympathetic excitement among some of their hearers which led them to supplement the ordinary Methodist "Amen," "Glory," and other expressions of feeling, with shouts of joy and marvellous efforts of jumping ; those so excited leaping about with cries of "Gogoniant, Gogoniant !" until they fell down exhausted. The practice was grounded on the authority of such texts of Holy Scripture as "The King of Israel danced and leaped before the Lord" [2 Sam. vi. 16], and a perverted literal interpretation of our Lord's words to His disciples, "Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy" [Luke vi. 23]. The original Methodist body discouraged from the first the revival meetings from which these hysterical phenomena developed, and the less educated Welsh Methodists have always been ashamed of them ; but the strange custom has not altogether vanished.

From Wales the custom of jumping devotion spread to America, where all religious oddities find a ready soil for germination, and where the Shakers had already established a somewhat similar practice. It is thus described by an eye witness : "Being told of this practice, I attended one of their meetings in New York in 1850. During the sermon much excitement prevailed, and loud shouts arose at intervals from all parts of the building. The sermon ended, one of the usual tunes was sung, accompanied, almost universally, with stamping of the feet, keeping tolerably good time with the measure of the strain. After a prayer, which could hardly be heard amid the surrounding confusion, a short interval of silence followed. Then I was somewhat startled by seeing a venerable "coloured sister" in one of the front pews jumping up and down with great rapidity for some minutes. Shortly after, amid loud stamping of the feet, I distinctly saw her jump over the front of the pew ; and, commencing from the pew she had left, she made a series of tremendous jumps up and down the aisle, shouting the whole time with a loud voice, and presenting a spectacle which I shall not easily forget. She was soon joined by others, and not knowing what might be the next part of the programme, I made a rapid exit ; feeling, when fairly outside, not a little thankful to have effected my escape. I may add that it is a well known fact that at the chapel I refer to, during their revival meetings, these zealous worshippers often protract their services from eight p.m. to seven or eight o'clock next morning, singing, shouting, praying, jumping, &c., the whole time" [Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. ii. 512].

There is an annual festival at Echternach, in Luxembourg, about twenty miles from Trèves, which takes place on Whitsun-Tuesday, and is called "The Jumping Dance of Echternach." It seems to be a relic of the fanaticism of the "Dancers" of the fourteenth century, and is thus described : "The procession starts from the bridge, accompanied by several bands of music ; the pilgrims of both sexes form in rows, and spring first four steps forward and three back, then eight steps forward and three back, and so on, continually increasing the steps forward, but making no change in those backward, until they reach the church, when they fall on their faces and begin to pray," high mass being immediately celebrated. [Ibid. 188]. This jumping dance has been several times suppressed, but is always revived again, and it is attended by an average of 8,000 persons.

This singular mania is heard of in much earlier times than those of the mediæval Dancers, in the case of the monks and nuns who are called "Echetæ" by Nicetas Choniates. It is also found in Russia, where the Khlisti mix up the practice of jumping with their horrible rites. [ECHETÆ. DANCERS. KHLISTI. SHAKERS.]

JUST-FAST-MEN. This name is spoken of by Foxe in connection with that of KNOWN-MEN. It appears to be a later form of "æw-fæst-men," which signified "men bound by the law ;" and is similar to "sooth-fæst" men, which would mean "just men" or "men fast in truth." It was probably one of the many names by which the Lollards were known among themselves and their opponents.

JUSTINUS. Nothing whatever is known of this heretic except from the pages of Hippolytus. He appears to have been a leader of the OPHITES, and perhaps contemporary with the Apostles. Hippolytus speaks of his heresy as an attempted amalgamation of Greek mythology with Scriptural history, and gives as an illustration a very curious account of the way in which the legend of Hercules was associated with the Scripture story from the Garden of Eden to the Incarnation of our Lord. This curious anticipation of eclecticism is said by Hippolytus to be contained in an apocryphal "Book of Baruch," which was in high repute with the followers of Justinus. Nothing is now known of such a book [Hippol. Refut. Hær. v. 18-23; x. 11].

K

KANT, EMMANUEL [A.D. 1724-1804], was born at Königsberg in Prussia; his father being a saddler, of a Scotch family named Cant. He was provided with a good education from his early boyhood, and acquired a knowledge, not only of Latin and Greek, but also of French and English. After many years spent as tutor in private families, and in his native university, he became Professor of Metaphysics in the latter in the year 1770, and held that office until his death, never quitting his native place.

The great work by which Kant became known was his Critic of Pure Reason [Kritik der reinen Vernunft], which first appeared in 1781. It attracted no notice at first beyond the university in which its author lectured: but in 1784, Schulze, one of his disciples, printed an Elucidation of it, which immediately drew the eyes of philosophers to the original work. In 1786 Reinhold began to use it as the text-book of his lectures in the University of Jena; and before long it became known through the length and breadth of Germany, not only among philosophers, but as one of the fashionable books of the day, which people must talk about even though they do not understand it.

The Critic of Pure Reason is a critical analysis of the intellectual faculty in its purity, that is, as a faculty uninfluenced by experience. The philosophical speculations of German thinkers had been recently much influenced by Locke's work On the Human Understanding, which had been made known at the court of Frederick the Great through the French literati by whom he was surrounded. This had come into conflict with the philosophy of Wolf, and the struggles of the two systems had made way for a scepticism which was throwing contempt on the study of mental science. This was the opportunity which brought Kant forward as the founder of a critical school of philosophers in which loose methods of thought were to be put aside, and a scientific inquiry made into the extent and limits of human reason, that should not be prejudiced, as that of Locke had been, by the a priori distrust of reason itself, which had been bred by the sceptical limitation of all knowledge by experience. It may be stated shortly that the result was a compromise between the idealist school of Descartes, which would accept only demonstration by intellectual ideas, and the sensationalism afterwards specially connected with the name of Hume, which would accept only that which flows from experience.

The effect of Kant's philosophy upon religion was to revive the power of natural religion, which had been undermined by the materialism of the French illuminati; but it did not go beyond. He looked down loftily upon Christianity as a not altogether valueless corroboration of the law of moral duty which is written in the natural conscience, and upon revelation in general as an image of that law. He held that it was impossible for either sense or reason to demonstrate the existence of God or of the immortality of the soul, but that an intuition of their existence forms part of our moral consciousness, and that thus they are to be accepted as morally certain. [SCOPTICS.]

KARABLIK. [SKOPTZI.]

KARAITES. The "Karaim" or "Scripturists"¹ are a Jewish sect which adheres to the text and letter of Scripture, rejecting alike the mystical theosophy of the Cabbala and the interpretations and additions of the Talmuds.

If we compare the Karaites with the old Jewish sects, it may be said that with the Pharisees they reject the Pantheism of the Cabbala, and hold against the Sadducees the doctrines of the resurrection, angels and spirits: that with the Sadducees they reject the system of tradition upheld by the Pharisees, and that with the Essenes they insist on the knowledge of the divine law and on a closer observance of its moral precepts. The characteristic of the sect is opposition to rabbinical traditions, and the Karaites affirm that they can shew an uninterrupted catena of teachers of their principles from the time of Ezra. This is probably an exaggeration, not an entire misstatement.² In our Lord's time the traditions of the elders had reached the point of making the Word of God of none effect [Matt. xv. 1-9; Mark vii. 1-13]. Josephus tells that Jonathan, a Sadducee, persuaded Hyrcanus to leave the party of the Pharisees, who held by tradition many things not delivered in the law of Moses [Antiq. xiii. 10, 6]. It can hardly be that there were not those who opposed these innovations without falling into the scepticism of the Sadducees regarding the Resurrection; and such Sadducees denying a Mosaic oral law, but not denying the Resurrection, might well be claimed by the Karaites as of their sect. The Pharisaic traditions were collected in the Mishna at the end of the first century. The Gemarists, or commentators on the Mishna, made up the Talmud of Babylon at the beginning of the sixth century. As the Sadducees declined [SADDUCEES] the remaining opposition to the Pharisaic system of tradition appears to have formed itself into the sect of Scripturists. Anan, a Babylonish Jew of the race of David, and his son Saul, about the year 750 declared openly for the written Word of God alone, exclusive of tradition. These are specially singled out by the Rabbinites as the leaders of their opponents, and it appears reasonable, in the absence of exact information, to date from them the formation of the sect of Karaites, allowing that a party, not forming a schism, had long before held their principles. At no time has the number of Karaites been large. Prideaux states, from Hottinger's Thesaurus, that in the middle of the seventeenth century there were of them in Poland 2,000, at Caffa in Tartaria Crimæa 1200, at Cairo 300, at Damascus 200, at Jerusalem 30, in Babylonia 100, in Persia 600 [Connection, iii. 478]. Dr. Clark found a colony of them in the Crimea, in the full enjoyment and exercise of their ancient customs and peculiarities [Travels, part i. vol. ii. ch. 4]. Pierotti, in 1861, stated the number of Karaite Jews in Jerusalem to be only 38. He added that they were superior to all the rest in intelligence, education, cleanliness, and probity [Jerus. Explored, i. 11]. This character is generally given to the sect. Scaliger says that they are reckoned men of the best learning and the best probity of all the Jewish nation [Trigland, Syntag. i. p. 176]. Clarke found them to have in the Crimea the same good name. They read the Scriptures and their liturgies everywhere, both publicly and privately, in the language of the country in which they dwell, and hold it an act of piety to copy out the Scriptures once in their lives. They are rigid in their fasts, strict observers of the Sabbath, and very careful in the education of their children, who are instructed publicly in the synagogues.

Trigland gives from Karaite writings the ten articles of the Karaite Creed: [I.] All things were created [II.] by an Uncreated Being, [III.] Who is without form, and is in every respect One alone; [IV.] Who sent Moses, [V.] and by Moses His perfect law, [VI.] which with its exposition, that is the Scripture and its interpretation, the faithful are bound to know, [VII.] Who guided the other prophets by His Spirit, [VIII.] Who will raise the dead, [IX.] and judge them according to their works, [X.] Who "has not rejected His people in captivity even while under His chastisements; but it is proper that even every day they should receive their salvation by Messiah the son of David" [Syntag. ii. cap. 10]. The latter part of this article is paraphrased by Milman, "that they must daily strive to render themselves worthy of redemption through the Messiah" [Hist. of Jews, iii. 273]. In articles IV. V. VI. are included the points of difference between the Karaites and other Jews, the causes, in short, of the schism. They assert the perfection of the written law of Moses, in opposition to the alleged authority of the oral law with its additions and alterations of the Mosaic law; and they assert the necessity of the pure interpretation of the written law, in opposition to the expositions of the Cabbala.

Between the adherents to the text of Scripture and the advocates of tradition arose a number of questions, ritual, ceremonial, and moral, regarding the celebration of the feasts, the laws of the Sabbath, and the laws of marriage. It would be useless to detail these. In general, the Sabbath was more rigidly observed by the Karaites, the laws of marriage were more strict, the table of prohibited degrees was larger [Trigland's Diatribæ, cap. ix.]. In one insignificant particular the two parties appear to have changed sides, the Textualists insisting on a figurative interpretation of the commands to wear phylacteries and use door-labels [Deut. vi. 8, 9], the rabbis interpreting them literally.

As regards the Karaites of modern times, the most interesting fact is their desire to exculpate themselves from the national sin of the death of Christ. During the reign of the Empress Catharine a communication was made to the Russian government in which the Karaites declared that their ancestors had taken no part in the crucifixion of our Lord. Dr. Wolff reports that he found in the neighbourhood of Babylon the original stock of the Karaites, who asserted that they had remained ever since the Captivity on the spot where he found them. The agreement of these two testimonies is remarkable. [See Colonial Church Chronicle, Febr. 1871, p. 56, where is also a Karaite hymn now used in Jerusalem.]

KEITHIANS. An offshoot of the American Quakers, who formed a temporary secession from that sect under the leadership of a Scotchman named George Keith, at the end of the seventeenth century. In the year 1700 Keith was ordained as a missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, but returning to England some years afterwards became rector of Edburton in Sussex, where he died in 1714. On losing their leader the sect of the Keithians became almost entirely dissolved, some of its members joining the Church, Keith baptizing 200 with his own hands, others becoming Baptists, and some returning to the Quakers.

KERJAKIS or KORSAKEN. A name employed in many parts of Russia to denote the Raskolnicks, or dissenters from the Established Church.

KETZER. This name seems to have been applied in the middle of the twelfth century in a special way to the Gazzari, some of whom came to Germany at that time from Italy [Gretser in Bibl. Max. Lugd. xxv. 253, B].

KILHAMITES. [NEW CONNEXION METHODISTS.]

KIRK OF SCOTLAND. [SCOTTISH KIRK.]

KHLESTOVSHIKI. [KHLISTI.]

KHLISTI. A name signifying "Flagellants" given to a Russian sect, usually considered as an offshoot of the Skoptzi, and formed about 1645 by a deserter from the army named Daniel Philipitch. This man went about declaring himself to be Divine, and his followers accordingly called themselves "God's people." Philipitch imposed ascetic practices upon his followers, and among others that of self-flagellation, which was inflicted with extreme rigour. Far more reprehensible extravagances have also been attributed to them akin to those of the Adamites. The police are recorded to have visited one of their meeting-houses in Moscow [A.D. 1840], and to have discovered that their religious exercises resembled those of the American Shakers, and that they had a community of women, although in order to conceal the fact they lived in couples, and even went through the form of marriage at the hands of the clergy of the Established Church. The following almost incredible account is given by a traveller of their ceremonies on Easter night, when they hold a festival service in honour of the Blessed Virgin: "On this night the Khlisti all assemble for a great solemnity, the worship of the Mother of God. A virgin fifteen years of age, whom they have induced to act the part by tempting promises, is bound and placed in a tub of warm water; some old women come, and first make a large incision in the left breast, then cut it off, and stanch the blood in a wonderfully short time. During the operation a mystical picture of the Holy Spirit is put into the victim's hand, in order that she may be absorbed in regarding it. The breast which has been removed is laid upon a plate and cut into small pieces, which are eaten by all the members of the sect present; the girl in the tub is then raised upon an altar which stands near, and the whole congregation dance wildly round it, singing at the same time. The jumping then grows madder and wilder, till the lights are suddenly extinguished and horrible orgies commence. My secretary has become acquainted with several of these girls, who were always afterwards regarded as sacred, and said that at the age of nineteen or twenty they looked quite like women of fifty or sixty. They die generally before their thirtieth year; one of them however had married and had two children" [Baron von Haxthausen's Visit to the Russian Empire, i. 254, Lond. 1856]. Such an apparently authentic narrative should be remembered in association with Hepworth Dixon's favourable statements respecting these and all other Russian Dissenters. [Dixon's Free Russia, i. 259, 3rd ed.]

KNIPPERDOLLINGS. A section of the Munster Anabaptists, so called after their leader Bertrand Knipperdolling, a confederate of Munzer. [ANABAPTISTS.]

KNOWN-MEN. Foxe says of the Puritans of Henry VIII.'s days, that "after the great abjuration aforesaid, which was under William Smith, Bishop of Lincoln, they were noted and known among themselves by the name of 'known men' or 'just-fast' men, as now they are called by the name of 'Protestants'" [Foxe's Acts and Mon. p. 820, ed. 1583].

The former designation had, however, been much longer in use, having been appropriated by the Lollards, and being thus explained by Pecock, Bishop of Chichester, in the middle of the fifteenth century. "The first of those texts is written 1 Cor. xiv. in the end thus: 'Sotheli if any man unknowith, he schal be unknowun.' By this text they take that if any man knoweth not or put not, in what he may, his business for to learn the writing of the Bible as it lieth in the text, namely, the writing of the New Testament, he shall be unknown of God for to be any of His. And for this, that they busy themselves for to learn and know the Bible, namely the New Testament, in the form as it is written word by word in the Bible, they give a name proper to themselves and call themselves 'knowun men' as though all other than them be unknown; and when one of them talketh with another of them of some other third man the hearer will ask thus: 'Is he a knowen man?' and if it [be] answered to him thus: 'Yea, he is a knowen man,' all is safe, peril is not for to deal with him: and if it be answered to him thus: 'He is no knowen man,' then peril is casted for to much homely deal with him" [Pecock's Repressor, p. 53, Record Off. ed.] Some readers will remember when the question, "Is he a converted character?" used to be asked in a precisely similar manner four centuries later.

KNOX, JOHN. [SCOTTISH KIRK.]

KORNTHALITES or KORNTHÄLER. A Pietistic community of Lutherans founded near Stuttgart in Kornthal, Württemberg, about the year 1819, by G. W. Hoffmann, with the view of eventually emigrating to the Holy Land, and there establishing a fresh, inrenewed purity, the kingdom of Christ. This idea was revived by Hoffmann the younger in 1854 [JERUSALEM FRIENDS], but the original body has subsided into a separate community of Evangelical Lutherans, forming a kind of Moravian settlement in their native valley.

LABADISTS. A Quietist sect of Dutch Protestants which took its name from John Labadie, a French Jesuit priest. Labadie quitted the Jesuit College at Bordeaux in the year 1639, being then about thirty years of age, and became canon of Amiens. Here he became a favourite confessor and director among women of the upper classes, but was obliged to leave the city on account of scandals. These charges of intrigues hung about him at Toulouse also, and he finally lost credit altogether in the Church. In the year 1650 he seceded to the Calvinists, and was pastor at Montauban until 1660, when he was banished thence for exciting sedition, and once more endeavoured to settle at Geneva. But his presence seems to have caused disturbance wherever he went, and on a similar charge of sedition being there also made against him, he removed in 1666 to Middleburg in Zealand, accompanied by a band of followers. On his way through Utrecht he won over the learned lady Anna Maria Schurmann; and, through her zealous support, the Princess Palatine Elizabeth, who gave a refuge to many of his followers at Erfurt, of which place she was titular abbess. When shut out from the church by the Lutherans of Middleburg Labadie and his followers broke open its doors, and this violence again led to their expulsion by the magistrates of the city. Driven from Zealand, notwithstanding the support which their leader received, the Labadist fanatics formed a small settlement near Amsterdam, but were obliged to move thence first to Erfurt and thence to Altona, where Labadie died on February 16th, 1674. After his death his followers held together for a few years at Wiewart in North Holland, but the sect died out with the death of Labadie's original adherents. They were in many respects similar in character to the early Quakers, attaching much importance to "inward light," and professing great austerity of manners. [Moller's Cimbria Litterata. Weismann's Hist. Eccl. sæcul. xvii.]

LAMPETIANS. A sect probably of the fourth or fifth century, and said to be so called from a leader named Lampetius, of whom, however, nothing is known. St. John Damascene describes them as repudiating all vows, on the ground that no Christian ought to do anything unwillingly or by constraint; and as hence being led to a freedom of life which became licentious [Damascen. de Hær. p. 359, ed. 1548]; and a similar notice of them occurs in the Scholia of St. Maximus on the Ecclesiastical Hierarchies of Dionysius [Dionys. de Eccl. Hier. in Bibl. Max. Lugd. i. 228, d.]. The latter also identifies them with the Massalians, Adelphians, and Marcianists; from which it would seem that they were a local variety of the Euchites.

LATITUDINARIANS. [LOW CHURCHMEN.]

LATTER-DAY SAINTS. [MORMONS.]

LEIBNITZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM, [A.D. 1646-1716] was the son of a Leipsic professor, and was brought up to the profession of the law. He rose to very high position as a diplomatist, became an intimate of Sophia Charlotte, Queen of Prussia, and was made a baron in 1711 by the Emperor Charles VI. He occupied a very high position in almost every branch of learning, and from him all the subsequent speculations of German philosophy may be said to have flowed. "The mind of Leibnitz was cast in a gigantic mould, and made by nature to tower above the rest of the world around him. By virtue of this it was that, like all great minds, he cast his shadow before him, and gave more pregnant suggestions in some of his cursory writings than most other men could do in the combined and systematic labour of their whole life" [Morell's Hist. of Phil. i. 186].

When Leibnitz came upon the field of philosophical speculation the theological results of the Cartesian system had made themselves evident in the writings of Malebranche and Spinoza. The influence of the former had led to the denial of all secondary causes by making all force the activity of the Supreme Being. Spinoza took every existing thing to be a part of the Universal Substance. The tendency of both lines of philosophy had been to destroy the idea of Causation, as coming from without the sphere of individual being, and to make all existing things simply modes of the one infinite existence. Leibnitz strove to recover the idea of external causation by his system of "Monadology," in which he considered Force as a quality imposed upon Substance in its original creation and then left to work out an inevitable destiny. This original combination of Force and Substance he supposes to have been made in an infinite number of distinct and dissimilar "monads"—having something of the character of atoms—which upon their creation became self-subsistent and indestructible, each monad being a living and germinal microcosm with a fixed capacity of developing itself spontaneously.

In applying this theory to the natural world Leibnitz classified his monads in such a manner as to exhibit them in a developing sequence; the monad of inorganic life possessing all the qualities of other monads, but all except one, that of motion (as in crystallization), remaining dormant. The monad of the vegetable creation develops formative vitality, leaving consciousness still dormant. To this succeeds the development of sensation and memory as in animals. Then follows the monad in which reason and reflection are aroused from their dormant condition and added to all preceding qualities. Each of these stages of development represents the unveiling of an infinite quality of Deity, and the primary Monad is Deity itself, the fountain from which all others have derived their origin.

The theology of monadology is necessarily Deism. When once the monads have been brought into existence they become self-existent and self-developing, no external power being able to change their nature, to alter their course of development, or to destroy them. They are indestructible machines, having an irresistible power of perpetual motion in a given direction. Its morality was also of necessity Fatalism. For according as the self-contained force of the monad was originally destined to exert itself, so must it exert itself, whether in the fully developed form of a conscious soul or in the half-developed form of unconscious matter. Although, therefore, there was something more of free-will in the system of Leibnitz than in that of Spinoza, from the introduction of the element of self-development in the monad, yet it was still not such a free-will as extends to moral action, for the law of development was already laid down in the law of existence.

The system of Leibnitz was embodied by him in his Théodicée and his Monadologie, the latter work being published only a short time before his death. It failed to produce so much effect as might have been expected from its author's great living influence upon the mind of Europe. This arose from the want of a clear, logical, and systematic way of stating it. But shortly after the death of Leibnitz his disciple WOLF placed it before the world in such a manner as to win it a foremost place in the ranks of philosophical speculations. [Tennemann's Manual. Ritter's Geschichte der Christlichen Philosophie. Morell's History of Philosophy. Edinb. Rev. July 1846.]

LEONISTS. A name given to the Waldenses from Leon, the German name of the city of Lyons, where they originated, and from which they called themselves the "Poor of Lyons." Some Calvinist writers are said by Gretser to have derived the name from Leo IV., son of Constantine Copronymus! [Bibl. Max. xxv. 253, B]

LESSING. [RATIONALISTS.]

LEYDEN, JOHN OF. [ANABAPTISTS.]

LIBERATOIRES. [ADECDITÆ.]

LIBERTINES. A Flemish sect of Antino-mians, who also called themselves "Spirituals." They originated with Anthony Poekes, Gerhard Ruff, Quintin, and others in Flanders, and thence passed into France, where they were patronized by Margaret, Queen of Navarre and sister of Francis I. Their principles were, that God being the Author of all human actions no human action could be evil; that religion consists in union with God by contemplation, and that any one who had attained to this was free to act according to their pleasure. These were the principles of the BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT, from whom the Libertines were doubtless descended. Calvin wrote against them, Instructio adversus fanaticam et furiosam sectam Libertinorum, quise Spirituales vocant.

The name was also given to the RANTERS and FAMILISTS by many English writers of the seventeenth century, from their Antinomian claims of immoral liberty.

LOLLARDS. The followers of Wickliffe in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The name seems to be identical with that of the German LULLARDS; but it was used in England simply in the sense of heretics, and thus had a clever turn given to it as if it had been derived from "lolium," and signified tares among the wheat. The name is found in a bull of Gregory XI. [A.D. 1377], in a constitution of Archbishop Arundel [A.D. 1408], and in Netter of Walden's Fasciculus Zizaniorum, which was written early in the fifteenth century.

The Lollards were partly a political party of socialists, and partly a school of anti-sacerdotalists, and represent in England that wave of disloyalty to Church and State which was sweeping over every continental country in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. But it is also evident that they were associated by contemporaries with the influence and particular teaching of Wickliffe, and that they themselves claimed to be his disciples. The truth seems to be that a party answering to the Lollards had arisen in England in the first half of the fourteenth century in the same subtle way in which a similar social and religious epidemic had broken out in Italy, Germany and France; and that circumstances which cannot now be clearly traced had given the intellectual leadership of that party into the hands of Wickliffe.

This remarkable man, John de Wickliffe [A.D. 1324-84], was a Yorkshireman, born at Wickliffe on the Tees. At the age of sixteen he was sent to Oxford, where he was entered as a commoner of Queen's College, then a recent foundation. He was removed to Merton, the college of Ockham and Roger Bacon, the influence of whose example perhaps excited Wickliffe to strike out a bold line for himself. He became successively probationer and fellow of Merton, where he soon distinguished himself by his skill in logic, his knowledge of the scholastic philosophy, his acquaintance with the four great Latin Fathers (he seems never to have acquired Greek), and his fierce unsparing hostility to everything that he deemed evil. It is uncertain against what abuse his first efforts were directed. A tract is extant of the date of A.D. 1356, entitled the Last Ages of the Church, but its genuineness is not admitted. The only evidence of his authorship is, that it has been found in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, bound up in a volume with works that are his [Milman, Lat. Chris. xiii. 6; Shirley's Catalogue of Wickliffe's Works, xiii.]. It was written in a time of pestilence, and advocates the theory of the nearness of the Last Day, which Abbot Joachim first started. In this tract the secular clergy, and particularly those well benefited, are denounced as simoniacs.

In A.D. 1360, Wickliffe commenced his warfare with the Mendicant Friars, who had intruded into the universities as elsewhere, and by claiming degrees on their own terms, and striving to draw into their body the most promising students at an earlier age than the statutes allowed, seemed likely to subvert academic discipline, as they had already subverted parochial discipline in the country at large. In his tract against them, Wickliffe denied their favourite position that our Lord was a vagrant and a beggar, exposed their almost blasphemous regard for their founder, and branded the richer as hypocrites, the poorer as mere vagrants, and all alike as misleaders of the people. The popularity which he thus gained in the university won for him in A.D. 1361 the appointment of Master of Balliol College, to which was attached the rectory of Fyldingham in the diocese of Lincoln. Four years later he became Warden of Canterbury Hall.

This Hall had been only lately founded by Simon Islip for a warden and eleven fellows. Three out of the whole number were to be chosen from the monks of Canterbury, and eight from the secular clergy. Having become dissatisfied with the turbulent character of Wodehull, the first warden, Islip dispossessed him and the regulars, and appointed none but seculars in their room, with Wickliffe for their head. But this arrangement was reversed immediately afterwards by Simon Langham, Islip's successor in the see of Canterbury, who, having once been a monk himself, favoured the cause of the monks, and restored Wodehull and the regulars, whereupon Wickliffe, according to the ordinary custom of the day, appealed to the Pope. After the usual delay in such matters, the papal decision was given against him, perhaps owing to the fact that Wickliffe, as Royal chaplain, had been appointed to stand in writing the papal claim to tribute and homage from the King of England which Urban had just pressed, basing it upon the surrender of the kingdom by John. Wickliffe performed his task with his usual energy and vigour, but his success did not prevent Edward from confirming the appointment of Wodehull upon the receipt of 200 marks.¹

Wickliffe remained at Oxford, took his Doctor's degree in A.D. 1372, and being thus "Sanctæ Theologiæ Professor," he commenced lecturing in divinity. At the same time he continued to wage war with the friars, whom he accused of holding fifty errors and heresies. It was perhaps about this time that he wrote against the abuse of promoting clergy to State offices, owing to which the ecclesiastic was too often sunk in the statesman, and on the other hand statesmen were paid for their services at the expense of the Church by the possession of benefices. The question created so much excitement at the time in Parliament, that the Bishops of Winchester and Exeter were compelled to resign their offices of Chancellor and Treasurer.

Altogether Wickliffe's conduct had so far been such as to bring him into favour with the ruling powers. He was particularly patronized by John of Gaunt, through whose influence he was in A.D. 1374 placed on a commission to treat with the Papal Legate at Bruges respecting points in dispute between the King and the Pope, the chief of them being the right claimed by the latter to appoint to certain benefices in England. Against this claim sundry statutes had been passed by Parliament, but the right was still asserted and often exercised. The case was compromised, but Wickliffe, for his services on this occasion, when he seems for the first time to have spoken of the Pope as Antichrist, received the prebend of Aust in the collegiate church of Westbury, and the rectory of Lutterworth, which he held till his death.

The opposition against him was now increased, and the Pope required the Primate to deal summarily with him. This the law of the land would not permit, but he was cited by Courtenay, then Bishop of London, to appear before a synod held at St. Paul's, and to answer to nineteen articles that had been alleged against him.² He appeared, supported by the presence of John of Gaunt and Lord Percy, Earl Marshal, who behaved with insolence and rudeness to the synod—a duly convened and fully authorized judicial tribunal—behaviour which Courtenay met by mildness and dignity. The populace, indignant at the turbulent conduct of these noblemen, who were already deservedly disliked, behaved with such tumultuous violence that the two were forced to fly for their lives, and the synod was broken up without coming to any decision [A.D. 1377].

Early in the reign of Richard II., the Pope Gregory IX. issued three bulls against Wickliffe, addressed to the King, to Sudbury, Archbishop of Canterbury, and to the University of Oxford. The bulls to the King and to the University seem to have produced no effect; the Archbishop summoned Wickliffe to appear before him at his private chapel at Lambeth, but the proceedings there were arrested, partly by a tumultuous assembly of the Londoners, and partly by a mandate from the Princess Dowager of Wales, who headed the Regency Government. At the same time Wickliffe declared that his opinions had been formed from the Sacred Scriptures and from holy doctors, and that if they were proved to be adverse to the faith he was ready and willing to recant. The only result was that he was enjoined to keep silence, and the death of Gregory, with the schism that followed, greatly strengthened his position. He wrote a tract comparing the rival popes who were anathematizing each other to Simon Magus.

It was about this time that he commenced his most important work, the translation of the Scriptures. It may be remarked in passing that it is quite a mistake to suppose that the Church of the Middle Ages was opposed to the devotional reading of the Holy Scripture. Translations of the Bible had been made into the English tongue during many centuries [Blunt's Plain Account of the Eng. Bible]. The real objection was to the claim of some to form for themselves a scheme of Christian doctrine out of Scripture, interpreted according to their own individual judgment, a claim which the Church of England has never allowed. Besides this, particular translations were objected to as having been made by heretics, and not without reason. But though the mediæval Church never as a body opposed the devotional reading of the Holy Bible in the vulgar tongue, sufficient pains were not taken to supply the people with authorized versions. This defect Wickliffe endeavoured to supply, prefacing his effort by the issue of a tract on the truth of Scripture. His translation was made into good, vigorous, racy, English from the Vulgate. Many copies were transcribed by the hands of loving disciples, so that it soon became widely circulated, chiefly by means of a band of followers whom he now began to organize and send forth to preach everywhere, either in the churches or in the highways, calling them his "poor" preachers. They went about in blue or russet gowns, barefoot, depending for their maintenance upon the hospitality of their hearers; and they gained many followers, particularly in the neighbourhood of Lutterworth.

In A.D. 1379, his work was interrupted by a severe illness at Oxford, which almost carried him off; however he recovered and developed still further his opposition to the current beliefs. Hitherto he had not attacked any of the doctrines of the Church, but in A.D. 1381 he began to express doubts concerning transubstantiation, and published his twelve conclusions on the matter [Vaughan, Life, ii. 45]. This turned against him many who had hitherto been his main supporters. The University censured him, and forbade any of its members to hold and maintain such doctrines on pain of the greater excommunication and imprisonment. He appealed to the King, but his appeal was rejected, and his protector, John of Gaunt, coldly admonished him to submit to his ecclesiastical superiors on such a question. But Wickliffe's spirit was not one that would yield to the counsels of an Erastian statesman on questions of Church doctrine, and he continued to declare what he conceived to be the truth. He was in consequence summoned before an ecclesiastical court at Oxford,¹ but obtained an acquittal on the ground that passages of doubtful import in his writings ought to be construed in meliozem partem. An attempt was now made to identify him with those wild lawless bands which, under Wat Tyler and others, were rising against the Government. Although Wickliffe had no real connection with them, his known views on the lawfulness of confiscating Church property, if mal-administered, was thought to threaten all property, and it was accordingly provided by Act of Parliament that unlicensed preachers, or Lollards, should be arrested and held in strong prisons until they should justify themselves according to law and reason of Holy Church [5 Ric. II. st. 2, c. 5]. This Act passed the Lords, and was promulgated by the King, probably at the instance of Courtenay, now Archbishop of Canterbury, but it had never been submitted to the Commons, and at their remonstrance some time afterwards it was withdrawn.

In A.D. 1382, the Archbishop proceeded against Wickliffe, and he was cited before an assembly of eight bishops and fourteen doctors at Greyfriars in London. He refused to appear, alleging the privileges of the University; but the investigation continued, and out of twenty-four articles gathered from his writings ten were condemned as heretical and fourteen as erroneous. [DICT. OF THEOL., LOLLARDS. Gieseler's Eccl. Hist. iv. p. 248, Clark's tr.] This condemnation was publicly proclaimed in London; but Wickliffe appealed to the civil powers in Parliament, requiring them to relax the monastic vows; to see that tithes were applied to the maintenance of the poor; that Christ's doctrine on the Eucharist was taught; that if a bishop or curate were notoriously guilty of contempt of God his temporalities should be confiscated; that the clergy should not be allowed to hold secular offices, and that no one should be imprisoned on account of excommunication: to which were added certain articles against the Pope [Vaughan, ii. 97]. The Commons did not accede to this petition, but protested against the Act for the imprisonment of heretics mentioned above.

Wickliffe still had many adherents at Oxford, among whom was the Chancellor, who refused to expel him from the University, or cause his followers to be sought out for punishment; but Parliament happened to be transferred to Oxford, and with it went the Convocation, before which his views on the Eucharist were questioned. They were condemned, but it is uncertain whether Wickliffe was actually expelled from Oxford or withdrew of his own accord. He did retire to Lutterworth in A.D. 1382, where he was allowed to end his days without farther molestation from the Archbishop. But his last moments were not undisturbed. Pope Urban VI. of Rome had proclaimed a crusade against his rival of Avignon, and the war-loving Bishop of Norwich headed those English who took part in it, to the indignation of many patriotic men, who could ill bear to see so much English blood and treasure wasted upon a profitless foreign enterprise. Wickliffe saw his opportunity, and sent forth a tract, in which he severely censured the wickedness of a war among Christian nations undertaken to promote the ambitious designs of two "antichristian priests," as he styled them. The crusade proved a failure; but Urban's anger was roused, and he summoned Wickliffe to appear before him at Rome. Wickliffe replied that his weak state of health would not allow him to undertake the fatigues of such a journey; and in fact he had been ailing for some time. On Innocents' Day A.D. 1384 he was struck with paralysis while celebrating mass in the Church of Lutterworth, and died on the last day of the year, St. Sylvester's Day. He was buried in the chancel of the church, but forty years after, in obedience to a decree of the Council of Constance, his bones were exhumed, burnt to ashes, and cast into a brook. But he had won the respect of those who opposed him, as being undoubtedly one of the most learned Englishmen of the day. He left behind him numerous writings on the most varied subjects, more than two hundred being said to have been burnt in Bohemia. Shirley's catalogue reckons up ninety-six extant Latin, sixty-five extant English works, besides about one hundred works that have been lost. Wickliffe was no Protestant. He did indeed wage war with the papal claims, and he opposed extreme materialistic views on the Eucharist, but he maintained the Real Presence. His distinctive views were political and social rather than religious. He withstood the monks, friars, and the dignified clergy. He held peculiar views on ecclesiastical property, and the right of the State to confiscate it, which his followers developed to their logical extent, and applied to all property; and this in the unsettled state of those times was the main cause of the persecuting statutes which Parliament from time to time passed against them. He himself organized no band of followers, though he had, indeed, sent forth his poor priests; but all those who in after days were influenced by his writings, and held his views, political or religious, as well as those who went beyond him, were classed together as Lollards.

These Lollards included men of the most diverse character and principles, from the sincere, honest religious reformer to the wild socialist visionary, whose opinions, if allowed to prevail, would have plunged society into chaos. They comprised all orders of men, knights, merchants and peasants. Even a peer, the Earl of Salisbury, has been branded by Walsingham as a favourer of Lollards all his life, as a reviler of images, a despiser of canons, and a scoffer at sacraments. He was beheaded in A.D. 1400 for conspiring to restore Richard II.¹ The Lollards arrayed against themselves all the friends of order, as well as the supporters of the existing hierarchy. They judged their ecclesiastical superiors according to a standard of their own, and went about interfering in parishes in contempt of the parochial system, much as the friars had done. Some of them objected to church music and organs, and quoted Scripture in support of their views, without regard to the context.

An Act has been already mentioned as passed against the Lollards in A.D. 1381. Thirteen years later they presented a bold remonstrance to the Parliament, complaining of the wealth and power of the clergy, and protesting against celibacy, transubstantiation, benedictions and exorcisms, the union of spiritual and secular offices in the same person, chantries for the dead, pilgrimages, the worshipping of images and relics, auricular confession, indulgences, capital punishments, and trades which minister to pride or luxury [Fasciculus Zizaniorum, p. 300]. They proved so mutinous in London that an insurrection was apprehended, and Richard was hurriedly summoned back from Ireland. In his reign the sheriffs' oath required them to watch the Lollards, as being known to be turbulent and disaffected; and the practice was afterwards confirmed by Henry IV., and continued in force until the time of Charles I., when it was dropped as obsolete in consequence of an objection made by Sir Edward Coke, when Sheriff of Buckingham.

The state of the kingdom in Henry's reign was alarming. His adherents and those of the deposed Richard divided the realm, while the Lollards in the background were threatening ecclesiastical property, and in some cases all property. Accordingly, in A.D. 1401, the Act "De hæretico comburendo" was passed by all the estates of the realm, providing that the bishop should arrest, imprison, and bring heretics to trial at his courts. If they should refuse to recant, or should relapse after recanting, he was to hand them over to the sheriff of the county, or to the mayor or bailiff of the nearest borough, to be burnt alive on a high place before the people. The Scotch passed a similar Act in A.D. 1425. It may be remarked that in no country except Great Britain was a special law necessary for the execution of heretics, the mere will of the government being elsewhere sufficient.

The first to suffer under the new Act was William Sautree, a clergyman of Norwich diocese. He had recanted before his bishop, but continuing to preach in London was condemned as a relapsed heretic, degraded and burnt [A.D. 1401]. Another priest, William Thorpe, was arraigned before Arundel, but his fate has not been handed down to us. The only other known sufferer in Henry IV.'s reign was Thomas Bradby, a tailor, from the diocese of Worcester. Prince Henry was present at his execution, and when he cried for mercy as the flames mounted up, ordered them to be quenched, and offered him his life and a pension on condition of his recantation, but he refused and was burnt. The fact that these were the only two executed in that reign, while the Lollards boasted that their number exceeded 100,000, shews the unwillingness of the bishops to put the Act into force. As in Queen Mary's reign, the laity of Parliament, the noble lords and knights of the shires, however covetous they may have been of the temporal power and wealth of the clergy, were the most fierce in urging them on to seek out, imprison, and burn the Lollards. When, after every effort had been made in vain to persuade them to recant, the bishops, as the law required, handed them over to the secular power, the local authorities were always ready to carry out the law as it then stood, without remonstrance. It was, in fact, a brutal age, as is shewn by the savage punishment for treason frequently inflicted under Henry IV.; and the power of the Commons in the State having in his reign become a reality, the whole nation was responsible for the burnings. The country had, indeed, become so dissatisfied with the remissness of the bishops, that in 1412 a petition against the Lollards was presented to Parliament through Sir John Tiptoft.

After the accession of Henry V. the condition of the Lollards became worse, and there can be no doubt that some of their number by their seditious conduct provoked severe action on the part of the Government [Hook's Lives of Abps. Arundel and Chichele]. At the beginning of this reign occurred the case of Sir John Oldcastle, sometimes called Lord Cobham in right of his wife, and hitherto known chiefly as a tried soldier, and a man high in favour with the King. He was accused before Convocation of heretical notions on the sacraments, pilgrimage, penance, and the power of the keys; and that through his influence unlicensed preachers had been sent forth in the dioceses of London, Rochester, and Hereford. Henry took this case in hand himself, argued with Oldcastle, and remonstrated with him, particularly on the heretical books that he had in his possession. Oldcastle replied that he had not yet read them, and so could not be answerable for what they contained. He was allowed to retire to his castle of Cowling, near Rochester, where he treated with contempt the summons of the archbishop, and despised his excommunications, until a king's officer was employed in the case, when he gave way, and was committed, not to the Archbishop's house at Lambeth, but to the Tower of London. He then published a confession of faith, satisfactory on many points, but defective on the question of the Eucharist. Cobham at the same time offered to produce one hundred knights as his "compurgators," and expressed himself willing to submit to the wager of battle, but those ancient forms of judicial decision were already beginning to become obsolete. He was arraigned again before the archbishop and other bishops, and a long contest ensued, during which, while the primate was mild and conciliatory, Oldcastle displayed an insolence of conduct which would have provoked any court even of our own day. After several examinations he was solemnly condemned, and committed again to the Tower, whence he contrived to make his escape and fly to Wales, where he became the centre of the disaffected, who were then very numerous.

How far he may have been personally implicated is uncertain, but well grounded reports of Lollard risings began to spread. The Lollards were supposed to be preparing to march to London, with the intention of overthrowing the King's present counsellors, making Oldcastle prime minister, destroying the union between Church and State, suppressing all the religious orders, and confiscating Church property generally. It must be remembered that the country was in a very distracted state, that Henry had not as yet had the opportunity of displaying the ability to rule, or the generous and noble qualities which afterwards won him popularity, that his title to the throne was disputed by numbers, who either believed that Richard was yet alive or looked up for the rightful heir, and that many of the Lollards had proclaimed doctrines destructive alike of civil rule and proprietary rights, so as to band together all parties in the State against them. Henry, alarmed, issued a proclamation against the Lollards, indicting Oldcastle, Sir Roger Acton and others by name, removed from Eltham to Westminster, and called upon his friends to arm in his defence. The city was suspected, as many of the inhabitants were known favourers of the Lollard party; the gates were closed, and several arrests were made, but probably owing to the promptness and boldness of the King's measures no outbreak took place. The imminence of the danger so alarmed the Government, that thirty-nine persons were tried and executed for treason and heresy; but a very large number were pardoned, and a general amnesty was proclaimed, with twelve exceptions. At the same time [A.D. 1414], an Act was passed extending that of Henry IV., and requiring all officials upon entering office to take an oath to destroy Lollards, and assure the ordinaries therein; the justices were empowered to inquire concerning offenders, and to deliver them up to the ordinaries within ten days. A relapsed heretic was to be hanged (probably in chains round the middle) for treason against the King, and burnt for heresy against God [2 Henry V. stat. i. c. 7]. It is to be noted that this statute was the act, not of the clergy, but of the laity in Parliament, having been originated in the Commons as usual by petition, adopted by the Lords, and assented to by the King.

Two years later, there appeared a constitution of the Convocation under Archbishop Chichele. It provided that heretics should be inquired after by the bishops or their officials in each rural deanery twice a year; but we do not read of any executions in consequence, nor of any close search. In fact the more turbulent spirits who had brought Lollardism into disrepute as a political faction were being drafted off into the French war.

Oldcastle remained in concealment in Wales for some years, although a price of 1000 marks had been set upon his head, a proof that the Government considered him really dangerous to civil order. Once only he shewed himself near St. Alban's, and that was during an invasion of the Scotch, with whom he was supposed to be in secret treaty. At length, in 1418, he was taken by Sir E. Charlton after vigorous resistance, and brought to London. He was interrogated by Parliament, but when he denied their jurisdiction over him, affirming that King Richard was still alive, they condemned him without further hearing to be hanged as a traitor and to be burnt as a heretic.

We do not read of any other executions under Henry V., except that of Taylor, a priest, in the last year of his reign. Several occurred in the early years of Henry VI., and numbers were committed to prison, and persuaded or compelled to recant. The bishops were as a rule exceedingly unwilling to deliver them over to the secular arm, and often kept them in confinement at their own expense to preserve their lives. The Wars of the Roses stayed the persecution and wrought a great change in the character of the Lollards. All the turbulent and disaffected of the nation were absorbed into the contending parties, and the Lollards proper became a quiet and peaceful school, which, by spreading the Scriptures, and by persuasive measures, sought to extend their principles as far as possible, and prepared the public mind for the Reformation effected in the course of the following century. An attempt has been made to claim a bishop, Pecock of Chichester, as a favourer of their cause, and in fact a confessor. But as a matter of fact he was thoroughly opposed to them in two important points. He advocated the union of ecclesiastical and civil offices in one person, maintaining that it was no business of the bishops to go about preaching in their dioceses, but that they were much better employed in advocating the cause of the Church at the courts of kings. He was also a fervid champion of extreme papal pretensions; affirming that the Pope was the one source of all episcopal power, and that all bishops were his delegates. It was this that set the English bishops against him, and caused his deprivation, but the bare fact that he was so deprived by the existing powers was enough to make Foxe and his believers turn a champion of extreme Ultramontaniam into a Protestant martyr [Pecock's Repressor, Record Off. edition].

After the accession of Henry VII. the persecution broke out afresh, and several were burnt in his reign, among whom was Joan Boughton in 1494, the first woman who suffered for heresy in England. Still the number of those who were put to death for heresy is remarkably small, compared with those who in the same period of time met a like fate on the Continent. Foxe, who is generally so minute in his accounts, gives the names of twenty (not including Oldcastle and the thirty-nine who were executed for the Lollard rising under Henry V.) as having suffered from the burning of Sautree to the accession of Henry VIII., a period of 108 years; an Italian or Spanish inquisitor would have thought the whole number barely sufficient for one single "Auto da Fé." The early days of Henry VIII. were comparatively free from the stains of blood, Wolsey being no persecutor. From that time the name of Lollard disappears, being succeeded by that of the PURITANS.

LOMBARD, PETER. [SCHOOLMEN.]

LOVE, FAMILY OF. [FAMILISTS.]

LOW CHURCHMEN. Those laymen and clergymen of the Church of England who regard the Ministry and Sacraments principally in their relation to mankind.

The name was first used in the time of Queen Anne; but, as has been shewn under the title HIGH CHURCHMEN, there has always been such a school in the Church of England since the Reformation, and the existence of distinct schools of thought is not peculiar to the Church of England, but is traceable through the whole course of Christian history. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries Low Churchmen often assumed the name of "Evangelicals" or "the Evangelical party," a name which, as an assumption of exclusiveness, carries its own condemnation, but which has become historical.

I. LOW CHURCHMEN OF THE REFORMATION PERIOD. The warmest sympathies of Low Churchmen have generally been stimulated by influences outside of the Church of England. In modern times the stimulus has come from Dissent and Scotch Presbyterianism, in earlier days it came from Geneva. Thus the Low Churchmen of the Reformation period were that strong Calvinistic party within the Church which desired to retain the Episcopal system and the Prayer Book, but to modify the former in the Presbyterian direction, and to get rid from the latter of those distinctively Catholic principles and practices which foreign Protestants like Calvin stigmatized as "bearable fooleries." This party sprung originally from Cambridge, where, before the days of Calvin, its predecessors were in possession of the University, and strong enough to send out a colony under the auspices of Wolsey to "Cardinal" College in Oxford. In Edward VI.'s time the Calvinistic influence grew strong at Court through the encouragement received from the Duke of Somerset and Cranmer [CALVINISTS]: it was consequently strong on the bench of bishops; and both the Universities were then tuned by the imposition upon them of two foreigners, Peter Martyr and Martin Bucer, as Divinity Professors. The efforts of the party were directed, during Edward's reign, towards a remodelling of the Prayer Book in such a manner as to free it from the taint of Popery, which was considered to corrupt the First Prayer Book, that of 1548, the work of Henry VIII.'s Convocation: and although their efforts were not entirely successful, they sufficed to make changes which theologians of later days have always regretted, and which introduced into the Communion Service original novelties that had been previously avoided with care.

In the reign of Queen Elizabeth the Low Churchmen were led by Cartwright and Travers, and by those who had fled for safety to Zurich and Geneva during the reign of her sister; among the most notable were Jewel, Bishop of Salisbury, Grindal, Bishop of London, and Horne, Bishop of Winchester. The efforts of the party were now turned against the retention of the old Liturgical customs, such as the use of vestments (which Jewel called "relics of the Amorites"), of altar lights and altar crosses, of wafers for the Holy Communion, and of kneeling at its reception. The Thirty-nine Articles were also attacked by them for the purpose of giving them a strongly Calvinistic colour, and when this endeavour failed, the Lambeth Articles were prepared, and would have been imposed upon the Church but for the resistance of Queen Elizabeth. [DICT. OF THEOL., LAMBETH ARTICLES.] On James I.'s arrival in England great hopes were entertained by the Low Church party that his Presbyterian education would make him favourable to these changes, but the Hampton Court Conference destroyed these expectations. It was during his reign, however, that they succeeded in weaning the people from the sacrificial aspect of the Holy Communion by very generally removing the Lord's Table from the east end of the chancel, where it stood "altar-wise," and placing it as a communicant's or "communion-table" in the middle of the chancel or in the nave. The attempts made by Laud and other High Churchmen to undo the Low Church innovations of the Jacobean period had, as is well known, great influence in bringing about the Great Rebellion, and yet prevented those innovations from being imposed upon the Church in subsequent generations. [PURITANS.]

II. THE LATITUDINARIANS. A regular current of secession from the ranks of the Low Church party to those of the Presbyterians, the Independents, and the Roman Catholics, deprived it of its more zealous elements, and prepared it to assume a position which may be defined as that of an expediency settlement, a position which the party occupied from soon after the Restoration until the latter half of the eighteenth century. They had now grown very indifferent about extreme Calvinism on the one hand, and very indifferent about the Episcopal system on the other: and it thus seemed possible for them to establish a colourless theology and colourless Episcopacy that might become a platform on which moderate Calvinists, moderate Arminians, moderate Presbyterians, and moderate Independents, might all unite in one common Church. This scheme of "comprehension"—and an honest and true comprehension would have been a glory to them for ever—won for Low Churchmen the new title of "Latitudinarians." Their motto for the next hundred years was that of the publication which first set forth their principles in detail, "Let your moderation be known unto all men."

The name of "Latitude-men" was first given by the Puritans to those of the clergy who conformed to Presbyterianism and Independency under the government of Cromwell. They were "men of a prelatial spirit that had apostatized to the onions and garlic of Egypt, because they were generally ordained by bishops, and in opposition to that hide-bound, strait-laced spirit that did then prevail they were called 'Latitude-men;' for that was the first original of the name whatever sense hath since been put upon it. This was a certain bar to their preferment, as they were sure to find if any of them came before the Committee of Tryers" [Brief account of a new sect of Latitude-men, together with some reflections upon the new Philosophy, by S. P., Cambridge, June 1662]. About 1770 the class of men described by this writer began to be called by the more lasting name of Latitudinarians, as is shewn in the following dialogue: "Philaethes. Have you not heard the choleric gentlemen distinguish these persons by a long nickname; which they have taught their tongues to pronounce as roundly as if it were a shorter than it is by four or five syllables? Theophilus. Yes Philaethes, oftener, I presume, than you have: for though we are both countrymen, and wonted more than most to a solitary life, yet my occasions call me abroad, and into variety of companies, more frequently than yours do you: where I hear, ever and anon, the word of a foot and a half long sounded out with a great grace; and that not only at fires and tables, but sometimes from pulpits too: nay, and it accompanied good store of other bombasts and little witticisms in seasoning, not long since, the stately Oxonian Theatre. Phil. I am not so little skilled in the language of the Beast as to be ignorant of the derivation of that long name: but I pray, Theophilus, what do those that so please themselves with it mean by it? Theoph. That I can tell you from their own mouths: for I have heard them give a description of a Latitudinarian; and it is this short one, 'He is a gentleman of a wide swallow'" [Principles and Practices of certain moderate Divines of the Church of England (much misunderstood) truly represented and defended, in 3 parts, 1670, p. 10].¹ Baxter refers to them in his usual sardonic manner as at first only "Cambridge Arminians, and some of them not so much, and were much for free and new philosophy, and especially for Cartes" [Baxter's Life and Times, iii. 20].

During this age of the school, Low Churchmen broke away from that slavery to the theology of Calvin by which they had previously been characterized, and which was revived by their successors. They were extremely averse to dogmas altogether, and the rigid theories of Predestination and Election gave way to a much less unwholesome kind of teaching, which was practically that of an Universal Redemption from which no sinner is arbitrarily excluded, or excluded at all by anything except his own free will. In thus emancipating the Church of England from the "horrible dictum" of Geneva they did good service to the Christianity of the country, and prevented it from ever again running so generally in that groove which had led to the Antinomianism of the preceding times.

The lax creed of the Latitudinarians developed, however, to loosen men's hold upon truth, and gave rise to an opinion somewhat similar to that of the Hegelian school of more recent days, namely, that absolute truth has no existence, and that what presents itself as truth to any sect (within reasonable bounds) is to be taken as truth relatively to them though it may not be so to others. This principle is expressed by the writer previously quoted in the following words: "But I will now, in a more distinct manner, give you an account of their opinions. They may be referred to matters of doctrine and discipline. As to the former, they profess to dissent from none that have been held to be fundamentals of the Christian faith, either by the primitive or the best reformed modern Churches; and heartily subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles of our Church, taking that liberty in the interpretation of them that is allowed by the Church herself. Though it is most reasonable to presume that she requires subscription to them as to an instrument of peace only" [Principles, &c. p. 191]. This he repeats in another part of his work in the words, "nor do they require our internal assent to their Articles, but enjoin our submission to them as to an instrument of peace only" [ibid. p. 305].

This principle influenced all the opinions of the school, and its action upon the essential doctrines of the creed may be seen in the writings of men like Archbishop Tillotson [A.D. 1630-94], whose once popular sermons are a good illustration of that "moral" tone (as it was afterwards called) which the Christian faith assumed when thus watered down. Its particular tendency was towards Arianism, a heresy with which the Latitudinarian clergy were largely infected. It may be further illustrated by the view which divines of this school took of Episcopacy, a view which gained a permanent hold upon Low Churchmen, and which was derived from Chillingworth, whom the author of the Apology for Latitudinarianism thus quotes: "If we abstract from Episcopal government all accidentals, and consider only what is essential and necessary in it, we shall find no more than this; an appointment of one man of eminent sanctity and sufficiency to have the care of all the churches within a certain precinct or diocese, and furnishing him with authority (not absolute or arbitrary, but regulated and bounded by laws, and moderated by joining to him a convenient number of assistants) to the intent that all the churches under him may be provided of able and good pastors, and that both of pastors and peoples conformity to laws and performance of their duties may be required, under penalties not left to discretion but by law appointed" [ibid. 324].

Such principles (which are exactly the same as those attributed to the party in the tract of 1662 previously quoted) led satirical writers to characterize the Low Churchmen of William III. and Queen Anne's days as "No Churchmen."

"Low Churchmen are so called," says one of them, "who make a shift to keep in the communion and bosom of the Church, and maintain a sort of outward conformity, but at the same time have no liking to her constitution, . . . these Low Churchmen are indeed No Churchmen" [The distinction of High Church and Low Church distinctly considered and fairly stated, 1705]. "Ne'er a barrel the better herring between Low Church and No Church," is the title given to his tract by another writer in the year 1713. But these writers were attacking the Latitudinarians when they were become less respectable than they had been in their early days, when the principles of the school were bearing their natural fruit, that of being as careful not to have "overmuch righteousness" as not to have overmuch faith.

III. THE EVANGELICALS. In the middle of the eighteenth century a Pietistic school of Low Churchmen began to be developed, which grew into that great and influential section of the clergy and laity known as the "Evangelical party." This Pietistic school ran parallel with Methodism, and both may be traced up in a great measure to the same origin, the influence of the works of William Law [A.D. 1686-1761], especially of his Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life. The one was an educated Pietism keeping within the borders of the Church, the other an ignorant Pietism which soon wandered outside those borders.

The influence of the pious Nonjurors' writings on the "Evangelical" school is well seen in the case of Henry Venn [A.D. 1724-97], one of its earliest members. Soon after Venn had been ordained, his son records that he had heard him say it was his custom to walk almost every evening in the cloisters of Trinity College for the purpose of devotional meditation. "In this frame of mind Law's Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life—a book which has been the means of exciting many to a life of holiness—was particularly useful to him; he read it repeatedly with peculiar interest and advantage, and immediately began, with great sincerity, to frame his life according to the Christian model there delineated" [Venn's Life of Venn, 16]. At a later time "his plan of life was very methodical, realizing as far as he was able that laid down by Mr. Law in his Christian Perfection" [ibid. 19]. The influence which the works of Law had on Wesley's mind is well known; and even the journals of the period shew how widely those works were changing the character of the clergy.

But at the time when Venn was leaving college life [A.D. 1750], after being three years in orders, for the life of a parish priest, the new school of Low Churchmen was only just coming to light; and although there were a few excellent members of it whose holy lives have kept their names in remembrance, such as James Hervey of Weston Favell [A.D. 1714-58], Samuel Walker of Truro [A.D. 1714-61], William Talbot of Reading [A.D. 1717-74], Thomas Adam of Winttringham [A.D. 1701-84], the name of Venn is the earliest of those who attained anything like distinction.¹ He was, however, only one of a large body, for during the early part of George III.'s reign, and the ten years' rule of the good Archbishop Secker [A.D. 1758-68], the numbers of the "Evangelical" clergy rapidly increased, and towards the latter years of the century they had reached to about three hundred [Evang. Mag. Nov. 1795, p. 449]. It is impossible here to do more than mention the names of some of those who took a leading part—chiefly as preachers—among them; and indeed few of them were men of sufficient ability to leave their mark on the page of history, so that even the "lives" of those whose lives found friendly pens to write them are mere records of personal feelings and social incidents. The chief of them were William Romaine of St. Anne's, Blackfriars [A.D. 1714-94], John Fletcher of Madeley [A.D. 1729-1785], John Berridge of Everton [A.D. 1716-1793], William Grimshaw of Haworth [A.D. 1763], Richard de Courcy of St. Alkmund's, Shrewsbury, William Bromley Cadogan of Chelsea and Reading [A.D. 1751-1797], Joseph Milner of Hull [A.D. 1744-97], and his brother Isaac Milner, Dean of Carlisle [A.D. 1751-1820], John Newton of Olney and St. Mary Woolnoth [A.D. 1725-1807], Beilby Porteus, Bishop of London [A.D. 1787-1804], Richard Cecil of St. John's, Bedford Row [A.D. 1748-1810], and Thomas Robinson of Leicester [A.D. 1749-1813]. To these names may be added those of a rather later generation: Thomas Scott of Aston Sandford [A.D. 1747-1821], Legh Richmond of Turvey [A.D. 1772-1827], and Charles Simeon of Cambridge [A.D. 1759-1836].² But perhaps none of these clergy, except Milner, Scott, and Simeon, exercised so great an influence in the revival of religion within the Church as was exercised by the great layman William Wilberforce [A.D. 1759-1833], whose missionary book, entitled A Practical View of Christianity [A.D. 1797], circulated by many thousands, and whose holy example in public and private life leavened English society as it was never leavened by a single layman before, except, perhaps, by Robert Nelson.

The Evangelical movement within the Church was contemporary with the Methodist movement under the Wesleys and Whitfield. Some of the clergy engaged in the former held aloof from the Methodists, as did Walker of Truro, who wrote: "My conduct with regard to the Methodists hath been upon the plan of Gamaliel's advice: for though there appeared a zeal and boldness in them which might very justly engage my heart to them, yet I could never persuade myself their proceedings were justifiable; . . . nevertheless I trust they have been the means of kindling Gospel principles among us, and seem about to leave the work to more regular and capable heads than their own" [Sidney's Life of Walker, 281]. He afterwards wrote to John Wesley, endeavouring to persuade him to give up his Methodist societies into the hands of the Evangelical clergy, in whose parishes they were formed, and received a reply from the great autocrat, which is amusingly illustrative of his love of power. Others, however, among the early Evangelicals associated themselves heartily with the Methodists, leaning to Wesley or Whitfield as their own views inclined to the Arminian or the Calvinistic side. Fletcher of Madeley and Hervey, the author of Theron and Aspasio, and of the Meditations in a Country Churchyard (a work in its day almost as popular as the Christian Year in later times), were among Wesley's earliest coadjutors, while Grimshaw, Berridge, and Romaine,³ co-operated with Whitfield, Lady Huntingdon, and the Calvinistic Methodists in general. [HUNTINGDONIANS.]

A few of the earlier school were indeed on very friendly terms with Dissenters, though generally with those belonging to the parishes of other clergymen rather than with those of their own. "Influenced by the hope of doing good," says the biographer of Venn, with respectful disapproval, "my father in certain instances preached in unconsecrated places" [Venn's Life of Venn, 177]. Wesley's clerical friends often assisted him in the same way, and the practice had gone to an inconvenient length when it was stopped by the proceedings taken against Lady Huntingdon's chaplains. Venn preached at Rowland Hill's Meeting-House, Surrey Chapel, whenever he visited London, and for several Sundays in succession as late as the year 1790 [ibid. 176, 485]. But the principles of the Church weighed so lightly with men of this school when balanced against individual opinion and feeling, that when Venn left Huddersfield in 1751, and was succeeded by a vicar of whom he and his admirers did not approve, he instantly advised the latter to build a dissenting chapel for themselves; and although, very shortly after it was built, a vicar of Huddersfield arrived who was of their own way of thinking, these people were permanently alienated from the Church [ibid. 174]. The later school which followed the lead of Milner the Church historian, and Scott the Commentator, was more true to the Church and its principles, and in recent times (notwithstanding the establishment of "the Evangelical Alliance" in the year 1846) its members have generally been vigorous opponents of the Dissenters in their own parishes.

The absence of any other organized party in the Church, their active preaching and their many good works, combined with the influence of Joseph Milner's unhistorical Church History, and Thomas Scott's more valuable Commentary on the Bible (a work not yet [A.D. 1873] superseded by a better one), placed the Low Church school in the front ranks of the Church of England from about the end of the eighteenth century until the rise of the Tractarian movement, that is, for about half a century. During that time a large proportion of the important and influential posts in the Church fell into their hands, and especially a great number of those town parishes which take the lead in religious movements. They did not build many churches, and the restoration of churches was seldom carried by them beyond the building of pews and galleries for the use of an audience.¹ But they did a great and good work in the country, and prepared the way for a movement into which large numbers of them afterwards drifted, that High Church or "Tractarian" movement which was substantially a continuation and development of their own. The general result of their labours upon the religious life of the country was that [1] they taught multitudes a sense of sin, and the need of conversion from it; [2] they trained people to habits of private and family prayer; [3] they revived a spirit of faith, which had almost died out under the influence of the Latitudinarians and the Scoepics; [4] they cultivated the religious affections and kindled afresh the love of God.

² The reader who wishes for a more detailed account of the early Evangelical clergy should consult Erasmus Middleton's Biographia Evangelica, 1810, and John White Middleton's Ecclesiastical Memoirs of the First Four Decades of the Reign of George III., reprinted in 1822 from the Christian Guardian of 1820 and 1821.

There was also a large amount of active benevolence among them which led them to undertake several good works of public interest and importance. In the year 1799 the Church Missionary Society, intended originally for missions to Africa and India, was established by them, and out of its bosom were developed such men as Henry Martyn and Bishop Heber. Again, they took a most active part, under the leadership of Wilberforce, in procuring the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade, which was finally accomplished, as far as England was concerned, in the year 1833. They co-operated likewise with the Dissenters in establishing the "British and Foreign Bible Society" in 1804; and the "Church Pastoral Aid Society" was founded by them in 1829. These good works were effected at a time when there was but little energy for organization among the "High" Church party, and when if they had not been done by Low Churchmen they would not have been done at all. It may also be added that they used the press extensively for the publication of books and tracts of a religious character, though no high literary power was ever developed under the wing of the party.

But the good which was done by the Evangelical school in reviving personal religion was largely counterbalanced by the recklessness with which they neglected education both among the clergy and the laity. They expended all their energies on educating the heart, and treated mankind as if it was rather wrong than otherwise to educate the head. They would not, in terms, have denied that reason and intellect are the gifts of God as well as faith and love, but there was always among them a latent prejudice against the exercise of the intellect, on the ground that it interfered with the work of grace in the soul. Whatever educational work, therefore, the Evangelical school engaged in, it was undertaken as a concession to "the world" which needed to be apologized for on the part of those who were "true Christians." The consequence was that no sufficient measures were adopted for educating the poor, that the schools of the middle classes fell into the hands of those who were incompetent to teach anything beyond such rudimentary knowledge as would barely suffice for shopkeeping (a teaching unworthy the name of "commercial education" which was given to it), and that the higher education of the public schools and the universities became, practically, of the most secular character possible.

Added to this, the Evangelical clergy entirely failed to guide the intellect of the country in their sermons. Their system was built up on a few leading doctrines, and on these two or three strings they were ever harping. They set an excellent object before themselves, that of converting the world, but their scheme of conversion did not comprehend the subjugation of the intellectual powers to the power of grace; it rather looked to their suppression by it. Hence the "march of intellect" left such pulpits of the Church of England as were occupied by them far in the rear. The Bible was made to run on Calvinistic rails, and those who declined to force all interpretation of it in this direction were looked upon as bringing "human reasoning" to bear upon the Word of God, and as treating that Word with disrespect instead of reverence by so doing. In the earlier days of the Evangelical movement there was indeed a section of the clergy engaged in it who revolted against this narrow view of Holy Scripture, and endeavoured to establish that system of Biblical science which is known as "Hutchinsonianism;" but this peculiar mysticism was as unintelligible to the world at large as German philosophy; it made no impression whatever on the age, and touched none of the Biblical questions which are of vital interest to mankind. [HUTCHINSONIANS.] Almost the only other direction in which the intellectual studies of the school ever turned was that of the interpretation of unfulfilled prophecy; and the mean results of their researches in this direction were uninspired predictions respecting the fall of the papacy, the advent of the millennium, and the end of the world; predictions the rashness and valuelessness of which has been shewn in most cases by the "logic of events" in their non-fulfilment. The consequence of all this was that the Low Church clergy were utterly powerless against the irreligious intellect which they had permitted to develop itself unchecked; their pulpit teaching never touched the educated mind of the age, and their own mental power was so dwarfed that they were wholly unable to influence for good the wonderfully rapid growth of literature during the last generation.

The Evangelical movement may thus be characterized generally as a movement of transition, so far as national religious life is concerned. It was a movement of unintellectual subjective religion, leading onwards to a movement of intellectual objective religion. It taught habits of prayer as a stage on the road towards habits of adoration, so that the idea of getting good for ourselves by prayer was supplemented (under the influence of a later school) by the idea of worshipping God for His own glory. It revived the spirit of faith, that others might afterwards set before believers definite objects in which to believe. Such a work should never be valued lightly, for when men had been brought to a sense of sin, to repentance, and to the love of God, there was but a little way further for the religious life of the nation to travel before it would reach that higher ground to which, in the next generation, it attained. [HIGH CHURCHMEN.]

LUCIANISTS. A section of the Marcionites, followers of Lucian, as he is called by Hippolytus and Epiphanius, or Lucan, as he is called by Tertullian and Origen. This heretic was originally a disciple of Marcion [Hippol. Refut. Hæc. vii. 25], and seems to have formed a sect of his own (as his companion Apelles did) about A.D. 140. Beausobre, Lardner, and some others of the same school, consider that they are identical with the SELEUCIANS, who are mentioned by Augustine and Philaster, but the principal ground for this opinion is that the name of Seleucus is given as Leucius in some manuscripts of St. Jerome's works. [Lardner's Hist. Heret. 283.]

The particular tenet by which the Lucianists were distinguished from the Marcionites in general was that, in the resurrection from the dead, neither the actual body nor the actual soul of the deceased person would arise, but that a "tertium quid," something created for the purpose, would represent his personality. "We may ignore," says Tertullian, "a certain Lucan, who does not spare even this part of our nature, the soul, which he follows Aristotle in reducing to dissolution, and substitutes some other thing in lieu of it. Some third nature it is which, according to him, is to rise again, neither soul nor flesh; in other words, not a man, but a bear perhaps—for instance, Lucan himself" [Tertull. de Resurr. carn. ii.]. This may have been intended by Tertullian to indicate that Lucan believed in the transmigration of human souls into animals of a lower nature than man [Mill's N. T. Prolegom. 334, p. 37]. But this opinion was attributed to Marcion by Epiphanius, and the words of Tertullian seem to be rather a contemptuous rejection of Lucan's opinion, whatever it was, than a statement that such was the terminus of that opinion. Neander considers that Lucan "thought himself compelled to believe that everything 'psychical' was perishable; but that the πνευματικόν only, which participated of the Divine life, was immortal" [Neander, Ch. Hist. ii. 151, Bohn's transl.]

There is no evidence that the Lucianists ever occupied any important position as a sect, Epiphanius knowing scarcely anything about them in his time [Epiph. Hæres. xliii.]. Lucan himself, however, exercised no small influence for evil, being condemned as the author of many forged imitations of Scripture as early as the end of the fifth century, by Gelasius [Gelas. Decret. Labb. Concil. iv. 1264]. Many of the apocryphal writings now extant under the names of the Apostles are also traced up to him by Grabe [Spicileg. S. S. Patr. ut et Hæret. vol. i.], Mill [Prolegom. ad N. T.], and Beausobre [Hist. Manich. vol. i.].

LUCIANISTS. A name sometimes given to the early Arians from Lucian, who was one of the most famous heads of the school of Antioch, and among whose pupils had been the Arian bishops Eusebius of Nicomedia, Maris of Chalcedon, Theognis of Nicæa, Leontius of Antioch, Antoninus of Tarsus, and others [Philostorg. Hist. Eccl. ii. 14]. Lucian was himself a pupil of the heretical Paul of Samosata, and Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria, accuses him of having adopted his opinions [Theodor. Hist. Eccl. i. 4]. During the persecution of Athanasius the Eusebian party brought forward a Semi-Arian creed, which they alleged to be in the handwriting of Lucian [Sozom. Hist. Eccl. iii. 5]; but Sozomen seems to doubt whether this was a true assertion, and adds that Lucian was a most estimable man, and learned in the Holy Scriptures. Epiphanius speaks of him as infected with Arian errors [Epiph. Hæres. xliii.]. If Lucian was in any sense the father of the errors taught by his pupils he must have renounced them himself in his later life, for he is spoken of in the highest terms by St. Athanasius, St. Jerome [Catal. cap. lxxvii.], and St. Chrysostom [Opp. i. Hom. xlv.]; and the touching account of his martyrdom at Nicomedia [A.D. 311], during the Diocletian persecution [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. viii. 13, ix. 6; Philostorg. Hist. Eccl. ii. 13], offers no indication that he was then an Arian. Epiphanius [l. c.] says that the Arians in his time had indeed claimed Lucian as one of their martyrs, but he has had a place in Catholic martyrologies from the earliest times to which they can be traced.

LUCIFERIANIS. A schismatical party, followers of Lucifer, Bishop of Caralis (Cagliari) in Sardinia, who in the year 362 separated from the Church, on the ground that Arian bishops and clergy, on their return to the Church, ought to be admitted only to lay communion, and that the Church which receives them into the clerisy is contaminated, and her communion to be avoided.

Lucifer, the fellow-labourer of Athanasius, Eusebius of Vercelli, and Hilary of Poitiers, commended by Athanasius and Jerome [Apol. de Fuga. Opp. i. p. 703, ed. 1627; adv. Lucif. Opp. i. p. 169, ed. 1616], the undaunted opponent of the Arian Emperor at the Council of Milan [Hieron. de Vir. Illustr.], fell into this schism through dissatisfaction at the lenity of the Council of Alexandria, which decided that Arian bishops and clergy, on reception into the Church should retain their rank and office [Athan. Epist. ad Antioch, i. p. 374]. The divisions of the Church of Antioch at the time of this council, and the part which Lucifer took are narrated elsewhere. [MELETIAN, ANTIOCHENE.] It is frequently said that the general disapproval of the consecration of Paulinus for the Eustathians was the first cause of Lucifer's separating himself from the communion of the Catholic bishops. But Paulinus' title was recognised by the Council of Alexandria, and generally by the Western Church. The disapproval of Eusebius [Sozom. Hist. Eccl. v. 13], and of others in private, may have led to a breach of communion with them individually, but could not have outweighed the reception of Paulinus by the council. The vehemence of Lucifer's opposition to the Arians drove him into an excess of rigour in discipline, and led him to advance maxims which excommunicated the whole Church. He retired to his diocese, and for the remainder of his life continued with his followers in separation from the Church. Theodoret states that he added certain new dogmas to the doctrine of the Church [H. E. iii. 5]. But the testimonies of Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine clear him of this charge [Amb. Orat. de obitu Satyri; Jerome, adv. Lucif.; August. Hæc. lxxxi.]. His rule was that laymen coming over from the Arians were to be received by imposition of hands, with invocation of the Holy Spirit, that clerics could be received only to lay communion, and that the Church deciding otherwise was turned into a brothel. This last was a familiar word with the Luciferians, and Lucifer's known violence of language makes it probable enough that the word was his. The usual assumption of schismatics that the Church has apostatized is reproved by Jerome, "Christ did not come down solely for the Sardinian sheepskin," "Christ is too poor if he has only a church in Sardinia;" and the disciplinary maxim is controverted at length in the dialogue referred to.

From these expressions of Jerome Lardner inferred that the schism never spread very far. This is construing Jerome's words too literally. The schism found its way into Italy, Antioch, Spain, and Egypt; and a bishop of the sect was created for Rome [Marcell. et Faust. in Bibl. Patr. Lugd. v.] Hilary the Deacon, a Sardinian, who had been associated with Lucifer and Eusebius at the Council of Milan, followed Lucifer; and presently went beyond him by rebaptizing the Arians, for which Jerome calls him "Deucalion orbis" [adv. Lucif. p. 170].

About A.D. 384 the Luciferians obtained a rescript from Theodosius, to secure them from persecution, since they made no innovations in the faith. But the party came to an end rapidly. Theodoret speaks of it as extinct in his time [H. E. iii. 5].

The Church of Cagliari celebrated the feast of a Saint Lucifer on the 20th of May. Two Archbishops of Sardinia wrote for and against the sanctity of Lucifer. The Congregation of the Inquisition imposed silence on both parties, and decreed that the veneration of Lucifer should stand as it was. The Bollandists defend this decree of the Congregation, Baillet, in his Life of Lucifer (and Natalis Alexander), contending that the Lucifer in question is not the author of the schism, but another Lucifer who suffered martyrdom in the persecution of the Vandals. [Calmet, Sac. and Prof. History, lxxv. 110. Liguori, Hist. Hæres. I. iv. 3, 50. Nat. Alex. vii. 117, ed. 1787.]

LUCIFERIAN. A local name of the BEGHARDS, by which they were known in Angermünde about A.D. 1336. [Chronic. Magd. ap. Meibom. ii. 340. Mosh. de Beghard. 338.]

LUCOPETRIANS. A name given to the MESSALIANs from an alleged founder named Peter. Euthymius Zigabenus says that he set himself up as the Messiah, and promised to appear again after his death; that three days after his death his disciples were watching for his resurrection when the devil appeared to them in the form of a wolf, and that hence they named their founder in derision Λυκόπετρος, or Wolf-Peter. The principal disciple and successor of Peter is said to have been Tychicus, whom Euthymius alleges to have applied to his master all the texts in Holy Scripture which speak of the First and Third Persons of the Holy Trinity. What is the true foundation of this legend it is impossible to say. [Euthymius, Triumph. de Secta Messalian.]

LULLARDS. The name of some fraternities in Germany and the Netherlands, which were formed in the twelfth century for carrying to the grave the bodies of those who had died of the plague when no other persons were willing to perform this office of charity, and who were popularly so called from the soft funeral hymns which they sang ["lullen," "lollen," "lallen," Old German] as their mournful processions went on their way. These fraternities were known among themselves by the names of "Cellite Brothers and Sisters" or "Brothers and Sisters of St. Alexius;" the one from their houses claiming to be monastic cells, the other from their patron saint. They were also known as "die Nollbrüder," from the obsolete word "Nollen."

The Lullards appear to have been viewed with distrust at a very early date by the ecclesiastical authorities. In the year 1309 they are spoken of in the neighbourhood of Liège as "quidam hypocritæ gyrovagî, qui 'Lollardi,' sive 'Deum laudantes,' vocabantur" [Gest. Pontif. Leod. Script. ii. 350]. In 1395 the Pope Boniface IX. recalls any privileges which had been granted by himself or his predecessors to persons of either sex "vulgo Beghardi, seu 'Lullardi' et 'Zuestriones,' a seipsis 'Fratricelli' seu 'Pauperes puerili' nominati," on the ground that heresies were lurking among them. A few years afterwards [A.D. 1408] Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, complains that his province is infected with "new unprofitable doctrines, and blemished with the new damnable brand of Lollardy" [Johnson's Canons, ii. 470.]

In the year 1472 the Cellites were admitted among the exempt religious orders by Sixtus IV., and had further privileges conferred upon them in 1506 by Julius III. It is probable therefore that the name of Lullard had come to signify two different classes of persons, the original fraternities for the burial of the dead, and those who were associated with the general stream of heresy which began to flow so strongly in the Beghards and the Wickliffites in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries [Mosh. Ecc. Hist. ii. 285, Stubbs' ed.].

LUTHERANS. In the beginning of the sixteenth century the urgent need of a Reformation in the Church became universally acknowledged. Corruption tainted every order. Bishops and abbots had become more like secular princes than spiritual fathers, or had degenerated into unscrupulous statesmen, their example naturally affecting the lower orders of the clergy and the laity also. The Papacy had been polluted by the immoralities of Alexander VI., and was not raised very highly again as a religious institution by Julius II., a man in whom there was more of the soldier than the priest, or by Leo X., whose elegant tastes and refined scholarship were chequered by a scarcely disguised infidelity. In fact the revival of learning had become, in Italy at least, a revival of heathenism, and the state of morals, as revealed in Boccaccio's Decameron, was frightful in the extreme, while the wealth of nations was drained into Italy upon religious pretexts, to support the luxuriousness of the Roman Court. It was under these circumstances that Lutheranism sprang into being, and as all reform within the Church was at first refused, the Catholic Church lost a considerable part of the Teutonic and all the Scandinavian race.

Martin Luther, the son of John Luther, a refiner of metals, was born at Eisleben in Saxony, on the Eve of St. Martin's Day 1483. His childhood was passed at Mansfield, where his father had settled as chief magistrate. The Universities, first of Eisenach and then of Magdeburg, laid in him the foundations of that learning of which he afterwards made such effectual use. In 1501 he migrated to the University of Erfurt, where he took his degree. He had originally intended to devote himself to the study of civil law, but the sudden death of a friend, struck by lightning, strengthened in him those religious impressions by which he had always been to a great extent influenced. Accordingly, he entered in 1505 the monastery of Augustine Eremites at Erfurt, supposing that the life and discipline of a monk was the best aid to the practice of religion and study of theology. His religious history at this period is interesting. He used often to meditate upon the anger of God and His many judgments of sin, until at length he became possessed by an extreme dread of eternal judgment. His fears urged him on to a more diligent study of the Scriptures, with which it is said that he first became acquainted in his monastery, and at the same time the sermons of an aged monk at Erfurt on the remission of sins taught him to discriminate between a general belief in the article, such as devils might have, and the particular adaptation of it to his own needs. This led him to a more attentive study of St. Paul's Epistles, and from them he at length evolved his doctrine of justification by faith only. His principle was, believe, or rather feel, that your sins are forgiven, and they are forgiven. This faith would cover anything. He is reported to have said, "Pecca fortiter, crede fortius." Meanwhile he studied carefully the works of St. Augustine, nor did he neglect the authors who had the best repute in his day, the Schoolman Ockham, as might have been expected, being his favourite among them.

In 1508 he was summoned to the newly-founded University of Wittenberg, at the instance of John Staupitz, Provincial of the Augustinians, and Professor at Wittenberg. There his fame for philosophical and theological knowledge increased. In 1507 he had been ordained priest and celebrated his first mass. Three years later he was sent on business connected with his order to Rome, where the profligacy, the infidelity, and the irreligion that prevailed, did not help to confirm his attachment to the existing order of things. In 1512 he took his Doctor's degree, and began to give public instruction in Theology. In his lectures he based his teaching upon the Scriptures and the writings of St. Augustine, rather than upon the Schoolmen, against whom he wrote several theses.

At this time Leo X., who wanted money partly to meet his extravagances and partly to complete St. Peter's, sought to supply the want by issuing an extraordinary number of indulgences. These had originally been remissions or relaxations of canonical penance, but were now regarded as full pardons for every kind of sin, past, present, or to come, so that the fortunate possessor would be secure of an immediate entrance into Paradise after death. The sale of these indulgences was conducted with scarcely less decorum than that of quack medicines at a fair; one of their most scandalous vendors being Tetzl, a Dominican friar, the sub-commissary of the Elector Archbishop of Mayence, who carried on the business as a mere matter of ordinary trade, wherein the object was to gain the largest possible return. It was even said that indulgences were staked at the gaming-table. The discontent which this conduct caused impelled John of Staupitz to put forward Luther to oppose him, a task which Luther was ready enough to undertake; for some of those who had confessed to him had held forth the indulgences as a plea against the penance which he had imposed: whereupon he had refused them absolution, and so drew upon himself the angry threats of Tetzl.

Luther, having appealed in vain to the Elector Archbishop to stop the sale, first preached a sermon against the abuse, and then in the autumn of 1517 set up on the door of the Castle Church in Wittenberg ninety-five theses against indulgences, copies of which he also sent to the neighbouring bishops [Löschner, Acts of the Reformation, i. 4387]. He maintained therein that the whole life of a Christian ought to be one continued act of penance; that the papal indulgences could not go beyond the remission of canonical penance, which could be imposed on the living only; therefore, they did not affect the dead: that those who trusted in them for salvation would with their deluders perish everlastingly; that they are in fact quite distinct from the pardon of God; that contrition alone is necessary; that the truly penitent have full remission from all pains or guilt, even though they be without a written indulgence. He did not however undervalue papal absolution as a declaration of remission, but he considered it most hurtful if men got to trust in it, or lost through it the fear of God: if the Pope possessed the power he ought to exercise it freely for the love of God, and not for the sake of money or to build a church. He also preached a sermon on indulgence and grace, in which he attacked the doctrine that satisfaction necessarily finds place in true repentance. These proceedings drew out from Tetzel a reply in the shape of counter theses, in which he was seconded by other men of learning, chiefly Dominicans, to whom Luther replied with great acrimony and zeal.

The Pope, though at first he did not trouble himself about the matter, was at length persuaded to interfere. Instead, however, of requiring Luther's presence at Rome, which had been his first intention, he deputed his Cardinal Legate Cajetan, at Augsburg, to arrange the dispute. His haughty demand of unconditional submission provoked Luther to appeal from a Pope who had been ill informed to one who should be better informed, and at length from the Pope to a General Council. About this time the Emperor Maximilian died, and during the interval before the election of a successor the government was conducted by the Vicar of the Empire, Frederick, Elector of Saxony, Luther's immediate sovereign and protector. Meanwhile the papal proceedings were suspended, and Luther had time to draw around him friends and followers, among whom the most celebrated was Schwartz, or Melancthon, a professor of Wittenberg. Leo wished to win over Frederick with a view to the imperial election, and accordingly sent his chamberlain, Charles of Miltitz, to settle affairs. By his conciliating manner he persuaded Luther to promise to keep silent, if his enemies did the same, and to profess publicly obedience to Rome. This Luther was the more easily persuaded to do as Miltitz had stopped the proceedings of Tetzel.

But a disputation at Leipsic upon free-will between Eck and Bodenstein of Carlstadt, a follower of Luther's, opened the controversy afresh, as the primacy of the Pope was dragged into the question, and Eck stigmatized his opponents as Hussites and Lutheran heretics. It was at this time that Luther began seriously to inquire into the grounds of the papal claims, and to express those doubts which afterwards led to an open rupture. After the actual conference the dispute was continued in writing, so that men's attention was once more drawn to him and his opinions. The Bohemian CALIXTINES wrote to him congratulating and encouraging him, and he was thus the more confirmed in his design to appear as a Church reformer. Frederick of Saxony proved his firm friend; Erasmus pleaded for him with the Elector Archbishop of Mayence, and supporters began to shew themselves in various parts of Germany, whereupon he issued an appeal to the Christian nobles.

A bull of excommunication was issued against Luther on July 15th, 1520. Forty-one propositions taken from his works were pronounced heretical; his writings were proscribed; he was declared excommunicate if he should not retract within sixty days, and all the princes were called upon to seize his person. The bull was received in Germany with open marks of disapprobation, and met by Luther's work De Captivitate Babylonica Ecclesiæ, in which he entirely threw over indulgences (hitherto allowed by him in a modified form), and declared the papacy to be the Kingdom of Babylon, and the power of Nimrod the mighty hunter. He requested his friends to burn his early books on each of these subjects; he maintained that there were three Sacraments, Baptism, Penance, and the Eucharist, in the last he claimed the cup for the laity, denied transubstantiation as a Thomist and papal doctrine; he declared that the elements continued true bread and true wine, but that there was in them a real Presence of Christ's true Body and true Blood; he denied the doctrine of sacrifice in the mass, and the sacrament of extreme unction. As his friends encouraged him to go on in his resistance, and demanded an impartial investigation into the point at issue, Luther was emboldened to send a fierce letter to the Pope, together with his work on Christian Liberty, in which he maintained his doctrine on justification in its most offensive form, and inveighed furiously against the vices of the papal court. At length, after having appealed to a General Council, on December 10th, 1520, he appeared in public at the eastern gate of Wittenberg, formally abjured the papal authority, and flung into a large fire which had been prepared the Bull, the Decretals, the Extravagants, and the Clementines, adding the words, "Because thou hast troubled the sanctuary of the Lord, therefore may the eternal fire torment thee." In consequence the Pope issued another bull of excommunication and interdict upon any place where he or his followers might reside, calling in also the aid of the secular arm, which the newly elected Emperor Charles V. was glad to afford.

A diet had been assembled at Worms early in 1521, to which Aleander, the papal legate, appealed, but the assembled princes were unwilling to condemn Luther at the mere instance of pope or emperor; they had also a quarrel of their own with the Pope, and drew up a list of a hundred and one grievances.

As they required that the reformer should be summoned to answer for himself, a safe conduct was granted to him, and he appeared before the diet. There he avowed his works and refused to recant, but his safe conduct was respected, and no violence was done to his person, notwithstanding the suggestions of the papal legates.

After his departure the ban of the empire was published against him and his adherents. The safe-conduct gave him protection for twenty-one days only, after which he would be exposed to the attacks of his watchful enemies; the Elector of Saxony, therefore, who had no desire to oppose directly the imperial power, devised a stratagem to secure his safety. A body of masked horsemen, disguised as brigands, seized him and carried him off to the Castle of Wartburg, where he remained for three quarters of a year in honourable captivity, concealed alike from friends and foes, being unknown even to his guards. During this interval he gave himself up to study, and commenced the translation of the Scriptures into German. This was not however the first translation of the kind, for there were no fewer than fourteen printed editions of the Bible in High and Low German between 1462 and 1518 [Walch, Biblioth. iv. 76]. He also issued various tracts against confession, masses, vows, and enforced clerical celibacy, and sent a very combative reply to Henry VIII.'s treatise on the seven sacraments.

The ban of the Empire fell with comparative harmlessness upon his followers. The Emperor was too much engaged with the French War to put it into execution; many of the princes openly favoured the Lutherans, and others were indifferent or did not care to make themselves unpopular with their subjects. It had practical force only in the personal domains of the Emperor and his brother, in Bavaria and the Duchy of Saxony, and where some of the prince bishops thought fit to enforce it. Meanwhile the Church system was overthrown at Wittenberg, and a new state of things brought in under the auspices of Carlstadt. The monks were encouraged to desert their monasteries, several priests contracted marriage, private masses were abolished, images were removed from the churches, auricular confession and the invocation of the saints were discontinued, and the cup was restored to the laity. Those clergy who still persisted in celebrating mass and chanting the hours were exposed to mob violence. Those changes alarmed Luther as being too hasty, and accordingly he wrote to the Elector to deprecate them. There was the more urgent cause to do so, for fanatics like the ANABAPTISTS began to appear, teaching the doctrine of a visible kingdom of Christ upon earth, soon to be manifested, in which rights of property should be unknown, and denying Infant Baptism. Luther, therefore, left his retreat without consulting the Elector (to whom he afterwards wrote an apology), and hastened back to Wittenberg, where the control of ecclesiastical affairs was placed in his hands. Of the changes made by Carlstadt, he confirmed some and moderated others. Private masses were abolished, the use of images and the practice of confession were restored, and the reception of the communion, under one or both kinds, was left to the discretion of the people themselves. He now [A.D. 1522] published his translation of the New Testament.

Much opposition was checked by the fact that the new Pope, Hadrian VI., was an honest, sincere, and religious man, who had a real desire to remedy the evils that he saw existing round him, and openly admitted that the whole Church required a thorough reform. That he was sincere is unquestionable, though he may have also hoped to lessen the influence of Luther, by taking the work into his own hands. As it was, he only damped the ardour of his own supporters, and drew out from the Diet of Nuremberg a more urgent demand for the redress of grievances, and a petition for a general council. But Hadrian's efforts were cut short by his death, and the accession of the most conservative of Popes, Clement VII., in 1523. Luther won over many of the Princes by his proposal to secularize the monastic and episcopal property; and about this time the Kings of Sweden and Denmark leagued together to establish Lutheranism in their own dominions. The whole of the north coast of Germany was now on his side, as were many of the free towns, and he confirmed his followers everywhere in their belief by his writings. But they had become so numerous that a closer organization was necessary. Accordingly, he prepared a revised and translated form of the mass, and arranged for the systematic management of the revenues of his communion, according to the primitive plan, by appointing definite portions for the clergy, for the schools, for the relief of the poor, for the repair of churches. At first his changes were designed for Saxony only, but they were afterwards adopted in all the countries where his doctrines prevailed. The successful spread of those doctrines was very rapid. It was in vain that the papal legates demanded from one diet after another the execution of the decree of Worms against him and his followers, and that the Emperor confirmed the request by his rescript. They were met with demands for the redress of grievances and the convocation of a general council. It was indeed proposed that a diet to be summoned at Spire should arrange matters, but meanwhile the Lutherans were left practically in peace.

In 1524, Luther threw off the monastic dress which he had up to this time retained. The same year witnessed his quarrel with Erasmus, who had hitherto been able to occupy a middle position, and though he was strongly in favour of reform, would not renounce communion with Rome. This was a position that Luther could neither endure nor understand, and the admirers of each were constantly urging on their chiefs to break with the other as a time-server or a heretic. Luther's violence, and a request from Henry of England, provoked Erasmus to publish his work on Free Will, in which he opposed, though with moderation, the Augustinian opinions that Luther had adopted. Luther rejoined in a treatise on the Slavery of the Will, which was in part an intemperate answer to Erasmus, and in part a personal attack upon him. To this Erasmus replied in his Hyperaspistes [A.D. 1526], and then threw himself entirely into the arms of the party opposed to Luther.

This was followed by the controversy with Zwingli on the Eucharist. Luther ever held firmly to the belief in the Real Presence ("Objective" as we should now term it), although he was not always consistent with himself in his manner of explaining it. Carlstadt had effected at Orlamund what he considered a more thorough reformation. He disallowed the use of images entirely, and in his views on the Eucharist dissented from his old master. But Luther proved too strong for him, and being obliged to retire to Basle, he was at length reduced to such narrow circumstances that he gave way and returned to Saxony. Zwingli had adopted Carlstadt's theory that the Eucharist is a mere memorial rite, and defended it in several works, and as it thus began to prevail in Southern Germany as well as in Switzerland, Luther again plunged into the conflict. A conference held between him and Zwingli, at Marburg, in A.D. 1529, at the instance of Philip Landgrave of Hesse, ended in a final separation. Luther has been censured for his conduct on this occasion, and, no doubt, he did carry on the controversy with all the violence natural to his character, but no permanent union could be expected between an earnest believer in the Real Presence and a dogmatic denier of it. Another blow fell upon him through the insurrection of the Anabaptists, for although Luther had ascribed their principles to the inspiration of the Devil, and encouraged the Princes to wield the temporal sword that God had entrusted to them against the fanatics, many supposed that they were only carrying out Luther's own principles to their extreme, and thus his cause was not a little damaged.

In 1525, Luther, a professed monk, married a nun, Catherine Bora, a lady of high rank. His friends greatly blamed him for this act, concerning which he himself had misgivings at times. Both parties concerned were under a vow of celibacy, and whatever may be thought of the expediency of such vows, few would deny, that having been taken, a religious reformer ought to have self-command enough to keep them, and to be above suspicion in his own conduct.

In spite of these drawbacks, Luther's sect rapidly extended itself. Besides the Elector of Saxony, he had the Landgrave of Hesse, the Dukes of Mecklenburg, Pomerania, and Zell, among his followers, together with many free cities of the Empire. The Grand Master of the Teutonic Order and Margrave of Brandenburg broke through his vows, secularized Eastern Prussia, the possession of his order, added it to Brandenburg, and so founded in sacrilege what afterwards became the Kingdom of Prussia. Associations for defence were formed by the Princes of both sides, by the Catholics in the League of Ratisbon, by the Lutherans in that of Torgau.

The Diet of Spire, in 1526, allowed freedom and toleration to the Lutherans until a General Council should be assembled; but the Council was delayed owing to the wars of the Emperor with France and Italy, and the intrigues of the Pope. Three years later, in a second Diet at Spire, the tolerant decrees of the first Diet were virtually repealed by the following enactments:—

[1.] That where the Edict of Worms had been executed it should be still observed.

[2.] That no further innovations should be made by the Lutherans.

[3.] That the Mass should be re-established in all places where it had been abolished, and that the Catholic subjects of Lutheran Princes should enjoy complete toleration.

[4.] No new doctrines were to be preached, or any contrary to the interpretation of the Church.

[5.] There were to be no new hostilities under pretence of religion.

[6.] The Zwinglians and Anabaptists were to be proscribed.

The Lutheran Princes published a protest against this Edict, and so won for themselves the name of "Protestants." In this protest they declared,—

[1.] That the unanimous decision of one Diet ought not to be rescinded by a mere majority in another.

[2.] That their consciences would not allow them to restore the Mass among their subjects, i.e. the Catholic minority, or allow two forms of administering the Communion in one place.

[3.] They objected to clause 4, the question being, What is the true Church?

[4.] They held to Scripture as the sole infallible rule of life, to be interpreted by itself alone, and not by tradition; they would not allow anything to be taught within their dominions except Scripture.

[5.] They consented to proscribe the Anabaptists, but desired to exempt from persecution the Zwinglians. [Coxe, House of Austria, c. xxviii. sub fin.]

This protest was signed by the Elector of Saxony, the Margrave of Brandenburg Anspach, the Landgrave of Hesse, the Duke of Brunswick and his brother, the Prince of Anhalt, with the representatives of the imperial cities, Strasburg, Nuremberg, Ulm, Constance, and ten others of less note; to which shortly afterwards were added Augsburg, Frankfort, Hanover, Hamburg, and others. The protest was sent to the Emperor, who received it with marks of severe displeasure, and arrested the deputies who had been appointed to convey it; but he was shortly afterwards induced to act with more moderation, and summon a Diet to meet at Augsburg. Here the Protestants, who were still labouring under the stigma of a connection with the Anabaptists, put forth the Confession of Faith known as the Confession of Augsburg, which has become one of the authorized formularies of the Lutheran communion. It had been drawn up by Luther, but was revised and somewhat softened down by Melancthon. It contains twenty-eight articles, of which twenty-one are affirmative and declaratory of doctrine, and seven polemical, against Roman doctrine or practice. The Emperor received the Confession with coldness, and forbade its publication. Fruitless discussions followed, but the divisions of the Catholics proved the safeguard of the Protestants, some advocating extreme measures, while others, headed by the Elector Archbishop of Mentz, recommended conciliation. Finally a decree was passed ordering the re-establishment of all suppressed doctrines and practices, the enforcement of clerical celibacy, and the restoration of all the plundered Church property. But no practical result followed, for all parties were looking forward to the meeting of a General Council, which, however, the Pope still contrived to delay. But the election in 1531 of the Emperor's brother, Ferdinand of Austria, King of Hungary and Bohemia, to be King of the Romans, alarmed the Protestant Princes, who at Smalkald formed a league for the protection of their religion and liberty. The history of this League, with its first transient success and final disastrous failure, forms part of the history of the Holy Roman Empire, and not of the Lutherans. A civil war followed, and the result was that the Protestants were entirely foiled on every side. Hermann, the reforming Elector Archbishop of Cologne, was deposed, the Margrave of Brandenburg and the Duke of Saxony were won over by Charles to desert their party, other Princes were compelled to submit, and the two great champions of the Protestant cause, the Elector of Saxony, the son of Luther's old friend, and the Landgrave of Hesse, were made prisoners. Charles was everywhere triumphant. Wittenberg itself fell into his hands, but he used his victory with moderation, allowing the Protestants to continue in peace.

The remainder of Luther's life was uneventful; but he was fully occupied in writing, and in superintending the communities which were called by his name, living in security at Wittenberg, where he could defy alike the thunders of the Vatican and the menaces of the Emperor. Death carried him off before the triumph of Charles and the fall of Wittenberg, which probably would have been followed by more severe measures against him. He died shortly after the first meeting of the Council of Trent, in 1546, at his native place, Eisleben, whither he had been summoned by the Count of Mansfeldt to settle by his local knowledge a dispute that had arisen about boundaries. He was buried at Wittenberg with great pomp.

Luther's extraordinary strength of character is shewn by the great Revolution which owes its origin, its course, and its final triumph to him. Nothing but a strong self-will would have enabled him to withstand the powers alike of the Pope and the Emperor, but it often hurried him into too great violence in his controversies with his opponents. For the Pope, as might be expected, he had no consideration; but in his disputes with Henry VIII. and Duke George of Saxony, he displayed a violence of temper which only injured his cause. His final breach with Zwingli was unavoidable; but the controversy with Erasmus was carried on by him with an unbecoming heat, which only alienated and sent into the arms of the opposite party one who had strong yearnings after reform.

The other great defect of Luther's character was his subjectiveness. He had himself gone through a certain spiritual course, by which he had been brought from sorrow and despondency to find peace; and, like Wesley, he supposed that every one else must experience the same, or else forfeit his claim to be considered a child of light. In a similar spirit he rejected the Epistle of St. James and the Apocalypse from the Canon, because they did not accommodate themselves to his judgment, or rather his theory, and thus he laid the foundation of that Rationalism which afterwards prevailed so extensively in Germany. He claimed for himself to throw off Church authority, but it was that he might set up an authority of his own, and he would not allow to Erasmus, to Carlstadt, to Zwingli, or to the Anabaptists the right of differing from him.

The history of Lutheranism after the death of Luther may be shortly told.

When Charles had destroyed the power of the League he contented himself with asserting his political supremacy over the Protestant Princes, and did not interfere with their religious principles. His desire was to effect a comprehension through the Council of Trent, which was then commencing its sittings. Of the history of the Council it is not the place to speak, save that at the critical moment, the Pope, for his private ends, baffled the Emperor's design, by suspending its sittings. Thus disappointed, Charles drew up twenty-six articles of compromise, known as the Interim, which he submitted to both parties. It was to hold good only until the Council had given judgment on the disputed points, whence it derived its name. For the most part it allowed matters to remain for the time as they were, and was therefore gladly accepted by the moderate Lutherans, although the more rigid, particularly those in the imperial cities, still held aloof, until they were reduced by force of arms. But these victories lessened the Emperor's authority, by kindling the jealousies of Catholic and Protestant Princes alike; and Maurice, the new Elector of Saxony, by whose aid he had won most of his power, was still a zealous Protestant, although ambition had hitherto got the better of his religious principles. Maurice now felt alarm for the existence of his party, and accordingly began to intrigue against the Emperor, until seizing a favourable opportunity, when the attention of the latter was drawn off to the Council of Trent, he again raised the standard of civil war. His professed object was to protect the liberties of the Empire, to maintain the Protestant religion, and to liberate the Landgrave of Hesse, whom Charles had long detained in unjust captivity. In the war that followed, the ascendancy of the Protestant party was once more established, and Charles himself narrowly escaped being made prisoner. His ill success, the advance of the Turks into Hungary, and the mediation of his brother Ferdinand, the King of the Romans, at length induced him to consent to the treaty of Passau, 1552. The Landgrave was set at liberty, and the Lutherans were placed on an equal footing with the Catholics of the Empire until a diet could meet which should settle all religious and civil difficulties. But Albert of Brandenburg refused to be bound by the treaty, and carried on a war of plunder with the Catholic Princes, until the ban of the Empire having been published against him, he was driven into exile, and his dominions were granted to his nephew, the Margrave of Anspach.

The long expected diet met at Augsburg in 1555, under Ferdinand King of the Romans, who used all his influence to effect a reconciliation between the contending parties. The result was an act of perpetual peace and toleration for all who adhered to the Confession of Augsburg. Henceforth Lutheranism became the established religion of North Germany, and was placed on an equal footing with the Church in the imperial government. The only remaining point of dispute concerned the ecclesiastical fiefs. Ferdinand decreed that toleration should be granted to subjects, but that the change of religion in any prelate should ipso facto vacate his benefice. This decision was disputed in later times, but the question was finally settled after the Thirty Years' War, when the treaty of Passau was again confirmed.

To return now to the internal history of Luther's communion. His place was at first filled by Melancthon, but he was too gentle to maintain Luther's pre-eminence, and henceforth the cause won no more triumphs, but rather retrogressed, first before the reformations effected in the Church by the Council of Trent, and then before Calvinism. The causes for this are easy to see. The chief cause was the fearful spread of immorality among Luther's followers, arising from his doctrine of justification: an evil which was acknowledged alike by friend and foe. There were first the Antinomians, who appeared before Luther's death under Agricola. He maintained that the Gospel only should be taught in the Churches to the exclusion of the Law; but his disciples claimed the right to sin as much as they pleased if only they held to Christ. Even among the Lutherans Nicholas Amsdorf declared that good works were pernicious to salvation, and many others, without going so far, were indifferent about Christian holiness. The preachers in their sermons confined themselves more and more to polemics, or to dry points of philosophical theology, to the loss of spiritual religion. And though learning flourished, Erastianism swallowed up zeal and piety.

The later history of the Lutherans resolves itself into two chapters, their controversies among themselves, and their efforts to bring about union with the Calvinists.

The first controversy was that of the Adiaphora, or things indifferent, arising from the Interim. This decree proved distasteful to both Catholics and Protestants; and Melancthon, when called upon to give his opinion on the matter, declared that while it could not be accepted as a whole, submission would prove the best course in things indifferent, such as concerning the exact number of the Sacraments, many rites and ceremonies, particularly chanting, unction, &c. This decision gave rise to a fierce controversy. The rigid Lutherans branded the accepters of the Interim as ADIA-PHORISTS, and alleged that Melancthon was defective on the doctrine of Justification, because he maintained the necessity of good works. The controversy was put an end to by the Formula of Concord, and in the interval was thrown into the background by the Synergistic dispute.

The SYNERGISTS declared that man co-operates with God in the work of salvation. On this point also Melancthon sided with them in opposition to the rigid Lutherans, who were headed by Flacius of Saxe-Weimar, Professor of Divinity at Jena. His intemperate zeal threatened to cause a schism between the Lutherans of Saxony and of Saxe-Weimar, which was prevented only by the interference of the Princes. Many other disputes broke out and sectarian divisions arose, and their result was seriously to impede the progress of Lutheranism. At length, at the instance of the Elector of Saxony and the Duke of Saxe-Weimar, who saw and lamented the evils of division, a body of moderate men was appointed to draw up a Formula of Concord, which might be accepted by the whole Lutheran body. Difficult although this undertaking was, it proved successful beyond anticipation. The Form was produced at a conference at Torgau in 1576. It was examined and corrected by a large number of Lutheran Doctors, was submitted to the consideration of the Princes, was at last brought forward before a general assembly of divines that met at Magdeburg, and was adopted by them as an authoritative exponent of Lutheran doctrine against Calvinists on the one hand, and Lutheran innovators on the other.

The next important controversy was that of the SYNETICISTS, commenced by George Calixtus in the following century. His aim was to induce the Lutheran and Reformed (or Calvinist) communions, to which he was quite ready to add the Catholics, not indeed to unite in one body, but to abstain from mutual enmity and to join together in the bonds of brotherly love. He believed, to the scandal of many of that time, that the knowledge of the Holy Trinity is less clearly revealed in the Old Testament than in the New, that good works are necessary to salvation, and that God is accidentally (per accidens) the author of sin. This dispute was ended by the rise of Pietism. [See further, J. G. Walch's Introduction to the Controversies in the Lutheran Church.]

PIETISM was an attempt to lessen the profligacy, want of discipline, and the general disorders which had been caused by the Thirty Years' War. It originated with Spener of Frankfort, who strove to effect a reform similar to that which Wesley afterwards had in view in England. He instituted prayer meetings, private classes for religious instruction, to be carried on side by side with the public services and exegetical teaching of Scripture. But many of his followers degenerated into wild enthusiasts, prophecy-mongers and fanatics, so that in some places laws were enacted against them, and the magistrates were compelled to suppress their meetings, owing to the commotions to which they gave occasion.

In the last century a body of men, the Herrenhütter of Lusatia, formed a distinct social and religious community under Count Zinzendorf. Many of them had originally been Lutherans, with whom they professed to agree in doctrine, though their ecclesiastical discipline was peculiar, but they actually formed a distinct sect, and as such have ever been discountenanced by the rigid Lutherans. [MORAVIANS.]

It only remains to glance at the relations between the Lutheran and the Calvinistic bodies. An attempt had been made in the sixteenth century to effect a union, but this was rendered hopeless by the Formula of Concord. It may have been in consequence of this Formula that Maurice Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel went over to the Calvinists, and displaced all the Lutheran teachers in the University of Marburg, and the ministers generally throughout his dominions. This was in 1604. The dispossessed found shelter in Hesse-Darmstadt, which has continued Lutheran.

In 1610 the Elector of Brandenburg adopted a modified Calvinism. He introduced the simpler form of worship, and embraced Calvin's views on the Person of Christ, and on the Eucharist, but rejected his teaching on Grace and the Divine decrees. He was content to hold these opinions himself, and put no restraint upon his subjects, but allowed, what was rare in those days, liberty of conscience to all. Henceforth his successors, the Electors and Kings of Prussia, have distinguished themselves by their efforts to bring about a union from time to time, as in A.D. 1631, 1662, 1736, and in 1817. The last endeavour has met with a certain amount of success. The King of Prussia in that year formed out of both communions in his dominions one Evangelical Christian Church; the names alike of Protestant and Reformed being abolished. In A.D. 1822 a new Liturgy was drawn up and accepted by 7750 out of 8950 congregations; the opposition coming partly from Berlin, where a protest was made by the magistrates and twelve ministers, and partly from Silesia. The old Lutherans, as they were called, were for some time subjected to persecution, particularly in Silesia, where troops were quartered upon them to bring them into submission, and numbers of them fled to America, but they are now recognised by the law. [UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH.]

While the Lutheran and Reformed bodies exist side by side in many parts of Germany, it may be said generally that the greater part of North Germany, Hanover, Saxony, Hesse-Darmstadt, and Saxe-Coburg, and, in the south, Wurtemberg, are Lutherans; whereas in Hesse-Cassel, Baden, and Anhalt, Calvinism prevails. The Scandinavian kingdoms are rigidly Lutheran, and there an Episcopal form of Church Government and some ancient Catholic customs have been retained. [SWEDISH PROTESTANTS.]

Latterly, Lutheranism has spread widely in America owing to the German immigration. Its adherents are, however, very much divided, especially on questions connected with ceremonial worship. On the one hand are the "Old Lutherans," who used many ancient liturgical customs, such as altar crucifixes and altar lights; on the other are the "New," or "Reformed Lutherans," who discourage the use of liturgies and liturgical customs, and adopt the American fanaticism of "revivals." MAHOMETANS. The followers of Mahomet [A.D. 571-632], who began to propagate his new faith in Arabia, his native country, about A.D. 611. The name given by the founder to his religion and adopted by its professors, is "Islam," the meaning of which is said by some to be "to make peace, obtain unanimity," especially by submission—hence "to surrender," and in a religious sense, "to submit wholly to God, and acknowledge him only as Lord;"—but by others, to be "to seek righteousness with all one's strength."

I. PERSONAL HISTORY OF MAHOMET. Mahomet, or, as the word is more correctly written, Mohammed, Mohammad, or Muhammad ("the praised" or "the desired"), was born at Mecca, April 20th, A.D. 571.¹ It seems that he was named Kotham, and that he adopted the title Mohammed, about the time of the Hegira, to apply to himself some Old Testament Messianic prophecies [Hagg. ii. 8; Cant. v. 16]. He was the only son of Abdallah and Amina, of the noble but impoverished family of Hashim, of the tribe of Koreish. His father died two months before his birth, and his mother when he was six years old; his grandfather, and, on his death in two years, his uncle Abu-Talib, though poor and with a large family, took charge of him, and treated him kindly. As a boy he earned his living as a shepherd, an occupation much despised by Arabs, but little is known with certainty of his early life. In his twenty-fourth year he entered the service of Khadijah, a rich and clever widow, thirty-eight years old, whom he subsequently married, and by whom he had two sons, who died young, and four daughters. We learn nothing further of him till he came before the world as a religious reformer.

Arabia was at this time ripe for a moral and religious reformation. Christianity had been early introduced [Gal. i. 17], but was only slightly diffused, chiefly in the petty kingdoms on the borders of Syria, in Irak, and in some desert oases. Orthodoxy was rare; persecution had from early times driven into the Peninsula heretics of all kinds and shades. Judaizing Christians—Ebionites, Nazareans, MENDÆANS,—were most numerous. From these, especially the Mendæans, Mahomet seems to have borrowed his Christology and several ritual and devotional practices; his early converts being indeed sometimes called Sabians in the traditions. Judaism was more widely extended and powerful. Several Jewish communities were scattered over the country, and Jewish ideas, owing to the high intellectual culture of the Jews, were widely spread among the heathen, seeming to have tainted Arabic Christianity also. Magianism [PARSEES] had a few adherents, chiefly on the borders of Persia. But idolatry prevailed over the greater part of Arabia. One personal God (Allah) and Creator was acknowledged, but he was too far above man to care for him; hence various deities, who usurped most of his honour, were set beside him, especially several goddesses, daughters of, and mediators with Allah. Worship was paid to the host of heaven, to fetishes, symbols of higher powers, to stones and trees. Each tribe had its own deity, priesthood, and temple, but the centre of worship for all was the Kaaba or holy house of Mecca, with its numerous idols, said to be 360, whither the Arabs yearly went on pilgrimage. Belief in evil spirits (Jinn), by whom soothsayers and oracles were inspired, and in angels, was universal; some tribes had a vague belief in a resurrection. Their moral condition was of the lowest. They practised polygamy, with unlimited liberty of divorce; marriage was allowed to near relations; widespread profligacy prevailed among both sexes. They were passionately fond of wine, gambling, and marauding, were very revengeful, and had a horrible custom of burying their infant daughters alive. On the other hand, they were, as at the present day, brave, generous, hospitable, high-spirited and eloquent. On the borders small kingdoms had been established, the kings of which were vassals to the Byzantines, to the Persians, or to the Abyssinians; but the greater part of the Arabs, whether settled in towns or nomads, were divided into numerous tribes, each with its own chief, which were perpetually at war with each other.

From among these profligate idolaters, just before, and during, Mahomet's youth, had arisen a number of inquirers, who, probably influenced indirectly by Jewish and Christian ideas, were seeking a higher faith. These had cast off idolatry, with the superstitions and cruelties which it involved, and professed to teach the religion of Abraham, having sacred books of their own and calling themselves Hanifs, i.e. "Puritans." Four of them were relations of Mahomet; with one of whom, Waraka, his wife's cousin, he was very intimate. He at first called himself a Hanif, adopting their teaching and often their words.

As regards the rest of the world, it will suffice to give these historical landmarks. Mahomet's appearance as a prophet nearly coincided with the foundation of Westminster Abbey; Boniface IV. had recently attained the Papacy; the Saxons and other tribes of Northern Germany were adopting Christianity. France was slumbering under the Merovingians; the Eastern Empire was being ravaged by the Persians and Avars, but Heraclius, who had just [A.D. 610] ascended the throne, was preparing for his victorious campaigns. [For the pre-Islamic state of Arabia, see Pocock, Spec. Hist. Arab. 1-7, 33, 173; Sale, *P. When Mahomet was about forty years old, he began, under the influences above described, to doubt the truth of idolatry, to ponder in solitude, among the valleys and rocks near Mecca, on the Unity of God, immortality, judgment to come. After a severe mental struggle, amounting at times almost to insanity, accompanied with epileptic fits (to which he had been subject in childhood), horrible dreams and hallucinations, he imagined, that as he slept in a cave in Mount Hira, an angel, who afterwards declared himself to be Gabriel, appeared to him, and, calling him thrice, bade him "cry." Mahomet answered, "What shall I cry?" whereon the angel delivered to him a message from God, the first revelation [Kor. xcvi. 1-5; cf. Isaiah xxix. 11; xl. 6]. No further revelations came for some time.¹ Mahomet's mental distress returned; he thought himself possessed by devils, and was only prevented from suicide by a second appearance of the angel, followed by a violent fit, on recovery from which he received a second revelation, bidding him "arise and preach" [Kor. lxxiv. 1, seq.]. From that time to his death the revelations were constant, sometimes coming quietly, but generally accompanied by horrible fits, after which he was conscious of God's message to him. Such is the traditional account of Mahomet's call, and it is important as throwing light on his belief in himself.

Mahomet's mission was at once acknowledged by his own household—his wife, the confidante of his doubts; Ali, his cousin, who was however only seven years old; and Zeid, his freedman and adopted son, who had been a Christian. Others soon joined him; some being persons of position, as Abu-Bekr, and Othman, afterwards caliphs, and several slaves. At first he and his converts suffered only from derision, and there was a general feeling in his favour. But when, after about two years, he proceeded publicly to attack idolatry, violent persecutions arose; he was compelled to teach only in private, in the house of a follower named Arkam; he himself had to endure insult and violence; his poorer followers were tortured, many of them recanted, and others fled to Abyssinia [A.D. 616]. The fugitives however returned in a few months, on a rumour that a reconciliation had taken place between the prophet and his persecutors. The truth was, that Mahomet's faith in his mission had for a time given way, and he acknowledged idols as intercessors with God. But finding his converts much scandalized [Kor. liii. 34], and himself despised, he retracted his concession, declaring that the devil had misled him [Kor. xvii. 74, 75, xxii. 51]. Persecution therefore was renewed; but indignation at his treatment led to the conversion of his uncle, Hamza, and soon after the valiant and energetic Omar, hitherto a bitter persecutor, joined him. This caused a great increase in the ranks of the Moslems, who now ventured publicly to proclaim their faith. Plots were then formed against Mahomet's life, and when the family of Hashim, headed by Abu-Talib, declared that they would avenge his death, the rest of the Koreishites formed a league against them, put them under a ban, forced them to retire in a body to their own quarter of Mecca (the "Shih"), and there blockaded them [A.D. 617]. About the same time² some Moslems again took refuge in Abyssinia, where the Christian King (Najashi) protected them. Others afterwards joined these, and few of them rejoined Mahomet till after the Hegira. The Hashimites suffered much from privation, but after two (perhaps three) years [A.D. 619 or 620], dissensions arose among the confederates, the league was broken up, and the ban removed. Soon after this event Mahomet lost his wife, and his uncle and protector, Abu-Talib. In a few weeks he married a second wife, and was betrothed to a third, thus adopting polygamy. For a time, another uncle, Abu-Lahab, subsequently his bitterest foe, protected Mahomet; but withdrew this protection in disgust at his teaching that all their heathen forefathers were in hell. Mahomet then attempted to gain converts at Tayif, three days' journey from Mecca, but after a short stay was driven out with insult and violence. On his road back to Mecca, he imagined that a company of Jinn were converted by hearing him recite the Koran [Kor. xli. 29 seq., lxxii. 1 seq.]. By preaching at fairs, to caravans of pilgrims, and wherever numbers of people were collected, Mahomet had during some years won adherents in different parts of Arabia, especially at Yathrib, afterwards called Medina—an abbreviation of Medinat-an-Nabi, "the city of the Prophet." At two successive pilgrimages deputies from that city had secret interviews with the Prophet in a valley near Mecca; they promised to propagate Islam by every means in their power, gentle or forcible, and to receive and protect the Prophet if he were compelled to leave Mecca. On discovering this, the Koreishites resolved that Mahomet should be murdered, and he was nearly surprised, only escaping by the devotion of Ali. Accompanied by Abu-Bekr, he fled from Mecca, and they took refuge from pursuit in a cave, before which, say the traditions, a spider wove its web, a pigeon laid two eggs in its nest, and a tree grew up, to testify to its solitude. After three days they reached Medina, whither Mahomet's chief followers had already betaken themselves, and the Prophet entered the city in triumphal procession. This event is the Hegira or flight; it took place in A.D. 622, in the summer or early autumn.

The Hegira marks an epoch in Mahomet's life. Islam and its founder henceforth have their place in the history of the world. Hitherto the Prophet had had no field for action; he had been the man of thought and speech, the persecuted preacher of a Monotheism which looked to himself as its prophet. Henceforth he was the man of action. Accordingly, he soon became Prince as well as Prophet; he formed the design of spreading his faith and rule first over Arabia, then over the world. His revelations underwent a corresponding change. Hitherto they had consisted of doctrinal and moral precepts; threats of a judgment on the wicked, promises of bliss for the good, accounts of God's dealings with the men of old. Their style is earnest, poetic, full of fire, and often very striking. Now they assumed a more prosaic tone: they concern passing events, contain laws, political and social, and military directions, not unlike the "general orders" of an army,¹ justifications of Mahomet's acts, public and even private, such as his dealings with his wives. The morality of the Koran also deteriorates; polygamy is formally sanctioned; the liberty of divorce is extended; force takes the place of persuasion. We see at the same time a very marked declension in Mahomet's character; he gradually gives himself up to the gratification of his passions, and produces revelations which allow to himself that which he forbids to others; he becomes treacherous, vindictive, cruel, countenancing and ordering assassination of his enemies, wholesale massacre of his prisoners. Nevertheless, such were his attractive qualities and his force of will, that he retained and increased to the last the devotion of the great body of his followers.

The Prophet's first care was the organization of the believers. Forms and times of worship and practical observances (fasting and alms), were definitely settled; a mosque was built, with houses adjoining for Mahomet and his wives, the number of whom was constantly increasing. To prevent jealousy between the two classes of his followers, the Muhajerin, or "refugees," from Mecca, and the Ansares, or "helpers," of Medina, he formed them into a brotherhood by pairs, one of each party. He soon acquired such power in the city, that even those who disbelieved him were compelled to dissemble, but yet took every opportunity of thwarting him. These are often mentioned in the Koran as "the hypocrites" [ii. 9-19, xxxiii. 12, 47, lvii. 13], and gave Mahomet much trouble. The Prophet tried to win over the Jews also, having already adopted many of their ceremonies and institutions. He made a few converts, but the great body repelled his overtures, and became his bitter opponents. Mahomet thereupon altered most of the observances intended to gain them, and, as soon as he was strong enough, attacked, and either exterminated them or expelled them from their lands with circumstances of great cruelty and treachery.

The next six years of his life [A.D. 622-628] were passed in almost constant fighting, which began with attacks on Meccan caravans, but soon developed into regular warfare. The first pitched battle, at Badr [A.D. 624], was a great victory to Mahomet, which he ascribed to angelic aid [Kor. iii. 120, seq., viii. 9, 10]. But in the battle of Ohod [A.D. 625] the Moslems were completely defeated, and Mahomet himself was severely wounded. For a time his influence was much weakened, but his undaunted spirit and self-confidence soon regained their sway. At length the Koreishites and their allies, in alarm at Mahomet's growing power, with 10,000 men besieged Medina, which was fortified against them [A.D. 627]. The Moslems defended themselves vigorously for fifteen days; dissensions, fomented by emissaries of the Prophet, broke out in the enemy's camp, and they retired discomfited. Henceforth Mahomet had little to fear from his enemies. He had adopted the policy of conquering and converting Arabia in detail, and encouraged by his successes, he marched with a great force on Mecca [A.D. 628], under pretext of performing pilgrimage. The Koreishites opposed him in formidable numbers, and, after some negotiations a truce for ten years was concluded at Hodeibia, close to Mecca, one condition being that the Moslem pilgrimage should be postponed till the next year. This caused great discontent, which Mahomet tried to appease by calling the truce a victory [Kor. xlviii. 1, seq.]. Soon after, a Jewess, whose relations had been slain in battle with the Moslems, set some poisoned meat before the Prophet; one of his companions died, and Mahomet himself, who only tasted a morsel, felt the effect to the day of his death. The next year [A.D. 629] he made the pilgrimage to Mecca, and many of his chief enemies in that city came over to him. But his forces shortly after suffered a severe defeat at Muta in Syria, in their first encounter with the Empire, on which the Koreishites broke the truce. Mahomet, with 10,000 men, marched on Mecca, which submitted with little resistance [A.D. 630]. The Prophet entered the city, went at once to the Kaaba, and with the words, "Truth is come, let lies depart," ordered all the idols to be broken before his eyes. With wise magnanimity he spared even his bitterest opponents; and, if they embraced his faith, loaded them with honours and wealth. From Mecca he sent expeditions against the neighbouring tribes, and destroyed their idols. The next year, called the year of deputations, was marked by the submission of almost all the Arabic tribes. Henceforth the policy of intolerance and exclusiveness was proclaimed in all its rigour. Idolaters were forbidden to set foot in the Holy City of Mecca; they were to be destroyed whenever and wherever they were found. To Jews, Christians, Sabians, Magians ("The people of the Book"), was offered only the alternative, "the Koran, tribute, or the sword" [Kor. ix. 1-7, 29-35]. After the conquest of Mecca, Mahomet returned to Medina, his refuge in distress and poverty, where, notwithstanding his immense power, he continued to live the same ostentatiously simple life as before, mending his own clothes, and milking his own goats. In 631 he led another expedition against the empire, which, partly through the faint-heartedness of some of his followers, partly from the privations of the long march, effected only the conversion of some border tribes. Mahomet was now past sixty years of age; his health was broken by fatigues, mental and bodily, by the effects of his malady, his licentiousness, and the poison which had been administered to him. The last year of his life was troubled by pretenders, who, aware of his feeble health, hoped to seize his power. These, however, with the exception of Moseilama of Yemama, the most formidable, were crushed before his death. Mahomet, feeling his end approaching, made the pilgrimage to Mecca, which was conducted with unexampled splendour, in the spring of 632. Soon after his return to Medina he was attacked by a fever, and died after an illness of fourteen days on June 8th, 632. He was buried in the house of his wife Ayesha, and almost on the spot where he had died. One daughter, Fatima, married to her cousin Ali, survived him. After Khadijah's death he had sixteen wives and several concubines, but only one son was born to him, who died an infant. [For his person and habits, see Gagner's Abul feda, chaps. 65 and 66; Weil, 339-348; Irving, ch. 29; C. de Perceval, iii. 332-337; Sprenger (English), 84-94; Muir, ii. 28-31, iv. 302, seq.; Quart. Rev. cxxvii. 301-304.]

The Mahometan biographers ascribe an immense number of miracles to their Prophet; but in this they contradict many passages of the Koran [vi. 32-37, 109, 124; vii. 92-98, &c.], from which it is plain that Mahomet, when appealed to, as he often was, for a miracle, referred his objectors to the Koran itself as a proof of his mission, and declares that even if a miracle were granted them they would not believe. The only wonder hinted at in the Koran is the journey to Jerusalem and the seventh heaven in one night, which was pretended, or was dreamt, to have taken place just before the Hegira. [Kor. xvii. 1. For the traditional account of this journey, see Irving, Life of Mahomet, chap. xii.; Taylor, Hist. Mohammedanism, 367-379.]

It is difficult to decide how far Mahomet was sincere in his claim to be God's messenger, and to what extent he was a conscious deceiver. The theory that he was an impostor of the type of Joseph

Smith [MORMONS] is in contradiction with his whole life and with the character of his system, as a real advance, religious and moral, upon Arabian heathenism. On the other hand his gross immorality in his dealings with his wives, his breaches of faith, such as the making war in the holy months, and the revelations published to sanction these crimes, his publishing as divine inspirations to himself legends which he had learnt from Jews and others, the opportuneness of so many revelations to suit his own wishes and plans, make it impossible to acquit him of imposture. The probable explanation is, that his earnestness and belief in his mission led him, as it has led many others, to look upon all his impulses, desires, and excuses, as coming from divine prompting [Möhler, Ueber das Verhältniss, &c., i. 368-370]. The nature of those impulses, especially towards the end of Mahomet's life, and the character and history of his religion as the greatest foe of Christianity, make it probable also that he was a special instrument in the hands of Satan [Muir, ii. 60, seq.].

HISTORY OF MAHOMETANISM. Before entering in detail into this subject, it is necessary to describe the nature of Islam as a political power. Its peculiarity is the predominance, both in idea and in fact, of the religious element. The acquisition of political power is a religious principle. The whole social and civil fabric rests on the divine law. The State, therefore, is only the religious community in its unavoidable political relations. The head of the Church is ipso facto head of the State, and that because he is head of the Chureh. Hence, in theory, Islam forms only one community, under one head: there is no room for national distinctions; every believer is a fellow countryman; only a Moslem can rule Moslems. The head of the one community is an absolute despot, epiritual and temporal, controlled only by the divine law given to Mahomet. And as Islam claims to be the universal faith of mankind, that head is the lawful lord of the world.¹ The result of this theory was the establishment for a time of the mightiest empire which the world has ever seen. That empire was dismembered, not by national revolts from a foreign rule, but by disputes as to the lawful successor of the Prophet. Hence every rebel was a heretic also; orthodoxy and loyalty were identical: theological differences produced, or were produced by, political changes. [Döllinger, Muhammad's Religion, &c., 33-36; Freeman, Lectures on the Saracens, lect. iii.]

As the Prophet had appointed no successor, on his death there was much disputing, and some danger of a schism. Finally, Abu-Bekr, whom Mahomet had seemed on several occasions to point out for the office, was generally accepted. He took the title of Caliph (properly Khalif, "Successor"). On the news of Mahomet's death, almost all Arabia revolted, but after a short and bloody struggle was finally subdued. Abu-Bekr [A.D. 632-634] bequeathed his office to Omar [634-644], who named six of Mahomet's companions to appoint his successor. They, passing over Ali, appointed Othman [A.D. 644-656], under whom the primitive simplicity of his predecessors began to be exchanged for luxury and corruption. He was murdered in the mosque at Medina, having provoked a rebellion by his partiality and injustice. Ali [A.D. 656-661] succeeded him; but, encouraged by his unpopularity, Moawiyah, son of Abu-Sophian, of the family of the Ommiads, claimed the caliphate, and in a campaign against him Ali was murdered. His weak and gentle son, Hassan, was in six months compelled to resign in favour of Moawiyah [A.D. 661-680], who removed the seat of power to Damascus, and made the caliphate hereditary. On his death, many Moslems refused to acknowledge his son Yezid, advocating the claims of Ali's family: hence arose the sect of the Shiites. Hosein, son of Ali, grandson of the Prophet, tried to raise a rebellion, but was defeated and slain on the plain of Kerbela [A.D. 680]. Several civil wars followed, during which the holy cities of Mecca and Medina were twice stormed, and the Kaaba was much damaged. Under the Ommiads the caliphate became little more than an ordinary Eastern despotism.

In A.D. 750, after a fierce war, the caliphate was transferred to the Abbasides, descendants of Mahomet's uncle Abbas, whereon the now vast empire began to be dismembered. Abderrahman, an Ommiad, established a caliphate in Spain [A.D. 755-1030]. Different dynasties, nominally subject to the caliph, really independent, occupied outlying provinces—the Aglabites, in Tripoli and Tunis [A.D. 800], the Edrisites, in the west of Barbary [A.D. 808], the Taherites, in Khorassan [A.D. 820], and others. A third (the Fatimite) caliphate was established in Egypt [A.D. 908-1168] by Mohammad-al-Merdi, who professed to be descended from the Prophet. One of this line, Al-Hakim [A.D. 996-1020], claimed divine honours as an emanation of the Deity, and is still worshipped by the Druses. The name of Al-Mostanser was [A.D. 1055], by order of the Emir-al-Omra, substituted for that of the Abbaside caliph in the prayers of the mosques in Bagdad. Against Mustali, who had captured Jerusalem [A.D. 1096], the first crusade was directed. The Fatimites were finally [A.D. 1168] overthrown by Saladin. The rival caliphs were constantly at war, and did not scruple to use the aid of infidels against each other. In 762 the Abbaside Al-Mansor removed the seat of the caliphate to Bagdad. The Abbaside caliphs were great patrons of science and literature, but by their luxury and extravagance hastened the decline of the caliphate. In the middle of the ninth century, the Caliph Al-Motassem formed a bodyguard of Turkish slaves, who soon were able to dispose of the throne at will among the Abbaside family. From this time the caliphs of Bagdad, though venerated in their spiritual capacity, had little temporal power beyond Bagdad and its neighbourhood. They became mere puppets in the hands of a new officer, the Emir-al-Omra, "Commander of Commanders." Finally [A.D. 1258], the Mongols took Bagdad and slew the last caliph, Al-Mostassem. A person claiming to be his uncle fled to Egypt, where he and his successors were recognised as spiritual powers, being found by Mahometan rulers to be useful instruments. The last of them [A.D. 1377] ceded his claims to Selim the Terrible, Sultan of the Ottomans, whose successors have since that time been regarded by orthodox Moslems as the rightful caliphs.

The detailed history of the Mahometan conquests and empire must be left to strictly historical works;¹ a brief summary will suffice. The Saracens²—so the Arabs were known to the West,—in little more than a century [A.D. 650-750], in spite of two repulses from Constantinople [A.D. 668-675 and 717-718], and the great defeat of Tours [A.D. 732], conquered Syria, Persia, and Western Asia to the Oxus, Egypt, almost all Africa and Spain. Between A.D. 750-1050, owing to the revival of the Eastern Empire, the decline of the caliphate, and internal dissensions, the Moslem arms were on the whole stationary or retrograding. Crete [A.D. 823], however, and Sicily [A.D. 827-878] were conquered, and even Rome was sacked from the sea [A.D. 846]. In Asia Mahmoud of Ghizni [A.D. 997-1028] won Transoxiana and Cabul, and introduced Islam into India. The revival of military zeal, under the Seljukian Turks [eleventh century], who took the place of the now worn-out Saracens, was checked by the Crusades [A.D. 1095-1270] in the West and the Mongol ravages in the East. At the end of the thirteenth century, Islam was at its lowest ebb, ruling only in Egypt, part of Syria, part of Hindostan, and Spain. But in 1299 the Ottoman Empire began its great career. It established itself in Europe [A.D. 1353], subdued Thraee [A.D. 1354], and the remains of the Byzantine possessions in Asia [A.D. 1390]. The defeat and capture of Bajazet by Tamerlane [A.D. 1402] scarcely checked their course. Bosnia [A.D. 1415], Wallachia [A.D. 1418], were subdued; and after several attempts Constantinople was taken by Mahomet II., and the Eastern Empire destroyed [A.D. 1453]. On the other hand the Saracens were finally expelled from Spain [A.D. 1492]. Moldavia [A.D. 1456], Servia, the Morea, Albania [A.D. 1466], the Crimea [A.D. 1475], Rhodes [A.D. 1522], most of Hungary [A.D. 1550], Croatia [A.D. 1537], Transylvania [A.D. 1552], were successively subdued. Germany was twice invaded [A.D. 1529, 1532], Italy was ravaged [A.D. 1543], and several great victories were regained at sea. From about A.D. 1550, owing to the great naval defeat at Lepanto, a wearing struggle with Persia, and internal dissensions, the Ottoman power declined; yet Cyprus [A.D. 1573], Crete [A.D. 1669], and part of Poland [A.D. 1676], were added to their dominions. In 1678 came the first struggle with Russia; and the utter rout of the Turks before Vienna [A.D. 1683], finally overthrew their military ascendancy : by the end of the century the Ottoman power was completely broken. The Turks have gradually been stripped of almost all their European provinces, and their wars have been almost wholly defensive.

The effects of the Mahometan conquests on the religion of the conquered have been very various. In Christian countries where the Moslem power has not been lasting, as in Spain, Sicily, and those parts of Eastern Europe conquered by the Turks, no trace of them is left except buildings and some popular customs and superstitions. But where their dominion has endured, as in Western Asia and Northern Africa, Christianity, once supreme, has now almost perished. This has been caused partly by individual conversions—for no Christian population, except perhaps that of Crete, has ever in a body apostatized—but mainly by the substitution of a Moslem for a Christian population. Baptism and the teaching of Christianity were forbidden; Christian women were forced into the harems of Mahometans; Christian children were forcibly brought up as Moslems; indignities, burdensome taxes, and personal duties, were imposed on Christians; from time to time violent persecutions took place. Moreover, in many countries heresy largely prevailed, which is unable to furnish any firm ground of faith. Heretics frequently invited or combined with Mahometans for the sake of overthrowing their orthodox rivals. [Egypt: Lane, ii. 276; Gibbon, vi. 332, 428. Syria and North Africa: Finlay, Byzantine Empire, i. 159. Asia Minor: ib. i. 198]. One remarkable effect of the Mahometan spirit of conquest must be noticed. As it attacked Christianity as a religion, at first defence, and subsequently reprisals on the part of the Church became a religious duty. The unwarlike spirit of the early Church entirely passed away; and in its stead appeared that military Christianity which is so conspicuous in the history of the Crusades [Milman, Lat. Chr. ii. 220-222; Lecky, Hist. Europ. Morals, ii. 262-268]. In heathen countries, the inhabitants usually embraced, after a longer or shorter time, the Moslem faith. Persia since its first conquest has undergone many vicissitudes between heathenism (under the Mongols), Sonnism, and Shiism, which is now the national faith, and has become in many points assimilated to the ancient Magianism. In India, during the Moslem dominion, Islam was confined to the ruling classes at the various courts, and found little acceptance with the natives. The Emperor Akbar discarded Mahometan peculiarities, and was a simple Deist. In many points Islam has approximated to Brahmanism. Persecution has done its work here also, even in modern times, especially by Tippoo Saib of Mysore [Döllinger, 15, 16]. The sword and persecution have ever been the chief means of propagating Islam; no missionary organization has at any time existed, and individual efforts for voluntary conversion have been rare and accidental. Yet instances are frequent—the Turks [eleventh century], the Mongols [thirteenth century]—of whole heathen nations brought in contact with Mahometans having voluntarily accepted Islam. Astonishing progress has been made by it for many years past in Central Africa; while in China and the Asiatic Islands it has made many converts [Döllinger, Muhammad's Religion, &c. 16-20; Möhler, Ueber das Verhältniss, &c. i. 386].

The causes of the success and rapid extension of Islam may be thus summarized:—

[1.] The great power over nomadic and Eastern races—as were the Saracens and Turks—of Mahomet's personal character and religion. Even in his faults he nearly corresponds with their ideal, and his religion suits their habits and ways of thought.

[2.] Extension by the sword, as a religious principle, together with the intense and burning religious zeal of the Mahometans, fanned by hopes of immediate bliss, sensual or spiritual, to suit different temperaments, to those who died fighting for the faith.

[3.] Want of religious depth and earnestness among the Christians to whom Islam was opposed. In early times, this was in great measure the result of widespread heresy, which weakened faith, caused indifference through weariness of controversy, and created numerous divisions and discords; in later times, of discords between the Roman and Eastern Churches, and Protestants. Christendom was divided; Mahometanism was, at the time of its successes, absolute unity, spiritual and temporal.

[4.] The outward character presented by Mahometanism. The permission in this life, and promise in the next, of sensuality influenced low and coarse minds; asceticism in the long and strict fast, regular prayers and ablutions, almsgiving, abstinence from intoxicating liquors, and other burdensome precepts, and a generally austere and scrupulous spirit, suited higher characters. [See Hallam, Middle Ages, ii. 117, ed. 1872.]

[5.] The inward truth in the religion, namely, the intense acknowledgment of God's sole supremacy, hatred of idolatry, and of everything that trench upon His prerogatives.

[6.] The military skill and wise policy of both Saracens and Turks in dealing with Christians, and the consequent strength of their government as opposed to the weakness and discords among Christian powers.

The cause of Mahometan decline is mainly that Islam is especially a religion for nomad and half-nomad races; hence when they settle they lose their strength, which arises from their nomadic life, and their religion loses its purity and power. They degenerate, become luxurious and inactive; internal dissensions and divisions arise; the same doctrines (e.g. fatalism) that strengthened them in their success weaken them in their depression. Moreover, the opposition to progress innate in Islam tends to keep Mahometan nations stationary, while Christian powers advance in power and wealth.

AUTHORITATIVE SOURCES OF DOCTRINE. These are the Koran and the Sonna.

[1.] The Koran consists of the revelations which Mahomet professed to receive from time to time, either directly from God or through the Angel Gabriel. The name Koran (lit. "that which is read" or "that which ought to be read") is applied both to the whole work and to any part of it. It has many other titles with the Mahometans: Al Forkan, "Liberation," "Deliverance," hence "Illumination," "Revelation;" Al Moshaf, "The Volume;" Al Kitâb, "The Book;" Al Dhikr, "The Admonition." It is divided into 114 Chapters ("Suras," "rows, primarily of bricks in a wall," thence "a line" of writing). Each chapter is divided into verses (Ayât, "signs," "wonders"), which vary slightly in different editions. Both suras and verses are of very different lengths, the suras having from three to 286 verses, the verses being from one to nearly twenty lines. Each sura has its title, taken either from some subject treated or some person mentioned in it, or from some important word, often in the middle or near the end of the sura. Some suras have two titles; some verses have also titles of their own. Next to the title comes the mention of the place where, according to tradition, the sura was revealed—Mecca, Medina, or partly at Mecca, partly at Medina. To every sura but the ninth is prefixed the form of blessing, "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful." This blessing is often called "Bismillah," from the first word in the Arabic. It is used at the beginning of all books and public documents, before meals and other actions, and is constantly on the lips of Mahometans.

As Mahomet thought expedient, he recited each revelation to those who happened to be present, one or more of whom usually committed it to writing, on palm leaves, leather, stones, mutton-bones, or any rude material which might be at hand. After the Hegira, the Prophet had regular secretaries always in attendance on him. Mahomet professed to recite each passage immediately on receiving it; in fact, most of them were carefully elaborated in private before they were published. When the passages were taken down, some few copied them, but most learnt them by heart, as Mahomet wished his words to "live in men's hearts." It is said that at the Prophet's death a few persons could repeat the whole Koran. Two years after, many of those who knew the Koran were slain in the campaign against Moseilama; whereon Abu-Bekr, fearing the loss of some of it, commissioned Zeid ibn Thabit of Medina, one of Mahomet's secretaries, to collect and arrange the fragments; he is said to have gathered the text from "date leaves and tablets of white stone, and from the breasts of men." Apparently few or no copies of this recension were made, for in A.D. 652; the Caliph Othman, learning that there were important variations in the existing texts and in the recital of the Koran by different persons, commissioned the same Zeid ibn Thabit, aided by three Koreishites, to make a new revision. Several copies were sent to the chief military stations, and all others were destroyed by the caliph's command. This recension of Othman has come down to us almost unaltered.

The greatest care has been exercised in maintaining the text pure; hence there are very few various readings, and those mostly confined to the differences in the vowel points and diacritical signs, which did not exist in Othman's time. There is good reason for believing that the first recension under Abu-Bekr contained the Koran as taken down from the Prophet's lips, with doubtless some omissions, but without important falsifications or interpolations; and that Othman's revision—that is, the present text—faithfully reproduces that recension.

The Koran is composed absolutely without any arrangement or system whatsoever. It has neither beginning, middle, nor end; it is a gathering of irregular scraps indiscriminately put together. Zeid ibn Thabit seems to have arranged the suras in their present order, putting the opening prayer at the beginning, and the rest like the pipes of an organ, the longest first. The division into suras is, in a great measure, due to Mahomet himself. To suit his own purposes and the needs of his community, while at Medina, he seems to have arranged his revelations, by mixing up those of different dates and on different subjects all in a chaos. Hence in the same sura the most discordant matters are treated, the writer passing abruptly from one to another without the slightest transition. Of modern authors no two agree as to the chronological order of the different parts. Numberless volumes have been written by Mahometan theologians to point out the connection and train of thought. "Detailed injunctions of things allowed and forbidden, legendary stories of Jewish and Christian religion, amplifications of all kinds, boundless tautologies and repetitions, form the body of this sacred volume" [Goethe, quoted in Quart. Rev. cxxvii. 348]. Few of the legends are repeated less than twice, some of them eight or ten times. Descriptions of the last day, judgment, hell, paradise, form nearly one-sixth of the whole. Many of the repetitions are to be ascribed to the redactors, who accepted and incorporated all that proceeded from Mahomet, even although it might have been superseded by later utterances. We have, more than once, several drafts of the same passage [comp. Kor. lxxxiv. 1-5; lxxxii. 1-5; lxxxi. 1-14]. In spite, therefore, of many passages of striking power and grandeur, of much vigour and beauty of description, of moral sentiments tersely and keenly expressed; in spite, too, of the deep earnestness of conviction, the real devotion and piety that pervades the Koran, it is to an English reader dreary, monotonous, tedious, and dull. But no work suffers so much from a translation, however masterly, because its beauties consist mainly in its rhythm and diction. There are no less than an hundred names for the last day, and as many epithets of God. Moreover, it was intended not for reading, but for chanting, or recitation; hence, almost throughout runs a kind of continuous rhyme, to which the sense is frequently sacrificed, often very striking, which no translation can exactly reproduce.

Three stages may be recognised in the compoeition of the Koran. [1.] The period of early struggles, marked by a higher poetical spirit, an appreciation of the beauties of nature, more intense feeling and earnestness. [2.] The period of controversy and the formation of doctrine, shewing a more prosaic and didactic style, with frequent repetitions of histories and legends. [3.] Period of power, of legislation, moral and ecclesiastical, indicated by a more dogmatic and commanding tone, and comparative freedom from histories and legends. Yet, even to the last, there come at times grand and wild poetie utterances, like those of the first period. A certain unity of style runs through the whole. A special peculiarity of the Koran is, that every word is ascribed to God speaking to Mahomet; in order to mark this, the word "say" is prefixed to the didactic portions [see e.g. Kor. cxii. 1].

The orthodox Mahometans hold that the Koran is divine and uncreated; that the first transcript has existed from everlasting beneath the throne of God, written on a tablet of vast size, called "The Preserved Tablet," which contains also the divine decrees, past and future. A copy from this tablet, in a single paper volume, bound in silk and ornamented with gems, was, on the "Night of Power" [Kor. xvii. 1], in the month Ramadhan, sent down by the hands of Gabriel to the lowest heaven, whence the Archangel revealed it to Mahomet in portions, as occasion arose, shewing the whole volume to the Prophet once a year [Pecocke, Spec. Hist. Arab. 222, seq.; D'Herbelot, B. O. art. Alcoran]. The most extravagant language is used in its praise. Mahomet himself appeals to its surpassing excellence in proof of his mission [Kor. ii. 21; iv. 84; xi. 16; xvii. 90; xlv. 2-7, &c.], and this has been a favourite argument with his followers. A living Mahometan writer heads a subdivision of an essay, "That the perfection of the Koran proves its divine origin" [Syed Ahmed, On the Holy Koran, 35], in which we read, "We boldly and confidently assert, in the face of all our antagonists, that a like unto it has never been, and never will be produced" [ibid. 36]. To explain the various contradictions and discrepancies, they put forth the doctrine of abrogation [Kor. ii. 100; xvi. 103], that God cancelled some verses and supplied them by others: 225 verses of the present text are said to be abrogated.

The Koran is with the Mahometans not only all that the Bible is to Christians, but also their code of law and jurisprudence, and to a great extent also their Book of Common Prayer. They hold it to contain, implicitly or explicitly, all knowledge. They treat it with the utmost reverence, being very careful so to hold or hang it that it may not be below the girdle; no other book is ever put on the top of it; no Moslem may touch it unless he is legally pure; it may not be printed, for fear of something unclean in the ink, paper, or printer; it may not be sold to, or even touched by, an unbeliever; they use it, the whole, or separate verses, as an amulet or charm; they consult it and divine by it on all important occasions.

[2.] The Sonna (lit. "custom"). The second authoritative source of doctrine is an amplification and explanation of the Koran. It consists of the sayings and doings of the Prophet, as handed down by tradition, put into writing, at the earliest at the end of the first century after the Hegira. The original purpose of the collectors of traditions was to supply materials for the decision of questions of doctrine, morals, law, and even of habits and customs, when the Koran is silent. The Sonna, therefore, chiefly deals with matters of practice. As Mahomet was an inspired prophet, all his deeds and words are regarded as prompted by God, and therefore as authoritative guides to his followers. Hence it became a regular business to collect all statements about the Prophet that rested on credible authority. They were at first learnt by heart, and taught in lectures; afterwards, when the number increased to an enormous extent, they were brought into one form and put into writing. At first any professed traditions were accepted; at length, learned Moslems undertook to sift and criticise them. Hence the formation of the Six Canonical Collections, which were composed between A.D. 870-930. There are also others of later date and inferior authority. The traditions are all cast in the same form. They are seldom more than ten lines long; each relates usually only to one fact, in the same style, and in the form of a dialogue. At the head of each is put the chain of witnesses (Isnad) on whose authority the tradition rests, beginning with the writer, and going up to some companion of the Prophet. This is of great importance, and is, with Mahometans, a test of the "soundness" of a tradition. They are on all possible subjects. A single specimen will suffice,— "Ibn Saad, from Wakidy, from Zakariya ibn Yahia ibn Yazid Saadi, from his father. The Prophet said, 'I speak purest Arabic; I am a Koreishite, and speak the dialect of the Banu-Saad.'" Many of these traditions are spurious; those that relate to questions of law and morals have been of great advantage in enlarging and giving breadth to the narrowness of the Koran [Muir, l. xxviii.-cv.; Sprenger, i. 9-12, iii. lxvii.-civ.; Döllinger, 9-12].

DOCTRINES. On this subject it is important to bear in mind two points. [1.] According to Islam, revealed religion has the same extent as in the law of Moses, including civil and criminal laws, and also, to some degree, social habits. [2.] Islam, as professed, does not represent Mahomet's personal views at any period of his life. The Koran and the genuine traditions represent all the stages of belief and action through which the Prophet passed in twenty years; whereas all therein contained is of equal and absolute authority with Mahometans. Moreover, there are many accretions of later date, to supply felt deficiencies either in theology or jurisprudence; most of these accretions being derived from the same sources as the teaching of Mahomet, namely, Judaism and Christianity.

The faith of Islam is summed up in the two articles:—"1. There is no God but God. 2.

Mahomet is the Prophet of God." Hence all the doctrines and ordinances taught or practised by the Prophet are of divine authority. Mahometan theologians divide their religion into two parts—Faith (Iman) and Practice (Din.)

[A.] FAITH is divided into six heads. 1. God. 2. His Angels. 3. His Scriptures. 4. His Prophets. 5. The Resurrection and Day of Judgment. 6. God's absolute decree and predestination of good and evil.

1.] God is the creator and preserver of all things in heaven and earth, without beginning or end, omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent. Beyond all other attributes is that of absolute unity. Mahometanism teaches the sternest and strictest monotheism. Nothing exists but the Creator and the creation. The Creator is the only power, force, and act, in the universe; all things are effected at His will and by His passive ministers. Hence God is immeasurably above His creatures, who are but His tools. Angels, devils, jinn (or genii), all owe their being to Him, and are liable to death or extinction at His will. Thus Mahometanism is far removed on the one hand from Epicureanism, Pantheism, and idolatry; on the other, from the Christian doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation. Christians, and even Jews, because they hold Ezra to be the Son of God [Kor. ix. 30], are included with heathens as polytheists—those who pay divine honours to creatures.

2.] Angels are inferior to men, because they were bidden to worship Adam, and because Mahomet was a man. They are God's ministers and servants, free from sin, who praise God day and night, and are never weary of serving Him. They have pure and subtle bodies, created of an ethereal kind of fire or light; they have neither distinction of sexes nor carnal appetites, but differ in form, degree and duties. Some bear the throne of God; others intercede for the faithful; others guide the affairs of earth, and help and guard the faithful; others watch over heaven, others preside over hell; others bear away the soul at death; two, one on the right hand, one on the left of each living person, record his good and evil deeds respectively; two shall bear each soul to judgment. The four most important angels are—Gabriel, their chief, the angel of revelations, declared to be identical with the Holy Ghost; Michael, the friend and protector of the Jews; Azrael, the angel of death; Izrafil, who shall sound the trumpet on the resurrection-day. One of the angels was called Azazil. Refusing God's command to worship Adam at his creation, he was cursed, and lost his high position; hence he became Iblis [Διάβολος], or Satan, the enemy of God and man. Besides angels there are also Jinn (sing. Jinnee), a race inferior to angels, created before Adam, of fire. The jinn are both good and evil. The former accepted Islam, the latter rebelled against God, and refused to believe Islam; they are called Sheitans (Satans), Ifrits, or Merids. Of these Iblis is the lord, and, according to some, the father. These evil jinn, by listening at the doors of heaven, learn God's secrets, which they impart to soothsayers; the angels drive them away with stones, i.e. shooting-stars. The jinn are of both sexes, propagate their species, sometimes with human beings, eat, drink, and are subject to death. They are generally invisible, but can assume various forms at pleasure. Many men, especially Solomon, have gained great power over the jinn. The doctrine of angels and jinn is derived mainly from Jewish tradition and Arabic belief, with a slight admixture of Christian notions [Geiger, Was hat Mohammad aus dem Judenthume aufgenommen, 83-85, 185; Sprenger, ii. 238-251; Rodwell and Sale, notes passim].

3.] Scriptures, or Divine Books. These have been in all 104, sent down by God to man; ten to Adam, fifty to Seth, thirty to Idris (Enoch), ten to Abraham, one to Moses (the Law or Pentateuch), one to David (the Psalms), one to Jesus (the Gospel), one to Mahomet. Each of these abrogated the preceding, and confirmed that which followed. All are lost but the last four, of which all but the Koran have been misinterpreted and corrupted by the Jews and Christians; but yet some passages remain confirming the Koran and prophesying Mahomet. The whole Old Testament is regarded as sacred, but not so highly as the Psalms and Law. The following texts are quoted as referring to Mahomet:—Gen. xvii. 20, xxi. 13; Deut. xviii. 15, 18, compared with xxxiv. 10; xxxiii. 2; Hab. iii. 3. (Sinai = Judaism; Seir = Christianity; Paran = Islam). Cant. v. 10-16 (a description of Mahomet); Isa. xxi. 7 (Chariot of Camels, or, more literally (Vulg.), Rider upon a camel = Mahomet; chariot of asses, or rider upon an ass = Jesus); Hagg. ii. 7; Luke xxiv. 49; John i. 20-25 (that Prophet = Mahomet), xiv. 25, 26; xvi. 7 (Παράκλητος, a corruption of Περικλυτός = Mahomet) [Syed Ahmed, Essays, On the Prophecies respecting Mohammed, esp. pp. 9, 10; Pococke, Spec. Hist. Arabum, 17, seq.].

4.] Prophets. These are men sent down from God to teach mankind, all believing the same creed (Islam), honoured by communications from God, workers of miracles. Of these there have been, according to one tradition, 224,000, according to another, 124,000, of whom 313 have been ambassadors or apostles. Of these there are mentioned in the Koran, Adam, Abel, Seth, Idris (Enoch), Noah, Hud (identified by some with Heber), Abraham, Lot, Ishmael, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Aaron, Shoaib (the same as Reuel, Raguel, or Jethro, Moses' father-in-law), David, Solomon, Elijah, Elisha, Jonah, Job, Ezra. Very curious and unscriptural legends are told of many of these, derived chiefly from Jewish tradition [Geiger, Was hat Mohammad, &c. 98-196]. From the New Testament, Zachariah, John the Baptist, and Jesus, are named prophets in the Koran; the accounts of these are derived from an heretical, apparently Ebionite or Judæo-Christian, source. Besides these, there are mentioned also Lokman, Saleh, Arabian prophets; Dhulkifl, whose identity is disputed (Ezekiel, Obadiah [1 Kings xviii. 4], or Isaiah [Rodwell, 179]), and Dhulkarnain (Alexander the Great).

5.] Resurrection and the Day of Judgment. Under this head it will be convenient to take the whole doctrine of the state of the soul after death. When a corpse has been laid in the tomb the soul returns to it for a short time, and the deceased is then visited by two terrible angels, Munkar and Nekir, who question him concerning his faith. The wicked they will severely torture, but the good they will leave in peace. There are many opinions about the state of the soul of ordinary believers between death and the resurrection [Sale, P. D., § 4; or Lane, Mod. Egypt, ii. 269]. The souls of prophets are admitted into paradise at once; the souls of martyrs—those who die in battle against infidels—rest in the crops of green birds, which eat of the fruits and drink of the rivers of paradise. Many fearful signs will go before the resurrection, eclipses, earthquakes, wars, the coming of Antichrist (Dijjal), who will be defeated and slain by Jesus Christ. It will be preceded by three blasts of the trumpet: at the first of which the universe will be shaken, the sea dried up, the mountains levelled, and the works of man destroyed; at the second, all living creatures, even angels and jinn, will be annihilated; only God and the dwellers in paradise and hell will remain. Forty years after will be sounded the blast of resurrection, when all will come to life again, will appear before God and be judged; their deeds shall be weighed in a balance, and as good or evil preponderates, so shall be the sentence. Not only men but also brutes and jinn will be thus judged. After the judgment retribution will be exacted for every wrong and injury done to others. This being finished, all men will be led over the bridge Al-Sirat, which extends over the midst of hell, finer than a hair and sharper than a sword's edge, beset on both sides by briars and thorns. The good, led by Mahomet and the prophets, will pass safely over it into paradise; the wicked will fall into hell. In hell there are seven regions: the first of these is reserved for wicked Mahometans, who will only remain till their sins are expiated, and will then be admitted into paradise; the other six regions are assigned to those of other religions, who will be tortured for ever. The horrors of hell are very vividly described; fear being, according to Mahometan doctors, the chief motive of morality. Between hell and paradise there is a partition (Al-Araf), or intermediate region, where those shall be placed whose good and evil deeds are equal. The descriptions of the joys of Paradise are very minute; the reward of the blessed will consist chiefly in sensual enjoyments—most delicious meats and drinks, the society of each man's wives, and of the houries or girls of paradise. To enjoy these thoroughly they will live in perpetual youth. But these sensual delights will be little regarded by the most blessed, to whom it will be granted to see the face of God. Many Moslems hold that the descriptions of paradise are figurative: and it is worth notice that they were written when Mahomet had only one wife. Persons will be admitted to paradise, not by their own merits, but simply by the mercy of God, through faith; but the happiness of each will be measured by his merits. To estimate these, sins are divided into those that deserve punishment in the next world and those whose penalty is inflicted during this life. Doctors differ in the assignment of particular sins to these categories [Palgrave, Arabia, 281-285, sm. ed.]. The doctrine of the future state is derived mainly from Jewish tradition, with an admixture of Christian and Parsee elements.

6.] Predestination. Every event has been absolutely predestined by God, and written from all eternity on the "Preserved Tablet." Hence each man's lot is irrevocably fixed—how, and how long, he is to live, what his end will be, and no human care can vary or ward off God's decree.

[B.] PRACTICE. This has four branches. 1. Prayer, including Purification. 2. Almsgiving. 3. Fasting. 4. Pilgrimage.

1.] Prayer and Purification. Purification is a necessary preparative for prayer, which will not be accepted from an unclean person. It is of two kinds. The greater or extraordinary purification is of the whole body, to cleanse from certain ceremonial defilements. These defilements are nearly the same as those of the Jewish Law [Lev. xv.]. It is also performed on the morning of Friday and of the great festivals. The lesser or ordinary purification takes place before the ordinary prayers, and on some other occasions; it consists in washing the face, arms, elbows, feet, hands, mouth, nostrils, ears, feet, with prayers, and reciting sura 97 of the Koran. The prayers, &c., are often omitted [Lane, Mod. Egypt, i. 85-89]. When water cannot be procured, sand is allowed to be used. This relaxation occurs in the Talmud [Geiger, 89]. Prayer is ordered to be made five times daily: [1] in the morning at daybreak and before sunrise; [2] just after noon, when the sun begins to decline; [3] in the afternoon, midway between noon and nightfall; [4] a few minutes after sunset; [5] at nightfall, when the evening has just shut in. Some add two other times, which are not imperative: [6] between sunrise and noon; [7] a little after midnight. The second and third and the fourth and fifth services may be kept together, thus making three prayers daily [Syed Ahmed, On the Religion of the Pre-Islamitic Arabs, 17]. The times of prayer are proclaimed by muezzins from the minarets of the mosque, in a sort of chant, with very striking effect. The prayers may be performed either at home or in the mosque. The worshipper always turns towards Mecca (the Kaaba); he adopts various attitudes. The worship consists of repeated ejaculations of the Takbir (Allahu Akbar, God is most great), Raka, or inclinations, prayers and recitations from the Koran, especially suras iii., v. 256, cviii. cxii. cxiii. cxiv. The prayers are short forms, incessantly repeated, inelastic, inexpressive, with few ideas. The regular public service in the mosque takes place at noon on Friday, "the day of the assembly;" it is of the same nature as the private daily devotions, with the addition of a sermon. Except on certain festivals women are not allowed to attend the public services, or to pray in the mosque. Intercession, both for the living and the dead, forms a conspicuous part of the devotions. The prayers are all addressed to God; but the intercession of Mahomet and the saints is intreated. The Mahometans are very reverent and devout during their devotions, both private and public.

2.] Alms are of two kinds, those prescribed by the law, and those which are voluntary. The former were in early ages collected by officers appointed by the sovereign, and applied to pious uses; their payment and application is now left to the conscience. The proportion to be given varies according to the kind of property from which it is given.

3.] Fasting. There is one obligatory fast in the year—the month of Ramadhan, because the Koran was given in that month. From the time the new moon appears to the next new moon, the Moslem is bidden to fast every day, from the time when one can distinguish plainly the white thread from the black—explained by some to mean the white and black streaks seen in the east before daybreak—until sunset. He must abstain during that time from eating, drinking, smoking, perfumes, and all sensual indulgences. There are some few exemptions, but those who are hindered by any temporary cause must fast an equal number of days in another month. This fast is kept with great strictness, and when Ramadhan falls in summer¹ it is most oppressive. The idea was probably derived from the Christian Lent. There are also some optional fasts, the most important being the Ashura, the 10th day of Moharram (1st month). This was in imitation of the Jewish day of Atonement; it was instituted as obligatory soon after the Hegira, when Mahomet was trying to win over the Jews, and was afterwards made optional. The same day is also kept in memory of the martyrdom of Hosein, the Prophet's grandson, at Kerbela.

4.] Pilgrimage. Every believer is bound once in his life, either in person and by another, whose expenses he pays, to make the pilgrimage to Mecca and Mount Arafat, unless prevented by poverty or ill-health. It takes place in the month Dzul-hajji. The ceremonies to be performed by pilgrims are very numerous and complicated; the chief of them are the wearing of the Ihram or sacred garment, consisting of two simple pieces of cloth wrapped round the loins and over the shoulder, compassing seven times the Kaaba or holy house of Mecca, kissing or touching each time the black stone, fabled to have fallen from heaven; a journey to Mount Arafat, about ten miles from Mecca, and the offering of victims (sheep, goats, kine, or camel). [For further particulars see Burckhardt, Travels in Arabia, vol. i.; Burton, A Pilgrimage to Mecca and El-Medina; Sale, P. D., § 4.] The practice of pilgrimage and most of the customs connected therewith were borrowed from the heathen Arabs; but a fresh meaning, connected with the legend that Abraham and Ishmael instituted the pilgrimage, was assigned to them. Pilgrimages are also often made to the tombs of saints, to pray for their intercession. Besides the above observances, all the Mahometans practise circumcision and wear beards. These customs, derived from the Arabs, are not mentioned in the Koran, their institution is ascribed to Abraham. [Syed Ahmed, Rel. of Pre-Islamitic Arabs, 8.]

There are certain things forbidden by Islam—partly heathen practices, partly unclean meats, partly things likely to do harm. These are various superstitions about cattle, burying female children alive, divining by arrows, casting lots, gambling, usury, wine, and all intoxicating liquors and drugs (some add even coffee and tobacco), eating blood, swine's flesh, whatever dies of itself or is strangled, or killed by a blow or fall, or by another beast, or is slain in honour of an idol, or anything at the slaughtering of which the name of God has not been said.² Some Moslems add many other meats to this list, being, with some exceptions, those forbidden by the law of Moses.

War against all unbelievers, if they have been the aggressors, is enjoined as a sacred duty; if not fighting for pay, those who are killed in it are regarded as martyrs. Of those enemies who, refusing to capitulate or surrender, are reduced by force of arms, the men may be killed or enslaved, and the women and children enslaved. Life and liberty may be granted them if they surrender and agree to pay a poll-tax, or embrace Islam. If they have acted treacherously they may be exterminated. It has been a great question with Mahometan theologians when "religious war" (Jihad) is allowed or commanded [Hunter's Indian Muslims, chap. iii.].

CIVIL AND CRIMINAL LAWS. The most important of these are the laws relating to marriage. A Moslem may not have at the same time more than four wives, who must all be free women and Moslems; but, in addition, he may keep any number of slave concubines [Kor. iv. 3; Lane, i. 122]. An unlimited power of divorce, without giving any reason, is allowed to the husband, and is fully taken advantage of; cases are mentioned of middle-aged Mahometans who have had thirty, forty, or even fifty wives [Döllinger, 26]. A wife cannot obtain a divorce except for cruelty or neglect, and then she loses her dowry. A man may divorce his wife twice, and take her back without any ceremony; but if he divorce her a third time, or pronounce a triple divorce in one sentence, and then wish to marry her again, she must be first married and divorced by another husband, who must have consummated the marriage. A divorced woman must wait three months, or, if pregnant, till she is delivered, before she can marry again. An adulteress is punished by stoning if detected; but there must be four eye witnesses of the deed, and a false accusation against any woman is punished by scourging. If a man have a child by a concubine, the child is free; the mother cannot afterwards be sold or given away, and on her master's death becomes free. The prohibited degrees are somewhat wide, and apply both to wives and concubines. Women may not show their faces to any man but their husbands and those within the prohibited degrees. Slavery is allowed, with almost absolute power to the owner. For murder, manslaughter, and personal injuries, retaliation or satisfaction in money is prescribed. Theft is punished by loss of limbs, lesser crimes by scourging, apostasy or blasphemy by death. The laws of inheritance are very elaborate, the chief principles being the rejection of any privileges of primogeniture, and the assigning to a female half the share of the male of the same degree of relationship.

RELATION TO JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY. On this point the Koran is inconsistent. In many passages [ii. 3, 59, 285; iv. 50; v. 53; vi. 92; x. 38; xlv. 8-11, 29, &c.] the view is put forth that the Old and New Testaments and the teaching of Mahomet are identical, that all three are books sent down from God, equally sacred and to be obeyed, and the believers in each (with, in some passages [ii. 59; v. 73], the Sabians also) will be saved. In other later passages it is taught that Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, are successive revelations from God, confirming but superseding each other, Jesus being a greater Prophet than Moses, and Mahomet than Jesus, that the Jews were perverse and wicked in not accepting Christianity, and both Jews and Christians in not accepting Islam. Whenever opportunity offered, they were to be compelled to embrace it or pay tribute [Kor. ix. 28-35]. To support this view, which is that now held by Mahometans, it is constantly asserted that the Jewish and Christian Scriptures had been misinterpreted and falsified. This inconsistency is explained by the change in Mahomet's views, through which from the Prophet of Arabia only he proclaimed himself the Prophet of the World [Möller, Ueber das Verhältniss, &c., 361-385]. From Judaism is derived all that distinguishes Islam from pure Deism. Its local character—the Kaaba standing in somewhat the same relation to Islam as the Temple to Judaism—its strong religious and national unity, its conception of the nature of a divine revelation, as prescribing not only principles, but detailed laws, and even habits and customs, many theological notions, moral and ritual, civil and criminal laws, and a very large portion of the substance of the Koran, are of Jewish origin. But frequent errors and confusions [see e.g. Kor. ii. 250], numerous coincidences, verbal and in matters of fact, with the Talmud, prove that Mahomet's knowledge of Judaism was obtained not from the Scriptures, or any written document, but from oral tradition. It is doubtful, indeed, whether he could read. Christianity, known to Mahomet in a similar way, evidently in great part from an heretical source, though theoretically superior to Judaism,¹ had little real influence on his teaching.

The doctrine of the Trinity [supposed to consist of the Father, Jesus, and Mary; iv. 169; v. 76-79], and of the Sonship of Jesus, is repeatedly and vehemently attacked. The Holy Ghost is identified with the angel Gabriel. Yet Jesus is set forth as the Word of God, and a spirit proceeding from Him, as the greatest Prophet before Mahomet, conceived miraculously of a pure virgin,² Mary or Miriam, the daughter of Amram and sister of Aaron [Kor. iii. 33; xix. 23]. Stories are told of Him which appear also in the Apocryphal Gospels [Kor. iii. 40, 41]; and finally, when the Jews wished to crucify Him, God rescued Him, and substituted another person in His place [Kor. iii. 48; iv. 156], while He died a natural death. But He will appear again at the last day and destroy Antichrist. Baptism and the Holy Eucharist are barely alluded to [ii. 132; v. 112-115].

OTHER CHARACTERISTICS. There are several festivals kept by the Moslems. The first ten days of Moharram, the first month of the year, are considered as eminently blessed, and are kept with rejoicing. Many are in the habit of giving alms on this day. The tenth Moharram, as already mentioned, is kept by some as a fast, and by all is held sacred, as the day on which the Prophet's grandson, Hosein, was slain on the plain of Kerbela. It is a great day with some orders of dervishes. From the third to the twelfth of Rabia I. (the third month), the Prophet's birthday is kept with decorations and great rejoicing, and with chanting the Koran and hymns in honour of Mahomet. The eve of the twenty-seventh Rajib (the seventh month), is a festival in honour of the "Miraj"—the Prophet's journey to heaven. The eve of the fifteenth Shaban (the eighth month), is kept with solemn reverence as the day on which each person's fate for the year is determined. A special form of prayer is used on this night, either at home or in the mosques. The two chief festivals are called the two Ids, and by the Turks, the two Bairams. The lesser Bairam, or Id-al-Fitr (feast of the breaking of the fast), is immediately after the fast of Ramadhan, on the first three days of Shawal (tenth month). The greater Bairam, Id-al-Kurban, or Id-al-Adha (the feast of the sacrifice), begins the tenth Dzul-Hajjah, the last month of the year, on which day, that on which the pilgrims at Mecca offer sacrifice, animals are sacrificed, and the meat given to the poor. Both feasts are kept with general rejoicing and special public prayers. Moslems also visit the tombs of their relations, and have part or all of the Koran recited there. There are many festivals kept in honour of the birthdays of saints or "Welis," especially of near relatives of the Prophet. Very great and superstitious reverence, unauthorized by the Koran or traditions, is paid to saints. In fact, Mahomet and the saints are put almost on an equality with God. Over the graves of the most celebrated saints mosques are erected; and over all, a small building, which is Rolls of Abraham and Moses, "the oldest rolls," &c., see Sprenger's Life of Mohammad, i. 53, seq.; for Mahomet's instructors, the same, ii. 348-390.

held sacred. These sanctuaries are visited to pay honour to the saint, or to obtain his intercession with God for some benefit to the devotee. On these occasions prayers are said, parts of the Koran are recited, and votive offerings made. Marriages are performed in private, with prayers, pious ejaculations, and recitations of the Koran. At burials there is a service in the mosque, and sometimes a sacrifice is offered at the grave.

Islam has no priesthood, nor even a regular order of ministers. The Imams who usually lead the public services and preach, generally have other occupations; any competent person may take their place; they may be dismissed from their office, and then lose their title; they have no religious authority, and no official respect. The sacrifices are simply commemorative; any person may slay the victims. The Ulemas of Constantinople are a corporation of men learned in theology and jurisprudence, who give decisions in cases of conscience, law and religion and public policy; their sentence (Fetwa) has great weight. Muftis, or Doctors of Law and Theology, are numerous and much respected; the concurrence of the doctors makes with strict Moslems an article of faith. Orders or societies of persons uniting for devotional purposes are very numerous. The members of them are called Dervishes. Some of their devotional practices are very strange. Many of them give themselves up to an ascetic life, and live on alms; these are sometimes called Fakirs, and receive much reverence. Both the strange devotions and asceticism are the results chiefly of widespread Pantheism (Sufism) among Mahometans, though this theory is utterly at variance with the principles of Islam [Taylor's Hist. Mohammed. ch. 13; Döllinger, 70-79; Lane, i. 304-311; ii. 151-154, 168-182, 187-190].

Religious Sects among the Mahometans are almost countless. The orthodox, or Sunnites, are divided into four sects, named, after their founders, Hanifites, Malekites, Shafeites, and Hanbalites, who differ in some unimportant points of ritual and Koranic interpretation. Of the heretical sects, the most important are the Shiites, who reject the first three caliphs as usurpers, holding Ali, and the Imams, his descendants, to be the lawful successors of Mahomet. They also reject the Sonna, accepting in its place four collections of traditions of their own. Shiism is the established religion of Persia, where it has adopted some peculiarities of Zoroastrianism. There are several sects of Shiites, some of whom hold the Imams to be incarnations of God. The Sufies, who are mystic pantheists, have been mentioned. The Babs, a recent sect in Persia, have mixed Christian and Magian doctrines with Islam. The Wahabees, founded by Abd-al-Wahb (died 1787), accept only the Koran and Sonna, and desire to purify Islam from superstitious accretions, saint-worship, &c. They have founded a great power in Central Arabia, and have caused much trouble in India by preaching the duty of war against infidels. They call orthodox Moslems, with Christians and idolaters, polytheists. Many sects differ only in abstruse points regarding God's attributes and predestination, the eternity of the Koran, &c. [See Pococke, Spec. Hist. Arabum, 26, 27, 199-327; D'Herbelot, B. O., under the different names; Sale, P. D., § 8; Döllinger, 80-133.]

The effects of Mahometanism, as shewn in life and character, must be briefly noticed. The minuteness of the ritual and the social rules, together with the hardness and coldness of the morality taught, produces a great amount of formalism. The name of God and pious ejaculations are constantly on the lips, even in the midst of the most indecent conversation. Mahometans often say the "Bismillah" before committing a crime [Sprenger, ii. 206]. Hence the most scrupulous observance of outward duties is not unfrequently united with the grossest habitual immorality and crime [Döllinger, 26-29]; religion and morality seem completely sundered. Another great evil results from the minuteness of the laws concerning marriage and divorce. Many volumes have been written to explain them, entering into the closest and most disgusting details, forming "a mass of corruption, poisoning the mind and morals of every Mahometan student" [Muir, iii. 302], and utterly defiling the very language. Hence arises the prevalence not only of most indecent language and conduct, but also of extreme profligacy among both sexes. Unnatural vice is fearfully common. The pictures of the sensual joys of paradise contribute in some degree to this profligacy; these come to be the chief object of their thoughts, and are anticipated, so far as possible, on earth. The doctrine of predestination, or rather fatalism, produces extreme apathy and want of energy in action; while the notion that all Mahometans are God's chosen in a special sense, though causing a deep brotherly feeling among themselves, which is fostered by the precepts on almsgiving, leads them to a bitter contempt and hatred for all other religions.

It remains to sum up the good and evil sides of Mahometanism. On the one hand, it is a rigid foe to idolatry, as it teaches the unity, perfection, providence and government of God, and hence submission and resignation to His will, together with the great doctrine of a judgment and eternal retribution. It inculcates, moreover, brotherly love and union with fellow-believers, and many social virtues, with almsgiving, temperance, and a certain standard of morality. On the other hand, it perpetuates the great evils of the East—polygamy, slavery, and absolute despotism; it opposes all political and social progress, while the semi-civilized arbitrary character of its law and justice renders property insecure. Its doctrine of propagation by the sword leads to constant wars and rebellions, with an utter contempt for human life. It is, in fact, a semi-barbarous religion. On its religious side it fails to satisfy the natural longing for some mediation between God and man, while yet it bows before God as an irresistible Power; its morality, in itself defective, is dry, cold, hard, lifeless, without any amiable traits; and, finally, as substituting Mahomet for Christ, it is essentially antichristian. While it may be an advance on heathenism, it is an advance which almost excludes the further advance of Christianity, missionary efforts being almost without result.

MAJORINI PARS. The party of Majorinus. This was the name by which the Donatist party in Africa always referred to themselves, before the Catholics had invented the later title by which, in spite of their resentment, they became popularly designated. Majorinus was consecrated to the see of Carthage, in opposition to Cæcilian [A.D. 311], and was the predecessor of Donatus in that episcopate.

MALAKANES, or MOLOKANE. A Russian sect, which arose first in the government of Tambof, in the middle of the eighteenth century, and which was so called from their custom of living on milk (Malako), instead of fasting altogether, upon fast-days. They call themselves Istineeye Christiane, i.e. true Christians, and also "Gospel-lers." A colony of about three thousand Malakanes were settled in the earlier part of this century in the Crimea, where they were visited by Baron Haxthausen [A.D. 1843], who discovered that, among various erroneous points, they rejected the necessity of Baptism and the Holy Eucharist, as well as the lesser sacraments, explaining away the words which refer to material elements by a spiritualizing interpretation. This sect, composed of the lowest and most illiterate peasants, was imposed upon [A.D. 1833] by a certain Terenti Belioreff, who, claiming to be the Elias, announced the advent of the Millennium within thirty months, the immediate cessation of all business, and the community of goods. He then summoned them in large numbers to witness his ascent to heaven like Elijah, but when, upon making the attempt, he fell to the earth instead, he was seized as an impostor and a disturber of the peace, and sent to prison, where he shortly died. Many of his followers, to avoid persecution, emigrated to Georgia, where they are said to be still awaiting the promised Millennium. The following extracts from their Confession of Faith will shew that, unlike most Russian sects, this one was much akin to modern forms of Protestantism.

Of Baptism: "Paul says, Christ did not send me to baptize but to preach: we, therefore, understand by the Sacrament of Baptism, not the earthly water, but the spiritual cleansing of our souls from sin in faith, and the destruction of the old Adam within us, with all his works, that we may become clothed anew with a true and perfect life." Of the Ministry: "We have a bishop and high-priest in the person of Christ alone, Who has called us all alike." [Haxthausen, Studien über Russland, Hanover, 1847.]

MALEBRANCHE. Nicholas Malebranche [A.D. 1638-1715] was born at Paris, and was afflicted from his birth with deformity and disease. His theological studies were pursued at the Sorbonne, where he read Eusebius and the other ecclesiastical historians,—while the celebrated father Richard Simon taught him Hebrew and Syriac. But all was labour in vain; he confused his roots; applied to one century the events of another, and had a very dim appreciation of the nature of heresy. In his twenty-second year he joined the Congregation of the Oratory; but happening to purchase at a bookstall the treatise of Descartes De Homine, it took such effect upon him as to cause him to abandon the study of theology, and to devote himself to philosophy as an earnest Cartesian, though prosecuting at the same time mathematical studies.

The basis of the creed of Malebranche was the axiom, thoroughly Cartesian in its principle, that our only perception and knowledge of things is in God. Knowledge is the solution of the antagonism between the thinking subject and the external object. It can only be this solution by our immanence in God. Finite substance remains finite, and eternally distinct from the Absolute; the Absolute is the sole fountain and source of knowledge, which alone can harmonize the antithesis of thought and its object.

A brilliant flash of lightning in the dark night illuminates every object and reveals the distant country as in broad day, and we know the different features of the landscape, but we know it only in the light that is external to ourselves: so knowledge, of whatever kind, can only be attained in the Light of the Divine Substance. In ourselves we are wholly dark. In the Cartesian system Infinite Substance is a mere copula, whereby the mind acquires a perception of finite substance in its true nature—it is as a mere mathematical point of spirit innate in the mind of man: but in the system of Malebranche it widens out. Although there can be no interpenetration of mind and matter¹—the two substances being mutually opposed—yet there can be a true and permanent union between the mind of man and the Absolute, both being of spiritual substance. Malebranche declares that he was at times tempted to consider himself and his thoughts as a part of the Divine Nature, which Geulinx before him, and Spinoza afterwards, did not hesitate to affirm. He says, for instance, “Je me suis porté à croire que ma substance est éternelle, et que je suis partie de l'être divin, et que toutes mes diverses pensées ne sont que des modifications de la raison universelle” [Méd. Chrét. ix. 16]. Human reason may coalesce with the Absolute reason from whence it derives its light. God knows everything, and we who know God have a true perception of the ideas that God has of all that is. Although the spirit, therefore, cannot penetrate material substance so as to gain an objective knowledge of it, yet it has a subjective knowledge of it in a perception of the ideas that God has of it. Such is his theory of vision in God. The idea of God therefore teems with the spirits of men, and is the world of ideal existence. All our knowledge of things is in the Absolute Substance of God, and since this knowledge as a mode of mind is our very selves, therefore our spirit has an immanence in God; and the subject-matter of our knowledge, that is, the idea of external things, is in God; the Absolute is peopled with spirits and with ideas. Absolute Substance, from this point of view, teems with life and reality, while in the Cartesian scheme it is a vast and dreamy void.

Malebranche explained our knowledge of a Divine Being as Descartes had done. Spiritual and extended material substance are diametrically opposed; therefore the idea of extended matter could never originate in the human spirit. The spirit of man is divided out among the millions of individuals of which the human race consists, an aggregate of being that can never produce unity of idea. Hence, any universal sense in which all men are agreed can never have had its source in this herd of spirits; it must be traced to some other source than the mind of man. But belief in the existence of God is such a universal sense, for it underlies the consciousness of every human being; and it can only have been communicated by God Himself.

Malebranche declared that bodily movement is under the immediate direction of God. The notion that the spirit of man should move the body he thought to be a metaphysical difficulty that could not be got over. God being the Supreme Cause, there can be no other cause for anything; for, if there were any co-ordinate cause, it would either act in opposition to the Absolute, which is absurd, or in co-operation, which is superfluous; therefore he came to the conclusion that all movement emanates from God. I will to move, but God effects the movement; will is suggestive rather than causative of movement. It was the occasionalism, again, of Geulinx, whose ideas received a considerable development in Malebranche; the difference between the two being chiefly referable to the difference of their religious belief.

Descartes had remained satisfied with demonstrating, by solid reasoning, the existence of a Deity; he rather flinched from discussing the relation that subsists between God and the external creation. His treatises declare that the extension of matter is indefinite. His letters, in a more pronounced way, laugh at those who circumscribe the work of God within a hall; but he nowhere pushes on the notion of infinitude to duration as well as extension; only when Queen Christina questioned him with respect to the eternity of the world, he declared that the world would never perish, and that as the mind gains wider ideas of the universe, in the same proportion it has reason to praise the Creator in the infinity of His works. As regards the moral government of the world he said that everything is of God—good and evil, fair and foul, true and false. From Him it comes that good is good and evil is evil; that murder and incest are crimes, as well as that the radii of a circle are equal, or that the square of the hypotenuse in a right-angled triangle is equal to the squares of perpendicular and base. Here Malebranche diverges from the Cartesian theory, and engrafts upon it those Platonic views of the justice and benevolence of the Deity that he derived from Augustine. God is the absolute and all-powerful Cause of all; but He is the intelligent and designing Cause; and the happiness of the creature is the final cause of creation. He is the universal reason, the Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. God exists not simply because we have an inborn idea of His power and vastness, but because we believe Him to be holy and just and true; otherwise the Deity would be infinite indeed in power, but no object for the creature's love, and differing in degree only, but not at all in kind from the brute force of nature. Benevolence is the general design (volonté générale) of the Divine order of things; though there must of necessity be occasional interruption in its working. Rain will fall on barren sands, and fertile tracts are rendered barren by drought. The worst evils of life will befall the good, while the evil prosper. The general rule is only established by such exceptions. And, in an ascending scale, the world of grace is ordered by the same general design (volontés générales) as the natural and moral world. All is ruled by the same purpose of deep counsel, all proceeds according to one law of general design. There is no capricious choice, no blind election. The God of theology, as the God of philosophy, is still the same Infinite Being of eternal justice, intelligence and wisdom. God moves in simple ways, and those ways, throughout every part of His government, whether in the order of nature or of grace, are general.

Are these two orders separate? or are they parts of one system? A knotty point which Malebranche solves through the revealed doctrine of God made Man. That which had been always held to be a deep unfathomable mystery was to Malebranche the central sun of his system. The Infinite, he said, in calling the universe into existence, could only have proposed to Himself an infinite result. The finite is wholly absorbed in His infinity. The worlds that teem through space; the spiritual essences which rise in ascending scale from man to God, and far transcend in their worth myriads of worlds, are all as nothing in the Presence of the Infinite. But creation, to be worthy of the Creator, must also be infinite. Then it was needed that the Creator should impart to it His own infinity of Being, and cause the Eternal Word to descend into it, and become part of it, that the Word should be "made flesh." The Incarnation of the Son of God is the key of the whole mystery; the centre on which everything turns; the answer of Malebranche to Anselm's question, "Cur Deus Homo?" For it raises man, and with man all nature, to the Being of God. The several systems of nature, moral order and grace here blend in harmony; the one dominant idea of which is the Divine progression by ways that are at once simple and general. The more we know of the laws that govern the universe, the more we perceive that they are simple and harmonious in their design and action; and that they resolve themselves more and more under the comprehensive heading of general laws. Organic anatomy demonstrates unity of principle; philology is comparative by reason of the inherent harmony of its parts. Extinct fossil species have their counterpart in living organisms; and dead languages, in their broad distinctive features, are one with those of to-day. Malebranche could only trace the same analogies and wide-spreading laws in the relation subsisting between the Creator and His universe.

But such a scheme from a gentle and loving son of the Church was a novelty; and Antoine Arnaud of Port-Royal celebrity, and Bossuet denounced it at once as neuterizing, as contradictory to the Fathers, especially to Augustine;—as chimerical and as subversive of all that had ever been held to be true in theology. The most mysterious doctrines, they urged, were submitted to rationalizing investigation; the doctrine of the Incarnation became only an element of the general scheme of creation; and the antagonizing systems of nature and of grace were made to blend together in reciprocating harmony of action. Prophecy, revelation, miracles, which the Church could only refer to the predestined purposes of God, were reduced by Malebranche under the head of general laws and designs. Thus Butler also considered that, under the operation of general laws, "five or six thousand years may have given scope for causes, occasions, reasons, or circumstances from whence miraculous interpositions may have arisen" [Anal. II. ii.; Ritter, Gesch. d. Phil. XI. iv. 2].

MANICHÆANS. Manichæism was the system of religious and philosophical eclecticism founded by an Oriental named Mani, at the commencement of the latter half of the third century A.D. It rose in Persia during the reign of Sapor II., prince of the dynasty of the Sassanidæ, and spread with extraordinary rapidity through the adjacent provinces of the Roman Empire. Much mystery attaches to each phase of its existence, even to the name, pretensions, and death, of its founder, and an almost romantic interest has been thrown around its history by the frequent and sanguinary persecutions it has suffered, and the dark and incredible charges by which those persecutions have been justified.

It professed to identify, and was in fact an attempt to harmonize, the dominant principles of Zoroastrianism and Christianity. Unlike almost every other form of error, it had the fortune to possess a distinct creed, discipline, and ethical system, the salient features of which have remained constant under all variations of latitude and fortune, and it has thus gained the repute rather of a separate false religion than of the heresy of a sect. Its philosophy rested on the purest Dualism of the East, and by its recognition of the complete identity of matter and evil, purported to reduce morality within the domain of physical law. Its moral code arrogated the principles of the most elevated virtue, and inculcated the most rigorous asceticism. The practice of few sects is entirely adequate to their professions; still it is hard to conceive, as the possible outcome of such a system, the Manichæism described by Leo the Great [Leo. Opp. i. Serm. xxxvi.] as the sum of all the profane in paganism, the blind in Judaism, the sacrilegious and blasphemous in all other heresies. At no time, indeed, has the purity of its professions saved it from the hatred and contempt of mankind; and yet, despite this hatred, and despite the persecutions of Cæsar and pontiff, this faith, amidst infinite discouragements, preserved, during a thousand years, a vigorous life in Europe, and still, it is alleged, survives in Asia.

Mani, as the Orientals write his name—Manes and Manichæus, as the Europeans—was born about A.D. 240 in Persia, or at least in some district obeying the Persian rule. Probably of Magian family, he was certainly educated among, if not admitted to the fellowship of, the Magi; but his native dialect appears nevertheless to have been Chaldee. The Greeks (as we read in the Acta Archelai cum Manete, n. 53, p. 97, from whom most of the orthodox writers have borrowed) have a story that his real name was Cubricus or Corbicius; that he was a slave-boy in the house of a widow, to whose bounty he owed both freedom and position; that in the house of this widow died, by diabolical visitation, Terebinthus or Buddas, an arch-heretic, who bequeathed to her his books of impiety (themselves the work of Scythian, a Saracen disciple of Empedocles and an opponent of the Apostles); that Cubricus, taking possession of the heretical library, assumed the mission of the deceased Terebinthus, and thereupon exchanged the name of his servitude for the more honourable one of Manes, or "the eloquent." There are many circumstances calculated to discredit this plausible narrative, which is found in the authorities who have followed the Acta, but in none others: for it is all but impossible that Scythian could have confronted the Apostles; and there is evidence that, of the so-called predecessors who instructed Mani, one at least was a disciple and contemporary. Besides, Mani indisputably was admitted to the Magian court of Sapor, where a slave-boy would not readily have found an entrance. Finally, the doubtful authenticity of the Acta [see literature of Manichæism], and the manifest plagiarism of the other authors in whose writings we find this narrative, must destroy our confidence in a story not probable in itself, and altogether at variance with the unsuspected Oriental authorities. It is probable that the resemblance between the Oriental "mani" and the Greek "manes," the typical slave-name of Greece, is the parent of this remarkable legend. St. Augustine tells us that the name of Manes was changed to Manichæus to avoid the preposterous ribaldry of opponents, to which its resemblance to the Greek μαρία was found to give occasion. The name of Mani, somewhat fancifully connected with the Hebrew "menahem," or "comforter," more probably belongs to the same Sanskrit family with the Greek "manes."

All accounts agree in placing Mani at the court of Sapor in the middle of the third century, and in describing him as learned in all the wisdom of the Magians,—physician, astronomer, artist, philosopher and poet. He found the religion of Zoroaster, which had languished under the Parthian rule, just restored to life and vigour by the successors of Cyrus. The sword of Aristotle (so the Persians named the science of the Greeks) had been broken in the strong hands of Artaxerxes, Christianity was groaning under the persecution of Sapor, but Zoroastrianism, in the moment of its triumph over foreign and domestic rivals, was divided into two hostile factions of dogmatic opinion. Of these the Magusian, to which Mani was attached, desired to restore the pure primitive faith, which made Ahura-mazda, or Ormuzd, and Angra-mainjus, or Ahriman, (themselves the eidola of the Divine ideas of the Vedas) the sole tenants of the Zoroastrian Olympus. The other, or specifically Magian faction, supported the pretensions of a third and superior being, known as Zarvana-akarane, or "Time without bounds." It was a notable moment for a reformer; and Mani came forward, offering Christianity to the Persians as the pure Magusian creed, which the Christians ignorantly followed. At first Sapor received his teaching in good part, but nationality and faction were soon arrayed against him, and he escaped with difficulty from the indignation of his countrymen. From the court of Sapor he fled northwards into Turkestan. His flight was the Hegira of Manichæism. From this moment he assumed the prophet and claimed the full rights of an apostle—that apostle, he alleged, through whom was the coming of the Paraclete. From the place of his exile missions were despatched to all parts of Asia, reaching, it is said, as far as China and Thibet; and here, with more or less of conscious imposture, he wrote and decorated with pictures or carvings his sacred book, the Ertenghi Mani.

From the Christian sources before referred to, comes a tale to the effect that the exile of Mani was due to his want of medical skill; that, called in by Sapor to cure the sickness of his son, and proving unsuccessful, he fled from the anger of the bereaved father. Some (Mosheim among the number) have supposed this to be an allegory describing the moral sickness with which the apostatizing son of Sapor was afflicted, a supposition only less improbable than the tale itself. The production of the Ertenghi Mani, the same writers tell us, was accompanied by a pretended miracle of a journey to heaven, evidenced by the disappearance of the prophet in a cave, into which he had previously conveyed a large store of provisions, and whence, after the completion of his work, he came forth to the world, announcing it as a gift from the hand of the Deity. It may not be unreasonable to suppose that a man persecuted for his life should have spent many months in a cavern in the mountains, nor that the credulous enthusiasm of his followers should have attributed a celestial journey to their martyred teacher; at any rate the legend rests on a very slender foundation of probability.

In exile, the heresiarch certainly adapted the Scriptures to his canon, and composed besides certain theological treatises, of which the principal were known as the Mysteries, Chapters, Gospels, and Treasures. Such of the rude science and astronomy of the East as was current in Persia was carefully collected by the hands of the immediate followers of Mani; and as they dwelt in exile, far from the Persian centres of learning, this scientific bent must have been given to their labours by the individual influence of their leader. They proposed to explain both the origin of things and the nature of the Deity, and propounded a solution of theological doubt as well as a removal of scientific difficulty. The testimony of St. Augustine is given to the alluring quality of these pretensions, and at least to the eloquence of the authors who supported them. These authors anticipated, by a fortunate guess, the existence of the antipodes; and were among the many speculators respecting the existence and character of purgatory.

Followers, and devoted followers, very soon collected around the prophet; and it is particularly noticeable that the preaching of Mani met with this marked success, because, in this early period, Manichæism appears as a belief addressed to the reason of a small and cultivated class rather than one calculated to rouse the enthusiasm of an ignorant multitude. From his exile in Turkestan, the preaching of Mani penetrated the Roman Empire of Valerian and Gallienus, and reached the capital and palace of Sapor. On the death of that prince, his son and successor, Hormisdas, embraced the heresy and recalled the heresiarch. Either to secure his safety, or for convenience in superintending his missions, the prince allowed him to inhabit a strong castle near his western frontier. But the reign of Hormisdas lasted less than two years, and on the accession of his successor Varanes, the same Magian jealousy which had caused the exile of Mani successfully contrived his death. He was induced to accept a disputation with the Magi, and being declared defeated in the contest, his skin was flayed from his body and his carcase given to the dogs. It is not quite clear whether this took place during the short reign of Varanes I. or of his successor Varanes II., but the date given to the encounter and the execution is A.D. 277. This date is the same as that given to the supposed controversy with Arehelaus, Bishop of Cascar, according to the doubtful work so entitled; that work, however, ascribes the death of Mani to Sapor, into whose kingdom Mani, although under proscription, is alleged to have withdrawn after his humiliating defeat by the Christian bishop. The Orientals ascribe his death to the causes we have mentioned, and in fact to the inconsiderate zeal with which he laboured to introduce Christianity into Zoroastrianism.

The death of Mani crowned the edifice of Manichæism; and the fresh Magian persecution, for which it was the signal, dispersed, without disheartening, his followers, who continued the dissemination of their opinions in the countries of their dispersion.

The mythological scheme which Mani bequeathed to the world shews Ormuzd, the spirit deity or principle of good, eternally dwelling in his peculiar realm, with five ministers, light, air, fire, bright water, and gentle wind. Opposite to him is Ahriman, the author of evil, in a separate dominion, also having five servants, darkness, fire, smoke, foul waters, and tempestuous winds. The creatures of the kingdom of Ahriman had always pursued the congenial occupation of intestine strife, in ignorance of the existence of the kingdom of Ormuzd. Accident discovered to the powers of darkness the realm of light; it was the signal for its immediate invasion. For its defence, a spiritual emanation, called "the first man," was produced, under whose guidance the spiritual armies suffered defeat, if not captivity, at the hands of Ahriman. As a consequence of this defeat, beings made in the likeness of this Adam, but of evil nature, were in turn produced. The contest was soon however renewed by the servants of Ormuzd. A further emanation of light, styled "the Spirit of Life," took command of the armies of his defeated predecessor, and obtained a partial success over the creatures of darkness, and the victor was enabled to arrange the particles of evil into such a form, and so to blend the spiritual and the material Adam, that, though temporarily united in this Mezentian embrace of material evil, the light should possess the means of subsequent escape. It is to these labours of the Spirit of Life that we owe the condition of the world on which man lives. It follows, therefore, that no creation, in the Christian sense, can be predicated of the belief of Mani. We have only here a process of mixture by means of which the two opposing elements pervade and permeate each other, so that the existing system partakes of the nature of both. To the subjugation of the forces of light by the powers of darkness is attributed the loss of that free will which is the rule of human souls in the pure and spiritual condition. From these conquered beings, who by the force or guile of Ahriman underwent the material bondage of the body, the tainted inheritance of the enslaved will has been transmitted. In each body of a man thus descended there is a soul of darkness derived from the creations of Ahriman, a soul of light from those of Ormuzd, while the body of its own nature is material and vicious. Salvation is the freeing of the soul of Ormuzd. Ormuzd, the first person of the Christian Trinity, (not in any case to be identified with Jehovah, a subordinate Demiurgic minister of Ahriman), produced (contemporaneously with the production or rather the arrangement of the earth by the Spirit of Life,) the Christ, a spirit of light—misnamed Mithras by the Persians, residing in the sun by His power and in the moon by His wisdom, and the third Divine Person, the Holy Spirit. Christ descended upon the earth in a doctetic body, to draw upwards the souls of light. The sufferings which seemed to mar His divine person were the phantoms of the unpurged material eyesight, and symbolized the dishonour of the material effigy. According to Mani, those who confess Christ must renounce Jehovah, the servant of Ahriman and the minister of matter, and by obedience to the law of Christ, as expounded by his prophet, seek the freedom of the immaterial heaven. Leaving the vicious earth, the soul which achieves salvation will, after death, undergo a twofold purification; the first, by water in the moon, whose phases mark the ebb and flow of arriving and departing souls; the second, by fire in the sun. The soul that has lived in sin must re-enter matter, and there undergo the ordeal of a new life, or if only fit for the Manichaean purgatory, be given over to the demon-people of the terrestrial air. When all are purified save the irrecoverable, fire will consume the matter of the earth, and Ahriman, with the existences that belong to him, relegated to the proper realm of darkness, will be eternally guarded by the remorseful watchfulness of the damned. Holding this bizarre faith, the Manichæans declared themselves orthodox, as Trinitarians, as believers in a final judgment, in a resurrection of the spirit (not, of course, of the body, which they accounted evil), and in a salvation through Christ, dexterously claimed by the advent of His power, not by His sacrifice or expiation.

The whole sect was divided into two classes, the elect or perfect, and the auditors or catechumens, a circumstance which gave rise to the mocking accusation, that they possessed an ecclesia in ecclesiâ. Their hierarchy consisted of twelve magistri or apostles, with a president or successor to Mani, under whom were seventy-two bishops, with presbyters and deacons in descending series. All of these were selected from the higher rank of the perfect, though that order included many of the laity; and indeed it is everywhere a note of Manichæism, that it was to the pure life and not to the sacerdotal function that the dignity of "perfection" attached. No distinction of sanctity existed between the perfect: the priestly office was purely ministerial, and the lay and ecclesiastical members of the order were upon a footing of absolute equality. In these democratic elements, or rather in their capacity for democratic development, lies the secret of much of the vitality of Manichæism. The perfect were solemnly admitted by a baptism of purification, and to them were confined the highest sacra of their religion. They obeyed a rule of the most severe asceticism, were forbidden all animal food (including eggs and milk), wine, and all sensual gratifications; even marriage and the bath were proscribed. To till the land, to attend to private or public business, to do anything save to pray, bless, and receive the homage of the catechumens, was to depart from virtue.

It is scarcely possible to conceive a system more antagonistic to the Zoroastrian ideal; for the rule of life of the "Destour" enjoins, in the first place, activity and usefulness. The saint, as Zoroaster paints him, is an industrious citizen, who begets children, plants trees in bare places, carries water to the dry land; and indeed the Zendavesta tells us, that he who sows the ground with care and diligence acquires a greater store of merit than he who repeats a thousand prayers. Such antagonism explains the abhorrence of the Magi; and almost justifies the persecutions of the Sassanidæ. The life of the auditor or catechumen was equally inimical to Zoroastrian theory, although rather one of profession than of practice. His rule of morality was the same as that of the perfect, but he enjoyed the license of the weaker nature and was not bound to the ascetic life. Even the elect, unless the final act of lustration had been accomplished, were permitted to retire, if strength failed them, into the humbler condition of the catechumen.

The ritual of the Manichæans consisted of daily, almost hourly, prayer and fasting, and the perusal of the Scripture according to their canon; but no special temple was allowed to be devoted to the purposes of worship. They used certain hymns, which were however probably recited not sung, addressed, in great part, to certain beings, whose names ἠμόφορος and στέφανόφορος, recall the attributes and functions of angels. They turned in prayer to the sun by day and the moon by night, the visible signs of the deity of Ormuzd, the dwellings of the power and wisdom of Christ. Although denying the sacramental efficacy of Baptism, they continued its use as a token of the necessity of purgation, the obligation under which, as they declared, all persons lay of recovering the freedom of the will. They certainly used the orthodox invocation, for their apologists appeal to it in proof of their orthodoxy, and the fact that there is no mention of the rebaptism of any converts made by the Christian Church is conclusive of the reputed efficacy of the Manichæan administration of this sacrament. Similarly, while wholly denying the sacrifice of the cross, they retained a rite which they termed Eucharistic, but as the cup was filled with water, and the tenor of the service was one of thanksgiving, it cannot be said to have partaken of any sacramental or sacrificial character. In addition, these heretics are charged by St. Cyril of Jerusalem and St. Augustine with polluting the Communion under circumstances of the most revolting horror. They are alleged to have practised a rite called the ἰσχάς (the name means the wild fig, the symbol of lewdness), which is said to have consisted of a ceremonial pollution of the elements with the vilest products of the human organization. The story is in the highest degree improbable. The Manichæans at any rate called themselves Christians, and revered the name of Christ. The authors best capable of knowing, like St. Ephrem (himself an inhabitant of Mesopotamia), altogether ignore it. From St. Cyril, (who drew his historical information wholly from the Acta Archelai, which give no express information on the point,) down to St. Augustine, a long line of silent enemies acquit the heretics of the charge. Indeed, the general purity of their manners is admitted by many earlier Christians. Fortunatus, a Manichæan, in his controversy with St. Augustine, appeals confidently to his opponent's experience during nine years of fellowship, and St. Augustine is unable to allege that he had seen anything of a revolting character. Again, it is to be noted that St. Augustine, when writing to Honoratus, a pagan friend, whom the Saint, while yet a Manichæan, had induced to embrace the heresy, omits to use the obvious and cogent argument to be drawn from the repulsive character of these mysterious rites. This is alone fairly conclusive of the unfounded nature of the charge.

The Manichæan Church calendar was simple; all days were by the perfect appropriated to prayer, but the Lord's Day was specially observed by both orders, and kept as a strict fast both by perfect and catechumens. Easter, and perhaps Pentecost, was kept as a feast, though Christmas and Lent were seasons of no special significance. The great festival was the Bema or Commemoration of the teaching of their founder, which took place near the usual time of Easter; and was so named from the empty chair placed in the room where the solemnity was enacted, symbolizing the authority of the murdered founder of the heresy. The Manichæan Scripture canon rejected the Old Testament, as the work of evil inspiration, portions of the Acts of the Apostles, as containing false views of the Paraclete, and certain Epistles. Many alterations, the effect of which was to justify the doctrine and discipline of Manichæism, were, under the pretext of removing corruptions, introduced into the Gospels themselves. These, the Pauline Epistles, the books of Mani, and perhaps certain of the apocryphal scriptures, said to be the forgeries of Leucius, probably make up the whole of their canon.

In allusion to these striking peculiarities of ritual and discipline, the Manichæans received and adopted many strange titles; such are the names σακκόφοροι and ἐγκρατῖται (the penitential and the continent), ἀποτακτικοί and ἑδροπαράσταται (the set apart and the partakers of water), names partly assumed to protect them from notice, partly affixed, in times of persecution, by the contempt of their enemies. To these persecutions we owe both our knowledge and ignorance of the early history of the heresy.

The troubled state of the Persian religion which marked the moment of Mani's attempt, seemed admirably suited to the rise and development of his more advanced system. But success, which priestly jealousy would in any case have made doubtful, national hatred rendered impossible; and though the sword of persecution raised in Persia by Sapor drooped in the hands of his successors (at least until the reigns of Kobad and Yezdeshird), Manichæism soon became the religion of an obscure minority, and purchased by its silence and insignificance a prolonged and ineffectual existence. In the empire, on the contrary, the epoch seemed unpropitious. The old Gnosticism, which, like the heresy of the Manichæans, was a growth of the Dualistic dogma, had been lately overthrown by the Platonism of Plotinus and the idealism of Origen. Christianity, just triumphing over her intellectual adversaries, about to enter upon the dominion of the world, seemed little likely to brook the intrusion of a new and Oriental heresy. But on this ground Manichæism was successful. To its faint resemblance to honoured weapons used in the defence of orthodoxy much of this success was due. Through the country of the Platonists the heresy flowed rapidly into Western Africa, of all the Churches of Christendom the most prolific both in orthodox and heretical talent—the African apostle of the heresy being one Adimantus or Addas, whose name has been preserved by the fame of his treatise on the disagreement of the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures.

In Africa the success of Manichæism was almost national, and it was in Africa that Roman persecution first overtook the Manichæan sectaries. A rescript of Diocletian, now generally admitted to be genuine, was the signal for that series of assaults by sovereign princes, which have their crowning victory in the establishment of the Tolosan inquisition. But neither in Egypt nor Western Africa was the persecution effectual in stopping the march of the devouring heresy. It is curious to observe that the first great convert of these countries, Alexander, is a citizen of Lycopolis, the birth-place and residence of Plotinus. During the century succeeding the first inroad of Manichæan teaching, the sectaries appear to have evaded, by policy or obscurity, the special sufferings with which they were afterwards afflicted, or to have been confounded with some others of the innumerable herd of heretics which the orthodoxy of Constantine proscribed. Alexander Lycopolitanus, the greatest name of the period, does not seem to have suffered or witnessed persecution; and in the reign of Gratian, just a century after the death of Mani, we find a Manichæan, Sebastian by name, in command of the imperial contingent in Egypt, and continued in high office under succeeding princes; but repressive legislation had then at least begun. Valentinian I., with true imperial policy, had declared that all lands or tenements in which a Manichæan should be found were forfeited to the imperial fiscus. His coadjutor, the tolerant Gratian, when granting an amnesty to nearly all the sectaries in his dominion, specially excepts these dangerous heretics. The edicts of Theodosius decree death to the "perfect," outlawry to the "catechumen." The second Valentinian and Honorius confirm these severe enactments. Nor is it from orthodox enmity alone that the Manichæans needed shelter. The persecutions of the Vandal kings of Africa drove into Sicily and Italy the remnants of Manichæan vitality, where the acumen of Pope Leo and the ready subservience of Valentinian III. were exhausted in the destruction or conversion of the heretics. At the instigation of the Roman bishop, a special commission of inquiry was set on foot by the Emperor. From such prosecutors we can scarcely expect marked fairness, nor complete justice from such a tribunal, but it is alleged that the guilt of the heretics was ascertained before the most worthy, if not the highest, Roman tribunal, "coram senatu amplissimo," and made plain by the conspicuous evidence of the accused themselves, "manifestâ confessione ipsorum patefacti." We have already quoted the verdict of Leo upon these unhappy religionists. The charges made against them, if really substantiated, certainly warranted the imperial severity. Not only are they accused of polluting the Eucharistic elements, but the ceremonial violation of a maiden of tender years in the presence of the "perfect" is said to have formed part of their ritual. The terms of the edict which Leo obtained from the Emperor are conceived in a sufficiently repressive spirit. These heretics are to be banished from the world; they are everywhere to be liable to the penalties of sacrilege; to approve their opinions is to commit a public offence; it is felony to harbour them; no penalties for delation are to attach to their accusers; they are in every case to be deprived of the "testamenti factio." Some dissoluteness of manners may well have arisen within a sect whose constitution was so peculiar as theirs, but it is reasonable to conceive that the eagerness of Christian witnesses and judges confounded some of the viler pagan mysteries with the comparatively innocent profanations of the Manichæans. The heretics bowed to the storm. They conformed to certain of the Christian usages; they accepted the orthodox Eucharist, in which however they were not seldom detected by their avoidance of the cup; they changed their names; they forebore their outward observances, and probably in part forgot their meaning. Though incomplete, the work of Leo was not wholly in vain. His letters to the Bishops of Tuscany, Campania and Sicily shew how great an undertaking was the work of extermination. Thirty years after Leo's death his efforts were emulated by Gelasius, but notwithstanding that a century and a half of repression had elapsed before Gregory I. ascended the chair of the Roman See, that pontiff had still to complain of the multitude of these heretics, who had in many cases the audacity to occupy the lands of the Church itself. But if the exertions of the Pontiffs and Cæsars had failed to exterminate the sectaries, they had reduced them in the West at least to a body whose exertions were confined chiefly to self-preservation, and who, though they might aspire to the dignity of martyrs, no longer could arrogate the title of apostles.

It is in the early times of these imperial persecutions that Manichæism appears in its most attractive guise. The central figure of the heresy in this period is that of Faustus, Bishop of Milevi in Africa, that "laqueus diaboli" whom St. Augustine praises as the most eloquent of preachers. In him we have the type of the perfect Manichæan teacher, as St. Augustine himself is the type of the catechumen. In its progress through the land of the Platonic philosophy, the heresy, although it continued to retain the mystic Oriental mythology of its founder, slowly became adapted to the more rational requirements of Latin civilization. Faustus, African though he was, and though the African sect was reputed one of the most conservative, lays vast stress on morality, little on doctrines. He especially declares that it was by its moral results, by the piety that was the fruit of ascetic teaching, and not by the peculiar doctrine, that they would be judged. In A.D. 373 St. Augustine was a Manichæan, and for at least nine years afterwards remained in thralldom to the heresy in the condition of a catechumen. We have already described the singular professions of the "perfect." The life of the catechumen, as revealed by St. Augustine, is scarcely other than commonplace. Some peculiar cultivation, resulting from their scientific literature, an air of refinement and luxury, not to say of licentiousness, are the distinguishing marks of this ordinary life; while the perilous distinction of less and greater virtue, was, it would seem, already betraying the more ambitious and vigorous portion of the community into a life of cultivated sensualism. But St. Augustine had not the temperament which can remain perfectly satisfied with a merely material refinement, and his conversion, which gave to the side of orthodoxy the most vigorous intellect of the century, proved a fatal blow to the heretical cause. Almost the immediate result of this hostility was the deportation of the Manichæan leaders, the total destruction of their sacred books, and the proscription of the sect by the Roman power. Comparative clemency or ineffectiveness must however have on the whole marked these attacks, for the Manichæans fled unhesitatingly from the tender mercies of the Vandal to the proscription of the Roman executive. By that proscription, over which the Great Leo presided, the vigour of the early or Oriental Manichæism was destroyed.

This first period, that of the pure primitive Oriental heresy, commences with the mission of Mani in the third century, and closes with the pontificate of Gregory the Great in the early years of the seventh. After three centuries and a half of active life, we find it depressed, shorn of its special ceremonial, having lost, or in the act of losing, its mythology, its sacred books destroyed, its votaries, both "perfect" and "auditors," conforming to the manners and confounded in the mob of converted heretics. During the next four centuries, in its Italian exile it is slowly being moulded into the more available shape, receiving the more rational ideas, armed with which it was to terrify and to be destroyed by the iron power of Papal Christianity. During this middle period, while the old faith of Mani is slowly yielding up the Oriental and taking in the Western idea, the torch of heresy is successfully borne by the descendants of the Persian Manichæans, who had propagated his errors in the Eastern provinces of the Roman Empire. These heretics became first famous in Cappadocia and Armenia, the place of their rise, but are chiefly associated with Bulgaria, the seat of their exile. They were, however, very different from their African brothers. Policy or conscience had led them both to renounce the name and leadership of Mani, and to reject his more objectionable and complicated dogmas. Indeed, they anticipated and formularized much of that organic change subsequently observed in Western Europe, and present variations, at least in their Bulgarian exile, even more marked than those which are observable in the famous Manichæes of the thirteenth century. Fortunately for these earlier heretics, the patriarchal influence at Constantinople was in no wise comparable with the power of the Roman Pontiff, and the doubtful orthodoxy of numerous emperors gave moments of respite from ecclesiastical oppression. Still, though in a feeble way, in its persecution by the Eastern emperors, the history of Paulicianism (for such is the title assumed by this reformed Church of the Manichæans) rehearses the great Albigenian tragedy. This, the second presentation of Manichæism, is its reformed or Eastern development, and the period of its history is from the seventh to the eleventh century. [PAULICIANS.] The third and last phase of the heresy is the Western development. This, which engages attention from the eleventh to the fourteenth century, is a far purer representation of the primitive Manichæism than that of the middle or Paulician period. It has a double origin, the one drawn from the Bulgarian innovators, the other from the primitive remnant in the Italian cities. But the northern stream flowed through an unfavourable country, and was mainly absorbed by the persuasion, or diverted by the persecution, of the Church of Rome. Its attenuated bulk became wholly insufficient to preserve any distinctive congenital traits, and it was finally lost in the torrent of Southern Manichæism. But before the formulation of the heresy which we afterwards meet with as the Albigensian, its presence is indicated by a series of outbreaks in which traits, more or less Manichæan, are plainly visible. The earliest of these cases of reputed Manichæism is that of a peasant of Champagne, one Leutardus, an inhabitant of Virtus, near Chalons-sur-Marne. He is said to have dreamed, while engaged in the agriculture by which he lived, that he was commissioned to introduce a new practice and profession in Christianity. Obedient to this vision, he came forward as a preacher, announcing that marriage was unlawful, that the Cross was to be dishonoured, and that no tithes were to be paid. He appears to have been sincere, for he divorced his wife, and to have at first earned by his sincerity the contemptuous tolerance of the clergy; but as his following increased rapidly, they were soon compelled to expose his pretensions, and being a poor and ignorant creature he was readily discredited, and fell a victim to his preposterous mania. The date of this occurrence is A.D. 1000. Glaber Radulphus, from whom the story is taken, also gives us full particulars of the more celebrated case of the canons of Orleans, who, twenty-two years later, are said "to have been infected with an Italian heresy." The allusion to Italy, the refuge of the primitive and Oriental heresy, is particularly noteworthy. Although the story is variously told, the main features and approximate date can be made out. About the year A.D. 1022, a Society was discovered in Orleans, comprising several of the canons of the Church of St. Croix, and including besides many other persons, chiefly men of noble birth and studious habits. They were accused of rejecting the sacraments, and of asserting the viciousness of matter, testified by the same profligacy of ceremonial of which Leo accuses the Italian heretics, with this feature of additional horror, that the bodies of the children, the fruit of their debauchery, were at these orgies calcined, and the fragments distributed by way of Eucharist. A pervert discovered their crime, and they all cheerfully suffered the extreme penalty. These men are accused of profligacy, but their learning is undoubted, and the two were not generally united in the eleventh century. In Lombardy, the heretics, in whom we discover something of Paulician valour, occupied and defended through many weeks the castle of Monteforte, which only yielded to the superior forces of Heribert, the Archbishop of Milan. Taken prisoners, they refused to recant, and, with scarcely any exceptions, accepted the stake in preference to Christianity. Manichæans they undoubtedly were, holding the peculiar doctrines which spring from the dualistic theory; but we have an express allegation that they believed in the Old Testament. They are accused of Judaism and Manichæism, an accusation which must remain unintelligible. At Goslar similar scenes were enacted. At Arras alone was there any successful attempt at conversion. There the eloquent ministration of the Bishop of Cambray subdued the obstinacy of the Manichæans of the district, and the sixteen errors which they recanted are conclusive evidence of their Manichæan origin. They are found to reject Baptism and the Lord's Supper; to deny the sanctity of churches, of altars, of relics; to be strenuously opposed to the use of bells and of chanting; to deny the efficacy of ordination, of funeral rites, of penance, of confession; above all, they strictly repudiated the lawfulness of marriage. Everywhere the obstinate heretics were punished with death, only one voice, that of Wazon, the Bishop of Liège, being raised on the side of clemency. But in the next century Manichæism was in its zenith. Everywhere pursued by the detestation of mankind, the heretics held on their way through Germany, France, England, and Italy. At Cologne the populace joined in the outbreak, and flung the heretics into the flames; but the conduct of the perfect, and even of the auditors, astonished and perplexed the judges, who did not however abate the rigour of their sentences. In England, indeed, the rising was unimportant, and the heterodox opinions were easily stamped out.

From the executions at Orleans and Milan in A.D. 1022 and 1031, down to that of Cologne in A.D. 1163, the chain of persecution is completely continuous; but these persecutions, while they swept away Manichæism from the other districts of Europe, steadily drove downwards within the pale of Albigensian heresy the despairing remnants that escaped the justice of orthodoxy. Like their younger and more famous brethren, the Albigenses, they are known by many names, and like all anti-sacerdotal ascetics, rejoiced in the vague appellation of Cathari. But one fact of their nomenclature is noteworthy, namely, that these early isolated Manichæans are frequently called "Tisserands," or weavers. This seems curiously like an illustration of the democratic tendencies of skilled labour.

While the feeble exotic Manichæism of the North was thus dispersed, in the South it culminated in the great Albigensian revolt. [ALBIGENSES.] This was the final effort of Manichæism, which for a time defied the power of Christianity. It was finally crushed, however, in the middle of the fourteenth century, and thenceforth Manichæism appears only as the doubtful parent of the strange sects of the Beghards, Schwestrians, Turlupins, Albati Fratres, and Flagellants, who, in various disguises, penetrated, at a later period, into the France of Philip le Bel, the Italy of Boniface VIII., and the England of the Plantagenets. From all these countries the heretics were shortly expelled by the indignation of the people or by the hostility of the government. In Bosnia, a doubtful Manichæism, assumably derived from Paulician sources, appears to have maintained itself far into the fifteenth century; but the people were illiterate and barbarous, and their doubtful conversion by Cardinal Carvalho, which is alleged to have taken place A.D. 1422, anticipated only by about forty years their destruction by the Ottoman Turks. In Bulgaria only a remnant is said to have survived the Turkish wars, and the merit of having brought them back to the fold of orthodox Christianity is claimed by Deodatus, Archbishop of Sophia.

We have noted, then, the epoch of the three great waves of this heresy, which are seen to rise against, and be destroyed by contact with, the orthodox religion. The great heresy, once the rival of Christianity in Egypt and Africa, the conqueror of the Grecian Church in Bulgaria, and the equal opponent of orthodoxy in Southern France, would seem to be now approaching absolute extinction. In modern times the only trace of Manichæism in Europe is found in some savage and idolatrous tribes of the northern frontiers of Turkey (the descendants probably of the fierce Dualists whom the arts and arms of the Comneni failed to convert); but these have long since disowned, or rather have been incapable of comprehending, the tenets of their Manichæan forefathers. In Asia, in the Persian highlands, a remnant of primitive heresy is said still to linger among an obscure and predatory population. If, therefore, we except these few idolaters in the Bulgarian province, and the wild and treacherous hordes in the Persian mountains, nothing remains of this famous heresy which, in more than one century and in more than one region, menaced the very existence of orthodox Christianity.

THE LITERATURE of the ancient MANICHÆISM, once of considerable extent, and including works as well of science as of religion, is now, at least in its original form, wholly lost to us. The pitiless, if necessary, advice of St. Augustine, to burn the whole of that heretical library, which numbered in Africa alone [St. Aug. contra Faustum, lxiii. 14], "tam multi, tam grandes, tam pretiosi codices," has been but too faithfully obeyed. It is only therefore from the fragments selected for confutation by its orthodox opponents, and embedded in the writings of those opponents, that any idea can be gained of the temper and extent of Manichæan culture. The most nearly contemporaneous and important work of this character is the piece known as the Acta disputationis Archelai episcopi Mesopotamiensis cum Manete, a work from which all writers, other than Orientals, who offer any account of the life and doings of Mani, have very manifestly drawn their information. It is said to have been written in Syriac, and translated by an unknown hand into Greek, and thence into Latin. It purports to be a relation by Archelaus, Bishop of Cascar or Carchar, of a contest between himself and Mani, as to the rival pretensions of orthodox and Manichæistic Christianity. We have before pointed out the improbability, not to say impossibility, of the line of action which it attributes to Mani, its patent error as to the possessor of the Persian sceptre at the date of his execution, and its almost total variance with those Oriental accounts which are wholly free from suspicion. Further objections present themselves in the fact that, while Cascar or Carchar is very distinctly marked in this work as an episcopal town, situate just within the borders of Roman Mesopotamia, and described as a place enjoying all the luxurious civilization belonging to long-continued Roman occupation, research is unable to discover in the topographical records of the district anything at all answering to the description in the Acta. Three Cascar or Carchars are to be found, none of which are in Mesopotamia; two Cascar, one in Syria, far from the supposed scene of the dispute, the other in the neighbourhood of Seleucia, a Persian city under Persian domination. Both Karchesium and Carres have been suggested as names which might obviate these objections, but the city of Archelaus is described as wealthy and populous, and in particular, enthusiastically Christian; whereas Karchesium was a mere barren fortress perched in an angle of the Euphrates, while Carres was perhaps the most intensely pagan town in the Roman Empire. Add to this, the contest is unknown to any Oriental writer, the name of Archelaus is unmentioned by Eusebius, by St. Ephrem (himself an inhabitant of Mesopotamia), or by Theodoret: it also is omitted from the lists constructed by Photius in the seventh century, and by the learned Ebed-Jesu in the thirteenth century, which contain the names of the faithful who defended orthodoxy from the attacks of Mani. We have certainly the express testimony of St. Cyril of Jerusalem that he had seen the work, which is his sole guide to the history of the heresiarch, and a similar mention of it by St. Epiphanius and St. Jerome. But such testimony from its nature is worth very little, and under no circumstances is it so noteworthy as the silence of a countryman like St. Ephrem. Finally, Photius distinctly states that Heracleian, Bishop of Chalcedon, whose refutations of Manichæism he praises in the highest terms, had expressly declared that Hegemonius was the author of the Acta Archelai [Phot. Cod. 85, 20.] The date of this composition is to be found in the Acta themselves, where an argument of the falsity of the pretensions of Mani to be the Comforter is founded on the fact that, whereas Christ's promise was immediate, Mani's advent was not till upwards of three hundred years from the death of Christ. It would thus seem that this fourth century writer for the moment forgot that Mani and himself were not contemporaries, having forgotten that he had himself fixed the date of the supposed transaction by reference to the reign of Probus [Archel. Acta, n. 27], at the commencement of the last quarter of the third century A.D. Without laying too much stress on errors of chronology or topographical ignorance, the circumstance that Photius gives us the very explanation which a consideration of the various difficulties would by itself suggest, leads irresistibly to the conviction of the truth of that explanation. This shews the work attributed to Archelaus to be a theological essay written by some orthodox Greek, thrown into the form of contemporaneous chronicle; the idea having been no doubt suggested by the fatal Magian controversy : and this work, written in the early part of the fourth century A.D., and coming, in the unsettled times that followed the death of Constantine, into the hands of St. Cyril, was accepted by him as an authentic record of historical fact. As a nearly contemporaneous recital of the Greek view of Mani's life and character, containing as it does fragments of dogmatic teaching, and in particular a portion of an Epistola ad Marcellum attributed to him, the work of course possesses a very high value. Besides these Acta of Arche-laüs, the most important original sources of our information are to be found in St. Epiphanius in a portion of a sermon De fide attributed to Mani (of doubtful authenticity however), and in the works of St. Augustine. The thirty-three books of the latter, contra Faustum Manichæum, contain the text of a treatise, or at least one division of a treatise, written by the Manichæan Bishop of Milevi. Portions of Manichæan statements are also found in St. Augustine's two books, De Actis cum Felice, in his work contra Fortunatum Manichæum, and that contra Epistolam fundamenti, in which last an abstract of the work of Mani is given. These, with one other fragment of an epistle contained in St. Augustine's piece, adversus Julianum Pelagianum, exhaust the list of this heterodox literature. The orthodox opinions of the Fathers and philosophers who opposed Manichæism are to be best read in St. Augustine, de Hæresibus, in Titus of Bostra, contra Manichæos, and in works of similar title and character by Didymus Alexandrinus and Alexander Lycopolitanus, and passim in St. Epiphanius, Eusebius, Theodoret and Socrates. The modern literature of Manichæism is copious but undigested. The Histoire critique de Manichée et du Manichéisme, by Isaac de Beausobre, Amsterdam 1734, an author whose Protestantism is more decided than his Christianity, is a learned and accurate account of the early history of the heresy; with which, for the same period, may be advantageously compared the history of the Manichæans, contained in vol. iv. of Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique by Le Nain de Tillemont, Paris, 1701. C. W. F. Walch's Entwurf einer vollständigen Historie der Ketzereien, vol. i.; Nathaniel Lardner's Credibility of Gospel History, part ii. vol. iii., are the most important works on the early period of the subject, and in these the labours of predecessors in this field of inquiry will be found accurately collated and criticized. The philosophical aspects of the heresy have deserved and obtained the labour of Ferdinand Christian Baur, in whose Manichäische Religionsystem the subject is treated in the most modern spirit, as it is also by G. Flügel in his work, Mani, seine Lehre und seine Schriften. The Oriental authorities are Hyde, de vetere Persarum Religione; D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, and Pococke's Specimen Historiæ Arabum. The ecclesiastical histories of Mosheim and Gieseler offer the best general account of Manichæism: the latter contains, besides, very full citations from original authors, and provides the reader with an invaluable catalogue of the ancient and modern literature, including that of the middle and later as well as that of the early Manichæism.

MARATHONIANS. [PNEUMATOMACH.]

MARCELLIANS. Marcellus, Bishop of An-cyra in Galatia, and his followers, held a third and advanced stage of Sabellianism. For this heresy Marcellus was condemned by several Arian Councils, particularly by that of Constantinople in A.D. 336. Socrates states that the charge against him was, that he held Christ to be a mere man [H. E. i. 36]; Sozomenus, no doubt correctly,¹ that he held the Son of God to have His beginning from His birth of the Virgin, and the kingdom of the Son not to be without end [H. E. ii. 33]. This charge was founded on Marcellus' book against Asterius, an Arian, entitled de Subjectione Filii Dei [Hilary, Frag. Hist. ii. 22, col. 1300, Bened. ed.]. Marcellus, together with Athanasius, was acquitted of heterodoxy at Rome in A.D. 341, and at the Council of Sardica in 347.² It may reasonably be thought that Marcellus' judges proceeded rather upon a sense of his opposition to Arianism,³ and of his connection with Athanasius, than upon any clear and detailed proof of his correctness of doctrine; for from this time the charges against him were taken up by the Catholics, and Athanasius, who long declared him orthodox [Apolog. 2, Epist. ad sol. vit. agentes], was eventually obliged

² The terms of the acquittal at Sardica may be seen in the Synodical Letter to the Churches in Hilary [Frag. Hist. ii. 6]. It is said that Eusebius and his colleagues alleged as Marcellus' own statements what he only proposed as questions. It is said also that Marcellus declared in his book that the kingdom of Christ is without beginning and without end. Eusebius [cont. Mar. ii. 4] allows that the contrary assertion was not made without hesitation. Hilary mentions the point [de Trin. xi. 21], but does not name Marcellus. After naming and denying this particular charge, the Synod refers to a previous acquittal at Antioch.

On another point, the assertion of One God in the sense of denying the eternal Sonship of the Second Person, Hilary refers to Marcellus without naming him: "Impie multos ad unius Dei professionem Galatia nutrit" [de Trin. vii. 3]. To this passage Jerome doubtless refers when, writing of Marcellus, he says, "Sed et Hilarius septimo adversus Arianos libro nominis ejus quasi hæretici meminit" [de Vir. Ill. 86]. But in the second book to Constantius Marcellus is named as a heretic. The de Trinitate was written in Phrygia, the book to Constantius at Constantinople. It seems fair to infer that, coming from his banishment, Hilary found the heresy of Marcellus, of which he had himself little doubt before, generally acknowledged.

to suspend him from communion [Sulp. Sever. ii. 37]. A reference to these acquittals and to the subsequent condemnation was made in the Council of Constantinople [A.D. 869, Actio vi.], when Zacharias of Chalcedon, on the side of the Photian bishops, urged as an example that Marcellus had been acquitted by Pope Julius and by the Synod of Sardica, yet that he was always considered to be a heretic under anathema. It was replied that Marcellus was rightfully and regularly acquitted, because he had anathematized all heresy, and especially that of which he was accused; that when he afterwards returned to his heresy he was anathematized by those who acted with Silvanus, whose decision was ratified by Liberius. This was not a condemnation of the act of Julius and the council, but a subsequent proceeding upon Marcellus' change of mind. Eusebius' treatises, contra Marcellum and de Ecclesiastica Theologia, were occasioned by the answer to Asterius, and give in their citations and references "the only existing document of Marcellus' opinions." These opinions are most carefully drawn out by Newman [Select Treatises of S. Athanasius, p. 503], who relates also the connection between Athanasius and Marcellus. Newman's statement is as follows.

Marcellus held, according to Eusebius, that [1] there was but one person (πρόσωπον) in the Divine Nature; but he differed from Sabellius in maintaining, [2] not that the Father was the Son, and the Son the Father, (which is called the doctrine of the ὑπόστασις), but that [3] Father and Son were mere names or titles, and [4] not expressive of essential characteristics,—names or titles given to Almighty God and [5] His eternal Word, on occasion of the Word's appearing in the flesh, in the person or subsistence (ὑπόστασις) of Jesus Christ, the Son of Mary. The Word, he considered, was from all eternity in the One God, being analogous to man's reason within him, or the ἐνδιάθετος λόγος of the philosophical schools. [6] This One God, or μόνας, has condescended to extend or expand Himself, πλατύνεσθαι, to effect our salvation. [7 and 8] The expansion consists in the action, ἐνεργεία, of the λόγος, which then becomes the λόγος προφορικός, or voice of God, instead of the inward reason. [9] The incarnation is a special Divine expansion, viz. an expansion in the flesh of Jesus, Son of Mary; [10] in order to which the Word went forth, as at the end of the dispensation He will return. Consequently the λόγος is not [11] the Son, nor [12] the Image of God, nor the Christ, nor the First-begotten, nor King, but Jesus is all these; and if these titles are applied to the Word in Scripture they are applied prophetically, in anticipation of His manifestation in the flesh. [13] And when He has accomplished the object of His coming, they will cease to apply to Him; for He will leave the flesh, return to God, and be merely the Word as before; and His kingdom, as being the kingdom of the flesh or manhood, will come to an end.

It is sufficient to refer to Newman's note for the proofs from Eusebius that Marcellus held these tenets, and for the comparison of the tenets with the arguments of Athanasius in his fourth Oration. It is rightly remarked that there is no reason to doubt the correctness of the statement, on account of the Arianizing tendencies of the reporter. "Eusebius supports his charges by various extracts from Marcellus' works, and he is corroborated by the testimony of others." But we venture to differ from Newman in this, that we consider a large part of this scheme to be common to Sabellius and Marcellus, and not to belong distinctively to the latter. In the article SABELLIANS it is shewn that Father and Son were considered, as regards the Deity itself, to be mere names or titles, and the "Deus protendens usque ad Virginem" to be the Son. The Hermogenian notion of Christ leaving His body in the sun, whether or not the Sabellians adopted its terms, agrees in principle with the Marcellian tenet of the Son leaving the flesh, returning to God, and relinquishing the kingdom. Marcellus then appears to differ from Sabellius in his modification of the πλατυσμός, by introducing into it the doctrine of the λόγος, the ἐνεργεία of which he considered to constitute the "expansion."

Gieseler [Comp. i. 220] considers very probable the opinion of Baur [Dreieinigkeit, i. 26], that in the sense of Sabellius (rather we should say of Marcellus) the Logos, in opposition to the Monas, is the manifested God generally, and that the three πρόσωπα are to be considered as the changing forms of the Logos. Newman's statement appears to be the better supported of the two. But in whichever form the conception of the Logos was introduced, it creates no essential difference between Sabellianism and Marcellianism; and the general classification of the two as one heresy is perfectly legitimate: "Marcellus Sabellianæ hæresis assertor extiterat" [Sulp. Sever. ii. 37]. The formal condemnation of this heresy by the party of Silvanus, and its ratification by Liberius, has been named. The ratification by Liberius¹ is his acceptance of the letters presented by Silvanus, Theophilus and Eustathius, after a series of synods at Lampsacus, Smyrna, and other places; his letter to the Macedonian bishops in reply; his receiving them into communion upon this proof of their adherence to the Nicene faith. In the letter of the three bishops, the Marcellians are declared to have been condemned [Socr. H. E. iv. 12. Whether they were condemned in all the preliminary synods does not appear. Silvanus was present at the Synod of Antioch A.D. 363. Socr. H. E. iii. 25; Sozom. H. E. vi. 4].

The Marcellians are condemned in the first Canon of Constantinople [A.D. 381]. They are named after the Sabellians, and are followed by the Photinians. They were soon merged into the sect of the Photinians. The Allocation of the Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451] to the Emperor Marcian [Harduin, Concil. ii. col. 645] describes the Monarchianism of Photinus and Marcellus. [PHOTINIANS.]

MARCELLINIANS. A section of the followers of Carpocrates, who had a woman named Marcellina for their leader. Epiphanius speaks of them as worshipping images of Marcellina, and his statement seems to be confirmed by Irenæus and Origen, as well as by the custom of the Carpocratians in worshipping Epiphaneus, the son of their founder. [Iren. i. 24. Origen, contr. Cels. v. Epiph. Hæres. xxviii.]

MARCIANS. [MARCOSIANS.]

MARCIONITES, or MARCIONISTS. The followers of the famous heretic Marcion of the second century. Marcion was a native of Sinope, a wealthy shipmaster [nauclerus, Tertull.]. Rhodon, a writer of the latter part of the second century, calls him the mariner Marcion [ap. Euseb. H. E. v. 13]. The late and prejudiced writer Epiphanius says that he was the son of a bishop of the Catholic communion, an account which seems at variance with that of Tertullian, who says that he had been a Stoic, and uses several expressions that shew that his conversion to Christianity was at an advanced period in life. As little credit is due to the rest of the story of Epiphanius, that Marcion was excommunicated by his own father for seducing a young woman. The venerable and orthodox father and the profligate and heretical son formed a good contrast. But his great adversary, Tertullian, knows nothing of Marcion's profligacy, though the story is found in the spurious additions to his treatise de Præsc. Hæres. c. 57. On the contrary, Tertullian calls Marcion most holy (sanctissimus), and speaks of the difference between him and his incontinent follower Apelles, whom he calls "Desertor continentiæ Marcionensis" [Tertull. de Præsc. Hæres. 30].

Marcion left Pontus after being, according to Epiphanius, excommunicated by his father, and came to Rome. The date of his coming is involved in the difficulties of the early papal chronology. Epiphanius says that it was after the death of Hyginus [A.D. 142, Tillemont; 132, Bunsen], that is, during the vacancy of the Roman See. It was certainly before the year 139, if that be accepted as the date of the Greater Apology of Justin Martyr [Pagi, Neander, Bunsen], for in that Apology he is twice spoken of as then living and teaching in Rome. Epiphanius relates that on his arrival he went to the Roman presbytery and demanded the Proedria, that is, the episcopal chair, then vacant; such a demand could hardly have been made by a man of infamous character. His wealth also must have been considerable, since, according to Tertullian, he gave to the Roman Church no less a sum than 200,000 sesterces (ducenta sestertia, = about £1670). Being put under examination by the Roman presbyters, he is said to have retorted on them by the question: What is the meaning of that saying of our Lord, No man putteth new wine into old bottles? This anecdote, too characteristic not to be true, may explain his non-election. It was such a revelation of what was in Marcion, as could not fail to alarm the Judaizing party prevalent in the Roman Church. Epiphanius goes on to say that he left the Roman presbyters with the threat that he would cause a perpetual schism among them, and immediately joined himself with the heretic Cerdo, a Syrian Gnostic then in Rome. But the statement that Marcion was merely a revengeful schismatic seems confuted by Tertullian's assertion, that he remained in communion with the Roman Church until the episcopate of Eleutherius, though he was put out of communion more than once (semel atque iterum). As Eleutherius did not come to the Roman See before the year 172 [Bunsen], Marcion remained in communion more or less consistently for at least forty years, that is, during the greater part of his life. Tertullian says furthermore, that after Marcion's final excommunication, the large sum of money which he had given to the Roman Church was restored to him, but that, as he expressed penitence, the peace of the Church was offered to him on condition of his bringing back his followers with him, which death prevented him from doing [de Præsc. Hæres. 30]. The well-known story of Marcion's meeting with Polycarp in Rome, shews the same anxiety to keep from schism. When Polycarp visited Rome about the Paschal question, Marcion met him, and asked him to acknowledge him, to which Polycarp replied, I acknowledge the first-born of Satan. All this is in accordance with what we know of the practical bent of Marcion, who never elaborated such a system as that of Basilides or Valentinus, a system irreconcilable with Catholic doctrine; but based his peculiar views upon one or two tenets, easily comprehended in any system, and which he strove to get admitted into the Catholic system itself. Such a man would be anxious to avoid schism and excommunication above all things.
